Priests' Retirement Fund is a financial and spiritual benefit to all

By Alesha M. Price
Staff Writer

ASHEVILLE — Father Bernard Manley lives in an apartment in his hometown of Asheville now that he is retired and uses his time for his hobbies.

Father Dean Cesa is not thinking about retirement anytime soon. He was ordained in 1998 and now serves as the parochial vicar of St. Patrick Cathedral in Charlotte.

It would seem that these two men would not have much in common, but actually, both are "second-career" priests. Father Cesa was an electrical engineer for 12 years before deciding to go to seminary, while Father Manley was an architectural and building engineer and the general manager of the Asheville Chamber of Commerce before he went to seminary in Connecticut.

Moreover, both agree that the Priests' Retirement Fund is important not only for priests but for the lay community as well.

The money that parishioners will give during the second collection on the weekend of Sept. 11 and 12 will provide for the future retirement of current diocesan priests, support the pension fund of order priests, and supply other benefits for diocesan priests. Retired diocesan priests receive a monthly pension to help with their living, medical, and miscellaneous expenses after having served various church communities for many years.

This year's target amount for the diocese is $705,183. Bill Weldon, chief financial officer for the diocese, stated that approximately $568,000 of the amount collected will be contributed to the diocesan clergy retirement fund and the retirement funds of religious order priests serving in the diocese.

In order to determine the annual amount needed to fund the diocesan plan, an actuarial firm is hired to perform an actuarial valuation of the plan. This involves projecting the future retirement benefits of all diocesan priests based on anticipated benefit levels and projected years of retirement.

This insures the funds will be available when a priest become eligible for retirement benefits. Each parish and mission is assessed 3 percent of its yearly offertory to fund the priests' retirement and benefits program. This means that if the amount is not raised on that weekend, then the money will have to come from parish operating funds.

Father Cesa, at age 40, is years away from retirement but is aware of the importance of the fund to the priests.

"The consciousness that we have to raise is that all that we have is from God, so we must be generous with whatever we have and be grateful with what we have."

— Father Dean Cesa

"We need to make funds available for retirement, and this collection should serve as one's loving response for the service of priests and the loving response to God for what he has generously given that people are called to share," said Father Cesa.

He continued, "The consciousness that we have to raise is that all that we have is from God, so we must be generous with whatever we have and be grateful with what we have."

Father Cesa talked about Father Ray Berg, another retired second-career priest, and Father Ken Whittington, who both inspired him while he was in seminary.

Father Cesa said, he "really got an appreciation of the celebration of Mass from Father Whittington." Through Father Berg, he realized it was possible to be a priest after being an engineer because Father Berg had been an engineer also before becoming a priest.

Father Cesa's decision to become a priest was a gradual one, fostered after he began attending daily Mass which he says "will change a person's life."

Father Manley served the diocese for several years even though he was ordained when he was 65. After his wife passed away and his daughters were grown, he thought about becoming a deacon. Bishop Emeritus Michael J. Begley suggested he think about being a priest. That started the

New testimony points to army in Guatemalan bishop's murder

SAN SALVADOR (CNS) — New testimony from a former member of the Guatemalan army about military involvement in the murder of Auxiliary Bishop Juan Gerardi Conedera of Guatemala City has provided important evidence in the case, said investigators and church officials. "This is going to be a great help in clearing the crime up. It will help us piece together the whole jigsaw puzzle," said the director of the archdiocesean human rights office, Nery Rodenas. "I am more optimistic now we have this evidence," he told Catholic News Service in a telephone interview Aug. 26 from Guatemala City.

Papal trip to Iraq still not finalized, Vatican says

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Responding to persistent reports that Pope John Paul II will travel to Iraq this fall, the Vatican said such a visit is still awaiting final approval. "This trip to the Middle East, which — as is known — the Holy Father intensely desires to make, has not yet been defined," Vatican spokesman Joaquin Navarro-Valls said Aug. 26. The pope has said that as part of a biblical pilgrimage, he wants to visit the site of ancient Ur, birthplace of Abraham, the ruins of which are in southern Iraq.

Britain proposes anti-terrorism law include clinic attacks

LONDON (CNS) — The British government proposed amending the anti-terrorism law to include attacks such as those at abortion clinics, which would normally be handled under criminal law. The Home Office document, "Legislation Against Terrorism: A Consultation Paper," raises the prospect of attacks on abortion clinics, and doctors and nurses on staff, as have happened in the United States, though it says not a single case has occurred in Great Britain.

U.S. bishop tours Honduran site for clues on U.S. priest

TEGUCIGALPA, Honduras (CNS) — Auxiliary Bishop Thomas J. Gumbleton of Detroit toured the ruins of a U.S.-built military base in eastern Honduras, looking for clues about what happened to Father James Carney, a U.S. priest who disappeared in Honduras in 1983. Bishop Gumbleton inspected a small building Aug. 26 reportedly used as a torture center by the Honduran military and the U.S.-backed Nicaraguan counterrevolutionaries, known as contras, during the 1980s. The structure is located on the El Aguacate base, 80 miles east of Tegucigalpa, the capital. Bishop Gumbleton said Father Carney may have been held in the building, which has walls stained by blood and marked with scribbled writing.

Archbishop seeks church share of Peru's birth control budget

LIMA, Peru (CNS) — Archbishop Juan Luis Cipriani Thorne of Lima asked Peru's health minister to give the Catholic Church 30 percent of the budget the ministry earmarks for birth control. Speaking on a national radio program, the archbishop said the way the budget is used is "arbitrary and biased, since 99 percent of the money goes to promote artificial birth control." "With only 30 percent of the budget, we can show that Peruvians are capable of using well the natural methods of family regulation, because they are not the uncontrollable animals the current birth control program assumes they are," said the archbishop.

Report urges better pastoral care for cohabiting couples

WASHINGTON (CNS) — A report sent to the U.S. bishops Aug. 20 says the wide practice of cohabitation poses major pastoral challenges for church marriage preparation programs. It says marriages preceded by cohabitation are less likely to succeed than others, but pastoral ministers should approach a cohabiting couple's decision to marry as "a teachable moment." "Here is a unique opportunity to help couples understand the Catholic vision of marriage. Here, too, is an opportunity for evangelization," the report says. The 27-page report, "Marriage Preparation and Cohabiting Couples," was prepared by the U.S. bishops' Committee on Marriage and Family, headed by Bishop Thomas J. O'Brien of Phoenix.

Asian theologians say pluralism means recognizing other religions

BANGALORE, India (CNS) — The Christian mission amid Asia's religious pluralism must acknowledge other religions' existence and their legitimate role in their believers' lives, said a report at the interdisciplinary Congress of Asian Theologians. The diversity of religions in Asia is a "coresponse to God's creative design," said a report from the theologians who studied mission work at the second Asia theologians' congress, held Aug. 9-15 in Bangalore. The mission group report was received well, with no objections raised, reported UCA News, an Asian church news agency based in Thailand. Of the 104 theologians from 12 Asian countries and elsewhere who attended, 10 Catholics represented the Federation of Asian Bishops' Conferences.

New Kansas standards won't affect Catholic teaching on evolution

WASHINGTON (CNS) — A compromise version of science education standards passed by the Kansas Board of Education won't affect how Catholic schools there teach evolution, said an official of the Kansas Catholic Conference. Mary Kay Culp, the conference's associate director of education, said passage of the compromise means that each school district, including Catholic ones, "will be able to teach whatever we want on the subject of evolution." "The Catholic schools will teach Darwin's theory of evolution, they always have," she said. "And they will teach other valid scientific views that oppose evolution."

Hispanics find amigo in Father Aschmann

By JONATHAN WATSON

KANNAPOLIS — They come from south of the border to a place where they don't understand the language and the people don't understand their culture.

Sometimes the reception they get from locals is downright frosty.

But St. Joseph's Catholic Church in Kannapolis is a place where area Hispanics have found warmth — a place to worship and a friend and helping hand in Redemptorist Father Karl Aschmann, who worked as a priest for 35 years in Paraguay.

Aschmann conducts two masses each Sunday, one in Spanish and one in English. He has seen his congregation grow by leaps and bounds in the last three years — more than 400 attend his Sunday noon mass, which is held in Spanish.

He baptized 12 children last month, and has conducted several weddings at St. Joseph's. His congregation has grown out of the modest church building on St. Joseph Street and into the church's nearby fellowship hall, converted into a temporary chapel. On its door hangs a paper on which Aschmann wrote the names of the children who will be baptized this month, on Aug. 28.

Hispanics do not deserve the negative characteristics sometimes attributed to them, says Aschmann. "I've found them to be wonderful people," he says of his parishioners. "They're good workers, and they want our friendship."

St. Joseph's Catholic Church in Kannapolis is a place where area Hispanics have found warmth — a place to worship and a friend and helping hand in Redemptorist Father Karl Aschmann, who worked as a priest for 35 years in Paraguay.

Many are here because of economic or political troubles in their home countries, Aschmann says. They work hard, make money, and send it back to family members where they're from.

Another thing: "they want to learn our language," Aschmann says. English classes at St. Joseph's grew so much they had to move to Rowan-Cabarrus Community College's south campus.

"This year, we'll be at A. L. Brown," he says.

Aschmann, who is 76 years old, was ordained to the priesthood in 1950. In 1952, he went to Paraguay, the landlocked South American country he would call home for 35 years.

Shortly after he got to Paraguay, Gen. Alfredo Stroessner, a ruthless dictator, seized control of the government, Aschmann said. Under Stroessner, who ruled the entire time Aschmann was in Paraguay, Paraguayans had few rights and little hope for peace and prosperity.

Elections in Paraguay were a farce, Aschmann said. There was no middle class. High officials in the ruling party were very rich, but most of the people were poor. The ruling party took what it wanted.

Even his sermons were reported back to the government. Once in a sermon, he told his congregation to pray for greater peace in Paraguay and throughout the world.

He was approached later by a well-dressed woman, who repeated verbatim some of the words he spoke. "Those were strong words, Padre," she said.

"Don't we need more peace?" he asked the woman, a government spy.

"Yes," she said, "but you can't say that here."

The climate in Paraguay was tropical. Aschmann served a parish that was probably 100 miles long and 30 miles wide, he said. He got around by Jeep sometimes and horses when the roads, almost all unpaved, were impassable.

"The mosquitoes came in squadrons," he says. Dysentery was a frequent problem. Numerous highly poisonous snakes inhabited the jungles around the villages.

Father Carl Aschmann

In spite of the political oppression and difficulty of life, the people of Paraguay managed to be happy, he says. "Paraguay was a place of joyous people." And they kept to their faith. As a priest, Aschmann was revered.

"They loved God. God was very important in their lives."

His years in Paraguay taught Aschmann to love the people there for their simplicity, humility and generosity, he said. He sees the same traits in the Hispanics who come to Kannapolis, that he serves at St. Joseph's. "They don't have much, but they give what they have," he says. ▼

Mass to honor Mother Teresa, Sept. 5

A memorial Mass commemorating the two-year anniversary of Mother Teresa's death will be celebrated Sept.5 at 11:00 a.m. in St. Patrick Cathedral.

Bishop William G. Curlin will serve as celebrant and homilist. The bishop, a personal friend of Mother Teresa for more than 25 years, worked with her and her sisters in establishing shelter for the homeless and dying. The public is invited.

On June 13, 1995, Mother Teresa visited Charlotte and spoke at an ecumenical prayer service.

"She had a deep love for Christ... She came to help those in need of special assistance, especially the poor. For Mother Teresa, there was no child, woman or man on earth who was unlovable," said the bishop. ▼

The Pope Speaks

POPE JOHN PAUL II

Pope says loss of sense of sin strengthens social evils

By JOHN THAVIS
Catholic News Service

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope John Paul II warned of an erosion of the sense of personal sin, which in turn has strengthened "frightening" forms of social evil in the modern world.

"The drama of the contemporary situation, which seems to abandon several fundamental moral values, depends in great part on the loss of the sense of sin," the pope said at his weekly general audience Aug. 25.

"There exists a frightening attraction of evil that has made people judge many forms of behavior as 'normal' and 'inevitable.' Evil grows and presses with devastating effects on consciences, which remain disoriented and unable to judge," he said.

The pope said the weakened awareness of sin was caused in part by a widespread religious indifference and outright refusal to accept revealed truths and commandments. It is a theme the pontiff has developed in two encyclicals in recent years.

"Very often, human responsibility is obscured by the pretext of an absolute freedom, which is said to be threatened and conditioned by God as supreme legislator," he said.

The pope emphasized that social sin — including economically and politically oppressive structures — flows from individual sin. Even when personal sin is interior, he said, it leaves a mark on society.

He said it was undeniable that powerful structures of injustice condition many people's lives today. At times the economic wrongs imposed on disadvantaged populations give rise to moral discouragement, he said.

"So many people feel a sense of powerlessness and confusion in the face of a cruel situation that seems to offer no way out," he said.

But he said Christians should be convinced by their faith that even the strongest structures of evil can be defeated and replaced with structures of good. He said the upcoming jubilee year offers an opportunity to reawaken awareness of personal and social sin.

Pope seeks clemency for two Arkansas death-row inmates

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Archbishop Gabriel Montalvo, apostolic nuncio to the United States, appealed in the name of Pope John Paul II for clemency for Arkansas death-row inmates Mark Gardner and Alan Willett, whose executions were set for Sept. 8. The appeal was sent by letter to Republican Gov. Mike Huckabee. Archbishop Montalvo wrote, "The Holy Father, while praying and expressing deep sympathy for the victims, for their families and friends, prays nevertheless that the life of Mr. Gardner and Mr. Willett themselves may be saved through your compassion and magnanimity."

The Bottom Line

ANTOINNETTE BOSCO

A quarter century of writing to friends

I have a lot to celebrate this September. It is the 25th anniversary of a very special event for me — the invitation from Catholic News Service to become one of its columnists.

It started with a phone call from Angela Schreiber, then a features editor for CNS, on Sept. 18, 1974. I remember the exact date since this is my birthday. Using the strategy of flattery, she seduced me into saying yes, I'd take on the responsibility of writing a weekly column.

The agony and the ecstasy began immediately. Every week for these 25 years I have asked myself: What shall I write that is important enough — inspiring, informative or entertaining — to justify people giving their time, a chunk of their lives, to read it? This is not something I take lightly.

Without question, writing this column has had a profound growth effect on me. You cannot spend so much time contemplating ideas and researching facts without using the muscles of your mind and heart. The column has forced me to exercise every iota of discipline I have within me in order to write accurately and with style in hope that the reading would be easy and satisfying.

I have shared much of my personal life with my readers — stories of my children, my motherhood, my tragedies, my philosophies, values and faith. I have looked at issues and sometimes, with my social commentaries, stepped on toes. Occasionally, I have tried, and I hope succeeded, to bring a smile into the lives of my fellow Christians across the country.

People often ask me why I write and I answer: Why does anyone opt for the expressive arts like writing, art, music, dancing, acting? Sometimes I jokingly respond that I write because I am egotistical enough to think I have something to say that someone else would want to read. But that's only partly true. Most of the time I write because I hope to express an idea powerfully enough to get others to see a subject in a fresh way and then feel better informed or inspired.

Many of you have written and called me "friend," and this has been for me a privilege and an honor. It is hard to express how humble and proud I have felt when someone writes just to say, "Your story lifted me out of the blues" or, "Your column today revived my faith."

I have written this column not to be a teacher, preacher or model, but an empathetic friend, getting together with you to get to the bottom line: out of isolation and into communication. I have opted for a connection of mind and spirit. I hope this is what has happened and will continue to happen.

From my heart, thank you for making my life so much richer this past quarter century.

Coming of Age

AMY WELBORN

The message we're fed about sex

"It was open season on virgins."

So went the assessment, short and to the point, of an acquaintance's daughter's first experience of public high school.

After eight years in Catholic grammar schools, she'd chosen to attend the local bells-and-whistles public high school for academic reasons. What we old folks used to call health class provided the first encounter with this brand-new world.

It wasn't that the sexually inexperienced in the class were held up as direct targets. No, it was subtler than that, at the level of assumptions and atmosphere.

Quite simply, this class, which considered sexual issues, treated the students as if there were no options for them other than sexual activity.

Abstinence was not mentioned once. Ribbed condoms, yes. Abstinence, no.

It was too much of a radical shock to this girl's system, so she ended that experiment in terror and went back to Catholic schools.

I'm not writing to condemn public schools. That's not the purpose here at all, since I attended public schools for all but four years of my own student life.

No, I'm describing this girl's experience as a way of getting at a bigger point. What happened in health class is just one element of a consistent, pervasive message you're being fed everywhere you turn: that sexual activity is no more meaningful than walking down the street. But it's not true. I don't care if adults are the ones communicating that to you. They're wrong, plain and simple.

I thought about this again the other night when, unable to sleep, I stumbled into the living room and turned on the television. Flipping through the channels, I paused at MTV.

Now, when MTV first entered the world years ago, it was met with some concerns and protests. Various parents, worried about its content, demanded that it be taken off cable menus, and so on.

At the time, I didn't pay too much attention. I was just starting to teach high school then, and I'd watch MTV occasionally so I could understand my students and their interests. I didn't think it was terrible. Stupid, yes. Waste of time, yes. But pernicious and damaging? Nah. Well, time changes, and I don't think it's just my aging tastes.

The show is called "Undressed." It weaves three stories of various forms of teen-age lust together in a half-hour format, complete with cheesy sets, truly lame acting and absolutely no boundaries of taste or responsibility.

All you need to know is this: One of the stories focused on two girls getting a verbal lesson from a male friend on how to give a boy oral sex. Clinical names for body parts were never used, but it was perfectly clear what they were talking about.

Let's not fool ourselves on the target audience: It's teen-agers. I could go a lot of directions with this, and rail against those who profit from exploiting the vulnerable, but I won't. I promise.

Instead, I'll just remind you again that it doesn't matter if you're hearing this at school, on television and in the magazines you read: Sex is not a mere physical activity, and if you treat it that way, thinking that the only things that matter are contraceptives and technique, you are setting yourself up for tremendous harm and experiences that you will, without question, deeply regret when you're older and you look back at the gift you treated so carelessly.

Light One Candle

FATHER THOMAS J. McSWEENEY
Guest Columnist

Write on!

The great American editor George Horace Lorimer observed: "Writing is like religion. Every man who feels the call must work out his own salvation." Indeed, writing as a profession is a noble vocation that offers men and women tremendous opportunities to spread light where there is darkness.

Just a few weeks ago, I had a delightful conversation with Angela Masconi, a respected, award-winning reporter with the New York Post, who covers some of the city's toughest crime stories. She explained, "In the midst of even the most sordid details there is always some personal lesson to be extracted that might help readers gain a moral perspective that can make a positive difference in their lives."

We are influenced by the books, magazines, newspapers, and advertisements we read, by the copy that comes over the radio and television and Internet. All of these leave their imprint on us as individuals. They help influence our thoughts, mold our tastes and affect our judgments.

Increasingly the charge is made that the various communications media are producing too much that is cheap and immoral, too much that is materialistic and profane. There is alarm that literary and social standards have been radically lowered. Realistically, we can not expect "the cream of the crop" in all our sources of entertainment and information; but we should expect that the "milk" will not turn sour. For example, most of us do not object to occasional stories about violence. But we do resent a continuous and deliberate appeal to our baser instincts.

There is value, of course, in refusing to buy offensive literature, in turning off vulgar broadcasts, and in ignoring tawdry movies. But the real cure does not lie there, for it is like objecting to bad food without providing anything better. Good cooks must replace the bad ones, and in this case the cooks are the writers and communicators.

They are the people who write, produce or direct television programs or movies; the journalists and news anchors who talk to millions; the authors of stories, articles, plays and books. My experience with the Christopher movement tells me that God-given talent is much more generously distributed than most people realize. And it is of no use to protest, as some do, "Perhaps you're right, Father, but the industry still doesn't want worth-while people in the writing field." That is neither fair nor accurate.

There are a great number of sound, sensible communicators like Ken Burns, Bill Moyers, Mark Shields, Tim Russert, Cokie Roberts, and many more who are articulate in their beliefs and have changed their profession for the better.

It is my belief that more like them will come from those adults and young people among us who are not content to merely complain about quality, they are willing to do something about it. I am not saying that this is an easy career path. On the contrary, that is why we all have a responsibility to encourage people to develop the best that is within them. They will know the deep and lasting joy of creative work, and will play a part in bringing to others some of the true, the good, and the beautiful that the Creator of all intends for all.

Different religions in marriage

At a "PreCana" marriage preparation seminar last weekend an engaged couple were concerned about being of two religions. "Sometimes I visit his church; sometime he visits mine" said the soon-to-be bride. "But, shouldn't we choose one church?" Many couples find themselves in the dilemma of belonging to different worshiping communities. We think that what may be first seen as a problem can become opportunities for growth.

Ironically, religion should be a medium by which marriage finds strength. Yet, for many it is a stumbling block. For the couple mentioned above, their issues were less about doctrine than about their connections to particular communities of worship — membership. We suggested that they, for the time being, maintain memberships in both churches together. Wherever they go for weekend worship, they should go together.

We also suggested they discuss this with their pastors, get a sense of what their membership means to their relationship, involve themselves in a ministry together, and allow time, work and the Spirit to direct them. Eventually, they will gravitate to one church or the other.

For some couples, ideological, theological and doctrinal differences separate them Sunday mornings. Their religious differences create for them opportunities to learn about other traditions. Worshiping together allows them to learn more about the practices and customs that have shaped each other's spirituality.

It helps to understand that all marriages involve differences in faith. Our experiences of God are unique. One challenge/opportunity that is lifelong in marriage is to discover shared God-experiences that create a shared spirituality that transcends religion. Making your home a sanctuary for God, experiencing together awe in nature, participating together in God's creation of children, working together for the people of God, all offer shared numinous experiences.

Also understand that differences in faith are part of what's different about the individual partners. This is so even when they are of the same religion. Family traditions and personal histories shape our world-views and our perceptions of the numinous. Married partners bring their unique faiths to share with each other. It's important to be open to those experiences and willing to be affected by them. What emerges is a unique couple spirituality that can be the center of joy in a marriage.

However, the "danger" of learning is growing. When we're open to the God-experiences of another, our own faith changes. To grow in marriage couples must embrace that change, reverence it and be faithful to it. Indeed it is the experience and manifestation of God in them. It is living a sacramental relationship.

Only God is unchanging; we're not expected to be. Fear of change in this area of our lives stunts our growth and blocks our view of "God-in-us" that is our greatest source of strength.

Irreconcilable differences about faith

Q. I have a big problem. I am dating this wonderful man, hardworking, kind, and I love him very much. The problem is he is Lutheran and I am Catholic. Neither of us wishes to change. If we have children he wants them Lutheran, and of course I want them to be Catholic. I have cried for two weeks now and can't sleep. He knows this, but doesn't want to talk about it because he knows I get upset.

His parents were killed several years ago, before we met. I have talked with my parents about it but still cannot come to a decision. I am 31, he is 34. We've been dating for 16 months. Please help me.

A. I wish I had a solution that you and your fianc, could feel happy about right now, but I don't. And I don't think anyone has.

You really are at absolute odds, and getting married will not change that; in fact, the problem will most likely just get worse.

The most important task you have is to be totally honest with each other about this dilemma and, even more seriously, be honest with yourselves. Unless one of you changes, which appears impossible, one of you will end up sacrificing what you believe is spiritually essential for your children and for yourself as a parent.

From what you tell me, that is unthinkable for both of you, which, if you are both sincere and committed in your faith, is the way it ought to be.

If neither of you changes and you do get married, chances are you will be living in a permanently tense and bitter standoff, which I'm certain is not the kind of marriage either of you wants.

Interfaith marriages inevitably bring with them special challenges which are not present when the husband and wife share a common faith and vision of life. Before a marriage takes place, however, the couple need to have identified some shared avenues they agree on by which they can resolve the differences which will confront them.

That does not seem to be the case with you and your friend. As hard as it may be, you need to rethink your plans for marriage. That will be far less difficult than abandoning the way you live your life with God as a Catholic or asking him to abandon his, which both of you will regret.

Letting go of your tentative marriage plans will take a lot of courage. But good marriages are built on a variety of essential qualities, including some you surely do not share now. I will pray for you, and I know many of our readers will also.

Dear Readers: Several weeks ago I responded again to a question about disposing of old religious articles. Here are two more locations to which rosaries, pictures, statues and other sacramentals may be sent. They have contact with groups in our country and elsewhere who can use them.

Man shoots, kills self in St. Peter's Basilica

By JOHN THAVIS
Catholic News Service

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — An Italian man shot and killed himself near the main altar of St. Peter's Basilica, prompting authorities to temporarily close the church.

Authorities said the basilica was full of visitors Aug. 26 when Benedetto Minnini, a 63-year-old man from the southern Italian city of Bari, pulled out a pistol and shot himself once in the head. He died instantly.

An Australian woman tourist who witnessed the shooting screamed for help, and Vatican police quickly sealed off the area and later closed the basilica. The man's family did not offer an explanation for the suicide, or say why he traveled to Rome and St. Peter's Basilica to kill himself.

Pope John Paul II was staying at his summer residence outside Rome at the time of the shooting.

Vatican spokesman Joaquin Navarro-Valls called the suicide a "sad episode." He said that, contrary to some reports, the basilica had not been "deconsecrated" by the suicide, but that a "rite of reparation" would be carried out at the regular evening Mass the following day.

There have been previous suicides in St. Peter's Basilica, but this was the first suicide-by-gunshot in recent memory. ▼

Catholic ex-POW, ambassador, urges new look at Vietnam

WASHINGTON (CNS) — U.S. Ambassador to Vietnam Douglas "Pete" Peterson, a prisoner of war during the Vietnam conflict, said America should take a fresh look at the Southeast Asian nation. Vietnam has changed between his assignments to Vietnam, said Peterson, a Catholic. "Vietnam isn't the nation that it was when we were engaged in that situation," he said. At the time of the Vietnam War, 49 million people lived in both North and South Vietnam, he said. Today in the reunited country of 80 million residents, "65 percent of the people are under age 25, and 80 percent are under age 40," giving the nation very little collective memory of the war, Peterson added. The ambassador is the focus of a PBS documentary, "Assignment Hanoi," to air Sept. 7 on many PBS stations.

Hospital stay prolonged for Cardinal O'Connor

NEW YORK (CNS) — Cardinal John J. O'Connor of New York remained hospitalized at Memorial Sloan-Kettering Cancer Center in Manhattan Aug. 30. Joseph Zwilling, communications officer for the Archdiocese of New York, told Catholic News Service that the cardinal was expected to remain a while longer at Sloan-Kettering, where he had been undergoing tests since his Aug. 25 admission. No information has been released about the results of the tests.

Judge temporarily modifies decision on Ohio school vouchers

WASHINGTON (CNS) — A federal judge in Cleveland Aug. 27 temporarily reversed a decision he made three days earlier halting an Ohio school choice program that gives vouchers worth up to $2,500 to Cleveland students to attend private or parochial schools. In the new ruling, U.S. District Judge Solomon Oliver Jr. said elementary students who participated in the program last year may receive vouchers this year for the first semester or until a trial set to begin Dec. 13 settles the constitutionality of the issue. However, some 587 students who were to join the program this fall will not get vouchers under Oliver's amended decision.

Ex-senator urges graduates to keep learning throughout life

JOLIET, Ill. (CNS) — When Paul Simon gave up his seat in the U.S. Senate in favor of a modest office in the Public Policy Institute at Southern Illinois University in 1997, it was a matter of predictability. "Now I can tell my wife I'll be home for dinner," said the professor of political philosophy and journalism in an interview with the Catholic Explorer, Joliet diocesan newspaper. The 70-year-old lifelong Democrat took a break from the classroom Aug. 14 to give the keynote address highlighting commencement ceremonies at the University of St. Francis in Joliet.

Timorese await autonomy vote result amid violent backdrop

DILI, East Timor (CNS) — The largely Catholic population of East Timor waited for the result of an Aug. 30 U.N.-sponsored ballot on autonomy amid a backdrop of ongoing violence.

On the day of the vote, an East Timorese working for the United Nations was stabbed and killed, the first U.N. worker to be killed in the violence leading up to the ballot.

Bishop Carlos Filipe Ximenes Belo, the Nobel Peace Prize-winning apostolic administrator of Dili, appealed Aug. 30 to both the pro- and anti-independence camps to work together for peace.

"My appeal to the leaders is that they are able to convince their bases to accept the verdict of the people and to lay down their arms and help make political compromise to ... work for peace and reconciliation," he said.

About 95 percent of eligible East Timorese were believed to have voted, including Timorese living abroad such as in the United States, Australia and Portugal. Voting was reported relatively peaceful, with heavily armed police standing guard along with unarmed U.N. police advisers at the 200 polling places in East Timor.

Results of the vote were not expected to be announced until a week afterward.

In a statement read at an Aug. 29 Mass in Dili, Bishop Belo had urged East Timorese to vote according to their conscience and to avoid violence. The bishop was out of town celebrating a Mass for peace in Suai, an area wracked by months of militia-led violence.

East Timorese, holding voter registration papers, wait outside a polling station for the start of the U.N.-monitored vote on independence in Dili Aug. 30.

"Don't be afraid. Be brave and choose the future of East Timor," he said. "This generation will create history — and people all over the world will talk about us. They will talk about the brave warrior people and the brave hearted."

Bishop Belo had said he would stay with his people as the vote neared and violence escalated.

"The Vatican has entrusted the Catholics here to me, so I will never leave them, whatever the risk I face," he said.

On Aug. 23, he confirmed receiving a death threat which said in the Bahasa Indonesian language: "Be careful. For now your robe is white, but one day, it will be stained with your own blood."

Catechists and church workers were killed and attacked throughout the territory in the weeks leading to the vote.

U.S. Rep. James P. McGovern, D-Mass., after a weeklong mid-August fact-finding mission in East Timor, noted how many of those opposed to independence would "prefer that the bishop not be on the scene. The threats have to be taken seriously."

Despite the May 5 agreement calling for a vote on East Timor's status, militias in the region continue to operate "with impunity," McGovern said.

In the days leading up to the vote, some 200 East Timorese fleeing pro-Indonesian militias took refuge in a Don Bosco boys' school in a Dili suburb. In Balide, 50 women and children sought refuge at Salesian convent.

"They feel safer here than they do in their own homes," said a nun.

The militias forced more than 60,000 East Timorese from their homes shortly before the voting, the Vatican missionary news agency Fides reported Aug. 30. Refugees were said to be hiding in the countryside.

Fides said that at Oekusi, in the eastern part of the island, pro- and anti-independence armed groups clashed, injuring dozens and burning 40 homes.

Pope John Paul II prayed for peace in Indonesia and East Timor Aug. 25 at the end of his general audience.

Speaking about East Timor, he prayed "that all its inhabitants and all others involved in the events of that territory" work sincerely for reconciliation and help heal historical wounds "with mutual respect and love."

Indonesian President B.J. Habibie has said if the voters reject autonomy,

Mexican church hopes Blessed Juan Diego will be canonized in 2000

By JIM HODGSON
Catholic News Service

MEXICO CITY (CNS) — Mexican church leaders said they were confident that the man who witnessed the apparition of Our Lady of Guadalupe in 1531 will be named a saint by Pope John Paul II on May 21, 2000.

During an Aug. 24 news conference that was followed by Mass in the Basilica of Our Lady of Guadalupe, Cardinal Norberto Rivera Carerra of Mexico City said the canonization of Blessed Juan Diego Cuauhtlatoatzin was "almost complete." The Vatican has made no official announcement of canonization.

The news conference was held to launch a book that documents the life of Blessed Juan Diego and his encounter with Our Lady of Guadalupe. Cardinal Juan Sandoval Iniguez of Guadalajara and Archbishop Justo Mullor Garcia, papal nuncio to Mexico, were present with Cardinal Rivera.

During the Mass, the prelates were joined by the prefect of the Vatican Congregation for Clergy, Cardinal Dario Castrillon Hoyos, and by Cardinal Ernesto Corripio Ahumada, the retired archbishop of Mexico City. The Mass was frequently interrupted by applause from a large, enthusiastic congregation.

In his greeting, Colombian-born Cardinal Castrillon said what he learned about Blessed Juan Diego had touched his mind and his heart.

"In the universal church nobody can reasonably doubt that Blessed Juan Diego has been the emissary of Holy Mary, to make her known and loved, and through her, her divine son," he said.

Msgr. Oscar Sanchez Barba, the postulator of Juan Diego's cause in the canonization process, told reporters at the news conference that some members of the Mexican hierarchy continue to doubt that Blessed Juan Diego really existed.

He noted the controversy that erupted in 1996 when Abbot Guillermo Schulenburg, the basilica's abbot at the time, told reporters he did not believe in the Guadalupan apparitions or that Blessed Juan Diego ever existed. Soon afterward he resigned from the post he had held since 1963.

Cardinal Rivera said doubts about the existence of Blessed Juan Diego did not slow the canonization process, but led church officials to work more carefully to expose the truth about his encounter with Mary.

Mary is believed to have appeared to Juan Diego, an indigenous man, on three occasions in December 1531, 10 years after Spain's conquest of the Aztec empire.

Juan Diego was born in 1474 in Cuautitlan, a community northwest of what is now Mexico City. He was named Cuauhtlatoatzin, and when he was baptized by Franciscan missionaries in 1525, he received the Christian name Juan Diego.

Mary encountered him on a hill known as Tepeyac, on the north side of Mexico City. The hillside was associated with the worship of Tonantzin, a mother of gods in the Aztec religion.

Mary appeared as an Aztec princess and spoke in Nahuatl, the language of the Aztecs still spoken by about 3 million people in central Mexico. She addressed Juan Diego with an honorific title and asked him to tell the bishop she wanted a church built on the site.

When the bishop asked Juan Diego for proof she had made this request, Juan Diego returned to Tepeyac. Mary told him to gather roses in his cloak and to take them to the bishop.

When Juan Diego returned to the bishop, he unrolled his cloak, which was emblazoned with the image of Mary, dressed as a dark-skinned Aztec princess, standing in front of the sun and on top of a crescent moon. The cloak now hangs behind the altar of the basilica.

The message was understood to be an affirmation of the indigenous people in the midst of their defeat and oppression, and was central in the church's evangelical effort.

Juan Diego died in 1548. He was beatified by Pope John Paul on May 6, 1990, during a visit to Mexico City. Mexican church leaders said they expect Juan Diego to be declared a saint on May 21, the day during the jubilee year they said the pope will dedicate to Mexico. ▼

Peace group says German bishops ignored church support of WWII

By LYNNE WEIL
Catholic News Service

ROME (CNS) — A German Catholic peace group has accused Germany's bishops of ignoring the church's support 60 years ago for the launch of World War II.

But a spokesman for Germany's bishops said that statements have already been made over the past 50 years by the church in Germany concerning the war and that another one was not needed now.

Joachim Garstecki, the group's general secretary, said that "the church's support of Adolf Hitler's war has been a blind spot for far too long."

The German branch of Pax Christi, the Belgian-based international peace movement, said in a late-August statement that its views were provoked by the German bishops' conference's "silence on the topic of the entanglement of our church in the Second World War."

Pax Christi's German branch had asked the bishops last November to make a clear declaration of church culpability in Adolf Hitler's attack on Poland in September 1939, which launched the war. The agency asked that this declaration be made before the 60th anniversary of the event.

Pax Christi said it regrets that the bishops have made no such statement.

"The Catholic Church in Germany, despite its decisive ideological opposition to national socialism, supported the German government (under Adolf Hitler) in its war," the group wrote.

Joachim Garstecki, the group's general secretary, said in an Aug. 27 telephone interview that "the church's support of Adolf Hitler's war has been a blind spot for far too long."

"Much discussion has been made of the Holocaust and the role church inaction played in that," he added. "But there has been no official admission that the Catholic Church was supportive of the invasion of Poland."

Rudolph Hammerschmidt, the German bishops' spokesman, told Catholic News Service that "Pax Christi is not taken very seriously around here."

"The documentation laid out by the church over the past half-century concerning the Second World War is available for all to see," he added. "Statements have already been made, and we find no reason to make another on this occasion."

In May 1995, the German bishops released a statement on the failure of the faithful and the church to stop the war and the Holocaust. The statement was timed to the 50th anniversary of the end of the war in Europe.

The German bishops issued a joint statement with the Polish bishops' conference in December 1995 concerning individual abuses among Poles and Germans during and after the war. ▼

Diocesan schools apply for higher accreditation level

EDITOR

CHARLOTTE — On the cusp of the millennium, Catholic schools in the Diocese of Charlotte are taking the first steps towards a higher level of certification. Once completed, diocesan schools will enter the new century as part of the elite group of schools accredited by the Southern Association of Colleges and Schools.

Regional accreditation is the means by which educational institutions regulate themselves through self-evaluation and peer evaluation. All diocesan schools must meet 114 established standards, in areas including curriculum, faculty, resources and services, buildings and grounds, and school improvements. The process is an opportunity for faculty to improve and enhance the learning process.

Monitoring the process are Superintendent Dr. Michael Skube, Assistant Superintendents of Schools Franciscan Sister Mona Wingert and Janice Ritter. While Sister Mona oversees adherence of certification for all teachers, Ritter has involvement in other levels required for certification.

For teachers, Sister Mona insures "everyone is teaching in the field in which they are certified." Concurrently, Ritter is the resource contact for schools as they go through "the process of writing their individual school plan."

That plan, says Ritter, includes "developing a profile of their school, describing the makeup of their school, defining or redefining their mission statement." From there, it is a process that calls each educational facility to take an introspective look at their individual school goals and objectives. "It reminds schools that they are working toward excellence," says Sister Mona. "The faculty has to make the plan; they are the ones to look at their needs and determine what and how to achieve their goals," Ritter added. "The faculty has a common mission."

Reviewing plans of action, SACS will determine eligibility. Each school stands alone for accreditation. And while each school determines its own plan, the Diocese of Charlotte injected two goals each educational facility must include: a spirituality goal and one for technology.

While the ultimate beneficiaries are students, accreditation further underscores each school's adherence to a quality of education synonymous with Catholic school education in the Diocese of Charlotte. "The benefits of accreditation are numerous," says Sister Mona. "For each school, this accreditation promotes the sharing of new ideas, innovative programs, and current trends in education, as well as enhancing professional expertise and judgement."

Fourteen of the 17 diocesan schools are involved in this critical self-evaluation. Bishop McGuinness Memorial High School in Winston-Salem, Charlotte Catholic High School, and St. Michael's School - kindergarten through 8th grade- in Gastonia have been SACS accredited for a number of years. ▼

Ritter wears new assistant superintendent title well

By ALESHA M. PRICE
STAFF WRITER

CHARLOTTE — Janice Ritter has been a part of almost every aspect of Catholic and public education, so it seems natural and logical for her next step to become the second assistant superintendent of schools for the Diocese of Charlotte. Ritter comes to the recently created position with a wealth of knowledge and experience.

Sister Mona Wingert, assistant superintendent of schools, offered some thoughts on Ritter: "I felt that she best fit our job description. She is very professional and personable and open to new ideas. She will be working with in-services and staff development, and she already put out her first newsletter, which was well received. I am delighted to have her in this position."

After obtaining her bachelor's degree in fine arts and her master's degree in fine arts with a concentration in art education from the College of New Rochelle in New York, she jumped into teaching with both feet.

She was the art teacher for kindergarten through eighth grade and a fourth and fifth grade teacher at Blessed Sacrament Elementary School in New York for several years. During that time, she was the head teacher of three- and four-year-old children at the Child Study Center.

She moved to Charlotte in 1988 and began her life in the city with a job at Beverly Woods Elementary as a kindergarten-through-sixth grade art teacher.

At Sharon Elementary, she was a first-grade teacher and established a multi-age program. This would allow CHARLOTTE — Those were scary words during morning announcement time, but the Diocese of Charlotte schools have lined up principals who can possibly make that visit virtually stress-free one. Children are resisting, and parents are rejoicing because the bell has rung for the 1999-2000 school year. Students from four diocesan schools started the year with new supplies, uniforms, and principals.

"We are very fortunate that all four principals have been involved with Catholic schools in some way, either attending Catholic school or being involved with teaching or administrative positions. They will all do well in their new positions because they understand Catholic schools."

— Dr. Michael Skube, Superintendent of Schools

Sharon Broxterman

"I love teaching and being around children. I thought at first that I would have to give that up if I became principal; however, I realized in order to be an effective principal, you have to remain in their [children's] presence," explained Broxterman, St. Gabriel's new principal in Charlotte.

Broxterman

This Ohio native moved to Charlotte in 1985 after teaching kindergarten through fourth in Kentucky. She received her undergraduate degree from Thomas Moore College in Kentucky and her master's of education from Northern Kentucky University.

During her first years in Charlotte, Broxterman taught fourth grade at St. Ann's and All Saints in Charlotte. While she was teaching at All Saints, she was asked to fill the position of assistant principal in addition to her classroom work. She had double duty until the student population grew larger, then she concentrated on the role of assistant principal singularly.

She simultaneously worked at All Saints and attended Winthrop University in Rock Hill, S.C., to obtain certification in administrative supervision. Her religious background includes certification in religious instruction and the position of religious coordinator at All Saints.

Involvement with Catholic education is a family affair with two daughters who have been teachers in the MACS system and one currently teaching at Our Lady of the Assumption.

Broxterman describes herself as a hands-on principal who loves being in the classroom to see how kids learn, and she hopes that she can help the teachers do a better job.

William Meehan

Family brought Meehan to Charlotte. Immaculata's newest face in Hendersonville is originally from Massachusetts and lived in Midwestern states while working as an elementary school principal for over 20 years in various schools.

Meehan

While serving as principal and development director of an elementary school in Iowa for nearly nine years, he decided to leave that position when, through a series of events, the school was no longer affiliated with the Catholic Church. With a daughter in Tryon, N.C., and a sister in S.C., he figured that Charlotte would be a nice place for him to move.

"I liked what I saw when I came down here, so I decided to stay," said Meehan.

Before working in Iowa, this military man earned his bachelor's in political science and his master's of education from two Massachusetts schools: American International College and State College at Westfield. He also has certification in administrative positions from various states and has been the principal of six different schools throughout the Midwest.

For 10 hectic years from 1978-1987, Meehan was the co-superintendent and principal and director of curriculum for an Illinois elementary school.

What causes a man to be so dedicated to Catholic school education? Meehan cites his aunt who was a nun and taught college.

"I was impressed by her involvement and that inspired me to teach and eventually to become a principal," he said.

What Meehan likes most about being a principal is the opportunity and the ability to allocate necessary resources and being able to make a difference and a contribution to education.

Angela Montague

Montague has always had the inclination to become a principal but never pursued her dream until she became certified in school administration.

Montague

"Being a teacher and a principal are similar because of the constant contact with students and other teachers, but the job of principal is a more global position because the decisions affect everyone in the school," said Montague, recently named as principal of St. Patrick in Charlotte.

Originally from New Jersey, she and her family have been living in Charlotte for 14 years after her husband received a job transfer. Since then, she has obtained her N.C. licenses in K-12 counseling and K-12 school administration. Prior to that, Montague earned a bachelor's degree in social work from Rutgers University and a master's degree in education from UNCC.

She has 11 years in the education system with six years experience as a

Triad schools plan on track

By JOANN S. KEANE
Editor

WINSTON-SALEM — Several months have passed since Bishop William G. Curlin announced plans to build three new schools in the Triad region.

In keeping with the initial plan, the first phase of the Triad schools plan still calls for a new, centrally located Bishop McGuinness High School.

During the past few months, the site selection committee has spent many hours studying several centrally located sites. As the committee wraps up location recommendations, the specific high school site announcement by Bishop Curlin is anticipated in late October.

In a recent letter to members of the Diocese of Charlotte residing in the Triad, Bishop William G. Curlin recently wrote: "Building a new Catholic high school for the Triad is vitally important to all of us. A new campus with expanded facilities, which offers program breadth and state of the art learning opportunities can best accomplish the vital mission of Bishop McGuinness High School in the new century ahead."

Punctuating the need for a new Bishop McGuinness High School was further evidenced during a recent accreditation evaluation visit by the Southern Association of Colleges and Schools. Programs and personnel received high marks, while it was noted the program and population had outgrown the practical limitations of the building.

"A quality high school education — particularly a Christ-centered Catholic education, which educates the whole person — is more than buildings, classrooms and hallways or campus facilities. The goal of a Bishop McGuinness education is to educate students to become effective leaders in their church and community."

"Traditionally," said Bishop Curlin, "a Catholic education has been an important part of the lives of many of our children ... many [among] you have received the special benefits of a Catholic education. We owe very much to those who provided that opportunity to us. Now it is our time." ▼

Shaping the Future

DR. MICHAEL SKUBE
Superintendent of Schools

Our Catholic schools are committed to shaping the future by helping parents in the religious and moral formation of their children. The schools also offer a rigorous curriculum with students held to a high standard of achievement. A basis for this environment is an emphasis placed on external discipline which attempts to foster acceptance of responsibility for actions.

As our principals, teachers and support staff work with students in religious formation, academic excellence and self-discipline, planning for the future is critical.

To provide the opportunity for parents to send their children to Catholic schools, plans were announced last school year for the building of additional facilities in the Triad area. These plans include a new facility for Bishop McGuinnes Memorial High School followed by an elementary school in the Greensboro area and an elementary school in the Winston-Salem area.

The Charlotte schools are entering into a long range planning process in order to clarify directions for the years to come. The plan will focus on several objectives including: identify whether new schools are needed, where they should be located, and when they should be opened.

As future plans for all of our schools develop, the plans will be integrated into the strategic plan which is being developed for all ministries of the diocese. Helpful in this type of planning is the decision by our schools to become accredited by Southern Association of Colleges and Schools (SACS). With a principal concern of improving educational quality, our schools must meet 114 established standards, in areas including curriculum, faculty, resources and services, building and grounds, and school improvement. This process will ensure accountability through an ongoing process of evaluation based on standards of quality.

To lead the parents, teachers, and students in shaping the future, we welcome four new principals this year: Sharon Broxterman (St. Gabriel), Angela Montague (St. Patrick), Celeste Usischon (St. Pius X), and William Meehan (Immaculata).

For over 200 years, Catholic schools have been an effective means of helping youth grow in their faith. As our schools face the many challenges ahead, they will continue to have a profound impact on the Catholic Church and the American nation.

Good luck in the new school year!

Endowment helps students, commemorates beloved principal

By ALESHA M. PRICE
Staff Writer

HIGH POINT — A select few children whose parents would normally have to struggle financially will benefit because of the Francis J. McGrail Endowment Fund at Immaculate Heart of Mary.

This endowment, established two years ago, comes out of the tragic 1998 death of the former principal, Frank McGrail, who served for 10 years at the school, and helps students in good academic standing in grades five through eight in the form of one to two $500 scholarships. A committee of the current principal, three middle school teachers, and other key administrative people determine which student or students will receive the scholarship for the school year.

"This is definitely an appropriate way to memorialize Frank," said former Home School Association president Diane Jakubsen. "He served children and recognizing the academic excellence of students was important to him." Jakubsen was president from 1997 to spring 1999.

Retired Army Col. McGrail was hired in 1987 as the principal, and many believe him to be the main force behind positive change at the school. His absence was greatly and widely felt after he passed away.

Laura Goldston, who was the chair of the 1998 auction committee and the one of the core group who created the idea for an endowment, sadly recollected about the time after his death: "It [his death] was a big shock and loss for the school. It was a hard time, but the two assistant principals and teachers continued to keep up the quality of education that he implemented. He was instrumental in reviving the school and improving academics."

The student body and faculty not only lost a principal, but also a man who was loved by all in many ways.

"He knew every child's name and at least one important detail about their lives. They were his primary concern, which is hard to do with parents and teachers also in the picture. I respected him for his dedication to the kids," warmly continued Jakubsen.

Dr. Michael Skube, superintendent of schools, said that "he was very spiritual and brought that to his work. He was a dynamic leader and did a marvelous job. As a principal, he was a people-person and beloved by teachers, parents, and staff. He was a motivator and encouraged his students to do their best.

There needed to be a way that he would be remembered for years.

"An endowment in the diocesan foundation is a wonderful way to remember a loved one and to ensure their values are carried into the future. Currently, we have 57 endowments in the foundation and dozens of individuals have included endowment gifts in their estate plans," said Jim Kelley, diocesan director of development.

After Goldston and others spoke with the school board, they decided that an endowment would be best because it would always be in place and would grow over the years. The annual auction committee that raised funds for the school and the church decided to donate $10,000 from the June 1998 auction, and that started off the donations. Everyone began sending in money for the fund as a form of tribute to his or her principal.

"The Frances J. McGrail Endowment Fund was established with donations to the school in his name. It will perpetuate Frank's wish to give as many children as possible the chance to be a part of the school. I hope it will continue to grow so that his legacy will live on," said Paula Robinson, McGrail's administrative assistant for 10 years at the school.

Gail McGrail, Frank's widow, feels that her husband "would be very happy and enthused to have a scholarship in his name.... His high standards, the absolute confidence he gave each student that enabled them to achieve their best and his love of God will be remembered each year as this scholarship is presented. His education was made possible through scholarships. If Frank had chosen a way he would have liked to have been remembered, this would be one way." ▼

"Letters from Yellowstone" tells story of pioneer family

REVIEWED BY JULIE ASHER
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

A couple of years ago a historian spoke at the National Postal Museum in Washington about a pioneer family that traveled from the East to settle in Oregon.

The historian shared the family's story by reading letters written by the mother to a married daughter who had stayed behind. Her letters captured all the drama of a trying journey westward and the details of their new life. It was an absorbing tale, and using letters to tell it was fascinating.

Now comes along a brightly written novel, "Letters from Yellowstone," by Diane Smith. She uses letters to tell the story of a band of researchers who spend May through September of 1898 in Yellowstone National Park.

In correspondence to family, friends and colleagues back home, the main characters discuss their feelings, talk about the group's members, describe life in the park, and share the joys of their discoveries as well as their frustrations.

The book's first letter is from A.E. Bartram, a medical student at Cornell University who really prefers botany. After hearing a campus lecture about a planned field study to find and record flora in Yellowstone, Bartram writes to the study's leader, Professor Howard Merriam, at an agricultural college in Bozeman, Mont., asking to join the group.

Merriam welcomes the interest of such an eager student, replying to Bartram in the affirmative. Arrangements are made, Bartram travels West and hooks up with the professor, who is shocked to find the student is a woman — Alexandria Bartram, Alex for short.

In letters to his mother, Merriam expresses his concerns over taking a woman along, but Bartram is an enthusiastic, independent, strong-willed female in a man's world who brings a breath of fresh air to the group.

Her presence also adds an element of tension to the group, which includes a Chinese cook, a reclusive entomologist, another professor who has a fondness for alcohol and takes a wild raven as a pet, two roguish ranch hands, a mountain man and his dog, and a Crow Indian and his family, who set up camp near the research group.

By 1898, 26 years after the park was formally established, Yellowstone was bustling with activity — from tourists, hunters, promoters and developers, and of course, scientists. There were a few hotels, stagecoach rides and other diversions, including a steamboat tour on Yellowstone Lake. And there was talk of running the railroad through the park.

CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

It was the last night of our parish mission, and the visiting priest was talking about forgiveness. He offered an image: that we were like birds, made to fly, but if we had unforgiveness in our hearts we were chained to a perch. Yes, we could stretch our wings, even fly a couple of feet into the air, but the chain kept us bound to that perch.

"Forgive," the priest urged us. "Cut the chain of unforgiveness, and you will soar high and free."He then invited all of us to file to the front of the church where a priest would be waiting and to say to him: "I forgive ..."

I knelt in the pew searching my heart. There seemed to be no one in my life toward whom I harbored unforgiveness. Things were good in my marriage, I was at peace with the rest of my family, my friends and co-workers.

As I continued to kneel there I suddenly was overwhelmed by powerful emotions and memories. I broke out in a sweat, and tears choked me as I remembered my World War II childhood: the day news came that my favorite uncle had been executed in a concentration camp for listening to the BBC; the letter from Poland that told of my godfather's death and of how disfigured he was by brutal beatings so that even his own brother did not recognize him. Painful, bitter memories crowded in upon me.

I stood up and joined the procession moving to the front of the church. Then it was my turn to stand before the priest. He held out his hands, and I grasped them.

"I forgive the Germans," I said. Then I moved away and returned to my pew, spent, but calm.

Many of us know that forgiving another is a gift that — by God's grace — we give ourselves. Harboring unforgiveness keeps us from flying free and corrodes our spirit. But Jesus says more. Much more.

"Amen, I say to you, whatever you bind on earth shall be bound in heaven, and whatever you loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven."

Do we really believe that? To whom would it matter that a middle-aged woman in Texas forgave "the Germans"? To the commandant of Sachsenhausen concentration camp? Is he still alive, and does he even remember my uncle's execution? What would my forgiveness matter to the guards who so savagely beat Uncle Bruno?

The very questions seem preposterous. And yet, and yet....

Jesus takes a radically different stance. It matters greatly. Jesus says you and I have the power to bind and loose in eternity, and God honors how we exercise that power.

It would seem that God respects our choices and dignity much more than we do ourselves. That is truly an awesome thought. ▼

Jubilee year ceremonies to be made available to U.S. TV

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Nine Vatican events planned to celebrate the jubilee year 2000 will be available in whole or in part to U.S. broadcasters.

In past years, the events have been shown on U.S. television by either the EWTN or Odyssey cable channels, or both.

Ceremonies to be available to U.S. television are:

— Christmas Eve, Dec. 24, 1999, opening of the Holy Door of St. Peter's Basilica, presided over by the pope.

— Midnight Mass of Christmas, celebrated by the pope.

— Christmas Day, Dec. 25, 1999, the pope's Christmas message and "urbi et orbi" ("to the city and to the world") blessing.

— New Year's Eve, Dec. 31, 1999, prayer vigil in St. Peter's Basilica for the transition to the year 2000.

— Jan. 18, 2000, opening of the Holy Door of the Basilica of St. Paul's Outside the Walls and an ecumenical service to begin the Week of Prayer for Christian Unity. This may be switched to the Jan. 25 ecumenical service to close the Christian unity week, depending on which one involves the pope's participation.

— Good Friday, April 21, 2000, solemn Way of the Cross at the Colosseum, presided over by the pope.

— Easter Sunday, April 23, 2000, Mass celebrated by the pope in front of St. Peter's Basilica.

— Easter greeting and "urbi et orbi" blessing by the pope.

— May 18, 2000, Mass celebrated by Pope John Paul II on his 80th birthday in front of St. Peter's Basilica.

An additional ceremony also may be available to broadcasters. It involves a March 20, 2000, liturgical celebration in the Basilica of the Annunciation in Nazareth, Israel, with TV linkups to the Basilica of St. Mary Major in Rome and principal Marian shrines around the world. ▼

"A Dog of Flanders" produces lovely setting, colorful characters

By HENRY HERX
Catholic News Service

NEW YORK (CNS) — An orphaned boy in a 19th-century Flemish village struggles to be an artist in the engrossing tale, "A Dog of Flanders" (Warner Bros.).

This is the story of little Nello (Jeremy James Kissner) whose poor but good-hearted grandfather (Jack Warden) raises him with stories of his dead mother and a sketchbook of drawings she wanted her son to have.

As he grows into a teen (Jesse James), Nello wants to become an artist like his mother and in this he gets encouragement from a local painter (Jon Voight) who is drawn to the lad for reasons that become clear later.

Nello's closest friend is the miller's daughter but when the man's warehouse burns down, Nello is accused of starting it.

Disgraced in the eyes of the community, Nello's only hope is winning the prize money in an art contest but he loses unfairly and despairs.

At this moment, the boy's dog, whom he had rescued from an abusive master, comes to the fore by finding the pocketbook the miller had lost in the snow.

After returning it, Nello wanders off into the storm, reaches the cathedral as the midnight Mass of Christmas ends and slips in as the congregation leaves.

He unveils the Rubens' painting of Christ being taken down from the cross and examines it with light of a candle in the freezing crypt.

But as the candle burns itself out before morning, so too Nello's life seems to flicker out as he sees Rubens and his dead mother and grandfather.

When the villagers locate him in the morning, they don't realize the miracle of his having survived the night.

Adapted from the 1872 Ouida novel by director Kevin Brodie, the Flemish setting is lovely and the characters are colorful.

Brodie explores the poor lad's problems and prospects with some sensitivity, though young children are likely to find the story somewhat shaky, especially the boy's keen sense of the loss of his mother and yearning for his unknown father.

Most youngsters will enjoy the movie, though some are likely to find parts of it challenging.

Because of stylized violence, some intense menace, an implied sexual encounter and a few curse words, the U.S. Catholic Conference classification is A-II — adults and adolescents. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is PG — parental guidance suggested. ▼

Pope says church teaching on marriage urgent amid social change

CASTEL GANDOLFO (CNS) — Recent social changes have made it all the more important to insist on church teachings about marriage and the family, Pope John Paul II said.

The "secularist mentality" that has questioned "truths about the person, matrimony and the family," has become "in a certain sense more radical" since the early 1980s, the pontiff said.

Pope John Paul made his remarks to a gathering of academicians at his summer villa in Castel Gandolfo. The Pope John Paul Institute for Studies on Marriage and the Family had spent five days discussing various legal, moral and theological issues; the papal audience closed the meeting.

Noting that the institute was founded 18 years ago, the pope complimented its "praiseworthy service." But he also said efforts needed to be redoubled to counteract social trends which have arisen in the past 18 years.

Pope John Paul said individual moral norms are not in themselves the issue anymore. Instead, he said, the basic "image of a man or woman itself" faces opposition from an "alternative anthropology."

"This (anthropology) refutes the fact, inscribed in corporeal reality, that the difference between the sexes (creates) identifying characteristics for the person," the pope said. "As a consequence, the concept of a family founded on indissoluble matrimony between a man and a woman is placed in crisis."

Pope John Paul noted that basic church teaching concerning sexual relations has not changed.

"In reality," he said, "the sexual connotation of corporeal reality is an integral part of the original divine plan, in which man and woman were created in the image of God and are called to realize a community of persons."

Pope John Paul said parenthood is a vocation which is "to be lived as a singular responsibility before God" in which children are "welcomed as gifts."

To have sexual relations without the possibility of creating new life is an assault on "the unique personal dignity of the child," the pope added.

"In effect," he said, "only when the essential characteristics of the conjugal act are respected ... is the persona of the child respected at the same time, and his origination from God, the source of every gift, is manifested."

Likewise, Pope John Paul added, the manipulation of human genetic material for procreation "leads to the negation of limits and the vocation present in corporeal reality, and misconstruing of one's own being as a gift which comes from God."

The church must continue to make known its teachings in these areas, "with renewed effort at the start of the third millennium" so that God's plan for humanity may be more profoundly understood, the pope said.

"The Christian response to the failings of individualistic and collective anthropology" requires adherence to original teachings, Pope John Paul said, adding, "reflection on the person, on matrimony and on the family ultimately must be integral with the social doctrine of the church, with an aim toward becoming one of its most solid roots." ▼

East Timor Vote, from page 7

Indonesia would consider granting the territory independence.

Portugal had controlled Indonesia for 400 years but abruptly left in 1975. Indonesia invaded East Timor in 1975 and annexed it in 1976, although that annexation has not been recognized by the Vatican or the United Nations. A vast majority of East Timor's 800,000 people are Catholics. About a quarter of the population has died from fighting, starvation and disease under Indonesian rule. ▼

Court-ordered late-term abortion for 14-year-old prompts outrage

By CAROL RENNEN
Catholic News Service

PHOENIX (CNS) — Bishop Thomas J. O'Brien of Phoenix has expressed outrage over a recent decision by a Maricopa County Superior Count judge ordering child welfare officials to take a 14-year-old girl across state lines for a late-term abortion. But he is also offering the church's resources to help the girl.

"I want to express my horror and outrage at the situation reported in the Arizona media in which Judge William Sargeant has ordered Child Protective Services to transport a 14-year-old girl out of the state to undergo an abortion, perhaps even a partial-birth abortion, of her nearly 7-month-old unborn baby," Bishop O'Brien said in a statement released Aug. 25.

He urged Arizona Gov. Jane Hull and other Arizona leaders to appeal Sargeant's ruling "and take a stand in support of the life and well-being of the young mother and her unborn child."

Hull, however, maintains that the girl chose the abortion and that it is in the girl's best interest.

Published reports on Aug. 27 said the judge was reconsidering whether the girl was competent to decide for herself to have the abortion.

The girl, who was reported to be 23 weeks pregnant, may be as far along as 27 weeks, according to Arizona Right to Life President John Jakubczyk. A source close to the girl, whom Jakubczyk said appears to be reliable but does not want to be named, claims that ultrasound photos of the baby show the girl was actually 27 weeks pregnant.

Jakubczyk said the girl and her court-appointed advocate requested an abortion when she was 14 weeks along, but she ran away and was not found until a few weeks ago. The court is asking for the abortion under the context of "rape," which qualifies the girl for a federally funded abortion.

It is not known, however, if she was actually raped or if the state is considering it statutory rape due to the girl's age. No rape charges have been filed in the case.

The court reportedly ordered the girl be taken out of Arizona for the abortion because she is more than 20 weeks pregnant. Arizona law does not specifically prohibit abortions after 20 weeks of pregnancy, but the law does place restrictions if the fetus is viable — able to survive on its own outside the mother's womb.

Arizona Statute 36-2301.01 states that an abortion can only be performed after viability if the mother's life or health is in immediate danger.

The law says a fetus is viable if "there is a reasonable probability of the fetus' sustained survival outside the uterus, with or without artificial support."

No medical records have been released in the case, but Jakubczyk said he believes the baby to be viable. He said Arizona Right to Life believes the girl should be placed in a maternity home or shelter and provided assistance to care for her baby.

Bishop O'Brien is offering such assistance through local church agencies. "My heart goes out to the young mother, and I am heartened by the many members of the public who have expressed a desire to adopt and raise this child if she is unable to do so. I also commit the resources of the Catholic Church in Phoenix to offer care and support to this young mother and her child."

A prayer vigil was held at the Arizona Capitol Aug. 25 to urge Hull to step in and stop the abortion. Bishop O'Brien was among the estimated 150 people at the vigil and offered a short prayer.

"I consider this ruling to be the latest in an unfortunate series of decisions, beginning with the 1973 U.S. Supreme Court decision, that virtually legalized abortion on demand," the bishop said in his statement. "These decisions have dealt with the abortion issue in ways that are contrary to the moral and democratic principals of our nation."

Msgr. Edward Ryle, director of the Arizona Catholic Conference, said the entire situation is a difficult one. "I hope this young girl received quality social services, but tragically, sometimes the best of social services are not successful," he said. "Our prayers are with the young girl, and I hope that whether the abortion takes place or not, she receives first-class service in the future."

Msgr. Ryle also expressed disappointment that the media did not give similar attention to Bishop O'Brien's Good Friday comments opposing the death penalty.

He said the church is often portrayed as only speaking out against abortion, when in fact the church supports a consistent ethic of life that includes efforts against abortions as well as the death penalty and euthanasia. ▼ ball rolling for Father Manley, who was sent to St. Patrick Cathedral, St. William Church in Murphy, and St. Francis of Assisi in Mocksville before he retired.

Currently, he is the representative for retired priests on the Presbyteral Council and serves on the Priests' Personnel Committee.

His third-floor apartment in Asheville is filled with his woodcarvings and his wife's ceramic models. His collection of model fire engines and gas station pumps are prominently displayed on shelves in his living room. Flowers and plants line his balcony and fill the corner outside his door. His latest projects are awaiting his expertise in one of the bedrooms converted into a woodshop.

"I give the church 10 percent of the money spent on my hobby supplies. We are supposed to tithe 10 percent of our earnings, but I can't do that. So, I give because I don't want to feel selfish, and my conscious is a little clearer," said Father Manley.

"It takes money for retirement especially in these times," said Father Manley. "The priests' retirement fund should be promoted and advertised more by each church, and the churches should have retirement information available for their parishes." ▼ children to have the same teachers during different grades, kindergarten through third grade thereby placing children where they needed to be academically and keeping some amount of structure during those grades.

She then held administrative positions at Irwin Avenue Open Elementary as an assistant principal and as principal of St. Patrick Elementary in Charlotte since 1997.

During her stint as principal of St. Patrick's, the position of another assistant superintendent of schools came to be.

Dr. Michael Skube, superintendent of schools, explained how that position was developed: "A person from Catholic University in Washington, D.C. did a report concerning MACS schools and the use of personnel throughout the diocese. The new position came from her recommendation with the idea being that a new assistant superintendent would help out with issues like regional systems like MACS and the schools in the Triad."

Ritter thought the position would be "a chance to grow professionally because it is important that one strives to learn new things. This would be a chance for me to bring my skills to the job and learn at the same time."

It is also significant for Ritter because she has a son who is a senior at Charlotte Catholic High, and her work will directly and indirectly affect him and other students throughout the diocese.

She says that the biggest challenge will be helping the teachers with the new state license procedures and making sure the guidelines of the Southern Association of Colleges and Schools are maintained.

K-8 school counselor. Starting in the 1992-93 school year, she was the dean of students at Holy Trinity in Charlotte for four years.

"Being dean was a wonderful experience for me because the middle school was new to MACS at the time, and I had the opportunity to start from the ground up with the school," said Montague.

During that time, she was also the brainchild of the MACS Crisis Plan, which is in place at every school in the diocese. It serves as a guide and documented procedure for any conflicts or problems that might arise while school is in session.

Montague stressed that "education is important because you can see growth and development of children who are a vital part of society today."

Celeste Usischon

Sean Usischon, a sixth grader at St. Pius X in Greensboro, has the unique and somewhat nerve-testing opportunity to have his mother as the new principal at his school this year.

Usischon

Originally from New York, family also led Usischon and her family to Greensboro seven years ago. Her parents had retired to the city, so she thought "there would be a better quality of life in which to raise her son."

Usischon has been in the field of parochial education for 18 years in several capacities: three years with Catholic Charities in New York as the educational director of child care, eight years as a kindergarten and two to three years as a fifth-grade teacher, and two years as the assistant director of a child care center at a hospital.

She earned a bachelor of arts degree in elementary education from St. Joseph College in Brooklyn, N.Y., and a master of education degree in education from Fordham University at Lincoln Center in N.Y.

After moving to Greensboro, from 1994, she worked at St. Pius X as a first grade teacher and as the religious education coordinator. When the former principal decided to take a sabbatical, she approached Usischon with the idea of taking her place.

"I decided that it would be an honor and a pleasure to represent the school. It offers a challenge, and in a career such as education, it's good to make changes in order to grow," said Usischon.

She added, "St. Pius X offers education to students in neighboring parishes like Our Lady of Grace and St. Paul the Apostle."

Dr. Michael Skube, superintendent of schools, said, "We are very fortunate that all four principals have been involved with Catholic schools in some way, either attending Catholic school or being involved with teaching or administrative positions. They will all do well in their new positions because they understand Catholic schools." ▼

Priest uses environmental-friendly vehicle for parish work

By MATT DOYLE
NC Catholic Staff

DURHAM — The final week of July saw temperatures in most of North Carolina hover around the 100 degree mark. Combined with other atmospheric factors, the air felt more like a life-sized kiln than a warm Carolina summer.

With the stagnant air came ozone warnings, something the air quality experts use to alert the more vulnerable among us the very young, very old and those with respiratory problems to the dangers that exist. Part of what contributes to the problems on such hot days is emissions from automobiles.

While all this was going on, Franciscan Father Patrick Tuttle said he was driving "guilt free" on his daily rounds. The reason was his newly-acquired electric-powered Chevrolet S-10 pick up.

While limited in its range (a total of 60 miles on a charge), the truck is capable of doing anything asked of it, including perform admirably under highway conditions. Father Tuttle explained the engine offered the equivalent power of a traditional V-8.

Immaculate Conception Church decided to go with an electric vehicle after Father Tuttle saw a demonstration at the North Carolina State Fair. Father Tuttle said it was a natural decision for the three friars because of call from their province for "justice, peace and the integrity of the environment."

Father Tuttle said "these kind of moves are going to be made by a lot of people ... recycling, real serious preaching about our relationship to the earth, alternative vehicles and alternative forms of home heating and air conditioning."

While the technology that will allow for a more harmonious interaction with the earth may be new, the teaching is not. "Francis of Assisi believed that all creation was the imprint of the Creator. In creation you could see the Creator.

"It's not pantheism, that creation is the Creator but ... that the Creator can be seen in his works," said Father Tuttle. "You have here a real serious attempt at being in a responsible relationship to God's gift. It is simply a smarter use of energy."

While the range of the vehicle is perhaps the greatest issue to be dealt with, there are new developments that could change that. Father Tuttle said new batteries are being marketed that will dramatically increase the number of miles the vehicle can travel between charges.

When Father Tuttle first encountered the demonstrations for alternative fuels, he said he was interested but put off by the cost. After learning about the available of grant money, he decided to pursue the idea.

Father Tuttle secured a $20,000 grant from the North Carolina Division of Air Quality. He said that covered a big down payment on the truck and two charging stations.

Now, the lease payment is about the same as the vehicle it replaced and the overall operating costs have been cut in half. Some of the more practical matters that must be kept in mind are the length of time need for charging the vehicle (three to four hours for a full charge) and the need to be vigilant about miles driven.

Father Tuttle explained that most of the time the vehicle is not receiving a full charge. As usage of the vehicles increases, he said there will be charging stations in public places that will allow curbside charges while drivers are going about their business.

On the road, the vehicle performs like any of its gasoline-powered cousins. Despite the eerie silence that comes from the absence of an internal combustion engine and the simple "on/off" ignition system, anyone operating the pick up would feel right at home.

Father Tuttle is willing to supply information to anyone who is interested. He can be reached via e-mail: friarpriest@earthlink.net. ▼ capture all these sights and sounds in their letters, including the hoopla of a park celebration of Independence Day. The correspondence also captures the researchers' work and the general ups and downs of field study, and how such a diverse group of people becomes a family of sorts.

A few of the letters bog down with details of taking samples of plants, identifying and storing them, and one surprising thing about the principal characters, namely Merriam and Bartram, is that being surrounded by so much natural beauty does not spark any reflection about God's creation, but then they emphasize they are scientists. In one letter Bartram, says "The natural world is my religion."

But these are small points. Smith's slice of life of a group working and living amid the magic and beauty of Yellowstone, dubbed "Wonderland" in those years, is an enjoyable read. ▼

Vatican II sparks discussion at St. Francis

By JOANITA M. NELLENBACH
Correspondent

FRANKLIN — Some 34 years after the Second Vatican Council closed, many Catholics are still wondering what it was all about. Why did the church need a council? What were the reasons for all those changes?

Parishioners at St. Francis Church in Franklin got some answers during a program on Aug. 14. The Saturday-long program centered around "The Faithful Revolution: Vatican II," a series of five video tapes that looks at the history Vatican II and what has happened in the Catholic Church since the council closed.

"The tapes are good; they have such incredible information," said Sharon Edwards, who with Ron Brahmer is coordinator of faith formation at St. Francis.

Edwards saw the video series at a diocesan faith formation conference several years ago and borrowed it from Our Lady of the Mountains Church in Highlands.

"Actually, [our program] started out as a voice of many questions: Why did we need changes in the Mass? What about birth control? Why has worship changed?" she said.

She wanted to show the series, she said, "so that people can engage in all the beauty of what the council did for us."

"The tapes give a highlight of just about everything," she added. "I would love to pull (the part about) liturgy out of this right now, and do a whole seminar on liturgy, for people to love where the church is right now. I'm just so proud of the church today."

The five tapes are "Genius of the Heart," "Inspired Awakening," "Human Dignity," "A World Transformed," and "Dynamics of Hope."

> "Can you imagine the faith it required to be a black Catholic in the South in those times of turmoil and then this 77-year-old man (Pope John XXIII) lit up the world like a candle, and the hope that had been given to them."
> — Ken Brahmer

After viewing each tape, the 16 parishioners attending the program broke into two groups to discuss what they had seen.

Joanne Kramer said she appreciated "Genius of the Heart," which delves into the origins of Vatican II, because she hadn't understood the reasons for the council or the resulting changes.

"It wasn't really explained to us back then," she said.

"I remember being so caught up in the rules and regulations that you lost what you were there for," Evie Barrett said of the preconciliar church.

Ron Brahmer agreed, remembering a nun who used a clicker to prompt his classmates to stand up and sit down during Mass.

"Looking back," he said, "you could train a monkey to do that."

However, the group recognized how difficult it is for some people to change.

"I remember my father resented having Communion in the hand and not having Latin," Mary O'Malley said.

Brahmer saw a connection between the Israelites spending 40 years in the desert for "to weed out those who weren't going to change, and they say it will take 40 or 50 years for [Vatican II] to take hold," he said.

In addition to showing church rituals, which people agreed should be preserved, the tapes also document the turmoil going on in and outside the United States in the 1970s. The tapes showed how Vatican II awakened Catholics to protest the Vietnam War and social injustice such as racial bigotry and political oppression in Latin America. People remembered when African-Americans had to sit in the backs of Catholic churches in the South.

"Can you imagine the faith it required to be a black Catholic in the South in those times of turmoil," Ken Brahmer, Ron's brother, marveled, "and then this 77-year-old man (Pope John XXIII) lit up the world like a candle, and the hope that had been given to them."

"It's amazing how Vatican II is equated with social change," Juok Choi said.

"I thought that was a powerful statement that until religions can get along we won't get along," someone remarked during one discussion period.

Ken Brahmer, who had been away from the Catholic Church, returned about a year and a half ago. He said the tapes gave him a "better understanding of the church in very general terms."

"It filled me in on a lot of things," he said. "See, I never really felt the church cared about us that much. Since I've been back I've found out [the church] is about love."

Someone commented that more people should see this video series.

"They will," Ron Brahmer said. "It will radiate through our pores as we act. Jesus started with 12. We're not doing so bad." ▼

Faith formation not simply a classroom ministry

Diocese celebrates catechetics, catechists with Faith Formation Week

BY JIMMY ROSTAR
ASSOCIATE EDITOR

CHARLOTTE — For thousands of young people across the Diocese of Charlotte, parish-based faith formation classes are a primary means of developing as believers. And while the classroom model is an important — and perhaps the most traditional — way the diocesan Office of Faith Formation fosters the process, many opportunities exist for people of all ages to learn more about their faith.

As the Diocese of Charlotte celebrates Faith Formation Week Sept. 19-25 with the theme "God our Father, God of Love," parishioners are asked to reflect on the catechetical mission of the church and to give thanks for the people charged with advancing that mission here in western North Carolina.

It's a mission pushed forward not only by the diocesan office, but also by hundreds of dedicated men and women in parishes across the diocese who are devoted to a singular purpose.

"The faith journey has various twists and turns, and the prism of faith attempts to assist a person deal with the realities of life from the perspective of his or her relationship with Jesus," said Father James Hawker, diocesan vicar for education. "Everything that the Office of Faith Formation does, and the purpose of everyone at the parish who is involved in catechetics, is to assist people to mature in faith."

Father Hawker, who oversees all education-related activities of the diocese, said faith formation is an extensive ministry. It's a ministry, he said, that must involve the parish community, parents and a dedicated relationship with God. Of course, the people doing the teaching are key as well.

"One very important point is to remind catechists and catechetical leaders than an integral component of their mission is their witness — the extent to which they reflect in relationships the qualities that are integral to faith," said Father Hawker.

If catechists exemplify such qualities as respect, compassion and sensitivity in their ministry, Father Hawker said, they can even further succeed in their educational mission.

"Catechists who are involved in structured programs also do a lot of informal catechesis by their witness," he added.

Parishioners of St. Peter Church in uptown Charlotte lead the recessional following a Mass Sept. 5. Church members brought tools of their trades — musical instruments, stethoscopes and books, among them — which they placed at the foot of the altar during the Offertory procession to commemorate Labor Day. It's the fourth year the Charlotte parish has hosted such a procession.

In the Diocese of Charlotte, one structured program Father Hawker mentioned primarily comprises students not in Catholic schools who come to their parish for religious education. They prepare for the initiation sacraments of Eucharist and confirmation, and learn what it means to live the Catholic faith as maturing people. It's the classic faith formation model, and a great number of children and teen-agers benefit from these parish programs.

But there are many manifestations of faith formation happening outside those formal classroom structures, too, said Dr. Cris Villapando, director of faith formation programs for the Diocese of Charlotte. "Faith formation strives to shape the religious culture of the community," he explained. "It tries to do that by forming attitudes, habits and values.

"Hopefully we can achieve this day in and day out — not only with young people but with adults, which is becoming more and more a new realization: that faith formation doesn't end by 12th grade."

Villapando said the Office of Faith Formation strives to animate the faith in the lives of adults as well. He highlighted a number of programs available to adults, including faith formation through small faith communities, lecture series, sacramental preparation programs, Scripture study groups, family clusters, multicultural settings and the Internet.

"Over and over, we are trying to explode the models of faith formation and reach out to adults in whatever settings they might be in," Villapando said.

Adults involved in home-school catechesis, initiation ministry, preparing youth for confirmation, running vacation Bible schools and ministering to people with disabilities also experience the support of the Office of Faith Formation, Villapando said. And so do adults engaged in diocesan programs such as lay ministry, formal ministry and catechist certification. Retreats and days of recollection also nurture the catechetical spirit.

The office's intent to pay special attention to adult religious education falls in line with the recently published "General Directory for Catechesis," which calls adult faith formation the chief form of catechesis in the church.

Vatican official won't view 'Eyes Wide Shut' at Venice festival

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — A Vatican official planned to attend the Venice Film Festival — a high-profile, annual showcase of the latest movies — but said he did not intend to take part in one of its main events. Cardinal Paul Poupard, president of the Pontifical Council for Culture, said Sept. 3 he wanted to show "in a visible and constructive way" that there can be "another type of cinema" with humanity and "the values of life and the family, love and decency" at its center. In a written exchange of questions and answers with Catholic News Service, the cardinal was asked whether he had seen or intended to see Stanley Kubrick's final film, "Eyes Wide Shut," which was playing every night of the Venice festival. The cardinal responded, "No!"

Priest's murder viewed as part of Hindu extremists' killings

BERHAMPUR, India (CNS) — Using bows and arrows, assailants killed a Catholic priest in a part of Orissa state where a Hindu extremist is blamed for murdering an Australian missionary and his two sons eight months ago. The priest's killing, seen as part of a pattern of killings by Hindu extremists, has evoked outrage from church leaders, and Indian Prime Minister Atal Behari Vajpayee has ordered the arrest of the alleged culprits. Father Arul Doss, 35, was attacked by 15-20 men in Jambani village in the eastern Indian state's Mayurbhanj district at dawn Sept. 2, Balasore Diocese sources reported based on testimony by eyewitnesses.

Institute works to repair image after priest admits theft

WAUSAU, Wis. (CNS) — The Institute of Christ the King, Sovereign Priest, the religious community that provides the Tridentine Mass in the La Crosse Diocese, was working to repair its public image in September after one of its priests admitted stealing religious objects. Father Glenn Gardner, 38, was sentenced to 180 days in jail Aug. 31 after pleading no contest to charges of burglary and theft related to taking monstrances, ciboria, candelabras, altar candlesticks, a missal stand, an antique incense burner, and several large candles from two Clark County churches. The objects were valued at about $9,000. Charged with Father Gardner was Kurt Chione, 41, a church organist from Aurora, Ill., who pled not guilty Aug. 31 and was freed on $1,000 bail. A preliminary hearing in his case was set for Sept. 30.

Kenyan church seeks help for victims of cattle theft

NAIROBI, Kenya (CNS) — A Kenyan priest has appealed for aid for more than 25,000 starving victims of cattle rustling in the country's Kerio Valley. Father Noel Mutongoi of the Endo Catholic Mission said Sept. 1 that the starving families are living in caves in the valley to hide from rustlers, who frequently invade the area. "The situation is bad and calls for urgent action in terms of providing food to the affected families, who are also exposed to disease. The most affected are women and children," Father Mutongoi told Catholic News Service in a telephone interview from Eldoret, in northwestern Kenya.

Vatican envoy seeks end to Iraq bombing if pope visits

ROME (CNS) — If Pope John Paul II travels to Iraq this fall, the United States and Great Britain should suspend their bombing campaign against the country, said a leading Vatican diplomat. "There ought to be a moratorium, because for one thing, this tactic is not leading anywhere," said Archbishop Renato Martino, Vatican nuncio to the United Nations. Archbishop Martino said the pope would not be going to Iraq to "sanctify the regime" of Saddam Hussein, but added that the pope's opposition to Western sanctions against Iraq was well known. He made the comments in an interview published Sept. 2 by the Italian Catholic newspaper Avvenire.

Colombian official negotiates with rebels for bishop's release

BOGOTA, Colombia (CNS) — Colombia's high commissioner for peace started negotiations with an imprisoned guerrilla leader for the release of kidnapped Bishop Jose de Jesus Quintero Diaz of Tibu. Meanwhile, the Colombian bishops' conference called for a week of reconciliation and peace Sept. 6-12 with the motto "For the new millennium, peace is possible," to help Colombians recover hope for a peaceful solution to the decades-long conflict between the military and guerrilla groups.

CRS seeks release of injured worker held in Republic of Georgia

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Catholic Relief Services is seeking the release of an injured American aid worker held in the Republic of Georgia since July. A CRS official said the worker was seriously injured and that his civil rights had been violated repeatedly. Georgian lawyers for CRS have linked the incident to the case of a Georgian diplomat imprisoned in the United States after being convicted of the 1997 drunken-driving death of a teen-age girl in Washington. Loren Wille, 53, of Golden, Colo., had his passport confiscated and was charged with vehicular homicide after a CRS vehicle he was driving crashed on a dark, rainy road, killing Manana Tsomashvili, his Georgian translator. Tsomashvili was in the back seat and was not wearing a seat belt, said a CRS spokesman.

Mexican bishops warn Chiapas situation could lead to force

MEXICO CITY (CNS) — The Mexican bishops' conference criticized the federal government's strategy in Chiapas in a statement issued Aug. 28. The statement was read from the pulpit a day later by Bishop Felipe Aguirre Franco of Tuxtla Gutierrez. The bishops' statement warned against a "false solution in favor of those who are strongest, increasing the presence of the army and state security forces." It added that past experience of attempts to impose military solutions has shown that "suffering, poverty, displacements increase."

17 CLEMMONS — The Children's

Senior monk at Belmont Abbey dies at age 88

BELMONT — The Reverend Bernard L. Rosswog, O.S.B., S.T.D., died on Thursday, Sept. 2, 1999, at Belmont Abbey after an extended illness. At 88 years of age, he was the senior monk at the monastery.

Father Bernard, born on Jan. 26, 1911, at Erie, Pa., was the son of Robert J. and Elizabeth Haibach Rosswog. He graduated from St. Mary's Parochial School and Cathedral Preparatory School, both in Erie.

In 1929 he began his studies at Belmont Abbey College. In 1931 he entered the novitiate of The American-Cassinese Congregation of Benedictine Monasteries at St. Vincent Archabbey, Latrobe, Pa., and in 1932 was professed a monk of Belmont Abbey. When he was solemnly professed he took the name of his deceased uncle, Reverend Bernard Hass, O.S.B., who, likewise, was a lifelong monk of Belmont Abbey.

He prepared for sacred orders at Belmont Abbey Seminary, Belmont, N.C.; St. Benedict's Seminary, Atchison, Kan.; and The Catholic University of America, Washington, DC. He was ordained priest at St. Vincent Archabbey in 1937.

He continued theological studies at The Catholic University of America until 1941, during which time he earned the S.T.L. and S.T.D. degrees. In addition, he studied at Pius X School of Liturgical Music in New York City.

When a young scholar at The Catholic University of America, Father Bernard was a proctor and, subsequently, assistant dean of men. Later he was named to a series of posts at Belmont Abbey: dean of men, rector, and vice-president of Belmont Abbey Junior college, headmaster and professor of mathematics and Latin at Belmont Abbey Preparatory School, and rector of Belmont Abbey Seminary.

He taught philosophy at Belmont Abbey College and Sacred Heart College in Belmont, N.C., dogmatic and moral theology and canon law at Belmont Abbey Seminary, and canon law to Belmont Abbey's novices.

For many years he also served as Belmont Abbey College's academic dean promoting the establishment and accreditation of senior college status of the Benedictine Catholic Liberal Arts College and was also an active member of its Board of Trustees.

Father Bernard was vicar general and chancellor of Belmont Abbey Nullius; pastor of St. Mary's Mission, Shelby, N.C.; auxiliary U.S. Air Force chaplain at Lake Lure, N.C.; pastor of Cherryville Mission; and associate and, later, pastor of St. Michael Church, Gastonia, N.C.

In addition, he served as subprior and, later, prior of Belmont Abbey and, subsequently, prior at St. Benedict's Priory, Richmond, VA. He was a member of the Presbyteral Council and the first judicial vicar (officialis) of the marriage tribunal in the Charlotte Diocese.

His doctoral dissertation treated of "God's Salvific Will." He composed the "Book of Customs," a "Holy Week Liturgy Booklet," and an "Oblate Office Book" for use at Belmont Abbey.

He also developed a "Study of the New Code" for priests, the first set of "Faculties" for the Charlotte Diocese, and a treatise on the "Marriage of Conscience and Marriage Solutions."

The words "in charge of" and "responsible for" run like a river through Father Bernard's resume. Having been a well-educated and talented professor, his contributions to scholarship in theology and canon law are significant. But his special gift is that of master mechanic: he could command that most balky and bulky of machines, i.e., the committee. His colleagues recognized for years that he gets things done. His fingerprints have been and remain all over the growth and development of Belmont Abbey College.

Father Bernard was an excellent administrator, professor and pastor with amazing energy, who continued to keep busy in spite of his crippling arthritis. Although a theologian, his greatest interest was canon law. He was always prepared with canonical solutions to legal entanglements and questions.

In retirement, Father Bernard took special joy in reading and study on a variety of subjects, especially theology and canon law. He was in great demand as a counselor, confessor and canonist.

In 1992 Father Bernard celebrated his 60th jubilee of monastic profession; in 1997 he celebrated the diamond anniversary of his priestly ordination.

Father Bernard is survived by the monks of Belmont Abbey and his relatives: William (a nephew) and Josephine Rosswog, Raymond (a nephew) and Beverly Rosswog, William and Jean Marie (a niece) Witkowski, and many grand nieces and nephews.

Father Bernard's body was received at 5:00 pm on Sunday Sept. 5, 1999, at the Basilica of Mary Help of Christians on the campus of Belmont Abbey at which time Vespers were sung and the rosary recited. A Mass of Christian Burial was concelebrated by Abbot Oscar Burnett, O.S.B., the monks of Belmont Abbey and priests of the Diocese of Charlotte at 11:00 am on Monday, Sept. 6, 1999. Burial followed in Belmont Abbey Cemetery. ▼

Internet courses help clergy improve counseling skills

By ROBERT DYLAK
Catholic News Service

SOUTH ORANGE, N.J. (CNS) — Can busy clergy find time from their parish duties to return to college and earn an advanced degree?

Seton Hall University's president, Msgr. Robert Sheeran, believes the university's online computer courses are turning out to be at least one answer.

Msgr. Sheeran said the 50 or more priests and the faculty who teach at Seton Hall share a concern for continuing education of the clergy.

"At Seton Hall, we are committed to utilizing the technological advantages that Internet-based delivery affords for the benefit of our students and the advancement of the teaching and learning process," said Msgr. Sheerin.

Brother Patrick Byrne, principal of Sacred Heart School in Newark, said the flexibility offered by the online program makes it possible for him to pursue a degree.

"Seton Hall is really looking ahead by providing this kind of opportunity for growth," said Brother Byrne. "I can study at night and fit the (Internet) coursework around the needs of the school," he said.

Seton Hall professors emphasize that although the two-and-a-half-year course is customized and students are communicating through computers, there is a sense of being part of a class — a team.

Seton Hall's academic director, Delores Thompson, said the team concept requires that all students make a commitment to each other.

"For this team, the commitment includes integrating spirituality into all course content," she said. ▼

The Pope Speaks

POPE JOHN PAUL II

Pope denounces terror campaign by militias in East Timor

CASTEL GANDOLFO, Italy (CNS) — Denouncing a terror campaign by pro-Indonesia militias in East Timor, Pope John Paul II called for an end to "intimidation and violence" in the contested territory.

Among those targeted by rampaging militias was Bishop Carlos Filipe Ximenes Belo, the Nobel Prize-winning apostolic administrator of Dili, who was reportedly unharmed in an attack on his residence that left 39 people dead. He was evacuated to Darwin, Australia, Sept. 7.

Hundreds of independence supporters were said to have been slain during the terror spree, which began soon after a national referendum showed that more than 78 percent of East Timorese want to throw off Indonesian rule.

The pope, speaking at a blessing at his summer residence Sept. 5, said the referendum results should be respected. He said he was following what he called "worrisome reports" from East Timor.

"I hope that a climate of serenity and peace can be established in the territory, and I ask prayers for our sorely tried brothers there," he told a crowd of several thousand people.

"May the Virgin Mary awaken in the souls of everyone sentiments of true pacification and constructive respect for the will expressed in recent days by the Timorese population," he said.

On Sept. 6, papal spokesman Joaquin Navarro-Valls said the Vatican had contacted the governments involved in the crisis to promote a solution "as soon as possible."

Indonesia invaded East Timor in 1975 and annexed it the following year, although the international community has never recognized the legitimacy of the annexation. A vast majority of East Timor's 800,000 population is Catholic. About one-fourth of the population has died from fighting, starvation and disease under Indonesian rule.

Pope meets with Arafat, welcomes latest Mideast accord

CASTEL GANDOLFO, Italy (CNS) — In a meeting with Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat, Pope John Paul II expressed satisfaction at the West Bank land-for-security accord that gave new life to the Palestinian-Israeli peace process.

After signing the breakthrough agreement in Egypt Sept. 5, Arafat traveled to Italy, where he met for more than an hour with the pontiff at his summer villa outside Rome to discuss details of the accord. The Vatican said the pope was pleased at the progress.

"The Holy See, in expressing satisfaction and hope at this advance, encourages both sides to continue the process and emphasizes the importance that peace holds for the two peoples," said a Vatican statement issued after the encounter.

The Vatican statement expressed satisfaction at progress on these legal questions, which have been explored by a PLO-Vatican commission since 1998. Several important holy places lie in Palestinian territory.

The Church and Jubilee 2000

For the Church, opening the doors to the Third Millennium means a singular and prophetic call for Catholicism "not to abandon the world, but to help shape it." The American bishops, seeing this as an opportunity to "transform" our daily work and leisure, family and political life, national and international relations, remind us that the year 2000 is "a holy year, a time of favor, a reminder that we live and work in a time of special grace between the Incarnation of Jesus and the Second Coming."

To give spirit and life to this coming event, the Church recently gathered 3,000 delegates from over 60 organizations in a "Jubilee Justice" celebration in Los Angeles. In welcoming delegates to the July meeting, Cardinal Mahony repeated the words of Pope John Paul II, making it clear that "a commitment to justice and peace is an integral condition for the preparation and celebration of the Jubilee." The Cardinal went on to say that "this event promises to be a significant and meaningful opportunity to lift up in a very public way the Catholic Church's rich social tradition and teaching that is embodied each day in your work and in the work of those with whom you share your ministry."

In Old Testament times, the Jubilee year reminded believers that the land and its yield belonged to God, and that we are stewards who should be faithful to God and to each other in sharing the fruits of the earth. The year of the "Lord's favor" meant that debts were to be canceled and family holdings that had sustained generations were to be restored. It was time to "let the oppressed go free" and to restore freedom and justice among people, to reestablish relations of equality and remedy the conditions that kept people oppressed.

What stood out in the Jubilee Justice meeting in Los Angeles was that it mirrored the global solidarity that the Pope has appealed for in approaching the year 2000. Speaking of forgiveness and reconciliation, the Pope has spoken frankly of the need for all of us to ask forgiveness as well as to be forgiving. The appeal, as Jubilee Justice Celebration

DR. BARNEY OFFERMAN
GUEST COLUMNIST

Sister Marie Chen, RSM, put it in an opening day retreat, is to "a God whose nature is mercy." On God's creation, another speaker, Pat Mische, said that the "way we treat the land is a metaphor for how we treat people."

The meeting was a global village both of liturgies and participants. Liturgies were celebrated in English and Spanish, with homilies in additional languages native to Asia and Africa. Immigrants and bishops, first and third world people, and a rainbow of colors across gender and age were represented from the platform and in the workshops. Speakers were there from East Timor and Ireland, Rome and Tanzania, France and the Philippines, Jamaica, West Indies and Mexico, and points in between.

The message was clear: As the bishops said, inviting Catholics into the 21st Century, "Every believer is called to serve 'the least of these,' to 'hunger and thirst for justice,' to be a 'peace-maker.'" They went on to say that Catholics therefore are called to protect human life, to promote human dignity, to defend the poor and to seek the common good. This social mission of the Church belongs to all of us. The Jubilee Justice gathering in Los Angeles was a faith-filled, stirring inaugural to bring that message to a world in need of it.

The Bottom Line

Films that inspire

I have long been fascinated by the works of independent filmmakers. Most of them are creative visionaries who dare to probe the different, the deep, the devout and even the deplorable complexities of the human species in the search to find meaning — and perhaps even truth — in this mystery called life.

Ben Patton, a young man I met several years ago at a monastery, is one of them. Now 34, the Georgetown University graduate has taken a first step toward his goal of developing feature films. He has teamed up with an Irish film production group and founded Patton Productions.

He helped produce and launch in the United States two new works: "Stranded," a 28-minute film about eighth-century monks, and "Between Dreams," a stirring account of a young man's experience as an in-patient with terminal cancer.

Patton told me excitedly that "Stranded" is being shown in September on cable-television stations in New York, Boston and Washington, and "Between Dreams" has been accepted to premiere at the prestigious Venice film festival also in September.

I've seen "Stranded." With visuals that are sheer poetry, and music scored and supervised by Patton, it evokes the mystery of the interior life. The film presents a searing, complex picture of ways faith is challenged by the circumstances of life. It depicts how three Irish monks of the eighth century, stranded in Iceland where they went to find solitude, confront their inner torments and truths.

One viewer said the film's greatness was in how it portrays the universal conflict of anyone struggling with faith issues.

Patton credits a year he spent at the Benedictine Abbey of Regina Laudis in Connecticut, where I met him, for his career change from environmentalist to filmmaker. If his name sounds familiar, it is indeed, because he is the grandson of the famed World War II leader, the late Gen. George Patton, who died in 1946 before Ben Patton's parents met.

The young man said he came to a point in his life where it was time "to do work inside, to gain a certain ability to focus and learn to do fewer things better." He chose the abbey because of its contemplative setting. He knew about this monastery because his sister, a convert, is a nun there, Mother Margaret Georgina.

"It's perhaps not coincidental that my first film would be about monks, since I had spent a year at a monastery," Patton said, commenting: "You do get clarity sometimes when you wait and just hang on. You get to a peaceful place."

The insights he gained at the monastery somewhat parallel the theme of "Stranded," and no doubt added to the film's appeal for him. As Patton explained: "I found the performances, direction, the cinematography, the music so strong. But what most resonates with me in terms of the story is the notion of surrender and the way each character handles that. Both through my experience at the abbey and through similarly centering/contemplative activities I do here in New York I've come to appreciate the notion of focus and surrender" in the quest to remain faithful to faith.

With such a spiritual grounding, Patton could be just the kind of filmmaker we need — one who chooses not just to entertain, but also to inspire.

"Me — a Priest?!"

This month brought an invitation to speak at a regional meeting of Serra Club International, a Roman Catholic lay group that seeks to foster vocations to the priesthood and religious life. My hometown diocese of Erie, Pa., was playing host to several clubs from Buffalo, Cleveland and Pittsburgh.

They have asked me to respond to a simple, straightforward question — "Why did you decide to be a priest?" One would think that I, like any priest, would have no difficulty in providing a ready answer. Yet, as often as I have put pen to paper this week, there always remains something inexpressible, even mysterious, about the logic and flow of events that lead to ordination.

There is a popular belief that a decision for the priesthood, ministry, or religious life must be accompanied by some sort of sign from God. The trouble with signs is that one usually assumes they must be supernatural, something quite out of the ordinary. I had no such sign. For me the call came from the common everyday experiences of life. In fact, I have come to understand that we are never nearer God's plan for us as when we are attentive to the familiar details of our daily routines.

For me it was going to college while working for my dad at a local Coca-Cola bottling company. Crashing a forklift into a stack of empties was just one of a series of signs that I should take my book-learning more seriously. Long interested in the theatre, I acted in the evenings with community and university playhouses. I also marched with the Pershing Rifles in ROTC, dated my high-school sweetheart Susan Rickloff and started to talk seriously with friends about the future.

In the midst of all this, Christ started interfering with everything. Looking back, I appreciate what Therese of Lisieux meant in The Story of a Soul when she admitted that Christ was most abundantly present to her not "during my hours of prayer ... but rather in the midst of my daily occupations." It almost seemed like a conspiracy.

There was Father Frank Haas, a counselor at Gannon University: "Tom, have you ever thought of being a priest?" No one had ever asked me that before. Then Monsignor Louis Lorei, the Dean of Humanities, "Sure, you might want to think about going into education or the theatre, but just imagine what you could accomplish as a priest who teaches theatre." And then came those serious late night conversations with friends who showed enthusiasm for the idea. "You a priest? Yeah, I can see you doing that."

Going to Sunday liturgy became different. Rather than silently criticize the celebrant for the way he was saying Mass, I began to imagine what I would do or say to make it more meaningful.

In time, such imagining turned into reality. But that initial calling still remains a mystery. I can point to the people whose example and gentle prodding helped me imagine the improbable. But the mystery remains. 28 years a priest — and still I marvel how the little things in life become the hinges on which life turns. A chance remark, a tap on the shoulder, a compliment, a gentle nudge — and life is never the same again.

Faith Formation: A Time to Remember

As we celebrate Faith Formation Week in the diocese, each of us would do well to recall the words spoken by Jesus on the occasion of His Ascension: "Go, therefore, and make disciples of all nations. Baptize them in the name of the Father, and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit. Teach them to carry out everything I have commanded you. And know that I am with you always until the end of the world" (Mt. 28:19-20). From that day forward the Church was commissioned to implement faithfully the command of the risen Lord to be a catechized community. While doing so she would be strengthened and sustained by His protective presence.

Catechesis, sharing the Person and message of Jesus, is an essential and integral component of the Church's mission. If it is to achieve its goal, the primary purpose of catechetics must be understood and appreciated. Its foundational aim is to assist the maturing believer, whether child, youth or adult, to grow in intimacy with Jesus. It follows, then, that catechesis is not concerned simply with the head but is directed to the heart. It is vital to recognize that its objective is not only to share information but to cultivate formation. The person being catechized is invited through this grace-filled experience to mature as a friend, disciple and witness of the Risen Lord. In other words, at each stage of life, he or she is called to continuing conversion to Jesus and to His Way.

Pope John Paul II in his apostolic exhortation "On Catechesis in Our Time" has stressed that catechesis is an art. The catechist, in fulfilling his or her role, speaks to the whole person while being sensitive to the cultural context within which the maturing believer resides. The catechist shares the message in such a manner that it is meaningful and relevant to the person to whom it is addressed.

How, one might ask, can the priest, the religious and lay catechist or the parent fulfill the sacred and serious responsibility of participating actively and fruitfully in the catechetical mission of the Church? Possibly my sharing with you a special moment in my life might respond to the question. On Feb. 10, 1963, I was privileged to celebrate my first Mass in the Cathedral of the Holy Cross in Boston. The preacher on this happy occasion was Cardinal Cushing. During his memorable homily the Cardinal said, "There are many ways to describe a priest. As I see it, the priest is a tool; you know what a tool is? It can be new or old, sharp or dull, impressive or unimpressive, but if it is placed in the hands of a skilled craftsman it will accomplish the unbelievable. The priest, like other Christians, is a tool in the hands of the Risen Christ."

As we celebrate Faith Formation Week the image shared by Cardinal Cushing describes so powerfully the identity and mission of the catechist. He or she is the agent whereby the love of Christ, as manifested in His Word, touches the lives, minds, hearts and souls of maturing believers.

What Canon Law Is

Q. Frequently in your column you refer to the canon law of the Catholic Church. I know in general what that means, but where can one get a copy? Or is it even available to everyone?

It seems like so much of what happens is explained simply by "it's canon law." I for one would be interested in reading it or at least having it to check on. And I imagine others would also.

A. As you indicate, the Code of Canon Law is the basic set of regulations that govern the life of the Catholic Church, from electing a pope to receiving the sacraments.

As an institution made up of human beings, the church has always had rules, or canons (Greek for precept, law), of some sort. We find them even in the New Testament.

As human society changes, of course laws change also, including in the church. So frequent revisions and reorganizations of one kind or another have taken place over the past 2,000 years.

Various compilations of existing laws were published through the centuries, perhaps the most famous being the 12th-century Concordance of Discordant Canons, in which a monk, Gratian, attempted to compile and reconcile all prevailing legislation.

Surprisingly, the first real Code of Canon Law was published only in 1917. When Pope John XXIII convoked Vatican Council II in 1959, he also announced a revision of the code, which was completed under Pope John Paul II in 1983.

It is this code which presently governs Catholic life in the Latin Church. Another code exists for Eastern Catholic churches. Many elements of the Eastern (Oriental) code are similar to those in the code for the Latin Church, but many also naturally reflect the distinctive traditions of those churches.

The code is available from the Canon Law Society of America (Washington, D.C. 20064). It is not awfully long and, as legal documents go, is nearly a gem of simplicity and clarity.

I should warn anyone who is considering buying it, however, that while it is easy to read, it is far from easy to apply correctly. It compacts into 1,752 canons the legal experience of hundreds of years, and like any tightly written legal document is highly complex.

Canons interrelate broadly with each other. Innocent-sounding phrases one might easily pass by can be crucial for a right understanding and interpretation of the law. In other words, it is not for nothing that men and women spend years of study and training to properly apply the code in the daily life of the church.

The Code of Canon Law can be interesting reading, even fun (if one enjoys that sort of thing), and an enlightening window into what makes the church function and how legalities affect the spiritual and other realities of Catholic life.

Just be aware of the limitations. A careful, serious reading of canon law does not make one a canon lawyer, any more than a careful reading of the Internal Revenue Code makes one an expert on income tax.

Black Catholic educator teaching lessons of Holocaust

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Educator Art Brown said he is asked routinely at the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, "Why, as a black person, do you work at a Jewish institution?" Brown, a parishioner at St. Teresa of Avila in southeast Washington, started in the education division in January 1993, a few months before the museum opened. In an interview with Catholic News Service, he answered the question by recalling other national museum openings in the Washington of an earlier era. "If there was a black person working at the Smithsonian back then, they probably were working in some janitorial type position," he said. "I saw the opportunity to be a part of the founding staff of an institution in Washington, and be a part of the professional staff."

Bishop P. Francis Murphy dies; noted peace, justice advocate

BALTIMORE (CNS) — Auxiliary Bishop P. Francis Murphy of Baltimore, nationally known advocate of peace and nonviolence and the advancement of women, died of cancer Sept. 2 at Mercy Medical Center in Baltimore. He was 66. It was Bishop Murphy's 1980 proposal to take a fresh look at the morality of nuclear weapons that led to the U.S. bishops' landmark 1983 pastoral letter, "The Challenge of Peace: God's Promise and Our Response." He frequently spoke out against war and the arms race. In 1992, when the bishops were in the midst of trying to write a pastoral letter on women, he wrote an article in Commonweal, a national Catholic magazine, in which he condemned the "sin of sexism" and urged the ordination of women "because justice demands it."

Croatian cardinal denied entry into Yugoslavia

WARSAW, Poland (CNS) — A Croatian cardinal was denied a visa to enter Yugoslavia for a brief pastoral visit to Catholics in the northern Vojvodina region. A church source said no official reason had been given for the move, but added that it was widely believed linked to Cardinal Franjo Kuharic's outspoken support for Croatian independence in the early 1990s. Cardinal Kuharic, who retired as archbishop of Zagreb in July 1997, was to have arrived in the Diocese of Subotica, Yugoslavia, Aug. 28 for a single Sunday Mass at the nearby Marian shrine of Bunaric.

First American elected to governance of Knights of Malta

SAN FRANCISCO (CNS) — When Richard Dunn was invested in the Knights of Malta 22 years ago at St. Mary's Cathedral in San Francisco, he never imagined it was the beginning of a journey to become the first American elected to the 900-year-old international order's ruling body. "This is an honor for Dick and for the whole archdiocese," said San Francisco Archbishop William J. Levada about Dunn's election this summer in Rome to the order's Sovereign Council.

Catholic doctor helps Texas solve 'abandoned baby' tragedy

FORT WORTH, Texas (CNS) — Thanks to the vision and effort of a well-known Fort Worth advocate for children, Texas now has a humane way to deal with the heartbreaking reality of newborn baby abandonment. Dr. John Richardson, a Fort Worth pediatrician and longtime member of St. Andrew's Parish in southwest Fort Worth, attended the ceremonial signing this summer of Texas' new Abandoned Baby Bill, which took effect Sept. 1. Believed to be the first such legislation in the nation, the new law allows new mothers, whose desperation may have otherwise led to a child's death, to leave babies less than 30 days old in the care of designated agencies, to do so anonymously and without threat of prosecution.

Bishop Belo evacuated to Australia as Timor plunges into anarchy

DARWIN, Australia (CNS) — As the capital of East Timor plunged into anarchy, the spiritual leader of the territory's Catholic majority, Bishop Carlos Felipe Ximenes Belo of Dili, was evacuated to Darwin.

The evacuation occurred Sept. 7, a day after pro-Indonesia militias attacked and burned Bishop Belo's residence in Dili. Amid the mounting chaos, church leaders in Australia, the United States and other countries called for prayers and an international peacekeeping force to maintain order.

UCA News, an Asian church news based in Thailand, reported that witnesses said the armed men entered Bishop Belo's compound at daybreak, shot at the building, then set it on fire to force the people inside to come out. As the people ran out in panic, militiamen shot them with firearms, witnesses said. More than 4,000 East Timorese had sought refuge at the compound.

Bishop Belo, who was unharmed in the attack but was said to be in shock, was later flown to Baukau, East Timor, to the residence of Bishop Basilio do Nascimento. However, when militias began attacking that residence, a Royal Australian Air Force Hercules transport plane transported Bishop Belo and other refugees to Darwin Sept. 7.

Speaking at a press conference upon his arrival, Bishop Belo, a co-winner of the 1996 Nobel Peace Prize, said of his fellow East Timorese, "They are very sad, and they feel that they are unable to fight against all the ways of violence, and they expect that the international community should act urgently and immediately to protect their people."

East Timorese people pray on the grounds of Bishop Carlos Felipe Ximenes Belo's compound in Dili Sept. 5. Thousands of people sought refuge on the grounds of the bishop's home as violence swept the region. Bishop Belo was forced to flee to Australia the next day as his home was set afire.

In the United States, Archbishop Theodore E. McCarrick, chairman of the U.S. bishops' International Policy Committee, echoed Bishop Belo's call for action.

"If Indonesia is not willing or able immediately to fulfill its responsibilities to the people of East Timor, then the United States should support the prompt deployment of a U.N. peacekeeping force to establish order, protect the innocent and ensure a peaceful transition to independence," he said in a Sept. 7 statement.

Indonesia invaded East Timor in 1975 and annexed it the following year, although the international community has never recognized the legitimacy of the annexation. A vast majority of East Timor's 800,000 population is Catholic. About one-fourth of the population has died from fighting, starvation and disease under Indonesian rule.

On Aug. 30, the majority of East Timorese voters rejected an Indonesian plan for the territory's autonomy within Indonesia. Since Indonesian President B.J. Habibie said his country would consider independence for East Timorese if they rejected autonomy, the vote was seen as a vote for independence.

Violence by pro-Indonesia militias began shortly after the election. Many observers said the militias were supported by the Indonesian military.

In Perth, Australia, Sept. 7, Archbishop Barry J. Hickey urged prayers for peace so that the East Timorese vote for independence could be implemented. He also called for "an immediate international response to stop the bloodshed" in the territory.

Caritas Australia's national director, Tom Story, said if a peacekeeping force did not intercede, "other measures to provide safety for those in danger must be provided.

"East Timor is right on Australia's doorstep, and we must not forget the sacrifices made by the East Timorese for our soldiers during World War II," Story said.

Cardinal Edward B. Clancy of Sydney, Australia, reiterated his call for a U.N. peacekeeping force to be sent to East Timor after Indonesia declared a state of martial law in the territory Sept. 7. But, he said, "the obvious sticking point" in sending such a force was that it needed a U.N. mandate and the approval of the Indonesian government.

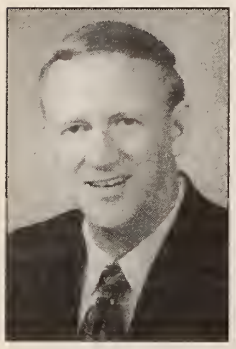
Educator, author to address issue of sharing faith in new millennium

By JIMMY ROSTAR
Associate Editor

An educator and author widely known in Catholic school circles will address the issues of Catholic education and sharing faith in the new millennium, the diocesan Catholic Schools Office recently announced.

Dr. Thomas Groome, senior professor of theology and religious education at Boston College, will address school educators, catechists and pastoral ministers from throughout the diocese in two presentations Sept. 24 and 25.



Dr. Thomas Groome

His Sept. 24 presentation, titled "Educating for Life: Catholic Education for the New Millennium," is for Catholic school personnel.

"As we begin the third millennium, what does it mean to be a Catholic educator, to conduct a Catholic school?" mused Groome in a written statement. "This day-long workshop will propose educating for life as the defining character of Catholic education, and will suggest ways to renew our commitment to this vision."

The workshop will be hosted at St. Gabriel School, 3028 Providence Rd. in Charlotte, from 9 a.m.-3 p.m.

On Sept. 25, Groome will address catechists, youth ministers, campus ministers and other pastoral and educational personnel in a workshop called "Sharing Our Catholic Faith: Teaching as Jesus Did for the New Millennium."

"By baptism, all Christians are called upon to share the faith — to evangelize and catechize in the Good News of Jesus Christ," Groome said. "The best way to do this is to teach as Jesus did.

"But what does such catechesis and ministry look like now, 2,000 years later and at the beginning of the third millennium? This workshop will reflect on how to model ourselves on Jesus the teacher today."

Groome's workshop for catechists and pastoral ministers will be hosted at St. Aloysius Church, 902 Second St. NE in Hickory, from 9:30 a.m.-2 p.m.

Groome's most recent work is last year's "Educating for Life: A Spiritual Vision for Every Teacher and Parent." The book is noted for its optimism, ecumenical sensitivity and practical suggestions in its effort to inspire teachers, ministers and parents to learn more about the educational tradition of Catholicism.

Groome has also penned three other books, including the widely used "Christian Religious Education: Sharing Our Story and Vision." He served as the primary author of three religion curricula, and has written more than 80 articles and essays on religious education and pastoral ministry.

For a quarter century, Groome has lectured extensively at Catholic and Protestant religious education conferences in North America and at other gatherings throughout the world.

Mercy Sister Maureen Meehan, director of religious formation for the Catholic Schools Office, invites guest speakers such as Groome to address people involved in education in the diocese a couple of times each school year. She said such presentations are extra ways to further educate the educators.

"The teachings of our Catholic traditions should be woven into our everyday teachings," she added.

"The most important responsibility we have from that perspective is education of adults," Father Hawker said. "If all we do is educate children and youth without seeing the relationship to the education of adults, we are not fulfilling our commission."

Overall, the Office of Faith Formation seeks to enhance the faith journeys of all parishioners in the diocese. And Faith Formation Week is one way of celebrating a vital ministry and all those who promote it at the parish level.

"A very important task of this office is to assist those involved in the catechetical mission of the church to understand that they are involved in an art," Father Hawker said. "By that, I mean taking what you have and making it palatable to persons who are on their way in their life's journey. The catechetical mission of the church is to be able to address each moment of a person's faith journey."

Summer school teaches children about the Bible

By ALESHA M. PRICE
Staff Writer

THOMASVILLE — Spanish and English filled the air as the children listened to the Bible stories of David and Jesus. The vacation Bible school at Our Lady of the Highways Church parish during the week of July 26 had nearly 68 students, aged four to 12, from various area schools, in classes to compare the lives of Jesus and David in the Old and New Testaments.

For almost 10 years, the Bible school has used idea packages from the David C. Cook Publishing House series of religious programs geared toward teaching children specifics about biblical passages. It has educated many young parishioners for eight years.

This year was no different. The theme — Awesome Adventures with David and Jesus — was centered on a system of five classes with their own themes: Pasture, Stream, Mountains, Cave, and the Heavens. The preschoolers were contained in their own class, while some of the older kids were asked to be youth leaders and helpers.

Kathy Laskis, the coordinator for religious education at the church, said, "It serves as an in-depth and interactive learning experience for the children. It is liberating and hands-on and literally transforms their world into the world of Jesus and David. It is a worthwhile thing to do because it can teach them to possibly model themselves after Jesus and David."

Students in the Mountain Class participate in an interactive David and Goliath story during the summer Bible school at Our Lady of the Highways parish in Thomasville.

The same lesson was taught to a different group of kids who changed classes each night. Each class was decorated according to the theme, and each class had a title which served as a focal point for the lesson. The children were given individual passports that were stamped after they completed a class.

In the Pasture class, the children colored a wall hanging with a meadow with sheep and sat on a flowered quilt on the floor. The symbol was a shepherd's staff, and the theme was "David, the shepherd and Jesus, the Good Shepherd." For one evening, the children were given a Bible passage in connection with the theme and were told to reflect using their own artistic expression.

Eleven-year-old Blanche Reyes said, "I thought it would be fun to meet other people and learn about God. I think the program is cool because we get to spend time and do activities together."

The Pasture group leader, Analyn Garcia, 16, said that she wanted inspire them to learn more about the Bible.

The Stream class featured a blue and white strip of fabric decorated with seashells. The theme was "David, the chosen and Jesus, God's Chosen One" with the symbol being a heart. The children were discussing the story of Adam and Eve using handouts with a substitute teacher for the night's lesson.

When asked about the impact of the classes, Stream youth leader Maria Jose, 15, said, "This is a positive thing because most kids my age will say 'I never learned that when I was small.' I wanted to help the kids begin to learn more about God at an early age, so they will understand more and believe in Him more fully as they grow older."

In the Mountain class, the teacher and the two youth leaders were dressed in clothing from Jesus' and David's time with a brown-material covered mass serving as the mountain and a darkly colored wall hanging with leaves, twigs, and rocks hanging from the material. The symbol, naturally, was stone with the theme being "David, the victor and Jesus, the Victor over death." The children made Popsicle stick figures of David and used them as part of an interactive David and Goliath story.

The Mountain youth leaders, 13-year-old Blanche Rojas and 16-year-old Hugo Dubon, both agreed that the Bible school was a positive influ-

My daughter and I had one of those blow-ups that aren't particularly rare during a child's teen-age years. I don't remember the substance of the argument, only that it ended with a stinging comment by her that left me fuming as she stormed off to her bedroom.

The meanness of the remark was not characteristic of Libby, but during that difficult adolescent stage it happened quite a bit, so I wasn't surprised, but I was angry. I knew exactly what was going on in her mind and what would happen next. She would soon be sorry for what she said and would eventually come to me and apologize.

But I was determined to teach her the lesson that you can't just go popping off, hurting people, and then come back and be forgiven just like that. I briefly wrestled with my conscience over this, but my conscience lost.

Sure enough, after a short time Libby appeared, sniffling and visibly contrite. I steeled myself as she asked for forgiveness. "Mom?" she added in a small voice when I gave no response.

"Listen!" I heard myself snap at her, "do you think you can talk to me like that and then come back and have me say, oh, that's OK? I have feelings, too, and I don't feel very forgiving right now!"

Well, revenge was not sweet. As I saw the look of devastation on her face I immediately felt ashamed. What lesson had I taught her? That when you are truly sorry and ask forgiveness, the person you love and trust most will slap you down?

Today's Scripture warns us against seeking revenge and reminds us that the Lord's forgiveness is repeated endlessly. The parable in the Gospel shows us that God expects us to be as merciful as he is.

Can't I remember an adolescent stage of my relationship with the Lord when I regularly refused to listen to him, hurt him and stubbornly worked against his will? And didn't he always forgive me? Did Jesus go stridently up Calvary putting his finger in faces along the way and yelling, "Hey, I have feelings too, ya know?!"

My daughter and I have a close, loving relationship, and we repaired the damage as I finally asked her forgiveness for my being unforgiving. But I was the one who learned the lesson: Yes, you do have to stand there and take the shots and then say it's OK — 70 times seven times.

Questions:

When have you refused to be forgiving? Over the years, what offenses can you think of for which the Lord has forgiven you?

TV Film Fair

By HENRY HERX AND GERRI PARE
Catholic News Service

NEW YORK (CNS) — Here are capsule reviews of theatrical movies on network television the week of Sept. 12.

Sunday, Sept. 12, 8-11 p.m. EDT (CBS) "Goodfellas" (1990). The heady rise — and eventual downfall — of three Brooklyn hoods (Ray Liotta, Robert De Niro and Joe Pesci) are shown from one gangster's warped point of view in this fact-based story spanning 30 years. Director Martin Scorsese synthesizes flowing cinematography, an eye for details and commanding performances into a chilling re-creation of the empty glamour and endless greed that characterizes mob life. Much graphic violence and rough language. The U.S. Catholic Conference classification of the theatrical version was A-IV — adults, with reservations. The Motion Picture Association of America rating was R — restricted.

Sunday, Sept. 12, 7-11 p.m. EDT (NBC) "Braveheart" (1995). Bloody historical epic in which 13th-century Scotsman William Wallace (Mel Gibson), spurred on by the murder of his wife, attempts to unite the bickering Scottish noblemen under Robert the Bruce (Angus McFadyen) in a fight for independence against the ruthless English King Edward I (Patrick McGoohan). Also directed by Gibson, the lavish production focuses on savage battles, betrayals and murders of revenge, softened by a smattering of royal romance. Much gory violence on and off the battlefield, a few fleeting bedroom scenes, brief nudity and minimal rough language. The U.S. Catholic Conference classification of the theatrical version was A-IV — adults, with reservations. The Motion Picture Association of America rating was R — restricted.

Wednesday, Sept. 15, 8-11 (CBS) "The Pelican Brief" (1993). With her life in grave danger after figuring out who was behind the assassination of two Supreme Court justices, a New Orleans law student (Julia Roberts) turns to a investigative reporter (Denzel Washington) to get her incriminating brief in print. Abetted by exceptional performances from a fine supporting cast, director Alan J. Pakula's spiky thriller maintains suspense despite a convoluted plot. Some restrained violence and an instance of rough language. The U.S. Catholic Conference classification of the theatrical version was A-III — adults. The Motion Picture Association of America rating was PG-13 — parents are strongly cautioned that some material may be inappropriate for children under 13.

Join the Carmelite Friars in Prayer as We Honor Saint Therese, The Little Flower

In joyful anticipation of the Little Flower's life and spirituality, we would like to include your needs in our prayers.

Please join us as we petition St. Therese during two Novenas of Masses from October 2-10 at the National Shrine of Our Lady of Mount Carmel and the Basilica of St. Therese in Lisieux, France.

When you join us during this special time of prayer, you may want to honor and petition St. Therese by using the Little Flower Rose Petal Chaplet.

This unique blessed Chaplet is made of genuine rose petals which are compressed into beads. Each of the 25 beads (1 Our Father and 24 to represent each year of St. Therese's life) has the beautiful fragrance of roses... a wonderful reminder of the Little Flower. The Chaplet also has a silver-tone St. Therese medal and comes with an instructional prayer card.

The Little Flower Rose Petal Chaplet will be sent to our friends making an offering of $12 or more to support Carmelite Ministry. Please check the appropriate box on the coupon to receive this beautiful gift.

Every

Act Of Mercy

Is Backed By The Power Of The System.

Mercy Hospital, long known for its excellent care and gentle touch, still offers those ingredients so important to medical care. And now, each Mercy Hospital program is backed by the largest, most comprehensive healthcare system in the region — Carolinas HealthCare System. Unlock the Power of the System at Mercy Hospital.

Emergency Department
Characteristically offering the shortest waits in the area, the Mercy ED is staffed by board-certified and board-eligible Emergency Medicine specialists 24 hours a day.

The Heart Center
The cutting edge of high technology allows the center's outstanding heart specialists to diagnose and treat heart problems. With 25 years of experience, hundreds of open heart surgeries and thousands of cardiac catheterizations are successfully completed here each year.

Conveniently Located Doctors
The System's network of primary care physicians is located over several counties and work with Mercy's 200-plus specialists.

Managed Care
If you're covered by a healthcare plan, chances are good Mercy is among your accepted hospitals.

The Lung Center
Mercy has designed a center exclusively for the diagnosis, treatment and management of lung diseases in adults. The Lung Center offers a wide variety of equipment and specialists who treat the full spectrum of pulmonary disorders from asthma to lung cancer.

Pain Center
The center offers a comprehensive approach to the diagnosis and treatment of people with chronic pain. Our team of specialists includes a physician specially trained in pain management and focuses on both the physical and psychological aspects of a person's pain condition.

Rehabilitation Center
A full program of rehabilitation — led by physicians, nurses, therapists and counselors — helps patients overcome the changes resulting from physical disability.

Outpatient / Inpatient Surgery
Professional staffs give outstanding care to patients and families, whether it's for a few hours or for overnight stays.

ence on the children.

"I was coming here as a student, and I was asked to be a helper. This is good thing because it helps them to learn about Jesus," said Rojas.

Dubon said, "I like working with the children, so I am glad to be a youth leader."

With a teacher dressed in appropriate attire significant of the areas where Jesus and David lived, the Cave classroom was decorated with pictograms and cave drawings that the children were trying to decipher and a brown-patterned cloth on the floor and on the teacher's chair.

The theme and symbols dealt with friends: "David, a friend, and Jesus, the Faithful Friend." During snack time, the children, in keeping with the theme, had to share their twin Popsicles and graham crackers with each other.

Perhaps the most impressive class of all was the "Heavens" which featured a gold throne, stars hung from the ceiling decorated with glitter wishes, white sheets and curtains, and purple filters on the light fixtures. The children were able to sit on the throne with their decorated crowns, which served as the symbol, to make and grant wishes for themselves and the class.

One of the substitute teachers, Gary Provost, stated, "I believe I was touched by God. I had been slacking in my Catholic duties, so I had been visiting the Blessed Sacrament lately. I was inspired to come and teach."

"It was definitely a success this year even though we ran into some problems in the beginning. Overall, the kids had a wonderful time and an excellent religious learning experience," said Laskis.

From the looks of the smiling faces of the children and their eagerness to learn more about the connections between Jesus and David, it is safe to say that this vacation Bible school helped the area children to become closer with their faith. ▼

Konstant of Leeds, chairman of the bishops' Department of International Affairs, urged an international peacekeeping force and a halt to economic and military aid to Indonesia.

At the papal summer residence in Castel Gandolfo, Italy, Sept. 5, Pope John Paul II called for an end to all acts of "intimidation and violence" in East Timor.

"May the Virgin Mary awaken in the souls of everyone sentiments of true pacification and constructive respect for the will expressed in recent days by the Timorese population," he said.

Indonesian bishops called for an end to the violence and urged Indonesian Catholics to help East Timorese with prayers and action, especially humanitarian assistance for displaced people in refugee camps.

Refugees reportedly were fleeing to West Timor, where Catholic Relief Services, the U.S. bishops' international aid and development agency, already had been administering food assistance programs for the local population, said Michael Wiest, CRS deputy executive director.

"We have staff and assets out there, especially in form of food aid, and we're in a position to make 2,500 metric tons of rice available if needed," he said in a Sept. 7 telephone interview from the agency's headquarters in Baltimore. "We're not sure yet exactly what is needed," he said.

Hours prior to the attack on Bishop Belo's residence, militias attacked the diocesan complex in Dili, burning several buildings. The Carmelite-run Motael clinic in Dili was also attacked, sources in East Timor said. Attacks were also reported at a Canossians sisters convent that was sheltering refugees and at the International Committee of the Red Cross headquarters, located next door to Bishop Belo's residence.

"They're destroying this city. There's nothing left. As I am talking to you, I am watching the city burn," said a Salesian nun in Dili, who spoke via phone with the request of anonymity.

"The houses nearby are burning, and the military is just letting them do it. No one can do anything at this point, not UNAMET, no one. I don't know what you can do, but we need peacekeeping troops in here right away," she said Sept. 7.

She also said a militia commander told the nuns to evacuate the convent or it would be burned to the ground.

"Whether we live, or whether we die, we're not going to leave the people," she said. ▼

LIMEX students share thoughts on program

By JOANITA M. NELLENBACH
Correspondent

HICKORY — Theology is about religious studies the average layperson isn't expected to understand. Right?

Not for students in the Loyola Institute for Ministry Extension Program, or LIMEX (pronounced "limx"), offered by Loyola University New Orleans. LIMEX students learn "practical theology."

LIMEX students in the Charlotte Diocese gathered at St. Aloysius Church Aug. 29 to talk about the program. Also attending were Dr. Barbara Fleischer, LIMEX director; Bishop William G. Curlin, and Father James Hawker, diocesan vicar for education.

Previously, the closest LIMEX program was at the Rock Hill (S.C.) Oratory, 25 miles from Charlotte. The first LIMEX course in the Charlotte Diocese began in August 1998. Presently 48 students are enrolled in groups in Charlotte, Asheville, Arden and Winston-Salem. Joanna Case, the Charlotte Diocese LIMEX liaison, said there is considerable interest in starting groups in Greensboro, Wilkesboro/Boone, and perhaps another in Charlotte. A minimum of 12 students is needed to start a group.

Bryna Bozart-Barnes told what LIMEX has meant to her. She yearned to be a hospital chaplain, but found no training until she heard about the Oratory's LIMEX program.

"It has opened so many doors for me," she said. "I'm so grateful. It couldn't have happened for me any other way." Since graduating, she has become a chaplain at Mercy Hospital in Charlotte.

Connie Milligan is director of religious education at St. John Neumann Church in Charlotte.

"I can't say enough about how [LIMEX] has helped me in my ministry," she said. "It's helped me have a great understanding and compassion for the people I'm privileged to work with."

Dr. Barbara Fleischer, director of LIMEX at Loyola University New Orleans, chats with Don and Pam Allen during the LIMEX gathering at St. Aloysius Church in Hickory Aug. 29. Don Allen is in the ninth of 12 courses in the LIMEX program.

But ministry isn't restricted to traditional "religious" roles.

Don Allen of Charlotte, who hopes to graduate from the Oratory program next spring, is a physician's assistant working with urology patients.

"I'm a convert, and I really got into [LIMEX] just to learn more about Catholicism," he said. "I didn't know the program would be so involved. I think it's helped me with my patients. I have a lot of indigent patients, and it's helped me minister to them."

Courses include Old Testament, New Testament, and spirituality, among other subjects. But Course No. 1 is an eye opener for people who never realized theology goes beyond books and philosophical discussions. That first course establishes LIMEX's real-world emphasis.

"Course 1," Fleischer said, "is about how one does theology. How do I discern what ministerial aspect to engage in? How do I identify a piece of ministry with which to connect? That is the basis on which the program is built. What does this mean in terms of how I minister to my community? Practical theology never leaves the world."

Sid Baker, who is starting the fourth course in the group that meets at St. Barnabas Church in Arden, found his worldview has widened.

"I think what Course 1 did for me was opening me up to look at people," he said. "It makes you think twice about where they're coming from, where you're coming from, and it makes me slow down in my quickness to judge."

Ann Stowe is starting the fourth course in the group at St. Eugene Church in Asheville.

"This to me is a very unique course because we can implement what we learn immediately," she said. "It's almost like you're getting your money's worth right from the start instead of having to get through four years of college first. It shapes your life. It makes such a difference."

It does "shape your life," not only in its view of theology, but in the time commitment. Allen, who is taking the ninth of 12 courses, said he and his wife are already planning "life A.L. - After LIMEX."

Courses last 10 weeks. Preparation for each session takes six to 10 hours and includes of reading a chapter in the course book (the equivalent of a classroom lecture), reading chapters in one or more textbooks, and keeping a journal of answers to questions in the course syllabus.

Students meet for three hours one evening a week, with a facilitator guiding the sessions. A session includes a video that expands on what they have read and discussion of journal entries and the material on the video.

A Loyola instructor grades the papers submitted at the end of the course. Students can earn a master's degree or continuing education certificate in religious education or pastoral studies.

All the effort is worth it, the students say.

"I worried about every detail of every paper," Milligan said. "You in the beginning stages, hang in there. You and your group grow together. It's a great experience. It has enhanced me as a human being."

Anyone interested in LIMEX can contact Joanna Case, diocesan liaison for LIMEX, at (704) 362-0013 or by e-mail at jcase@charlotte.infi.net. ▼

Ecumenical retreat brings denominations together

GREENSBORO — For those needing spiritual, physical, or emotional healing from within, the seventh annual Ecumenical Healing Retreat will take place on the weekend of Sept. 24 and 25 at First Lutheran Church, 3600 West Friendly Ave. Nineteen area churches, including St. Pius X, Our Lady of Grace, and St. Paul the Apostle Catholic Churches, will be sponsoring the event along with the Franciscan Center.

The theme, "Entering More Deeply into the Healing Light of Christ," is the brainchild of Rev. Flora Slossan Wuellner, an ordained minister in the United Church of Christ in Berkeley, Calif.

The retreat begins Friday, Sept. 24 at 7:00 p.m. until 9:00 p.m. and continues Saturday, Sept. 25 from 8:00 a.m. to 4:00 p.m. and will include breakfast, worship, presentations, lunch, and healing prayers.

For more information or pre-registration, call the St. Paul the Apostle representatives Jackie and Bob Phillips at (336) 282-8185. ▼

Giving relationships a fighting chance

BY JOANN S. KEANE
EDITOR

CHARLOTTE — Sometimes avoiding problems is the best way to resolve them.

While this approach may cut against the grain of how many relationship therapists would guide their patients, this unconventional approach is seeing a swell of interest.

Charlotte therapist and author of "The Solo Partner," Phil DeLuca, M.S.W., developed strategies he says work, "even when there is an uncooperative partner who actively undermines all efforts to improve the relationship."

Janet Chapman credits DeLuca's program for saving her marriage. More than a decade passed since she and husband Mark went for marriage counseling. Mark was defensive, and refused to change. Janet learned to deal with the situation, while the marriage deteriorated. In their dysfunctional partnership, she became the sole parent to their five children.

"The Solo Partner" embraces a concept geared towards a singular partner. In essence, the program contends one person in the relationship can make the other change, with changes the program participant adopts as their own behaviors.

DeLuca is convinced his techniques can bring promising results when an uncooperative partner is involved. "However," he says, "if you are fortunate enough to have a cooperative partner, this approach will work even better."

Don't confuse DeLuca's program with Retrouvaille, a peer ministry designed to help an increasing number of marriages and families stay intact. After six years of involvement, Rev. Mr. Nick Fadero guestimates he's had over 3,000 calls of interest in Retrouvaille. Of those calls, only about 20 percent of those who receive information will actually come, mainly due to an uncooperative partner. At its crux, Retrouvaille brings couples together for an intensive marriage workshop, where the weekend program stresses self-discovery, communication and faith.

Rev. Mr. Fadero calls DeLuca's approach one of tough love.

Nearly five years passed since Janet Chapman picked up a copy of "Solo Partner" as a last hope. "Mark refused counseling, but the situation was desperate," she recalls. Her husband read it, began to relate to DeLuca's step-by-step process, and adapted his behaviors accordingly. "Finally, after 10 years, things are improving," says Chapman.

On Oct. 9, DeLuca will bring this unorthodox conflict resolution workshop to Charlotte. Rev. Mr. Fadero says, "Solo Partner participants will be taught how to resolve conflict based on Scripture and Catholic principals." DeLuca says the program is geared for both married or unmarried partners, as well as other types of relationships, such as parent-child, friendships, dating relationships and roommate relationships.

"These techniques are designed to reduce conflict, limit 'power plays' and manipulation, and encourage the development of effective communications," says DeLuca.

For registration information and workshop details, call 704-334-2283. ▼

Bishop Curlin recalls the charisma of Mother Teresa

By JOANN S. KEANE
Editor

CHARLOTTE — On the second anniversary of the death of Mother Teresa of Calcutta, Bishop William G. Curlin offered prayers of remembrance for the woman who captured the hearts of the world.

During a Sept. 5 Mass at St. Patrick Cathedral, the bishop reflected on a number of the experiences from their friendship of nearly three decades. Mother Teresa quickly came to know she could count on the bishop and his willingness to pitch in, whether it be scrubbing the floors of a planned hospice, or conducting impromptu retreats for her and her sisters in India.

Moreover, he spoke of her simple faith — the driving force of Mother Teresa.

"She saw with an inner vision," said Bishop Curlin. "She saw with her heart. It was her belief that if you want to touch God, you reach down and touch a crying child, a dying person, you feed the homeless, or just reach out to the brokenhearted." That, the bishop recalled, is where Mother Teresa said you will find Jesus in the least among us.

In 1995, Mother Teresa visited Charlotte, where she was keynote speaker for an ecumenical prayer service at the Charlotte Coliseum. While in the diocese, she established a convent and left four of her sisters to continue in ministry to the poor.

Years before her death, the world called her a saint. During a tour of the United States in 1982, she was asked at a press conference in Charleston, S.C., about the popular conviction that she was already a saint. "Please let me die first," she replied. Her response was typical of the sense of humor Bishop Curlin frequently spoke of. "She was a woman of joy," he said.

Following her death, an outpouring of requests from all over the world prompted Pope John Paul II to waive the usual waiting period of five years after the death before investigation of new sainthood causes can begin. Church sources in Rome said it is apparently the first time such an exception had been made.

Bishop Curlin was one of those asked to contribute to the official investigation by providing testimony that will help substantiate sainthood, a request he was honored to fulfill. As the Vatican committee scours the earth for witness of miracles, Bishop Curlin offers, "The greatest miracle of her life was ... one tiny little woman who only had faith and love ... and with those two virtues, she raised the hearts of the world." With this, said the bishop, she helped and inspired countless millions to want to do the same.

"We need heroes today," said Bishop Curlin in his homily. "We need heroes who inspire and move us and motivate us and charge us up. Mother Teresa practiced heroic virtue. She taught us that the greatest power you have on earth is inside you." ▼

Indonesian activists burn Australian and American flags in front of the Chinese Embassy in Jakarta Sept. 10, opposing any attempt by the United Nations to intervene in outbreaks of violence in East Timor.

Vatican paper wonders if Timor peacekeepers will be too late

WASHINGTON (CNS) — After a week of bloodshed and repeated church calls for international intervention, the Indonesian government agreed to allow U.N. peacekeeping troops into East Timor.

The Sept. 12 move answered pleas from East Timor's two bishops, Pope John Paul II, and church leaders from several continents, but the Vatican newspaper questioned whether it was too late, since pro-Indonesia militias reportedly had killed tens of thousands of people and left some 200,000 homeless.

"What will remain of East Timor? What could be saved at this point?" asked the newspaper, L'Osservatore Romano.

Others, however, urged the peacekeeping force to begin work immediately.

A church worker in East Timor reported that on Sept. 13, militias were on the move again, burning property and shooting indiscriminately. The worker feared that unless U.N. troops arrived quickly, the militias would go on another killing spree.

"You go from hearing good news to hearing discouraging news," the worker said. "It keeps going back and forth, and it's pretty tiring, and we keep waiting and waiting."

U.N. Commissioner for Human Rights Mary Robinson told the Australian Broadcasting Corp. Sept. 13 that she had found overnight in Jakarta a "new atmosphere, a much more positive one" toward cooperating in work for humanitarian relief in East Timor.

Nevertheless, she said, the United Nations had to "look very quickly at assembling the evidence of human rights violations" and the "very serious terrorizing and forcible displacement of population, killing, and utter devastation of communities that has taken place in East Timor."

"I have been very shocked and troubled by the clear link that came up in every single version between the (Indonesian military) and the militia, and the complicity in many instances of the police and local authorities," she said.

Vatican Radio's program director, Jesuit Father Federico Lombardi, said in a commentary Sept. 13 that the Vatican was pleased that Indonesia agreed to accept outside intervention and that the church hoped that "deeds would follow words in the shortest time possible." The international force should be deployed "as rapidly and as effectively as possible," he said.

Bishop Carlos Filipe Ximenes Belo, who had called for international peacekeepers, termed the Indonesian decision a "courageous choice." The bishop, apostolic administrator of Dili, East Timor, spoke in Portugal, former territorial administrator of East Timor.

The next day he flew to the papal villa in Castel Gandolfo, south of Rome, to meet with Pope John Paul. The pope, who earlier had called for

Gore makes controversial visit to Detroit parish

DETROIT (CNS) — Controversy surrounded the Sept. 5 visit by Vice President Al Gore, AFL-CIO President John Sweeney and others to Detroit's Sacred Heart Church. About two dozen pro-life supporters gathered a block from the church before and after the 10:30 a.m. Sunday Mass. At the invitation of a Chicago interfaith group, a number of civic and labor leaders attended the Mass as part of a Labor Day program in southeast Michigan. "Vice President Gore's stated views on abortion and so-called 'choice' issues are directly and categorically in conflict with Catholic moral teaching," said Ned McGrath, director of communications for the Archdiocese of Detroit, in a statement released Sept. 4.

Burundian bishop perplexed by lack of Western interest

ROME (CNS) — Blaming Western nations for furnishing arms to warring ethnic factions in Burundi, a leading bishop said he did not understand Western disinterest in aiding his country economically. Archbishop Simon Ntamwana of Gitega said the West — particularly the United States and the European Union — should take some responsibility for the fighting that has killed more than 150,000 since 1993 in clashes between ethnic Hutu rebels and the minority Tutsis, who control the government and army. "I certainly remain perplexed, particularly with the United States," Archbishop Ntamwana, president of the Burundian bishops' conference, said Sept. 10 after a meeting of Burundian bishops with Pope John Paul II.

Papal biography was a command performance — from the pope

WASHINGTON (CNS) — What's an author to do when the pope invites him to dinner and asks him to write the pope's biography? For George Weigel, the answer was easy — not only because Pope John Paul II asked him but because the author had long wanted to write such a book. Three-and-a-half years in the making, "Witness to Hope: The Biography of Pope John Paul II" will be available in bookstores by mid-October from HarperCollins Publishers. An imposing yet highly readable volume that runs nearly 1,000 pages, including footnotes, the biography is the work of Weigel, a Catholic newspaper columnist and senior fellow at the Ethics and Public Policy Center in Washington.

Bishop calls proposed N. Ireland changes important step

DUBLIN, Ireland (CNS) — An independent commission's report proposing changes to Northern Ireland's police force is "an important step forward," said Bishop Patrick Walsh of Down and Connor, Northern Ireland. The Independent Commission for Policing in Northern Ireland published its report Sept. 9 and recommended changes to the British-controlled Royal Ulster Constabulary, including changing its name to the Northern Ireland Police Service and making the force 30 percent Catholic within 10 years.

Polish church condemns computer game aimed at killing cardinal

WARSAW, Poland (CNS) — A Polish computer firm is under investigation for allegedly circulating a computer game with the objective of killing a character named after Cardinal Jozef Glemp of Warsaw. A church spokesman condemned the game as "deeply alarming" and said it highlighted the need for tighter Internet regulations. In a mid-August report, the mass-circulation Gazeta Wyborcza daily said the game, "Operation Glemp," had been designed by a 25-year-old employee of Altar, a Kielce-based computer firm. It added that the aim was to kill Cardinal Glemp after "shooting at everything black which moves."

NCCB pro-life official urges support for fetal protection bill

WASHINGTON (CNS) — The executive director of the U.S. bishops' Secretariat for Pro-Life Activities urged members of the House Judiciary Committee to approve a bill intended to punish those who attack fetuses in the womb. Letting such attacks go unpunished "makes no moral or legal sense," said Gail Quinn in a Sept. 8 letter to Judiciary Committee members. The committee was considering the Unborn Victims of Violence Act, which in August had been approved 5-2 by the House Subcommittee on the Constitution. The bill would protect unborn children whose mothers are physically assaulted, beaten, maimed or murdered.

Limits, not persecution, seen as Vietnam's response to religion

NEW YORK (CNS) — Vietnam's appraoch to religion today is by placing restrictions than by persecution, the chairman of the U.S. bishops' International Policy Committee said after a visit there. In a telephone interview Sept. 8, Archbishop Theodore E. McCarrick of Newark, N.J., reported that bishops in Vietnam cannot meet without government permission. Official approval is also required for a man to study for the priesthood, and although many men are being ordained, many others who want to study for ordination are not allowed to do so, he said. The government also restricts church use of media, he said.

Experts contest book describing Pope Pius XII as anti-Semite

ROME (CNS) — An English author, after investigating the life of Pope Pius XII with Vatican approval, has concluded that the late pope was an anti-Semite who was well-informed about the extent of Nazi persecution of Jews but failed to condemn it. The allegations prompted a flurry of rebuttals from Vatican and church experts, who said the author, John Cornwell, had selectively interpreted documents from the period and jumped to false conclusions. Cornwell's soon-to-be-published book, "Hitler's Pope: The Secret History of Pius XII," was excerpted in the October issue of Vanity Fair.

Catholic Schools Office brings distance learning to diocese

By JIMMY ROSTAR
Associate Editor

WINSTON-SALEM — Thanks to the technological advance called distance learning, teachers in the Diocese of Charlotte's Catholic schools and religious education programs can learn more about the sacramental life of the church this fall.

The program is called Serve Our Schools & Parishes, a live, interactive television series designed for Catholic school teachers, catechists and people involved in a variety of education ministries. A project of the National Catholic Educational Association in Washington, D.C., Serve Our Schools has reached nearly 3,500 catechists and educators who have completed its courses.

Leaders in Catholic education and theology present the courses live via satellite or cable network to specified sites where educators and other participants are gathered. Each session is an hour long, and is enhanced with interactive audio and Internet access for those who enroll.

The upcoming scheduled classes revolve around the theme "The Sacramental Life of the Church: Give Us This Day Our Daily Bread," and will emphasize sacramental preparation of young people.

Sessions are free of charge and will be hosted in the library of Bishop McGuinness High School, 1730 Link Road, in Winston-Salem.

The upcoming series suggests specific understandings of the sacraments and how they educate both mind and heart on a very personal level.

Mercy Sister Maureen Meehan, director of religious formation for the diocesan Catholic Schools Office, is responsible for bringing the program here. She called Serve Our Schools an "informative and interesting" means of reaching teachers and catechists in their own ongoing formation.

"This is an excellent resource for our teachers in Catholic schools, for our catechists in faith formation programs, and for all people who in some way are educating others about our beautiful faith," she said.

Participants can earn CEUs, or education credits, from Barry University in Miami through the Adrian Dominican School of Education.

Sister Maureen added that the public is also invited to attend. "People who would simply like to know more about the church's sacraments will learn a great deal from this program," she said.

Sessions will be hosted at BMHS from 3-4 p.m. Live presentation dates, themes and session descriptions are as follows:

• Session One, scheduled for Sept. 29, is called "Born in Christ" and will focus on the sacrament of baptism as the beginning of Christian life;

• Session Two, to be held Oct. 13, is titled "One Bread One Body" and centers on the Eucharist as an experience of Christ's love and strength;

• Session Three, on Oct. 27, is "The Lord Forgives" and explains how the sacrament of reconciliation is an encounter of God's love and mercy;

• Session Four, scheduled for Nov. 3, is called "We Are the Lord's Own" and illustrates how the Holy Spirit through the sacrament of confirmation empowers people to live their faith in all they do;

• Session Five, on Nov. 10, is titled "The Lord Calls" and focuses on the sacraments of holy orders and matrimony as instances of grace that build Christian community. This session also deals with the sacrament of the sick as a way Christ touches the suffering with strength, hope and love.

The course presenter is Father Richard Fragomeni, a faculty member of the Catholic Theological Union

Parish revives annual tradition of blessing taxis

By EVELYN ZAPPIA
Catholic News Service

SAN FRANCISCO (CNS) — St. Boniface Church revived a San Francisco tradition — the annual blessing of the taxicab drivers — on Sept. 1, the feast of the patron saint of cabdrivers, St. Fiacre.

Cabbies of various religious affiliations lined Golden Gate Avenue in front of the historic church as Franciscan Father Floyd Lotito briefly talked to each driver and performed the blessing.

"May God bless you and your cab and everyone that rides in it," he said. "We ask in his name to keep you safe from harm and in good health."

"In this city it's important to get all the help I can," said driver Rinaldo Datlag. "I believe in blessings, and know this will keep me safe."

The blessing ceremony put focus on the service cab drivers provide the community and also drew attention to St. Boniface Church and the friars' campaign to raise funds for the facility's seismic retrofitting. The church in San Francisco's Tenderloin district must be upgraded to comply with seismic standards passed into law after the 1989 Loma Prieta earthquake.

Restoring the church ensures that the good works the Franciscans have been providing in the Tenderloin community for 112 years will continue, Father Lotito said. ▼

POPE JOHN PAUL II

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Here is the text of Pope John Paul II's English-language message Sept. 9 to the bishops and faithful of East Timor.

Their Excellencies Bishop Carlos F. Ximenes Belo, SdB, apostolic administrator of Dili; Bishop Basilio do Nascimento, apostolic administrator of Baukau,

It is with great sadness that hour by hour I am receiving ever more tragic news from the cherished land of East Timor, and I am profoundly saddened that the glimmers of hope born of the recent popular consultation have been transformed into the terror of today, which nothing and no one can justify.

In these hours of suffering, I wish to send to both of you, to the clergy, seminarians, religious and faithful of the two dioceses, this expression of my spiritual closeness, while remembering in prayer those who have died, the injured, the refugees, the deportees and all who are in distress. I call on everyone to cling to hope in the victory of the Cross, even as they are living once again the sorrowful experience of the Passion.

In most firmly condemning the violence, which has also been furiously unleashed against the personnel and property of the Catholic Church, I implore those responsible for so many acts of wickedness to abandon their murderous and destructive intentions. It is also my heartfelt wish that as soon as possible Indonesia and the international community will put an end to the slaughter and find effective ways to meet the legitimate aspirations of the Timorese population.

With such sentiments and fervent wishes, and as a pledge of divine comfort, I impart with all my heart to you and your Christian communities my apostolic blessing.

From the Vatican, Sept. 9, 1999.

Pope warns of modern society that has forgotten God

CASTEL GANDOLFO, Italy (CNS) — Divorce, abortion and assisted suicide are not marks of a progressive culture, but of a society that has forgotten God, Pope John Paul II said.

"Some ideas which are considered pillars of modern or postmodern culture are clearly non-Christian," the pope said Sept. 11 in a message to the bishops of Puerto Rico.

The bishops met the pope at Castel Gandolfo, south of Rome, during their "ad limina" visits to report on the church in their dioceses.

"Regrettably, the current cultural context — and Puerto Rico is not an exception — tends to give rise to a culture and a social life separated from God," the pope said.

"Divorce, abortion, assisted euthanasia, pre-marital relations and hedonism are presented as modern 'conquests' because of a misunderstood (idea of) individual freedom exempt from responsibility," the pope said.

Office of Justice & Peace

JOANNE KENNEDY FRAZER
GUEST COLUMNIST

Faith Doing Justice conference

The infinite bounty of God begins with the gift of life itself and continues with everything that sustains it. Our (human) activity is not so much an earning our way as a cooperating with the Creator God in transforming history into God's reign of justice and love. ("New Wineskins," Sandra M. Schneiders).

This quote captures the purpose for the Office of Justice and Peace Faith Doing Justice biennial conference: to provide ways to integrate the social mission of the church into lives and ministries in order to change "the way things are" into the way God would have them be.

The biennial diocesan-wide Faith Doing Justice Conference will be held Saturday, Oct. 23, 1999, at Queen of the Apostles Church in Belmont.

The keynote speaker, syndicated columnist Glenmary Father John Rausch, lives and works in Appalachia where he teaches, writes and organizes. His keynote topic is "John 3:16-It's More Than a Poster!" ("John 3:16" is often seen on posters at sports or entertainment events.) Father Rausch while exploring the meaning of generosity in "God so loved the world, that God gave God's only son...," will examine how a spirit of generosity, when lived by God's people in the public arena and the marketplace, has deep implications for justice, human rights and dignity in our society.

Workshops are designed to teach content and skills that will enhance a number of parish ministries. There will be sessions on justice in the new millennium, role of the faith community in welfare to work programs, environmental justice, social analysis, diversity, socially responsible investing, living wage, Catholic social teaching, using the N.C. bishops' pastoral to build social justice committees, and debt relief for poor nations.

During the afternoon, Father Rausch will present a workshop on "Social Analysis: Asking the Right Questions about Problems and Issues in our Communities," which will be a discussion how to identify and analyze issues of social and economic justice in order to take effective action.

Among the 10 workshops to choose from in the afternoon are Hunger and the Catholic Campaign on Debt presented by Rev. Mark Barwick, S.E. Regional Organizer for Bread for the World. Human Right to a Safe Environment: Care for God's Creation will be given by Jean Pudlo, Development Director of the Piedmont Land Conservancy.

Other workshop leaders include Barbara Earls, NC Council of Churches Jubilee Project; David Harold, Piedmont CSS regional office; Sister Veronica Grover, education consultant; Dr. Bernard Offerman, Catholic Campaign for Human Development; Jerry Bergeron and Sister Phyllis Tierney, parish pastoral associates; and Colleen McDermott, diocesan campus ministry director.

Parishes are invited to share display exhibits of successful activities in their social ministry.

The registration fee of $25 per person ($20 per person when 4 or more people from the same parish register together) includes lunch and materials.

The mighty mosquito

To be awakened by a mosquito screaming "Weeeeeeee! Weeeeeeee! Wee! Weeeeee!" in a really, really high-pitched voice is probably Stephen King's idea of fun. For all I know, he might have special genetically engineered mosquitoes flown in from a secret laboratory on a tiny island in the South Pacific just for his listening pleasure. This keeps his nerves sharp and his horror-story writing skills razor-edge, and his agent on Valium.

However, being awakened by a screaming mosquito is not my personal favorite way to exit slumber. In truth, however, it is not always clear if it is the mosquito's "Weeeeeeeeee. Weeeeeeeeee. Wee. Weeeeee" that wakes me up or if it is my left hand.

You see, my left hand usually hears the mosquito before my ear does (I think it has to do with my diving history's effect on my ears). So it (my left hand) jerks incredibly quickly to my ear and slaps it really hard, pretending to be trying to hit the mosquito.

Actually, the hand is just getting a huge belly laugh. It is not trying to hit the mosquito at all. It just uses the "Weeeeee" as an excuse, like your kid brother used to do when he claimed he saw a fly on the back of your neck.

"Whoops, sorry," guffaws my hand, "I was just trying to destroy that screeching mosquito."

"Sure, jerk," my ear barks back. "I know you're crossing your fingers."

I ignore them. I have leapt into the air and am now standing on the bed — my eyes squinting, surveying the darkness to try to hear that maniac mosquito again. I whisper, "Why do people squint their eyes to hear better?"

"Are you mosquito hunting again?" a voice in the dark asks. It sounds familiar. It's a much lower tone than the mosquito uses. Still, it could be one of Stephen King' mutant mosquitoes that alters its voice.

"Is that my wife asking?" I venture. "And don't try to fool me because I have a loaded pillow in my hands and I'll let you have it."

"My mother tried to warn me," the voice replies.

"Didn't you ear that mosquito?" I ask.

"The one that goes, 'Weeeeeeeee' like a little genetically created mosquito dentist with a high pitched drill?" she completes my sentence for me.

"Yes," I whisper.

"Would it help to turn on the light?" she asks.

"Maybe," I said, "but you know what happens then."

"Yes," she sighed, "they become invisible and disappear back to Stephen King's island in the South Pacific."

"Exactly."

"Maybe we should talk to Father O'Kneel about this," my wife suggests.

"OK," I tell her, "but I don't think exorcisms work on mosquitoes."

Love's labor found

The word in the American workplace is that employees are demanding a broader mission on the job than bringing home a paycheck. One worker puts it directly: "My job doesn't challenge me to express myself, my creativity or my individuality —all I do is work in order to live!"

Like many others he feels that all he does when he works is to make money in order that he may eat, and then eat in order that he may have strength to go back to work again. It is a process that subordinates the human spirit to the economic and the mechanical. And it is an issue that is getting a lot of press.

Labor analyst Adam Bryant recently observed [in the New York Times]: Companies, reaching the limits of downsizing and re-engineering, have decided that one of the few remaining ways to get more out of their workers is to help them find purpose."

Richard Leider, author of "The Power of Purpose: Creating Meaning in Your Life and Work" and a frequent speaker and adviser to corporations like American Express and General Motors: "Many companies are wondering, 'How do we attract and renew and bring out the energy and talents in our people?"

One solution in the last quarter of this century has been to reconfigure labor practices to allow employees some share in the profits or management or ownership of industry.

Yet another remedy for restoring the dignity of workers — a spiritual one — is gaining currency. It is based on the recognition of a very old idea: that each and every one of us counts as a human being, as a child of God.

For example, James Amos, president and CEO of MailBoxes Etc., concluded that it was useless trying to motivate workers with spreadsheets. So he hired Sister Suzanne Donovan, a nun, to create a mission statement for the company.

Everyone worked on it. In the end they selected eight items: caring, honesty, integrity, trust, respect, commitment, and accountability. Every worker tries to live that statement. In fact, they meet once a month in groups to discuss ways in which these values can motivate their job performance. Amos declares: "We are committed to bringing the glorious concept of the dignity of the worker back into our economic life."

For all of us, that dignity is embedded in our eternal destiny.

Raising a microphone, making a table, sweeping the floors, threading needles, routinely working at a machine in a factory — all of these operations can be sanctified and made a prayer, provided they are offered with a Divine intention. Whatsoever we do, sanctification is possible when the task is offered in the name of God.

We can do different things for different reasons, like dropping money in a cup just to be seen, or giving it simply because we see Christ in the poor. We all have work to do that is unpleasant, but it becomes purposeful when we love someone. Work done for the love of God makes one happier and gives an inner peace the world cannot take away.

Battling substance abuse by your child

There are approximately 150 million drug users around the world. Millions more are alcohol abusers. That means billions of people worldwide are made more miserable each year by the irresponsible behavior of substance abusers.

It is estimated that well over half a million Americans die each year from drug- and alcohol-related causes. More than $56 billion is spent on illegal drugs in the United States alone.

A recent survey indicated that only 14 percent of parents thought that their children had used drugs. However 38 percent of the teens surveyed admitted that they were using. What begins in the name of fun, like smoking a little pot, can blossom quickly into a life-threatening addiction.

Marijuana is stronger today than it was in the '60s and '70s. The dealers want kids to get hooked early so they can move on to more serious drugs. Teens go from experimentation to addiction in about six to 18 months. More kids are smoking pot in grammar school today than ever before. The average age for first use is 14, but some start in the fifth grade and earlier. By senior year in high school, one in 20 uses drugs on a daily basis.

These young people's learning skills diminish, and concentration is impaired. In addition, interest in sports and other activities dissolves. Watch for warning signs such as a change in behavior or appearance, a big drop in grades or a decrease in energy. A sure tip-off: unexpected disappearances of money or possessions. Family conflicts become more intense at that point.

What can a parent do to keep things from going this far? Take action to get between your children and drugs. Your children will need to know how you feel about drugs and about them. Tell them you love them, and warn them about the consequences of drug use. They could spend their lives in and out of jail, and risk the possibility of a miserable death. Let them know this in no uncertain terms.

Do not wait for them to come to talk to you. Talk straight. Do not tolerate evasive answers. Take a stand, and mean it, but be ready to listen and learn as well.

Find out what they are thinking about their future. Consider using random drug-screening tests right in your home. Testing their urine is one way to be sure. If they lie to you, and test positively, punish them severely. In advanced cases you may need to enlist trained professional help.

My heart goes out to parents who are dealing with headstrong teens. Do not be discouraged. They will fight you tooth and nail, but if you persist, your chances of prevailing are very good. With God's help all things are possible.

Once you get involved, stay involved. Make clear your expectations. Say no to questionable parties. Be serious about your intentions. Network with other parents, and if possible join a support group. Setting a good example is so important for you and for others.

Above all pray for God's wisdom and strength. Ultimately, prayer will be your strongest weapon.

Communion services conducted by laypersons

Q. In our parish the pastor's poor health precludes some morning Masses. A Communion service is substituted, which is conducted by a layperson.

It has become customary for the presider to deliver a homily, of his own making, after the readings. I understood that homilies are to be delivered only by ordained deacons or priests. Is there an official rule about this?

A. There is an official Catholic ritual for these ceremonies titled "Sunday Celebrations in the Absence of a Priest." While specifically designated for Sunday, the same principles would apply to other days of the week as well. The numbers given below refer to this document.

Generally, these celebrations take the form of either morning or evening prayer (the Liturgy of the Hours), or a Liturgy of the Word with holy Communion.

When a priest is not available for the celebration of Mass, at the recommendation of the pastor the bishop is to appoint someone, lay or religious, to lead these liturgies, including the prayers and ministry of the word, and administer Communion (21).

The ritual points out, incidentally, that these ministers carry out their responsibilities in virtue of their baptism and confirmation. It is, in other words, part of their proper function as baptized Christians to do so.

Even when a layperson presides, he or she is always to be assisted by other ministers to proclaim the Scriptures, help distribute Communion, provide the music and so on.

At the reading of the word of God, there should always be some explanation of the readings or a period of silent reflection on what has been heard. Since only an ordained minister may give the homily as such, the pastor may prepare one for the leader to read, or the lay leader may give a brief explanation of the Scripture text, if permitted to do so by the bishop (41).

An obvious peril in permitting this sort of liturgy, as many bishops have noted, is that it may seem to minimize the crucial importance of the Sunday celebration of the Eucharist in Catholic Christian life.

The Mass as a liturgical sacrifice, in the Liturgy of the Eucharist, can never be adequately substituted for by any other rite. Thus, the service we are discussing here is intended for use only when the full celebration of the paschal mystery, with the liturgies of word and Eucharist, is impossible because no priest is available.

As the introduction to this ritual indicates, pastoral teaching must always "emphasize that the sacrifice of the Mass is the only true actualization of the Lord's paschal mystery, and is the most complete manifestation of the church" (4).

For those interested, a Spanish-English edition of this ritual, complete with related documents, prayers, litanies, blessings and so on, is published by The Liturgical Press, Collegeville, Minn.

Minnesota nun, 81, named top U.S. missionary for 1999

CHICAGO (CNS) — A Minnesota nun who began serving the poor out of the back doors of parishes where she was cook has been named winner of the 1999 Lumen Christi Award for exemplary work as an American missionary. Benedictine Sister Justina Violette, 81, was to receive the award from Msgr. Kenneth Velo, president of Catholic Church Extension Society which sponsors the award, Sept. 16 in her home diocese of Crookston, Minn. Nominated by Bishop Victor Balke of Crookston, Sister Justina began her vocation by serving as a cook at a string of parishes.

Ex-baseball commissioner wants to be remembered for love of Jesus

NEW YORK (CNS) — As Major League Baseball commissioner from 1969-84, Bowie Kuhn presided over some of the most historic and tumultuous times of America's national pastime. But when asked how he'd like to be remembered he simply said, "as a good Catholic man." Before taping an appearance on "Personally Speaking," nationally syndicated by the Catholic Communication Campaign, Kuhn discussed his years as commissioner, his love for the game, and his love of Jesus Christ. Kuhn said his faith has been his anchor throughout his life.

Mercy sister wins highest national fly fishing award

Cardinal O'Connor resumes public duties after brain surgery

NEW YORK (CNS) — Cardinal John J. O'Connor of New York, recuperating from removal of a brain tumor, resumed public activities at the annual Labor Day Mass at St. Patrick's Cathedral Sept. 12, eight days after his release from Memorial Sloan-Kettering Cancer Center. He announced a joint project of the Archdiocese of New York and the New York City Central Labor Council (AFL-CIO) to deal with discrimination and exploitation faced by immigrant workers. Auxiliary Bishop Patrick J. Sheridan of New York presided at the Mass. But Cardinal O'Connor, wearing his red cardinal's robe, delivered the homily and appeared to have regained much of his normal strength.

Miss Wisconsin stands firm on platform of abstinence

HOLMEN, Wis. (CNS) — During her yearlong reign as Miss Wisconsin, Mary-Louise Kurey plans to encourage young people to improve their character through sexual abstinence. Kurey believes that many young people are open to the message that sexual abstinence is an important pathway that leads them toward a brighter future. Selected in June to wear this year's Miss Wisconsin crown, Kurey is preparing to compete in the annual Miss America pageant, to be held Sept. 18 in Atlantic City, N.J. For her talent entry at the Miss America pageant, she will sing an Italian aria, "Il Bacio" (The Kiss).

Indonesia and the international community to put an "end to the slaughter" in East Timor, was upset by what he saw as a campaign of terror against the church.

"I cannot hide my deep bitterness that all sense of humanity has once again been defeated, and that at the dawn of the third millennium fratricidal hands are being raised to kill and destroy without pity," he said Sept. 12.

"Again I express complete condemnation of the serious human rights abuses perpetrated in that territory, in the vain attempt to cancel the will expressed by the people and their legitimate aspirations," he said.

After more than 78 percent of East Timorese voted for independence Aug. 30, pro-Indonesia militias unleashed a campaign of terror against East Timorese, about 85 percent of whom are Catholic. They attacked thousands of people who had taken refuge in Bishop Belo's compound and burned his home, forcing him to flee to the home of Bishop Basilio do Nascimento, apostolic administrator of Baukau, East Timor.

After more than 78 percent of East Timorese voted for independence Aug. 30, pro-Indonesia militias unleashed a campaign of terror against East Timorese, about 85 percent of whom are Catholic.

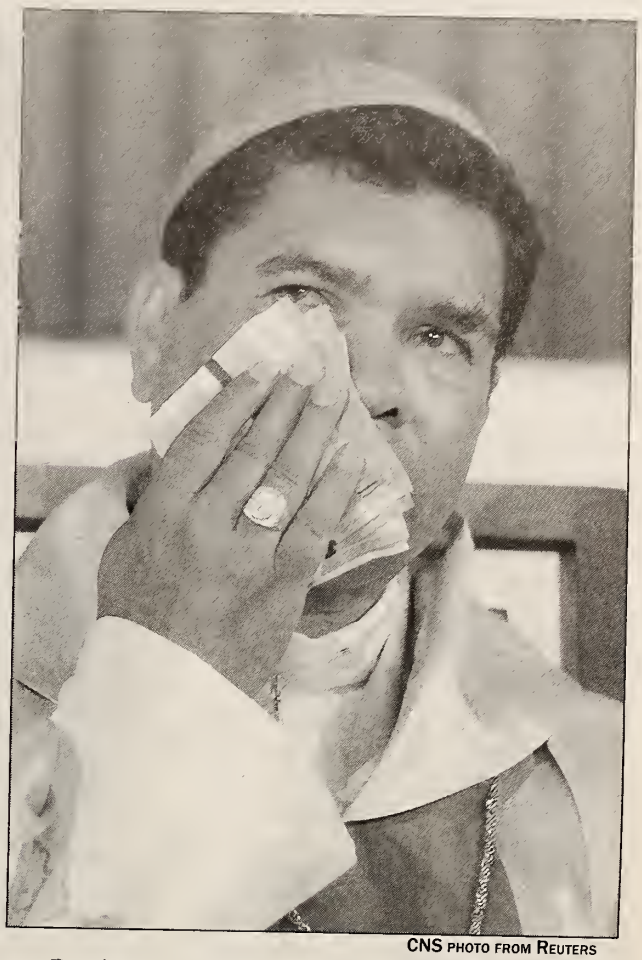
When the militias attacked Bishop Nascimento's home, Bishop Belo was evacuated to Australia. Bishop Nascimento fled to the hills following the attack; his house, too, was burned to the ground.

After the incident, Bishop Nascimento told Portugal's RDP radio station international intervention was urgently needed or "the people of East Timor are going to die."

During an attack outside of Dili, militiamen killed the head of Caritas East Timor, Father Francisco Barreto. Four members of his staff reportedly were killed in an attack on a parish in Suai. Caritas Australia set up an East Timor Caritas office in Darwin, Australia.

The director of Jesuit Refugee Service in East Timor, 70-year-old Jesuit Father Karl Albrecht, was shot and killed Sept. 11 in a Jesuit residence in Dili. When intruders broke into the Loyola Jesuit Residence late at night, Father Albrecht heard a noise and took a flashlight with him to investigate.

Jesuit Father Ageng Marwata, superior of the Loyola community, said the intruders ordered Father Albrecht — who needs hearing aids — to turn off the flashlight. When the priest did not respond, the intruders fired at least three shots at him, including a fatal shot to the stomach.



East Timor Bishop Carlos Filipe Ximines Belo wipes his face after tearing up during Mass in Lisbon, Portugal, Sept. 12. He appealed for a spirit of forgiveness despite the killings in East Timor.

Salesian Sister Marlene Bautista, an American who remained in East Timor through the anarchy and violence, urged people to "please keep praying for us."

"The sisters are firmly convinced that it's the prayers of the people of the world that have kept us alive. It's a miracle that we're still alive; we've had so many close calls," Sister Bautista said in a Sept. 10 interview.

In a letter to President Clinton Sept. 9, Bishop Joseph A. Fiorenza of Galveston-Houston, president of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops, called for the immediate creation of a U.N. peacekeeping force for East Timor.

The bishop condemned what he described as "unmitigated terror" taking place in East Timor and urged Clinton to "take the actions necessary to save the lives of the suffering people in East Timor," saying that in their vote for independence, East Timorese "placed their trust in the great democracies of the world."

The day the letter was sent, Clinton announced he was suspending U.S. military ties to Indonesia. After the announcement that Indonesia would accept peacekeepers, Clinton said the United States would commit hundreds of soldiers, but not for combat. ▼

World's eyes on United Nations in tense times, pope says

By TRACY EARLY
Catholic News Service

NEW YORK (CNS) — Pope John Paul II, in a message keyed to the opening of the 1999 General Assembly of the United Nations, said that "the eyes of the world are rightly turned to the U.N. for leadership and guidance in meeting the challenges of the present hour, marred by tension and violence in various parts of the world."

His message was sent by Cardinal Angelo Sodano, Vatican secretary of state, to participants in an ecumenical prayer service Sept. 13, the day before the opening of the 54th session of the General Assembly at U.N. headquarters in New York.

Kofi Annan, secretary-general of the United Nations, and other members of the diplomatic community were among the participants in the service.

Cardinal Sodano said the pope "joins all of you in commending the work of the coming session to Almighty God, and in praying that the United Nations organization will become an ever more effective instrument of dialogue and cooperation within the family of peoples."

Pope John Paul was also praying that the U.N. would remain "faithful to its mandate to foster world peace on the basis of respect for the inalienable rights of individuals and nations," Cardinal Sodano said.

The prayer service is sponsored annually by Cardinal John J. O'Connor of New York and Archbishop Renato R. Martino, Vatican nuncio to the United Nations, and is held at Holy Family Church, whose parish boundaries include the U.N. building.

This year's service fell on a day when the U.N. was struggling to develop a response to the violence in East Timor.

There was no reference to that or any other specific situation, but Archbishop Martino, who read the papal message, said the end of the second millennium was a time to remember the "great moments" of the U.N. and "to look back with regret and a spirit of repentance for the times when our efforts have fallen short."

Central to all the challenges of the future is "the task of securing respect for human life and the fundamental rights and freedoms of the human person," the nuncio said.

The presence of Cardinal O'Connor was especially welcomed because he was resuming public activities after surgery for a brain tumor.

Pope John Paul's message extended "heartfelt prayers for his speedy recovery."

In recognition of the cardinal's rapid return, he was described as "our miracle man" by Father Robert J. Robbins, pastor of Holy Family Church.

Cardinal O'Connor said that during his "little episode in the hospital" the flowers and message from the U.N. secretary-general and his wife "meant so very, very much to me."

The gesture demonstrated that the U.N. was not only an institution but a group of persons, he said. Diplomats should make sure their institutional role does not keep them from remembering they are persons working for persons, he said.

"I have never faltered in my devotion to or my support of the U.N.," Cardinal O'Connor said.

But he noted that many people saw the U.N. as "a large machine" that accomplished very little. And he said what the U.N. accomplished would depend on keeping the personal relationships central.

Annan, speaking briefly at the end, acknowledged "the fragility of our work," and expressed regret for what had not been accomplished in meeting world needs.

"Hatred and greed seem to have the upper hand in too many societies," he said.

But the secretary-general said that the international community could see "signs of progress" in such areas as increasing life expectancy and literacy. "We do move forward," he said.

Annan, a native of Ghana with a Protestant background, reiterated his belief in the importance of prayer. He said discussions of international issues should be "suffused with prayer," and that members of the U.N. community should "support our prayers with good works." ▼

Canadian church to celebrate Canadian Martyrs' 350th anniversary

By ART BABYCH
Catholic News Service

OTTAWA (CNS) — On the eve of a new millennium, the Catholic Church in Canada is turning to its roots in celebration of the 350th anniversary of the deaths of the eight Jesuit missionaries known as the Canadian Martyrs.

"We thank God for giving the church in Canada such impressive founders and models," said the Permanent Council of the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops in a pastoral letter released Sept. 14, the feast of the Holy Cross.

"As we begin a new millennium and find ourselves challenged to undertake a new evangelization, we are encouraged by the witness of the Canadian martyrs and their devotion to Christ, as well as by their courageous zeal and spirit of prayer," the council said.

Bede Hubbard, assistant general secretary of the Canadian bishops' conference, said the anniversary, to be celebrated in late September, is important because of the place the martyrs have in the history of the Canadian church at its outset and because "their witness remains a living heritage."

He noted that Pope John Paul II, in "Tertio Millennio Adveniente" ("As the Third Millennium Draws Near"), reminds Catholics that the church was born of the blood of the martyrs.

The eight Canadian Martyrs were Sts. Jean de Brebeuf, Antoine Daniel, Gabriel Lalemant, Charles Garnier, Noel Chabanel, Isaac Jogues, Rene Goupil and Jean de la Lande.

The bishops' governing council described them as part of a team of "greats" who founded the church in Canada. The council said that team also included Sisters Marie de l'Incarnation, Catherine de Saint-Augustin, Marguerite Bourgeoys and Marguerite d'Youville, Bishop Francois de Montmorency Laval and the Mohawk ascetic Blessed Kateri Tekakwitha. ▼

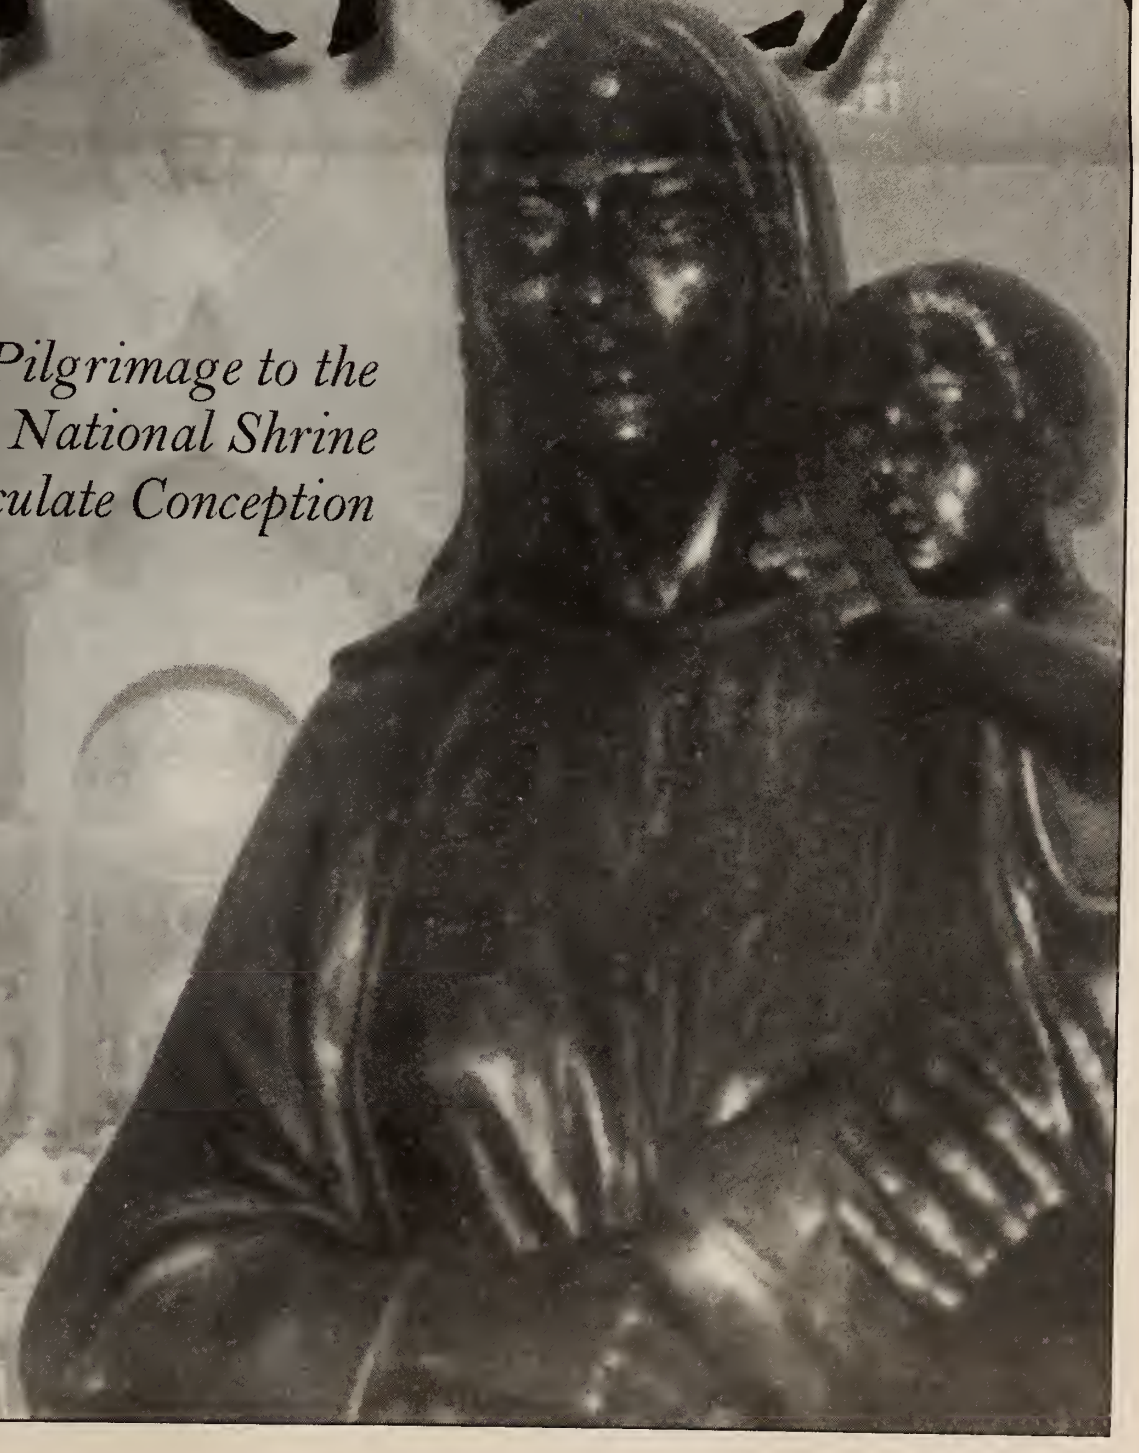
A Pilgrimage to the Basilica of the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception



Special to
The Catholic News & Herald
September 17, 1999

A Brief History

American devotion to Mary is celebrated at her shrine

In 1897 at the petition of the American bishops, Pope Pius IX named Mary, under the title of her Immaculate Conception, as Patroness of the United States. Then in the early 1900s, Bishop Thomas J. Shahan, the fourth rector of The Catholic University of America in Washington, D.C., suggested building a shrine to Mary adjacent to the university campus.

Bishop Shahan presented his plan to Pope Pius X in a special audience and received not only a $400 personal contribution from the pontiff, but his enthusiastic support as well.

In 1913, the Board of Trustees of The Catholic University of America agreed to donate a parcel of land on which would be built the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception. Nationwide support for the proposed Shrine soon began to pour in. Designs were completed and the cornerstone was laid by his eminence, James Cardinal Gibbons, Archbishop of Baltimore on September 23, 1920. Completed in 1926, the Crypt Church has been in continuous use ever since.

Located at the center of the Crypt Church is the exquisitely carved Mary's Altar dedicated to Our Lady of the Catacombs. The altar was given as a gift to the National Shrine by more than 30,000 women named Mary and has been used for the celebration of Mass since 1927.

The great depression and second World War delayed construction until 1953 when the nation's Catholic bishops renewed the effort to build the Great Upper Church of the Shrine. Catholics in every parish throughout the United States responded overwhelmingly to the national fundraising effort and during the Marian Year of 1954 construction of the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception was resumed.

In just a few short years, thousands of Catholics gathered with the American heirarchy for the solemn dedication Mass of the Great Upper Church on November 20, 1959.

Together, they celebrated in word and song the humble beginnings of this great church and rejoiced in the lasting impact their new National Shrine would surely have on the life of the church in the United States.

In the decades that followed, the many chapels of the Shrine were added, each reflecting the religious heritage brought to America by generations of immigrants Catholics. These chapels represent both the diversity of Catholic faith and the strength of unity achieved through devotion to Our Lady. Stained glass, mosaics and sculpture serve to record this rich and vibrant heritage of prayer and devotion.

The Basilica of the National Shrine represents nearly a century of fervent faith, devotion, and generosity on the part of American Catholics. As a spiritual center for the nation, the Shrine stands majestically in the capital city as a constant reminder of Mary's perfect response to the Lord: "Let it be done to me according to Thy will." ▼

Diocesan pilgrimage to D.C. Shrine will serve as link for parishioners

CHARLOTTE — Parishioners in the Diocese of Charlotte will have the opportunity to visit the Basilica of the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception in Washington, D.C. during the weekend of Nov. 12-14. Sponsored by the African-American Affairs Ministry, the trip's focus will be on the Our Mother of Africa Chapel which was dedicated in August 1997.

"Father Mauricio W. West will be leading the pilgrimage which is open to anyone in the diocese, not just for African-Americans to visit the Our Mother of Africa Chapel," explained Rev. Mr. Curtiss Todd, vice-chancellor of the diocese and vicar for African-American Affairs. "The African-American Affairs Ministry decided it would be a good idea for black Catholics in the diocese to see the chapel and for others to see the shrine and the other chapels. There is a focus on the Our Mother of Africa Chapel; however, anyone can visit any chapel in the shrine."

The idea for the chapel came from several sources including the National Black Catholic Congress, African-American bishops, and members of the National Shrine Board. Beginning in 1993, dioceses, parishes, and other organizations nationwide donated more than $2.5 million to build the chapel and to establish an endowment fund.

Dale Brown, a parishioner for 29 years and the pastoral assistant and RCIA coordinator at Our Lady of Consolation Church in Charlotte, said, "the Our Mother of Africa Chapel is important because it helps us to be in touch with who we are. In the past, we haven't seen many statues of the black Virgin Mary, so this is a way for us to identify with our heritage. I hope that this trip will awaken the diocese so that they will come to understand our heritage and our involvement with our religion."

The shrine itself is the largest Catholic Church in this part of the world and includes 60 chapels whose themes focus on various nationalities. It is divided into two sections, the Great Upper Church Level, which holds more than 6,000 people and was dedicated in 1959, and the Crypt Church Level, which seats 400. On Oct. 12, 1990, Pope John Paul II honored the shrine by naming it a basilica, a term given to certain churches because of specific historical, social, or spiritual values.

The weekend-long trip will serve as a time for people all over the diocese to come together in prayer and worship. The bus will be leaving the Pastoral Center in Charlotte on Friday, Nov. 12 at 3:30 p.m. and will return on Sunday night, Nov. 14. The trip includes a guided tour of the shrine and time for personal tours, a prayer service in the Our Mother of Africa Chapel, Mass celebrated by Father Mo West, free time, and Mass at St. Augustine Church in Washington, D.C. All meals and the hotel price except for two meals on Saturday will be covered in the pre-paid cost.

For single occupancy, the price is $175, and for double occupancy, the price is $145. Children under 18, accompanied by an adult, will be able to travel for $75.

"We wanted to keep the cost low so that more people would have the opportunity to go," said Rev. Mr. Todd. "With a grant from the Black and Indian Mission Office, we were able to offer this trip at a very affordable price."

Father Mauricio W. West stated, "this pilgrimage is a wonderful opportunity for us as a diocese to visit not only the chapel dedicated to Our Mother of Africa but also the National Shrine." ▼

The Basilica of the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception
The term basilica refers to a special designation given by the Holy Father to certain churches because of their antiquity, dignity, historical importance or significance as a center of worship and devotion. The National Shrine was named a Basilica on October 12, 1990, by Pope John Paul II.

Artistic and architectural elements adorn Our Mother of Africa Chapel

By ALESHA M. PRICE
Staff Writer

The idea behind Our Mother of Africa Chapel in the Basilica of the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception is a focus on African-American themes from slavery until modern times. The statues, sculptures, and carvings are a reflection of this subject in a significant way.

The main theme, which is threefold, draws in the crucifix, the Our Mother of Africa with the Christ Child, and a history of the African-American people.

Juvenal Kaliki, a Tanzanian artist, and a New York artist Jeffrey Brosk sculpted the crucifix which hangs over the altar. Kaliki carved the crucified figure of Christ in ebony, a black hardwood indigenous to Egypt in Northern Africa, while Brosk created the cross from cherry wood which creates a contrast of light and dark. Tanzania, a country in Africa, was introduced to Christianity in the 19th century, so those religious concepts were incorporated into the artistic work of the native people that exist today.

The sculpture of Mary with the Infant Jesus, carved by Ed Dwight, a Mid-western artist, has Mary and her Son with African-American facial features. Jesus gestures toward the sculpture within the opposite wall of the statue, and Mary and Jesus' gaze is focused on the sculpture of their sons and daughters.

The sculpture of Mary with the Infant Jesus, carved by Ed Dwight, a Midwestern artist, has Mary and her Son with African-American facial features. Jesus gestures toward the sculpture within the opposite wall of the statue, and Mary and Jesus' gaze is focused on the sculpture of their sons and daughters.

Dwight also created the inlaid wall sculpture of the African-American people from slavery to modern times. From left to right, different eras of history are depicted in representations of figures of African-Americans from the Civil Rights era and beyond to the first Africans brought to America on Dutch ships in the early 1600s.

Upon entering the chapel, one can see a carved bronze rendering of the sunken 17th century slave ship the "Henrietta Marie" discovered in 1972 off the coast of Key West, Florida. The ceiling of the front area of the chapel was constructed like the hull, the lowest portion, of a ship, which reflects the slave ship carved on the floor.

The columns supporting the structure represent Nguzo Saba, the seven family values serving as guides to life in general for African-Americans. These principles include: Umoja meaning unity, Kujichagulia meaning self-determination, Ujima meaning collective work and responsibility, Ujamaa meaning family and cooperative economics, Nia meaning purpose, Kuumba meaning creativity, and Imani meaning faith.

Contained within the marble altar are the names of those who contributed to the chapel and to the endowment fund. The inscriptions of the altar use characters from the Ge'ez alphabet of ancient Ethiopia, and the monogram of the X and P for "christos" or Christ on the front is a combination of traditional and African styles.

All of these features add to the importance of the chapel not only for African-Americans but for all races because of the history of Africa and America which all people share. ▼

Many children in the developing world live in poverty with little hope for the future. Can you help a poor child? Become a sponsor today!

Christian Foundation for Children and Aging (CFCA), an international Catholic sponsorship program, can show you the affordable way to sponsor a child.

Ordinarily it takes $20 a month to provide a poor child with the life-changing benefits of sponsorship. But if this is not possible for you, we invite you to sponsor at a level you can afford (minimum $10). CFCA will see to it from other donations and the tireless efforts of our missionary partners that your child receives the same benefits as other sponsored children.

Your sponsorship helps provide a poor child with nourishing food, medical care, the chance to go to school – whatever is needed most.

You receive a picture of your child, information about your child's family and country, letters from your child and the CFCA newsletter. But most important, you receive the satisfaction of helping a poor child!

Baseball team faces lawsuit for church bulletin promotion

By JOHN GEHRING
Catholic News Service

BALTIMORE (CNS) — The Hagerstown Suns, a single-A minor league team in western Maryland, thought it found a great way to attract fans when they began offering discount admissions for those who brought church bulletins to the front gate.

What they didn't count on was unhappy fans.

Like many minor league teams, the Suns use a variety of promotions for various organizations and even host a weekly couch potato night.

But one fan, Carl Silverman, took the Suns to court for Church Bulletin Day, saying he was unable to get a discount last spring because he wasn't religious and therefore didn't have a bulletin.

Silverman filed a complaint with the Maryland Commission on Human Relations charging that the bulletin promotion discriminates against patrons on the basis of creed.

The commission found probable cause to find a violation and sent the case to the Office of Administrative Hearings where lawyers for the Suns pitted their case against the American Civil Liberties Union, who represented Silverman. As of early September, a ruling had not yet been issued.

Dwight Sullivan, a lawyer who represented Silverman, said the team's promotion violated his client's rights.

"It doesn't respect the conscience of atheists or agnostics," Sullivan told The Catholic Review, Baltimore's archdiocesan newspaper.

Jay Schwartz, a lawyer representing the Hagerstown Suns, argued that the promotion was broad enough and that it even allowed atheists to bring a bulletin or newsletter from their organization.

After the trial began, a review of bulletins accepted at the Hagerstown stadium showed that an American Civil Liberties Union bulletin had been accepted, said Schwartz.

Kevin Hasson, president and general counsel with Becket Fund for Religious Liberty, a Washington-based bipartisan and ecumenical public interest law firm, said the Hagerstown case illustrates a familiar societal tension.

"This is a perfect example of a battle that is going on every day across the country between two different visions of human nature competing in the culture war," he said.

The factions include those who view religion as a natural part of life in a democracy, he said, and another group which views religion as "the equivalent of second-hand smoke, something to avoid because it is dangerous."

For three decades, according to Hasson, the courts have shown a hostility to religion while claiming to be neutral.

But he said recent rulings have shown that the courts may be changing. For example, he cited a case in which officials in Jersey City, N.J., won the right to display a nativity scene, a menorah and other faith symbols on public ground. ▼

Book Review

"Blue Hole" offers tale of life in a small town

REVIEWED BY PEGGY WEBER
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

In "Blue Hole," G.D. Gearino offers another tale of life in a small, southern town. The author of "What the Deaf-Mute Heard," Gearino uses several voices to explore some mysteries and help some characters shed their burdens.

Central to the whole story is Charley Selkirk, who was thrown out of high school for tackling a boy too hard at a football practice. Of course, the boy, who was white, had just tackled a black player too hard, but that was different.

The story is set in 1969 in Garrington, Ga. It explores race relations, the war in Vietnam and the role of women. All of these weighty topics are secondary compared to the interactions of a circle of a people in the town who are drawn together by a mysterious death.

When Charley is tossed from school he loses his girlfriend and ends up working for a young photographer, Tallasee Tynan. She takes him under her wing and thinks she is helping him out. However, deep down she is recovering from her own difficulties, which include the death of her husband and lost opportunities in life.

Charlie keeps busy with the work and just drifts and observes. However, his talent for watching and being an outsider comes in handy as it helps him figure out what is going on at the hippie commune outside of town and what are the mysterious relationships in town.

Every character in this book is flawed in some way. They all are trying to work out of their own troubles. It is only when they unite to pursue the truth in the death of a young boy that the smoke clears and some wounds truly heal.

Charley has, perhaps suffered the most. When he was 9-years-old he was asked to watch his 5-year-old brother, Shay. Charley plays with him and makes his lunch. However, he leaves him alone for a short time to go up the street and play baseball. He admonishes his brother not to leave the house. Of course the youngster does and drowns in a nearby stream.

"Blue Hole"
By G.D. Gearino
Simon and Schuster (New York, 1999).
224 pp., $22.00.

From that point on life unravels rapidly and painfully for Charley, his mother and his father. The father, who was a drinker, soon leaves and later dies.

Charley's mother initially had blamed Charley and then never speaks about the incident. It is this kind of environment in which Charley grew to sit and wait.

The chapter in which the author describes the death of the child is perhaps the best in terms of emotions. It wrenches at the reader's heart as one realizes that something horrific has happened.

Gearino tries to do a lot within the 224 pages. A regular columnist for the News and Observer daily newspaper in Raleigh, N.C., he clearly knows people and what makes them tick. He confuses the reader enough to think they have figured out the mystery but includes a surprise ending.

It is not a nail-biting, suspenseful story. Rather it is a walk through a maze that leads to resolution in the lives of many in this small, southern town. They finally leave their "blue hole." ▼

CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Many years ago a friend died unexpectedly. At his funeral, I had the chance to visit with his father, a man I had not met before. If I were a parish priest or staff member, I suppose I would be more aware of the fact that funerals are times of deep soul-searching for family members as they get in touch with their own mortality and relationship to God.

This dad turned to me with tears in his eyes and said there were things he had done years ago that he wasn't sure God could forgive him for.

I wish I'd had a crib sheet with this week's readings in my back pocket to pull out and show him. They are that good. I did say a few things about how God was in the forgiving business and that there was nothing he could not forgive.

But if I'd had these Scriptures in mind, it would have been so much more effective.

In the Matthew's reading Jesus tells the story of the owner of the estate who pays those who have been working only a little time in his vineyard the same as those who have been in the field all day. It is a graphic illustration of how God's idea of justice differs so radically from our own. No room for priggish self-righteousness here.

And if you think that isn't so, just give a listen to the Scripture from Isaiah 55: "Let the scoundrel forsake his way, and the wicked man his thoughts; Let him turn to the Lord for mercy; to our God who is generous in forgiving. For my thoughts are not your thoughts, nor are your ways my ways, says the Lord. As high as the heavens are above the earth, so high are my ways above your ways and my thoughts above your thoughts."

Seems pretty plain, doesn't it? God is so much in the forgiveness business that he sent his only Son into the vineyard to die to offer that forgiveness to us. And before he died, he taught about how incredibly generous his forgiveness is, even to the point of using some of his final words, while he hung on the cross, to offer that forgiveness to a repentant thief.

We should be ready to offer this assured hope of forgiveness to anyone who asks, at a funeral or just walking down the street. It really is good news. It's the best.

Question:
If someone asked you what hope God offers to those whose actions seem to put them very far from him, what would you say?

"The Lord is gracious and merciful, slow to anger and of great kindness. The Lord is good to all and compassionate toward all his works"
— Psalm 145:8-9.

PBS turning 30, which is reason to celebrate

By GERRI PARE
Catholic News Service

NEW YORK (CNS) — The welcome alternative to ratings-hungry commercial television, PBS will be celebrating its 30th anniversary this fall.

Among programming in the new season lineup is a "Frontline" documentary of particular interest to the Catholic audience, "John Paul II: The Millennial Pope," airing Sept. 28. (This office will review the documentary in advance of its broadcast.)

Starting Oct. 5, there will be a two-hour programming block dedicated to quality science presentations, including topics explored under the "Nova" banner, and a series dealing with powerful microbes, "Intimate Strangers: Unseen Life on Earth," scheduled for Tuesdays in November.

Shutterbugs may find the three-hour Oct. 13 series, "American Photography: A Century of Images," throws light on the history of 20th-century America and the considerable impact photographs have had on our citizens in recording their families, encouraging artistic expression and as a recorder of public events.

The acclaimed filmmaking brothers, Ric and Ken Burns, have two documentaries scheduled for November. Ken's entry, "Not for Ourselves Alone: The Story of Elizabeth Cady Stanton & Susan B. Anthony," recalls how the alliance of these two females gave birth to the women's rights movement during the 19th century. From the series "The American Experience," Ric's "New York: A Documentary Film" is a six-part series covering the city's Dutch origins in 1624 to its contemporary fame as a global center of culture and commerce.

Nov. 1 brings an "American Masters" special, "Hitchcock, Selznick & the End of Hollywood," chronicling the close working relationship between the famed director and producer, a collaboration which produced such classics as "Rebecca," "Spellbound" and "Notorious," despite their clashing approaches to the filmmaking process.

Another "American Masters" special, airing Nov. 24, focuses on beloved American artist Norman Rockwell, tracing his career and examining his body of work and the social commentary his art provided.

Not forgetting curious little minds, PBS has a new daily show for preschoolers, "Dragon Tales," from Children's Television Workshop, an animated series with 40 half-hour episodes about a sister and brother who are magically transported to an enchanted land of remarkable dragons with human qualities.

With its varied programming aimed at a broad spectrum of the viewing audience, PBS hopes to enter a new decade of quality fare that will prompt the audience to support its noncommercial goals by more than just tuning in. ▼

More than a few holes in 'Stigmata' plot, says priest

By MARK PATTISON
Catholic News Service

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Forget the seemingly demonic possessions in the new movie "Stigmata." Forget that the lead character, an atheist, is receiving the stigmata from some unseen force. Or that miracles and exorcisms go hand in hand — or, in one case, hands on throat.

What Catholics should be most concerned about in the film, says one priest, is the text displayed at the end of the movie describing the history and fate of the disputed Gospel of Thomas.

Father Timothy Friedrichsen, a New Testament specialist at The Catholic University of America, said "Stigmata" was entertaining as far as it went — until the text was shown on screen.

The text says that the Gospel of Thomas was declared by the Vatican to be "a heresy" and that the Vatican has sought to suppress it.

For one thing, the Gospel of Thomas has been available in bookstores for years and years, Father Friedrichsen said. For another, despite its discovery this century by archaeologists, it was likely known to early church officials at the time the New Testament canon was being formalized — and didn't pass muster then, either.

"The Gospel of Thomas was a text that was used amongst the Gnostic sects," said the priest, who was invited by Catholic News Service to attend a sneak preview of "Stigmata," which opens nationwide Sept. 10.

The Gnostics, according to Father Friedrichsen, were a small group of early Christians who did not believe Jesus was fully human in addition to being fully divine. They also "put a high value on secret knowledge of Christ," he said.

The Gospel of Thomas is a collection of sayings attributed to Jesus, the priest said, but without any narrative context that appear in the New Testament Gospels.

While some scholars believe the Gospel of Thomas is an authentic work, others believe "just as strongly" that it is a second- or third-century derivation of the Gospels of Matthew, Mark and Luke, said Father Friedrichsen, a priest of the Diocese of Sioux City, Iowa.

The Gospel of Thomas is "not a heresy," he added, "but people could construe that to be more important than anything else in the canonical Gospels."

It won't likely harm the faith of a practicing Catholic, he said, but nonpracticing Catholics or non-Catholics could be "taken in" by the text displayed at movie's end, as they would by a negative portrayal in "Stigmata" of a Vatican cardinal.

The U.S. Catholic Conference Office for Film and Broadcasting classified the film O — morally offensive — for its dismissive treatment of the Catholic Church, depiction of a murderous cardinal, a shadowy sexual encounter, frequent violence involving the stigmata and demonic attacks, occasional profanity and rough language.

Still, "Stigmata" has some good points, Father Friedrichsen said. It portrayed the celibacy of Father Andrew Kiernan (Gabriel Byrne), who investigates the stigmata reports, in a thoughtful, supportive way. The priest said he was struck by the character saying of the choice between celibacy and sexual activity: "I've traded one set of complications for another."

The Byrne character's explanation of stigmata was also quite accurate, the priest said, and the recurring rain motif in the movie "seemed to function almost baptismally."

Father Friedrichsen said he was impressed by the Byrne character's personal story: how his belief that science did not hold all the answers led him to a call to priesthood, and, later, how his work debunking religious phenomena for the Vatican Congregation for Sainthood Causes led him by his own admission to not pray for a long time.

But he found several inaccuracies in "Stigmata," among them:

— Writing on a scroll reading horizontally, not vertically, and the writing appearing as if written on a page.

— The Gospel of St. Thomas was not written in Aramaic as depicted in "Stigmata."

— The way Mass is celebrated by Byrne in the film.

— A Vatican office doling out every third page of sensitive documents to different religious orders to translate. "To make a conspiracy theory out of ancient documents is really a bit inflated," Father Friedrichsen said of the movie.

His overall impression?

"'Steel Magnolias' meets 'The Exorcist,'" he said.

The Catholic League for Religious and Civil Rights criticized "Stigmata" in a Sept. 1 statement as "a vehicle for making a political attack on the Catholic Church." It said it found the movie's references to Padre Pio and St. Francis of Assisi, both of whom had stigmata, "particularly insidious." ▼

Martin Sheen, 'Joan of Arc' to receive Catholics in Media awards

HOLLYWOOD (CNS) — Actor Martin Sheen will receive the lifetime achievement award from Catholics in Media at the group's annual award presentation, scheduled for Oct. 3.

Cardinal Roger M. Mahony of Los Angeles will celebrate Mass at the Universal Sheraton Hotel in the Los Angeles suburb of Universal City prior to the awards luncheon.

"Joan of Arc," the CBS miniseries which captured 13 Emmy nominations, will receive an award in the television category.

The movie "Down in the Delta" has been named to receive the feature film award, and Paulist Father Ellwood "Bud" Kieser will receive the group's Board of Directors Award.

Father Kieser produced the "Insight" anthology TV series and the movies "Romero" and "Entertaining Angels: The Dorothy Day Story."

Sheen will play President Josiah Bartlet in the new NBC series "The West Wing" and is well known for his activism on behalf of social justice causes.

The Catholics in Media awards, in their seventh year, are given to movies, TV shows and "other projects of artistry and integrity which affirm life and recognize the sacredness of the human person," according to an announcement by the organization. ▼

"For Love of the Game" (Universal)

While on the mound at the close of the baseball season, an aging pitcher (Kevin Costner) confronts not only the batters but himself as he ponders his future with the club, his passion to excel in the sport which has consumed his life, and the loss of the woman he loves (Kelly Preston) because she feels he doesn't need her. Directed by Sam Raimi, the pitcher's thoughts are shown in flashbacks which mirror the mounting tension in the stadium as batter after batter is retired along the way to a possible perfect game, with equally satisfying results for both baseball fans and romantics. Implicit sexual affair, angry outbursts, some course language and occasional profanity. The U.S. Catholic Conference classification is A-III — adults. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is PG-13 — parents are strongly cautioned that some material may be inappropriate for children under 13.

Bishop Ruiz welcomes Mexican government peace proposal

By JIM HODGSON
Catholic News Service

MEXICO CITY (CNS) — A Mexican bishop who has labored since 1994 to find a solution to conflict in Chiapas welcomed a new government proposal for peace.

Bishop Samuel Ruiz Garcia of San Cristobal de las Casas told reporters Sept. 10 that the new initiative "is quite positive because it replaces an aggressive policy" and returns the peace process to the level of national dialogue.

"Reading between the lines, you could say that there is a rectification of those things which had derailed the ways of dialogue," Bishop Ruiz said.

He said the new proposal "rejects a policy that had become generalized — including, it seems, from the highest levels — of repression, of aggression against autonomous groups, of physical imprisonment of the EZLN by means of blocking land communication."

Bishop Ruiz spoke as he bade farewell to Mairead Corrigan Maguire, winner of the 1977 Nobel Peace Prize for her work in Northern Ireland. Maguire visited Mexico on behalf of Amnesty International.

On Sept. 7, Mexican Interior Secretary Diodoro Carrasco announced a plan that said he and his government wished to address with the Zapatista National Liberation Army, known by its Spanish acronym, EZLN.

Armed conflict broke out in Chiapas Jan. 1, 1994, when the EZLN seized several cities within the diocese of San Cristobal, located in the Chiapas highlands of southern Mexico. After 12 days of fighting between federal troops and the EZLN, Bishop Ruiz agreed to mediate between the indigenous-led guerrillas and the federal government.

Peace talks were suspended in 1996 after the federal government refused full implementation of an agreement on indigenous rights and culture. Bishop Ruiz resigned as mediator two years later, citing government attacks on his credibility, paramilitary violence and the government's failure to implement the previous accord as blocks to the peace process.

There was no immediate reaction from the EZLN, which, because of logistical problems, often takes several days to respond to government announcements.

Carrasco's proposal contained six points. It proposed that the Mexican Senate re-examine different versions of constitutional changes that emerged from the 1996 accords on issues of indigenous rights and culture. The first point also suggested seeking new proposals from the EZLN, the federal government and other groups involved in the conflict.

In other points in the proposal, the government committed itself to:

— Ask the EZLN to propose new dates for government implementation of those parts of the accords that deal with social development in indigenous communities in Chiapas.

— Seek the release of imprisoned EZLN members or sympathizers who were not involved in murders.

— Analyze complaints by human rights organizations about harassment suffered by indigenous communities in Chiapas.

— Create a new civilian, nonpartisan mediation commission.

— Send new government negotiators that have decision-making capacity.

The papal nuncio to Mexico, Archbishop Justo Mullor Garcia, told reporters Sept. 9 during a visit to the northern border city of Reynosa that the proposal was "well-directed and praiseworthy" and asked the guerrillas to welcome it.

The president of the Mexican bishops' conference, Archbishop Luis Morales Reyes of San Luis Potosi, said he was "hopeful" about the initiative. Archbishop Morales, who also chairs the bishops' peace commission, indicated the church would consider a role in a proposed new mediation commission.

Cardinal Adolfo Suarez Rivera of Monterrey said the government's initiative was "one more effort for which we hoped, and it should be welcomed and heard."

Cardinal Suarez, born in San Cristobal de las Casas, spoke with reporters Sept. 8 during a visit to his home state.

"All of Chiapas is tired, exhausted from this conflict that has gone on so long. May this voice be heard with hearts of good will so that we can really leave the conflict," he said.

Some human rights groups, however, expressed skepticism.

"The official remedy is the same," said Jesuit Father Edgar Cortes of the Miguel Augustin Pro Human Right Center in Mexico City Sept. 8. He called for the army to withdraw, for the dismantling of paramilitary groups and for fulfillment of earlier agreements.

"The government document is marked by political weakness and is without a clear direction," he said, adding that it was "insufficient after three years of silence."

Opposition members of the Chiapas state legislature called on Carrasco to create a new mediation commission that includes Bishop Ruiz. Members of the National Action Party and the Party of the Democratic Revolution said Bishop Ruiz has the capacity to invite the Zapatistas into a new dialogue.

The two parties, which plan to present a common candidate in next year's state elections, said the large military presence may prevent the EZLN from returning to the negotiating table. ▼

Joe Dawson makes use of God-given talents

By KATHY SCHMUGGE
The Miscellany

LEXINGTON, S.C. — Joe Dawson, a parishioner at Corpus Christi Church, may have retired from the marketing business, but he remains active in the field, working these days for a heavenly client. Generously giving of his time and talent to the parish and community, Joe has been successful in promoting the Christian life, not with a clever slogan, but simply by the way he lives his life.

Since he has been a parishioner at Corpus Christi, Dawson has used his various skills in photography, writing, advertising and marketing to promote numerous church events and other community causes. Along with his regular duties as church photographer, he volunteered this year to head the parish fall festival, a two-day regional event. He is also working with the Charleston Diocese's office of communications and information, on a broadcasting series that will be airing on radio, cable and television throughout South Carolina. Dawson has been traveling the state to set the air time schedules for this pilot program sponsored by the diocese. His activity extends outside the church as he teaches a marketing class at the local community college without pay and gives marketing advice to groups trying to raise money for charities and foundations.

The media bug got a hold of Joe as a young photographer in the U.S. Air Force. No sooner did he perfect his picture taking, when he began to work on his writing. After the military, he was employed at several television networks in the Carolinas, such as WBTV, WBTW and WIS, with positions in promotion, sales and research. One of his most interesting projects involved a photo essay he did for WBTV in the '60s. On this assignment he spent several days with presidential candidates, John F. Kennedy and Richard Nixon, during their race for president.

Armed with a quick wit, photography and writing skills, Dawson eventually started his own marketing firm. No matter how busy he was with his company, he could not say "no" to a worthy cause if he felt he had the skills to help. One time when he was in the middle of a big campaign for ICEE, Joe received a call from individuals who wanted to raise money to rebuild the Providence House, a home for recovering alcoholics in Columbia, which had tragically burned down. He took on the project and the house was quickly rebuilt by the Columbia Home Builders Association without charge.

For him, stewardship is as natural as taking a breath of air. "For years I held back from heavy involvement in the church because I did not feel I had a niche. I could not see myself as a catechist or lector." He recalled the day he was in church and they announced that they needed someone to run a festival. "I thought I can do that job and realized that I must use my God-given talents in the church. If you have a skill as a mason or brick layer let someone know, and believe me you will get a call." He later joked that it was probably a voice that inspired him, "a voice with a Jewish accent from the man with sawdust in his hair, a friend of fishermen."

As a member of the parish communication ministry, Joe is constantly taking pictures and writing press releases to the diocesan and secular papers. As a professional photographer, he is often called to take pictures for big events such as First Communion and confirmation. When asked what motivated him to spend his retirement working for free, his blue eyes twinkled as he answered, "Some day I am going to met my Maker and He is going to say, 'Joe, you haven't always been good.' I want to have something to fall back on."

In conjunction with his work with the diocese, Joe Dawson stays very busy. Willingly he goes from one job to another because as he would say, "God gave me a quick mind and I must use it!" ▼

Brevard parish hosts Landings retreat for leaders and members

BREVARD — "Those who minister in the church today are at greater risk of burnout than ever before," said Paulist Father Jac Campbell, founder of Landings — a program which assists inactive Catholics to return to practice of their faith.

Father Campbell went on to say, "All who serve, whether clergy, religious or lay people, need to step back, reflect and be renewed in order to continue being effective in ministry."

Landings first came to the Charlotte Diocese in 1996 at the invitation of Father Edward Vilkauskas, then diocesan director of evangelization. Twelve parish teams were trained in the first group and others have been prepared since then.

Father Campbell noted that some parish programs "took off" and have continued to welcome inactive Catholics, forming Landings groups several times a year.

Sacred Heart parish in Brevard, for example, has formed 10 Landings groups since 1996, which have welcomed back 25 inactive Catholic and involved many other active Catholics in sharing their faith within the Landings groups.

Other parishes have been less successful, and some have discontinued the program. All need encouragement to minister to inactive Catholics, who are numerous in the United States.

To that end Father Campbell will lead a Landings retreat for leaders, group members, and "returned" Catholics from across the diocese.

The topic will be "Have I grown spiritually through ministry?". Campbell suggested that those trained as leaders but who have not yet begun Landings in their parish, and those who have not started a group recently would benefit from the encouragement of this retreat.

In addition to prayer, reflection, and liturgical worship, participants will be able to share and discuss their Landings experiences and to learn from others.

Landings Retreat
October 22 & 23
Sacred Heart Church in Brevard, NC
(6 pm Friday - 3 pm Saturday)

The retreat will be held October 22 and 23 at Sacred Heart Church in Brevard, N.C., beginning with a light, meatless supper at 6pm on Friday, and concluding at approximately 3pm on Saturday.

Cost of the retreat is $25 per person, which includes two meals and refreshments. Those who will require lodging during the retreat are reminded that late October is leaf season in the mountains and that they should make reservations early. Registration deadline is Oct. 15.

Belmont Community Theater opens with plays about Holocaust

BELMONT — The Abbey Players/Belmont Community Theatre will produce two plays to run in repertory as the next presentations of the 1999-2000 season. The plays are "A Shayna Madel" by Barbara Lebrow and "Good" by C.P. Taylor. Each play deals with a different aspect of the Holocaust.

"A Shayna Madel" (which means "beautiful girl" in Yiddish) is the story of a family shattered by the event. In 1946 Brooklyn, an assimilated Polish-Jewish girl is startled by the reappearance of her long-lost sister, discovered in a displacement camp after the war. The sisters slowly rebuild their connection as they attempt to reconstruct their family ties. The play is a deeply moving examination of the Holocaust told from the point of view of the victims.

"Good" takes the unusual approach of presenting the events in Germany from the point of view of the oppressor. John Halder, a German academic, is slowly drawn into working with the Nazi regime in a desire to get ahead socially and financially. As the play progresses, we see the events of the 1930's as filtered through the conscience of this "good" man, who inevitably becomes an accomplice in the horrific events through his inability to make a moral choice. The play was first produced in London by the Royal Shakespeare Company, and enjoyed successful runs in both New York and San Francisco, where actor William Hurt played the role of Halder.

"A Shayna Madel" opens Sept. 30 and will run Oct. 1-2 at 8 pm. There will be a 2:30 Sunday matinee on Oct. 3. "Good" runs Oct. 7,8,9 at 8:00 pm and Oct. 10 at 2:30 pm. The following weekend the two plays will alternate performances. Both plays are under the direction of Simon Donoghue, and will be designed by Gary Sivak. All evening tickets are $10.00; all tickets for the matinees are $8.00. For further information, or to make ticket reservations, please call the Box Office at 704-825-6787. ▼

Triad churches gather for ecumenical event

By NANCY NORTON
Correspondent

WINSTON-SALEM — Joshua brought the 12 tribes of Israel together to sign a covenant at Shechem. Reminding the people of God's covenant with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, Joshua speaks of all the mighty deeds the Lord has done for them. He brought them out of the desert, saying, "Now fear the Lord and serve God completely; cast out all other gods."

Conventual Franciscan Father Joseph Madden's homily related this theme for the "Signing of the Covenant Celebration" between Our Lady of Mercy Catholic Church and Christ Evangelical Lutheran Church, both in Winston-Salem. Parishioners from each church came out, despite heavy rains, to witness this historic event hosted at Our Lady of Mercy Church on Aug. 25.

"Our part of covenant is to love God the way Jesus loves God," explained Father Madden, pastor at OLM. "And as Joshua said, 'As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord.'"

Many have been praying for this unity of Catholics and Lutherans, praying that one day we will all be one, Father Madden said. "We have come together by the power of the Lord," he added. "This event is the smaller that reflects the larger: to act together for justice."

Rev. Pierson Shaw, pastor of Christ Lutheran Church, and Conventual Franciscan Father Joseph Madden, pastor of Our Lady of Mercy Catholic Church, sign a covenant between the two faith communities at a ceremony Aug. 25.

The Wednesday night service carried both Lutheran and Catholic traditions, along with a combined choir singing the Celtic Alleluia.

As outlined in the covenant, the churches plan to: pray for each other; pray together in joint services; continue joint observances such as Lenten devotions; reflect on the Word of God in shared programs of study; provide ways for better understanding and appreciation of each other's heritage and beliefs; share, study and discuss the results of the Roman Catholic/Lutheran dialogues; and promote social events that bring the members of each community into formal settings to foster personal contacts.

This is a step toward healing the separation between the churches. Conventual Franciscan Father Joseph Barry Angelini, associate pastor of Our Lady of Mercy, says it was on the impetus of the Rev. Pierson Shaw, pastor of Christ Lutheran, that a local dialogue began. Rev. Shaw adds that his denomination has been involved in these types of covenant relationships in the past.

Andy Briggs, an OLM parishioner, is excited about the covenant. "This is a strong part of ecumenical Christian ministry," he said. Fred Moretz, a Christ Lutheran parishioner, agrees. "I wanted to be a part of this existential experience," he said. "We have been working quite awhile towards this opportunity."

Rev. Shaw believes the greatest difference between the two traditions is "the Marian dogmas, but we are working through these." The Christ Lutheran Church is now in full communion with the Episcopalian and Moravian churches.

"There is a deep interest between Lutherans and Catholics and now a willingness to do something about coming together," Father Angelini said. Besides participating in the covenant promises weekly, a joint healing service will take place in the fall.

Gifts of love were exchanged, as two flower stands were presented to Christ Lutheran and a chasuble and stole were given to Our Lady of Mercy. At the reception following, everyone was pleased at the foundation laid between the two churches. As illustrated in the program cover, quoting from I Corinthians 3:11, "... That foundation is Jesus Christ." ▼

The Southeast FIRE Rally

Rally fires up the faithful in prayer, song, spirit

A woman kneels in prayer during the Southeast FIRE Rally Sept. 18 at Belmont Abbey College. The event, billed as the largest-ever Catholic evangelistic gathering in the Charlotte metro area, drew well over 2,000 adults and teen-agers from the Southeast and beyond.

By Jimmy Rostar
Associate Editor

BELMONT — At a site rich with decades of Catholic history, thousands of people gathered to celebrate the new springtime of the upcoming jubilee.

More than 2,000 people from the Southeast and beyond rallied Sept. 18 around FIRE — a Catholic alliance promoting faith, intercession, repentance and evangelism. Hosted in Wheeler Athletic Center on the grounds of Belmont Abbey College, the rally featured four leaders in charismatic renewal movements, each coming with a message of a living faith. A youth track also brought about 550 young people together for a similar encounter. The day was filled with preaching and music, and ended with Masses celebrated with both the adults and the youth.

FIRE was sparked in the fall of 1982, when charismatic renewal leaders decided to form an evangelism team. Their goals? To apply Gospel teachings in the modern world, to reach out to Catholics seeking to deepen their commitment to Christ and the church, and to challenge the faithful to more fully embrace church life.

The first FIRE Rally was hosted in May 1983. Nearly 120 rallies, 400,000 participants and dozens of countries throughout the world later, FIRE still spreads. And on Sept. 18, it made its way to Belmont for an unprecedented gathering that celebrated the Catholic faith.

Faith

"In the new covenant, the Holy Spirit is given to every single Christian. Every single Christian has the possibility of being led and guided by the Holy Spirit."

That was one of Ralph Martin's many impassioned messages on what the gift of faith means for Christians, especially on the eve of the new millennium. The president of the evangelization mission called Renewal Ministries, Martin said faith and openness to the Holy Spirit can change lives forever.

He noted Pope John Paul II's "whole ministry as pope is dedicated to helping us surrender ourselves and open ourselves to the action of the Holy Spirit in each of our lives."

The upcoming jubilee, Martin said, is a time for the church to experience a renewed presence of Christ in the world.

"The church isn't a social club, the church isn't a hobby," he said. "The church is a meeting with God, and that's what the church is supposed to point to, facilitate and deepen."

British bishop says unions can be key in promoting values

BRIGHTON, England (CNS) — Unions can play an important role in promoting human values in the workplace, and Catholics should join the appropriate union or professional association, said a British bishop. Retired Auxiliary Bishop John Jukes of Southwark, chairman of the English and Welsh bishops' Committee for the World of Work, said it was "no good having clear principles and stated convictions about Gospel values if these matters are not reflected in our actions and lives." At a mid-September Mass for delegates to the annual conference of the Trades Union Congress, or TUC, the bishop said trade unions had their origins in the need to protect workers from injustices and from denial of their dignity as human beings.

Bishops, scientists find common ground on stem-cell research

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Scientists and Catholic bishops in a three-day dialogue found common ground and areas of disagreement on issues of stem-cell research. They agreed that "using embryonic stem cells to generate a child is unsafe and unethical and should be prohibited." They recognized together that "disagreement exists about whether a fertilized egg possesses rights associated with the human person." The dialogue, sponsored by the Committee on Science and Human Values of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops, brought five bishops and 12 scientists together Sept. 10-12 to discuss the scientific and moral implications of embryonic and adult stem-cell research.

Bishops express shock, remorse over Texas church shootings

FORT WORTH, Texas (CNS) — Bishop Joseph P. Delaney of Fort Worth said the seven people slain Sept. 15 inside a Baptist church in Fort Worth were martyrs. In a statement issued a day after the shooting, Bishop Delaney noted that the Catholic morning prayer of Sept. 16 honored the third-century martyrs St. Cornelius and St. Cyprian. "These victims, slain in the normal pursuit of their faith, can be considered martyrs as well," Bishop Delaney said. Seven other people were wounded in the evening attack at Wedgewood Baptist Church.

Sociologist warns of Catholic trend to marry outside church

NEW YORK (CNS) — Sociologist James D. Davidson has warned that the sharp decline in Catholics entering church-sanctioned marriages seems to "portend profound changes for the future of American Catholicism." Davidson, a sociology professor at Purdue University, reported in the Sept. 10 issue of Commonweal that fewer and fewer Catholics are entering valid Catholic marriages, especially when the partner is not Catholic. "These findings suggest that the church is losing touch with young marriage-age Catholics," he said, adding that if this is true it has "enormous pastoral implications."

Revised book on indulgences covers modern situations

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The word "indulgences" has an old-fashioned ring to it, but the Vatican's revised handbook on indulgences outlines some modern situations in which Christians merit eternal reward. When undertaken with the traditionally required confession, Communion and prayer, indulgences can be earned for acts of charity or Christian witness in everyday life, Vatican officials said. For example, in a factory cafeteria where swearing and vulgarity are the norm, a worker can earn an indulgence by publicly making the sign of the cross and praying before he eats, said a monsignor who works in St. Peter's Basilica. "That can require a lot of courage," said Msgr. Dario Rezza.

Appeals court overturns sentences of five SOA protesters

ATLANTA (CNS) — The 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Atlanta has overturned the sentences of five protesters convicted in two separate 1997 actions at the U.S. Army's School of the Americas at Fort Benning, Ga. The three-judge panel ruled Sept. 2 that U.S. District Judge J. Robert Elliott, who presided in both trials, had erred in ordering consecutive instead of concurrent sentences after the protesters' second conviction. By the time the ruling was handed down, all but one of the five had served more than the time stipulated in the new ruling.

Pope says financiers should have professional code of conduct

CASTEL GANDOLFO, Italy (CNS) — Entrepreneurs and financiers should develop and follow a professional code of ethical conduct to stop practices which hurt the poor, Pope John Paul II said. "Christians who work in the economic sector and particularly financiers" must find ways to fulfill their "obligation of justice," the pope told a group of business leaders belonging to a Vatican foundation. Members of the "Centesimus Annus — Pro Pontifice" Vatican Foundation met the pope Sept. 11 during their annual seminar. The foundation was established by the pope in 1993 to promote the teachings about economic justice contained in his 1991 encyclical.

CCHD awards $10 million in anti-poverty grants

WASHINGTON (CNS) — The Catholic Campaign for Human Development, the anti-poverty arm of the U.S. bishops, announced $10 million in grants to be distributed nationwide among 306 different agencies. The dollar amount is the highest in the campaign's 29-year history. Last year CCHD gave $8.5 million. The money comes entirely from a nationwide collection taken up in most U.S. parishes the weekend before Thanksgiving.

Eastern N.C. fights rising waters, executes relief efforts

By JOANN S. KEANE

RALEIGH — Devastating flooding and damage in the aftermath of Hurricane Floyd led Governor Jim Hunt to issue a second assistance plea within 48 hours.

On Sept. 20, the governor called on the nation for a relief fund for the Tar Heel State. One day later, in a televised talk, he reminded North Carolinians, "neighbors desperately need help."

"Our state has never faced this kind of disaster before. I would certainly hope that people ... could be as generous as possible."
— Bishop Joseph Gossman of Raleigh

The Diocese of Charlotte has joined efforts to assist its sister diocese, making the pastoral center the collection point for funds to be combined and distributed to agencies and organizations best suited to utilize the contributions.

"In addition to the prayers we offer for the individuals who lost so much, we pray for the relief efforts to assist as eastern North Carolina recovers and rebuilds," said Bishop William G. Curlin, bishop of the Diocese of Charlotte. In conversations with his brother bishop in Raleigh, Bishop Curlin has pledged support as needed for recovery.

A state of emergency exists in 26 of the state's 100 counties. While most of the flooding attributed to the hurricane is in the easternmost counties, some 66 counties have been named major disaster areas by the federal government.

Inaccessibility is a major obstacle as nearly 235 roads remain closed. Five rivers are expected to crest before Sept. 25. Reserve units have been mobilized, and additional emergency support is steaming in from other states.

"We're trying to keep in touch with people," said Bishop F. Joseph Gossman, bishop of the Diocese of Raleigh. "...the only way to get through is telephones and even the phones are down in a lot of areas. A lot of electricity is off; not only are wires down, but the substations are under water."

President Clinton visited the devastated areas of North Carolina Sept. 20 and brought promises of federal aid for those hardest hit, including temporary food stamps and unemployment payments for families in need. He urged storm victims to keep up their spirits and told them, "We're going to be with you every step of the way."

Damage to churches in the Diocese of Raleigh is minimal, according to early reports. A massive oak tree stripped shingles and flooded portions of Sacred Heart Cathedral in Raleigh. In Wilson, St. Therese School was flooded under several feet of water. In Roanoke Rapids, Father Robert Shea, pastor of St. John the Baptist Church found eight feet of water in the rectory basement.

Ethel Jones of Tarboro wades through flood water to get back to her home Sept. 19 in eastern North Carolina. The area was deluged with rain from Hurricane Floyd.

Residents of the state stranded by floodwaters have been moved to safety but relief workers are still struggling to provide clean water and shelter. "Thousands have lost their homes, and thousands more don't know what they'll find when the water is gone," said the governor. Flooding along the coastal plains affects an area of 18,000 square miles with a population of 2.1 million.

North Carolina health officials express concern over a growing health threat caused by rotting farm animals and sewage washing into floodwaters. Estimated of poultry losses exceed 500,000 turkeys and 2.5 million chickens. Additional agriculture damage is still being assessed, although it is being seen as the worst agricultural disaster in the state's history.

"It will be a long and difficult job restoring people and their communities to their normal lives," said Governor Hunt. "But we can do it, we will do it and we won't quit until the job is finished.

"Human being can't control hurricanes and floods," said the governor. "But we can control what happens afterwards."

"Our state has never faced this kind of disaster before," said Bishop Gossman. "I would certainly hope that people ... could be as generous as possible."

"And we need prayers," added the bishop of Raleigh. "I've been telling people that we may not be able to do very much in a tangible way, but we can certainly all pray." ▼

Pope sends condolences after earthquake in Taiwan

By LYNNE WEIL
Catholic News Service

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — In the wake of a major earthquake in Taiwan, Pope John Paul II sent his condolences to the victims and to their families.

In a Sept. 21 telegram in the pope's name to Cardinal Paul Shan Kuo-hsi of Kaohsiung, Taiwan, Cardinal Angelo Sodano said, "The Holy Father is close to the entire population and asks you to convey his sympathy to all affected by this tragedy."

Cardinal Sodano, the Vatican's secretary of state, said that Pope John Paul prayed "that the Lord will sustain the efforts of all those engaged in rescue efforts, in comforting bereaved families and meeting the urgent needs of all those involved."

The cardinal said the pope was "deeply saddened" that so many people had been killed, injured or made homeless in the quake.

Taiwan's Interior Ministry reported Sept. 21 that more than 1,500 people were dead, nearly 4,000 were injured and more than 2,000 remained trapped in collapsed buildings throughout the country. More than 200 people were reported missing.

The earthquake was the worst on record for Taiwan. Authorities in the region and abroad who monitor seismic events measured its strength at 7.6 on the Richter scale, making it the largest quake in Taiwan in this decade.

Striking at 1:47 a.m. local time Sept. 21, the quake was centered 90 miles southwest of the capital, Taipei, in Nantou County. County officials appealed for donations of blankets, food, cars and bulldozers to help in the hunt for survivors.

The Vatican news service, Fides, operated by the Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples, said the church began to mobilize to assist rescue and aid efforts immediately after disaster struck.

"We will do everything possible to relieve the population's pain," Cardinal Shan Kuo-hsi told Fides. "All the structures of the church are preparing to assist people."

The cardinal heads the Kaohsiung Diocese and is president of Taiwanese bishops' conference.

"The church in Taiwan will move in two directions," he said in the Fides report. "First of all, the urgent mobilization of all the churches and schools to house those who have been made homeless, then (we) will promote a worldwide collection of funds to aid the displaced."

Masses for the dead were to be held in all Taiwanese parishes Sept. 26.

MISNA, the Italian missionary news service, reported that its local sources said the region nearest the epicenter was partly mountainous.

The agency said shocks were felt as far away as Kaohsiung, about 100 miles south of the epicenter, but no major damage was reported there.

Of the 21 million people living in Taiwan, 300,000 are Catholic.

Gratitude for CRS donation

On behalf of Catholic Relief Services and the overseas poor whom we serve, thank you — Bishop William G. Curlin and the Catholic community of Charlotte — for your diocese's donations totaling $100,093.39 for the people of Kosovo. With large numbers of refugees returning to their homes, many have immediate needs for assistance in feeding themselves and their families. With your generosity, Catholic Relief Services and the local Caritas agencies' food programs have distributed tons of food, including wheat flour, sugar, salt, beans and vegetable oil, to the people of Kosovo.

I also wanted to take this opportunity to update you briefly on some of our activities in the region. CRS continues to help with the repatriation of displaced persons. Five of the original eight refugee camps in Macedonia have been closed. We continue food distributions to camps in Skopje, Vinica and Delcevo, as well as to host families and social cases all over Macedonia. We expect to provide food to almost 10,000 host families this month as well as to approximately 16,000 vulnerable social cases.

In Kosovo the public schools have been devastated. Nearly 400 primary schools were severely damaged, and 42 percent must be searched for mines. CRS is working to get this effort underway to ensure some modicum of normalcy for those children and families returning to rebuild their lives. CRS believes that these same schools can be a foundation for rebuilding this devastated society, and that is why, together with Caritas, we are targeting the schools in Southwestern Kosovo as part of our long-term Parent School Partnership program to foster community involvement. This program aims to bring parents together for the goal of improving the quality of education for their children, and will move them to action on other issues within the community.

I apologize for the delayed acknowledgement of your generous gift. Due to the overwhelming response from Catholics across the country, our donation tracking has fallen behind although we are making every effort to catch up. Be assured that your generosity is appreciated and is being used to help those in need. The support of the people of your diocese for Catholic Relief Services and its programs truly demonstrates a commitment to a global solidarity. Thank you again for your leadership on behalf of those suffering in the Balkans.

Executive Director, CRS

Comparing Serbia and Vietnam?

I have read different articles in your paper with the attitude that the bombing of Serbia was wrong. For instance, the bishops' statement that the bombing caused most of the deaths of the ethnic Albanians. Also, the article about the Vietnamese sympathy for the poor Serbs. How about sympathy for the Kosovar victims?

Nonsense! The war in Vietnam cannot be compared. Even yet, weren't the North Vietnamese Godless Communists against many Vietnamese Catholics who believed in God?

Graves have been found in Kosovo of two-year-olds executed before the bombing. A mother and her baby (the baby still in its mother's arms) were shot before the NATO action.

This attitude of peace at any price is like Chamberlain making peace with the evil Nazis before World War II — useless. Unfortunately, in this world, freedom and justice have a price. Only those willing to defend such ideas are worthy to have them.

If you saw your neighbor and his family assaulted, would you not help? Wouldn't it be wrong, if you did nothing? You could always say that you didn't want to be involved in violence as an excuse. Surely the need of police in a city is justified by the human tendency to evil. Aggressive leaders of nations have to be kept in check also by an international police force.

If an organization like NATO had existed at the time that Hitler invaded Poland, action would have been taken against Germany that might have prevented World War II with the loss of 6 million Jewish lives and millions of allied lives. Milosovic is a little Hitler; his Jews are the ethnic Albanians. Also, if the Allies had done nothing to defeat Hitler, you and I would be likely speaking German and The Catholic News & Herald would not exist in all probability.

Genocide is evil; the defense of helpless, innocent lives is not. Have you not seen pictures of the pathetic refugees run out of their country? The reality is the bombing did stop the murder of Kosovars by the Serbs.

There's a saying: All that evil needs to flourish is for good men and women to do nothing. That is what cowardly pacifists recommend.

Photo objection

In the Sept 17th issue of The Catholic News & Herald, you ran a picture of Dylicia Pagan being released from prison. The picture appeared in the center of the "People in the News" section.

I most heartily object to having terrorists featured in our diocesan paper. Her terrorist organization, FALN, was responsible for six deaths and many injured people in their misguided terror campaign. While her conviction may have been for sedition, she shares complicity with the actual bombers.

Moreover, many of the victims of the FALN's reign of terror were Catholic themselves. Am I to assume that The Catholic News & Herald considers Dylicia Pagan a better Catholic than those that her organization killed? I should hope not, but that is the impression given by your newspaper.

Book review distressing

I have just read the book review by Joseph R. Thomas critiquing Thomas Harris' book "Hannibal" (Aug. 20, 1999 issue). I am stunned that a Christian periodical would even consider printing this article with its detailed descriptions of the book's grotesque characters and vivid account of cannibalism.

The review called attention to the horrific detail in Harris' book but said nothing to discourage one from reading it. In the final analysis Mr. Thomas said the book was "...chilling,...about as ghoulish as such stories get, [and] often fascinating." If I were inclined to read the horror-genre, I would be anxious to get my hands on a copy of this book just from reading the last paragraph of the review.

Christians should not be encouraged to read books of this sort. Our priest spoke only a few Sundays ago of the dangers of cluttering our mind with worldly garbage. He challenged us to change our habits and fill our days focused on the good things God has created and provided for us.

I might have expected an article of this sort in a secular publication but see no relevance to its being included in a religious based periodical. It may be possible that this book could have some value as a literary work. As I have not (and will not) read the book, I cannot critique the book itself. It is the review and its place in The Catholic News & Herald that I find fault with first and foremost. Perhaps books (and maybe even their reviews) should be rated with the same standards as movies are rated by the U.S. Catholic Conference.

What to do about racism?

Racism. FBI statistics show more than 7,800 hate crimes already this year. The Southern Poverty Law Center of Alabama reports 474 organized hate groups in the United States, up 20 percent from last year.

John Franklin, chairman of the advisory board for the President's Initiative on Race and Reconciliation, admonishes "Regardless of how it is expressed, racism stems from the stereotypes that go unchallenged when Americans hold to the common belief that it's best to ignore issues of race instead of openly exploring them."

The good news is that at least since the 1950s there have been individuals and small groups who have come up with honest and practical ways to improve race relations on a human scale, on an individual level — where the problem starts. It is a battle that is going to be won one heart and mind at a time.

Father James Keller, the founder of The Christopher movement, was fond of telling the story of a California woman who made her local community learn the power each of us has to do something positive.

A young black man, studying to be a teacher, had taken a part-time job as a filling station attendant to help support his wife and himself until he got his degree.

Some of the station's customers objected to being serviced by a black man and told the station owner they'd take their business elsewhere, unless the man was fired. Rather than lose business, the owner was about to agree — until a woman neighbor of his heard the story and decided to do something about it.

"How many customers do you figure to lose?" she asked the owner.

"Oh, eighteen, maybe twenty," was the reply.

"If I get you twenty new customers, will you keep the fellow on?" the woman shot back. The man thought for a moment. "You bet I will," he said, finally.

Not only did this woman get the station owner twenty new customers; she actually got him five more for good measure. More important, she made it possible for the young student to keep his job and continue schooling.

That woman's effort and thousands like her are no less important than any legislation effecting change in our racial attitudes and behaviors. They are not waiting for anyone to tell them what to do. They are just doing it — person to person, in their own neighborhood.

While many believe that race relations will remain a fragile thread in our national fabric for decades to come, I believe that the efforts of ordinary people like you and me will make the ultimate difference.

What was it Christ said? . . . "Blessed are the peace-makers; for they shall be called children of God."

The narrow context of Palestine where nearly all his earthly life took place did not give him many opportunities to meet people from another race. However, Jesus accepted all the categories of persons with whom he came into contact.

Only those were left aside who excluded themselves because of their own self-sufficiency, such as certain religious leaders. And he warned us solemnly — we will be judged on the attitude we have toward the stranger or the least among us; for, without our even knowing it, it is Christ Himself whom we meet in them.

Reframing the public-private school debate

The public schools in the county where I live are pretty good. Test scores are going up. Facilities are fairly modern. Teachers are very dedicated; some stay with the system for many years.

As in many growing communities, the schools are overcrowded. But that problem is being addressed gradually with an ambitious building program that opens one new school per year.

At the same time, the demand for Catholic schools in our area is growing. Parents are afraid of drug use and violence. There is a desire for prayer and religious training, especially in the lower grades. We recognize that one hour a week of religious education for 30 weeks a year does not form our children into mature adult Christians.

Each year when our state Catholic conference goes to lobby the legislature, we ask for some form of assistance to private schools. We really need it. Our parents pay the double burden of supporting two school systems.

Given the fact that a presidential election is coming, school funding will be a hot-button issue from the court house to the White House. Maybe now is the time to rethink how we frame the issue.

Much of the debate this coming year will pit public schools against private. Parents of children in religious schools will be seen as opposed to parents of children in public schools. Those who want vouchers or charter schools will be seen as weakening the public system.

From my standpoint as a pastor in a community where 90 percent of the Catholic children go to public schools, it seems to me that this is a false division. There is a way to frame the discussion that takes care of every child. If some fringe groups like the American Civil Liberties Union and the radical religious right will just dial it back a bit, we might even be able to see some common ground.

Perhaps Catholics can lead the way.

For 150 years we have operated an excellent school system, serving millions of people of all faiths, pretty much without government aid. We have a lot of experience and expertise to bring to the discussion.

Catholic schools are no threat to the public system. Indeed, we have common interests. Even if we both had a huge increase in funding, we would still have a long way to go to serve all our children well.

In addition, we have some expertise to offer to public systems. The fact that Catholic schools are known to be lean in their overhead costs while public systems are administratively top-heavy may provide an opening.

Third, maybe we could agree that the First Amendment is as strong in guaranteeing religious expression as in preventing governmental establishment of religion. Other free societies seem to have worked this out. As a universal church, the Catholic community could bring its experience elsewhere in the world to the table.

We all have a common interest in good schools. The common interest is our children. That provides a lot of common ground, no matter where we go to school.

Question Corner

FATHER JOHN DIETZEN

The salvation of extraterrestrials

Q. In 1947 an incident occurred in Roswell, N.M., that was officially declared to be the crash of a weather balloon. Since then there have been rumors that it was the crash of a flying disc with extraterrestrial biological entities, living beings from somewhere else in the universe.

I don't ask in jest or delusion; I really would like to find some answers. It is said that UFOs are the second most popular subject on the Internet these days — second only to sex. The number of people who believe life exists in the universe beyond our earth grows significantly with each of our scientific and space advances.

The controversy goes on, but my question is: How would a discovery that there are rational beings somewhere besides on earth impact Christian faith and current Catholic theology in particular? Has any Catholic group undertaken a study of the subject and its doctrinal consequences? Could Jesus Christ have come to them also?

A. With all the insanities and evils the human race is inflicting on itself these days, one might be forgiven for wondering how much rational life there is now even on this earth.

That aside, it seems to me the only claim we can make for sure in such matters is that nothing in Catholic faith or tradition would rule out the possibility that reasoning, conscious, "humanlike" creatures exist in other parts of creation.

If we intelligently believe in a divine being, can we suppose that God's creative imagination and power is exhausted by the human realities we know? Can we presume that God has "done it all" here, in us?

Countless other life forms, with faculties necessary to relate to each other and the Creator in a conscious way, are surely possible. What "salvation" (from what? to what? how?) might mean for these creatures we have no clue.

Considering the exuberant imagination and generosity with which God lavishes beings and life of all kinds on the planet around us and on the rest of the cosmos we do know, one might strongly suspect that this divine extravagance is not limited to here. Any theory about how or whether that happens, however, is pure speculation.

Some people claim it is typical human arrogance and narcissism even to question the existence of other humanly conscious life. We cannot be, as they say, the only fish in such a big pond.

That's not a very persuasive argument. It pretends to know much more about what God expects and receives from his creation, including ourselves, than we will probably ever know this side of eternity.

Again, conjectures are fun, but we need to remember that's all they are, unless and until some of our descendants, hundreds of years from now, somehow find out for sure.

Rebels free kidnapped Colombian bishop held more than a month

BOGOTA, Colombia (CNS) — A Colombian guerrilla group released a Catholic bishop kidnapped and held for more than a month. The People's Liberation Army, Colombia's smallest guerrilla group, released Bishop Jose de Jesus Quintero Diaz of Tibu to a commission headed by the president of the Colombian bishops' conference. Bishop Quintero told reporters after his Sept. 19 release he gave thanks to his fellow bishops and to Pope John Paul II "for his prayers and intervention" for his freedom.

FBI finds blood of priest, others near site of bishop's murder

SAN SALVADOR (CNS) — Blood found near the place where Auxiliary Bishop Juan Gerardi Conedera of Guatemala City was bludgeoned to death last year matches samples taken from a diocesan priest and at least two other people, said a special prosecutor leading the murder inquiry. But a former human rights investigator at the Guatemala City Archdiocese questioned the validity of the results. "I don't know if it will be possible to defend them (the results) in court, since the scene of the crime was so badly contaminated," the former head of the archdiocesan human rights project, Edgar Gutierrez, told Catholic News Service Sept. 18.

BEREA, Ohio (CNS) — It's only 8:30 a.m. and already coach Chris Palmer has had a long day. He arrived at Cleveland Browns headquarters about 5:30 a.m. to study films of previous team practices and to meet with the assistant coaches about what they need to work on that morning. He has been working virtually nonstop since he was named the Browns head coach in January, and this lifelong Catholic works equally hard at making time in his busy schedule to practice his faith. "I enjoy teaching on the field," Palmer told the Catholic Universe Bulletin, newspaper of the Cleveland Diocese. "I enjoy that interaction with the players. Of course, I enjoy game day too."

Rwandan bishop denies charges of genocide participation

KIGALI, Rwanda (CNS) — Rwandan Bishop Augustin Misago of Gikongoro denied charges of participating in the country's 1994 genocide. "I deny all five of the charges against me. I don't accept any of them," he told a Kigali court as his trial opened Sept. 14, reported Reuters, the British news agency. He faced the death penalty if convicted and has insisted he is the victim of a campaign driven by government officials against the church.

Actress works to improve lives of foster children

PHILADELPHIA (CNS) — Foster children have a friend on television. She's Victoria Rowell, formerly of the popular soap opera "The Young and the Restless," and now the astute forensics expert, Dr. Amanda Bentley, on CBS-TV's "Diagnosis Murder." She will do whatever it takes to make the life of children in foster care more pleasant. "They do need a voice and after all, I'm a former foster youth myself," said Rowell, who recently was photographed for a promotional poster for the archdiocesan Catholic Social Service's Foster Care Program. "I'm interested in helping the advancement of foster family legislation."

Pope to give New Year's Eve blessing to world's people

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — As revelers around the world toast the new millennium, Pope John Paul II will bless the world's people. The pope plans to give a special blessing "urbi et orbi" (to the city and the world) at midnight Dec. 31 when he greets people in St. Peter's Square to usher in the year 2000. The announcement was included in a calendar of papal events published Sept. 15 by the Vatican. The "urbi et orbi" blessing usually is given only on Christmas, Easter and during a newly elected pope's first public appearance

Cardinal Hickey celebrates Red Mass in West Virginia

CHARLESTON, W.Va. (CNS) — Cardinal James A. Hickey of Washington urged participants in a Sept. 12 Red Mass in Charleston to "keep in mind the Lord's courtroom, our Lord of judgment, on whose docket we shall all one day appear." Addressing a group of 400 that included West Virginia lawyers, judges and lawmakers, the cardinal said all would do well to emulate God's brand of justice in their own dealings with others. Cardinal Hickey was principal celebrant for the Mass in Charleston's Sacred Heart Co-Cathedral to mark the start of the judicial year in West Virginia.

Respect Life Sunday is Celebrated on October 3, 1999

Neither do I condemn you: to heal the brokenhearted, to comfort all who mourn

For many people, 2000 means Y2K, and that spells trouble. But for Catholics, 2000 means something much greater and certainly more hopeful than the anticipated computer-generated glitches.

Pope John Paul II has called 2000 the Great Jubilee, a "year of the Lord's favor," when God will pour out graces in abundance. "Above all," John Paul explains, "the joy of every Jubilee" is a "joy based upon the forgiveness of sins, the joy of conversion." From Isaiah, we know that God not only forgives, he also promises to "heal the brokenhearted...to comfort all of mourn...to give them a glorious mantle instead of a listless spirit" (Is 61:1-3)

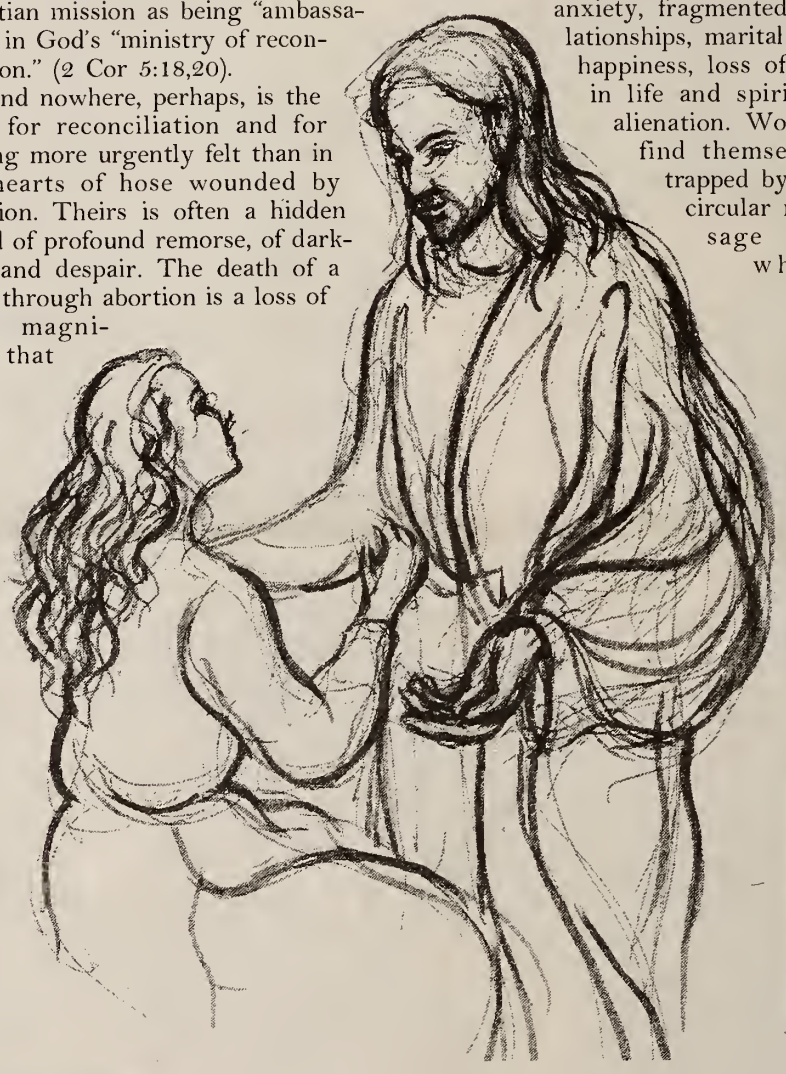
As we look back over the 20th century — indeed over the last year alone — we find much to mourn; genocidal slaughter based on ethnic and religious differences, cold-blooded killings by teens, 10 prisoners a month executed by the state, doctors in Oregon and the Netherlands assisting patients to commit suicide with the law's blessing and 50 million children destroyed by abortion worldwide.

Violence and "legitimized" killing are such serious and persuasive problems they may seem to be beyond our control. And so, we reason, we have no power nor responsibility to change things. Yet the observance of Edmund Burke rings true: All it takes for evil to triumph is for good people to do nothing.

We are not helpless onlookers: "The future is not determined; we co-author it with God," as one bishop reminds us. Just as countless individual sins contribute to the "culture of death" now infecting the world, countless individual choices to be virtuous are needed to build a "culture of life" in the coming millennium.

We start by making the personal choice to uphold—to really witness to—the sanctity and dignity of every human life. Forgiveness and conversion must not take root in our hearts and in our communities so that we can hold out to others a vision of hope and healing. St. Paul describes the Christian mission as being "ambassadors" in God's "ministry of reconciliation." (2 Cor 5:18,20).

And nowhere, perhaps, is the need for reconciliation and for healing more urgently felt than in the hearts of hose wounded by abortion. Theirs is often a hidden world of profound remorse, of darkness and despair. The death of a child through abortion is a loss of such magnitude that time not only fails to heal all wounds, it deepens them. Often grief becomes manifest through alcoholism, drug abuse, depression, chronic anxiety, fragmented relationships, marital unhappiness, loss of joy in life and spiritual alienation. Women find themselves trapped by the circular message that whirs inside: "I allowed the life of a child to be taken; my sin is too great for even God to forgive."



Breaking through the darkness and despair with words of hope, Pope John Paul II says to these women: "The Church is aware of the many factors which may have influenced your decision, and she does not doubt that in many cases it was a painful even shattering decision. The wound in your heart may not yet have healed. Certainly what happened was and remains terribly wrong. But do not give in to discouragement and do not lose hope...give yourselves over with humility and trust to repentance. The Father of mercies is ready to give you His forgiveness and His peace in the Sacrament of Reconciliation. You will come to understand that nothing is definitively lost and you will be able to ask forgiveness from your child, who is now living in the Lord." (The Gospel of Life, 99)

Each of us can help transform this message of hope from words on a page to life-giving water. How? By sharing this message of Christ's unconditional love and forgiveness with someone who is hurting from abortion. We can become the catalyst for restoring that person to new life in Jesus Christ.

A culture of life will flourish if people of faith, people of life, give witness to God's love. And united as one body, may we enter the Jubilee Year of 2000 with great rejoicing, proclaiming the redeeming power of God's merciful love. ▼

The future is not determined; we co-author it with God.

How many to be healed?

By FATHER ED SHERIDAN

According to statistics, there have been over 28 million abortions over the past years since the Roe vs. Wade decision by the Supreme Court of the United States. This does not count the millions worldwide in other countries. Even Ireland is in the midst of discussing changes in the law which presently says that abortion is not only immoral but illegal. How many abortions have there been and how many in the future? Anyone's guess.

Father Ed Sheridan

The abortions have not only prevented life from having a chance but also has inflicted tremendous hurt and damage to the women (and the men) who have chosen the destructive way of handling a challenge in their lives. Very few women (and men) can move away from an abortion without some psychological scars and deep hurts within themselves. There are millions of people who seek help and healing as a result of their actions. A doctor friend in another city told me that the persons who have the deepest hurt within themselves and the unhappiest people are generally those who have not handled the unborn in a positive manner.

There is a program in place which tries to help and heal women known as Rachel's Vineyard. The Catholic Conference Center hosted two retreats over the past few months, and I was privileged to be a part of both weekend retreats. Because of my responsibilities within my own parish, I was only able to be present at various times, but these were wonderful (yet emotionally draining) times to see the healing offered by the Church as a vehicle in God's hands. St. Paul talks about his sinfulness and the need for patience from Jesus due to Paul's admitted sinfulness. Patience is needed to be given to those who have been involved in abortion, and this must be given by the Church as well as by Jesus. Rachel's Vineyard gives this. Unfortunately, those who attend the retreat are very small in number compared with the millions who need that healing. A program like this cannot be done in a big city coliseum or stadium. It does need personalization and individual caring — even within a small group.

Priests, counselors, and doctors attempt to help individuals, and this must continue. Efforts are made to assist not condemn, to heal rather than to hurt more deeply. The forgiveness of individuals in their unique pastoral professions is absolutely needed. The Church must do the same. By sponsoring retreats like Rachel's Vineyard, the Church is reaching out to others.

As a man, I found some of the "exercises" within the retreat to be painful and very emotional, but they seemed to be very necessary and very healing especially for the women participants.

For all who encounter people who are hurting, condemning, and nearly placing themselves in despair and hopelessness, Rachel's Vineyard is an answer which should be tried. When will we ever get to the millions? Most likely that is impossible, but this is a beginning for the Church to be what it is supposed to be — a healing and helping Church. In the meantime, those in a position to help need to be aware of the tremendous hurt and injury done by the act of abortion and also by a non-caring, judgmental, and condemning person, pastoral minister, or health professional. ▼

Father Ed Sheridan is pastor of St. Aloysius Church in Hickory.

Often when it pertains to anything concerning abortion, people are afraid of allowing women to experience "hurt," and the truth is sacrified to a sense of false mercy. There is more concern for the "person," rather than the soul.

There can be no mercy without justice, and no justice without the truth.

I don't know why my soul fled the truth for so long. But, finally, though Project Rachel, my soul was set free and allowed to go to its Creator. I will be forever grateful for the gift of this ministry.

Do you know someone who is carrying the grief and sorrow of past abortion?

Catholic Social Services of the Diocese of Charlotte, provides post-abortion counseling in each of its three family service offices. These services differ in availability due to staffing of the particular offices but share the same philosophy. CSS offers professional, caring, and compassionate counseling services focused on helping the person achieve peace and healing.

In Charlotte

Call (704) 370-6155 and ask for the Intake Counselor. As counselors rotate this responsibility, you may reach voice mail. You need not explain the type of counseling you wish. Calls are returned the same day. Five counselors are on staff. All are master's level who have attended specific training regarding post-abortion counseling.

In the Triad Area

Call (336) 727-0705. David Harold is available for post-abortion counseling. You may ask for him directly. He is a master's level counselor who has attended training in post-abortion counseling. If you prefer a female counselor, he can refer you as needed.

In the Asheville area

Trinitarian Sister Marie Frechette is available for post-abortion counseling. She, too, is a master's level counselor who has completed Project Rachel training. She may be reached at (828) 255-0146.

There is an affordable sliding fee scale for our counseling services. However, services are always offered regardless of ability to pay. Post-abortion counseling is an important part of the counseling services offered by this agency. We strive to be particularly aware of and sensitive to the needs of women coping with post-abortion trauma.

With God's mercy, forgiveness reigns

It is possible for any woman to unexpectedly have a bad emotional reaction to an abortion. But researchers have identified several factors that predict which women are most likely to suffer severe reactions.

Some people seem to come through an abortion unchanged. Others struggle for years with feelings of grief, guilt, shame, anxiety, low self-esteem, anger, or depression. Still others have problems with nightmares, eating disorders, broken or abusive relationships, substance abuse, and even suicide.

Post-abortion therapists are prepared to help people of every religious background, or no religious background. Because abortion involves issues of death and moral responsibility; however, it is natural and necessary for the religious and spiritual beliefs of the client be explored.

Moreover, what most don't realize is God's mercy is great enough to forgive an abortion. With the help of a retreat program called Rachel's Vineyard, healing and reunification are possible. Rachel's Vineyard is a weaving of spirituality and psychology, calling participants into the heart of the God who passionately desires their wholeness and holiness and who loves each as if they were only one.

The focus of the retreat is a biblical healing process. The weekend includes discussions, prayer, living Scripture exercises, private letter writing and a memorial service. Participation is strictly confidential and offers an opportunity to experience God's love, forgiveness and compassion.

For more information on Rachel's Vineyard, and the upcoming Nov. retreat, contact Dr. Martha Shuping, (336) 659-1342.

Rachel's Vineyard weekend retreats provide opportunity for any woman or man who has struggled with the emotional or spiritual pain of an abortion. There are psychological exercises to help work through repressed grief and anger and many rituals to help the participant grieve the loss of their unborn child and to accept God's forgiveness.

In the Diocese of Charlotte, Dr. Martha Shuping, a psychiatrist in private practice, is a retreat leader for Rachel's Vineyard in the Diocese of Charlotte. Shuping has conducted workshops and counseled women with pregnancy loss for over a decade. ▼

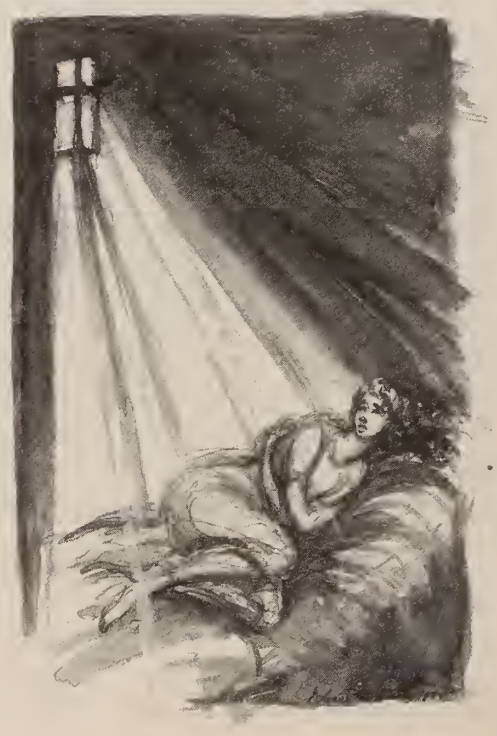
Editor Joann Keane contributed to this article.

I would like to say a special word to women who have had an abortion. The Church is aware of the many factors which may have influenced your decision, and she does not doubt that in many cases it was a painful and even shattering decision. The wound in your heart may not have healed. Certainly what has happened was and remains terribly wrong. But do not give in to discouragement and do not lose hope. Try rather to understand what happened and face it honestly.

If you have not already done so, give yourselves over with humility and trust to repentance. The Father of mercies is ready to give you his forgiveness and his peace in the Sacrament of Reconciliation. You will come to understand that nothing is definitely lost and you will also be able to ask forgiveness from your child, who is now living in the Lord."

— Pope John Paul II, The Gospel of Life (No. 99)

If you have had an abortion, God's mercy is great enough to forgive that, too.



The Shrine
Dedicated to Children Who Died Unborn

Church of the Holy Innocents, New York

The Shrine Dedicated to Children Who Have Died Unborn is a memorial for all children who have died before birth through miscarriage, abortion or who are stillborn.

When parents suffer the loss of an unborn baby, there usually is no burial or any way for them to honor and remember their child. His Holiness, Pope John Paul II, reminds us in his encyclical letter Evangelium Vitae, that these children are now "living in the Lord" and are with God for all eternity.

This shrine offers an opportunity for families to enter the name of their child into the Book of Life which is encased at the shrine between statues of the Holy Family and beneath the Eternal Flame candle. Our shrine is a place of prayer, healing, forgiveness and love.

The Holy Sacrifice of the Mass is celebrated on th last Friday of every month in honor of the children inscribed into the Book of Life and for the comfort of their families.

If you would like to enter a child's name into our "Book of Life," please send us a letter with the name of the hcild, or contact:

Quebec bishops say no apologies, no church funds for 'orphans'

By MARY DURRAN
Catholic News Service

MONTREAL (CNS) — The Quebec bishops' assembly announced it would offer neither apologies nor compensation to the Duplessis "orphans," who claim their lives were ruined in Quebec's Catholic-run institutions of the 1940s and '50s.

Bishop Pierre Morissette of Baie-Comeau, president of the assembly, said that to make an apology would be to accept a version of events that the church does not accept and would constitute a "betrayal of the good works of those who dedicated their lives to the service of the poor."

As far as financial compensation is concerned, Bishop Morissette said: "We consider that the church has already given a great deal to the poor and continues to give generously."

However, the bishops said the church is willing to cooperate with the Quebec government, which announced earlier this year that it would institute a $3 million (US$2 million) fund for social services for the Duplessis orphans.

"We are willing to continue and even put more resources into church social programs which offer assistance to former orphans," Bishop Morissette said in a Sept. 15 press conference given with Cardinal Jean-Claude Turcotte of Montreal, president of the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops.

"To be deprived of the contact and love of one's family constitutes a wound which leaves deep scars. We feel deep compassion for those orphans who were given up to the nuns or abandoned by their families and had to spend their childhoods in an institution," said Bishop Morissette.

"Added to a stubborn refusal to apologize is a disdain for the victims and the truth, as well as a campaign of misinformation."
— Bruno Roy, president of the Committee of Institutionalized Duplessis Orphans

"We cannot rewrite history," Bishop Morissette said. "That's why we believe it's preferable to devote our time and energy to respond to the needs of those who call on us today for help."

The bishop's announcement came after extensive consultations in all of Quebec's dioceses with religious institutions and with the seven religious orders implicated in the Duplessis orphans controversy.

The 3,000 "orphans" were illegitimate children or children born into abject poverty who were given up to Catholic-run orphanages during the government of Maurice Duplessis, a Catholic.

As the orphanages ran up debts in the 1940s, Cardinal Paul-Emile Leger negotiated a federal subsidy that was available only for psychiatric care. Thus, the orphanages became psychiatric hospitals, and a number of healthy children were falsely diagnosed as mentally ill and interned with real psychiatric cases.

Since 1992, victims have been seeking reparation from the government and the Catholic Church. Calls on the church to apologize for its implication in a system that illegally interned healthy children in a regime designed for psychiatric cases intensified in the wake of Pope John Paul II's recent calls for the church to mark the millennium by asking pardon for past wrongs.

"How can you ask somebody to apologize for something they were forced to do at gunpoint?" asked Cardinal Turcotte, referring to the religious orders, whom he said had no choice but to accept federal money and turn the institutions into psychiatric hospitals.

Bishop Morissette added that he rejected allegations that there had been systematic abuse of the children interned in the institutions.

Many former orphans have alleged that they were subjected to the treatment that was conventional for mental cases at the time: restraint in a straitjacket, cold baths, electric shock treatment and isolation. Others have alleged general cruelty and emotional abuse or sexual abuse by lay monitors who worked in the orphanages.

"There may have been isolated cases of abuse in the orphanages, but it certainly wasn't systematic," Bishop Morissette said.

The president of the Committee of Institutionalized Duplessis Orphans, Bruno Roy, said the bishops' declaration "added insult to injury."

"Added to a stubborn refusal to apologize is a disdain for the victims and the truth, as well as a campaign of misinformation," he said.

Roy said the orphans' committee has never maintained that sexual and other abuses were systematic, as the bishops' assembly has suggested.

"What was systematic was the labeling of healthy children as mentally ill," Roy said. "The church's sin was its silence. It kept quiet, because otherwise it would have lost the federal money. The bishops' assembly has fudged this issue."

Roy said the orphans recognize the devotion of the many of the individual nuns who worked with the children and acknowledge that many of them did the most they could.

"But there would be no contradiction in saying that while many individuals selflessly worked for the good of the children, the institutions involved participated in a system that was wrong," he said.

The Committee of Institutionalized Duplessis Orphans called on Catholics throughout Quebec to boycott the Sunday collection at Mass as of Oct. 3 by dropping a leaflet of support of the orphans into the collection instead of a monetary gift. ▼

Worriers and patron saints come together in new book by sisters

REVIEWED BY ANNE LEVEQUE
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

"Heaven Help Us" is subtitled "The Worrier's Guide to the Patron Saints." As a world-class worrier, I felt an immediate affinity for the authors: sisters who "come from a family of worriers."

What do you do when you're lying awake at night, fretting over whatever you have to fret over: love, finances, children, or the lack of any of those things? Prayer is a powerful tool, but many of us feel the need to DO something. This book is offered as a practical guide for the worrier. It gives specific prayers, rituals, and advice that is sometimes a little peculiar.

The book is divided into thematic sections so that you can easily find a saint to fit your particular needs. There are sections such as "When Love's Labors Lose," "Heavenly House Calls" and "For Wandering Souls." There are also introductory sections on why we ask saints to intercede for us and the canonization process.

There is a page or two on each saint covered, giving a little background on the saint and a prayer or two along with a ritual to perform. These rituals mostly fall into the category of harmless activities: when you ask St. Stephen to protect your home and its inhabitants against illness, disease, hail, or storms, you place some oats in a bag and hang it in a prominent location. Just as you're wondering where on earth you might find some oats, the authors point out that Cheerios will do just fine.

Some of the rituals, on the other hand, are a little dubious: St. Agnes, readily recognized as the patron of unmarried women who are looking for a husband, can be invoked on behalf of single men as well, but the ritual involves eating an entire raw herring, bones and all!

"Heaven Help Us: The Worrier's Guide to the Patron Saints"
By Alice LaPlante and Clare LaPlante
Dell Publishing (New York, 1999)
224 pages, $9.95

We also get bonus rituals and odd saint facts to spice up this collection.

Clearly, many of the rituals seem terribly superstitious. However, as the authors point out, rituals can be comforting. Some of the rituals come from long-held traditions among Catholics, such as burying a statue of St. Joseph in your yard to ensure a swift sale of your house. Others may be purely the invention of the authors.

This is a light-hearted, humorous guide to the intercession of the saints. The authors have successfully incorporated myth, legend, tradition and prayer to create a delightful collection of intercessions. ▼

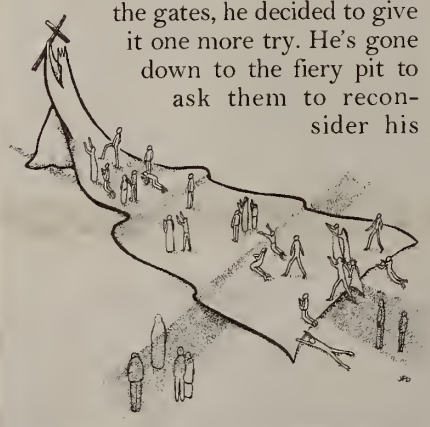
The old story goes like this:

The end of time had come. The righteous stood before the gates of heaven, faces beaming with satisfaction at having been found worthy. Peter and his helpers stood by, conferring in whispers, smiling benignly at the crowd.

Some time passed. In the assembly of the saved, puzzlement grew. Eventually murmurs arose, and a delegation approached and asked Peter politely to please explain what was taking so long. Peter nodded reassuringly and spoke to the crowd.

"We've had a slight change of schedule," he said in a celestial voice. "Just as the Lord was to open the gates, he decided to give it one more try. He's gone down to the fiery pit to ask them to reconsider his invitation and join him in heaven. When he returns, heaven will open."



The crowd stood in stunned silence. Suddenly there came a far-off sound of song and laughter.

Peter grinned and shouted to the crowd, "Here comes the Lord with all the repentant sinners!"

The Lord and the rag-tag band of last-minute rescuees danced into sight. The gates swung open in a glittering flash, and the Lord danced through, followed by remorseful exbullies and forgiven porno stars and repentant terrorists — every imaginable sinner now, through the mercy of God, became saints.

Peter beckoned the white-robed souls forward. And at that moment — so the story goes — the final judgment occurred. Those who took their place among the forgiven entered into God's joy forever. But those who resented the presence of the latecomers excluded themselves from communion with God and exchanged glory for pride.

This week's Gospel shows Jesus reminding his listeners — then and now — that to resent God's forgiveness of even the most notorious sinners removes us from the power of that same forgiveness.

"Jesus said to them, 'I assure you that tax collectors and prostitutes are entering the kingdom of God before you. When John came preaching a way of holiness, you put no faith in him; but the tax collectors and the prostitutes did believe in him'"
— Matthew 21:31b-32a.

Movie Review

Movie adaptation of Vonnegut novel is surreal satire in suburbia

By GERRI PARE
Catholic News Service

NEW YORK (CNS) — The American dream turns nightmarish for a wealthy car dealer going bonkers in suburbia the surreal satire, "Breakfast of Champions" (Hollywood).

Based on Kurt Vonnegut's 1976 novel, the movie is heavy-handed and wears out its welcome not long after presenting a parade of excessively eccentric characters who populate the film.

Bruce Willis is Dwayne Hoover, the town's wealthy, admired car dealership owner whose grinning visage is constantly seen on TV ads but who begins each day by putting a gun barrel into his mouth. Nothing and no one make sense in his life. His wife (Barbara Hershey) is a TV-addicted zombie and his teen son (Lucas Haas) is remote and overly fond of glittery costumes.

THE CATHOLIC COMMUNICATION CAMPAIGN

At work, sex with his secretary (Glenne Headly) doesn't relieve Hoover's stress and customers fawn over him as a TV star. His sales manager (Nick Nolte), fearful Hoover's discovered he's a closet transvestite, is also going over the edge with bizarre behavior, while the new employee, ex-con Wayne Hoobler (Omar Epps) abjectly worships Dwayne for no reason other than their names are similar.

Meanwhile, cranky pulp fiction writer Kilgore Trout (Albert Finney) has been lured to Hoover's town to be honored at an arts festival, and the car dealer gets it into his befuddled thinking that Trout's the guy who will explain the mysteries — and the meaning — of life to him.

As written and directed by Alan Rudolph, the movie looks dated in its use of self-conscious camera techniques that appeared creative two decades ago but now seem only stale.

Bruce Willis stars as Dwayne Hoover in "Breakfast of Champions," a surreal satire based on Kurt Vonnegut's 1976 novel. The U.S. Catholic Conference classification is A-III — adults. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is R — restricted.

Willis the actor undoubtedly identifies with the character whose TV visibility means he has no privacy in public, but the smiling facade Dwayne puts on is relentlessly hammered home to diminishing effect as the character builds to a violent outburst.

Finney's philosopher-hack is supposed to provide humorous cackles but his dialogue just doesn't provoke much laughter.

Nolte, however, scores points when he goes bananas on camera, stripping to his frilly red negligee in the middle of filming a car commercial. As the wife who cheers him on, Vicki Lewis is given little to do. The same is true for Hershey as Dwayne's wife, another character whose mindlessness is never explained.

The crazed assortment of neurotics doesn't develop much human dimension, so when a gooey, uplifting ending suddenly materializes it has no resonance with the audience. Vonnegut's social commentary on materialism and the rampant consumer culture tends to get lost in the buffooneries of these cartoonish characters.

Due to an extended sexual encounter, brief violence, intermittent profanity and minimal rough language, the U.S. Catholic Conference classification is A-III — adults. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is R — restricted. ▼

Young hearts set afire with messages of inspiration and motivation

By ALESHA M. PRICE
Staff Writer

BELMONT — On an Indian summer day under a tent next to the track and field of Belmont Abbey College and Monastery, over 500 youth from the Charlotte and other dioceses gathered for a day of music and talks at the Southeast FIRE Rally on Sept. 18.

Eighteen-year-old David Hamilton from St. Therese Church in Mooresville said, "I like that all of these young Catholics can come together and worship in one place because it is difficult to get kids together at one time for something positive; this is something that everyone should experience."

While adults gathered in the Wheeler Athletic Center, the younger crowd could probably be heard from miles around screaming and yelling in response to the dynamic and vibrant personal stories and rousing music of the FIRE team participants in charge of the youth all-day session. The original idea was for a two- to three-hour breakout session from the adults; however, when the youth registration swelled to over 500, the coordinators decided to hold a separate rally for the younger participants.

"This is a good experience because you can learn more about God and have a good time also," said Robert Dear, 14, from St. Luke Church in Raleigh, N.C. "I like how they are relating to us; they are focused on the kids and are putting forth the effort so that we can understand."

To keep the kids on track, host Bob Lesnefsky told jokes and led call-and-answer breaks and games while delivering his message: "God has opened the doors for this conference to take place today. This is an exciting time to be a youth, and God is doing amazing things in the lives of youth. The Church and God both believe in them."

Lesnefsky is a theology and religious education student at Franciscan University at Steubenville, Ohio. He has worked on his emcee styles from being one of the main leaders of the popular summer youth conferences sponsored by the school.

The day began at 8:30 a.m. with music from Lion of Judah, a Christian music band from St. Joseph's Church in Marietta, Ga. With contemporary religious and inspirational music to keep the mood going throughout the day, the band invited the participants to join in with motions and gestures during the songs. They take their name from the Biblical name for Christ and the title of an old praise song.

"We believe in the power of the Holy Spirit, and we want to share that with young people who are at a critical point in their lives," said Laura Franc, one of the lead singers and founders of the group, along with her husband Bernie. "We have been called to sing about God, and music speaks to everyone."

Third Order Regular of St. Francis of Penance Father Dave Pivonka, the featured speaker of the day, is the assistant to the president of Franciscan University of Steubenville, Ohio, and the youth conference coordinator.

"You are the generation that God is blessing right now. You can find hope and meaning in Him no matter the problem. Your decision on whether or not to follow Christ is the most important one of your lives," stressed Father Pivonka.

He spoke of the violence that has plagued this country in recent times like the shootings in Fort Worth, Texas, Kentucky, and the deaths at Columbine in Littleton, Colo. He warned the group that believing in God and worshiping Him in these times is a dangerous thing and that they have to be strong in their faith.

"You are the generation that God is blessing right now. You can find hope and meaning in Him no matter the problem. Your decision on whether or not to follow Christ is the most important one of your lives," stressed Father Pivonka.

Another speaker was Lisa Weible Militello from St. Joseph Church in Columbia, S.C., her parish's youth ministry leader for eight years and youth conference participant for five years. She tearfully talked about the importance of being celibate before marriage because she had made some wrong choices in her personal life and how she converted to Catholicism after a pilgrimage to Medjugorje.

"Youth are a treasure, and we need to keep them rooted in their faith. They need to know that they can make better choices, so that is why I am here. People try to catechize children before they evangelize them, and we need to have more events like this in this region," she said.

The last group of speakers included young adults from Belmont Abbey College and Franciscan University. Lesnefsky, Catherine Rumore, a sophomore from Birmingham, Ala., and Maureen Davis, a junior from Harrisburg, N.C., used personal testimonies and stories to stress the importance of a dedication to God through prayer, attending church, and living a positive life in all areas.

Rumore, co-host of an EWTN youth-focused show "Life on the Rock," was "really excited to see so much truth revealed today because we are lied to by the media. The narrow path is difficult, but Jesus never said that it would be easy."

Lesnefsky talked about his decision to remain celibate until marriage, while Davis told the teens about her bad choices and the way she changed her life.

Fourteen-year-old Curt Smith from Good Shepherd Church in King, N.C., said, "I came to experience the Catholic religion more closely with people who had gone through painful experiences. I wanted to know how others have grown in their faith through difficult decisions."

"My hope is that teens have found a place where they can come in contact with a God who loves them. We have to speak to them in a different way because they speak a different language. This rally is important because this lets them know that there are options and that they don't have to buy into the negative things of the world. They need to see people their own age living positive lives," said Father Pivonka. ▼

Intercession

Sister Ann Shields is an ardent believer in a passage from the Gospel of John: "If you remain in me and my words remain in you, ask for whatever you want and it will be done for you (Jn 15: 7).

As a FIRE presenter at its 117th rally, she shared this passage and emotional stories to illustrate how intercession — God's love shown through oneself to others — is the key to true Christian compassion.

"The heart of charity is that I surrender my life in such as way that God's love can work through me," she said.

Sister Shields, the superior of the religious community the Servants of God's Love in the Diocese of Lansing, Mich., noted Pope John Paul II's call to focus on God the Father, the sacrament of reconciliation and the virtue of charity in this last year of jubilee preparation.

"This is a season of grace," she said. "Your willingness to follow the Lord unleashes spiritual power, and a spiritual peace."

Sister Shields encouraged the crowd to stay on the path of obedience, to persevere in their prayer, and to pray for what's most important in the eyes of God. "Trust Him," she said, "and know that that He hears every word of every prayer you pray."

Repentance

In his talk on repentance, Third Order Regular of St. Francis of Penance Father Michael Scanlan spoke often of entering the embrace of God.

A trio of FIRE Rally participants stand in praise during a song performed at the Southeast FIRE Rally. The event was filled with preaching and music.

Succeeding in that challenge has great rewards, he said, but sin poses many obstacles along the way.

"Unfortunately, sin takes you further than you want to go, keeps you there longer, and hurts you more," said Father Scanlan, president of Franciscan University of Steubenville, Ohio.

"The moment today that you turn toward God and say, 'I want out of that sin, I want out of that twilight zone, I want to break from what keeps me at a distance from you' ...God comes to you with grace."

Father Scanlan led a prayer session in which participants invoked the Father, Son and Holy Spirit to empower them in their lives, to direct their actions and to wash away resentment and bitterness.

"I'm challenging all of you right now to give God permission," he said. "Not for that narrow one thing that you might already be doing, but for God to move in your hearts right now and lead you to do the thing He most wants you to do in helping others in building His church."

Evangelization

The entire day's events focused in some way on evangelization, but one priest emphasized it by discussing young people. Father Dave Pivonka, who led the youth track nearby, stopped by the main rally to share some thoughts on sharing the faith.

"Brothers and sisters, I firmly believe that God has chosen to anoint the teen-ager generation, the youth generation, right now all across the world," said Father Pivonka, a priest of the Third Order Regular of St. Francis of Penance and assistant to the president at Franciscan University.

Father Pivonka said young Catholics need mentors in the faith. Evangelization takes place in so many faith traditions, he added, and Catholics must partake as well.

"We need to pray for joy — the joy of the new resurrection, the joy of the jubilee — so that when people, especially our young kids, look at us they can say, 'There's something different about that person, and I want what they have.'"

The fire spreads

The event culminated with the closing liturgy, presided over by Bishop William G. Curlin and concelebrated by more than a dozen priests attending the rally.

During his homily, Bishop Curlin told participants to bring the palpable presence of Jesus they experienced back to their communities. "If we don't live in his presence, if we don't have that sense of God about us, then we're living on externals," he added.

Bishop Curlin challenged the congregation to make time to talk to God, and watch how God will lift their hearts.

"Make a leap of faith and say, 'Jesus, I am yours ...", he said. ▼

Middle schoolers "rope in" communication, leadership skills
About two dozen middle school youth from St. Philip the Apostle Church in Statesville gathered Sept. 26 near Mooresville to participate in Iredell County Recreation Department's ropes challenge course. The county program is designed to promote communication, cooperation, trust, personal enrichment, encouragement, leadership skills — and having a good time. "I kind of got over my fear of heights — some," said Kelly Gillis, 12. "I learned to trust everybody here because we all worked together and had fun."

Raleigh Social Ministries bring relief to ravaged counties

By MATT DOYLE

TARBORO — The sun was shining and the air was brisk in Tarboro Sept. 22 as a load of goods from Catholic Social Ministries of the Diocese of Raleigh arrived at St. Catherine of Siena Church. It may have appeared like any other normal fall day in eastern North Carolina. That appearance was a deception.

Everything was not normal in Tarboro. For some, things will never seem normal again.

Hurricane Floyd sliced through this eastern North Carolina community and left it inundated. President Bill Clinton and North Carolina Governor Jim Hunt had descended onto Main Street a few days earlier to bring encouragement and money and to listen to people's stories.

Helicopters still crisscrossed the skies, looking for survivors and watching the river run. National Guard troops cruised the streets and kept vigil at crowded shelters where victims had taken refuge from a storm that continued to show its rage long after it had ceased to exist.

As the CSM group headed along route 64 from Raleigh to Tarboro, it became more evident that something catastrophic had happened. Tall pines were still scattered along the roadside where they had fallen. Mud-covered landscapes offered an often-grotesque vista.

Roadways ended abruptly. Detours abounded.

In Tarboro, streetlights were darkened. They stood helplessly at intersections unable to control what happened.

St. Catherine's property escaped unscathed. The neighborhood had not suffered major damage.

Just over the ridge, according to those familiar with the terrain, was the part of Tarboro that has made its name known around the world, if only for a short time. Walter Bell, former president of the parish council, explained how the Tar River wraps itself around the town putting the low-lying areas in jeopardy.

Rose Gallagher, whose own home is filled with a family in need, expressed a sense of urgency for the Spanish-speaking residents of the area. Many do not have Social Security numbers and are not eligible for assistance.

Bell said that there were times at the height of the storm when it appeared that the river might make its presence known even in the area around the church. It is not that the river itself would make it to the church, but he said the storm drains could no longer empty into the waterway and there was nowhere for the rainfall to go.

While there were no physical signs of damage to the church property, those who had suffered losses gathered at the parish. Spanish-speaking families had sought shelter after losing their homes, at least temporarily, to the waters. They busied themselves doing yard work, passing the time until the floods receded.

Passionist Father Bill Murphy, pastor, had opened the parish hall and his home to the victims. Despite a lack of running water, they were all able to carry on and still able to smile.

A small, informal group of parishioners gathered with Kathleen Walsh, director of CSM, to offer their thoughts and reactions to the storm and in some way to vent their feelings and needs to another, an outsider.

Rose Gallagher, whose own home is filled with a family in need, expressed a sense of urgency for the Spanish-speaking residents of the area. Many do not have Social Security numbers and are not eligible for assistance.

Vatican denies U.N. claim it gave up opposition to family planning

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Vatican said its family planning position remains unchanged, despite a U.N. official's claims that the church no longer presses for references to natural family planning methods in U.N. documents. During a London presentation of the 1999 World Population Report Sept. 22, Nafis Sadik, executive director of the U.N. Population Fund, claimed the Holy See had ceased opposing U.N. family planning programs. But in a two-page statement Sept. 27, Vatican spokesman Joaquin Navarro-Valls said that "the Holy See has not changed at all its well-known position."

Baptist-Catholic report on Bible released

WASHINGTON (CNS) — In a report released Sept. 23, U.S. Roman Catholic and Southern Baptist scholars said that while they have "serious differences," they "share a great deal in our Christian faith concerning the authority and truth of the Bible." The group expressed hope that their 1,600-word report on how Catholics and Baptists approach Scripture "will be useful to teachers and students of our Christian faith and thus contribute to better mutual understanding and deeper devotion to the Bible." While not a "confessional statement," the report affirms certain "core convictions" Catholics and Baptists share.

Indian bishops concerned about attacks, seek Christian response

NEW DELHI, India (CNS) — Indian bishops expressed concern over recent attacks on missionaries by Hindu fundamentalist groups, but asked church members for a Christian response. A statement of the standing committee of the Catholic Bishops' Conference of India said that while the attacks appeared sporadic, they show the "systematic way the fundamentalist forces have been operating." Church sources say that since January, six people have been killed in more than 100 cases of violent attacks against Christians throughout the nation, for which pro-Hindu groups have been blamed.

New Age Christ is not Christianity's Christ, says Vatican book

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — New Age proponents speak of Christ, but theirs is not the Christ of the Gospels, said a new book published by the Vatican. "Instead of the religion of God who became man," New Age followers "prefer that of a man who becomes God," said Father Alessandro Olivieri Pennesi. In his book, "The Christ of the New Age," the priest contrasts New Age and Christian teachings about Christ. The primary and basic difference, he said, is that New Age adherents believe Jesus was simply a man; through a process of enlightenment he reached the status of Christ, like Buddha, Muhammad and Krishna did.

Bishop says Christians called to be good stewards of their gifts

MINNEAPOLIS (CNS) — All Christians are called to be trustworthy stewards of the gifts they receive from God, including time, talent and money, said the vice president of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops. Bishop Wilton D. Gregory of Belleville, Ill., said, at the National Catholic Stewardship Conference Sept. 19-22, that "stewardship is the spiritual challenge that we all face to prove ourselves ... deserving of the confidence that God has already placed in us, giving us all that we have and are."

Bishops to vote on Catholic college norms this fall

WASHINGTON (CNS) — The U.S. bishops plan to vote this November on a national application of the Vatican's worldwide norms for Catholic higher education. The U.S. proposal includes norms requiring theologians who teach in Catholic institutions to have a mandate from the bishop to teach, but it uses the Latin "mandatum" to highlight the technical character of the term. It urges that Catholic members constitute a majority on boards of trustees and on faculties of Catholic colleges and universities "to the extent possible." It also says the president of the institution "should be Catholic" but permits exceptions to the rule.

In India, nun stripped, forced to drink urine of assailants

PATNA, India (CNS) — Suspected Hindu militants stripped a Catholic nun and forced her to drink their urine in the eastern Indian state of Bihar. According to Bishop Victor Thakur of Bettiah, three men in their mid-30s took the 25-year-old nun of the Immaculate Heart of Mary congregation to a deserted mangrove Sept. 20 and stripped her after forcing her out of a three-wheeled vehicle. When the nun resisted rape attempts, the assailants forced her to drink their urine collected in a bottle, said Bishop Thakur. He met the nun Sept. 21 at the St. Joseph's Health Center of Khalpura in Bihar's Chapra district, some 680 miles east of New Delhi, reported UCA News, an Asian church news agency based in Thailand.

Border issues make challenging mission for church agencies

TUCSON, Ariz. (CNS) — The jobs of Catholic social service, migration and pastoral workers take on a different look along the Mexican border. The lives of many of the 6.2 million people living on either side of the 2,000-mile-long U.S.-Mexico border are affected by extreme poverty, low wages, little respect for workers' rights, substandard housing, environmental degradation and related serious medical problems, explained presenters at a Sept. 16-18 conference on border issues hosted by the Diocese of Tucson. Those who cross into the United States looking for economic relief face strict border controls, language and cultural barriers and even a "universal" church that isn't attuned to their needs, other speakers said.

Annual dinner raises dollars for Western CSS Office

By ELIZABETH LOVEJOY

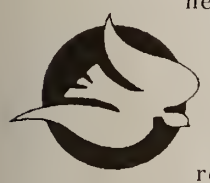
ASHEVILLE — Turkey dinner came early this year in Asheville, when the Western Regional Office of Catholic Social Services served up its Third Annual Fund Raising Dinner on Sept. 26, in the backyard of its headquarters at 35 Orange St.



The business of community outreach is happening in the rooms of this updated Victorian dwelling, which have been converted into more than a dozen offices and small group meeting areas. The operation is headed by Missionary Servant of the Most Blessed Trinity Sister Marie Frechette, director.

Sister Marie and the office staff, joined by their 12-member board of advisors, moved their energies into the backyard to welcome more than 100 guests to their party. On the lawns beneath tents and huge shade trees, the event included a tour of the facility and the opportunity to spend time with the staff and the board.

"This is a chance for everybody who's interested to see our offices and ask questions about our services — without actually coming to us as a client," said Sister Marie. The event is also becoming an opportunity for regular supporters of the agency who come from far-reaching areas of the region to catch up with each other once a year.

Donated equipment and services came from many sources, including Image Smith, Basilica of St. Lawrence, Groce Funeral Home, St. Barnabas' Minstrels, On-the-Spot Cooking, and the De Morgoli family. On hand to take care of all the tables and chairs was a corps of young North Carolina Columbian Squires — the youth group of the Knights of Columbus — from St. Lawrence Basilica, who called and offered their help.

The St. Barnabas Minstrels, from the Catholic parish in Arden, provided lively "Catholic gospel" music, alternating at the microphone with Sister Marie who conducted the raffle drawings.

The board of advisors, who planned the event, solicited more than 25 generous gifts and services from area merchants and institutions, items for literally everybody in the family, such as bed and breakfast accommodations, oil changes, theatre tickets, and graphite fly rods. More than 3,000 raffle tickets were sold at $1 each, and by 2:30 Sunday, more than 135 dinner tickets, at $10 apiece, had been turned in to the caterer.

Receipts from the dinner, the only local fund-raising event sponsored by the agency during the year, supplement income from three other primary financial resources: funding from the diocese, fees paid for agency services, and money from grants.

"And we've been writing a Community Foundation grant for about three years that pays for a bilingual counselor," Sister Marie said.

Although the largest percentage of the agency's financial support comes from diocesan backing, board member and upcoming president John Richardson warned of the increasing need for greater local funding.

"We want our supporters to realize that local financial responsibility will probably increase in the near future," he said.

The Western Regional Office offers dozens of services to clients without regard to religion, sex, race, coun-

Brother says Indonesian militiamen sought priests for confession

KUPANG, Indonesia (CNS) — Many pro-Indonesia militiamen are haunted by guilt after killing innocent people in East Timor, said a religious brother.

Our Lady of Mercy Brother Franciscus Lengkong, head of his congregation's community house in Dili, said that at the height of the atrocities in East Timor following the attack on the home of Bishop Carlos Filipe Ximenes Belo, many militiamen sought priests to confess their sins.

"They came to our community house every day asking us to hear their confessions. But we told them we are not priests and that they should seek priests still staying in town," Brother Lengkong told UCA News, an Asian church news agency based in Thailand, in mid-September. He spoke in the western Timor city of Kupang, capital of Indonesia's East Nusa Tenggara province.

Several militiamen said they felt guilty after killing innocent people and wanted to confess, but there were no priests left in Dili, he said.

"We knew from them that three priests, namely Jesuit Fathers Karl Albrecht and Tarcisius Dewanto, and Father Hilario Madeira, parish priest of Suai, had been killed," said Brother Lengkong.

Our Lady of Mercy Sister Marliana Laia told UCA News that before being forced to leave Dili, she and two colleagues were free to move from their convent, where 700 pro-integration and pro-independence supporters were sheltered, to the home of Bishop Belo, apostolic administrator of Dili.

She added that thanks to the protection of Aitarak pro-Indonesia militiamen who took control of Dili, she was able to move about freely.

The Aitarak militia was blamed for the attacks on the Dili diocesan center and Bishop Belo's residence Sept. 5-6 that killed some 65 people.

Hundreds or even thousands were feared dead in massive violence blamed on pro-Indonesia militias and Indonesian troops following an overwhelming vote for independence rather than integration with Indonesia in the recent autonomy referendum. The results of the Aug. 30 ballot were announced Sept. 4.

"The bishop kept encouraging us to do our best to serve refugees who were sheltered at churches, rectories, religious communities' houses and the bishop's residence," Sister Laia said.

She said she and her two colleagues were forced to leave the convent by Indonesian military personnel, who told them that all other nuns had left Dili for western Timor.

The three nuns and the displaced people at their convent were evacuated to a nearby military post, and from there they were transported to Atambua, in western Timor near the border with East Timor.

However, Sister Laia said she and the other two nuns returned to Dili the next day, boarding the truck returning to transport more refugees. The three nuns found that their convent had been ransacked and looted.

"But we were surprised when we entered the chapel. We found a burning candle before the statue of the Blessed Mother Mary. Someone might have prayed there while others were looting the convent," the nun said.

Back in western Timor, Sister Laia said she found out from newly arriving refugees that her convent had been burned down.

Brother Lengkong and Sister Laia said they saw soldiers involved in looting and burning houses and stores in Dili. Some were dressed in military uniform and some in the black T-shirts worn by Aitarak militiamen, they said.

Brother Lengkong added that a soldier forced him to surrender all three motorcycles and a television set at the brothers' community house. ▼

POPE JOHN PAUL II

Pope meets, blesses Israeli-Palestinian youth group

By LYNNE WEIL
Catholic News Service

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope John Paul II urged Christian, Muslim and Jewish youths from the Holy Land to work together for a peaceful and secure future.

"The decisions you make concerning yourselves and your vocation in society will decide the prospects for peace, both today and tomorrow," the pope said in a Sept. 22 message.

"Your hope and your youthfulness will stand by you in this exciting task," he added. "But you will be able to accomplish it only if you can instill in your own hearts that peace which you plan to bring to your peoples and to the world — no longer a peace based solely on accords and agreements, however noble and necessary they may be, but a peace born from within each person."

The pope delivered his remarks in a letter as he met and blessed a delegation from the Youth for Peace Program of the Peres Center for Peace, a nonprofit organization based in Tel Aviv, Israel.

Toward the end of his weekly general audience, Pope John Paul said he hoped his message would "encourage the efforts being made by young people in the Middle East to build a society where peace and harmony among peoples and the followers of different religions will reign supreme."

After the audience, the pope shook the hands of three members of the group: Antwan al-Saca, 15, who attends the St. Catherine Catholic Church in Bethlehem; Reem Shadid, 15, a Muslim from Hebron; and Amit Yishhai, 17, an Orthodox Jew from Rehovot, Israel.

Al-Saca told Catholic News Service his younger sister and older brother were "very jealous" that he could meet Pope John Paul, "but my parents and the people of my community are very proud of me."

"If the pope comes to the Holy Land next year," Al-Saca said, "it will be a great day for all of us — not just Catholics, but people of all faiths. And it will be a very meaningful moment in the peace process."

Yishhai said: "From a political and moral point of view, the pope has a lot of power. It is good that he shows an interest in what is going on in the peace process, and even in what we are trying to do."

The group presented Pope John Paul with the first copy of a glossy, poster-sized peace calendar with children's drawings expressing reconciliation and peace. It features the names of the months as they are marked by Islam and Judaism, as well as the 12-month Gregorian calendar used universally as the standard for measuring a year.

The holy days of each tradition are noted, and explanations appear in English, Hebrew and Arabic.

Organizers said profits from sales of the calendar would help fund the Youth for Peace Program as well as other agencies in the Middle East that bring young people together.

Economy of Faith

Putting a face on the global economy

A few workers from Greenville, Tenn., followed their jobs to Juarez, Mexico. On December 20, 1995, the Phillips corporation, the owner of Magnavox, moved its manufacturing line for 25 inch table-model TVs from Greenville to the Maquiladoras in search of cheaper labor. A delegation of workers, union leaders and community activists visited the Maquiladoras plant four months later and found workers made roughly one fifth the wages of their American counterparts.

The global economy promises cheaper prices for consumers and prosperity for workers. In reality the global economy produces winners and losers. Only one third of the world's population can participate in that economy as consumers, though many more participate by sewing shirts and assembling TVs. After five years the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA), an expression of the global economy, has doubled Mexican exports to $115 billion a year, but it has increased Mexican workers living in poverty from 34 percent to 60 percent. The global economy basically demands mobility for moving factories and jobs where the labor is cheapest and resources plentiful without interference from local governments.

The Coalition for Justice in the Maquiladoras (CJM), a group supported by churches, unions and grass roots organizations from Canada, Mexico and the US, began in 1989 by looking at environmental issues along the Mexican border. Since then the group's focus has expanded to health and safety issues and alternative economic development. Through lawsuits and labor education, CJM attempts to hold Fortune 500 giants and lesser Maquiladora companies accountable for practices that would never be tolerated in the US. Last June Coalition members met a very sick 8-year-old boy named Erick.

Maribel Martinez worked four years at Delphi's manufacturing plant in Matamoros, Mexico, making automotive steering wheels used in GM cars. She was exposed daily to dangerous chemicals and solvents without appropriate safety equipment. Working while pregnant, Maribel delivered her son, Erick, who was born with serious health problems including glaucoma, hydrocephaly and decalcification of the skull.

The market system represents an ingenious mechanism for producing and distributing goods and services, but it has its limitations. Pope John Paul II teaches the principle of the priority of labor over capital. Basically, he reminds us that every worker is a subject, not an object; a son and daughter of God, not simply a cog in the wheel of production. While wage differentials will invariably exist in different parts of the world, no wage should slip below a living wage-the amount needed to live a dignified life. If cheap clothes or goods come to market at the expense of the health and dignity of workers, the system itself is sick.

Members of CJM are currently searching for ways to help Erick with his health problems. He needs surgery to insert a valve to help drain the water that accumulates in his head. The CJM folks need a neurosurgeon or $6,000 for the operation (E-mail: bstock@bellsouth.net) With all the hype about prosperity and good times, there exists a down side. Young Erick puts a human face on the global economy.

Hispanic Ministry

FATHER VINCENT H. FINNERTY
Guest Columnist

Working with the Hispanic population

This column is a first for The Catholic News & Herald. Its objective is to inform the Catholic community of western North Carolina of the church's work with the ever increasing Hispanic population in the state and in the country. It will appear as a regular feature.

First, let me present myself. My name is Vincent H. Finnerty, C.M., a Vincentian priest of 20 years. I worked in a very poor and missionary area of the interior of Panama for seven years and then was changed to Mexico. I spent nine years there, the first five as the spiritual director of the Vincentian philosophy and theology seminaries; the last four as the Provincial Director of the Daughters of Charity of St. Vincent DePaul. In July of 1995, I was assigned by Bishop Curlin to be the diocesan director of Hispanic Ministry here in the Diocese of Charlotte.

In 1995, there were 16 parishes working in one form or another with the Hispanics with a total of 49 Masses being celebrated in the course of a month. Presently, there are 36 parishes that serve the Hispanics with a total of 160 Masses being celebrated each month.

Diocesan Hispanic Ministry employs nine full-time pastoral agents, three lay persons, three religious sisters and three priests. Of these nine positions, seven are paid for by the Diocese, one by a grant from the Mercy Sisters' Foundation and the other by activities of the Hispanic community in the diocese. Before the end of the year, three more lay persons will be hired and paid for by grants and activities of the Hispanic Community.

Who are these persons and what do they do?

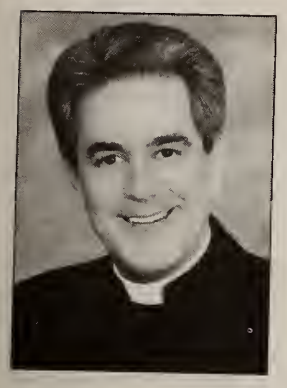
Sister Mary Kay McDonald, MSBT, is coordinator of Hispanic Ministry in the vicariates of Asheville and Smoky Mountain. Sisters Linda Scheckelhoff, OSF, and Andrea Inkrott, OSF, are the coordinators in the Boone and Hickory Vicariates respectively. Father Joe Waters also works in these two vicariates. Enedino Aquino is the coordinator of the Winston-Salem Vicariate and Father Joe Elzi, C.M., takes charge of Greensboro. José Capistrano is beginning in the Gastonia Vicariate and Héctor Andrade is in charge of radio and newspaper programs that we wish to begin in different parts of the diocese.

Of the three people to be employed before the end of the year, two will work full-time in youth pastoral and one in the Albemarle vicariate.

Presently, there are two Hispanic priests in the diocese: Father Fidel Melo at Our Lady of the Americas in Biscoe and Father Ricardo Sánchez in Holy Family, Clemmons. Luis Osorio is an Hispanic deacon who, with God's favor, will be ordained in June 2000.

This column is dedicated to informing the readers of The Catholic News & Herald about Hispanic Ministry. I will treat different themes and welcome questions. You may write me at the Catholic Hispanic Center, 2117 Shenandoah Ave., Charlotte, NC 28205 or you may send an e-mail to cchisp@juno.com.

Father Vincent H. Finnerty is director of Hispanic Ministry for the Diocese of Charlotte.



Light One Candle

FATHER THOMAS J. McSWEENEY
GUEST COLUMNIST

When teens — and parents — argue

I stand in awe of parents. Of course, I know what it's like to be a son and a brother but I lack firsthand experience in raising youngsters. Still, from what I see and, especially, hear, communications is an on-going challenge for all involved.

While time colors memories for adults who look back and wonder "why can't they be like we were?" there seems little room for doubt that today's teens are more outspoken than earlier generations and less likely to obey without question. But does that mean we are breeding defiant, thoughtless youth? I think not.

The fact is, it is natural for young people to test the rules. The banter and battles of adolescence have always been part of the growing up process. As one parent put it: "One might even suggest that arguing is part of a child's job description." In the end, with attentive parenting and patience plus their own tentative efforts, most youngsters do become responsible adults — just as their parents did.

That's why so many experts who work with parents and teens refuse to be alarmists. They develop new strategies for dealing with the exigencies of being a teenager. Case in point, Patt and Steve Saso's 10 Best Gifts for Your Teen note that when teenagers make mistakes, parents often punish them. This causes resentment and invites rebellion. Instead, they believe that you can use the opportunity to turn a negative into a positive. Rather than say "Go to your room and think about what you did wrong!" try saying, "Go to your room and think about what you could do differently next time so this won't happen again." Transforming the mistake into an opportunity for growth helps the child learn problem-solving skills.

In her latest book, "Tired of Arguing with Your Kid?", best-selling writer Dolores Curran shares some creative responses to teenage complaints, accusations and arguments that can help diffuse some everyday confrontations. The author cautions that "these responses" are not meant to be used sarcastically or unkindly but in tones of empathy, concern, and humor." Here are a few of them:

- Someday you may be lucky enough to have a child just as lovable as you.
- No, it's our room and we're letting you use it till you're out on your own.
- Thank you for sharing that. Parenting is a learning process, and your input helps.
- I'm hurt. I depended on you and the job wasn't done.
- Great pout! Does it hurt to keep your face like that?
- Dinner is not late. It's not ready.
- How would you solve this if you were me and I were you?
- You are right. I don't understand you, but I don't let that get in the way of love.
- Because God sent me to you and you to me. Who knows the will of God?
- Is this worth the fight? Let's examine that first.

Dolores Curran also provides a list of phrases kids really hate to hear from How many times do I have to tell you? to This hurts me more than it does you to When I was your age . . . .

Family Reflections

Student exchanges

Our daughter, Andrea, befriended a young man from Germany last year. This young man, Johannes, was attending the local high school for one year, and being hosted by a married couple who, for all practical purposes, were his parents while here in America. When we met Johannes for the first time, we were impressed with him. Imagine the courage it must take for him to come to a foreign country to live for an entire year away from his homeland, his family, his culture. But we were also very impressed with those who opened their home to a stranger and took responsibility for him. What extraordinary hospitality and generosity!

George and Barb Dickson are that family. Married twenty years, they have hosted eight students from various European countries, all adolescent young men, in their suburban home south of Chicago. Having children of their own has not been their gift from God. Yet, the sacramental love they have in their marriage longed for a vessel in which to overflow. Being host parents has been that vessel for them.

Unlike parenting as we know it, George and Barb didn't have the benefit of parenting through stages of childhood before facing the challenges of parenting a teen. They went into it "cold turkey," but with a kind of hopefulness that demonstrates an abiding faith. "When we pick them up at the airport I know" Barb said about the chemistry between them and their year-long guests. For them it is a decision to love without knowing.

Remarkably there have been few major problems. Though each student is unique in his personality, temperament, openness to affection and need for emotional space, they always find the right touch. George is a hugger who invariably affects each student with his brand of affection. There was one young man who seemed less open to hugging even after a year. When Barb and George visited him in his homeland, his birth-parents remarked how his year in America had changed him so. The young man himself credited George with teaching him how to show affection.

Barb and George visit all of their "sons" and their families after their year is over. According George, "We know that we are entrusted with a treasure each time we host. And we treasure our time with each guest." They also send flowers to the parents.

"It's always painful when they leave" said Barb, "but it's worth the heartbreak. We enter each other's lives at a critical time for them. It's a joy to witness seeing each of them grow from being a boy to into manhood."

Responding to the question "Who are you to these kids?" George quotes one of the young men who once told them, "You're not my mother or my father, but definitely my mom and dad!"

Question Corner

FATHER JOHN DIETZEN
CNS COLUMNIST

Who are the angels?

Q: Several in my extended family no longer practice the Catholic faith. They still are connected to some practices, however, and still ask questions. I do the best I can.

Recently, an uncle asked a lot of questions about angels. How were they "named"? What is Catholic teaching about the angels? Who are the angels mentioned in the annunciation, the nativity, the transfiguration, the resurrection? How do we know about them? Just from the Bible?

I know this is asking much, but can you give a few thoughts to help them?

A: Our word angel comes directly from the Greek word "angelos," which means messenger. That immediately tells us much about them, as far as we humans are concerned.

Every encounter with angels in the Scriptures, which is the only way we know anything directly about them, is in the context of their being sent by God to deliver a message or help to someone. In fact, it seems that their names (for the few who are given names) are based on their mission as described in the Bible.

Gabriel, which means "God is strong," appears in the Old Testament in the context of prophecies anticipating the coming of the Messiah (Daniel and Jeremiah). Perhaps for this reason he is chosen to announce the birth of John the Baptist and Jesus in Luke's Gospel.

Raphael ("God heals") plays a central role in the Book of Tobit when he leads young Tobiah on his journey to find a wife and heals Tobit's blindness.

Michael ("who is like God?") appears a few times in the Book of Daniel. The letter of Jude refers to him as guard of the body of Moses (from an ancient work called "The Assumption of Moses"), and Revelation describes him as the leader of the heavenly armies in the battle with the forces of the dragon.

The Old Testament speaks often of one called The Angel (messenger) of Yahweh. Was this a particular angel? Often, like other angelic appearances and actions, it is hard to distinguish between the angel and God. Was this angel added by the storyteller, perhaps to emphasize the holiness and distance between the people and God?

Most of the time, as for example at the tomb of our Lord, angels are not named. Interestingly, however, when they are described they are always young, good looking and male!

While our Scriptures give only a few of them names, angels, singly or in groups, enter the story of salvation countless times. Sometimes they are described in worship, as in Isaias (6:3) where we find the hymn of praise we echo in every Mass, "Holy, holy, holy ..."

Other times, as for example in the beginning of the Book of Job, angels serve as a sort of palace guard, a heavenly court. And numerous other times, of course, they fulfill their mission to bring information and assistance and support that reflect God's kindness, fidelity and compassionate concern for his human family.

Today it is nearly impossible to miss the popular fascination, even among people with no particular religious faith, with guardian angels. That God has in some way commissioned angels to be beside us, to protect and guide our ways on earth, has strong support in Scripture as well as Christian tradition.

This belief that each person, even each community, has an angel to be a spiritual companion through life is simply one manifestation of our conviction that God has a daily, personal concern for our good and happiness. It's one of the best things we know about angels.

Montana bishop asks prayers for double murder-suicide victims

HELENA, Mont. (CNS) — Bishop Robert C. Morlino of Helena has asked Catholics in western Montana to pray for the three victims in an apparent double murder-suicide involving the diocese's interim superintendent of schools. According to the coroner's office in Missoula, Tim Sullivan, the 58-year-old Catholic school administrator, apparently killed his estranged wife, Kathy Sullivan, 50, and her boyfriend, Scott Bardsley, thought to be in his late 40s, Sept. 25 in Bardsley's Missoula home. He then apparently committed suicide, using the same gun. "We pray for them and we mourn their loss, especially those of us who are associated with Catholic schools in our diocese," said Bishop Morlino, who was installed as Helena's ninth bishop Sept. 21.

Nuns hid parents of independence leader during Timor violence

DILI, East Timor (CNS) — Nuns hid the parents of East Timorese independence leader Xanana Gusmao in the chapel of a Salesian convent in Dili, East Timor, during weeks of violence by pro-Indonesia militias. Salesian Sister Marlene Bautista of Long Beach, Calif., revealed the ruse Sept. 22. Sister Bautista said the sisters had been sheltering several members of the Gusmao family. Had they been discovered, the independence figures, and possibly the sisters, would have been killed, she said. "A Red Cross doctor examined them today and they're fine. It's funny, because we saw the CNN report saying that he (the father) had died. But we were like, 'No he hasn't; he's right here,'" she said.

Pope, pop stars see eye-to-eye on debt forgiveness

CASTEL GANDOLFO, Italy (CNS) — Pope John Paul II congratulated pop stars, economists and just plain folk who are campaigning for foreign-debt forgiveness. Trying on the bug-like, rose-tinted "fly glasses" of U2 lead singer Bono Sept. 23, the pope put at ease a delegation from Jubilee 2000, an international debt-reduction campaign. The pope and the pop stars said urgent action is needed to make the long-discussed debt relief program a reality. In addition to the Irish singer, the delegation included Harvard economist Jeffery Sachs, Randall Robinson of the Washington-based Trans-Africa organization, producer-singer Quincy Jones, singer and Live Aid organizer Bob Geldof and Latin jazz singer Willie Colon.

Black officials worried multicultural ministry might hurt

ROCHESTER, N.Y. (CNS) — Some African-American Catholic church administrators say they are concerned that an increasingly multicultural approach to church ministry might leave black Catholics without a specific ministry to address their needs. This sentiment was expressed by several administrators in Rochester to attend the annual fall meeting of the National Association of Black Catholic Administrators, held Sept. 15-19 in Rochester and attended by 48 people. The agenda consisted primarily of the association's business concerns and included reports from groups and committees.

Priest says arms give Salvadorans 'perverse sense of security'

SAN SALVADOR (CNS) — Seven years after the civil war ended, Salvadorans are re-arming themselves out of a "perverse sense of security" in the face of rising crime, said a leading Jesuit scholar. "In the 1980s it was a war between the guerrillas and the government. Now, we are at another war of society against itself," said the vice rector of Central American University in San Salvador, Jesuit Father Rodolfo Cardenal. "People think that (criminal) violence can be confronted with more violence, but that only takes us into a trend of never-ending violence."

Trial of Rwandan bishop is trial of the church, bishop says

By CINDY WOODEN
Catholic News Service

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The trial of a Rwandan bishop on charges of complicity in genocide is a trial against the entire Catholic Church in Rwanda, said the vice president of the country's bishops' conference.

The trial of Bishop Augustin Misago of Gikongoro "is a serious event for the church. That a bishop is accused of genocide cannot be considered a banal fact," said Bishop Frederic Rubwejanga of Kibungo, Rwanda.

Bishop Misago was arrested in April on charges that he participated in the wave of ethnically motivated genocide that swept through Rwanda in 1994. At the trial, which began in August, the bishop entered a plea of not guilty.

"If the trial unfolds according to (the criteria of) justice, neither the church nor the bishop will be damaged," Bishop Rubwejanga told Fides, news agency of the Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples.

In an interview published Sept. 23 by Fides, the bishop said, "The church has asked the faithful to pray that everything takes place according to the truth."

The bishop said an obvious question is why the bishop was suddenly accused, arrested and put on trial when five years had passed since the events occurred.

In Rwanda, he said, "there is the habit of confusing the church with its members. That which Christians have done individually is attributed to the church as an institution.

"It is frequently said that the Catholic Church, which has a great number of faithful, played an important role in the genocide, but this argument does not hold up to an attentive examination," Bishop Rubwejanga said.

The bishop said the Catholic Church in Rwanda always has preached reconciliation, which is at the heart of the Gospel. Since the genocide, new efforts have been made to preach forgiveness and unity.

"All of the dioceses have begun an extraordinary synod, which has as its objective that of facing the principal problem, which is ethnocentrism, and trying to uproot it," he said.

Ethnocentrism "was exacerbated by the genocide," he said. "There also is the challenge of justice in a country where human rights have been mocked." ▼

'Real choices':

Funding alternatives to abortion

By NANCY FRAZIER O'BRIEN
Catholic News Service

WASHINGTON (CNS) — It's one thing to talk about abortion as a "choice." It's quite another to offer pregnant women in crisis the financial, social and medical resources they need when they choose to have their baby.

"If today's women need choices, we must offer them real choices," said Rep. Joseph Pitts, R-Pa., at a Sept. 21 press conference on Capitol Hill announcing introduction of the Women and Children's Resources Act, which would establish an $85 million formula grant program for programs which offer women alternatives to abortion.

"If today's women need choices, we must offer them real choices," said Rep. Joseph Pitts, R-Pa., at a Sept. 21 press conference on Capitol Hill announcing introduction of the Women and Children's Resources Act, which would establish an $85 million formula grant program for programs which offer women alternatives to abortion.

The bill is co-sponsored in the House by Rep. Mary Bono, R-Calif., and will be introduced in the Senate by Sen. Rick Santorum, R-Pa.

Santorum said the legislation "offers compassionate, life-affirming choices" and "seeks to reach out to women, particularly low-income women, letting them know that they don't have to face this situation alone."

Bono noted that the legislation will not restrict abortion but will give pregnant women "the information they need to make a choice that is best for them."

In addition, she said, it will "provide funding for important programs and resources that will assist those women who choose to go forward with their pregnancies."

Under terms of the legislation, federal funding would go to states through a formula based on the number of out-of-wedlock births and abortions in the state, compared to the national total. States would distribute the funds directly to crisis pregnancy centers, maternity homes and adoption services on a fee-for-service basis.

Among the services that would be funded by the Women and Children's Resources Act are:

— Testing for pregnancy and follow-up services.

— Adoption information.

— Maternity and baby clothing, food, diapers and other baby items.

— Prenatal and postpartum health care.

— Information and education on fetal development, health and nutritional needs of pregnant and postpartum women, childbirth, parenting, pregnancy during adolescence, substance abuse and sexually transmitted diseases.

— Information, education and counseling on maintaining abstinence from sexual activity.

Only agencies which offer alternatives to abortion would be eligible for the funding, and grant recipients could not promote, refer or counsel for abortion.

— Referrals for other services, items and assistance regarding physical or mental health, food, clothing, housing, education and vocational training.

Low-income women would be given priority for the services, but the grants will not be exclusively means-tested.

Only agencies which offer alternatives to abortion would be eligible for the funding, and grant recipients could not promote, refer or counsel for abortion.

"The Women and Children's Resources Act seeks to improve women's health and offer a woman compassionate choices when she finds herself facing an unplanned pregnancy," Pitts said. "This is legislation that can frankly bring pro-life and pro-choice together to offer real solutions to women — on common ground."

"This is legislation that can frankly bring pro-life and pro-choice together to offer real solutions to women — on common ground."
— Rep. Joseph Pitts, R-Pa.

The legislation is modeled after Pennsylvania's Project Women in Need, or WIN, a statewide network of pregnancy centers, maternity homes and adoption agencies that provides comprehensive, life-affirming alternatives to abortion to pregnant women and assistance to parents with infants.

Pennsylvania now has 90 WIN centers which receive approximately $3.1 million a year from the state Department of Public Welfare. The centers often receive 500 phone calls per week.

Among those speaking in favor of the legislation at the Washington press conference Sept. 21 was Amy Stoner, director of 12 Project WIN sites for Catholic Social Services of the Archdiocese of Philadelphia.

"Because of Project WIN funding, we are now working with a new low-income population of women in southeastern Philadelphia as well as women who are part of the prison population," she said. "We're giving them options they never knew they had and they're actually learning about what is going on with their bodies.

"So many more women are given new choices through funding like this," she added. "I wish every state had the option we have. Millions more women would be served."

But whether the Women and Children's Resources Act becomes law or not, Catholic leaders in the United States have made it clear that their assistance to those in crisis pregnancies will not end.

More than 3,000 emergency pregnancy centers already operate in the United States to help women avoid abortion, and the U.S. bishops estimate that 10 million to 15 million people each year, "including many experiencing distressed pregnancies, turn to Catholic Charities for social and emergency services."

In "Faithful for Life," their reflection for Respect Life Sunday in 1995, the bishops pledged to do whatever they could for pregnant women seeking alternatives to abortion — and to continue that assistance after the child is born.

But whether the Women and Children's Resources Act becomes law or not, Catholic leaders in the United States have made it clear that their assistance to those in crisis pregnancies will not end.

"We repeat together what we have stated individually: no woman in need with a child, born or unborn, whether she is Catholic or not, should feel herself without help," they said. "We pledge the heart and hands of the church to help mothers and fathers in need to find pregnancy counseling, pre- and postnatal care, housing and material support, and adoption services." ▼

Aida Chaves said that without a social security number they cannot have savings or checking accounts and, in many banks, cannot rent storage boxes. She said those who had saved money either had to take it with them when they fled the storm or risk its loss.

"These people will not have another chance," said Chaves. "There are no fields to work on. Tobacco is gone. Corn is gone. Everything is gone."

Father Murphy told of how his parish had come together. They had agreed to reach out to other faith communities that may have lost their buildings. St. Catherine's could be their home while they recovered.

He had no doubt they would recover. Father Murphy saw signs of that recovery among his own people already as they searched for a deeper meaning to what otherwise could be just senseless destruction.

Father Murphy suggested the need to enter into reflection and prayer. "People are trying to respond to a lot of needs and a lot of feelings; unexpected difficulties and challenges."

The Scriptures and quiet reflection, he said, offer the opportunity to make some connection with God's mystery. There is "nourishment there," said Father Murphy.

"I am finding a tremendous call to charity. People are coming together in difficult situations.

"People are being called by charity to respond to one another and they are doing so." The community is putting aside differences and reaching out to one another, said Father Murphy.

"I think that must be an indication that a lot of our people are praying and are in touch with God." ▼

Pastoral administrator becomes shelter director and housing expert in matter of hours

By Matt Doyle
NC Catholic Staff

WILLIAMSTON — What happens when the shelters are full? In at least one case, the victims of Hurricane Floyd often find themselves in the homes of Good Samaritans in eastern North Carolina.

Immaculate Heart of Mary Sister Kieran Williams, pastoral administrator of Holy Trinity Church, was one of those Good Samaritans several times over. Most recently on Sept. 24, she took in 12 people who had nowhere else to go.

According to Sister Kieran, she received a call from the American Red Cross about a few Hispanic families and several single men who needed help in finding housing. Her short-term solution was to bring the people to her home and the church.

The Red Cross and National Guard provided the necessary bedding for the adults and the children; she shared what she had in her home. Four single men were housed in a living area of the church.

At the height of the storm recovery, Sister Kieran had given away just about all the food she had in her possession, including her personal items. But thanks to help from a parishioner who wants to remain anonymous, the stocks were replenished.

So, on Friday night, the displaced became family at Sister Kieran's table. "That went well, thank God. There was plenty of food."

"When I got back to my home, everyone pitched in and helped and we prepared dinner for that evening. We prayed together. We had our meal together."

Sister Kieran said they visited together, but the people were tired. She said it was the first time in days the people had beds to sleep in.

The next day, she was able to make connections in Tarboro and secured a place for all but two of her guests. The remaining two went their own way to find friends.

With the help of the National Guard, the visitors to Holy Trinity were transported to Tarboro. Sister Kieran said the people were certain they would be able to obtain work there.

At the height of the storm recovery, Sister Kieran had given away just about all the food she had in her possession, including her personal items.

Many of the people with whom Sister Kieran has worked since the storm struck have been those who were airlifted from their rooftops by helicopters in the days following Hurricane Floyd. Others were flown into Williamston as shelters in their home areas filled quickly.

Their lives have been filled with uncertainty. That kind of uncertainty remains for many.

On Nov. 7, Sister Kieran will be installed as pastoral administrator of Bishop Gossman finds 'vibrant' spirit in Greenville

By JOHN STRANGE
NC Catholic Staff

GREENVILLE — Bishop F. Joseph Gossman visited flood-ravaged Greenville Saturday, Sept. 25, and came away with a reaffirmation of the human spirit.

"Many people were quick to tell you that they lost everything," said Bishop Gossman. "But they were just as quick to thank God for their lives."

But all is far from well in Greenville, one of hundreds of communities hit hard by Hurricane Floyd.

At a stop at Catholic Social Ministries in Greenville, Bishop Gossman observed about 20 different groups seeking assistance, all within a span of a half an hour.

"I was really impressed at how organized CSM was," said Bishop Gossman. The offices were divided into rooms and sections containing dozens of bottles of water, cleaning supplies, food, clothing, personal items. "There was a huge trailer in the back," the bishop said. "They didn't have any more room."

After their visit with CSM, a U.S. Army helicopter from nearby Ft. Bragg arrived to ferry the bishop, several diocesan staff members along with a CSM volunteer to Wellcome Middle School on the outskirts of Greenville, where more than 500 people have been sheltered since the storm.

In the seven-minute ride, Bishop Gossman said, the chopper flew over the still-submerged Greenville airport, the closed US-13, and dozens of homes that were like islands in the river.

Bishop Gossman and the others walked the hallways talking with the refugees, Javier and Kathy Castillos and others providing translation for those who spoke only Spanish. Children played basketball while some adults lay on the floor and tried to nap. Many people lounged outside in the sun. A medical crew was set up at the entrance, offering tetanus shots to visitors like a bank offers lollipops to children.

"Most of the people living there were very concerned about where are they going to go when the shelter closes," Bishop Gossman said. Most of the Spanish-speaking residents were sure that their homes, most of them in trailer parks, had been destroyed or heavily damaged. Bishop Gossman said that they were caught between wanting to leave the shelter, and wanting to stay.

"Many people were quick to tell you that they lost everything, but they were just as quick to thank God for their lives."
— Bishop F. Joseph Gossman of Raleigh

"One woman told me that they were going to sleep in their car," the bishop said. Others told him they had lost their jobs. Flooded farms and businesses had no work for them.

"We're going to do our best to help them," the bishop pledged.

An hour later a helicopter arrived to drop off elderly cancer patients who had received radiation treatments at a Greenville hospital. The bishop and the others were flown back to CSM. The bishop later celebrated an outdoor Mass for about 40 people at a nearby home. ▼

Holy Trinity. She said she plans to have a party to celebrate not her installation, but the people of the parish. She intends to invite the Red Cross and the National Guard with whom she has forged close bonds.

Noting that the recovery from Floyd is long term, Sister Kieran said she hoped those offering help and support now will continue to do so.

The storm experience has been more than just one of service. Sister Kieran was forced into a shelter the night of the storm, which offered her several chances to minister to the people in the area.

As she was leaving her home, she secured church documents and packed up the ciborium, her Bible and her guitar and headed for a local school. While she was there, she joined with the people of the shelter in a prayer service and read from Scripture the story of how Jesus calmed the storm.

Sister Kieran was excited about her ability to be a "pastoral presence" in the middle of the of the hectic hours that were part of Hurricane Floyd. She called it a "grace to be able to be that for the people."

In order to maintain that pastoral presence, Sister Kieran said it is important to minister to one's own spiritual needs on a regular basis. She said thanks to the members of the local ministerial group and her own community of sisters, she is able to draw on a great "source of spiritual nourishment." ▼

Eileen Marx's "Weaving Faith & Family" helps families seeking more Christian life

REVIEWED BY MARY KENNY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Eileen Marx's "Weaving Faith & Family" is a pleasant surprise. Books abound offering prayers and activities for families according to the church year. In my many years of raising a family, I found most of them a disappointment — material that never seemed to fit our family's need for religious expression, too-long prayers and readings, bored, fidgety kids with their minds and hearts clearly elsewhere. We pretty much gave up on such books.

Marx's book is different. It presents a chapter for each of four weeks in each month, 48 in all, following the seasons, events in our society and the church year. Rather than present a canned generic activity for all families, Marx offers many ways to personalize each week to fit your own family.

Each chapter opens with a theme. December, of course, is devoted to Advent, but June begins with gardens and July with Independence Day. Some themes can be selected out of season when appropriate, such as the first week of January, which is concerned with moving and establishing community. Social concerns are frequently addressed. The themes suggest specific action which families might take in the face of problems such as violence, racism, sickness, homelessness.

In addition to appropriate Scripture references and the author's personal reflection on the theme, each chapter offers easy-to-find sidebars. "What Can a Family Do?" suggests specific actions for individuals or families. Each chapter offers interesting books and video suggestions, both books for parents to read with children and books for adults. A sidebar on "Conversation Starters" includes questions which might enliven a family meal.

Finally, each chapter concludes with a short and appropriate prayer — some traditional, some written for the occasion, some from other sources both Christian and non-Christian. All are simple, fairly short and expressive of the week's theme.

My only problem with this book is the suggestion in the title that a family's spiritual formation can be sandwiched into a few spare minutes in a busy life. Of course, time is at a premium for almost all families today, and a prayer life on the run has marketing appeal. And yet ...

Part of the appeal of this book is that the author offers many different suggestions, allowing opportunities for families to adapt the material according their own interests, ages, and situation in life. But reading, thinking, and praying over these ideas still require time. True, the sidebar format allows the reader to quickly select one section each week. Perhaps some families would use only the "Conversation Starters," and that only occasionally during a meal or a ride in the car. However, to really present ideas which will challenge and change family members will require preparation: reading, thought, prayer.

Rather than view this book as a way to think and pray on the run, I would see it as an idea book, an inspiring book which will promote some worthwhile reflection and perhaps make your family more caring, more aware of social wrongs, more Christian. To achieve such lofty goals takes time and effort, but it is time and effort well spent.

Recommended for families seeking ways to live a more Christian life as a family. ▼

The phone call was from my parish asking if I wanted to be put on the upcoming roster for lectors and eucharistic ministers. "I know you'll be moving soon," Shirlee said, "but do you want to serve for the weeks you will still be here?" I hesitated briefly and then said that no, it would be simpler all round if my name was not included. I put down the phone and then I wept.

I realized at that moment how deeply my roots were planted at Holy Spirit Parish and how difficult it was going to be to leave and say goodbye.

This was a community with whom I had worshiped for two decades, one that I know and they know me. I had prayed and wept with them, celebrated, worked, struggled and played with them. They had surrounded me with loving care during the hard times; they had challenged me, at times exasperated me, and always stretched me.

My reflections went further. I remembered that when I had first come to the parish almost 21 years ago it had been as one of a family of six. Now I was leaving alone.

My four children were grown and gone, my husband had died. The many years of living and loving as man and wife and mother had been rich, busy, and they passed so swiftly. Facing the present reality of my life as a single woman who had sold the family home and was moving on was something I had never envisaged. Today's first reading and the Gospel passage address that kind of reality. They speak of control vs. letting go, of clutching vs. holding lightly.

For all the years of my Christian maturing I had known and given assent to the belief that life itself and everything in it were gifts from God, given to us to cherish, develop and enjoy — for a time, a limited time. Now that assent had a whole new dimension.

As I faced the parting from my dear community, I confronted again the parting from my children as they reached adulthood and, most especially, the parting from my husband in death. This time my assent was not just from my head. It came from deep within me, from a heart shaped by the experience of love, suffering and grief for which I cannot find words. ▼

New at the box office

NEW YORK (CNS) — The following are capsule reviews of movies recently reviewed by the U.S. Catholic Conference Office for Film and Broadcasting.

"Blue Streak" (Columbia)

Routine action-comedy in which a thief (Martin Lawrence) passes himself off as an Los Angeles police detective in order to get access to headquarters where he's stashed a $17 million diamond. Director Les Mayfield's cliche-ridden movie and Lawrence's comic mugging don't improve a movie where the thief is seen as a hero who deserves his instant millionaire status after escaping with police complicity. Justification of a major crime, some violence, coarse sexual references, occasional profanity and an instance of rough language. The U.S. Catholic Conference classification is O — morally offensive. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is PG-13 — parents are strongly cautioned that some material may be inappropriate for children under 13.

"Double Jeopardy" (Paramount)

Sleek thriller in which a probation officer (Tommy Lee Jones) chases a parolee (Ashley Judd) across the country to prevent her from murdering the two-timing husband (Bruce Greenwood) who framed her. Director Bruce Beresford's straightforward fugitive story maintains suspense without relying single-mindedly on the expected revenge motive. Some violence, a shadowy sexual encounter and intermittent profanity and rough language. The U.S. Catholic Conference classification is A-III — adults. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is R — restricted.

PBS special documents effect of parents' words on children

By GERRI PARE
Catholic News Service

NEW YORK (CNS) — The effect parents' words and example have on their youngsters becomes clear as four families are profiled in "The Children Are Watching," airing Friday, Oct. 8, 10-11 p.m. EDT on PBS.

The special is introduced by actress Jane Seymour, who introduces the four troubled teen-agers who are the focus of the program, which delves into how the parents' behaviors became part of the problem.

Sixteen-year-old Shannon lived with his divorced, addicted mom the first 12 years of his life until his father got full custody and imposed discipline that the boy rejected, turning instead to getting high with his school buddy.

The segment includes a tough-love type confrontation as the father stays locked in the bathroom with his son for hours on end until the boy finally agrees to give him a urine sample — which tests positive for marijuana.

Shannon had been dealing with feeling unloved and rejected by both parents for years, but near-daily counseling for both dad and son has brought them to a more honest relationship with real hope for the future.

In the second segment, a mother, Vanessa, recognizes that her daughter, Antoinette, 14, is repeating her own mistakes. Vanessa takes steps to correct the negative behavior pattern.

Vanessa's parents divorced, her mother beat her and she turned to drugs and prostitution. Then as a mother Vanessa too was abusive to her children and husbands and now sees an angry Antoinette is behaving the same way toward the younger siblings she must baby-sit daily.

An anger management therapist intervened and mother and daughter were able to begin to analyze what needed changing. Vanessa curtailed her seven-days-a-week work schedule to spend more time with her children — especially Antoinette, who found herself no longer angry all the time. With new attitudes, each hopes to bond from now on rather than constantly rail at each other in aggressive, hurtful ways.

An indulgent dad who loved driving fast and gifted his son with a high-speed car on his 16th birthday learns that his example could have cost lives in the third scenario.

When young Adam took a turn at 70 mph and nearly hit a woman he laughed it off, but she reported the scary incident to the police and pressed a reckless driving charge.

"The Children Are Watching"
Oct. 8, 10:00 p.m.
on PBS

This proved to be a favor to Adam and his parents, who were forced to rethink how they let Adam on the road without sufficient maturity to handle a potentially deadly machine, and Adam discovered he is accountable for his actions.

The final segment is less uplifting in that the mother, who had been emotionally abused by numerous men in her life, seems unable to set boundaries for her teen daughter, Miranda.

The mother allowed Miranda to move her addict boyfriend into the girl's bedroom, and arguments over terminating Miranda's pregnancy were only resolved by a miscarriage.

Miranda's father was alcoholic and threw wife and child out when Miranda was 9. As a result, Miranda never trusted men but also fears she will repeat her mother's pattern of intimate relationships with abusive men. Counseling suggests that Miranda has a real problem trusting her mother, but she actually comes off as the more mature of the troubled twosome.

Seymour's closing admonition that parents need to focus on their children's needs more than their own would seem self-evident, but these dramatic examples of children profoundly affected by their parents' behaviors underscores this warning. ▼

Nazareth House to educate, heal women and families

By ALESHA M. PRICE
Staff Writer

ASHEVILLE — When women from various parishes in the Asheville area joined together as the group Guadalupe: Catholics for Life, the original idea was to "use prayer and education for the culture of life," according to Pat Glass, founder of the organization.

"We prayed the rosary in front of the two abortion clinics, at that time, held programs and workshops every month, and gave out brochures about the negative side of abortion," continued Glass.

They used the "power of prayer" for the first six years of the group's existence; in 1996, one of the members had the idea that the group should change its focus. So, they became a non-profit organization, and within the last few years, they have decided to offer basic Christian teaching on marriage. Thus, Nazareth House was born.

Today, their mission is clear — to prevent abortions from happening through education about Christian marriage.

The name of the first organization, Guadalupe, is taken from the image of the Virgin Mary as she appeared to Juan Diego, and the name "Nazareth House" comes from the Holy Family.

"They are the perfect example of a happy and holy family," stated Glass.

Many are not familiar with the concept of "Christian marriage" nowadays. Basically, it involves natural family planning, chastity before marriage, and a dedication to God, she said.

"We began to see that the abortion issue, though always heartbreaking, as the result and not the problem itself," explained Glass. "We feel our mission is to make the church's teaching on marriage clear so that people will not have to suffer."

Helen Gordon, who is involved with sidewalk counseling in front of the now single abortion clinic and one of the original members of Guadalupe, talked about the need for Christian marriage: "I've spent many years doing sidewalk counseling, and I will continue to be there for women at that time of crisis. However, we need to bring the teachings of Christian marriage to the public so that the tragedy of abortion can be prevented."

Glass said, "Marriage is God's will. It should be a grace-filled and holy time. The great ends of marriage, which is permanent, should be life and love."

People have volunteered to go through the training process in order to help with post-abortion counseling, teaching the public on the church's teachings about marriage and family, and offering written and visual information about chastity and natural family planning.

Natural family planning, unlike the rhythm method based on the theory that all women have the same cycle, uses the idea that changes in a woman's body dictate the chance and time for pregnancy.

"So many parents did not have the benefit of teaching on Christian marriage," said Gordon. "People must understand not just the mechanics but how it brings mutuality, unity, and joy back into raising children who are at the heart of natural family planning."

Glass' hope is that they can touch many lives with Nazareth House, and she wants to remain in touch with the public on a consistent basis.

"Volunteers choose the church parishes they want to contact. We will also try to stay in touch with the media, church communities, Catholic and non-Catholic, and the surrounding community," said Glass.

Another aspect of the organization is to also educate women about the medical and social information they never hear, such as, the dangers of the birth control pill, the emotional, spiritual, and possible physical hazards of abortion, and the low divorce rate from natural family planning.

Glass said, "Abortion is the result of people not knowing or not being aware of Christian marriage."

"Christian marriage liberates people to live fully and joyously in Christ," added Gordon. ▼

Trivia 2000: Young will have plenty of activities in Rome

By LYNNE WEIL
Catholic News Service

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Young people on pilgrimages to Rome next year will not lack jubilee-related things to do in the evenings.

The Vatican is assuring that the youthful faithful will have lots of alternatives to the Italian capital's usual night life.

At 6 p.m. every Monday through Friday, a church near St. Peter's Square will hold meetings for prayer, Bible reading, singing and giving witness.

In the square every Wednesday night at 9, young people will be invited to pray together.

Thursday nights might find them in the Basilica of St. Agnes on one of Rome's most popular public gathering points, Piazza Navona. There, special Masses for the young are to be held from 9 p.m. to midnight, and multilingual priests are to be on hand to hear confessions.

Starting this October, a special advice service for the young is to be made available via the Vatican's Central Committee for the Great Jubilee of the Year 2000 — which also was the source of inspiration for the evening programs for young pilgrims.

To keep track of these and other events, the young can take to the airwaves. Vatican Radio is planning to air "Radio Jubilee Youth," a two-and-a-half-hour show in several languages, produced by and for young people, every afternoon of the year 2000. ▼

Faith Formation Office welcomes two regional coordinators

By JIMMY ROSTAR
Associate Editor

CHARLOTTE — The Diocese of Charlotte's Office of Faith Formation recently welcomed two new regional faith formation coordinators to its staff.

Franciscan Sister Bernadette Svatos has been hired as coordinator for the Northern Region, while Marylin Kravatz will serve as coordinator for the Southern Region. Both bring a wealth of experience to the diocesan office, which is charged with assisting in the faith journey of young people and adults throughout western North Carolina.

Sister Svatos

"I think it's what I'm about," said Sister Bernadette of her role as a catechist. "As a Franciscan, I feel that is what Francis lived: evangelization and bringing the Good News to others."

Based in Greensboro, Sister Bernadette reaches out to parish catechetical leaders and catechists in the Greensboro and Winston-Salem vicariates. She said she promotes support and cooperation between men and women there involved in the church's catechetical mission, all the while seeking ways to enhance and expand that outreach.

Sister Bernadette's previous service includes pastoral ministry and teaching, including four years in Japan teaching English and three years in Kenya working with a religious community called the Little Sisters of St. Francis.

In the realm of religious education and faith formation, she has served as director of religious education at the diocesan, regional and parish levels in a number western United States dioceses, taught catechetics and served in the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults process in parishes, and did consultant work for a publisher of religious education materials.

Sister Bernadette holds master's degrees in pastoral theology and catechetics, and in Franciscan studies and spirituality.

Like Sister Bernadette, Marylin Kravatz is responsible for serving as an advocate to the parish catechetical leaders in her region. The Southern Region is composed of the Charlotte, Albemarle and Salisbury vicariates.

Kravatz

"I will work with the parishes in implementing the latest in catechetical models, make sure diocesan guidelines are carried out, and basically help in any way I can from my experience to help them implement their programs," she said.

With 25 years in various forms of catechetical ministry within the Archdiocese of New York — along with five years of administrative work in that field — Kravatz has experienced the process of faith formation through parish and diocesan ministry to teens and adults.

"I strongly believe in handing on the faith, not only to children but to everyone," she said. "What I find most satisfying is to see God working through all of this; I've been privileged to see it happen."

Kravatz holds a master's degree in religious studies with a concentration in parish ministry. She lives in Charlotte with husband Michael, and is the mother of five children: Michael, Matthew, Mary Beth, Mark and Marisa.

Ongoing catechist formation is important, both coordinators agreed, and regional gatherings that bring parish leaders together are a regular part of the calendar. Both added that playing a role in the church's catechetical mission is a calling they feel blessed to have.

There are four faith formation regions in the Diocese of Charlotte, each headed by a coordinator and encompassing certain vicariates. The coordinators work closely with the diocesan Office of Faith Formation. ▼

try of origin, or age. Currently the organization provides bilingual services to at least 50 percent of their clients, Sister Marie estimated. "I would say every other phone call requires bilingual response," she said. "Mostly Spanish, but we do serve people from countries such as Ethiopia, Sweden, Ireland, and the Ukraine."

Agency services include: assistance to newcomers to the community with language barriers; family counseling in many areas of personal need; pregnancy support; refugee and immigration support; and adoption assistance, both domestic and international.

Explaining their policy about counseling, she said, "We do family counseling for people who are capable of self change. They include those with developmental problems, grief problems, issues of sexual abuse in their past, domestic violence issues with women."

Western Regional services reach 17 counties, roughly in a circumference that starts at the north side in the vicinity of Boone and reaches clockwise to Morganton, Tryon, and around to Murphy. The agency often collaborates with other social agencies in outlying towns.

Grooming up for the new millennium

Noted author address educators, catechists

By ALESHA M. PRICE
Staff Writer

HICKORY — Most of his younger students in his faith formation classes have known him as "Tom." Many have not even aware that he wrote the books being used in their class. This is a contrast from Dr. Thomas H. Groome, professor of theology and religious education at Boston College, who many faith formation teachers and catechists from across the diocese came to hear speak on his teaching methods and his ideas from his latest book "Educating for Life: A Spiritual Vision for Every Teacher and Parent."

On Sept. 25, catechists assembled at St. Aloysius Church for a presentation from Dr. Groome, "Sharing our Catholic Faith: Teaching as Jesus Did for a New Millennium." Through anecdotes, excerpts from his book, references to biblical passages, overhead projection, and group discussion, he introduced his idea in two parts, "How do we teach" and "What do we teach."

One day earlier at St. Gabriel School in Charlotte, he held a session with educators and administrators on the importance of Catholic schools in the new millennium.

Director of Religious Formation for Schools Mercy Sister Maureen Meehan said "[at the Charlotte session], he made us realize that we are not angels; we are human beings who have to develop our spiritual and mental lives in order to develop the children's academic and spiritual lives. We are called to be witnesses to God's plan for us, and we have to deliver that message in the teaching of our children."

During both sessions, Dr. Groome's basic idea was, "you as catechists are not bringing God to their lives; God is always there. You have to show them how to uncover Him, to stop and listen and to tell stories from the tradition."

During his talk in Hickory, he engaged his audience through questions and answer sessions and discussion much like he and many professors conduct their seminar college classes. The first question was, "How do you imagine the way Jesus taught; what was His teaching style?"

After many responses, which included "authoritatively," "familiarity with his audience," and "conversation," he summed up the answers into his theme for the day: "From life to faith; from faith to life."

Theresa Watkins, a reconciliation and first Communion teacher at St. Benedict the Moor who traveled from Winston-Salem, said, "I am still learning, and every opportunity to learn something is an opportunity for me to come closer to the Lord and answer His call."

"My hope is that we will always try to teach as Jesus taught," said Dr. Groome. "His way of teaching was to begin with people's lives, to bring them from their life to the faith tradition to His preaching of the Gospel, and to invite them to bring that Gospel back to their life again."

He told his audience to take note of the manner of Jesus' teaching and to model their own teaching after His style. The concept for catechists to remember, he said, is to use personal stories and relate them to Christian faith through discussion and reading.

Tonya Byerely, a second-grade faith formation teacher, from Christ the King in High Point, said, "I want to learn and have more insight on how to teach in the new millennium. I think he [Dr. Groome] is very resourceful and insightful and that Jesus is really using him as an instrument to teach a new way."

What it means to be Catholic in today's society was a secondary key point that Dr. Groome wanted the group to understand in order for them to teach their students. He gave the participants an opportunity to use ideas from their own experience of Catholicism and personal ideas over the years to demonstrate the importance of the theme.

"The content was excellent, and he brought a deep knowledge of theology and church tradition that enriched his presentation," said Jack Neerincx from St. Michael Church in Gastonia. ▼

New director takes development post at BMHS

By JIMMY ROSTAR
Associate Editor

WINSTON-SALEM — Bishop McGuinness High School continues its 40th birthday celebration this year with the announcement of a new director of development and public relations.

Edward C. Mitchell has joined the staff of Bishop McGuinness with a background in marketing and fund-raising. The owner of a marketing company in the Triad for the past six years, Mitchell said he sought a new professional challenge.

Mitchell

"I was really looking for something in the Catholic Church or school," said Mitchell, a parishioner of Our Lady of Grace Church in nearby Greensboro.

Mitchell has served as chairperson of the Twin Parish Committee, dedicated to promoting financial, educational, and spiritual relations between Our Lady of Grace Church and Our Lady of the Assumption Church in Kharkov, Ukraine. He's also coordinated a host of other fund-raising and volunteer projects for the parish and its affiliated school.

At Bishop McGuinness, Mitchell's primary charge is overseeing the annual fund drive, set to begin this month. But that is one of many responsibilities he will take on as the office expands. For one, he will serve as a liaison for the Home School Association, a duty newly introduced to the office of development.

As the school community flourishes, Mitchell said, he hopes to touch on areas of development that haven't been tapped before. "We really need to reach out to the community and keep them involved — and the students involved," he added.

He said he sees his new position as one that involves the cooperation and enthusiasm of the entire school family.

"If you get the spirit up and you get people involved and thinking positively — that we should help our neighbors, and work with people, and make an effort — then the whole place will explode," he said. "We've got excellent students, wonderful faculty and terrific parents here. We're in for a good time."

George Repass, principal at Bishop McGuinness, noted Mitchell's excitement. "He's a living example of the kind of spirit that we like to associate with this place," he said. "It's been an incredibly good fit from the start." ▼

New hues: St. Peter's Basilica restoration stirs debate

By JOHN THAVIS
Catholic News Service

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Restoration projects in Rome often leave critics aghast at the bleached appearance of churches and monuments, whose white travertine marble can come out looking like Styrofoam.

But when the front of St. Peter's Basilica was unveiled in September after more than two years of cleaning, jaws dropped for the opposite reason: The facade emerged in two tones, white and ochre, with decorations in red and green around the central benediction loggia.

"Technicolor!" screamed a newspaper headline.

"A betrayal," argued a leading architectural critic.

"Nice," said most of the tourists and pilgrims who came to view the new, dynamic aspect of the world's largest church.

The basilica's new coloration was probably the best-kept secret in Rome over the last few years, as experts worked under shrouded tubular scaffolding that hid every square inch of the bigger-than-a-football-field facade.

In more than a hundred samples taken from the strata of grime that covered the marble, the restorers discovered the ochre-colored pigmentation at the bottom, and more colors around the loggia. Was this the original appearance when the facade was completed by Carlo Moderno in 1612?

The Vatican head of the project, Sandro Benedetti, did some research. He found that in a 17th-century painting of St. Peter's the two-tone look clearly stood out, but not in later depictions. He surmised that rain and weathering had slowly washed the colors away.

Benedetti also discovered a written order for dozens of paint brushes placed by the architect Moderno at the end of his work — a clinching piece of evidence for the Vatican team.

The experts found that the red and green tint around the balcony was a later addition, probably by a pope who wanted to accentuate the spot from which he read pronouncements and blessed the crowd.

In Italy, all this would have provoked endless public debate about how — or whether — to proceed with the restoration. In the Vatican, behind the scaffolding, a decision was made: Go for it. The facade would wear its original make-up.

In reality, the "colorized" version of St. Peter's is hardly Technicolor. The hues are subtle. Colored marble dust was washed on, not actual paint. The effect, however, is dramatic: The once-austere facade has 3-D depth and a new warmth that pleases most observers.

Red and green hues frame the window of the central benediction loggia on St. Peter's Basilica. The newly restored facade surprised many when it was revealed with a splash of color.

"I like it better this way. It's not so severe," said Eva Kopp, an Austrian living in Rome.

"I think it's spectacular. If you compare it to the inside, with all the different colored marble, it makes sense," said Glen Hoffmann of Austin, Texas.

Jim Ambrosio, a tourist from New Jersey, gazed up at the church and pronounced it "impressive — the two tones really makes it stand out."

The main critic of the restoration, Carlo Bertelli, was unswayed by the overwhelming public approval. He called it "beautification" and said the basilica looked like something out of "Hansel and Gretel." Sure it's pleasing to the modern eye, he said, but are people sure the architect or his 17th-century patron, Pope Paul V, were aiming at that kind of visual charm?

Bertelli said the facade seemed recast as a multicolored backdrop for TV broadcasts, especially during the many papal events of Holy Year 2000.

No doubt Bertelli has not been invited to the gala blessing of the new facade by Pope John Paul II Sept. 30, to be followed by a televised gala featuring fireworks and a sung "Te Deum" of thanksgiving.

According to Cardinal Virgilio Noe, who manages the Basilica of St. Peter's, the pope said he liked the restoration job. Papal taste is not infallible, but the pope may have given this more thought than most — he has a room with a bird's-eye view of the facade. ▼

CSS Refugee Resettlement Office receives national grant

BY JOANN S. KEANE
EDITOR

CHARLOTTE — The Catholic Social Services Refugee Resettlement Office has been awarded more than $1 million from the U.S. Department of Labor, in the form of a federal grant earmarked for programs that help the hardest-to-employ refugee welfare recipients.

"We are very pleased," said Cira Ponce, director of CSS' Refugee Resettlement Office. The office was one of 64 grant recipients nationwide. Representing the third round of a two-year $711.5 million grant competition, the grants encourage communities to develop new, results-oriented training for clients.

The 64 grants awarded are for projects that target distinctive categories of recipients or providers. In Charlotte, it will be a continuation of helping refugee clients obtain and upgrade to better jobs. "This will allow us to increase the numbers in terms of clients we can now serve," said Ponce. Specifically, the $1,086,006 will also be used for programs already proven, including vocational skills training and teaching English as a second language. Most of the funds will pay for on-the-job training for refugees receiving welfare benefits.

"The competitive grants encourage communities to build partnerships and be innovative in their approach to helping welfare recipients become employed," said Alexis M. Herman, secretary of labor, in a press release. "The money may be used for support services ... which can make all the difference."

Since the mid-'70s, the Refugee Resettlement Office has guided re-

Charleston Diocese welcomes new bishop

BY NANCY SCHWERIN
THE NEW CATHOLIC MISCELLANY

CHARLESTON — The Diocese of Charleston received its new shepherd in grand scale Sept. 29, amidst a sea of faithful — 3,000 strong — who traveled by the busload to welcome Bishop Robert J. Baker.

The North Charleston Convention Center was the site of the largest gathering of Catholics in the state since Pope John Paul II's visit in 1987. The reverent ceremony, while sustaining its long-standing traditions, was immersed with joy and excitement.

Just as the crowd settled, the impressive procession began. Four archbishops, 20 bishops, nearly 200 priests from Florida and South Carolina, and a crew of seminarians preceded Bishop Baker, who walked through his soon-to-be flock with his usual warm smile — a gesture of hope and optimism that remained in place throughout the ceremony.

The room grew still as the Mil-

NCCB official praises passage of fetal protection bill

WASHINGTON (CNS) — An official of the U.S. bishops' Secretariat for Pro-Life Activities praised legislation passed by the House Sept. 30 that would make it a crime to harm or kill a fetus in the womb. Helen Alvare, director of planning and information for the pro-life secretariat, said the Unborn Victims of Violence Act that passed with a 254-172 vote "embodies simple justice by extending federal protection to defenseless victims of violent crimes." The legislation protects unborn children whose mothers are physically assaulted, maimed or murdered. It is the first such measure proposed at the federal level.

Vatican, Israeli officials discuss Nazareth conflict

JERUSALEM (CNS) — The Vatican ambassador to Israel met with Israeli Public Security Minister Shlomo Ben Ami to express concern about the ongoing conflict over proposed construction of a mosque in front of the Basilica of the Annunciation in Nazareth. Archbishop Pietro Sambi, Vatican nuncio to Israel and Cyprus and apostolic delegate in Jerusalem and Palestine, told the British news agency Reuters Oct. 4: "The Vatican has expressed its opposition. If a mosque is needed, very well. But not in that place."

'Golden age' of families a myth, historian-author tells conference

LOUISVILLE, Ky. (CNS) — The 1950s as a "golden age" of U.S. families is a myth, historian and author Stephanie Coontz told 240 family life ministers in Louisville. It is time to quit romanticizing about the '50s, she said, referring to the idealized families seen on TV in "Father Knows Best" and "The Adventures of Ozzie & Harriet." "The reality is there has never been a 'golden age' in this country when families could protect their members from such things as racism, economic problems and violence," she said.

Controversial art exhibit draws protesters, record attendance

BROOKLYN, N.Y. (CNS) — Hundreds of protesters were on hand Oct. 2 when the Brooklyn Museum of Art opened its "Sensation" exhibition of contemporary British works that included a painting of Mary with elephant dung and cutouts from pornographic photos on it. The Catholic League for Religious and Civil Rights, the Knights of Columbus and the Conservative Party of New York were organizations taking a leading role in the protest. As protesters held signs denouncing the exhibition, listened to speakers calling it "blasphemous" and "obscene" and prayed the rosary, a long line of people waited to get in to see what the controversy was about.

Sources say Vatican to make Kosovo its own diocese

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Vatican plans to make Kosovo, currently administered by the Skopje Diocese in Macedonia, a free-standing diocese, said sources in Rome. Auxiliary Bishop Marko Sopi, who ministers to Kosovo's 60,000 mainly ethnic Albanian Catholics from the southern city of Prizren, was to be the new diocese's bishop, the sources said. No timetable was given for the planned changes. "It's something I do expect to happen," Archbishop Rrok Mirdita told Catholic News Service in an Oct. 4 telephone interview from his residence in Tirana, Albania.

Mexican church works with other agencies after quake, flooding

MEXICO CITY (CNS) — The Mexican church's relief agency, Caritas, worked with other groups and government agencies to provide food, aid and shelter to victims of the country's recent earthquake and floods. The Archdiocese of Mexico City announced Oct. 3 it would channel its aid through Caritas Mexico, and that it would include medicine, food and cash for the rebuilding of homes. On Oct. 1, Cardinal Norberto Rivera Carrera of Mexico City issued a message of consolation and support for people in the Federal District and six states who suffered in the aftermath of the earthquake.

Clinton pledges to forgive poorest nations' debts

WASHINGTON (CNS) — President Clinton pledged Sept. 29 to cancel all U.S.-held debts of the world's poorest countries if they use the savings to "finance basic human needs." "The pledge has major symbolic and political significance," said Lydia Williams, policy adviser of Oxfam America, the U.S. branch of an international network of aid agencies. She said it could lead to a chain reaction of other creditor nations boosting their debt forgiveness for poor countries from 90 percent to 100 percent.

Scandals within church cannot erase its goodness, says archbishop

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Scandals within the Catholic Church and the sinfulness of church members cannot be allowed to erase every trace of good that church personnel have done, an Irish archbishop said. "A just interpretation of the past requires acknowledgment of wrongs and the need for change, but a generous acknowledgment of integrity and achievement as well," Archbishop Desmond Connell of Dublin told the European synod. Speaking Oct. 2, the archbishop said, "As members of Christ's body, we benefit from goodness in the lives of our brothers and sisters, but we also suffer on account of their sins."

Indonesian official: East Timor violence not directed at church

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Despite reports that Catholics were being systematically slaughtered in East Timor, Indonesia's ambassador to the Holy See said the violence had no religious element and would not affect his country's relations with the Vatican. "I understand that there have been some very sad incidents, but the violence is not immediately directed at the Catholic Church," Irawan Abidin told Catholic News Service in a Sept. 30 telephone interview from Jakarta, Indonesia's capital.

Semi-annual rosary service joins families together in prayer

By ALESHA M. PRICE
Staff Writer

CHARLOTTE — "The rosary is a powerful and meditative prayer," said Teresa Sanctis, on the occasion of St. Vincent de Paul Church parish's 47th semi-annual International Family Rosary Day on October 3.

"I have always had a great devotion to the Blessed Mother, and if there is anything I can do to bring others to her, that is important because she leads you to the Blessed Sacrament."

— Kathleen Potter

Sanctis joined with others from the parish along with other area churches to the bi-annual service.

St. Vincent parishioners have been holding their own version of the rosary march service to accommodate older participants since 1976 and have been inviting other churches to participate. The first service was held at Charlotte Catholic High School in the football field.

Kathleen Potter has been the coordinator since the beginning, along with help from Sally Connelly, Dana Bean, and Nettie Bruck.

"People were not saying the rosary back then, and this was a way to encourage people to come back to the tradition of a devotion to the Blessed Mother," said Potter. "I have always had a great devotion to the Blessed Mother, and if there is anything I can do to bring others to her, that is important because she leads you to the Blessed Sacrament."

The rosary has its origins in the 12th century reportedly deriving from the Dominicans. Because of a Christian military victory from a focused continent-wide prayer of the rosary in late-1500s Europe, Pope Gregory XIII later declared the first Sunday in October to be the feast of Our Lady of the Holy Rosary to commemorate the battle and reflect on devotion to Mary.

This year's service consisted of the rosary prayer, a Gospel reading and homily focused on Mary from Father Richard Bellow from St. Gabriel Church, the presentation of flowers to Mary, and procession of the Blessed Sacrament. The Knights of Columbus Council 770 and the officers of the Charlotte Chapter of the Catholic Daughters have also been in attendance since the beginning.

Bean said, "This is a way of honoring and thanking the Blessed Mother who has such an important role to play in the salvation of God's people."

The idea for the International Rosary Day originated in 1976 from Joseph Sherry, a California man, who wanted to pray for the social and spiritual welfare of people worldwide. So, on the first Sunday in May and October, participants say the rosary at the same time around the world in countries such as Ghana, Ireland, New Zealand, and Canada at 7 p.m. Greenwich mean time. That means 3 p.m. Eastern Standard Time, 10 a.m. in Alaska and Hawaii, and so forth for the various time zones. Many people still participate in the rosary march, Sherry's original concept. ▼ settlement for more than 7,000 refugees admitted to the United States from more than 20 countries. The Refugee Resettlement Office offers a myriad of services to incoming refugees, many arriving empty-handed as they seek asylum in this country. For people with health care, social services, housing and employment predicaments, the Refugee Resettlement Office facilitates a sometimes difficult transition.

While not the first national recognition for the Refugee Resettlement Office, the grant further enhances the trust in results of a well-run program.

The Refugee Office has received high praises for client services in the past. The office has been recipient of the John E. McCarthy Memorial Award for excellence in refugee resettlement. That honor — along with recognition by the Bureau of Refugee Programs of the U.S. Department of Labor — are tribute to their 'outstanding services and community support.'

"This grant is quite an honor for our Refugee Office," said Elizabeth Thurbee, executive director of the Diocese of Charlotte's Catholic Social Services. "The Refugee Office has undertaken many special projects since inception. And through the combined efforts of paid staff and volunteers, the Refugee Office continues to serve the growing needs of our community."

Pope tells gynecologists that church teaching can help guard life

By JOHN NORTON
Catholic News Service

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Catholic moral teaching on sexual behavior, abortion and euthanasia can help medical professionals be true "guardians and servants of human life," said Pope John Paul II.

The current cultural tendency to ignore science's ethical dimension has placed the medical profession "at a kind of crossroads," the pope told participants of the Seventh Congress of the International Gynecological Cancer Society Sept. 30.

"In your efforts to be true servants of life, I am certain that you will find light and encouragement in the church's teaching, the fruit of two millennia of Catholic moral thought on what God has revealed regarding the human condition," he said.

Pregnant women with cancer and their doctors face unique pressure from society and family to abort the fetus, despite the availability of effective forms of treatment to safeguard the life of mother and child, the pope said.

To prevent the increasingly frequent occurrence of cancer in pregnant women, public authorities must promote and fund more cancer research, the pope said.

"For all the talk about the rising costs of health care, particularly in the area of cancer treatment, there is a lingering sense that too little is being done and too little spent on health education and cancer prevention," the pope said.

In the area of education, the pope said doctors have a responsibility to point out clearly "that cancer can be the result of people's behavior, including certain sexual behavior, as well as of the pollution of the environment and its effects on the body itself."

Dr. Maria Luisa di Pietro, a researcher at the Institute of Bioethics at Rome's Catholic University of the Sacred Heart, told Catholic News Service that scientists have discovered a link between promiscuous sexual behavior, especially when it begins at a young age, and cervical cancer, because of the heightened possibility for the transmission of cancer-provoking viruses.

In working with women stricken with cancer and facing premature death, doctors should not sway in their commitment to serving life, the pope said.

"Nothing, not even a patient's request — which more often than not is a cry for help — can justify the taking of a life which is precious in the eyes of God and which can be a great gift of love to a family, even in the suffering of the final days," he said.

The pope said human support for cancer patients is vitally important because those confronted with suffering, death and the temptation to despair want most of all "companionship, sympathy and support in the time of trial."

"Ineffective treatment or treatment which aggravates suffering should be avoided, as also the imposition of unusual and extraordinary therapeutic methods," he said.

Journey back to faith

I've never met Jim Gilboy in person, but through our long phone conversations I know that we are soul mates.

Gilboy founded Marian Publishers of Oak Lawn, Ill., in 1996. His company is devoted to producing books that are, as he says, "Catholic-Catholic." He told me, "I consecrated the business to our Lord and our Lady."

All the titles found in Gilboy's attractive catalogue underscore his dedication — titles such as "Lost in the World: Found in Christ," "Radiating Christ" and, in Spanish, "Como Es Jesus" and several other spiritual books.

His publishing venture began after a conversion of heart and behavior brought him back to his faith after a long period of coldness. He said he had been caught up in a lot of entertaining, socializing and drinking because of the business he was in. "The Lord allowed me to almost hit bottom," he reveals.

When he began to pray, "Dear God, help me get out of this," Gilboy — a husband and father of six — said he found the courage to go to a treatment center and get control of his drinking.

Then he saw a film on Mary's reported apparitions at Medjugorje in central Bosnia, and his "heart was touched," he said. In 1991 he and his wife Mary Ellen, whom he credits as his "backbone" in keeping him going, traveled to Medjugorje. There "the Blessed Mother brought me back to Mass and the Eucharist," he said.

Another blessing came when he was introduced to perpetual adoration at a parish in Chicago. Now he calls attending daily Mass and being faithfully present for adoration "the whole substance of my life."

Gilboy's devotion to perpetual adoration led indirectly to our encounter. My son Sterling, who was involved with creating a perpetual adoration chapel in another Chicago-area parish, had met Gilboy through this ministry. Gilboy had a publishing need, and Sterling, thinking I might be of help, put us in touch.

Being ever the journalist, I wanted to know what motivated him to start a publishing company in these times of intense competition in the marketing and selling of books. He said that in gratitude to Mary he wanted to "do something for her."

And then in 1994 fate stepped in, as usual. A woman named Carole Ross wanted a book published, and "Mary sent her to me," he said. While it took two years and tremendous expense, since Gilboy didn't yet know the business, "By Way of the Cross" was published. Word that Gilboy was working on a book spread fast through his prayer group, and another woman brought him a manuscript, followed by others.

Marian Publishers was thus, surprisingly, established. "I was led to do this," said Gilboy, acknowledging he is "still struggling" to learn the book business. He underscores that the books he accepts have to put faith in a positive light and "touch on the reality of life."

Gilboy has an ultimate goal. "I want to be able to say to God when I die, 'I knew you when I was on earth,' and then, hear him say, 'Yes, you did.' I want to be a part of what our Lord came down to do."

Confessions of a long-time Catholic

It is very common for people who reach middle age to turn into conservative Catholics. No, I do not mean the type of Catholic who sends weekly reports to the bishop about his or her pastor's weekly liturgical errors on a manual typewriter where the "o" is filled in with gunk and it looks like a huge dot every time you hit it.

This is irritating, especially if your name is Cook or Poofnoofski, because it looks like they are making big periods or unhappy happy faces all over the page.

No, I mean really conservative Catholics. The metamorphosis can happen quickly and with little warning. One day you are an average I-hope-it's-a-short-homily Catholic, and then you wake up the next Sunday and you find yourself hoping the priest or deacon will deliver a scathing homily about those stupid shoes the young women are wearing that make them teeter back and forth like a telephone pole in an earthquake.

You know the shoes — Boris Karloff's Frankenstein wore a pair, only more practical. Then Sonny Bono and Tony Orlando picked up the style in the '70s. They called them platforms, I think. The shoes, not Sonny or Tony.

Now they don't have a name. (The shoes, that is. Sonny and Tony's names have not changed.) If you don't believe me, stop a young girl teetering down the street and ask her. Say, "Hey, young lady, what do they call those shoes you are teetering on?"

"The left one is, like, you know, Mary Alice," she might say, "and the right one is, like, whatever." Then she will teeter off tee-heeing with her friends, the group of them looking like a herd of tipsy giraffes.

The "style" has no name. Not chunkies, or hunkies, or Squatbottoms, or even platforms. I tell you, there is plenty of room here for a homily.

Which brings us, obviously, back to conservative Catholics. Here are some more indicators that "it" has happened:

—You judge parishes you visit primarily by the location of the bathrooms and the sound system.

—You always check "no" on parish surveys about building projects.

—You become highly agitated if you accidentally leave the weekly contribution envelope on the counter at home.

—You complain about the high prices at parish flea markets and pout by finding a 1966 National Geographic and reading it on the exercise bike you donated.

—You find yourself barking things like, "The Angelus, you know the Angelus don't you?"

—You rate ending world hunger on a par with ending holding hands during the Our Father.

—You see no reason a parish should have an e-mail address, for heaven's sake.

And another thing: There is absolutely no reason pastors or deacons should not ask soon, and in scathing terms from the pulpit: Why can't people remember to put their kneelers up so people can get by?

FATHER THOMAS J. McSWEENEY
GUEST COLUMNIST

"Really? I didn't know that!"

This week's column could be filed under "Really? I didn't know that, and please forgive my ignorance!" You would think that I, a Catholic priest systematically trained in the intellectual and moral tradition of my faith, should be familiar with Christianity's historical impact on other religions. I am not. In point of fact, a Muslim friend of mine recently taught me aspects of religious history that I was embarrassed to discover I knew nothing about. And for me, it is an important lesson.

We were winding up a delightful dinner when I asked my friend, Kayhan Sarab, if he might describe for me some of the practices and beliefs of Islam. Graciously he began with what was for me a bombshell of a question: "Well, of course, Father Tom, you do know that we Muslims have much in common with Christianity, right?" I replied somewhat sheepishly, "Um, you do?"

Clearly surprised, Kayhan studied the uncertainty in my face and reached across the table to touch my arm: "Surely you know of the profound respect we Muslims have for the Virgin Mary, the mother of Jesus!" Clueless, I shrugged my shoulders.

"Oh yes, indeed!" he said passionately. "According to the Koran (the sacred book of Islam), God chose Mary and made her pure and above all other women of the universe. Together, with her son Jesus, she was destined to play a unique role in the history of salvation."

"Muslims believe in Mary?" I stammered.

"Is it possible you do not know that there are more verses in the Koran — 34 of them — which name the Virgin Mary than there are in your whole New Testament?" Again I was at a loss. Kayhan went on to say that the Koran traces her presentation in the temple in Jerusalem, her purification, the annunciation with the Angel Gabriel, her virginal conception of Jesus who is considered a great prophet.

This week I set out to increase my awareness of Islam. I came across a talk given by Cardinal William Keeler of Baltimore when he received the 1995 Mahmoud Abu Saud Excellence Award from the American Muslim Council. He said that Mary "was ever ready to do the will of God....She responded (to the angel), 'Behold, I am the handmaid of the Lord; let it be done to me according to your word.' (Lk 1:38) This is the attitude of every true believer in the living God, the Lord of the universe. May God be with us as we seek to discover his holy will for us and to do it."

There is one more story from my friend Kayhan that I would like to share. The prophet Muhammad once sent a group of his followers to a largely Christian settlement in Ethiopia for protection from religious persecution. There they were questioned by a group of local leaders. After a recitation of all the elements common to their religious beliefs and hopes, the Christian community embraced the Muslims. And in a gesture of welcome and respect, one Christian plucked a single strand of hair from his head and placed it on the sand between himself and the Muslims and said, "That is the measure of the difference between us."

Thanks, Kayhan! You helped me grow in respect and understanding for our fellow believers in the one God who desires above all things our love for Himself and for one another.

Finding the joy of the Mass in times of death

It has been a couple of months since the shocking plane crash of John F. Kennedy Jr., his wife and sister-in-law. The media blitz that followed the news of their tragic deaths was unprecedented.

ABC Radio called and asked me to join their network during the broadcast at the time of the memorial Mass. I was to do the color commentary along with Betina Gregory, their news anchor.

We had to fill three hours and 10 minutes of airtime for the 3,000 ABC affiliate stations nationwide. Gregory coordinated the live feed from reporters and commentators outside the Church of St. Thomas More in Manhattan. It was my task to explain what was going inside the church.

Years earlier I sat near John Kennedy Jr. at an Al Smith dinner in the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel. I found him friendly, humorous and down to earth. As we chatted, my mind went back to that image of him as a little boy saluting his father's funeral procession. He was exactly 3 years old on the day of President Kennedy's funeral.

Now it was my sad duty to cover his memorial Mass, which as you probably know was completely private. There were no TV cameras or radio lines coming from inside the church itself. We were in a studio a few miles away trying to reconstruct the event as best we could.

I had performed a similar task for CBS when Jacqueline Kennedy died in 1994. It was a bit easier then. At least we had an audio feed from the church. We were able to broadcast the actual readings, the homily and the eulogy by Sen. Ted Kennedy. Not having that advantage this time, I had more time to explain the meaning of the Mass as a celebration.

Joy is a difficult concept to convey when someone has died. Nevertheless, the emotional subtext of every Mass is an expression of joy. Every Mass is Easter Sunday for the true believer.

We strive to be children of hope and gratitude in all circumstances, even in the midst of tears. When we gather to celebrate this mystery of faith, the pain of grief becomes less bitter.

Though the holy sacrifice is a memorial of the Lord's crucifixion, we emphasize the fact that Jesus rose from the dead. In him, with him and through him we express our joy to the Father.

Knowing that our deceased loved ones will rise from the dead to be with God in heaven brings some comfort to the weary heart. We strive to be joyful in the midst of tears.

Pope John Paul II expressed the meaning of Christ's mission among us in these words: "Christ came to bring joy; joy to children, joy to parents, joy to families and to friends, joy to workers and to scholars, joy to the sick, joy to the elderly, joy to all humanity. In a true sense, joy is the keynote of the Christian message and the recurring motif of the Gospels."

On a day filled with heart-piercing grief, the liturgy of the church reminds us that joy prevails over sorrow. This is why we call the Mass a celebration.

Question Corner

FATHER JOHN DIETZEN

The first woman created by God

Q. Our eighth-grade daughter told us recently that her teacher said Eve was not the first woman created by God. The first, named Lilith, was created the same time as Adam.

Things didn't work out between them, so she went to the other side of the garden. When Adam then complained to God that he was lonely, God took Adam's rib to form Eve.

This teacher attends certification classes to teach in our parish school. Is any of this story remotely true? Does it have any basis in the Bible?

A. The name Lilith appears in Isaiah (34:14) apparently as something of a demon. It is the only time the name appears in our Scripture.

The Lilith stories developed apparently out of Babylonian demon myths. A medieval document called the "Alphabet of Ben Sira" expanded, generally along the lines you mention, on ancient legends which portray her as a destroyer of pregnant women and infants.

Some feminists now read these stories as describing the antithesis of Eve, who was supposedly more docile and dependent, more open to seeing herself as a nurturer of children, than Lilith.

In fact, a feminist organization exists today bearing the name of Lilith. Usually it pursues considerably radical policies and goals with which many other women who are laboring for sexual equality and justice quite strongly disagree.

Obviously, the Lilith tales have no place in Christian Scripture or teaching.

Interdominational marriage

Dear Father Dietzen: Your recent column about a couple planning an interdenominational marriage prompted this perspective from someone who's been there.

Because we were concerned about our future family's faith, I (a Protestant) wanted to learn why my fiance was so committed to his Catholic faith and began attending classes for people interested in learning more about the Catholic Church.

To my great surprise I discovered there were many more similarities than differences. Before long, I decided to become Catholic.

We'll soon be happily married for 23 years. I believe couples facing this situation could try what I did. It couldn't hurt and might help. I've never regretted it.

The couple might start with a careful look at their common Christian baptism as ground for fruitful dialogue with one another.

A. I am grateful to you and the many other readers who wrote wise and helpful comments from their personal experiences. As a pastor and diocesan family life director for many years, I have worked closely with dozens of couples in happy and successful interdenominational marriages, and some which evolved as yours. You make an important point.

I think you would agree, however, that a man and woman considering marrying, and coming from different faith backgrounds, should be able to talk about their religious differences and work out, at least in basic ways, how they will deal with these differences for themselves and their children, as you did.

If those differences are irreconcilable before marriage, a man and woman are inviting spiritual tragedy in their family if they decide to marry anyway in a vague hope that "something will work out." This apparently was the situation with the couple whose letter was in the column to which you refer.

New bishop in Northern Ireland commits to peace

DROMORE, Northern Ireland (CNS) — The newest and youngest Irish bishop, Bishop John McAreavy of Dromore, has committed himself to advancing peace in Northern Ireland. "I will do all in my power to promote the search for a lasting peace and understanding between our different traditions in every way I can," Bishop McAreavy said after his consecration in Newry Cathedral in mid-September. The Dromore Diocese is one of two dioceses to have its territory completely within Northern Ireland.

McAuley Institute honors advocates for homeless, immigrants

WASHINGTON (CNS) — McAuley Institute, a national Catholic-run nonprofit housing organization, has given its fifth annual Courage in Community Awards to Mercy Sister Marie Ahern of Orland, Maine, and Sharon Murphy of Washington. The awards, which honor "outstanding contributions made by women in the development of decent, safe, affordable housing and strong communities," were presented at a dinner in Washington in September. McAuley Institute, based in the Washington suburb of Silver Spring, Md., assists local efforts to increase permanent, affordable housing through a $10 million revolving loan fund, technical assistance and advocacy.

NCCB official praises passage of fetal protection bill

WASHINGTON (CNS) — An official of the U.S. bishops' Secretariat for Pro-Life Activities praised legislation passed by the House Sept. 30 that would make it a crime to harm or kill a fetus in the womb. Helen Alvare, director of planning and information for the pro-life secretariat, said the Unborn Victims of Violence Act that passed with a 254-172 vote "embodies simple justice by extending federal protection to defenseless victims of violent crimes." The legislation protects unborn children whose mothers are physically assaulted, maimed or murdered. It is the first such measure proposed at the federal level.

Retired Bishop Norbert Gaughan of Gary, Ind., dies

MERRILLVILLE, Ind. (CNS) — Retired Bishop Norbert F. Gaughan of Gary died Oct. 1 of complications from a stroke suffered in 1992. He was 78 years old. He had been bishop of Gary from 1984 until his retirement in 1996. His administrative responsibilities were curtailed, though, following the 1992 stroke. Bishop Gaughan had lived at St. Anthony Home in Crown Point after his retirement. He had been a bishop since 1975, serving first for nine years as auxiliary bishop of Greensburg, Pa.

Sister Prejean urges Canada not to follow U.S. on death penalty

OTTAWA (CNS) — Sister Helen Prejean, author of the best-selling book "Dead Man Walking," urged Canada not to take the same path as the United States in the use of capital punishment. "The death penalty in the United States is 95 percent about politics and 5 percent about justice," said Sister Prejean, a member of the Sisters of St. Joseph of Medaille of Louisiana. She spoke to a group of policy-makers in an address Sept. 23 at the National Press Club in Ottawa. "The 38 states that have the death penalty in the United States have double the homicide rate of states that don't," she said. "The truth is that people who do violent acts aren't thinking at all of the consequences."

Shelter director stabbed to death remembered for his compassion

HARTFORD, Conn. (CNS) — A 42-year-old man stabbed to death outside the Hartford shelter he headed was remembered for his compassion, Catholicism and devotion to serving the hungry and homeless. A funeral Mass was said Sept. 24 for Paul Laffin, who was stabbed Sept. 20 and died shortly afterwards despite attempts by fellow shelter workers to keep him alive. He was director of St. Elizabeth's shelter, which is run by the Sisters of Mercy. Laffin was remembered as someone who cared deeply about the people who came to the shelter.

PEORIA, Ill. (CNS) — Retired Bishop Edward W. O'Rourke of Peoria, who lived what he taught about the benefits of a simple lifestyle, continued his example in death. Bishop O'Rourke, 81, died in Peoria Sept. 29, and he was to be laid to rest in a simple wooden casket, as he requested in his will. The funeral Mass was scheduled for noon on Oct. 5 at St. Mary's Cathedral in Peoria. A former executive director of the National Catholic Rural Life Conference, Bishop O'Rourke guided the Diocese of Peoria from 1971 to 1990. He was widely known as an advocate and friend of the poor, and used his retirement years to found and lead an organization that offered job-training and hospitality for the less fortunate of his Peoria neighborhood.

Pope beatifies five Italians, one Belgian at Mass

By JOHN NORTON
Catholic News Service

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Calling them "faithful workers in the Lord's vineyard," Pope John Paul II beatified five Italians and a Belgian during a Mass in St. Peter's Square.

The freshly scrubbed facade of St. Peter's Basilica was hung with huge images of the newly beatified men. Some 20,000 Italian and Belgian pilgrims joined the pope for the sunny outdoor ceremony Oct. 3.

"In today's celebration we have the joy to see elevated to altars of glory six faithful workers in the Lord's vineyard," the pope said. "In different times and in different ways, each of them generously gave of their own lives in service to the Gospel."

The newly-beatified are:

— Ferdinando Maria Baccilieri (1821-1893), a parish priest and founder of the Servite Sisters of Galeazza.

— Edward Joannes Maria Poppe (1890-1924), a rural Belgian priest and former soldier.

— Arcangelo Tadini (1846-1912), a priest and founder of the Sister Workers of the Holy House of Nazareth religious congregation.

— Mariano da Roccacasale (1778-1866), a Franciscan brother.

— Diego Oddi (1839-1919), a Franciscan brother.

— Nicola da Gesturi (1882-1958), a Capuchin monk known as "Brother Silence."

"In a world too often values-poor and saturated with words, there is need of men and women who, like Blessed Nicola da Gesturi, underline the urgency of recapturing the ability to be silent and listen," the pope said.

Pope John Paul has beatified 938 people during his 21-year pontificate. ▼

lennium Choir — 400 men, women and children from across the state — closed out the gathering hymn, "O Christ the Great Foundation."

Archbishop Gabriel Montalvo, apostolic nuncio to the United States, on behalf of Pope John Paul II read the apostolic letter calling Bishop-elect Baker to ordination as the bishop of Charleston. The letter, in part, states, "you will apply all yourself to carry out the responsibilities on behalf of the good and the welfare of your people." The congregation applauded their approval boldly.

In his homily the primary consecrating prelate, Archbishop John F. Donoghue of Atlanta, spoke on the duties of the office. "... Being true to Christ as a bishop requires one thing more than anything else, one thing that cannot be prepared, but must spring forth from our mind and heart because we know there is no other answer — trust in the power of Christ to guide us. ... I enjoin you to remain vigilant, for your own sake and for the sake of your people — to guard your own spiritual health, by adhering to the life of prayer and devotion that has to be the first mark of a bishop's life."

Archbishop Donoghue then questioned Bishop Baker, who stood before him, on his resolve to uphold the faith and to perform his duties as a bishop faithfully.

The elect prostrated himself on the floor as the congregation recited the Litany of the Saints.

The consecrating prelates, Archbishops Donoghue and Montalvo, and Bishop John J. Snyder of St. Augustine, led the other clergy in the laying on of hands.

In a symbolic gesture, the Book of the Gospels was held over the bishop's head as a sign of the power of the word of God. Archbishop Donoghue in the prayer of consecration called the Holy Spirit down upon Bishop Baker and anointed his head, marking the completion of the elevation to the episcopacy.

The Book of the Gospels was presented to the bishop, and he received the three symbols of his office from Archbishop Donoghue — the miter, the ring, and the crosier. Bishop David B. Thompson, retired bishop of Charleston, at a vespers service held the previous night at the Cathedral of St. John the Baptist, had blessed the symbols.

Bishop Baker received the kiss of peace from his brother bishops in a concluding gesture in the rite of ordination. Prior to that rite, the Liturgy of the Word was interspersed with the influence of the new shepherd; the readings were repeated in Spanish and in Vietnamese.

The liturgy of the Eucharist held a special tribute to the bishop's motto: Rejoicing in Hope. A Communion hymn was written by William Schlitt and composed by Timothy Tikker expressly for the ordination ceremony and took the title and theme of the bishop's motto.

Before the blessing and dismissal, Bishop Baker addressed the congregation offering many thanks to those who helped make the day possible and to all who made the trip. He thanked local dignitaries and ecumenical leaders for sharing in the occasion.

His excitement was apparent when, in his thanks, he said, "I'm having fun up here." In acknowledging his family, he joked, "My mother's been worried about feeding all of you."

The new prelate asked Bishop Thompson to stand and be recognized for his faithful service and guidance during this transition period. When Bishop Baker stumbled over the word episcopacy, saying, "I'll learn to say that word eventually,' Bishop Thompson replied: 'You don't have to say it; you just have to do it." ▼

Boston celebration of faith draws 19,000 teens, young adults

By NICOLE PASCARELLI
Catholic News Service

FOXBORO, Mass. (CNS) — More than 19,000 teens and young adults joined Boston Cardinal Bernard F. Law on Sept. 25 for the Archdiocese of Boston's Pilgrimage 2000 kickoff at Foxboro Stadium.

A festival area with games, activities, clowns and entertainment provided a celebration atmosphere that carried on throughout the day. Teens also had the chance to participate in amusements such as a Moonwalk, rock climbing wall and a dunk tank.

There was also a basketball area with a three-point shooting contest and other basketball-related games. A DJ entertained the crowd and played various games.

"There is no contradiction between faith and fun," Cardinal Law told reporters.

The kickoff event is the beginning of a seven-month preparatory period in which small groups will gather in parishes to reflect on the fundamental questions of Catholicism. It ends with a ceremony at Boston's Fenway Park next April. Over 35,000 teens and young adults have registered for the preparatory period.

Aimed at young Catholic from age 14-40, the motivation for Pilgrimage 2000 came directly from Pope John Paul II. In his apostolic letter on preparing for the year 2000, "Tertio Millennio Adveniente," the pope wrote, "The future of the church belongs to the younger generation, to those who, born in this century, will reach maturity in the next."

The cardinal echoed the pope's message throughout the day, telling those gathered that they represented the church's future.

At 6:30 p.m. teens and young adults gathered inside Foxboro Stadium for a play and a musical performance by the Christian band Jars of Clay. Following the performance, Cardinal Law celebrated Mass along with Boston Auxiliary Bishops John P. Boles, Francis X. Irwin and Emilio Allue and Bishop Elliott G. Thomas of St. Thomas, Virgin Islands. An estimated 200 archdiocesan priests and deacons also concelebrated.

A vast majority of the participants were high-school-age teens who registered with their schools, confirmation programs and youth groups. For many of them the gathering was an opportunity to show the cardinal and the archdiocese that they are the future of the church.

"I was really surprised at how they brought together so many kids," said Mike Bartelloni, 17.

"They did a great job letting teens know that they are part of the church," said Stephen Colella, campus minister at Catholic Memorial High School. Colella urged teens at his school to attend because "the cardinal is trying to reach out to you; show him that your faith is important to you."

Cardinal Law was very visible to the teens throughout the day, watching the musical performance and greeting them. He also wore a "WWJD" bracelet given to him by youth minister Troy Santarlasci, who also headed the cardinal's security team.

WWJD bracelets have become popular with teens because of their message, "What would Jesus do?" Many teens noticed the cardinal's red and white wrist band and noted that he was trying to connect with them.

Other "pop culture" sayings could be seen around the stadium. Like many groups, teens from St. Mary's Lifeteen in Dedham wore distinguishable shirts. On the back read the message "Got Jesus?" a take-off of the popular milk ads.

Bernie Choiniere, music minister at St. Mary, provided music prior to the Jars of Clay performance. Teens from his parish showed their support in record numbers with four busloads attending.

"The Mass was the best part," said Charlie McDonough, 17, a senior at Catholic Memorial and member of St. Catherine Parish in Norwood. "It was geared to teens so teens could relate to it."

When Mass began the stadium fell silent and all eyes focused directly on the altar.

"Pilgrimage 2000 is not about this night or Fenway in April, it's about what happens in between and after," Cardinal Law said during Mass. "This is just the beginning of something magnificent for the youth." ▼

Vatican's family council to host meeting on cohabitation

By JOHN NORTON
Catholic News Service

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Vatican invited a small group of scholars from around the world to examine the growing practice of unmarried couples living together, an official said.

About half a dozen experts will take part in a late-December meeting at the Pontifical Council for the Family, Msgr. Francesco di Felice, the council's undersecretary, told Catholic News Service Oct. 5. A list of participants was not available.

The issue of cohabitation also surfaced during a Pontifical Council for the Family meeting Sept. 27-29 with the heads of the European bishops' family commissions.

Italian Cardinal Dionigi Tettamanzi of Genoa warned participants that "certain cultural forces of a radical character have the destruction of the family institution as their more or less manifest objective," a Vatican statement said.

The cardinal said that the importance of the family's foundation on marriage comes not so much from the demands of faith, but on

CSS holds reception for Russian adoption judges and families

By ALESHA M. PRICE
Staff Writer

CHARLOTTE — It was a time for judges from Russia and families from across the diocese and nearby cities to come together to celebrate the fulfillment of many of their lives.

The Russian judges from the Moscow Regional Court who make the final decision for international adoption, Marina Vlasova, Elena Guseva, and Margarita Zhelybintseva, came for an East Coast visit along with a reception with the families and children they had brought together in Russia. Families from as far away as Georgia traveled

"There are many families who wish to share their hearts and home with children who need parents. Many Russian orphans would not have the chance to be a part of a family unless adopted internationally."

— Elizabeth Thurbee, Executive Director of CSS for the Diocese of Charlotte to greet and thank the people who helped them adopt their children.

The Wiedls contacted the Catholic Social Services office in Atlanta who sent them to Carol Meyerriecks, CSS pregnancy support and adoption caseworker in Asheville, who informed them about Russian adoptions.

Barbara Wiedl from St. Thomas the Apostle in Atlanta, said, "the program and the assistance in Russia is wonderful because they walk you through step by step. The judge who heard our case is here today[at the reception], and we were able to show her the positive change in our son Steven Jr. after only two months. We feel as if we have always had him."

"This is a chance for us to realize something that was missing from our lives," added Barbara's husband, Brady. "We are thankful to the Russian judges for allowing this to take place."

The Russian interpreter, Genny Shoubina, who also handles paperwork for the judges, Svetlana Batsoula, the facilitator for Russian adoptions through CSS in Moscow who also handles the CSS visits to Russia every six months, and Nina Ivanova Andreeva, the head of the department of guardianship, care, and adoption, also came with the group.

Shoubina translated for the judges, who said that they felt the "hospitality and warmth" from the people here. They also stated that "[international adoption] is good for the children because when you see the happy faces of those who are adopted, you know that it is for their safety and best interest."

When a couple wishes to adopt a child through CSS, their petition is submitted to the department of guardianship who then presents it to the judges. The prospective parents travel to Moscow to stand before the judges for their individual case.

"There are many families who wish to share their hearts and home with children who need parents. Many Russian orphans would not have the chance to be a part of a family unless adopted internationally," said Elizabeth Thurbee, executive director of CSS for the Diocese of Charlotte.

"We were thrilled about the opportunity to be able to adopt a child, and this has been a blessing," said Ann Woody from St. Therese Church in Mooresville. "It was really nice to see the judge who helped us again in a casual manner because when we went to Russia, it was so formal."

Thurbee continued, "It is a positive experience for most families. There are possible problems with the adoption of children past infancy from another country, but we try to offer as much support as possible."

Catholic Social Services for the Diocese of Charlotte operates the International Adoption Service, responsible for 40 Russian adoptions in 1998 and other international adoptions each year. ▼ the true good of society.

"The institution of marriage guarantees the nature of social commitment in favor of the weaker members, especially the children," the statement said. "Therefore, the stability which political powers must guarantee is not a strictly religious good, but a human good."

Cardinal Tettamanzi warned that laws making marriage just one of many personal union options would undermine society itself.

"A claimed equality between family and cohabitation on the part of society and civil law would introduce family models which cannot be compared in the slightest, and which result in damage to society," the statement said. ▼

Papal biography was a command performance — from the pope

By LOU PANARALE
Catholic News Service

WASHINGTON (CNS) — What's an author to do when the pope invites him to dinner and asks him to write the pope's biography?

For George Weigel, the answer was easy — not only because Pope John Paul II asked him but because the author had long wanted to write such a book.

Three-and-a-half years in the making, "Witness to Hope: The Biography of Pope John Paul II" will be available in bookstores by mid-October from HarperCollins Publishers.

An imposing yet highly readable volume that runs nearly 1,000 pages, including footnotes, the biography is the work of Weigel, a Catholic newspaper columnist and senior fellow at the Ethics and Public Policy Center in Washington.

Weigel has written or edited 15 books, including 'Tranquillitas Ordinis: The Present Failure and Future Promise of American Catholic Thought on War and Peace" and "The Final Revolution: The Resistance Church and the Collapse of Communism."

He said the idea of producing an in-depth biography of the pope first came up in May 1995 in informal conversations with Joaquin Navarro-Valls, the pope's spokesman.

For several months afterward, Weigel suggested ideas by mail and fax to Navarro-Valls on how he thought such a biography should be written.

Then in December 1995, Weigel was back in Rome to give a lecture when, to his surprise, the pope invited him to dinner.

"In the course of the evening he made it clear, quite vigorously, that he would be grateful if I would take on the project," Weigel said in an interview with Catholic News Service.

Weigel said that when he first discussed the project with Navarro-Valls, he had the feeling that a lot of his life had been a providential preparation for this assignment.

"I'd been active at the intersection of Catholicism and public life for two decades," he said. "I'd studied philosophy and theology. I had written the first book arguing that John Paul was the key figure in the collapse of European communism."

He said the pope assured him they would meet as often as necessary, and the author would get any needed materials and have complete editorial control.

Weigel said that arrangement allowed him to write "the first full-scale biography that presents the pope's life from 'inside' the convictions that have shaped that life."

"Every other major biography of the pope in English has approached him from 'outside,' so to speak, as a statesman who's incidentally a Christian, a priest, a bishop," Weigel said.

He said writing a biography from the outside is a little like writing a biography of Einstein and ignoring or downplaying the physics.

"With John Paul II, the theology, the Christian commitment that makes him the man he is, that shapes his thinking, his actions, his decisions, and his encounters with others, has to be the starting point," Weigel said.

While working on the biography, Weigel was in Rome more than a dozen times, for periods ranging from two weeks to seven weeks.

He was in Poland a half-dozen times, attended the pope's World Youth Day in Paris in 1997, and was in Cuba for the pope's pilgrimage there in January 1998.

Weigel also established correspondence with famous personalities all over the world, many of whom provided documents and reminiscences.

Regarding meeting with the pope, Weigel said, "We met 10 times, formally, over meals, and had several other more informal encounters, amounting to about 20 hours of con-

I attended a dinner recently where today's Gospel really happened: All the guests, trusting in God's providence, came "properly dressed" to the Lord's table.

Tom was coordinating a program through which our parish and a rural parish in Haiti were "twinned." The idea is for the two parishes to build a relationship with each other that will help them grow, together, in their relationship to Christ.

Although a few parishioners were closely involved in the program, Tom and the Haitian pastor, "Pere Pol," were the main links between the two faith communities.

During Tom's several visits to Haiti, he and Pere Pol became good friends and determined that the poor Haitian parish needed the help of its American twin to build a school.

But despite his growing love for the people there, when Pere Pol suggested what it would cost, Tom gasped, "Fifty thousand dollars? How can we do that? Here we are trying to get people to contribute to our own building campaign. We can't get more money for a school." Sadly he shook his head, "We can't do that."

But seeing the despondent expression on his friend's face, he gave in. "Listen, I don't see how we can do it, but we'll try."

Pere Pol soon made a visit to our parish. Several individuals provided food and space, and helped Tom organize a dinner to which he invited friends in the community to come meet the pastor. Those who came knew that God had called the two parishes together and that he was generously providing for the people of both as one.

They came to taste the banquet spread before them. They listened intently and looked at slides as Pere Pol and Tom told about the families in Lascahobas, Haiti — about the poverty and the lack of schools to accommodate the number of children who wish to attend.

Tom said: "I know a gift of money seems impersonal. But that's what will help. I know there are groups that go on mission trips to build something. But in this case they don't need us to come build a school for them. They know how to design and build a school in Haiti better than we do, and they need the jobs. They can use the pay from building their school to help send their own children there."

After dinner people made contributions in an amount exceeding the total needed. Tom spoke in awe and gratitude: "I'm not a fund raiser. I don't know a thing about it. This is the Holy Spirit at work. All I know is that if you just love, then the rest will be taken care of."

"The grace of God, Tom," Pere Pol said, smiling.

Question:
When were the times that you happily accepted God's generosity, but weren't properly prepared to truly share in it?

Show's title character will show Catholicism, actor says

HOLLYWOOD (CNS) — Art is imitating life, if Mike O'Malley has his way.

O'Malley, star of the new NBC sitcom that bears his name, is of Irish Catholic heritage. So is the character he plays, who is also named Mike O'Malley.

"You know what's going to be great? To actually have a practicing Irish Catholic on television," O'Malley said.

"TV people think nowadays that if you at all express a belief in Jesus and if you're Catholic, that connotes some crazy Bible-wielding lunatic who is closed-minded," O'Malley said. "I'm looking forward to not having that kind of character."

O'Malley, 32, grew up in Nashua, N.H., where he went to St. Christopher Elementary School, Nashua Catholic Junior High School and Bishop Burton High School.

"I think a lot of Americans have issues of faith that they're struggling with. I think that that will certainly be an element of the character as he's re-evaluating his life," O'Malley added.

"The Mike O'Malley Show"
Tuesdays on NBC
9:30 -10 p.m.

"When you're younger, when your parents are Catholic, you have a very strong faith. I think it's very easy to not make it your own, to make it your parents' faith.

"And I think that one of the great things about being an adult is that you get to make it your own."

"The Mike O'Malley Show," which airs 9:30-10 p.m. Eastern time on Tuesdays on NBC, concerns the dilemma of a fictional version of Mike O'Malley, who's approaching age 30 faster than he cares for and grows dissatisfied with having coasted through life thus far.

As opposed to TV industry types who boast they're "really trying to push the standards of TV," O'Malley's character "is a guy who's looking for standards," said the actor. "This is a character who is trying to get some standards in his own life. And he really hasn't said, 'How do I create meaning in my own life?'"

Mike O'Malley, star of the new NBC sitcom that bears his name, is of Irish Catholic heritage and the character he plays is a practicing Catholic.

The 32-year-old O'Malley has up to now made his living as a New York playwright, but until his broadcast network debut, most people knew him as "The Rick" on a series of commercials for the ESPN cable channel.

"I definitely take life very seriously, and I think that's what we're trying to do in the show," O'Malley said. "We know that people don't want their time wasted watching television. So we're trying to make the issues important to the characters so that ... people will be engaged in the stories that they're going through. I'm trying to take the work seriously without taking myself too seriously."

The nepotism ends there, O'Malley said. His TV namesake will have parents and maybe another sister, but they aren't coming from his own family.

In tune with his writing history, O'Malley said he will write some episodes and have a major say in final drafts of other scripts.

"The Mike O'Malley Show" "is a pleasant enough sitcom," said Gerri Pare of the U.S. Catholic Conference Office for Film and Broadcasting in her review of the debut episode.

"In the pilot the characters seemed genuinely headed toward increased maturity," Pare added. O'Malley himself, she said, "was natural and at ease in front of the camera — and the de rigeur sexual innuendo was minimal." ▼

Special documents the still image

By HENRY HERX
Catholic News Service

NEW YORK (CNS) — How the still image has come to influence our life and times is examined in "American Photography: A Century of Images," airing Wednesday, Oct. 13, 8-11 p.m. EDT on PBS.

The first hour covers developments from 1900 to 1934 beginning with the introduction of the simple Brownie camera, which cost $1 to buy and turned the nation into shutterbugs.

The candid snapshot became the record of family life, as invaluable today as a photograph of an historic event.

"American Photography: A Century of Images"
Oct. 13, PBS
8-11 p.m.

During this time, photographs came to replace illustrations in newspapers and magazines and the advertising profession was born using a picture to turn a product into an object of desire.

The second hour looks at the invention of the wire photo and the pictorial coverage of the Depression, World War II and the boom times of the 1950s, examining primarily how these photographs were used to influence public opinion.

The program ends with the images of the Vietnam War, the battles at home over civil rights and the counterculture as well as the technological innovation of the digital image and the ease with which it can be manipulated.

Here, too, the case is put for the superiority of still photographs over moving pictures, though the television program itself relies heavily on the use of newsreel footage.

Produced and directed by Muffie Meyer and Ellen Hovde, the program surveys the way in which photographs have become an essential part of American art, life and history.

It covers a lot of territory and raises a lot of questions but some may wish its sweep had been less broad and more in depth.

All, however, will agree the selection of photographs does define the 20th century and demonstrate "the enduring power of the still image."

It's a program many will want to see more than once. ▼

Jubilee art contest planned for prisoners

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Vatican is asking artists behind bars to send post cards for a jubilee year contest.

In June, the Vatican's jubilee organizing committee invited prisoners worldwide to submit original works on cards — or paper, if they prefer — depicting "a subject of religious character."

Entries would then face a judging panel; winners were to be displayed in an as-yet unspecified location and published in a catalogue for the Vatican's special jubilee day for prisoners — July 9, 2000.

Prison chaplains around the globe were asked to spread word of the competition, to encourage participation and to help obtain materials.

To qualify, entries must arrive at a central chaplains' coordinating office at Via Arenula 70, Rome 00186, Italy, by February 2000. Requests for information by e-mail could be sent to ispcapp@giustizia.it. ▼ versation in all.

"The pope is a natural, unaffected man. We had been in personal conversation since 1992, so it wasn't as if we were just getting to know each other," he said.

"At our first dinner conversation, at Castel Gandolfo in September 1996, the pope began, as he had always done before, by peppering me with questions about what was happening in the United States," he said.

"I said, 'Holy Father, wait a minute; I'm supposed to be the one asking the questions here.' This produced a pontifical shrug, a smile, and a very informative 90 minutes of conversation."

Weigel said that a year before the pope asked him to write the papal biography, he stated in a column that historians would someday refer to the pope as Pope John Paul II the Great.

"If that does become the case, it will be because, like Leo the Great and Gregory the Great, John Paul met the challenge of the barbarians of his time," he said. "He has championed Christian humanism and defending the inalienable rights of human beings made in the image and likeness of God.

"As with Leo and Gregory, not all of John Paul's initiatives have worked as he might have hoped. But what has worked has been epic," Weigel added.

"This 'pope from a far country' has changed the papacy and the course of 20th-century history, and set the course for world Catholicism well into the third millennium," Weigel said. ▼

Little Maria lives in a village in Guatemala in a two-room house with a tin roof and dirt floors. Her father struggles to support the family as a day laborer. Can you help a poor child like Maria? Become a sponsor today!

Your opportunity to help a very poor child is much too important to miss. And Christian Foundation for Children and Aging (CFCA), an international Catholic sponsorship program can show you the affordable way.

Through CFCA you sponsor a child for the amount you can afford. Ordinarily it takes $20 a month to provide one poor child with the life-changing benefits of sponsorship. But if this is not possible for you, we invite you to sponsor at a level you can afford (minimum $10). CFCA will see to it from other donations and the tireless efforts of our missionary partners that your child receives the same benefits as other sponsored children.

Your sponsorship pledge helps provide a poor child at a Catholic mission site with nourishing food, medical care, the chance to go to school – whatever is needed most. You can literally change a life!

And you can be assured your pledge has its greatest impact because our programs are directed by dedicated Catholic missionaries with a long-standing commitment to the people they serve.

To help build your relationship, you receive a picture of your child, information about your child's family and country, letters from your child and the CFCA newsletter. But most important, you receive the satisfaction of helping a poor child!

"I'm delighted to be CFCA's 100,000th sponsor . . . and I invite you to join me."

Service blends Native American, Catholic traditions

By JOANITA M. NELLENBACH
Correspondent

BRYSON CITY — Smoke fanned toward the east, north, west and south — smoke to purify. Prayers to the Creator. These were part of a "smudging" ceremony during a Labor Day vicariate gathering at Morgan Pavilion at Swain County Recreation Park.

Most of the attendees were parishioners from St. Joseph Church in Bryson City and Our Lady of Guadalupe Church on Qualla Boundary, the nearby Cherokee Reservation. Glenmary Father Tom Field, who asked Mary Herr to conduct the ceremony, is pastor of both churches.

Herr, a St. Joseph parishioner and of Cherokee descent, explained that the ceremony is a method of purifying one's self, home and environment and that Native Americans believe smudging cleanses heart, mind and body.

On the wall behind her hung a piece of buckskin on which had been painted an image of Blessed Kateri Tekakwitha, who, when canonized, will be the Catholic Church's first Native American saint.

The elements Herr used in the smudging represented the four life-sustaining elements: earth, air, fire and water. She placed the plants, grown in the earth, in a seashell. Sage burns well, so some of that was in the shell, along with sweet grass from New York State, where Blessed Kateri lived. Herr also used palm branches to represent the Catholic Church, cedar to represent the Cherokee, and sacred tobacco, which, Herr said, all tribes use in smudging ceremonies.

Once ignited, the plants burned slowly, and Herr used a feather to fan the resulting smoke into the air in four directions, counterclockwise according Cherokee tradition.

..."Great life-giving Spirit, I face the west, the direction of sundown. Let me remember every day that the moment will come when my sun will go down. Never let me forget that I must fade into you. Give me a beautiful color, give me a great day for setting, so that when it is time to meet you, I can come with glory."

When Herr finished fanning the smoke, the attendees faced in the four directions, which are represented by four colors (north, white; east, yellow; south, red; west, black), and prayed the "Native Prayer to the Four Directions":

"Great Spirit of Love, come to me with the power of the North. Make me courageous when the cold winds fall upon me. Give me strength and endurance for everything that is harsh, everything that hurts, everything that makes me squint. Let me move through life, ready to take what comes from the north.

"Spirit of Light, come to me out of the East, with the power of the rising sun. Let there be light in my words, let there be light on the path that I walk. Let me remember always that you give the gift of a new day. And never let me be burdened with sorrow by not starting over again.

"Great Spirit of Creation, send me the warm and soothing winds from the South. Comfort me and caress me when I am tired and cold. Unfold me like the gentle breezes that unfold the leaves of the trees. As you give to all the earth your warm, moving wind, give to me, so that I may grow close to you in warmth.

"Great life-giving Spirit, I face the west, the direction of sundown. Let me remember every day that the moment will come when my sun will go down. Never let me forget that I must fade into you. Give me a beautiful color, give me a great day for setting, so that when it is time to meet you, I can come with glory."

Participants took turns reading sections of a prayer ending with a portion of Psalm 51, which includes the sentence, "A clean heart create for me, O God, and a steadfast spirit renew in me."

Father Morris Boyd, pastor of St. Francis of Assisi Church in Franklin, offered a prayer for work, justice, and dignity for all who labor. ▼

The smoke is fanned toward participants in the ceremony, according to Native American tradition, which holds that smudging purifies mind, heart, and body.

Actor brings one-man show to Asheville parish

By DIANNE RIGGS
Correspondent

ASHEVILLE — "God's word has become like a Hallmark card to our culture," said Frank Runyeon, "when in fact, God's word is a dynamo — life-changing, exciting, moving. Nothing is more powerful than God speaking."

That belief has set the television actor on the road as an evangelist, proclaiming the Gospel of Mark across the United States, in a one-man theatrical performance. In a darkened church or theater, with only the effects of lighting and 12 seated parishioner "disciples," Runyeon carries the audience back to the catacombs of first-century Rome, huddled with other Christians, to hear the Word of Jesus come alive in the telling.

Runyeon brought his show to St. Eugene Church in Asheville Oct. 3.

Moving back and forth, up and down aisles, directly encountering the audience — now Jesus, now a Pharisee, now a pleading father, now a Roman soldier — Runyeon engages viewers with the raw details of Jesus' journey from baptism to crucifixion and the empty tomb.

The 46-year-old actor, best known for his roles in such television productions as "Santa Barbara," "As the World Turns," and "L.A. Law," has had an interest in religion since his teen years. "C.S. Lewis affected me profoundly," he said. "I decided I wanted to be a layman who could open the door of faith to people and make it seem less threatening."

Born in Cleveland and raised in Pennsylvania, he attended Princeton University, where he studied religion. At that time he also became a member of the Triangle Club — a group of people dedicated to musical comedy, writing and acting. It was here that he gained his start in the performing arts. While he still does occasional television appearances, biblical drama has been his passion for the past seven years. He wants to give the American people substance: help get them more in touch with Christian faith.

The Gospel of Mark comes alive in television star Frank Runyeon's one-man dramatic presentation at the parish of St. Eugene in Asheville.

Runyeon is seminary trained, having secured his master's degree from General Theological Seminary in New York. In preparation for his biblical theater, he also studied at Fuller Seminary in Pasadena and the Yale Divinity School.

In his performances of the Gospel of Mark, the Letter of James and soon to come, the Gospel of John, Runyeon does his own translations, striving to find the right contemporary American words to convey Biblical meaning. He says he wants to speak to this Third Millennium-poised culture.

"I want to help people experience the power and liveliness — even the entertaining quality — of God's Word. Jesus never said, 'Anybody who has eyes to read, read', but frequently said, 'Let him who has ears to hear, hear!'" contends Runyeon. He maintains that the Gospels were meant to be heard, not simply read.

Preparing for and performing the biblical texts has not left Runyeon himself unchanged. Entering into Scripture in this way has become for him a kind of Ignatian exercise that continues day after day. "It is a wonderful opportunity to grow closer to God — and this closeness is always followed by new testings," he said. " ... You grow closer to suffering and see your humanity in starker colors."

Attending seminary had a profound effect on the actor. "All of a sudden I was going to God, asking questions. I was going to Scripture, asking questions. God talks. Most of prayer is listening," he said.

Jesus excites Runyeon. "How much he loves the Father — that's the key. All comes out of the love they share," he said. He believes this age needs to realize that "happiness comes from serving other people's happiness." Jesus, in Mark's Gospel, "didn't come to be served, but to serve."

Runyeon visits churches, schools and theaters unaccompanied. The lighting, his main prop, is done by parishioners, including children. In the space of less than an afternoon, he trains the lighting crew, amidst directions, jokes, teasing. At once intense and playful, Runyeon invokes an atmosphere of seriousness tempered by laughter, both on and off stage. He prefers to play to audiences in churches, believing that the setting enhances the people's hearing, just as the performance itself expands people's expectations. "Some people say, 'I never got the power of Scripture before,'" he said.

Runyeon, an Episcopalian, is married to Annie, a Roman Catholic. They have three children and make their home in Westport, Conn. ▼

Mercy community honors jubilarian

By BARBARA NEFF HUTCHISON
Correspondent

BELMONT — The religious community, academic community, family, friends and admirers of Mercy Sister Mary Thomas Burke gathered in Belmont on Sunday, Oct. 3, to honor one woman's world of work and labors or love.

Sister Mary Thomas Burke, RSM

In the Cardinal Gibbons Chapel at Sacred Heart in Belmont, the home of the Sisters of Mercy of North Carolina, Sister Mary Thomas' 50 years of ministry as a Sister of Mercy were celebrated through sacrament, music, and community. Charlotte's Bishop William G. Curlin and Msgr. Padraic Loftus from Woodland Hills, Calif., celebrated the jubilee Mass, which was followed by a reception.

The sounds of harp, organ, and song reminded congregants throughout of the joy of this woman's spiritual journey. Evelyn Whitley played the harp and offered reflective music, including "I Wonder as I Wander." Ben Hutto traveled from Washington, D.C., to play the organ. Jane Dillard, a noted opera soloist, brought the depth of her spirit to the Bach-Gounod "Ave Maria."

The chapel was full, with close to 250 people attending. This group included many colleagues from the University of North Carolina at Charlotte, where Sister Mary Thomas ("Dr. Burke" on campus) has taught for 29 years. Others came from as far away as New Orleans, from where two colleagues in counseling education came to share in this ecumenical event. Visitors from other countries numbered 26. Family and friends came from Ireland, where Sister Mary Thomas left to come to America as a young woman. Her three brothers attended: Msgr. Thomas Burke, who lives in Charlotte; Dominick B. Burke, from Connecticut; and Noel Bourke, from Ireland. Noel's daughter, Bridie Bourke, read at Mass.

The guests' responses to this occasion included special mention of the Scripture, the homily, and Bishop Curlin's closing words as most fitting reflections honoring this dedicated woman.

The Scripture for the 27th Sunday in ordinary time became extraordinary when applied to Sister Mary Thomas' life by the homilist, Msgr. Loftus. He offered the piece of her story that he said mattered most. "Here is a woman who is at peace with God, with her world, and with herself ...." he said. "Her very presence, which radiates gentleness, generosity, and love, brings healing.

"Sister Mary Thomas is the embodiment of the words of St. Paul in the second reading today: 'Keep on doing the things that you have learned and received and heard and seen in me, and the God of peace will be with you.'"

Following the homily, the renewal of vows was repeated in unison by each of the Sisters of Mercy present.

Bishop Curlin offered the closing remarks at the end of Mass. He said that there was one word for Sister Mary Thomas: "elegant." He then commended her for her witness and love. ▼

SEPI board meets in Charlotte

By LUIS A. WOLF
Correspondent

CHARLOTTE — Members of the Board of Directors of the South East Regional Office for Hispanic Ministry and SEPI (South East Pastoral Institute) met in Charlotte for its semi-annual meeting Oct. 2. The meeting was hosted by Bishop William G. Curlin.

Some who attended the meeting were, the Most Rev. John C. Favalora, chairperson, archbishop of Miami; Most Rev. John F. Donoghue, archbishop of Atlanta; Most Rev. Oscar H. Lipscomb, treasurer, archbishop of Mobile; Most Rev. Francis B. Schulte, archbishop of New Orleans; Most Reverend Kevin Boland, Bishop of Savannah; and Rev. Mario Vizcaino. Sch.P., secretary. Other members of this board that attended this meeting were two religious sisters and six lay persons. The present board consists of twelve bishops and ten lay people.

After the opening and greeting by Archbishop Favarola, Bishop Curlin welcomed the members of the board to Charlotte and stayed for the duration of the meeting. Bishop Curlin is a past member of the board.

During the meeting, in addition to the presentation of the different reports, other topics were discussed, including the Regional Encounter to be held October 21-24 in Saint Agustin, Florida, in preparation for "Encuentro 2000".

"Encuentro 2000" will take place in Los Angeles, Calif., next July. This encounter, convoked by the bishops of the United States, will focus on a multicultural process to help better integrate Hispanics into the full life of the church. This encounter is an invitation to people of various cultures to share their concerns and hopes and to learn how to grow together in unity. The theme of this "Encuentro" is "Many Faces in God's House — a Catholic Vision for the Third Millennium".

After the meeting, Vincentian Father Vincent H. Finnerty, director, and members of the Hispanic Ministry of the diocese were invited to report on their activities in the Diocese of Charlotte.

The South East Pastoral Institute is an educational and service-oriented organization that helps the Catholic bishops from the eight states of the southeast region of the United States to develop and train leaders in faith and culture for the integration of the Hispanic Community in the life of the church and society.

This office takes its educational and evangelization programs through the states of Florida, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, North and South Carolina, and Tennessee.

Since its foundation in 1978 the SEPI has helped to establish more than 600 Hispanic communities in the region, to organize an Hispanic Pastoral Ministry in each one of the 26 dioceses, and has graduated about 40 students with a masters degree in pastoral theology from Barry University. The SEPI also offers courses for lay ministers, youth pastoral programs, audiovisual courses, and dozens of other services. The office is located in Miami, Fla. ▼

Fidelity key for priests of next millennium, speaker says

By JEAN M. SCHILDZ
Catholic News Service

ST. LOUIS (CNS) — What will the new priests of the next millennium be like?

If Benedictine Father Mark O'Keefe has anything to say about it — and he does — they will be men whose lives focus on the Word and the sacraments while they seek to evangelize Catholics and non-Catholics.

The responsibility of priests in any age is fidelity to their ministry, said Father O'Keefe, a moral theologian who is president-rector of St. Meinrad School of Theology in Indiana. "Priests will be evangelizers for a new age by doing what they were consecrated to do — by being what they were consecrated to be."

Father O'Keefe spoke on "Gateway to a New Millennium: Crossing the Threshold of Hope" at the 1999 convention of the National Conference of Diocesan Vocation Directors Sept. 25-30 in St. Louis. The convention focused on the challenges of attracting vocations in the new millennium.

More than 220 vocations directors gathered for the meting, one of the largest turnouts in the organization's history, said Dorothy Foss, executive director. Some 97 percent of all U.S. dioceses were represented, she said.

In his speech, Father O'Keefe noted that the number of Catholics is on the rise while the number of active priests continues to fall. Some projections suggest that in a few years, half of U.S. parishes will be without a resident pastor.

With the current culture blinded by materialism, consumerism, individualism, subjectivism and relativism, a priest in the new millennium will find himself exercising his ministry to those largely uninterested in it "and perhaps unwelcoming, if not hostile, to it," Father O'Keefe said.

In the foreseeable future, fewer priests will have to serve more and bigger parishes in a culture less receptive to what they have to offer and among Catholics who, studies say, have less connection to the church with each passing generation, he said.

While the future of the priesthood or the shape of parish communities are "not entirely rosy," Father O'Keefe admitted, it should not be feared. We must trust in God, he said. The challenge for priests of today and tomorrow is "to be faithful and effective agents of the new evangelization."

Priests will be effective evangelizers through sound preaching and teaching, prayerful and reverent celebration of the Eucharist, and shepherding of a vibrant and inviting parish life, he said.

Responding to Father O'Keefe's comments were Father Louis T. Guerin, vocation minister in the Diocese of Palm Beach, Fla., and Father Robert Finn, director of the Office of Continuing Formation of Priests in the St. Louis Archdiocese.

Father Finn emphasized ongoing spiritual formation for priests to help them successfully carry out their ministry. The sacraments of penance and the Eucharist are of central importance, he said.

Priests should frequently receive the sacrament of reconciliation and make it readily available to all. Those who "have themselves been moved to authentic conversion through a frequent encounter with the living Jesus Christ will know best how to extend repentance to others," he said.

Father Guerin called conference participants "the principal realists" in the church because they see what lies ahead more clearly than others.

Building on Father O'Keefe's comments, Father Guerin said that not only the priesthood is "in store for some turbulence in the future, but also parish communities as we know them." Noting that this was a good starting point for vocation ministers, he added that this is where both the problem and its solution lie.

"If we keep trying to get viable, healthy candidates out of parish communities that are antiquated and paralyzed because they are essentially being maintained by management of an older other model, then we are doomed to continue to produce priests whose dreams and ideals are squashed early in their first assignment," Father Guerin said.

"After all, if the parish isn't healthy, why should the applicant be?" he asked.

Father Guerin proposed that parish communities be allowed to manage themselves "under the care of a priestly presence that is deeply rooted in 'being' rather than 'doing.'"

"Do not water down the message," he cautioned vocations ministers. The "magnetism" of the priestly person "is to energize, gather and commission the mundane into a formidable community," he said. "It is from these communities that the new vocations will emerge and prosper." ▼

While the future of the priesthood or the shape of parish communities are "not entirely rosy," Father O'Keefe admitted, it should not be feared. We must trust in God, he said. The challenge for priests of today and tomorrow is "to be faithful and effective agents of the new evangelization."

Permanent diaconate enhances family life

Retreatants reminded of commitment first to wives and family, then ministry

BY ELLEN NEERINCX SIGMON
CORRESPONDENT

HICKORY — On a Saturday morning, with only the sounds of leaves rustling, birds chirping and acorns falling, several permanent deacons and their wives strolled around the grounds of the Catholic Conference Center. Their assignment was to spend an hour in silence and solitude so that they could hear what it was that God had to say to each of them.

Sister Mary Charlene Nowak gave them this assignment. She was the leader of the annual retreat for the deacons of the Diocese of Charlotte and their wives from Oct. 8 to 10.

"It is important for you to take the time to reflect on who God is for you," Sister Nowak told them. "You are what your prayer is. You need to be who God wants you to be."

Sister Nowak currently serves as the director of theological field education and assistant professor of spirituality at Christ the King Seminary in East Aurora, N.Y. She is also associate director of the formation program of the permanent diaconate in the Diocese of Buffalo. She has worked with the permanent diaconate for 26 years, and was part of the initial team that established the wives program and the curriculum for the diaconate there. She has been a member of the Congregation of the Sisters of St. Felix of Cantalice for 43 years, and serves as a retreat director and spiritual director.

During the retreat, Sister Nowak also stressed how important it was for the deacons and their wives to spend time together. "Family is supposed to be first," she said. "You, as deacons, receive all the sacraments. Your wives are a very important part of these sacraments as well.

"People are going to look up to you. You haven't changed. You are yourself, but you may be calling other people to something else by who you are.

"Husbands, please remember, you married your wives first."

Josie Pais, wife of Rev. Mr. Louis Pais, a deacon at St. Gabriel parish in Charlotte, talked about her role in her husband's ministry. "I have to help him tune back in to the family," she said. "It won't work if the wife is not sure. Too many sacrifices have to be made. They (the deacons) are refreshed and renewed by us. I know my husband is more effective (in his work with others) because of his marital relationship."

Barbara Macero, wife of Rev. Mr. Carl Macero, Sr., a deacon at St. Thomas Aquinas parish in Charlotte, agreed. "I have to share him more, but part of my ministry is allowing him to minister," she said. "It really is important, though, for the wife to maintain the balance in the relationship."

A permanent deacon is an ordained minister of the Catholic Church and part of the hierarchical structure of bishop, priest, and deacon. He may preach, baptize solemnly, and officiate at marriages and funeral services, but he also has a role involving the ministries of charity and the Word. It is expected that most deacons will support themselves from earnings in everyday occupations, and then perform their diaconal duties during evenings and weekends. A permanent deacon continues the family lifestyle he had chosen prior to becoming a deacon. If he is married, he should be certain that his wife and family support his decision to apply for the permanent diaconate.

> "I have to share him more, but part of my ministry is allowing him to minister."

Both Mrs. Pais and Mrs. Macero said that their husbands' roles as deacons have enhanced their marriages. "My respect for my husband has really grown," said Mrs. Pais.

Mrs. Macero spoke of attending a wedding that her husband officiated. "It was very moving to see him serving in that capacity," she said. Mrs. Pais agreed, saying of her own husband, "I enjoyed hearing what he had to say about marriage and seeing how excited he was about it."

Rev. Mr. George McMahon, a deacon living in Morganton, also talked about how becoming a deacon has enhanced his married life. "It's been really beautiful," he said. "It has brought us together as one. I've also been privileged to baptize most of my grandchildren."

During the retreat organized by Rev. Mr. Ben Wenning, a deacon at St. Gabriel parish in Charlotte and administrator of the permanent diaconate for the Diocese of Charlotte, the deacons and their wives attended six conferences led by Sister Nowak. She spoke on various topics, including the sacraments, making God alive for others, silence and solitude, images of God, the importance of prayer, being a light for others, the importance of being a servant, and the crosses that come with it. The deacons and their wives also participated in the sacrament of reconciliation and several prayer services. Sunday Mass was officiated by Bishop William G. Curlin. ▾

Washington challenged to take moral responsibility for Medicare

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Catholic medical organizations say Medicare cuts have caused such a crisis in health care that Congress and the president have a moral responsibility to restore the money. In a newspaper and television campaign launched Oct. 5, the Catholic Health Association and a coalition of religious, social service and medical groups say many agencies that offer medical care to the elderly are on the brink of collapse because of declining Medicare coverage mandated by the 1997 Balanced Budget Act. The campaign was launched a day after the Census Bureau released a report saying 44.3 million people in the United States had no health insurance.

House attempt to cut off funding for SOA fails

WASHINGTON (CNS) — A House attempt to cut off funding for the U.S. Army School of the Americas was reversed when the bill reached a House-Senate conference committee and when the final version was passed. That portion of the school's funding included in the foreign operations budget was restored in the final version of the bill approved by the House Oct. 5 and the Senate Oct. 6. Meanwhile, the leader of a campaign to close the School of the Americas, known as SOA, said he hopes 10,000 people will turn out for an annual protest at the school in Columbus, Ga., and that attention will focus on separate bills to close the SOA.

Religious leaders join push to pass nuclear test ban treaty

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Religious leaders added their voices to calls for the Senate to ratify the Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty on nuclear weapons. Among those voices was Auxiliary Bishop John J. Glynn of the U.S. Archdiocese for the Military Services, who said Oct. 7 at a press conference at the White House that the treaty "is not just a political or legal instrument; it is a moral commitment." "The moral credibility of our country is at stake. We cannot credibly urge other nations to forgo nuclear weapons if we are not even willing to ratify a treaty to stop testing our own nuclear weapons," he added.

On bishops' agenda: education norms, age, charity, jubilee

WASHINGTON (CNS) — When the U.S. Catholic bishops meet in Washington Nov. 15-18, they plan to vote on Catholic higher education norms, pastoral messages on charity and on the blessings of age, and a message for the jubilee year. They also plan to vote on a pastoral plan for adult faith formation and a series of proposals to restructure the National Conference of Catholic Bishops-U.S. Catholic Conference and revise its statutes. The agenda calls for them to discuss — without voting on — a draft document on church art and architecture, a draft basic plan for the ongoing formation of priests and a project report on ecclesial lay ministry.

'Scriptures came alive' in apartheid struggle, Tutu says

ROCHESTER, N.Y. (CNS) — Dramatic changes in South Africa during the past decade point to the hand of God moving through human affairs, said Anglican Archbishop Desmond M. Tutu, the famed anti-apartheid activist and Nobel Peace Prize winner. "In many ways the Scriptures came alive," Archbishop Tutu said of the anti-apartheid struggle. "They seemed to have been written with our specific condition in mind." In a rousing speech, the retired archbishop of Cape Town, South Africa, wowed an Oct. 3 luncheon audience of 1,400 people who gave him many ovations. The luncheon was one of several highlights of the Sept. 30-Oct. 4 conference of Catholic Charities USA, the national network of church social-welfare agencies.

KANSAS CITY, Mo. (CNS) — Trafficking in women and children is one of the fastest growing and most lucrative criminal enterprises in the world, a U.S. government official told several hundred women attending a workshop Oct. 2 at the National Council of Catholic Women's convention in Kansas City. More than a million women and children a year are forced into slavery-like conditions as domestic servants, sweatshop laborers and prostitutes, said Anita Botti, deputy director for international initiatives at the President's Interagency Council on Women. It is estimated that more than 50,000 women and children are brought into the United States for profit, primarily from the former Soviet Union, Southeast Asia and Latin America, said Botti.

Students receive musical and artistic treat as part of lesson plan

By ALESHA M. PRICE
Staff Writer

CHARLOTTE — The sounds of a string quartet, the flute, the school band, and the voices of the entire student body of Holy Trinity Catholic Middle School echoed through the gym on Oct. 8 during an afternoon session featuring members of the Charlotte Symphony. This mini-concert was the grand finale of weeks of study through the Cultural Enrichment Program implemented in Mecklenburg Area Catholic Schools.

"The idea behind the program," said Debbie Huffman, director of development for MACS, is to "enhance the students' cultural awareness and to expose them to artistic enrichment."

For this particular program at Holy Trinity, Huffman worked with Susan Miville, the Charlotte Symphony director of education, who collaborated with the faculty at the school — a partnership with the Charlotte Symphony, Holy Trinity, and Temple Israel.

"We hoped to show students that art plays an important role in humankind and the different ways that music and language come together to create songs," said Miville. "We wanted to bring them into the presence of great art and professional artists.

According to Elaine Michaels, the head of the English department and an eighth-grade teacher at Holy Trinity, who played an important role in the formulation of the program, in April, the symphony met with the English teachers from each of the grades and the band and music teacher to decide what their individual focus would be. The sixth grade decided to study the Holocaust, and the seventh grade chose to study poetry and ballads. The eighth grade focused on mythology for the duration of the program.

Miville came up with the broad curriculum guidelines, which were presented to the teachers so that they could give their input. The final plan was distributed in September to all of the teachers who then added their own interpretations for their classes.

During the week of Oct. 4-8, Charlotte Symphony players were in classrooms teaching the students various topics.

Miville stated, "I tried to meet specific educational guidelines and gave the musicians freedom to do research and develop their teachings around the basic program."

The sixth grade studied the Holocaust and read literature such as "The Diary of Anne Frank" and "The Devil's Arithmetic." The students had the opportunity to hear the string quartet perform music from that time period during last week's classes. The members included Lorien Benet on violin, Kathleen Jarrell, also on violin, Alan Black, a cellist, and Marie Winget on viola.

David Priester, 11, said, "I like history, so I enjoyed learning about how the Jews still practiced their religion and stayed together no matter what problems they faced. They [the quartet] played music from Holocaust composers, and you can feel the pain of the concentration camps and even some the happiness the Jews felt through the music."

Poetry and ballads were the focus for the seventh graders, who wrote their own poems and looked for literary devices in popular songs. Jeff Ferdon and Christine Van Arsdale, a harpist, were the "substitute teachers" for the week who played music indigenous to that literary period and taught the students how to write a modified form of mosaic poetry.

"At that time in Spain, there was a peaceful exchange of cultures where the Muslims, Christians and Jews were living together," explained Ferdon, a symphony double bass and viola da gamba player. "We presented music from over 800 years ago to the kids and gave them a part of Spanish Catholic history of which they might not be aware."

"The lessons were different from our everyday classes, and I liked having a break in our regular schedule," said Christine Mancusi, 12. "I learned that you can write different parts of a poem and put them together so that they sound good."

The eighth-graders studied various Greek and Roman myths and were taught by Anna Brock, a pianist, and Shirley Gilpin, a flautist, who played selections from Holst's "The Planets" during last week's session.

Allison Wentz, 13, said that "it is interesting how mythology can connect with music and how a song can sound like the description of a person."

Friday's program, based on the various lessons from all of the grades, opened with "Hatikvah," the Israeli national anthem performed by the school's band, and "Hinei Mah Tov" sung by Cantor Elias Roochvarg, the lead singer at Temple Israel. Students read their writings and poems from their classes, and the members of the Charlotte Symphony played selections based on the themes of the English classes and asked the students to interact with them throughout the afternoon program.

Alan Kaufman, the school's band director, directed the eighth-grade band as they played the Israeli national anthem and Kaufman's original composition, "Our Sisters of Mercy Overture."

POPE JOHN PAUL II

Knowledge of God comes through growth in his love

By JOHN NORTON
Catholic News Service

VATICAN CITY — Knowledge of God is less an intellectual process than a growth in his love, said Pope John Paul II.

"Certainly knowledge of God also has a dimension in the intellectual realm," the pope said during his Oct. 6 weekly general audience.

"But the living experience of the Father and the Son comes about in love, that is, in the last analysis, in the Holy Spirit, because God's love has been poured into our hearts by means of the Holy Spirit," he said.

Addressing thousands of pilgrims in a chilly and cloud-covered St. Peter's Square, the pope said the whole of Christian life can be summed up in the commandment to love.

"Everyone who loves is begotten by God and knows God," said the pope, quoting the First Letter of St. John.

"These sublime words, while revealing to us God's very essence as a mystery of infinite charity, lay the foundation on which the Christian ethic rests, all concentrated on the commandment to love," the pope said.

This commandment can be traced to the Old Testament covenant between God and Israel, he said.

"On one side, there is God's initiative of love; on the other, the response of love which he expects," he said.

In the New Testament, the dynamic of love is centered on Jesus Christ, the pope said.

"Humans participate in this love by knowing the Son, that is, by receiving his teaching and his redemptive work," he said.

"It is not possible to approach God's love except by imitating the Son in the observance of the Father's commandments," he said.

Initiation into this love brings full participation in Christ's filial relationship with the Father, the pope said.

"Love transforms life and illuminates even our knowledge of God, until reaching that perfect knowledge of which St. Paul spoke," he said.

Christian conversion brings an authentic experience of God and his infinite love, the pope said.

"The new heart, which loves and knows, beats in union with God, who loves with a perennial love," he said.

At the end of his audience, the pope asked for prayers for peace between Ethiopia and Eritrea, which have been engaged in a sporadic border war for 17 months.

The pope praised international mediators, especially the Organization of African Unity, for efforts to implement a negotiated settlement.

"Let us pray that the lingering obstacles will be overcome and the diffidence conquered, and that in this way, an encouraging witness that peace is always possible might be offered to the many 'countries of sorrow,'" he said.

Vatican II sparks discussion

Just a comment concerning the Sept. 3 issue, on the article "Vatican II sparks discussion at St. Francis." Besides the naïve, sort of utopian haze that marks the whole piece, there is a singular ugly, unjust and inaccurate analogy put forward by Brahmer, comparing the fallen and faithless Israelites of the Sinai desert with Catholics who are not exactly ecstatic about all the changes coming in the wake of Vatican II. This unfortunate comparison is truly uncalled for and certainly should not have been printed. However, the analogy does fit — perversely — in another sense: there certainly has been some "weeding out" going on, since over the past 34 years Mass attendance in this country has dropped from more than 70% to less than 22%. And among those who still bother to call themselves Catholic, two-thirds do not believe in the reality of the Church's central act of worship, the Eucharist, an unprecedented failure of faith.

Articles about the Second Vatican Council should be about the Council itself and not about knocking the past and the achievements of our Catholic ancestors. The accomplishments of the Council do not need to be defended by defaming the past. If there were problems in the preconciliar days (and there were), there are problems, many problems in the Church in our own day. In fact, Brahmer's analogy may be right in a way he did not intend — the past 34 years since Vatican II have been a veritable "wandering in the desert." We Catholics in America have lots of reasons to rejoice in our heritage and not so many reasons to gloat about the present state of things.

Andrew and Terri Lyke's column on "Different religions in marriage" (Sept. 3, 1999), albeit well intended, is a dangerously confused reflection with grave consequences.

Some of their advice to an engaged couple concerned about being of two religions was "...discuss this with their pastors, get a sense of what their membership [in their respective churches] means to their relationship, involve themselves in a ministry together, and allow time, work and the Spirit to direct them. Eventually, they will gravitate to one church or the other."

I come away with the sense that this couple could, based on this advice, justifiably conclude that one church was as good as another. What happens to the Catholic member's obligation to participate in the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass on Sunday? What about the great deposit of the Faith received at baptism, nurtured in the Eucharist, sealed in Confirmation to be shared with all those we encounter, especially one as dear as a fiancee?

The Lykes cite that our faith changes; true, but through the grace of the sacraments leading us more deeply into the heart of the Church not out of it. The Catechism of the Catholic Church states:

"For it is through Christ's Catholic Church alone, which is the universal help toward salvation, that the fullness of the means of salvation can be obtained. It was to the apostolic college alone, of which Peter is the head, that we believe that our Lord entrusted all the blessings of the New Covenant, in order to establish on earth the one Body of Christ into which all those should be fully incorporated who belong in any way to the People of God." (cf. 830)

We must never lead anyone to squander so great a gift as the one, holy, catholic and apostolic church of Christ.

Stewards of the light

It is interesting how certain buzz words pop up in speeches and sermons and during campaigns that try to stir up public good will and consent. Stewardship is one of those words that have been getting a workout lately. Politicians use it as frequently as religious leaders do to assert our shared responsibility to be "good stewards" of creation.

Truth is, activists and philosophers, scientists and saints have been warning us for generations that citizens of the world need to become better stewards — collectively and individually — of the resources we have. Like a wine steward, or a steward on a ship or airplane, we are expected to manage provisions so that everyone gets a share. It makes for appealing rhetoric, but true stewardship is difficult to achieve. Indeed, many of us have trouble managing things because, in truth, we allow things to manage us.

Evidence abounds that the yearning for material things — houses, cars, furniture, and clothing — eventually ties our self-worth to external things. For example, young people struggling to come to terms with their identities are particularly vulnerable to envy, feeling miserable if they don't have the "right" jeans or sneakers.

And what about adults? Forty percent of Americans today have more debt than assets, when real estate is factored out. The average house today has twice the square footage of those built in the 1950s, even though there are fewer people in them. While most suburbanites in the '60s and '70s were satisfied with a $10 charcoal grill in the backyard, grill sales are expected to reach $1.4 billion this year. Sales are strong in the high-end $1,000 to $4,000 range.

Talk about stewardship becomes hollow when envy and greed propel us to live beyond our own means and still covet the riches of others. Why are we so incapable of saying "Enough!?" Why is it so easy to be ungrateful for what we have and ungenerous with those who have little?

In Letters to My Son: Reflections on Becoming a Man, Kent Nerburn wrote: "Somehow we need to find a true measure of value for our possessions so we can free ourselves from their weight without denying them their rightful value." He suggests that his son ask himself if a possession will make him a better person, more able to share, more able to give, more willing to do good in a world that cries out for help.

Maybe we would finally be the stewards God expects if we realized that our responsibilities are not just about managing money and resources, but our time and abilities and character.

Bishop Joseph V. Adamec, speaking at a Stewardship Day last month in his Altoona-Johnstown, Pa., Diocese, reflected on Christ's admonition that we place our light atop a stand where all can see. "Actually I never thought of it this way before, but each of us is challenged to be a steward of the Light which is Christ. By using your talents and treasure for the benefit of others, your light will push back the darkness of greed and envy, and make this world just that much brighter."

Your world, your neighbors in need are desperate for everything you have to give, not just from your checkbook but from your understanding mind and loving heart.

Like sand in an hourglass, so are the days of our lives

With little more than 75 days until the new millennium, it's interesting to watch the top events of this millennium pollsters kick out their perceived millennial heavy hitters.

I am not a historian. However, I find great humor with each subsequent best of the best. I cannot agree with any popular conviction that calls Elvis the greatest musician of the past 1,000 years, nor do I see Abraham Lincoln as the greatest political leader within the same millennial timeframe. Both good, neither top ten material.

Just this week, I received an e-mail from an Internet newsgroup. This contained some interesting pearls of wisdom, including Mother Teresa and Pope John Paul II on their very short list, naming them as the greatest religious figures of this millennium.

No doubt these are two of the greats. While this pontiff and the saintly nun are certainly worthy of making the list, I'm more inclined to call them greats of our lifetime. Last time I checked, a thousand years constituted a millennium. Most of these pop polls are more centennial oriented. And in many online polls, results read in terms of decades, not even close to 100 years, and are worlds apart from the entire millennium.

One major magazine reflects upon the millennial top 100. Perusing through the entire listing, very few listings date prior to the mid-13th century. While still claiming non-historian status, I do believe that at least a few events that shaped our world happened sometime in those first few hundred years.

If you follow this list as gospel, then count yourself among those with the memory span of a gnat. However, if you see yourself more along the lines of a trivia buff, sit back and enjoy the ride.

Number 100 on the list — bear in mind this is a countdown, making this the least significant — was the invention of the calendar, dated to the mid-1550s. A footnote points out the Gregorian calendar is a couple dozen seconds from accuracy. Perhaps this timely inaccuracy is cause for the entire list spinning out of kilter.

Number one on that same list was the Gutenberg Bible. Good choice. The first typeset Bible brought the Word to life in the literal sense. This early print press brought the words — biblical and other works — to the people. Before this, literacy was reserved for an elite group of priests, nobility and scribes.

I do, however, have a hard time giving a whole lot of credence to a list that includes the concoction of Coca-Cola as one of the key inventions of the past 1,000 years. By the way, the cola invention is listed as more important than the aforementioned calendar. And as one of the great cola consumers, I have a real taste for soft drinks, but come on ...

Perhaps I'm reading too much into the polls. Maybe we should just raise our glasses high with the pause that refreshes and toast the mark of time.

Question Corner

FATHER JOHN DIETZEN
CNS COLUMNIST

What are relics really?

Q. When I was a child at St. Margaret of Scotland Church, our religion teacher told us our church housed a relic (a bone) of St. Margaret. It made a huge impression on me.

While I don't doubt the church had the relic, I have wondered about its validity. Where did this idea start? Does every church have a relic of its saint? How do church officials evaluate the authenticity of a relic? Our own children have never heard of them.

A. The veneration of the relics of saints (some clothing, something they used, even sometimes parts of their bodies) or of Our Lord (parts of the cross, for example), is one of those areas of Christian belief which are theologically solidly founded, but which, as history proves, have an almost built-in temptation for misunderstanding and even abuse.

The answer to your questions requires explaining a little of that experience.

As most of us know, very early on the Christian people began to honor the bodies of saints, especially the martyrs who gave their lives rather than deny their faith. Sometimes, for example, the blood of those who had been beheaded was collected on a cloth to be kept as a reminder of that individual's fidelity and courage in professing belief in Christ.

In time, the Eucharist was celebrated and churches were built over their tombs.

Later, however, the custom assumed some bizarre features. Possession of the bodies of certain saints became a jealously guarded source of prestige for churches and monasteries. When St. Thomas Aquinas, a Dominican, died in the Cistercian monastery of Fossa Nuova, the monks there reportedly decapitated his body to be certain of keeping his remains. The tug of war between the Cistercian monks and Dominicans for Thomas' body continued for decades.

Transfer of relics became a major international business. The church finds it necessary even to this day to forbid transfer of major relics from one place to another without the pope's permission (Canon 1190).

Not surprisingly, this strange sort of dealing with the bodies of saints was reflected in popular piety in the Middle Ages and beyond. Veneration of relics gave rise to all kinds of feasts, shrines and pilgrimages — such as the one described in Chaucer's "Canterbury Tales," for example.

Possession of relics became a mark of affluence and power. During a banquet in 1392, King Charles VI of France presented his guests with parts of the ribs of his sainted ancestor, St. Louis.

Even popes eventually became nearly powerless to discourage these practices. Mishandling, and the sale, of relics became one of the major abuses attacked by leaders of the Protestant Reformation.

In 1563, the Council of Trent offered three positive reasons for honoring the bodies of saints. They were living members of the body of Christ, they were temples of the Holy Spirit and they are destined for resurrection (Session XXV).

By the late Middle Ages it was customary, and finally required, to insert a saint's relic in every altar, the old "altar stone." Relics may still be placed in altars now, but only under certain conditions, one of which is that the relic be large enough to be recognizable as part of a human body (Rite of Dedicating a Church, 5).

For genuine relics, an authentication is normally issued by a church agency or religious order declaring that, as far as it is possible to determine, a particular relic is actually what it is reported to be.

Pope explains to children why he forgave would-be assassin

ROME (CNS) — Asked by children to explain why he forgave the man who tried to kill him in 1981, Pope John Paul II said he was just following the simple teaching of Jesus Christ. The pope was responding to some questions posed by the younger members of the Rome parish of St. Catherine of Siena, where he made a morning visit Oct. 10. "I forgave him because that's what Jesus teaches. Jesus teaches us to forgive," the pope replied.

World change begins with self change, peace award winner says

DAVENPORT, Iowa (CNS) — "Peace is the same as love," said Nobel Peace Prize laureate Adolfo Perez Esquivel as he accepted the Pacem in Terris Peace and Freedom Award in Davenport. Those words summarized his nearly 40-year struggle to promote human rights through nonviolent means in his home country of Argentina, throughout Latin America and in the world. Bishop William E. Franklin of Davenport presented the award plaque to Esquivel Sept. 30 on the campus of St. Ambrose University in Davenport.

Archbishop says Ventura needs lesson in how church aids society

ST. PAUL, Minn. (CNS) — Minnesota Gov. Jesse Ventura needs a lesson in how important church and religion are to society, according to a Minnesota archbishop. "We realize that Gov. Ventura is undergoing a learning process during his first term in office," Archbishop Harry J. Flynn of St. Paul and Minneapolis said in a statement about the governor's Playboy magazine slam on organized religion. "Our hope is that as he continues to evaluate and examine what is necessary to lead our state, he will choose to educate himself fully on the importance of church and religion in our society and perhaps even learn from our example," the archbishop added.

Welsh priest convicted of sex offenses dismissed by papal decree

CARDIFF, Wales (CNS) — A priest of the Archdiocese of Cardiff, jailed last year for sex offenses, has been dismissed from the priesthood by papal decree, said Archbishop John A. Ward. A statement issued by the archdiocese Oct. 5 confirmed that John Lloyd, 58, had been dismissed in the unusual step by Pope John Paul II after a request from the archbishop. In 1998, the priest was convicted on 14 charges of sexual assault, mostly against young people. He is serving an eight-year prison sentence.

Brother of disappeared former Jesuit won't end search for truth

TEGUCIGALPA, Honduras (CNS) — The brother of a former U.S. Jesuit priest, believed to have been killed by the Honduran military in the 1980s, said he would not give up his quest for the truth, but he admitted that he might not live to hear it. "I feel so close to my brother that I will be satisfied with what history will eventually bring forth. I expect the truth to come out ... in a country like this (Honduras), everyone knows what's going on," said 73-year-old Patrick Carney. "Eventually we will piece things together, but that may not be in my lifetime; that doesn't matter to me, I just want to be part of this" search, he told Catholic News Service.

Vatican expert's book defends WWII policies of Pope Pius XII

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — In a book based on 12 volumes of historical documents, the Vatican's leading expert on World War II defended Pope Pius XII's quiet diplomacy and said it helped save thousands of Jewish lives. "His public silence covered a secret activity through nunciatures and episcopates aimed at stopping deportations," French Jesuit Father Pierre Blet said Oct. 8. Rejecting the accusation that Pope Pius was anti-Semitic, Father Blet said: "He certainly was not. Look at all the actions he undertook" on behalf of the Jews. Father Blet spoke at a Vatican press conference to present his Italian-language book, "Pius XII and the Second World War."

NBA star talks to Michigan youths about sexual abstinence

SAGINAW, Mich. (CNS) — Bad decisions can have consequences that last a lifetime, especially a decision to have pre-marital sex, Los Angeles forward A.C. Green told a Saginaw youth gathering. Green, a 15-year veteran of the National Basketball Association, spoke to 350 youths and parents at a September rally sponsored by a group that promotes abortion alternatives and pregnancy assistance. He talked about why today's young people are driven to pre-marital sex and discussed reasons why and how youths should overcome peer pressure and steer away from such activities. The NBA star is founder and president of the A.C. Green Youth Foundation established in 1989 to educate youths to make responsible choices about sexual abstinence and social issues.

"I wrote the song as a part of an educational grant in honor of the school's new educational building, the Our Lady of Mercy Educational Center," said Kaufman. "I believe the program overall teaches the children how to derive beauty and creativity from situations that they could not imagine."

The eighth-grade girls' honors ensemble sung a 12th-century plainsong and songs from "A Taize Prayer Service."

Barbara Scott, the school's music teacher said, "The kids learned Hebrew chants and Latin hymns in chorus class. The Catholic background of the children feeds into these lessons, and they are able to relate to what they are studying."

Michaels said, "Music is an expression of literature and vice-versa. Both are able to reach emotional heights and lows and the depths of the soul. We cannot separate the two." ▼

Catholic spreads word on faith through adult ed classes

By ELIZABETH LOVEJOY
Correspondent

MONTREAT — Patrick Killough wants to give his non-Catholic friends and neighbors the chance to see and experience a live, walking-around, thinking Catholic who takes his religion seriously. To that end, he is teaching a series of adult education courses at Montreat College Center for Adult Lifelong Learning (MCCALL).

"Most of my students at MCCALL are not Catholic," Killough says. "They haven't known many Catholics, and they have misconceptions about Catholicism." His idea is to introduce modern Catholic culture through writings by and about Catholics, both fiction and non-fiction. And to be an example of a real living Catholic.

The first course, held last spring, was about the Jesuits. This fall he is teaching a course on the writings of British author Graham Greene who, he says, is probably the most important Catholic novelist in the 20th century.

Greene, an Englishman and Catholic convert from the Church of England, died in 1991 at the age of 95. He wrote prodigiously and successfully in many forms, but the most well known are his novels and plays, many of which were made into movies, and were hits both in England and abroad.

Patrick Killough speaks with a class member after teaching an adult education class at Montreat College Center for Adult Lifelong Learning (MCCALL).

For the past six years, Killough and his wife, Mary, have also taught adult classes at their parish church, St. Margaret Mary in Swannanoa, to fellow Catholics, some of whom haven't had a chance previously to study Catholicism beyond basic church doctrine. He is currently teaching about Graham Greene there, also.

Killough's career with the Foreign Service took him and his family to the far reaches of the globe, none of which were populated by significant numbers of Catholics. While his faith and roots in Catholicism have remained strong, he now finds satisfaction in studying and passing along Catholic thought, both historical and modern.

He attempts to take the mystique out of Catholicism for non-Catholics, and to share with his fellow church members a greater sense of individual spiritual strength through relevant intellectual stimulation.

Patrick Killough considers himself ecumenical, and observes with satisfaction such trends as the bridges being built between Catholics and Lutherans in North Carolina. He offers his courses as an amateur, he says, although teaching is not new to him. Since retiring and moving to Swannanoa in the early '90s, he has also taught as an adjunct at the University of North Carolina-Asheville, Warren Wilson College and Mars Hill College.

Patrick Killough makes a point during a recent class on Catholic writer Graham Greene. Killough teaches adult education courses at Montreat College and St. Margaret Mary Church in Swannanoa.

Educated primarily by the Jesuits, Killough has witnessed over the years a trend in the church toward more effort by lay people to study and teach to each other various aspects of their Catholic culture beyond catechetical doctrine.

He sees himself as a participant in the trend. He also sees Graham Greene as a prime participant through his writing. As an intellectual and a convert, Greene brought to his writing many questions asked by people who take their religion seriously.

"I think Greene was part of a generation of Catholics in England, including a number of women, who began carving out a role for themselves as laymen," he says. "There was a time when most education was with the clergy. That is no longer true."

Killough describes Graham Greene as unabashedly sinful, although remorseful. It is apparent that Greene's books were fashioned after his own life, and that his characters seem always to be anguishing about various crucial life questions.

"He wrote about religious components as motives in people's lives — often about people who are Catholics," he says. "Good Catholics, bad Catholics — mainly about bad ones."

Greene's characters have to work out their unique personal (and not always orthodox) religious ties to God.

"I think Greene was intellectually a very honest person," Killough says. "He discovered early in his writing he could not write about things he had not lived. ... And yes, he had his rationalizations about his behavior. But Greene was a tormented Catholic, I think." ▼

"I think Greene was part of a generation of Catholics in England, including a number of women, who began carving out a role for themselves as laymen. There was a time when most education was with the clergy. That is no longer true."

My Dear Friends in Christ,

As we celebrate World Mission Sunday, Oct. 24, we are mindful of our preparations for the coming 2,000th anniversary of the birth of our Lord. Those preparations this year call us to focus on God, our loving Father; God who loved the world so much He sent His only Son so that all people may be saved through Him.

Today, more than two-thirds of the world's people have yet to hear the great "Good News" of Jesus Christ their Savior or to experience — through the word and witness of missionaries — the abiding love of His Father. How vital, therefore, is our support for the missionary work of the Church.

As Pope John Paul II notes in his message for World Mission Sunday this year, "The Church is missionary in order to proclaim untiringly that God is Father, filled with love for all mankind." On World Mission Sunday, we unite with Catholics throughout the world in special commitment to this missionary task we all share. We should pray for the Church's missionary work and offer our personal sacrifices — our own sufferings, our cares and concerns — in union with the sufferings of Christ on the Cross for the salvation of the world. We should also offer financial help through the Propagation of the Faith for the missionary task.

The missionary work of the Church depends on each one of us. Please be as generous as your means will allow this World Mission Sunday and continue to pray that all of us in the Diocese of Charlotte may be eager and effective witnesses to God, our loving Father and to His only Son, Jesus Christ.

Sincerely in Christ,

An occasion to express the Christian "passion for mission"

World Mission Sunday

October 24, 1999

In faith-communities around the world, many people have very little in the way of worldly goods, but they have a "passion" for mission and, like Catholics in the United States, express that love on World Mission Sunday.

Father George Stephen, pastor of the parish in Chinnalapatty, India, says that the usual Sunday collection amounts to a total of $5. Despite the poverty of the parish, however, the people celebrated World Mission Sunday last year by contributing $125 for the Church's missionary work. The parishioners brought lunch with them that day and ate together on the church grounds. "It promoted the feeling of one community and kindled the spirit of evangelization," Father Stephen said.

Pope John Paul, in his message for World Mission Sunday this year, reminds the Catholics of the world that: "Mission must be the passion of every Christian, a passion for the salvation of the world..." just weeks before the opening of the Great jubilee in celebration of the 2000th anniversary of the birth of Jesus, two-thirds of the world's people still do not know Him in faith. Who can invite them to Christ but those who have been blessed with the gift of faith and a passion for mission?

The invitation goes out, in person, every day. From the United States, missionaries serve in countries throughout Africa, Asia, Islands of the Pacific and Latin America. The United States is not alone in this endeavor!

Indeed, the Church in many mission countries sends out missionaries: Korean Sisters, for example, are serving in Mongolia; priests from Nigeria are at work in other countries of Africa and in parishes in Texas and Maryland, and African priests and Religious are serving in Asia.

The celebration of World Mission Sunday is a reminder that the call to mission is directed to all and that everyone can answer — and needs to answer — through prayer and personal sacrifice and by financial support.

World Mission Sunday gives Catholics the opportunity to pray for the Church's worldwide mission in a special way — together, at Mass — and to offer help from the very heart of their faith for those who hunger and thirst, even unknowingly, for the news of God's love and His gift of salvation in Christ.

Bishop Joseph Ajomo of Lokoja, Nigeria, says that World Mission Sunday in his diocese begins with a week-long program of talks, bible study and question-and-answer gatherings about the meaning and importance of the occasion. On World Mission Sunday itself, the Liturgy reflects the missionary spirit.

Bishop Joseph Das of Berhampur, India, writes that in connection with World Mission Sunday the people are told: "If our children are given mission education, it is due to the sacrifices of many abroad who contribute from their blessings." And, he adds, "Though our people are poor as a whole, wholeheartedly they contribute for Mission Sunday."

Wholeheartedly, they express their passion for mission.

Today, 2000 years after the birth of Jesus, Savior to the world, two-thirds of the human family still do not know Him in faith.

Abba Leo is "father" to people of all ages in Ethiopia. Here, he enjoys a visit with a mother and her children, one of the families in his parish.

Missionary to the ends of the earth

Reflecting the love of God Himself

A story comes from Ethiopia about a missionary priest, Abba Leo from Italy. 'Abba": the very intimate name Jesus called His Father.

One evening, crossing a darkening forest on his motor bike, Abba Leo noticed an old woman struggling to build a little shelter with some sticks and dried leaves. He asked her, "What are you doing here, mama, at this time of the evening?" She had nowhere to go, she told him. Her people had put her out of their house: "They say that I am too old and eat without doing any work."

"I'll tell you what we shall do," Abba Leo said. "In ten minutes, I'll be back. We'll light a nice fire to warm us up and keep the animals away."

And so it was. In a short time, Abba Leo returned from the mission with a blanket, some food and a sleeping bag. In the morning, he was back at the mission to ring the bell for Mass.

That evening, as he was about to relax outside the mission house after his day's work, he thought of the elderly woman in the forest. And he thought of the hyenas and jackals. Thought giving birth to action, off he went on his motor bike, toting his sleeping bag. Again on the third evening, he was moved to spend the night on the ground to guard the abandoned woman from danger.

The next day, his people questioned him: "Where have you been?" So he told them the whole story. "Very well," they said, "tonight you will sleep in your own bed"; and away they went to build a proper hut for the woman so that she too could sleep "safe and sound."

Father Franco Mastromauro of Awasa, Ethiopia, who sent this story to the Propagation of the Faith, says, "Abba Leo did not need to prepare a sermon on Christian charity for the following Sunday. The homily had already been delivered and well received." And one elderly, abandoned woman knew what it was like to be loved by the Father.

Continually, Jesus spoke to His Father in prayer. Again and again, He spoke about His Father. He was sent so that in every age and place, all might know the Father, and experience His love.

So, too, we are sent. "As the Father has sent me, so I send you" (John 20:21).

"Mission" becomes our vocation at baptism as we are signed with the Cross and incorporated into the divine life of the Trinity, Father, Son and Holy Spirit. We are sent to be missionaries in the daily world around us: in our home, workplace, school, neighborhood. We are sent as well to influence the wider world of our society and culture. And, in the words of Jesus at the beginning of the Acts of the Apostles, we are to be His witnesses also "'to the very ends of the earth."

Many — like Abba Leo and Father Mastromauro — fulfill their missionary vocation as they leave behind their families and friends, as they travel to a country and culture new to them and, there, live and witness and proclaim their faith in Jesus Christ. Through them, many hear the Word and, with God"s grace, come to live in the faith that is the rock on which our lives are built.

Others — most of us — have a more subtle but no less real call to mission. Ours is the way of "prayer and sacrifice," a way envisioned by a young lay woman in France who wanted to love "without measure, without boundaries, without frontiers." In doing so, and in devising a way for every Catholic to do so, Pauline Jaricot laid the foundation for the now-worldwide Propagation of the Faith, which encourages prayer and sacrifice for the Church's missionary work and is the Church's central means of support for the missionary task.

On World Mission Sunday, celebrated worldwide on October 24, we are reminded of the truth that each follower of Christ is called to be missionary "to the ends of the earth." (just think what the world would be like if each one of us WAS!) Pope John Paul, in his message for World Mission Sunday, takes us a step further. "Mission," he says, "'must be the passion of every Christian; a passion for the salvation of the world...."

On World Mission Sunday, we offer prayer and sacrifice, through the Propagation of the Faith, for the missions of the world. A portion of the offering from Catholics in the United States remains in our country for the work of the Home Missions.

United with Abba Leo, with all missionaries of the world, with all our sisters and brothers in Christ, we proclaim our love for Jesus, our Savior, as we express our passion for mission.

Sisters and brothers throughout the missions serve in pastoral work, in education, health care and social services. Some 10,000 men and women novices in Religious Communities around the world are preparing for a lifetime of service to Christ and to the poor.

"Peace I leave with you; My peace I give to you..." (John 15:27)

Bishop Anastacio Cahango, O.F.M. Cap., auxiliary bishop of Luanda, sees in the midst of ongoing conflict in his country, an increasing thirst for the Gospel. The church cannot respond to the demands for evangelization. Our parishes are insufficient and so are the misson workers. The churches are unable to contain the great crowds coming to Mass. The situation is such, he says, that: "Only God can bring peace now."

"It was not you who chose me, but I who chose you..." (John 15:16)

The first national major seminary in Laos opened in September 1998. Sixteen seminarians are preparing for the priesthood there. In the past, seminarians studied in major seminaries outside the country.

In the past 70 years, some 1,300 missionaries have given supreme witness to Christ with the sacrifice of their lives. In very recent years, 32 missionaries gave this witness 1995, 46 in 1996, 29 in 1997, as many as 40 in 1998. Pope John Paul II says that the history of recent years demonstrates that persecution gaves rise to new Christians and that suffering, endured for Christ and his Gospel, is indispensable for the spreading of the kingdom of God.

Ministry of Mary a 'theological gold mine' for women, author says

By NANCY FRAZIER O'BRIEN
Catholic News Service

WASHINGTON (CNS) — The ministry of Mary offers a "theological gold mine" for discussions on the role of women in the church, according to the author of a new book on Mary.

But Redemptorist Father Jim McManus, author of "All Generations Will Call Me Blessed: Mary at the Millennium" (Crossroad, $14.95), said Mary also plays a central role in church discussions of social justice matters and ecumenism, among other issues.

"Pope John Paul II has said that God the Father entrusted his Son to the ministry of Mary," Father McManus said in an interview with Catholic News Service Sept. 28. "When looking at the ministry of women, this offers a theological gold mine for people to reflect on."

Such a reflection could "open the doors to all kinds of ministries by women," which are already "growing at a fast pace," he added.

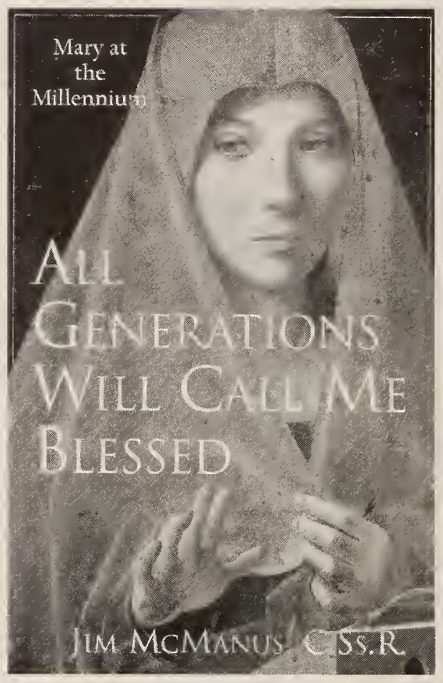
Father McManus, a London-based Irishman who served for nine years as provincial superior of Redemptorists in the United Kingdom, is now visiting several U.S. cities while on sabbatical. He spent a month in Washington with his younger brother, Father Sean McManus, president of the Washington-based Irish National Caucus.

Crossroad Publishing Co. in New York commissioned the book on Mary, based in part on familiarity with Father McManus' other books, including "The Healing Power of the Sacraments" and "Hallowed Be Thy Name."

Although the priest, a moral theologian, had no particular expertise in Mary, he took the assignment because "I had known Mary all my life, and I'm a preacher and I often preach on Mary."

He viewed the book as "a lovely opportunity to tell other people how Mary is known in the church and how we can get to know her through devotions."

The first four of the book's eight chapters look at how Mary is depicted in the Scriptures, by the early church fathers and in later church teaching. The second half of the 184-page book deals with Mary's place in the devotional life of Catholics and other Christians.



Father McManus said the key to Mary's role in the church during the third millennium is found in the Magnificat, her prayer of complete faith in God, contained in the first chapter of Luke.

"The Magnificat is not simply a hymn of thanksgiving for the grace God has given to Mary; it is more like a manifesto of salvation, a proclamation of the fidelity of God to his promises and the definitive inauguration of God's kingdom," Father McManus wrote.

"It can be read and received in every age, in every culture, and in every political and social situation," he added. "In our own time it is Mary's proclamation of God's victorious justice, his reversal of the things and values of this world, which has been rediscovered in a new way."

One chapter is devoted to how many Christian churches are returning Mary to a place of honor in their worship services, after centuries of neglect prompted by what Father McManus called political rather than theological differences between the Catholic and Protestant churches.

"As the Reformation developed, there were two warring camps, in a

I think a lot about church-state issues. More than most folks, I'm sure. As a reminder of how many important areas this array of issues hits, I carry a Roman coin, one with Constantine's head on it, in my back pocket.

As Christians, our relationship to the state changed dramatically when the Emperor Constantine proclaimed Christianity the state religion after a dramatic conversion experience in the third century.

When Jesus spoke his words in Matthew to clarify the issue at a time when the Roman state took a very different orientation toward the Jews of Israel, he gave an answer that was mystically complex and yet clear at the same time. It was one of those incredibly wise answers we sometimes get from Scripture that is specific enough to give the answer needed at the time it was spoken, yet broad enough in its application to guide humanity for all time.

Trying to trip Jesus up, his questioners asked him if it was lawful to pay tax to the emperor. He sensed their bad faith and said: "Why are you trying to trip me up, you hypocrites? Show me the coin used for the tax." They showed him the Roman coin, and he asked them, "Whose head is this, and whose inscription?" "Caesar's," they said, and he told them, "Give to Caesar what is Caesar's, but give to God what is God's."

Governments have changed, kingdoms have fallen and been raised up again, and still Jesus' words of wisdom serve us well. We submit to governments in areas where they are not in direct conflict with God's call to us to follow him and his laws. We challenge governments in areas where there is conflict, such as abortion, care of the poor and the immigrant, the possession and threat of use of nuclear weapons, and improper armed conflict. God's word and the resultant respect for humanity require that we not give up this coinage to the state, for these are the coins with the image of God inscribed upon them.

Questions:
Have you found at times that your conscience has moved you to oppose some action of the government in order to remain faithful to God?

"Give to the Lord, you families of nations, give to the Lord glory and praise;... Say among the nations: The Lord is king,... He governs the peoples with equity"

— Psalm 96:7,10a,c.

"Mystery, Alaska" is mindless sports comedy

By HENRY HERX
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

NEW YORK (CNS) — An amateur hockey team challenges a professional team to an exhibition game in the slick but mindless sports comedy, "Mystery, Alaska" (Hollywood).

The hockey-mad town in the frozen North is written up by a sportswriter who gets the New York Rangers to agree to play the reputed amateur hotshots.

Before they do, however, the story follows the mostly sexual exploits of team members, the most notable of which is the town sheriff (Russell Crowe), who's also the team's aging captain and has worries about his wife (Mary McCormack) two-timing him.

There are too many characters for any to be treated in depth and the result is a series of quirky sitcom scenes for which script co-author and producer David E. Kelley is well-known.

Directed by Jay Roach, the personal melodramatics are only of fitful interest and contribute nothing to the emotional tension of the big game which is put over by bruising body checks and sports movie heroics.

For all the production effort, the result is disappointing both as romantic melodrama and sports saga.

Because of stylized violence on and off the rink, several sexual encounters and much innuendo as well as frequent profanity and rough language, the U.S. Catholic Conference classification is A-IV — adults, with reservations. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is R — restricted. ▼

"The Boy Who Could Fly" (1986)

A teen-age girl befriends an autistic boy and tries to help him overcome his muteness in a tender and sensitive fable about the importance of friendship for those growing up in a socially inflexible environment. Nick Castle directs this unpretentious, life-affirming movie that uses brief but effective special-effects fantasy to provide some good-natured fun for youngsters. The U.S. Catholic Conference classification is A-I — general patronage. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is PG — parental guidance suggested. (Warner, $19.98)

"Lost & Found" (1999)

Wan comedy in which complications arise after a restaurant owner (David Spade) infatuated with a French cellist (Sophie Marceau) steals her dog in order to be the hero when he returns it. As directed by Jeff Pollack, the thin premise makes the comic antics seem little more than a stretched-out sitcom. A few crude sexual references, fleeting nudity, much toilet humor and an instance of profanity. The U.S. Catholic Conference classification is A-III — adults. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is PG-13 — parents are strongly cautioned that some material may be inappropriate for children under 13. (Warner, rental)

"Pushing Tin" (1999)

Quirky comedy in which the intense professional rivalry between two air traffic controllers (John Cusack and Billy Bob Thornton) spills over into their personal lives to threaten their respective marriages (to Cate Blanchett and Angelina Jolie). Briskly directed by Mike Newell, the characters' finely tuned performances poke fun at the macho world of controllers whose split-second decisions mean life or death in the skies. Brief violence, theme of infidelity, fleeting nudity and some profanity and rough language. The U.S. Catholic Conference classification is A-III — adults. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is R — restricted. (Fox, rental)

"Something Wicked This Way Comes" (1983)

Disney adaptation of the Ray Bradbury story about a strange traveling carnival that disrupts life in a small Illinois town sometime in the 1920s. The evil carnival master (Jonathan Pryce) fulfills people's desires, but in a way that costs them dearly. When two adventurous boys (Vidal Peterson and Shawn Carson) tumble to the carnival master's secret, they become the special object of his malevolence. Jack Clayton directs with just the right blend of tension and human warmth but some special effects are not for younger viewers. The U.S. Catholic Conference classification is A-II — adults and adolescents. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is PG — parental guidance suggested. (Anchor Bay, $14.98)

"Time Bandits" (1981)

Witty British comedy about a gang of greedy but good-hearted dwarfs who steal a map of creation from the Supreme Being (Ralph Richardson) and use it to bring an adventurous lad into a variety of historical epochs, including meetings with Napoleon (Ian Holm), Greek warrior Agamemnon (Sean Connery) and Robin Hood (John Cleese). Directed by Terry Gilliam, it is sometimes amusing and always intelligent, but its appeal for youngsters is spoiled by typical Monty Python vulgarities and black humor, some of it violent. The U.S. Catholic Conference classification is A-III — adults. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is PG — parental guidance suggested. (Paramount, $19.95)

Christians' exodus from Holy Land needs to be known, speakers say

In 1948, Christians comprised about 18% of the population of the Holy Land; today they account for less than 2%.

By RICHARD SZCZEPANOWSKI
Catholic Standard

BETHESDA, MD. — Palestinian Christians, facing economic hardships, housing shortages and lack of adequate education, are leaving the Holy Land at such an alarming rate that soon there may not be a Christian presence in the land where Jesus Christ lived, warned participants at a conference on Saturday.

About 300 people gathered at Stone Ridge School of the Sacred Heart in Bethesda for a conference designed to "increase the awareness of American Christians to the plight of Palestinian Christians, and to make Americans aware of the conditions the Palestinians live under," according to one of the organizers of the event.

The first national conference for Christians and their Churches focused on "Endangered People: Christians in the Holy Land. Can They Survive the Millennium?" It was sponsored by the Holy Land Christian Ecumenical Foundation (HCEF) under the auspices of Patriarch Michel Sabbah, the Roman Catholic patriarch of Jerusalem.

The conference outlined economic hardships faced by Palestinian Christians forcing them to leave their homeland: the lack of decent housing, Israeli government, confiscation and demolition of Palestinian homes and other properties, inadequate educational opportunities, no housing and economic development plans, poor job opportunities and political oppression.

Rabie, a Catholic, is president of Image Priniting and Publishing, Inc. and Vision Management and Consulting, Inc. He is cofounder and president of the Holy Land Christian Ecumenical Foundation (HCEF). He was born in Amman, Jordan, and his family is originally from Birzeit, near Jerusalem.

American Christians have little or no knowledge of the plight of Palestinian Christians, Rabie complained.

"The media here only covers war between Arabs and Israelis," he said. "We are asking the American public to find the truth and make their own judgment. If American Christians found out the truth, they would do what is right."

Rabie stressed that American Christians making a Holy Year pilgrimage to Christiandom's holiest sites should make an effort to meet with Palestinian Christians and learn of their plight.

"There is something more to the Holy Land that is beyond, say, the Church of the Nativity or the Basilica of the Holy Sepulchre. If things continue the way they are, and the Palestinian Christians continue to leave, then these churches will become empty museums, just like a collection of dead stones," Rabie said.

"It is the duty of every Christian in the world to keep — and increase — the Christian presence in the holy Land. Palestinian Christians are the 'living stones' of the faith," he added.

Because of the exodus of Palestinian Christians from the Holy Land, the Washington-based HCEF was established to highlight the plight of Palestinian Christians and to raise money and awareness of their situation. Rabie said the HCEF is committed to improving the lives of Christians in the Holy Land by developing bonds of solidarity between them and Christians in the United States.

Joining Rabie in establishing the foundation was Father Emil Salayta, general director of the educational department of the Latin Patriarchate of Jerusalem.

HCEF statistics paint a dire picture of the Christian presence in the Holy Land. In 1948, Christians comprised about 18% of the population of the Holy Land; today they account for less than 2%.

The population decline in Jerusalem has been even more dramatic.

In 1922, Christians numbered 51% of the population in Jerusalem; in 1978, Christians accounted for 10% of the city's population; and in 1990, only 4% of the population was Christian.

Lebanon has the highest percentage of Christians among its population, but in terms of numbers, Egypt has the most Christians with about 20 million.

According to Father Salayta, there are only about 160,000 total Christians in Palestine. He said that the largest Christian group. He said that the largest Christian group belongs to the Greek Orthodox Church.

The Diocese of Jerusalem, which includes all of Israel, Jordan, and the Palestinian areas, has about 60,000 Catholics.

In addition to serving as director of the Latin Patriarchate of Jerusalem's educational department, Father Salayta, a native of Madaba, Jordan, is also pastor of Immaculate Conception Parish in Birzeit and general secretary of the Priest's Council of the Latin Patriarchate.

The priest also stressed that the plight of Palestinian Christians should be known.

"We need to raise awareness of Palestinian Christians," Father Salayta said. "Most American Christians would be astonished to know that I am an Arab and a Christian and a priest."

Palestinian Christians feel "ignored and forgotten," he said, "and maybe part of the problem is we did not make ourselves known. Arab Christians are not converted from Islam. We are original Christians from the first Christian era."

Rabie said that Palestinian Christians "feel hurt" by the western Church's apparent lack of interest in their welfare.

"Christians come to the Holy Land, usually on Israeli (Ministry of Tourism)-sponsored trips, so really they are vacations, not pilgrimages," Rabie said.

"Western Christians come to the Holy Land and have nothing to do with us, their brothers and sisters in faith."

When western Christians meet Christians living in the Holy Land, he added, "they will learn that we are the original Christians, we've been there since the Birth of Our Lord, Jesus Christ."

Noting the strong ties between Palestinian Christians and Palestinian Muslims, Father Salayta said, "We are Christians, but we share the same history, the same aspirations, the same blood and the same pain as our Palestinian Muslim brothers."

The priest added that Palestinian Muslims "feel that we Christians are part of the Palestinian family," and that many Christians are active in and hold important posts in the Palestine Liberation Organization.

Pointing to Pope John Paul II's Jubilee Year trip to the Holy Land next March, Rabie said that "his visit is a good thing, because it will shed light on the problems of Palestinian Christians."

"The pope has always asked for a shared Jerusalem and for freedom, justice and respect for Palestinian Christians, 'the forgotten faithful'," he said.

The HCEF, Rabie said, was founded earlier this year and is comprised of a group of "good American Christians who want to help Palestinian Christians." The foundation seeks to provide "schools, good living conditions and peace" so that Palestinian Christians do not leave the Holy Land, he added.

"Collecting money is important, and we hope our American Christian brothers and sisters would respond to our plea," Rabie said. "But just as important is for our American brothers and sisters to help us with a lasting and just peace."

The HCEF seeks to raise money for programs that will encourage and assist Christians to remain in the Holy Land. Its goals are to educate Americans about the plight of Palestinian Christians, develop church-to-church, family-to-family and person-to-person partnership programs, and to finance employment, educational and housing projects for Christians in the Holy Land.

"The American people are open-hearted once they know about the living conditions of many Palestinian Christians," Father Salayta said. "The Holy Land is where we live, but every Christian in the world should feel that they belong to the Holy Land."

"We have to figure out practical steps of solidarity," the priest said.

From the time Israel was proclaimed a nation in 1948 until the 1967 Arab-Israeli War, Jerusalem was a divided city. East Jerusalem, including the Old City, was under Jordanian rule; and West Jerusalem was controlled by Israel. During the war, Israel captured the city and it has been under Israeli control since then. In addition to Jerusalem, Israel also captured the areas of biblical Judea and Samaria, including the towns of Schechem, Shiloh, Bethel, Bethlehem and Hebron.

"We are at the critical stage where many Palestinians are emigrating to the west."

Saturday's conference was one of several recent programs to highlight the needs of Palestinian Christians.

On Monday, Father Majdi Siryani, the legal advisor to the Latin Patriarchate in Jerusalem, and Bishop Mounib A. Younan, of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Jordan, presented a briefing in the U.S. Senate Dirksen building on the problems facing Palestinian Christians living in Jerusalem.

The presentation was jointly sponsored by the HCEF, Evangelicals for Middle East Understanding (EMEU), and the American Committee on Jerusalem (ACJ). Bishop Youman and Father Siryani offered Evangelical and Catholic positions on the status on Jerusalem, as well as discussing the conditions leading to Christian emigration from Jerusalem and the Holy Land.

Palestine encompasses the region between the Jordan River and the Mediterranean Sea. In 1947, most of the territory became the state of Israel when the United Nations ratified a partition plan. The state of Israel was proclaimed on May 14, 1948.

From the time Israel was proclaimed a nation in 1948 until the 1967 Arab-Israeli War, Jerusalem was a divided city. East Jerusalem, including the Old City, was under Jordanian rule; and West Jerusalem was controlled by Israel. During the war, Israel captured the city and it has been under Israeli control since then.

In addition to Jerusalem, Israel also captured the areas of biblical Judea and Samaria, including the towns of Shechem, Shiloh, Bethel, Bethlehem and Hebron.

On Nov. 15, 1988, the legislation body of the Palestine Liberation Organization declared Palestine and independent state and voted to accept UN resolutions that recognized Israel's right to exist. Israel at first refused to deal with the PLO, but in 1993, Israel agreed to recognize the PLO and grant limited self-rule in the Gaza Strip and Jericho. The pact was signed in Washington on Sept. 13, 1993. In September 1995 Israel signed an agreement transferring control of much of the occupied West Bank to the Palestinian Authority.

The Vatican formally recognized Israel after each of the two sides in the conflict recognized the existence of each other. The Vatican has also stressed that Palestinians have the right to sovereignty over their land and to freedom and self-determination. ▼ literal sense, ... and anything with a specifically Catholic hallmark was rejected," he said.

As a result, devotion to Mary was rejected in the Protestant churches, and the Bible — identified more strongly with the Protestants — was rejected for decades by many Catholics, he added.

But Martin Luther "had a tremendous devotion to Mary to his dying day," Father McManus said, "and he preached at least 65 sermons on Mary."

Today devotion to Mary is finding a place again in the life of the Lutheran, Presbyterian, Methodist and Anglican churches, and there is a thriving international Ecumenical Society of the Blessed Virgin Mary, founded 30 years ago, the author said.

Father McManus said the best compliment he has received about the book to date came from a young colleague who read it at his request before publication.

"He said, 'This is something I'd like all my Protestant friends to read.' He saw it as a way he could introduce his friends to Mary in a theological way, but not the Mary that many Protestants would reject." ▼

Capuchin Friars elect new leadership

Capuchin Friars of the Province of the Sacred Stigmata of St. Francis recently celebrated their 11th provincial chapter at St. Lawrence Friary in Beacon, N.Y. The province territory extends along the East Coast of the United States from New Jersey to Florida, with several missionary friars in Zambia, Africa, and Monterrey, Mexico. The assembled chapter members voted the following friars to the new provincial council: (from left to right) Father Kellen Mears, OFM Cap., to vicar provincial; Father John LoSasso, OFM Cap., to fourth councillor; Father John Aurilia, OFM Cap., serving in Hendersonville, to second councillor; Father Vincent Fortunato, OFM Cap., to provincial minister; and Father Jude Duffy, OFM Cap., serving in Charlotte, to third councillor.

Fire in the Mountains to ignite the faith of diocesan participants

WAYNESVILLE — The theme "be still and know our Creator" will be the focal point for Father David Valtierra, director of the Oratory Center for Spirituality in Rock Hill, S.C., as he leads "Fire in the Mountains 1999," a project of faith formation leaders of the Western Region, on Nov. 13 at Haywood Community College.

Father Valtierra, a northern California native who studied philosophy at Catholic University and philosophy at Graduate Theological Union in Washington, D.C., will present two sessions dealing with the themes "the gift of life in creation" and "the culmination of creation in Jesus." Participants will ponder the questions "how do we listen to God?" and "where do we find God today?"

After each of the large group sessions, the attendants will break into small groups for prayerful and personal reflection. Father Valtierra will read three passages from Ezekiel, Mark, and First Kings to evoke internalization of the topic at hand.

The event begins at 9 a.m. with registration and refreshments and will move to greetings and prayer. Bishop William G. Curlin will speak to the participants during the morning greeting. After the first large and small group sessions, lunch will take place followed by the second large and small group sessions. A short blessing liturgy and a general evaluation will end the day at 3:30 p.m.

For details about registration and participation, call Ann Lazar at (828) 253-0216. ▼

Catholic Schools Office welcomes national speakers

By JIMMY ROSTAR
Associate Editor

CHARLOTTE — A panel of nationally recognized Catholic educators will address teachers of elementary, middle and high school students from throughout western North Carolina Oct. 22 in a series of in-service workshops sponsored by the Diocese of Charlotte's Catholic Schools Office.

Workshops for teachers in the diocese's two high schools will gather at Charlotte Catholic High School, 7702 Pineville-Matthews Road, from 8:15 a.m.-3 p.m. for presentations by Jesuit Father James DiGiacomo and Mike Mosely. Father DiGiacomo, a widely published writer and a theology teacher at Regis High School in New York City, will discuss moral development in adolescence by focusing on developmental, sociological, philosophical and theological factors. Mosely, who works for the Center for Ministry Development in Naugatuck, Conn., will explore principles and strategies for comprehensive ministry to high school students.

Workshops for middle school teachers will be hosted at Holy Trinity Catholic Middle School, 3100 Park Road, in Charlotte from 8:15 a.m.-3 p.m. David Anderson, a parish liturgy and music director and workshop coordinator of GIA Publications, Inc., in Chicago, will discuss prayer, music and liturgy for middle school students. North Carolina native Mike Hagarty, project coordinator of youth ministry services for the Center for Ministry Development in Naugatuck, Conn., will explain strategies for comprehensive ministry to young people in this age group.

Workshops for elementary school teachers will be at St. Gabriel School, 3028 Providence Rd., in Charlotte from 8:15 a.m.-3 p.m. Christopher Walker, a lecturer, composer and conductor, will talk about incorporating worship music in liturgy, in the classroom and at home. Kathy Coffey, a representative of Living the Good News, Inc., in Denver, Colo., will discuss ways of educating children to become active participants in the celebration of the Eucharist.

Also at St. Gabriel School, Julie Howard, a songwriter and founder of the children's vocal group The Crayons, will teach Scripture-based music that engages elementary students. Apostles of the Sacred Heart of Jesus Sister Eleanor Perfetto, on staff at St. Thomas University in St. Louis, Mo., will focus on how teachers bring a Christian presence to those they teach. Dorothy McLaughlin, on staff at Marywood University in Scranton, Pa., will discuss how art can remind teachers and parents of the responsibility to their students and children.

"The speakers who will visit us later this month are known throughout the country for their talents in Catholic education," said Mercy Sister Maureen Meehan, director of religious formation for the Catholic Schools Office.

"As the church moves into the new millennium, we must offer educators ways to update their knowledge and skills to meet diverse challenges and needs of our students," she added.

The workshops are primarily for educators, though parents, liturgists and other interested persons are invited to attend. Advance registration is required. Lunch will be served at each of the presentation sites. For registration and further information on these and other programs, call Sister Maureen at (704) 370-3268. ▼

The Franciscan Center

Downtown Greensboro center serves ecumenical needs of community

By ALESHA M. PRICE
Staff Writer

GREENSBORO — In 1990, two significant things happened in the Diocese of Charlotte. The Catholic-Lutheran covenant was signed, and the Franciscan Center opened its doors. Though not related, the two events intertwined that season. Retired Lutheran Bishop Michael C.D. McDaniel hosted the interfaith pact at First Lutheran Church in Greensboro with former Charlotte Bishop John F. Donoghue and Raleigh Bishop F. Joseph Gossman. A ceremony followed at the newly opened Franciscan Center in honor of the signing of the covenant.

"One of our goals is to be a presence in the marketplace in downtown Greensboro," said Franciscan Father Louis J. Canino, director of the center. "We want to provide quality outreach to the alienated and offer people another spirituality that is basically Franciscan."

A good description of the Franciscan Center is that it is has a little something for everyone. On the first floor is the bookstore and gift shop where volunteers work throughout the week. The articles include rosaries, religious greeting cards, crucifixes, spiritual books and other gifts.

"We enjoy ordering special items for customers, and we run across interesting books through those orders," said Betsy Farmun, a part-time volunteer. "Since we are the only Catholic bookstore in the Greensboro Vicariate, we have customers from all over shopping here. We become a part of people's lives and their special events."

Housed on the first and second floors are large areas where people from the community can have meetings. On Wednesdays, Father Canino celebrates Mass at noon. The second floor of the center is the gathering area for over 300 12-step groups like Alcoholics Anonymous and Narcotics Anonymous. Also on the second floor are the Greensboro Offices of Catholic Social Services and Faith Formation.

One of the main public attractions is the noon lunch program that takes place once or twice a month with speakers from various denominations. One of the speakers, Retired Rev. Mr. Brady Faggart of First Lutheran Church, is a part of the advisory team and "represents the interests of the broader ecumenical community as in planning and local operations." His March talk was entitled "The Upside Down Kingdom: An Invitation to a Transformed Life."

"The center helps Protestants learn more about the Roman Catholic and Franciscan traditions and serves as a type of educational outreach," said Rev. Mr. Faggart. "The center was an outgrowth of the signing of the Catholic and Lutheran covenant and an attempt to find a common meeting place for everyone." In fact, the meetings of the Catholic-Lutheran committee have taken place in the center every month.

Father Canino added, "Those from other faith traditions have helped to continue the ecumenical theme of the center."

Father Canino spoke at one of the recent noon lunch programs on October 4. In celebration of the feast of St. Francis of Assisi, his talk "St. Francis of Assisi: The Revolution He Began and How It is Needed in Our Time" focused on how St. Francis enacted social change. To achieve that task, St. Francis simply questioned what was happening socially and politically during his life.

Father Canino described St. Francis' appreciation for all of God's creation, especially the animal world, and his idea of brotherhood and equality, which was radical during the time of the strict class system in Europe.

St. Francis was also under scrutiny because of his criticism of the heresy and indulgences that dominated church life during that period; therefore, St. Francis made a shift from the church and formed his own community.

Father Canino then handed out sheets of crime and poverty statistics for the crowd and asked, "what can we do as individuals and groups?" His point was "how can we model ourselves after St. Francis."

One participant, Elizabeth Ries, a parishioner at St. Pius X in Greensboro, has attended many of the lunch programs including the October 4 session. "I love to hear Father Canino's talks because he is very tuned into people. I come here [to the Franciscan Center] because it is an ecumenical place to gather. It is uplifting in a spiritual and social way," said Ries. ▼

CRS donates thousands of seedlings for reforestation in Sierra Leone

By ALPHA JALLOH
Catholic News Service

FREETOWN, Sierra Leone (CNS) — Catholic Relief Services donated more than 240,000 acacia tree seedlings for a government reforestation program in Freetown to remedy the area's serious erosion problem.

CRS project officer Thomas Foray said the donation was made through the Ministry of Agriculture and Forestry.

"It was meant to enable the ministry to reforest the hills of Freetown. They have been deforested by woodcutters," he said.

According to CRS, the U.S. bishops' international relief and development agency, the project will target 200 acres of deforested land, and local farmers will care for the seedlings. The first were planted in September.

Baika Sesay, CRS' senior manager for programming in Sierra Leone, said, "The plan is to get communities along the hills to take permanent responsibility for planting and caring for these trees."

During the rebel takeover of eastern Freetown in January, thousands of civilians could not travel outside the city to get wood, the main fuel for cooking, so they cut down trees on the hillsides of the nearby mountains, said a CRS statement.

Foray said that the deforestation of hills has caused many areas to be flooded during the rainy season.

"The worst affected areas are those closer to the sea, inhabited by fishermen. Their houses are sometimes swept into the sea by the flood," he said.

In 1998, two people were killed when the walls of a mud house fell on them as a result of seven days of continuous rainfall, which caused disastrous erosion. The deaths, at an area known as Mabella, caused the government to evacuate all the inhabitants. The area has since then been declared unsafe for habitation.

Sam Allieu of Sierra Leone's Ministry of Agriculture and Forestry, said: "We have involved youths in the tree-planting exercise. If we do not reforest the hills, houses on the seaside will be inundated with water flowing from the hills. And this sometimes results into awful incidents."

He said the help rendered by CRS is timely and will help to save the environment from further degradation.

"People have lost their lives in the past as a result of torrential rainfalls. This can be attributed to the deforestation of the hills. We want to avert the recurrence of such awful incidents," he said.

Allieu added, "If other charitable organizations follow the example of CRS, we shall extend the environmental conservation to areas outside Freetown."

He pointed out that Freetown is partially surrounded by hills.

"If we do not do something now to curb the torrents from the hills, many more people will likely lose their lives in the future," he said.

Drownings in street gutters has become a common occurrence during the rainy seasons, Allieu said.

"The streets are usually overflowed with water and people find it difficult to locate gutters. They get drowned while trying to cross over from one street to the other," he said.

At least 50 such incidents have been reported in the last two years, he said.

"That is why we very much appreciate the financial assistance given to us by CRS," he said. ▼

Seniors reflect on gifts on faith, happiness at annual retreat

BY ELLEN NEERINCX SIGMON
CORRESPONDENT

HICKORY — The rain didn't dampen the spirits of 170 senior citizens who traveled from many parishes in the diocese to take part in the Fall Day of Reflection for Seniors on Wednesday, Oct. 13. Jesuit Father Lawrence Hunt noticed this right away.

"Where God is, there should be smiles. There should be good cheer," he said to the group. Father Hunt, 72, is currently the pastor at St. Benedict the Moor parish in Winston-Salem and at Good Shepherd mission in King. He kept his audience laughing and listening with several stories he told about his childhood beliefs about the church, the time he spent in India doing missionary work, and his recent experience with lung cancer. He gave two talks during the day, and the first one was about happiness.

"The world desperately needs happiness, peace, . . . recognition, acceptance," he said. "If you have it, this is your great gift to bring to our world. When we were younger and on a tear, that's what we were supposed to do back then. Now we are more aware of God's presence beside us.

"We feel useless and helpless when we get older, but maybe that's our finest hour. Your prayers can help the entire world."

The Fall Day of Reflection for Seniors, held at the Catholic Conference Center, was sponsored by Catholic Social Services' Elder Ministries program. Sandra Breakfield, program director, organized the day. Elder Ministries also sponsors a Spring Fling every year that provides a variety of social and spiritual activities.

Father Hunt's second talk during the day was about seeing Christ in others. "It's not easy to see Christ in others all the time," he said. "It is a challenge."

"They will experience the kindness of Christ, the acceptance of Christ, through your acceptance of them," he said. "The thing that I don't like about another person usually reflects a quality that I might have, in some degree. If we accept and love people the way they are, sometimes it makes it easier for them to change."

Father Hunt also suggested that the members of the audience should try to do some volunteer work that they enjoy. "We need to get busy and do what we can to help others," he said. "The purpose of volunteering is to meet Christ in the people who come by. I think we have a spirit of joy. I think we have a twinkle in our eye.

"Somehow, hang in there through all the difficulties, and help other people through your joy."

One person in the audience, Coletta Carter, a member of Holy Family parish in Winston-Salem, said that her favorite moment of the day was when Father Hunt commented that "God has two faults. He can't remember and he can't count,"

Vatican urges young people to help world's hungry

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Young people can start building a better world by helping the world's hungry, a Vatican statement said. "The presence on our planet of millions of people still suffering from malnutrition is intolerable," said a message from the Vatican secretary of state marking Oct. 15, World Food Day. "It represents a true and permanent threat to peace," said Cardinal Angelo Sodano, writing on behalf of Pope John Paul II to the U.N. Food and Agriculture Organization.

Chinese-language catechism omits sentence rejecting atheism

HONG KONG (CNS) — The Chinese-language "Catechism of the Catholic Church" printed by a Catholic publishing house in China omits a sentence that rejects atheism and seems critical of communism. The passage in Paragraph 2425 of the 1994 Vatican-approved catechism prevented Faith Press in Hebei province from obtaining a government printing permit, required for all publications in China, said a priest familiar with the situation. UCA News, an Asian church news agency based in Thailand, reported that Volume 3 of the Faith Press catechism, issued in August, has two blank lines in the entry. The missing section is in Article 7, Section III, "The Social Doctrine of the Church" in the treatment of the Seventh Commandment, "You shall not steal."

Bishop calls Senate treaty vote a major arms control defeat

WASHINGTON (CNS) — The head of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops called the U.S. Senate's rejection of the Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty "a major defeat for arms control" and a blow to U.S. moral credibility. "This vote makes it more difficult for our nation to fulfill its moral responsibility as a world leader to work with other nations to promote international peace and security," said Bishop Joseph A. Fiorenza of Galveston-Houston, conference president. By a 51-48 vote, the Senate Oct. 13 rejected the treaty — signed by President Clinton in 1996 — that seeks to stop all nuclear testing by signatory nations. The treaty also covers monitoring procedures and sanctions against violators.

French bishops criticize legalization of unmarried unions

PARIS (CNS) — France's bishops warned that a new law giving legal status to unmarried couples, including homosexuals, was the first step toward further legislation to undermine the traditional family. The bishops, who have led protests against the law since its proposal two years ago, said it would weaken the institution of marriage and civil society as a whole. "One cannot ignore that, as was admitted even by some of its promoters, this legislation represents just the first step, for example, toward the adoption of children by people living a homosexual relationship," Archbishop Louis-Marie Bille of Lyon, president of the French bishops' conference, said in a statement.

European synod groups encourage women's roles in church

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Several groups of bishops at the European synod urged the Catholic Church to invite women to participate in all church offices not requiring ordination. "We propose that, in every way possible, the access of women to public roles in the church be promoted," said one of the Italian-language working groups. The synod's nine small groups, organized according to language, made their first reports to the synod's general assembly during an Oct. 13 evening session.

Vatican criticizes author of new Pope Pius XII book

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Vatican has sharply criticized the author of a new book about Pope Pius XII and said his claim to have spent months researching Vatican archive material was absolutely false. It said the book "Hitler's Pope: The Secret History of Pius XII," by English journalist John Cornwell, should be approached with caution by readers who have been led to believe the work reflects serious scholarship. The comments came in an unsigned article published Oct. 12 by the Vatican newspaper, L'Osservatore Romano.

African-American group rallies for pro-life cause

WASHINGTON (CNS) — A three-day march organized by African-American Protestants and Catholics took about 100 black pro-lifers from New Jersey to the nation's capital to declare abortion "the greatest deception leveled on African-Americans." The Oct. 8-11 march began in Newark, N.J., made stops at Lawnside, N.J., Philadelphia, Wilmington, Del., Catonsville, Md., and ended at the steps of the U.S. Supreme Court. The Rev. Clenard Howard Childress, a Baptist pastor from Montclair, N.J., and an organizer of the march, said "abortion on African-Americans is nothing more than black genocide."

Hispanic priests face challenges of defections, lack of vocations

SAN DIEGO (CNS) — Challenged by a vocations shortage and an exodus of Hispanic Catholics to Protestant churches, Hispanic priests in the United States met in San Diego to assess their future. As roughly 100 members of National Association of Hispanic Priests gathered for their annual meeting Sept. 27-30, their departing president said he felt that a deepening sense of fraternity and a greater openness to non-Hispanics were the marks of this year's gathering. Father Jose Gomez of the Galveston-Houston Diocese, who completed a four-year term as president of the association during the convention, said the meeting brought out "a lot of enthusiasm for the role of the priest in the third millennium."

Location for Bishop McGuinness High School announced

By JOANN S. KEANE
Editor

WINSTON-SALEM — Plans of the Diocese of Charlotte to relocate Bishop McGuinness High School moved a few steps closer as the diocese crossed a few precursory hurdles last week.

On Oct. 14, the City-County Planning Board approved the school site plans, and on the 15th of October, the Diocese of Charlotte closed the real estate transaction, taking possession of the parcel of land.

"With completion of necessary geological and environmental testing, and with the planning board approval, we purchased 40 acres of land — located on Highway 66, opposite Old Salem Road in eastern Forsyth County," said the Very Reverend Mauricio West, vicar general and chancellor of the Diocese of Charlotte. "We can look forward to breaking ground in January 2000. We're very much on schedule with the timetable outlined by Bishop William G. Curlin earlier this year."

Diocesan plans call for completion of the new state-of-the-art, 800-student high school for the 2001-02 school year. The Bishop McGuinness project, including the 118,000 square-foot complex, is expected to cost $13 million.

"The new campus with expanded, state-of-the-art facilities is exciting to anticipate," said Bishop Curlin. "A quality high school education — particularly a Christ-centered Catholic education, which educates the whole person — is much more than buildings, classrooms, or campus facilities. The goal of Bishop McGuinness High School education is to educate students to become effective leaders in their church and community."

Following the construction of the new Bishop McGuinness Memorial High School, a kindergarten through eighth grade school will be constructed in western Guilford County. This will be followed by the construction of second kindergarten through eighth grade school in western Forsyth County.

"Building a new campus with expanded facilities ... can best accomplish the vital mission of Bishop McGuinness High School in the new century ahead," said Bishop Curlin. ▼

Couples celebrate the sacrament of marriage at anniversary Mass

By ALESHA M. PRICE
Staff Writer

CHARLOTTE — Babies, bills, hardships, and happy days—what do these things have in common? All are a part of a marriage at one time or another, and all were remembered at the diocesan 25th and 50th wedding anniversary Mass, with Bishop William G. Curlin as the celebrant, at St. Thomas Aquinas Church on Oct 17.

A rainy, windy day did not stop the nearly 300 attendants from across the diocese from traveling to the church for the celebration. Inclement weather did not even have an effect on the 50th anniversary trip of Madeline and Walter Lesko, parishioners from St. John Neumann Church in Charlotte.

"We went to Hawaii for 16 days, and we traveled to the Bahamas," said Mr. Lesko. "On August 27, while we were in the Bahamas, guess who came through — Hurricane Dennis— 'Dennis, the Menace,'" they said in unison. "But we still had a good time."

"We want to celebrate those sterling examples of marital commitment," said Gerry Carter, director of Special Ministries for Catholic Social Services. "These couples are a treasure for the Church, so we want our appreciation to be visible."

The first and second readings during the liturgy came from Genesis 2:18-24 about the creation of woman and First Corinthians 12:31-13:8a about the descriptions of love and the Gospel of John 15:12-16 about the greatest commandment.

The bishop told couples in the congregation that "marriage is a constant process of surrendering yourselves to God and to one another." He also told them to "love one another more deeply than the day you made your first commitment to one another."

"Once you have that deep, abiding love, one in which you pledge to give your life to the other person, the ups and downs of life can only serve to build up your marriage," continued Bishop Curlin.

After the homily, the bishop asked the couples to stand for a renewal of their vows to one another while holding the other's hands.

Immediately after Mass, Marlo Wallace, administrative assistant for Special Ministries for CSS, handed out red roses and certificates to the husbands and wives as a symbol of their love and commitment to one another.

These certificates, signed by the bishop, include the couples' names and their particular anniversary. Those who were not able to attend the Mass will have their certificates and the program from the Mass mailed to them.

Many couples reflected on their years of marriage during the event and had interesting stories to share about how they met and this year's anniversary celebrations.

The Pope Speaks

POPE JOHN PAUL II

God offers share in divine nature through love, pope says

By JOHN NORTON
Catholic News Service

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — God offers humans the ability to share in divinity by loving as he does, said Pope John Paul II.

"The ability to love as God loves is offered to every Christian as the fruit of the paschal mystery of death and resurrection," the pope told 16,000 pilgrims gathered under autumn sunshine in St. Peter's Square for the weekly general audience.

This type of love, called charity, is possible through a sharing in God's nature, or "divinization," brought about by the Holy Spirit, the pope said Oct. 13.

Sounding hoarse but speaking in a strong voice, the pope said charity "constitutes the essence of the new 'commandment' taught by Jesus."

"Charity animates Christian moral activity, orients and strengthens all the other virtues, which build in us the structure of the new man," he said.

In the Old Testament, the fundamental commandment to love God "with one's whole heart, whole soul and whole strength" began as a response due God's love for his people, the pope said.

"Progressively, Israel understood that beyond this relationship of profound respect and exclusive adoration," it had to move toward a more personal recognition of God as Father and even spouse, the pope said.

This love had two essential characteristics, the pope said: Humans would have been unable to love in this way if God had not given them the power; and, that this love, "far from reducing itself to sentiment, is concretized in walking the ways of God, in observing his commands."

Jesus Christ redefined the command to love God as the "greatest and first of all commandments," and closely associated it with love of neighbor, he said.

"In the person of Jesus himself, the meaning of this commandment assumes its fullness," the pope said. "In fact, the maximum intensity of man's love for God is realized in him.

"Love for God, made possible by the gift of the Holy Spirit, is thus founded on Christ's mediation," particularly shown in his death for us, the pope said.

Christian charity finds its source in Christ's act of love, he said.

The church has defined charity a "theological virtue, meaning a virtue which is referred directly to God and lets human creatures enter into the circuit" of love between the three persons of the Trinity, he said.

"God the Father loves us as he loves Christ, seeing in us (Christ's) image," the pope said. This image is "painted in us, so to speak, by the Holy Spirit, like an iconographer."

"In this way, the dynamism of love for God springs" from a sharing in God's nature, which "'divinizes' us, according to the language of the Eastern tradition," he said.

A pastor's reassignment

Often we've shared with readers our experiences of the church in the home. We've also shared how those experiences affect and are affected by our parish experience. Currently we are dealing with change in the parish; our pastor has been reassigned to a new parish. This change in our parish experience of church is not without angst in our little church in the home.

When we first came to the parish in 1988, we chose to be involved primarily in parish activities and services that we could share either as a couple or a family. Our pastor, Father Jay, worked with us to make this part of the mission of our domestic church connect with the mission of the parish. As a result, our experiences of home and church blend well.

Father Jay's departure leaves a hole in our lives. It is felt first in our parish experiences — missing his presence in the sanctuary and pulpit, parish office and meeting rooms, and the greeting line after Mass on Sundays.

It's different for our church in the home. For families the experience of the universal church is filtered through the prism of their parish. The pastor is critical and the foremost representative of the institutional church. Father Jay's pastoral sensitivity — his knowing when to draw the line and when to leave it blurry — has been a welcoming presence to us that has strengthened our faith life.

Most significant has been his calling forth the gifts from our family. Gently yet persistently Father Jay encouraged us to share ourselves totally. As African-American Catholics we had come from a history of struggle to claim ownership and cultural expression in the church. The idea of coming to a suburban, middle-class, white parish was indeed a challenge. However, our pastor's hospitality suggested that it was not a matter of if we'd share our cultural gifts but rather how we'd share them. This gave us a sense of ownership early on. We feel "at-home" at church. It is precisely this, his hospitality, that is vacant in our lives because of his leaving.

However, as a faithful people (both parish and home) we are hopeful. At the very least the hospitality that Father Jay has shown us will mirror back to our parish community and our new pastor when he is appointed.

This being the first time we've experienced such a transition in pastoral leadership in our current family formation, we've learned something important as a result. The connection between home and parish can be strong when the connection with the family and parish pastoral leadership is strong. It takes a very special kind of leader to foster those connections with so many families. We've been blessed to have been served by that kind of leadership over the last 11 years.

That seamless cloth that drapes the sanctuary altar and the family dining table is the fabric of our faith life as a family. Father Jay's pastoral skills of have taught us this. And because we know this, our pastor, whoever he may be, has a place at our family table.

Notes on some friends and their money

I'm lucky God has given me so many good friends. I learn a lot about my life, and about life in general, by what makes them happy and what drives them crazy.

When I've got my head solidly on my shoulders, I can figure out a lot about my own life by considering the lives of my friends.

Lately, I've been thinking about my friends and the effect of money on their lives. Two in particular come to mind.

Brady washes windows in houses, apartment buildings and small businesses. He's not one of those fellows who hangs from the skyscrapers on long ropes; he climbs a ladder. He's hard-working, honest and good at what he does. People who hire him are likely to hire him again.

My friend Brady lives in a converted garage he rents from a young married couple. He's one of the happiest people I know.

Then there's Lynn. She owns an international manufacturing business. She founded it herself and built it from nothing into a multimillion dollar concern. She's hard working, honest and good at what she does. People who buy her products love them and buy more.

My friend Lynn lives in the penthouse of a high-rise apartment building looking out over the city and ocean. She owns the whole 31st floor, and she's also one of the happiest people I know.

Lynn eats in fancy restaurants. When Brady eats out, he gets a burrito at a fast-food Mexican place.

Lynn can afford virtually anything she wants. Sometimes Brady worries about making his truck payment. They're both content with their lives, and it isn't about money. They both know that money isn't what makes you happy.

Everything you read in a magazine or see on television is designed cleverly to convince you that buying things will make you happy: "Buy this product, and it will fix your life."

Buy this brand of shoes. Drive this car. Wear this makeup, this cologne.

Ads exist to convince you that if you give the company money, they can give you happiness. It's an empty promise.

Still we believe it.

As soon as you graduate from high school, they'll start sending you credit cards. Lots of young people — still teen-agers — find that they can max out one credit card and then simply get another. It's a dangerous addiction, giving the illusion that you can have stuff now, and then pay for it painlessly down the road.

What happens is that the stuff is lost or broken or worn out or simply out of fashion, and you're still paying for it. The promised happiness never materializes, and the bills never go away.

Brady and Lynn live contented lives because they spend time with the people they care about, they each have clear ethical principles that they live out consistently and each turns to God for guidance on a daily basis.

Lynn has more money — lots more money — but she isn't happier than Brady. For happiness isn't about the quality of things you buy, it's about the quality of the life you choose.

A Halloween lesson

Halloween — the late autumnal ritual meant to mask our fears. My most vivid memory of this rite took place when I was 6 years old, although at the time I only thought of it as getting ready to go trick-or-treating. A week or so before Halloween, my parents asked my older brother and me what we wanted to be — a clown with a big red nose, a skeleton with a black hood, or perhaps a devil with horns and a pitchfork? We spent the evening talking about the exciting possibilities.

Then around 2 a.m. my parents were startled awake by a screaming child — me. They ran into my room only to find my bed empty. It seems that while I was having a nightmare I had rolled onto the floor and then under the bed. I was asleep but wailing and clawing at the slats and springs.

I remember being terrified. In the dark space of my dream all sorts of monstrous images were racing towards me, laughing at me, roaring at me, taunting me. One was Clarabell, the clown of "The Howdy Doody Show," who only "spoke" by honking a horn strapped to his waist. In my nightmare, he snarled and showed the fangs of a werewolf. In fact, all the more sinister icons of popular culture — Oz's Wicked Witch, Frankenstein's monster, Dracula, even, if you can believe it, a terrorizing Minnie Mouse — suddenly appeared as a threatening mob. It is an event that stays with me and still speaks to me.

The reason? That nightmare was my first memory of fears taking the form of other beings that turned around to attack me. It was the first time my imagination found a way to give my fears a name and a face. I believe the traditions and customs of Halloween trigger a deeply felt human need to blame or hold someone or something responsible for our anxieties.

Monsters have been the subjects of the human imagination since the beginnings of stone carving and dramatic ritual. Combat with monsters is a recurrent episode in religious literature and heroic tales. These episodes dramatize the human need to deal with our fears whatever they may be. Uncertain about the future? Anxious about the consequences of an action? Unable to act? — Put a face on that fear, take a closer look at it, stare it down or slay it!

When my dad finally got me out from under the bed, he comforted me by assuring me that all the monsters were gone. He tucked me in and whispered, "I am right here with you." That was just what I needed to hear. Through the years the vivid details of that nightmare invariably became the most repeated anecdote about Halloween in the McSweeney home every October. And my dad and mom always took the opportunity to add a thoughtful observation that still makes a lot of sense. In time, they cautioned, we all must face our fears squarely. If not, we only hate them and turn them into "horrible imaginings."

Whether the monsters we face in life are all too real or creatures of our imaginations, we cannot ignore them or give in to them. I find that these words of St. Francis de Sales give me the comfort today that my dad gave me so long ago: "Do not fear what may happen tomorrow. The same loving Father who cares for you today will care for you tomorrow and every day. Either He will shield you from suffering or He will give you the strength to bear it. Be at peace, then, and put aside all anxious thoughts and imaginings."

Your will gives you freedom

Freedom. It is one of the things most Americans hold dear. That is why it is so ironic that the majority of Americans — over half — do not take the opportunity to leave valid wills.

A will gives you the freedom to choose what happens to your possessions — a lifetime of blessings that God has provided. You have the freedom as an American to distribute those assets to persons or organizations you wish to benefit. Along with that freedom is the responsibility to distribute those gifts thoughtfully and prayerfully, consistent with the manner of a good steward.

By having an up-to-date will, you can ensure your property shall be distributed according to your wishes. In addition, your will can also allow you to continue your support of your parish, Catholic school, Catholic agency, the diocese or the diocesan foundation.

Why do I need a will?

When someone dies without a will or other legal arrangements, state laws determine how that individual's property is distributed. These laws are the same for everyone and often cause added administration costs and delays. In addition, these laws cannot take into account the specific needs of loved ones or the charitable wishes a person may have had. For instance, with a will you can say that the bequest for a child is to be held in trust until the child has reached a certain age, say 30 or 35. Without a will your children may still inherit from you, but they may end up with full control over the inheritance between ages 18 to 21, depending on your state's laws.

A carefully prepared will helps ensure your wishes for distributing your estate are known and documented legally. You can decide the share each person shall receive. Careful planning can also reduce the taxes and certain other expenses, that would normally come out of your estate.

What about charitable bequests?

Naturally, most people's first concern in preparing a will is to take care of family members. After loved ones are provided for, many people consider the values and charities important in their lives that they want to uphold through their will. Many Catholics who have supported the church during their lifetime decide to make a gift in their will to continue that support. If their estate is of a size that is taxable, a charitable bequest by will can also provide federal gift and estate tax deductions.

The first step

A will is one of the most important legal instruments you can have. But in order to leave a legacy to your loved ones and your Catholic community, you must take the first step. Contact an attorney to draw up your will or if you already have a will, make sure it is up-to-date and coordinated with your other plans, such as life insurance or retirement accounts, which pass by way of beneficiary designation.

For more information about creating or revising your will or making a charitable gift through your will or estate plans, please feel free to contact me at the Diocese of Charlotte, 1123 S. Church Street, Charlotte, NC 28203, (704) 370-3320.

Catechetics for children

Q. If an 8-year-old child is unbaptized and wants to become a Catholic, is she required to go through the RCIA (Rite for the Christian Initiation of Adults)? Or can she be baptized and then participate in a parish religious-education program to receive the other sacraments?

My grandchild is at this point, and we would appreciate knowing what steps to take.

A. Children would normally not take part in an RCIA program before entering the Catholic faith. An exception might be when the parents are preparing to become Catholic and explain the lessons at a child's level as they go through the process.

No child who is old enough to receive some instruction in the meaning and practice of Christian and Catholic faith should be baptized without that instruction.

There is a procedure similar to the RCIA that is designed for children. Whether or how that program would be appropriate for an individual child depends on many circumstances: the age of the child, religious background and practice of the family, the parents' faith and practice of it, religious formation of the child in the past, what kind of support in living the Catholic faith the child will receive from family or friends after the baptism, and so on.

It is important, in other words, that the child know, at his or her own level, what being baptized means and what responsibilities are undertaken in receiving this sacrament.

It is also critical, in fairness to the sensibilities and conscience of the child, that he or she not be encouraged to make commitments (going to Mass on Sundays, prayer, sacraments) which cannot reasonably be fulfilled because of the religious circumstances at home.

These concerns and suggestions are spelled out more fully in the section of the RCIA ritual called "Christian Initiation of Children Who Have Reached Catechetical Age."

It is best to talk with the priest in your parish, or other parish minister responsible for children's religious-education programs, and determine the most appropriate steps for your granddaughter.

Receiving Holy Sacraments

Q. I am a Ukrainian Catholic. Your recent column on receiving the Holy Mysteries (sacraments) in Eastern churches was, I believe, misleading. Catholics of all rites, Latin or otherwise, are allowed and encouraged to receive the Holy Gifts in each other's churches.

If we are in full communion, there is absolutely no impediment to attending liturgies, receiving the sacraments and fulfilling Sunday and holy day obligations with each other.

A. You are right, of course. Whatever concerns and limitations exist for participating in the liturgies and sacraments of Eastern churches apply only to the Orthodox churches, those who are not in communion with the bishop of Rome.

Participation in the liturgies and "Holy Gifts" (a wonderful phrase, commonly used in the Eastern churches for the sacraments) of churches united with the Roman pontiff is, as you say, not only permitted but strongly encouraged, so that the special charisma of each church might be better known.

Thanks to you and others who wrote for this clarification.

Vatican officials deny postponement of pope's beatification

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Vatican officials strongly denied reports that the beatification process for Pope Pius XII has been abandoned or put on hold. "It is not true that the cause has been shelved. The cause is proceeding regularly and speedily," said Jesuit Father Peter Gumpel, who is involved in documenting the sainthood cause of the late pope. "The beatification will not take place in the year 2000, because there is such an enormous amount of material and we have not yet presented the 'positio' to the congregation. But the cause is continuing, and there is every reason to believe that sooner or later the beatification will take place," Father Gumpel said Oct. 15.

Scottish church defends financial help for pregnant 12-year-old

MANCHESTER, England (CNS) — The Catholic Church in Scotland defended its financial help for a pregnant 12-year-old following criticism that the church was bribing the girl not to have an abortion. The girl, who cannot be named for legal reasons and lives in the north of England, has been helped by a fund set up by Cardinal Thomas Winning of Glasgow, Scotland, to help women who would otherwise be considering abortion. Josephine Quintavalle of the Pro-Life Alliance said the church program offered "real choice."

Cuban archbishop asks government to respect liturgy

HAVANA (CNS) — Archbishop Pedro Meurice Estiu of Santiago de Cuba asked government agents and dissident groups to respect the religious nature of liturgical celebrations and avoid using them as political venues. Archbishop Meurice aired his concern after government security agents and members of dissident political groups exchanged insults and physical aggression during two recent religious celebrations. "In El Cobre, during the celebrations in honor of our patroness, we were all victims of an untimely interruption that took place in a very solemn moment," said the archbishop.

Cardinal helps Turkish mother return to cancer-stricken son

NEW YORK (CNS) — A chance meeting with New York Cardinal John J. O'Connor led to the reuniting of a 5-year-old boy stricken with cancer with his mother, stuck in her homeland of Turkey with visa problems. The cardinal interceded on behalf of the Caylar family of Queens, prompting the U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Service to allow Surmehan Caylar back into the United States on the rarely granted humanitarian parole. The cardinal's involvement began on Palm Sunday, March 28, while he was visiting patients at New York University Medical Center in Manhattan. Ibrahim Caylar, whose son, Muharrem, was being prepared for a bone marrow transplant, approached the cardinal in the lobby of the hospital.

Miami priest aims to bring spirituality into talk show realm

MIAMI (CNS) — Father Albert Cutie, 30, has taken on a daunting challenge: bringing spiritual values into the realm of television talk shows. Households in the United States and Latin America are getting to know him as "Padre Alberto," airing each weekday on the Telemundo network at 4 p.m. Eastern time. The show debuted Sept. 27. Already, his friends jokingly refer to him as "Father Springer." But Father Cutie, whose name is pronounced koo-tee-AY, makes it clear that, if comparisons must be made, he prefers "Father Oprah."

Cardinal calls for new ways of evangelizing in global society

NOTRE DAME, Ind. (CNS) — Past methods of evangelizing will not suffice in the high-tech world of the third millennium, Cardinal Francis E. George of Chicago told Catholic leaders Oct. 11 at the University of Notre Dame. "The church is presented with a new phenomenon after 2,000 years — the conscious rejection of the Gospel by entire people and cultures," Cardinal George said. Old ways of evangelization, including missions to territories where people never heard the gospel and missions to parishes where baptized people are called back to Christian life, are not sufficient in the global society, he said.

Catholic says walk for poverty is 'pilgrimage within yourself'

MANCHESTER, England (CNS) — A 670-mile walk to raise awareness of poverty in Britain is more than a journey of miles, it is a "pilgrimage within yourself," said a Catholic participant. "The pilgrimage has not just been about getting from A to B," said Val Simcock, a Catholic from North Wales. "It's not just about getting government to change, it's about having to change yourself," Simcock told Catholic News Service. Simcock said the pilgrimage had been one of the best experiences of her life.

Flight of priest hinders bishop's murder case, says official

SAN SALVADOR (CNS) — The sudden flight of a priest once accused of killing Auxiliary Bishop Juan Gerardi Conedera of Guatemala City is a "further obstacle" in the 17-month-old murder investigation, said an archdiocesan official. The departure of Father Mario Orantes, who shared the parish home of Bishop Gerardi at the time of his death, is an "obstacle" in the case, since he was "still under investigation and had not been completely cleared," said the director of the archdiocesan human rights office, Neri Rodenas. Father Orantes left Guatemala early Oct. 13 for the United States. His lawyer, Jose Toledo, told reporters that his flight was due to "security and health reasons."

Bethlehem mayor says checkpoint renovations will 'suffocate' city

BETHLEHEM, West Bank (CNS) — Planned Israeli renovations at the Bethlehem-Jerusalem checkpoint will "suffocate and isolate" Bethlehem, said Mayor Hana Nasser. "What they are doing now is to divide once and for all Bethlehem from Jerusalem. This is a political division under the pretext of Bethlehem 2000," Nasser said at a press conference Oct. 12. He urged international groups to oppose the renovations. But an Israeli civil administration official said the renovations, which were initially approved by the Palestinian National Authority, were designed to create "easy access for everybody to Bethlehem and Jerusalem."

Floyd forged path of destruction; relief efforts still continue

By ALESHA M. PRICE
Staff Writer

After the catastrophic effects of Hurricane Floyd to the eastern half and coastal areas of North Carolina, people across the state and around the country responded quickly with aid of all types for the victims.

In a Sept. 24th letter to all of the parishes, Bishop William G. Curlin said, "...in its [the Diocese of Raleigh's] moment of need, let us unite as a family of faith in offering our generous support to our brothers and sisters in areas devastated by Hurricane Floyd."

Hurricane Irene also hit the coast but fortunately did not cause as much damage to areas devastated by floodwaters. However, the already swollen Tar and Neuse Rivers are under watch for more potential flooding.

As of Oct. 15, the Diocese of Charlotte had collected over $112,000 for the people affected by the floods. Schools and churches have done their share to help with flood relief efforts.

St. Ann School in Charlotte has served as the collection site for the goods that students in all Mecklenburg Area Catholic Schools (MACS) have been donating since the hurricanes ripped through the coastal counties. The Monday after the major flooding began, St. Joseph Sister Helene G. Nagle, principal of St. Ann, asked the students to bring water to school during that week.

As the requests came in, the students at St. Ann and other MACS schools met those needs. Everything from trash bags, cleaning supplies, canned and other non-perishable foods, and bug repellent filled the St. Ann Church parish center. Fifth graders from St. Ann and eighth graders from Holy Trinity School in Charlotte helped to load the truck with John Talbot, a St. Ann Church parishioner, at the wheel.

Talbot works for Converse Corporation who donated the use of their truck. Moreover, when they heard that students at a Greenville school were attending class without shoes, they donated 500 pairs of children's shoes.

Fifth graders at St. Ann School in Charlotte help to load supplies into the truck that traveled to Whiteville to aid the flood victims. St Ann was the collection site for donations from Mecklenburg Area Catholic Schools.

In addition to that effort by the schools, an anonymous $2,000 donation came to Sister Helene, and Blackhawk Hardware and Harris Teeter matched that donation with $1,000 each which will be used to purchase supplies for those in need.

In the early morning hours of October 15, the third tractor-trailer left St. Ann School for the town of Whiteville near Wilmington. Prior to that, the two trucks had been to Rocky Mount and Greenville. Of all the trips he has made, Talbot said that this one moved him the most because his one delivery filled the empty "food room" in the town of Whiteville.

Further around the diocese, an Asheboro parish has done more than its fair share of donating money for the relief effort. St. Joseph Church collected approximately $15,000 for two specific parishes—St. Catherine of Siena Church in Tarboro and Holy Trinity Church in Williamston.

"We have a large Hispanic population, so we wanted to help churches in the Diocese of Raleigh with large migrant farm worker congregations," said Father Joseph W. Mack, pastor of St. Joseph Church. "After speaking with the Chancellor of Raleigh, we were told that those two church parishes needed serious help."

"This is an effective way to get people involved because they can connect with the immediate problems more easily," Father Mack continued. "This has been a collective effort, and the parish has responded well to the request."

According to the NC Catholic, the Diocese of Raleigh has received almost $500,000 from other states, not including the money from the Diocese of Charlotte. The Archdiocese of New Orleans gave $200,000 and a letter of support, and the Archdiocese of Cincinnati mailed a check for $50,000 to Catholic Charities, USA, specifically for the victims of the flooding. Other dioceses across the country have also contributed time, supplies, and money to the relief efforts.

Five church parishes in the Raleigh-Durham area collected nearly four tons of food and other goods between Sept. 21 and 25.

The city of Kinston in Lenoir County still has parts underwater, and people are requesting food, clothing, furniture, and other major items, according to Father Doug Reed, pastor of Holy Trinity Church. People in Kinston have lost everything; now, they need everything, he said.

Diane Pisczek, director of Raleigh's Catholic Social Ministry Office in the Cape Fear Deanery, said that many agencies have been offering counseling services and the needs cross social and economic boundaries. She stated that when a home is lost, people lose everything. The ability to recover may be different, but the sense of loss is not.

In the Tarboro area, three weeks after the storm, many people in the area were still not in their homes. Father Bill Murphy of St. Catherine of Siena Church said that he had toured some of the worst hit areas with representatives from relief agencies, and many communities were "ghost towns." Red marks on houses were indications the dwellings were no longer inhabitable. Father Murphy said the scarlet markings can be seen throughout the region, including every home in at least one trailer park.

One of the most vile impacts of Floyd has been the devastation of the graveyards in eastern N.C. Father Murphy said there are some burial grounds in the Tarboro area with coffins sitting on the ground waiting to be interred to the earth.

Governor Jim Hunt has recently announced that nearly $10.2 million in checks and cash and more than $263,000 in credit card donations since September 17 has been collected in the N.C. Hurricane Floyd Disaster

Bishops seek to strengthen influence of Catholic citizens

By NANCY FRAZIER O'BRIEN
Catholic News Service

WASHINGTON (CNS) — The U.S. bishops are using a variety of strategies to achieve wider distribution and greater understanding of their document on "faithful citizenship" for the year 2000.

It has been 24 years since the bishops began issuing a political responsibility statement each presidential election year, and "each year we've been trying to broaden the circle out more and more," said Cardinal Roger M. Mahony of Los Angeles.

"We're really trying to reach the folks in the pews, not just the leadership people or the social justice people," said Cardinal Mahony, chairman of the U.S. bishops' Domestic Policy Committee, in a telephone interview with Catholic News Service.

The 6,000-word document, approved unanimously by the bishops' Administrative Board in September and made public Oct. 20, is called "Faithful Citizenship: Civic Responsibility for a New Millennium."

"The title really says it all," Cardinal Mahony said. "Catholics really have a great responsibility to be active members of society, to really be informed."

As voters, Catholics must "see the world through the lens of Jesus Christ and the Gospels," he added, and must cast their votes not just as Democrats, Republicans or Independents but as disciples of Christ, judging how the candidates and their stands reflect Gospel values.

"Faithful Citizenship" is the result of collaboration among nearly two dozen committees and offices of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops and U.S. Catholic Conference. Also consulted were the bishops' National Advisory Council, state Catholic conference directors and diocesan social action directors from around the country.

In a letter to his fellow bishops, Bishop Joseph A. Fiorenza of Galveston-Houston, NCCB-USCC president, said throughout the consultation process, the bishops heard "a consistent message ... about the need to do more than issue a statement."

"Those involved in the consultation felt it was important to undertake a more thorough distribution and promotion strategy that would reach far more people than in the past," he added.

Cardinal Mahony said part of that strategy involved producing a more "user-friendly" document that is shorter than the earlier political responsibility statements and that looks "graphically sharp and to the point."

In addition to the 6,000-word document, which will be published in booklet format in November, a much shorter version of "Faithful Citizenship" will be available as color or black-and-white brochures.

A parish resource kit about the document is being prepared, and a video will be produced "to share the civic responsibility message at diocesan conferences, at parish meetings, in schools and in religious education programs," Bishop Fiorenza said.

A speakers' bureau also is being developed, as well as workshop and training packages to help dioceses incorporate the message into gatherings of priests or other parish leaders, education conferences or other diocesan meetings.

Sixteen offices of the NCCB-USCC will distribute the booklet and resources to their diocesan counterparts. These include Social Development and World Peace, African-American Catholics, Communications, Catholic Campaign for Human Development, Diaconate, Education, Evangelization and Missions, and Family, Laity, Women and Youth.

Also involved in the civic responsibility effort are the bishops' offices of General Counsel, Government Liaison, Hispanic Affairs, Migration and Refugee Services, Priestly Formation, Priestly Life and Ministry, Pro-Life Activities and Third Millennium.

"Focusing a diocesan staff meeting on the statement and developing a plan to share it can be an important part of the overall strategy," said a list of suggestions distributed to bishops with the document.

"Priests especially find it helpful to learn about the church's position on civic responsibility, the opportunities it presents, and the legal limits we need to observe," it added. "Devoting a half day or a full day of a clergy convocation to this topic can help priests share an important element of Catholic social teaching and respond confidently to any questions that may arise."

Cardinal Mahony said a major goal of the statement is to "break down the misconception" that when Catholic leaders speak out on public policy issues, they are taking sides in purely political matters.

"The church's participation in public affairs does not undermine but enriches the political process and affirms genuine pluralism," the document says. "The leaders of the church have the right and duty to share the church's teaching and to educate Catholics on the moral dimensions of public life, so that they may form their consciences in light of their faith." ▼

Relief Fund. Six million of that amount has been given to 30 counties to distribute based on disaster criteria from the Governor's Office.

Created by Gov. Hunt, the fund's purpose is to offer financial help with food, medical needs, housing problems, and other personal needs for those in areas with substantial damage. The fund is being administered by the United Way of N.C., along with other private relief agencies, local businesses, federal, state, and local disaster relief funds, and volunteer work. ▼

Two Fatima visionaries to be beatified in April

ROME (CNS) — Francisco and Jacinta Marto, two of the Fatima visionaries, will be beatified at the Vatican April 9, the bishop of Fatima, Portugal, announced.

The children, along with their cousin, who is still alive, saw Mary six times between May 13, 1917, and Oct. 13, 1917.

Bishop Serafim de Sousa Ferreira Silva of Leiria-Fatima, marking the 82nd anniversary of the last apparition, announced the date for the beatification.

Jesuit Father Peter Gumpel, who works in Rome with the postulator of the children's beatification cause, confirmed Oct. 14 that the ceremony would take place in April at the Vatican.

Francisco, who was 10 years old when he died in 1919, and Jacinta, who was 9 when she died in 1920, will be the youngest people beatified since detailed records of beatifications and canonizations began in 1592.

Both children died of influenza. Their cousin Lucia dos Santos, who also was present during the apparitions, is a cloistered Carmelite nun still living in Portugal. ▼

Bishop's Financial Stewardship Report

For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1999

Letter from Bishop Curlin

Dear Brothers and Sisters in Christ:

As your bishop, I am accountable to you, the people of the Church of western North Carolina, for the proper stewardship of our financial resources. Therefore, I am pleased to once again present to you the annual financial report of the Central Administrative Offices of the Diocese of Charlotte for the year ending June 30, 1999.

I encourage you to review the financial information contained on the following pages. The report shows that the Central Administration of your diocese is financially healthy. I am grateful for this report and for the good works which have been accomplished during the past year. The many outreach programs which are a part of everyday parish life throughout the diocese have touched the lives of many people in ways that words cannot adequately express. These good works are the result of your generous stewardship of time, talent and treasure.

During this past year, the diocese began a strategic planning initiative. Approximately 200 persons from across the diocese are involved in identifying the programs that will define our ministry as we start into the twenty-first century. The plan will address the operational and capital needs of our diocese for the next 20 years. I look forward to the outcome of this project in the Spring of 2000.

Also during this past year, I announced plans for three new schools in the Winston-Salem, Greensboro and High Point area. The first of these three schools to be constructed will be the new Bishop McGuinness High School (BMHS), which will accommodate 800 students. Land has just recently been acquired as the site for the new BMHS, which will be centrally located so as to serve the entire Triad. Construction is scheduled to start in early 2000.

On July 31, 1999, the diocese sold Good Shepherd Home Health & Hospice Agency in Hayesville to the Murphy Medical Center. Proceeds from the sale of Good Shepherd have been used to establish an Economic Development Fund. This fund is earmarked to provide financial support of endeavors designed to economically revitalize the four western counties of Cherokee, Clay, Graham and Swain.

The Diocese of Charlotte continues to grow in both numbers and diversity. Planning has begun for two new churches which will primarily serve the Hispanic population; one is to be located in Charlotte and one in Booneville. Additionally, St. Joseph Vietnamese Catholic Community moved into a newly acquired church during this past fiscal year and St. John Lee Korean Catholic Community began construction of an education building to serve their growing population. We have also expanded our outreach to southeast Asians through a new ministry to the Lahu.

As you can see, our diocese continues to grow in number and need. While much is being done, the future will present new challenges as we strive to serve all God's people. It is only by your generous assistance that we will be able to continue to expand our ministries and open new churches and schools in response to continued growth here in western North Carolina.

I am aware of the many sacrifices that you make on behalf of your parish, the Diocesan Support Appeal and the special appeals that directly assist the ministries of the Church. Be assured of my prayerful gratitude as we work together in building up God's Kingdom on earth.

Begging God's blessing upon you and your loved ones, I am
Devotedly in the Lord,

+ William G. Curlin

Report from Chief Financial Officer

William G. Weldon, CPA
Chief Financial Officer

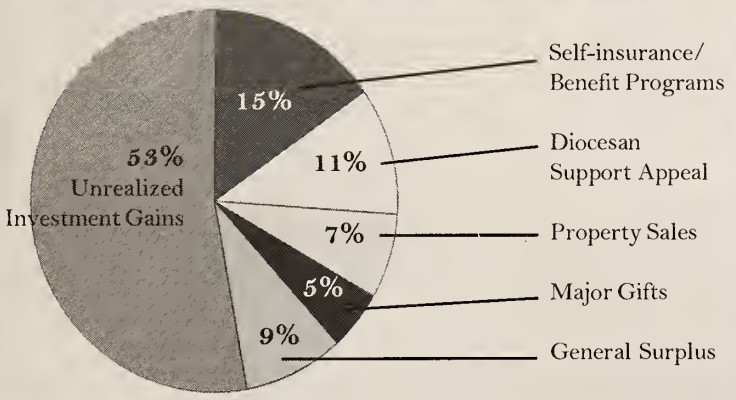
I am pleased to once again report that the Roman Catholic Diocese of Charlotte remains financially healthy due to the generosity of the people of this diocese. The Central Administration of the Diocese, the administrative arm of the Catholic Church here in western North Carolina, completed the year ended June 30, 1999 with an increase in net assets of approximately $2,182,000. Included in this increase is $550,000 which has been restricted by donor imposed stipulations, as follows:

- $529,000 represents an increase in permanent funds, primarily perpetual trust funds of which the diocese is an income beneficiary, but never receives the assets held in trust; and
- $21,000 represents an increase in net assets whose use is limited by donor imposed restrictions which are temporary and had not been satisfied as of June 30, 1999.

The remainder of $1,632,000 represents an increase in unrestricted net assets. This increase is primarily attributable to the following special purpose activities (see pie chart):

- Unrealized gains on long-term investments — Current year market appreciation on investments ($860,000) may be offset in future years should market values decline;
- Self-insurance and employee benefit programs — The amount by which these revenues exceeded claims and other expenses ($237,000) has been designated as additional insurance reserves for future contingencies;
- DSA contributions — Included in current year revenues are those funds which exceed the current year program budget and, thus, are for use next year ($180,000);
- Gain on the sale of two properties ($114,000);
- Receipt of one-time major gifts ($87,000).

Analysis of increase in unrestricted net assets



These five items total $1,478,000 and, thus, account for all but $154,000 of the increase in unrestricted net assets. The remaining $154,000 (1.1% of unrestricted revenues) represents the surplus attributable to all other programs and activities of the Central Administration.

During the fiscal year just ended, support of diocesan programs and ministries, i.e., program expenses, increased by approximately $1,063,000 over fiscal 1998. This represents a 13% increase in expenditures which directly support our mission. Expenses relating to supporting activities, i.e., administrative and fundraising expenses, decreased from last year's level by $29,000.

The diocesan Finance Office remains committed to the highest standards of fiscal responsibility. It is our responsibility to ensure that internal controls are in place and operating so as to safeguard Church assets and ensure that all financial activity is accounted for properly. The employees and volunteers who serve at diocesan parishes, schools and agencies, as well as those at the diocesan Pastoral Center, are stewards of the Church's temporal resources and thus, are accountable to you, the people who make up the Church of western North Carolina.

The financial statements of the Central Administration for the year ended June 30, 1999 are presented on the following pages for your review. The integrity of these statements and the integrity of the underlying financial systems are the responsibility of the diocese. The public accounting firm of Arthur Andersen, LLP, was engaged to perform an independent audit of these financial statements. Their audit report is also included in the financial report that follows.

Report of Independent Public Accountants

To the Most Reverend William G. Curlin,
Bishop of Charlotte:

We have audited the accompanying combined statement of financial position of The Central Administration of the Roman Catholic Diocese of Charlotte and Cathedral Publishing, Inc. (the Central Administration) as of June 30, 1999, and the related combining statement of activities and cash flows for the year then ended. These financial statements are the responsibility of the Central Administration's management. Our responsibility is to express an opinion on these financial statements based on our audit.

We conducted our audit in accordance with generally accepted auditing standards. Those standards require that we plan and perform the audit to obtain reasonable assurance about whether the financial statements are free of material misstatement. An audit includes examining, on a test basis, evidence supporting the amounts and disclosures in the financial statements. An audit also includes assessing the accounting principles used and significant estimates made by management, as well as evaluating the overall financial statement presentation. We believe that our audit provides a reasonable basis for our opinion.

In our opinion, the financial statements referred to above present fairly, in all material respects, the combined financial position of the Central Administration as of June 30, 1999, and the combining results of its operations and cash flows for the year then ended in conformity with generally accepted accounting principles.

The accompanying notes to financial statements are an integral part of these statements.

1. Organization:

The Central Administration of the Roman Catholic Diocese of Charlotte is the administrative arm of the Roman Catholic Church in western North Carolina. The Central Administration provides diocesan entities with business and administrative services including: Administering a savings and investment program wherein all funds on deposit along with the associated accrued interest are reflected as custodial obligations of the Central Administration; arranging financing for diocesan entities; sponsoring a noncontributory defined benefit pension plan and a tax-deferred annuity plan covering substantially all lay employees; and providing medical and dental insurance coverage for employees. The Central Administration assesses the diocesan entities on a monthly basis to cover the costs of these benefits. In addition, the Central Administration oversees the operations of Cathedral Publishing, Inc., publisher of The Catholic News & Herald. The Central Administration of the Roman Catholic Diocese of Charlotte and Cathedral Publishing, Inc. are collectively referred to herein as "the Central Administration."

2. Summary of Significant Accounting Policies:

Basis of Accounting

The accounts of the Central Administration are maintained on the accrual basis. The Central Administration complies with the Statement of Financial Accounting Standards (SFAS) No. 116, "Accounting for Contributions Received and Contributions Made," and SFAS No. 117, "Financial Statements of Not-for-Profit Organizations."

Cash and Cash Equivalents

The Central Administration considers all highly liquid instruments purchased with an original maturity of three months or less to be cash equivalents. The Central Administration has designated $230,000 of cash and investments for property and liability self-insurance reserves as June 30, 1999.

Property and Equipment

Property and equipment is stated at cost, when purchased, and at estimated market value, when donated. Depreciation expense is determined by using the straight-line method over the estimated useful lives of the assets. The following represents the major classes of property and equipment at June 30, 1999:

	1999	Life (in years)
Land	$ 5,273,000	N/A
Buildings	7,186,000	30
Improvements	2,232,000	10
Equipment	558,000	10
Vehicles	292,000	5
	15,541,000
Less -
Accumulated depreciation	2,691,000
	$12,850,000

Tax-exempt Status

The Central Administration is exempt from federal income tax under Section 501 (c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code.

Use of Estimates in the Preparation of Financial Statements

The preparation of financial statements in conformity with generally accepted accounting principles requires management to make estimates and assumptions that affect the reported amounts of assets and liabilities and disclosure of contingent assets and liabilities at the date of the financial statements and the reported amounts of revenue and expenses during the reporting period. Actual results could differ from those estimates.

Net Assets

The Central Administration's net assets consist of the following:

Unrestricted

Unrestricted net assets consist of all resources of the Central Administration which have no donor-imposed restrictions. The officials of the Central Administration may, at their discretion, designate unrestricted support for a specified purpose.

Temporarily Restricted

Temporarily restricted net assets consist of contributions received whose use by the Central Administration is limited by donor-imposed stipulations that expire by passage of time or can be fulfilled by actions of the Central Administration. When a donor restriction expires, temporarily restricted net assets are reclassified to unrestricted net assets and reported in the combining statements of activities as net assets released from restrictions.

Permanently Restricted

Permanently restricted net assets consist of contributions received from donors whose use by the Central Administration is limited permanently by donor-imposed stipulations.

Change in Accounting Principle

In fiscal 1998, the Central Administration changed its method of accounting for beneficial interests in perpetual trusts as required by the new American Institute of Certified Public Accountants Audit and Accounting Guide for Not-for-Profit Organizations. Under the terms of the perpetual trusts, the Central Administration has the irrevocable right to receive the income earned on trust assets, consisting primarily of government notes and bonds and various equities, in perpetuity, but never receives the assets held in trust. These assets are included as permanently restricted on the accompanying statement of financial position. The adoption of this change had no impact on cash flow, but had a one time cumulative effect on the change in net assets of approximately $4,295,000.

Reclassifications

Certain 1998 amounts have been reclassified to conform to the 1999 presentation.

3. Advances to Parishes:

The Central Administration maintains a revolving loan fund, which was established primarily from resources provided by bequests stipulated for advances to small or needy parishes at no interest. Advances outstanding at June 30, 1999 totaled approximately $1,735,000. These advances are long-term in nature and are reflected at their estimated present value of approximately $817,000 in the accompanying combined statement of financial position at June 30, 1999.

4. Pledges and Assessments Receivable:

The Diocesan Support Appeal (DSA) campaign begins in the fiscal year prior to the expenditure of funds by DSA program agencies. At June 30, 1999, approximately $505,000 in pledges out of a goal of $2,940,000 had not been collected.

The Central Administration assesses parishes and affiliates to cover the costs of general administration, property and liability insurance, employee health insurance, employee retirement and The Catholic News & Herald. Total assessments receivable at June 30, 1999 were approximately $207,000.

5. Notes Receivable:

The Central Administration has various notes receivable outstanding at June 30, 1999. Most of these notes bear interest at rates ranging from prime minus 1.25% to prime plus .25%; however, some are noninterest bearing. A summary of notes receivable, net of discounts and allowances, is as follows:

	1999
Mecklenburg Area Catholic Schools	$1,851,000
Parishes	257,000
	$2,314,000

6. Investments:

Investments are carried at market value and realized and unrealized gains and losses are reflected in the combining statement of activities. The cost and fair market value of investments at June 30, 1999 are summarized below:

	1999
	Cost	Market
Common stocks	$ 5,427,000	$ 7,523,000
Bonds	4,604,000	4,494,000
Cash	317,000	317,000
Other	71,000	71,000
Total investments	$ 10,419,000	$ 12,405,000

7. Parish Savings and Investment Programs:

The Central Administration administers parish savings and parish investment programs. These programs have been established for the benefit of diocesan parishes, schools and agencies. Interest is earned at 4% for the savings program and prime less 2.75% for the investment program. Savings program funds may be withdrawn at any time and investment program funds may be withdrawn the first business day of each month subject to a minimum 18-month investment period. Funds on deposit related to these programs along with accrued interest totaled approximately $12,931,000 at June 30, 1999 and are reflected as custodial obligations in the accompanying combined statement of financial position.

8. Pension and Retirement Plans:

Lay Noncontributory Deferred Benefit Pension Plan

The Central Administration sponsors a noncontributory defined benefit pension plan (the Plan) covering substantially all lay employees of the Roman Catholic Diocese of Charlotte. The Plan provides for benefits based on an employee's years of service and compensation. It is the intent of the Central Administration for the minimum funding to be the actuarially recommended contribution amount.

The net periodic pension cost of the pension plan is as follows:

Service cost on benefits earned during the year	$734,000
Interest cost on projected benefit obligation	661,000
Actual return on plan assets	(803,000)
Net amortization and deferral	28,000
Net periodic pension cost	$620,000

The actuarial present value of benefit obligations and funded status is as follows:

	1999
Benefit obligations-
Vested benefits	$7,639,971
Nonvested benefits	278,363
Accumulated benefit obligation	$7,918,334
Projected benefit obligation	$ (9,997,000)
Plan assets at fair value	10,393,000
Projected benefit obligation less than plan assets	396,000
Unrecognized net (gain)	(998,000)
Unrecognized net transition obligation	282,000
Accrued pension cost	$ (320,000)

Assumptions used in developing the projected benefit obligation, are as follows:

	1999
Discount rate	7.5%
Rate of increase in compensation	4.5
Rate of return in plan assets	8.5

Tax-deferred Annuity Plan

The Central Administration sponsors a tax-deferred annuity plan under section 403(b) of the Internal Revenue Code for substantially all lay employees of the Roman Catholic Diocese of Charlotte. Employer matching contributions to the plan are based on a percentage of contributions.

Each diocesan entity is responsible for payment of the matching contribution directly to the tax-deferred annuity plan. Also, the diocesan assessment for lay employees' benefits is 4% of lay employees' salaries.

Clergy Retirement Plan

The Central Administration sponsors the Diocese of Charlotte Clergy Retirement Plan (The Clergy Plan) to provide retirement benefits for priests within the Diocese. An annual collection is held at each parish to raise funds for clergy retirement and other clergy benefits. Each parish is assigned 3% of annual offertory as their goal for this collection. Any shortfall from goal in the amount collected is paid by the parish. Annual collections from the parishes for this purpose are included within the temporarily restricted fund. Contributions to this plan were approximately $317,000 in fiscal 1999.

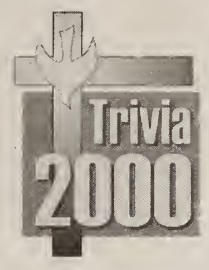
9. Employee Health Benefits:

The Central Administration administers medical and dental insurance coverage for the employees of the Roman Catholic Diocese of Charlotte. The Central Administration charges each organization premiums for the coverage of its employees on a monthly basis. The individual organizations have no liability for claims in excess of the premiums to be paid. The Central Administration has an arrangement with a third party to administer the medical and dental plan. Approximately 20% of the premiums submitted by diocesan entities is paid to third-party administrator for administrative services and the premiums for specific and aggregate stop-loss coverages. The remaining portion of the premiums is designated by the Central Administration to pay claims which are processed by the third-party administrator. The Central Administration has specific stop-loss coverage at $75,000 per claim and aggregate coverage beginning at 115% of the actuarially projected total individual claims under $75,000. Employee health benefits expense was approximately $1,549,000 during fiscal 1999.

Animated films with Gospel, jubilee themes planned

ROME (CNS) — The Gospel is kid's stuff — or at least it can be, according to cartoon-makers whose Bible-based work is to be integrated into plans to mark the year 2000.

The feature-length cartoon "The Miracle Maker," which depicts Jesus' life story, is set to debut in theaters in Europe and the United States this Christmas. It will be broadcast on Italian television in the jubilee year. "The Miracle Maker," a British-Russian production, was previewed at a recent cartoon film-festival in the resort town of Positano, Italy, where it attracted attention in particular for its creative use of computer graphics.



Meanwhile, the main Italian public television station, Raiuno, plans a series of animated videos on jubilee-related themes in tandem with Audiovisivi San Paolo, an undertaking of the Pauline Fathers and Brothers. The subjects are as diverse as the meaning of indulgences, the principal events of holy years and the significance of year 2000 celebrations in particular. Throughout the series, the same character acts as narrator: an earnest and straight-talking young monk, Brother Jacopone. ▼

Catholic, Jewish scholars to review Vatican's WWII documents

By CINDY WOODEN
Catholic News Service

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Vatican and its official Jewish dialogue partner will appoint a team of Catholic and Jewish scholars to conduct a joint review of Vatican documents from the World War II era.

The Vatican's Commission for Religious Relations with the Jews and the International Jewish Committee for Interreligious Consultations, known as IJCIC, announced the agreement Oct. 19.

The three Catholic and three Jewish scholars, whose names should be announced by the end of October, will begin with the 11 volumes of Vatican archival material published between 1965 and 1981.

"The main focus is to determine what occurred during the Holocaust period and World War II, and if questions still remain, then the scholars will seek further clarification," said Seymour D. Reich, IJCIC chairman.

The agreement marks the renewed activity of IJCIC — an umbrella group of Jewish organizations — which had been inactive for several years and plagued by internal divisions.

The Anti-Defamation League, which left IJCIC in April, was not part of the October agreement, Reich told Catholic News Service in Rome.

The joint study is a response to one of the thorniest questions in Catholic-Jewish relations: The activity of the Catholic Church and, particularly, of Pope Pius XII during World War II and the Holocaust.

Prominent Jewish organizations repeatedly have called on the Vatican to open its World War II archives to clarify allegations that church leaders knew the extent of the Holocaust yet failed to raise their voices in defense of European Jews.

The Vatican repeatedly responded that all relevant documents had been published in the 11 volumes prepared by a team of Jesuit researchers.

The Vatican has maintained the documents show the church helped save thousands of Jews from deportation to concentration camps and that Pope Pius feared that if he strongly condemned the Nazis, they would retaliate with harsher measures against Catholics and Jews.

Cardinal Edward I. Cassidy, president of the Commission for Religious Relations with the Jews, said in 1998 that calls for opening all the Vatican archives made no sense when the relevant published documents had not been studied thoroughly.

He called for a joint study of the published archival material by Catholic and Jewish scholars.

A year later, the cardinal said, "The offer was completely ignored" by Jewish organizations.

The Oct. 19 statement from the Vatican and IJCIC said, "Cardinal Cassidy and Mr. Reich expressed the hope that any question and differences that now exist or may arise can be resolved through the joint review process.

"The team of scholars is expected to raise relevant questions and issues that, in its opinion, have not been adequately or satisfactorily resolved by the available documentation, and to issue a report on their findings," the statement said.

Reich said he hoped the six scholars could meet in New York in early December and map out their work, which will deal with documents in their original languages — mostly Italian, German and French.

No timeline has been set, he said.

"This is intended to be a scholarly work; they won't rush or do a slipshod job," Reich said.

Although the volumes have been available since 1981, Reich said the approach of a joint review is new. "Even if they had been studied before, it wasn't by a group of Catholic and Jewish scholars. Their work will be officially recognized and, therefore, difficult to ignore," he said.

Cardinal Cassidy and Reich said their Oct. 18 meeting included a discussion about IJCIC's current membership and about some members' insistence that the Vatican and IJCIC not engage in a dialogue on theological issues.

Reich said, "Some of our members have a problem with discussing theological topics per se, but we have found ways in the past to touch those topics and, undoubtedly, we will in the future."

Rabbi A. James Rudin of the American Jewish Committee, an IJCIC member, told CNS in Washington the joint study of the Vatican's World War II archives is important to Catholic-Jewish relations, particularly given the Vatican process to beatify Pope Pius.

"The defenders and detractors of Pope Pius XII are both working with a lack of primary source materials," the rabbi said. "Pius XII deserves more than an incomplete study" on either side.

The rabbi said he was not hopeful about getting theological topics on the table for Vatican-Jewish discussions, since IJCIC operated by consensus and its Orthodox members insisted the conversations not focus on theology.

He said he disagrees with the Orthodox Jews because "if you're going to have a true dialogue, everything should be on the table. In fact, Jews do discuss theology with Christians."

Eugene Fisher, associate director for Catholic-Jewish relations for the U.S. bishops' Office for Ecumenical and Interreligious Affairs, agreed with the rabbi.

"Nothing should be barred from the table in dialogue. You can't have a dialogue through press releases — you have to sit down together to talk about it," Fisher said.

"The more volatile the issue is, the more important it is to be sensitive to each other's position," he said.

The current members of IJCIC are: the American Jewish Committee; B'nai B'rith International; Israel Jewish Council on Interreligious Consultations; World Jewish Congress; the Orthodox Union and Rabbinical Council of America; the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism and Rabbinical Assembly; and the Reform Union of American Hebrew Congregations and Central Conference of American Rabbis. ▼ passed away and some time had gone by, at the urging of others to do more activities, Mrs. Foskey began to take driving lessons. She had no idea that she would be receiving her license and meeting her second husband at the same time — David Foskey was the driving instructor. After three weeks, he proposed, she accepted, and they combined his three children and her six children into one large family.

"If one of my daughters had come to me and said 'Mom, I want to marry someone, but I've only known him for three weeks,' I would have said 'no way,'" joked Mrs. Foskey. "God knew when I would be ready for someone else and who I needed the most."

John Green and his wife Sue, parishioners from St. James Church in Concord who are celebrating their 25th anniversary, said, "It seems like yesterday [since we were first married]. This is a wonderful way to bring everyone together who is celebrating the same thing you are. It reminds us why we have been able to do this for 25 years — through God's blessing."

"Fifty years of marriage has been wonderful; it brought us four daughters, and we have grown into a close-knit family over those fifty years," said Mr. and Mrs. James Dawson from Our Lady of the Angels Church in Marion.

"We have had a wonderful and happy life," continued Mrs. Foskey. "The first year of marriage is full of happy expectations, but as the years go by, you realize that there is more to marriage than that. There is a joyful oneness between us, and our marriage has been very blessed. God knew when I needed someone and who I needed the most."

"It is a lifelong commitment," said Vincent and Helen Tamburro from St. Paul the Apostle Church in Greensboro. "It is an honor to be here and is nice to see so many other couples with the long marriages," said Mr. Tamburro. "This reminds you of events during your marriage and brings back many memories," added Mrs. Tamburro. She and her husband have been married for 50 years.

This endeavor is sponsored by the Family Life Program, one of the 10 ministries under the leadership of Gerry Carter, director of Special Ministries. The first anniversary Mass occurred during the time when Atlanta Archbishop John F. Donoghue was bishop of the Diocese of Charlotte and has continued since then. ▼

"Waking Up in America" paints grim picture of healthcare for homeless and hopeless

Reviewed by JAMES C. O'NEILL
Catholic News Service

In this age of profit-oriented HMOs and increasingly impersonal health care, the story of "Dr. Joe" Greer's work among the homeless and hopeless of Miami's worst slums, "Waking Up in America," carries a challenging message: it does not have to be that way.

No shrinking violet, the 43-year-old physician writes that as a young doctor, "I was inspired beyond my wildest dreams to build a clinic for the homeless, another for undocumented immigrants, and to establish other provisional facilities for the poor. In the process, I learned that the beauty of America is this simple: if we find it wrong, we can make it right."

"Waking Up in America"
by Dr. Pedro Jose Greer Jr.
with Liz Balmaseda,
Simon & Schuster (New York, 1999). 202 pp., $22.

This autobiography, written with the help of Miami journalist Liz Balmaseda, bristles with can-do bravado and resounding outrage. Dr. Joe has made it his mission to bring passion, drive and creative energy to focus on the city's castaways who had fallen through the cracks of an indifferent society.

Pedro Jose Greer Jr. is the son of a Cuban family which fled to Miami to escape the Castro regime. After studying medicine in Haiti, Joe started as an intern in 1984 at Miami's Jackson Memorial Hospital. Young Dr. Joe found himself trying to treat patients who were beyond help because nothing was done for them until at death's door.

To reach the poor and the sick in his first year as an intern, he started the Camillus free health clinic staffed with fellow interns, scrounging supplies from wherever he could. Trusting his instincts, Dr. Joe pushed his outreach program to the dangerous rat-infested hideaways of homeless drug addicts, prostitutes, runaways and other derelicts.

Today Camillus treats more than 10,000 persons a year and provides other survival services. His experience has led Joe to conclude that America's health care system "is designed for an upper-middle-class society" where "the poor and uninsured are left to scramble on the fringes."

In addition to medical and social action, Dr. Joe became an advocate for the "untouchables" first in Miami and later nationally. He served on the Bush and Clinton administrations' health care advisory groups, although he resigned from the Clinton group because it failed to live up to his expectations.

Dr. Joe bellows when he speaks of profiteering HBOs, the bean counters who deny decent medical care to bolster incomes and power bases within the medical community. At times readers might think Dr. Joe is blowing his horn too much. Nonetheless, it is a fact that his dedication has drawn financial and moral support from Comic Relief, a "genius" grant from the prestigious MacArthur Foundation, and backing from Miami's retired Catholic Archbishop Edward A. McCarthy.

At other times the book runs the risk of being seen as a promotion piece for some future fund-raiser for Dr. Joe's work. If so, that's OK. This is not only his story, but also the stories of many of the helpless and homeless whom we meet in these pages. This book forces readers to look at the personal aspect of dire poverty, to see the person behind the sociological or medical statistic. ▼

The crowded kitchen was noisy with animated conversation and laughter, and half-shouted queries of "chocolate or pistachio?" A multigenerational group of close friends was loudly enjoying good stories, delicious food and each other's company. Dishes were cleared, coffee orders taken and ice cream bowls distributed.

The hosts — new parents whose lives finally were getting back to normal now that the baby was sleeping through the night — were engrossed in a comical exchange recounting the adventures of parents and their teen-agers.

In the midst of this happy and raucous circle, the new parents suddenly looked across the table at each other. Their faces were alert, heads cocked ever so slightly, eyes narrowed. The conversation and laughter, engaging as they were seconds earlier, had faded into background noise.

"I'll go," the mother whispered to her husband.

"Where're you going?" a friend asked.

"The baby's crying," the father replied.

Everyone stopped talking and, as one, listened. Not a peep. They rolled their eyes and joked about nervous new parents hearing things.

Just then a loud wail pierced the laughter, followed by murmured sounds of comfort. The father grinned in vindication as the crying trailed off to contented silence.

"How the heck did she do that?" a teen-ager wondered in amazement. The sounds of talk and the slurping of ice cream from the bottoms of bowls resumed, and the party continued.

The power of love to sensitize the hearing of parents to the distress of their children is awesome to behold. How much more awesome, then, the sensitivity of God's hearing to us, his beloved children, when we are suffering.

In Sunday's first reading, from Exodus, God says of those in need, "When they cry out to me, I will surely hear their cry."

To the extent that we are anguished, this is good news indeed. To the extent that we are the cause of suffering for others, God's sensitivity to the cry of the poor should make us think hard about how we might relieve their pain.

"You shall not wrong any widow or orphan. If ever you wrong them and they cry out to me, I will surely hear their cry"
— Exodus 22:21-22.

Questions:
What's one time in your life when you heard something that no one else heard? Where in your daily life could you listen more attentively to hear, with God, the cry of the poor?

Six prize winners announced in this year's Angelus Awards

HOLLYWOOD (CNS) — Six student filmmakers will share $8,500 in prize money in this year's Angelus Awards competition, sponsored by Family Theater Productions.

The awards were announced in Hollywood by Jack Shea, president of the Directors Guild of America, and actor Kevin Dobson, an honorary committee member.

The Patrick Peyton Award for Excellence in Filmmaking, named after the priest-founder of the Family Theater, went to Columbia University student Lisa Kaufman for "Packing for Two." She also won $2,500.

Kaufman as well as three students awarded $1,500 each and two awarded $750 each will be honored at a Nov. 6 screening at the Directors Guild of America headquarters in Hollywood.

The winners of the $1,500 prizes are:

— Barbara Schock of the American Film Institute, the Mole-Richardson Award for Production Design for "My Mother Dreams the Satans Disciples in New York."

— D.J. Johnson of the University of Southern California, the Angelus Award for Nonfiction Filmmaking for "Men Like My Father, Families Like My Own."

— Dwight Hwang of California Institute of the Arts, the Angeles Award for Outstanding Animation for "The Reunion."

Receiving special recognition and the $750 prizes are Francesca Di Amico of the Art Center College of Design for "Silence Living in Houses," and Michael Zaidan of the American Film Institute for "The Last Tzaddik."

Four other finalists will have their films screened at the Nov. 6 event: Ted Kroeber of Loyola Marymount University, "Borders"; Matthew Hanzen of Brigham Young University, "Hold Me"; Dan Rutledge of Regent University, "The Window"; and Larry Eisenberg of California Institute of the Arts, "David Proshker."

The Angelus Awards honor student films which explore the complexity of the human condition with creativity, compassion and respect.

Past Angelus Award winners include Tony Bui, who won the Grand Jury Prize at the last Sundance film Festival for his film "Three Seasons."

Over the years many notable actors and filmmakers have been part of Family Theater Productions, including George Lucas and James Dean, who received their first film credits in one of those productions.

Co-sponsors of the Angelus Awards this year included Lucasfilm Ltd., Gregory Productions and Crest National Video. Actress Joan Van Ark is chairwoman of the honorary awards committee and other committee members include stars Gregory Peck, Lynn Redgrave, Christopher Reeve and Jane Wyatt. ▼

"Superstar" (Paramount)

Molly Shannon brings her TV comic skit character of a klutzy Catholic adolescent to the big screen but the thin story of her high school hi-jinks as well as some farcical religious stereotypes are only occasionally amusing. Director Bruce McCulloch fails to find much humor or any wit in the dim proceedings whose dopey central character grows increasingly tiresome, unsympathetic and ultimately irritating. Considerable sexual innuendo, comic religious stereotypes, occasional vulgar language and a sexual expletive. The U.S. Catholic Conference classification is A-IV — adults, with reservations. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is PG-13 — parents are strongly cautioned that some material may be inappropriate for children under 13.

Y2K documentary outlines society's dependency on computers

By HENRY HERX
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

NEW YORK (CNS) — Providing a breezy but reassuring look at what may happen on Jan. 1 when the date on computers turns from 99 to 00 is the informative documentary, "Y2K: The Winter of Our Disconnect," airing Tuesday, Oct. 26, 8-9 p.m. EDT on PBS.

Computer expert Robert X. Cringely takes viewers on a tour of computer history, theory and practice, explaining along the way how much — but not all — of contemporary life is dependent upon computers.

The potential Y2K crisis stems from the early days of computers when much needed data space was saved by using two digits instead of four to record dates.

When computers turn to 00 on Jan. 1, those which have not been reprogrammed properly will read the date as 1900, which may trigger a variety of malfunctions.

Though most computers have been reprogrammed, there is considerable uncertainty about how successful this effort has been.

Whatever may happen Jan. 1, Cringely points out that the production and delivery of power sources and other utilities will not be affected by dating problems.

It is the billing for those services as well as other types of accounting which may be affected by dating glitches.

Though banks and credit cards are also vulnerable to computer failures, Cringely points out if this were to happen, stores "will always accept your check."

"Y2K: The Winter of Our Disconnect"
Oct. 26 on PBS,
8-9 p.m. EDT

After running through various scenarios of Y2K mishaps, Cringely states the real danger is not one of technology but of people's fear of what might happen.

If people panicked and began withdrawing their bank savings or hoarding foodstuffs, there could be a real Y2K crisis.

By the time Cringely concludes this survey, he has made a convincing case that people have less to fear from computers than from their fear of them. ▼

Service on parish councils is a calling, pastor says

By JOANITA M. NELLENBACH
Correspondent

FRANKLIN — You've just been asked to serve on your parish's pastoral or finance council. If you agree, you'll be responding to more than an invitation from your pastor, as members of those councils in the Smoky Mountain Vicariate learned at a workshop at St. Francis of Assisi Church.

Representatives attended from Holy Redeemer, Andrews; St. Joseph, Bryson City; Our Lady of Guadalupe, Cherokee; St. Francis of Assisi, Franklin; Immaculate Heart of Mary, Hayesville; Our Lady of the Mountains, Highlands; St. Margaret, Maggie Valley; St. William, Murphy; St. Jude, Sapphire Valley; St. Mary, Sylva.

"When you are asked to serve on a pastoral council or finance council, this is not just serving on another committee; this is a call."
— Father George Kloster, Vicar of the Smoky Mountain Vicariate

"When you are asked to serve on a pastoral council or finance council, this is not just serving on another committee; this is a call," said Father George Kloster, vicar of the Smoky Mountain Vicariate, who conducted the workshop. This call is a vocation, Kloster said.

"A vocation is a very deep, very powerful, permeating interaction between myself and God," Kloster said. "We are called into existence at this time, in this place, among these people, for the sake of investing our time in some cause of transcending importance. Vocation is beyond our life's work; vocation is partnership with God."

Whatever the person's state in life — married, single, religious — the state should enrich and enhance the vocation. A vocation is seen as "what I most need to do and that the world most needs to have done," Kloster said.

"I must be alert to the authentic voice of God calling me in my life," he added. "We must have a real sense of honesty, have the ability to examine our motives, to not simply pursue our own ends."

So, how does this apply to service on the pastoral council?

"We're about things that need to be done," he said. "The council must understand it has a calling and must work to discern what that calling is. Many times the meeting is to get through the agenda, but if the agenda is drafted right, the council can hear God's call through the agenda."

God speaks through others, through his word, through conscience, prayer, and society. Therefore, unless the council sets aside time at meetings for prayer, reflection, and spiritual development, it might not hear God's call. Setting aside time for prayer and reflection is important because, Kloster pointed out, the parish is first and foremost a spiritual body, and the pastoral council sets the tone for spiritual development and faith growth in the faith community.

So, with part of the meeting being taken up with spiritual development, how does parish business get done without the meeting running far into the night?

"How can we be people who liberate others?" Kloster said. "Don't get sidetracked with irrelevant customs and unimportant traditions. What are the real needs, and how is this parish addressing them?"

The pastoral council avoids micromanaging. Commissions should be set up to implement what needs to be done. These commissions are liturgy, family life, evangelization, community life, administration, and faith formation.

Three, two, one: Lift Off

Eighth-grade students from Immaculata School in Hendersonville experienced an educational adventure during a recent three-day visit to the U.S. Space and Rocket Center in Huntsville, Ala. In addition to strolling the length of a 365-foot Saturn V rocket that carried astronauts to the moon, and walking underneath the nation's only full-scale space shuttle display and seeing firsthand, students got to see the world's fastest plane, the SR-71 Blackbird. But it wasn't just a sightseeing expedition, the students got some hands on experience with motion-based simulators, the thrill of G-force and weightlessness, and space footage viewed in the 67-foot IMAX format. From left to right, first row: Mary Elizabeth Rause, Octavio Rodnguez, Brian Petullo, Weesie Vieira, Jennifer Petullo. Row two, Janet Smith, Lauren Ellis, Brooke Davenport, Cortney Shock, Jason Keenan, William Wierman, and Krafton Locke.

"The people who are commissioned should have the freedom to do what they need to do," Kloster said. "The pastoral council should supply the vision for the parish; the commissions should carry out the vision. The council should have the broad view."

Each commissions submits a written report to the pastoral council so members can read them several days before a meeting. The reports detail what the commissions have been doing. If a commission has a special concern, it is addressed at the meeting. The appropriate commission takes care of routine items outside the meeting. For instance, if money is in the budget to get the rugs cleaned, the council shouldn't have to deal with that and it shouldn't be brought up at a council meeting.

Then there's money.

"The pastoral council needs always to know where the finance council is," Kloster said. "A member of the finance council needs to be a voting member of the pastoral council. The pastoral council needs to have a good sense of what the finances are without managing the budget."

Throughout the workshop, including the viewing of "Nights at the Round Table, a video on effective parish councils, the idea was stressed that all have an equal role to play.

"What made me sit up and take notice was the idea of equality," said Virginia Baecher of St. Francis. "If we could get that idea across to the parish, we'd have more people who'd want to get involved. Nobody's better than anybody else." ▼

South American kidnappings: continuing the vigil

Juan Bermudez wants the world to remember those in captivity.... "The more time we allow to go by, these people seem to be forgotten. Pray for them and not allow this situation to be forgotten."

By JOANN S. KEANE
Editor

CHARLOTTE — It may have seemed like an ordinary Sunday as Clemencia and Licerio prepared for Mass. With three children, there are infinite possibilities of how they might have spent that time.

One thing is irrefutable: Clemencia and Licerio headed out for Mass. They did not return.

Instead, on that day this past May, the couple and one of their children were kidnapped alongside more than 150 of their neighbors and friends. Their 10-year-old daughter was let go, but Clemencia and Licerio became pawns in an ugly guerrilla coup.

Nearly 40 armed and uniformed men — believed to be members of the rebel group ELN [the National Liberation Army] — abducted the parishioners during Mass at the Church of La Maria in the town of Cali in Colombia.

In Charlotte, Clemencia's brother, Juan Bermudez, prays for their release. And while the St. Gabriel parishioner and his family hold vigil in Charlotte, thousands of miles away in South America, the siblings and parents of his kidnapped sister and her husband hold on in faith.

In Cali, relatives of the kidnapped victims prepared a special Mass to pray for the hostages' health and liberation.

Mid-June brought the release of 33 of the hostages, and increased hopes for all the kidnapped victims. More would find their way to safety, though Clemencia and Licerio remained captive.

Sometime in July, Clemencia got a letter to her children — via The Red Cross — letting her children know that they were okay healthwise and hoping for a prompt resolution to the situation, says Bermudez. One of the Colombia newspapers published a picture of a handful of kidnapped in August. Included among the victims: a visible Clemencia, but no Licerio.

There is an audible frustration his voice as Bermudez recalls ELN plans to release a handful of individuals, including Licerio, but that never happens. With dashed hopes, Bermudez says, "There's nothing, there's no other news."

Bermudez worries about the emotional toll on his parents: His 89 year-old father and 76 year-old mother. "You go to my [parents'] house and the only thing they can talk about is the situation. There's nothing else going on except this," he says. "Everybody is trying to support each other, but it's been tough to cope with all of this."

Early in August, Archbishop Isaias Duarte Cancino of Cali excommunicated the guerrillas responsible for the May kidnappings. In a statement to the kidnappers, the archbishop said they "have done a wrong which they are removed from the communion of the Church. Let us hope they understand that they have committed a very big error, and that they must undo the wrong and return to the breast of the church, to enjoy the graces and blessings of God."

Holy words fall on the deaf ears of terrorists.

Words decrying the widespread violation of human rights and international humanitarian laws also go unheard by the guerrillas. Amnesty International repeatedly denounced the deplorable attacks against humanity. "We have repeatedly condemned the taking and holding of hostages in Colombia and call for the immediate and unconditional release of all those currently held by armed opposition groups and paramilitary organizations."

In mid-August, Pope John Paul II called for a lasting peace to end the "absurd violence" in Colombia. "...To all the victims of this absurd violence, I express my closeness and my prayers that they may be returned as soon as possible to their families," said the pontiff.

Yet faith resounds among the families, and prayers are slowly answered. Licerio was released three weeks ago, along with several other men. Bermudez hasn't talked with his brother-in-law, but word is he is in good shape.

Juan Bermudez wants the world to remember those in captivity, most expressively, his sister, Clemencia. "The more time we allow to go by, these people seem to be forgotten. Pray for them and not allow this situation to be forgotten." ▼

during a part of his talk telling the audience not to worry about past mistakes. "I will remember that always," she said.

Pat Brown, member at St. Matthew parish in Charlotte, also talked about the day. "I felt that Father Hunt's talk is just what people our age needed," she said. "The peace he emanates is wonderful."

Mary A. Green, also a member of St. Matthew parish, agreed. "He has such a good sense of humor and real faith," she said.

Other seniors talked about the reason they came to the event. "I think it's wonderful for people our age to get together," said Anne Kerelak, a member of Our Lady of Mercy parish in Winston-Salem. "It's too bad more people don't take advantage."

Marie Newschwander, a member of St. Philip the Apostle parish in Statesville, said, "We just need every once in a while to get away from our everyday routine."

Albertine Walker, also a member of St. Philip the Apostle parish, added, "I came because I enjoy the outing, and to meet other parish members and have fellowship."

Mrs. Breakfield said of the day, "It's almost like a reunion for a lot of people. I was very pleased. I thought that Father Hunt was absolutely wonderful. They (the seniors) really liked his manner and the way he seemed to speak from his heart. He gave them some practical things and some challenging things to think about."

Bishop William G. Curlin, who celebrated Mass at the close of the day, echoed the comments of Father Hunt by talking about the contributions that senior citizens could make with their lives. "I thank you, especially because of your example, . . . your prayers, . . . your living witness to this world," he said. "You are the heroes because you took your faith, and you kept it, and you showed the world. I thank you for being that light in our diocese.

"Show us how to walk like Jesus. Continue to be the light." ▼

Group signs covenant to become Mercy Associates

BELMONT — Thirteen lay men and women signed their initial Covenant to become Mercy Associates on Sept. 26 at Cardinal Gibbons Chapel in Sacred Heart Convent. This formalized commitment follows several months of study around the history of the Sisters of Mercy and the charism of Mercy as exemplified by Mercy founder Catherine McAuley.

Additionally, pre-Associates are asked to determine where they are and see how they can extend the charism of Mercy within themselves, their families and among their local communities.

Mercy Associate Pat Murphy welcomed the group; then came a reflection from Mercy Sister Mary Thomas Burke, who challenged the new Mercy Associates to be "intentional Christians in the marketplace."

Long-standing Mercy Associates reaffirmed their covenants, followed by the signing of covenants by new Associates at the altar. Mercy Associate pins were presented to new Associates followed by the anointing of their hands by Mercy Sister Mary Rosalind Picot, president of the regional community of North Carolina of the Sisters of Mercy of the Americas. Sisters Jeanne Marie Kienast and Therese Galligan, co-directors of Mercy Association, introduced the group to the Sisters of Mercy in attendance and to their fellow Associates.

The group includes: Carolyn Bergman of Gastonia; Debbie Burgess of Mooresville, Rita Brennan, Sue Coley, B.J. Dengler, Gaye Dimmick, Janet Garbison, Margaret Mancino, Kathy Murray, Linda and John Pastryk and Ann Schuler, all of Charlotte; and Mary Kathryn Pickitt of Lake Wylie, S.C.

Mercy Association supports a mutually enriching relationship between the Sisters of Mercy of the Americas and others that empowers a response to the call to Gospel holiness through sharing in spirit and mission. Mercy Associates make a commitment through a formal covenant with a regional community. Each Associate extends the mission of Mercy in his or her own way, while maintaining an independent lifestyle. Association also provides mutual opportunities for friendship, prayer, service, hospitality and celebration. Associates are welcome at many community gatherings.

In her time, Catherine McAuley, the founders of the Sisters of Mercy, responded to sickness, poverty and ignorance by following Jesus and his merciful response to the needs of others. For more than 160 years, the Sisters of Mercy have experienced the support, collaboration and dedication of many who share the Mercy vision.

Currently there are over 2,000 Mercy Associates who live and minister within one of 25 different regional communities. ▼

Charlotte resident part of national youth initiative

By JIMMY ROSTAR
Associate Editor

CHARLOTTE — Winston Sharpe says his memory of how to ride a bicycle has served him well.

He was a child growing up in the Bushwick section of Brooklyn, N.Y., and his bicycle still had training wheels on it. He needed a helping hand.

"My dad, he used to roll with me and push me along, holding on to that bike while I'm pedaling," says Sharpe, now 28 and a resident of Charlotte. "Then I look back, and all of a sudden I'm pedaling by myself. There were people involved with my life, holding on to that bike, and then there was me finally pedaling by myself. I was off and running.

"Now it's time for me to help somebody with their training wheels."

Thanks to funding given to the Catholic Campaign for Human Development, the U.S. bishops' anti-poverty agency, Sharpe is learning much about helping people help themselves these days. One of four young adults in the United States who received stipends to work with CCHD projects last summer, Sharpe has been involved in a new national initiative aimed at teaching young people about the church's social justice principles by getting them involved locally.

Sharpe worked as an intern with Partners in Hope, an advocacy program partially funded by a local CCHD grant that assists families in need. A program of the private, nonprofit agency Crisis Assistance Ministry, Partners in Hope strives to help families provide for themselves through support, empowerment and education.

Sharpe is set to work this fall as an intern with Helping Empower Local People, a campaign project focusing on areas of youth and education, crime and safety, affordable housing, and jobs and wages.

The purpose of his work with the CCHD programs is two-fold. "The idea of the internships is to have people of college age or older who receive a grant in the summer that would give them a direct experience in CCHD kinds of projects, plus equip them to go back to school financially and in terms of motivation," said Dr. Barney Offerman, director of CCHD for the Diocese of Charlotte. Sharpe will begin classes at Belmont Abbey College next semester. The money he has earned through the internships, along with other jobs, is helping him reach a goal of putting himself through school.

Winston Sharpe operates a forklift in the Second Harvest Food Warehouse.

For the past decade especially, Sharpe has worked diligently to keep pedaling forward. Having survived struggles in his youth with poverty, drugs, cutting school and strained family relationships, he moved to the Charlotte area with his mother in 1989.

He persevered through more trouble with drugs, repaired his relationship with his mother and in 1993 converted to Catholicism. "It took some positive individuals in my life, such as my dad and other people, to let me see that that wasn't the way to go," he says of his former lifestyle. "I made a conscious decision that I didn't want to be involved with that, and I wanted to change my life."

He became more active in volunteer work, and began taking a hard look at effecting social justice for himself and others.

Now that he has strong family relationships, Sharpe says he sees even more clearly the need for programs like Partners in Hope that are geared toward the entire household.

For Partners in Hope, Sharpe enlisted volunteer time and services of individuals, organizations, churches and businesses to help families achieve their goals of self-improvement.

"I feel a bond towards those people that I get involved with, especially within the Partners in Hope program," says Sharpe. "It's a program that provides for people who are living in those same types of problems I that I grew up with.

"It feels good to watch them grow and change their situation. I can see myself in them."

Sharpe says he knows first-hand of the importance of mentoring, too.

"As we get older and we realize our mistakes, we want to make sure that people don't make the same mistakes that we did," he says. "The mentoring process is so important. It provides some encouragement, it provides people with information, it provides people with education."

When he's not interning or volunteering, Sharpe works as distribution coordinator of Second Harvest Food Warehouse of Metrolina, an agency serving more than 450 nonprofits such as homeless shelters, daycare centers and group homes. He's a licensed barber as well, often offering free services to low-income Charlotteans.

Now that his work with CCHD has been paired with his own experiences, Sharpe says he is strengthened even further in his resolve to help others. "What I've learned is that it works," he says. "As long as you help somebody and point them in the right direction and provide them with encouragement, it will make them do something for themselves."

Learning to address root causes of society's ills is one of the benefits Sharpe says he has been given. It's a gift he deems important.

"All of my needs are met through the grace of God," he says. "I'm fed, I have shelter, I have a loving family, and I have people in the community who respect me now and who I respect....

"That's the best blessing that God could have given me: to be a part of the solution instead of part of the problem in the community. Through Partners in Hope, Crisis Assistance and the Catholic Campaign for Human Development, I'm allowing myself to be that instrument for positive change." ▼

True love stands test of time, says "golden" couple

By JIMMY ROSTAR
Associate Editor

CHARLOTTE — It was Easter Sunday evening in 1943 when Jacob Harold Jones strolled along a Portsmouth, Va., street and met Mary Louise Massey for the first time.

Jacob, age 15, spotted Mary waiting with her cousin for a bus to take them to the Portsmouth waterfront. "As normal on an Easter Sunday in that day and age, you'd promenade in the evening after services in your new suit — the only one you had," Jacob says with chuckle. "And the girls were looking good, too."

A friend introduced Jacob to Mary that springtime day, and young Jacob was instantly smitten. With that scene, the preface to a love story now more than five decades old was written.

"We just had chit chat and talked, but I was impressed," says Jacob with a smile. "After that meeting, I was hooked."

A chance meeting in 1943, not too long after their first encounter, brought the two together again. A junior assistant Boy Scout master at the time, Jacob visited the scout master's house for a gathering. The scouts spied two girls in the neighboring yard, and Jacob recognized one as Mary Massey. He concocted a ruse involving a fountain pen that brought him closer to the girl next door.

Jacob and Mary Jones celebrate their 50th wedding anniversary at a Our Lady of Consolation Church in August.

"I took off immediately over to her house, rapped on the door, and her mother answered," he says. "I introduced myself: 'My name is Jacob Jones. I'm a junior assistant scout master, and the scout master would like to know if he could borrow a bottle of ink.'

"I came in and was looking around, straining my neck and saying, 'Where is she?'"

About that time, he caught just a glimpse of Mary in the kitchen. "That was enough," he says, "because I knew where she lived. Subsequently, we got together."

Mary, it turned out, was enamored, too. And she still is. Mary and Jacob celebrated their 50th wedding anniversary in August with family and friends at their parish church, and again on Oct. 17 with jubilarians from throughout the diocese at the annual silver and golden anniversary Mass in Charlotte.

They were married Aug. 27, 1949, in St. Mary Catholic Church, a now-defunct African-American parish in uptown Charlotte.

"Ours was the first wedding in that little church," recalls Mary, a Charlotte native.

A career U.S. Army and Air Force man, Jacob traveled extensively in the United States, Europe and Asia. There were times apart when Mary couldn't travel with him, but they relied on the strength instilled in them by their families.

Jacob recalls what he once told someone about how to be a good husband. "I had to fall back on my military experience," he says, again with a smile. "I said, 'When you get in line, you keep your mouth shut and do what your told.' You run risk every day if you try to improve on your wife's suggestions."

Mary and Jacob have three children — Jacob Jr., Karen Jones-Andrade, and Alan — and the five did experience the challenges of military family life. But Jacob and Mary were able to show their children the world, including a tour of the Holy Land, and the family remained strong throughout the travel and new experiences.

The Joneses have three grandchildren as well.

Through it all, their faith has been paramount. "It's the 100 percent stuff," says Mary. "It's so important."

Jacob nods in agreement. "It's the glue," he says.

Both active parishioners of Our Lady of Consolation Church in Charlotte, the Joneses have — through good times and bad — relied on faith as the "crowning feature" of their relationship, as Jacob puts it.

"Every night, at home together, wherever we've been, we're on our knees saying prayers together," he says. "And there have been some cold floors with no carpet, too."

Marriage is a relationship of joy, discovery and compromise, the two agree. Mary says that in addition to a strong faith life, communication is key in a loving relationship. "You've got to be able to talk to each other," she says. "You cannot speak what you think is your peace and walk away. Both of you have to do this thing. You just have to stick with it until it's taken care of." ▼

"The Joint Declaration on the Doctrine of Justification"

Pope calls Catholic-Lutheran agreement milestone on journey

By Cindy Wooden
Catholic News Service

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Catholic-Lutheran agreement on justification is "a milestone along the not easy road of the re-establishment of full unity among Christians," Pope John Paul II said.

As representatives of the Lutheran World Federation and the Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity were signing the agreement Oct. 31 in Augsburg, Germany, the pope used his midday Angelus address at the Vatican to highlight the importance of the document.

"The Joint Declaration on the Doctrine of Justification," the pope said, deals with "one of the principal arguments which set Catholics and Lutherans against one another."

As one of the documents signed in Augsburg said, "Justification is forgiveness of sins and being made righteous, through which God imparts the gift of new life in Christ."

A key dispute during the Protestant Reformation was whether believers were justified and saved through grace alone or whether salvation required a combination of grace and good works.

The Catholic-Lutheran agreement states that justification comes through faith alone, but that good works are an essential sign of true faith.

Pope John Paul said the agreement "constitutes a sure basis for the continuation of ecumenical theological research and for facing the difficulties which remain with a better founded hope in resolving them in the future."

Catholic and Lutheran leaders pray together at the Lutheran Church of St. Anne in Augsburg, Germany, Oct. 31. The prayer service was held prior to the signing of "The Joint Declaration on the Doctrine of Justification."

"I want to thank the Lord for this intermediate step along a path which is difficult, but so rich in joy, unity and communion among Christians," the pope said.

Pope John Paul said the signing, in addition to helping Catholics and Lutherans give a better witness to the love and unity found in Christ, also is "a precious contribution to the purification of historic memories."

The signing ceremony in Germany began with a penitential service in Augsburg's Catholic cathedral. Catholics and Lutherans asked for forgiveness for not always having chosen the way of unity within their churches and within their lives.

Then, participants walked in a half-mile procession to the Lutheran Church of St. Anne for an ecumenical prayer service.

At the end of the service, the joint declaration was signed by Cardinal Edward I. Cassidy, president of the Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity; German Lutheran Bishop Christian Krause of Brunswick, president of the Lutheran World Federation; and by other Catholic and Lutheran participants.

In his homily during the service, Cardinal Cassidy said Christians share the original disciples' call to build the church of Christ.

"Our task is not only to continue the building, but unfortunately we have also the duty of seeking to repair the damage that has been done to that building by the storms, conflicts and, at times, by human-made earthquakes," the cardinal said.

Cardinal Cassidy said the agreement on justification is a gift from God and moves forward "in a significant way the work of restoration of unity among the followers of Christ."

The task of continuing the dialogue is urgent, he said.

"Our lack of love for one another,

In Angola, gang kills Italian missionary priest

LUANDA, Angola (CNS) — An Italian missionary priest was shot and killed in Angola, apparently after refusing to hand over his car to thieves. Father Umberto Negrini, 59, had already been robbed twice of automobiles in recent years. When men armed with knives and guns surrounded his car Oct. 30 in the Angolan capital of Luanda, he locked the doors and tried to start the engine, according to witnesses. He was shot through the window and died after being taken to a hospital.

Interreligious assembly concludes with calls for cooperation

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope John Paul II and representatives of some 20 religious traditions closed a four-day Vatican assembly, saying greater cooperation, based on mutual forgiveness for past wrongs, was necessary to solve the world's spiritual and material problems. Punctuating the colorful, song-filled concluding ceremony Oct. 28 in St. Peter's Square was a surprise apology — which was met with sustained applause — by an Indian Hindu for recent anti-Christian violence in her country.

Bethlehem mayor, priest voice concerns over clashes

JERUSALEM (CNS) — Bethlehem's mayor said he was "deeply concerned" that clashes between Palestinians and Israeli soldiers will negatively affect tourism as the city prepares to welcome Christian pilgrims for the jubilee year. "We want Bethlehem and the surrounding areas to be quiet and calm and stabilized. It is in the best interest of everyone," said Mayor Hana Nasser, who is Catholic. "There is no doubt this will affect tourism," he said, though he said he believes it will only be temporary. Meanwhile a local priest said "our doors and our homes are open" to receive pilgrims, but the lack of peace remains a "great problem." Clashes left a dozen Palestinians wounded Oct. 27 following the funeral of a Palestinian man killed by an Israeli soldier Oct. 25 near Rachel's Tomb. Demonstrations after the killing left almost 40 Palestinians wounded, and two Israeli civilians and one Israeli soldier injured.

Young adult Catholics found less likely to marry in church

KANSAS CITY, Mo. (CNS) — A new survey has found that younger adult Catholics in the United States are less church-connected and considerably less likely to marry in the church than their parents or grandparents. A team of sociologists, writing in the National Catholic Reporter, said young women in particular showed a "dramatic decline in allegiance" to the church. The National Catholic Reporter, a Kansas City-based Catholic weekly newspaper, devoted 10 pages of its Oct. 29 issue to findings of the survey, commissioned by the paper and conducted by the Gallup Organization by questioning 875 Catholics nationwide.

Calls to close Puerto Rican bombing range gaining strength

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Support is growing in Congress for a ban on U.S. Navy use of the Puerto Rican island of Vieques for bombing practice, activists on the issue said at an Oct. 26 press conference. Two Catholic bishops are among those urging President Clinton to exercise his authority to order the Navy off the island, which has been used for bombing exercises for more than 50 years. A civilian security guard was killed in April when a Navy fighter dropped two bombs more than a mile off target. Residents of the island, home to 9,300 people, see a connection between high rates of cancer and infant mortality, a decline in the quality of fishing in the area and the use of live ordnance and chemicals including napalm at the bombing range.

Bishop asks Catholics to return goods looted from East Timor

ATAMBUA, Indonesia (CNS) — The bishop of Atambua in predominantly Christian western Timor, Indonesia, urged local Catholics to return materials looted from East Timor during the post-referendum chaos. "Catholic leaders here have urged me to appeal to all people in Belu district, especially Catholics, to return the materials looted from East Timor to the owners," Bishop Anton Pain Ratu of Atambua said in mid-October, reported UCA News, an Asian church news agency based in Thailand.

In letter to elderly, pope says death brings union with God

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Old age and death naturally are frightening, 79-year-old Pope John Paul II said, but Christians must face the end of this life with the certainty they will be with God in the next. "Despite the limitations brought on by age, I continue to enjoy life," the pope wrote in a letter to his peers throughout the world. "At the same time," he said, "I find great peace in thinking of the time when the Lord will call me: from life to life!" Pope John Paul's "Letter to the Elderly," was released at the Vatican Oct. 26 and was written to mark the U.N.'s 1999 Year of the Older Person.

U.N. nuncio calls on nations to review how they treat children

UNITED NATIONS (CNS) — The Vatican nuncio to the United Nations called on the international community to examine its record on the treatment of children since adoption of the Convention on the Rights of the Child a decade ago. Speaking to a committee of the U.N. General Assembly Oct. 28, Archbishop Renato R. Martino said that despite the promises made then the world still saw "abominable crimes committed against millions of children, born and unborn."

St. Cecilia Singers share gift of song

By ALESHA M. PRICE
Staff Writer

CHARLOTTE — The rich harmonies and familiar melodious refrains from another time and place in history were performed for the attendants at the choir concert on October 29 from the St. Cecilia Singers of Gloucester near London. The singers intertwined their musical history with some traditional American songs.

"We don't often present concerts at the cathedral, so this was a great outreach to the community to provide an opportunity for people to hear music that they would not normally hear."
— Larry Stratemeyer, music director of St. Patrick Cathedral

"This was a wonderful opportunity for people to hear a British choir and share a rich choral tradition that is found in our American tradition," said Larry Stratemeyer, the music director of St. Patrick Cathedral, who helped with arranging the singers' visit to Charlotte. "We don't often present concerts at the cathedral, so this was a great outreach to the community to provide an opportunity for people to hear music that they would not normally hear."

The twenty-five-member chamber choir made Charlotte their last stop on their North Carolina tour, which included Wilmington, Goldsboro and Ahoskie. This was the group's first trip to the states to perform their songs. Ian Hunt has been the assistant director of music for Gloucester Cathedral and the choir conductor since 1998. Gloucester Cathedral will be 900 years old next July.

St. Cecilia, the patron saint of music and musicians, is a fitting choice for the name of the chamber choir founded in 1949 by Dr. Donald Hunt. The choir is celebrating their fiftieth anniversary this year. They have appeared on BBC television, have been on radio, and have also recorded a CD of Gloucestershire music.

They are a chamber choir, which is one that traditionally sings secular music, said Hunt. They are mainly a concert choir that sings about four concerts a year and have made tours to Germany, France and Holland. The members of the choir include professional and non-professional singers from all walks of life, such as, a forensic psychiatrist, a psychologist, teachers and a general practitioner. Three of the male singers are from Gloucester Cathedral, while some sing in the abbey choir at Tewkesbury.

Ian Hunt, the assistant director of music at Gloucester Cathedral, conducts the St. Cecilia Singers during their concert at St. Patrick Cathedral in Charlotte on October 29.

Hunt directed the singers through a program of songs from the sixteenth through the twentieth centuries from British composers. The audience enjoyed "Kyrie and Gloria" and "Agnus Dei" from "Mass for Five Voices," arranged by Orlando Gibbons and William Byrd and John Tavener's arrangement of "A Song for Athene," one of the songs performed at Princess Diana's funeral, and other songs by Ralph Vaughan Williams and Daryl Runswick.

Hunt said, "music enhances my life immeasurably. It serves as an escape and entertainment, and it is a language that says what words and pictures can't express. It offers a glimpse of God that people do not often see."

In their tribute to America, the choir sung traditional African-American slavery songs, such as, "Steal Away" and "Nobody Knows" from "Five Negro Spirituals," an arrangement by Sir Michael Tippett and Runswick's arrangement of "O, Shenandoah" and "Frog-Went-A-Courtin'."

brothers and sisters in the one Lord Jesus Christ, destroys the credibility of our preaching the Gospel of love," the cardinal said.

At an Oct. 29 press conference in Augsburg, the Rev. Ishmael Noko, general secretary of the Lutheran World Federation, said love must mark relations between Catholics and Lutherans everywhere.

"Wherever Lutherans and Roman Catholics live together, let the world know that they are not enemies, but sisters and brothers," he said.

Bishop Krause told the press conference that in the 30-year Catholic-Lutheran dialogue, "Trust and hope have increased and we have learned that that which binds us together is stronger than what distinguishes or separates us from each other."

The work of the dialogue must continue so that someday Catholics and Lutherans can be guests at each other's Eucharist, he said.

In addition, the Lutheran bishop said, the fruits of the dialogue must become concrete in joint efforts to help people in need.

Cardinal Cassidy told the press conference it was an honor to sign the agreement on behalf of the Vatican.

"If on the day of judgment I have nothing else to present to the Lord when he asks me, 'Did you do anything good during your life?' I can say I signed the joint declaration," the cardinal said. ▼

Charlotte Catholic High School football coach receives honor

CHARLOTTE — Charlotte Catholic High School has dedicated its athletic field in honor of longtime coach Jim Oddo. The dedication ceremony of the Jim Oddo Athletic Field took place on Oct. 22, 1999 prior to the CCHS Homecoming Game.

Former CCHS Principal, Sister Mary Rosalind Picot, RSM, opened the dedication ceremony with a prayer. The National Anthem was played by the CCHS Marching Band. Mercy Sister Paulette Williams, principal, dedicated and blessed the field.

"As we stand on the threshold of a new millennium, it is most important that we thank and honor a special person who has given 37 years to the ministry of education and coaching — 27 of those years to Charlotte Catholic High School. We honor tonight the man who put the pride in 'Cougar Pride,' Coach Jim Oddo."

Jim Keffer, Class of 1983 made the presentation of the sign denoting the Jim Oddo Field.

A tearful oddo thanked Sister Paulette and his alma mater for their continuing support. Following the game, a reception honoring Coach Oddo was held in the cafeteria.

Coach Oddo was recently named one of Delaware's all-time top 50 athletes and was invited to a celebration commemorating the 50-year anniversary of Delaware's former athletes of the year.

In 1957, Oddo was named Delaware's athlete of the year. That year, he was a member of North Carolina State University's championship football team. Before attending N.C. State, Oddo was an all-state offensive guard and linebacker at Wilmington High School in Delaware.

Oddo began coaching in 1959 at McCarty High School in Ft. Pierce, Fla. Three years later, he returned to Charlotte and spent several years coaching and teaching biology at East Mecklenburg High School. In the fall of 1973, oddo joined Charlotte Catholic High School as athletic director and today celebrates his 26th season with the Cougars.

During his coaching career at CCHS, Oddo has six Rocky River Conference Championships, 14 state playoff appearances, two Division 2 state championships and one state championship. In 1973, Coach Oddo was named the Mecklenburg County Coach of the Charlotte Catholic High School Year and in 1989, was named the East-West All Star Coach. Oddo was selected as the 1991 Shrine Bowl Coach, the only CCHS coach to receive this honor. Oddo's overall record through the 1998 season is 189-101-2. ▼

Parishes cook up recipe books to help with fund-raising efforts

By ALESHA M. PRICE
Staff Writer

FRANKLIN — A recipe of an idea for a fund-raiser — a pinch of cooperation from parishioners, a dash of the sharing of time-tested cooking methods, and a tablespoon of dedication from the committee members — all ingredients that St. Francis of Assisi Church in Franklin and St. Joseph Church in Newton have mixed together for their parish cookbooks.

It is not the first time a cookbook has been produced for St. Francis of Assisi Church, said Dan Lange, cookbook committee chairman. Several years ago, there was a cookbook that helped to raise funds for the youth group. At the parish council meeting last Christmas, Pat Wise, a council member, suggested that the cookbook idea be used again with proceeds to go to the church's Family Life Center improvements. Lange brought up the idea again several months ago, and the cookbook idea was put into motion again.

The committee contacted Morris Press, a Nebraska company that produces cookbooks, and they sent a kit with software. Parishioner Grace Sulsenti entered in and proofread most of the 350 recipes that were sent in for the cookbook.

"We wanted this to be a labor of love from the parish, and we didn't want to leave anyone out," said Lange.

St. Francis has a seasonal average of 350 parishioners, so everyone was represented in the cookbook. Many parishioners seek sunnier climates away from the Smoky Mountain Vicariate winters. The congregation was asked to submit at least five recipes each, and surprisingly, only about five or six of the recipes were repeated. However, even those recipes had variations in ingredients or cooking time, and the person's name was designated in the recipe's name.

The laminated cover shows a picture of the church and a dedication with the church history on the first page and a favorite chicken recipe from Father C. Morris Boyd, pastor of St. Francis. Like many cookbooks, the sections are divided with appetizers, main dishes, casseroles, pies and pastries and one special section called "This and That."

Lange explained, "we added that section for things with no real category like butter dumplings, flour tortillas, barbecue sauce and other items."

The foods run the gamut from English bread pudding to German-style potato salad to U.S. Senate Bean Soup, a recipe sent in by Evelyn George in honor of Senator Bob Carpenter. The award for strangest-titled recipe goes to "Ring Tum Diddly," a version of the British dish "Rarebit" containing milk, tomato soup, butter, flour and mild cheese.

If someone is up to his or her elbows in sauce or seasonings, taking time to turn the page of a cookbook can be cumbersome and messy. Therefore, Lange asked some parish cooks if they were writing a cookbook, what feature would they include. The consensus was that the entire recipe should be on one page, unlike in many cookbooks where the recipes are usually split in half on the front and back of pages.

About 750 copies will be printed and expected to be ready for sales in time for Christmas. Next summer, the committee plans to have a parish potluck dinner where everyone will bring a dish to share from the cookbook.

"Many of the recipes were submitted by relatives of deceased parishioners," said Lange. "This is a way for us to remember members of the parish who have passed on through their cooking."

The St. Joseph Church parish cookbook was so popular that 200 copies sold in three weeks and more have been ordered.

In April, Eileen Crider, president of the parish's Ladies' Guild suggested that a cookbook would serve as a good way to raise money for the group's fund. They were looking for "a fund-raising project that was a little different." The proceeds from the sale of the cookbooks would be distributed among various organizations, such as, the Holy Angels and Helping Hands, a church fund, which helps members who need financial assistance at any time.

In May, a personal tragedy struck the women when Sandy Rudisill, a member of the Ladies' Guild, passed away. They decided to dedicate the cookbook to her.

"It was a very nice way to honor her because she loved to cook," said Susan Grant, a member of the cookbook committee. "A member of the church, who was also Sandy's nurse, copied down the recipes that Sandy dictated."

Grant, Susann Jolly, and Donna Sharman formed the cookbook committee and contacted Walters Cookbooks Publishing Company in Waseca, Minn., who sent them a package with blank recipe forms and other items. The committee received more than 200 recipes from parishioners after requests were sent out.

Everyone turned in different recipes, so, as with the St. Francis cookbook, many of the recipes did not overlap. Some younger parishioners also offered their own easy-to-make recipes.

A basket of fruit is featured on the spiral-bound cover with an index of names and recipes in the back that many of the kids especially appreciated, said Grant.

"Everyone enjoyed the chance to share their recipes with others, and all of the proceeds will go to help those in need," said Grant. ▼

Father Hesburgh says road to peace in Kosovo will be bumpy

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Holy Cross Father Theodore M. Hesburgh, president emeritus of the University of Notre Dame, said a visit to Kosovo left him with sadness for the devastation but hope for better things to come. "It was a terrible feeling to see so many houses burned down and to realize that more than 20,000 lives were extinguished so brutally," said Father Hesburgh in a telephone interview about his trip, which took place in early October. The priest, who spoke to Catholic News Service from his office at Notre Dame, went to Kosovo with officials from the U.N. High Commission for Refugees, the UNHCR. The priest is a U.S. representative to the commission.

Priest says Vatican II evident in effort on justification text

NEW YORK (CNS) — The Vatican's decision to join Lutherans in signing a joint declaration on the doctrine of justification — after making "severe criticisms" of the document — shows the use of a new "ecumenical method" derived from the Second Vatican Council, according to Jesuit Father Avery Dulles. In the past, Lutheran and Catholic statements would have been examined individually to see if they could be harmonized, he said. Today, he said, theologians look at each system as a whole, and see the way it tries to express the Christian faith "through different thought-forms." Father Dulles made the Catholic-Lutheran declaration the theme of his fall lecture as McGinley professor of religion and society at Fordham University in New York.

Armenian Orthodox elect new patriarch

ETCHMIADZIN, Armenia (CNS) — Bishops, priests and lay members of the Armenian Orthodox Church elected a 48-year-old archbishop to be the new supreme patriarch of their church.

Archbishop Karekin Nersissian, the patriarch's vicar for the Diocese of Ararat, which surrounds the Holy See of Etchmiadzin, was elected Oct. 27 on the second ballot cast by delegates to the Armenian Apostolic Church assembly. The catholicos-elect was born in 1951 in Voskihat, near Etchmiadzin. He studied at the Etchmiadzin seminary and at the University of Vienna. He will be known as Catholicos Karekin II after his enthronement.

Famed director believed in redemptive suffering, says priest

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Legendary film director Alfred Hitchcock believed in redemptive suffering, and had many of his movie protagonists suffer before triumphing in the end, according to a Jesuit priest and film historian who wrote a biography on Hitchcock. "You must suffer and sacrifice in life if you're going to succeed," Father Gene Phillips remembered Hitchcock saying in an interview for the priest's 1980 biography, "Alfred Hitchcock." "He meant suffering in a moral sense, too," Father Phillips told Catholic News Service. "His characters suffered a great deal in his films."

Pizza-chain founder honored by Catholic-run treatment center

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Thomas Monaghan, founder of Domino's Pizza and former owner of the Detroit Tigers baseball team, told a Washington audience he is now devoting his life to helping people get to heaven. "Everything I try to do in my remaining life is to help people get to heaven. I want to get there myself," said Monaghan, who sold his company last December to devote his life to charitable work. He was in Washington Oct. 18 to receive the first St. Luke Award, given by St. Luke Institute, a treatment center based in the Washington Archdiocese for priests and religious.

Mercy Sister Mary Patrick Ryder, former teacher and principal, dies at age 89

BELMONT — Mercy Sister Mary Patrick Ryder died Sunday, Oct. 24, 1999, at Sacred Heart Convent. She was 89.

Received as a Sister of Mercy on May 26, 1927, Sister Mary Patrick was in her 72nd year as a Sister of Mercy.

A vigil service was held Oct. 25 in the Cardinal Gibbons Chapel at Sacred Heart Convent, where a Mass of Christian burial was celebrated Oct. 26. Burial followed at the Belmont Abbey Cemetery.

Sister Mary Patrick Ryder was born June 26, 1910, in Newport, County Mayo, Ireland. Her birth name was Margaret Ryder; she took the name Sister Mary Patrick upon entering the religious order of the Sisters of Mercy on Sept. 1, 1926.

She was a graduate of both Sacred Heart College, formerly in Belmont, and Catholic University in Washington, D.C., where she received a bachelor of arts degree in history and education in 1949.

Her ministry included teaching and serving for over 22 years as a principal at several Catholic schools. She taught in elementary schools at St. Leo's and Sacred Heart Academy, both in Belmont, and held positions in North Carolina Catholic schools in Newton Grove, Charlotte, Wilmington and Salisbury. She also taught in New York state and in New Smyrna Beach, Fla., where she also served as a principal.

Upon retiring from full-time teaching administration, Sister Mary Patrick served as a fund-raiser for Sacred Heart College. She served in the finance department of Holy Angels, Inc., in Belmont; in the pastoral care department at St. Joseph's Hospital in Asheville; and as treasurer for the motherhouse community.

In addition, Sister Mary Patrick held administrative appointments within the Sisters of Mercy of the Americas, Regional Community of North Carolina, by serving as local superior on four different occasions for a total of 23 years. She continued her years of service as part of the internal support staff at Sacred Heart Convent until her death.

Sister Mary Patrick was the daughter of the late Thomas and Catherine McGovern Ryder. She is survived by two sisters: Mrs. Jim Cummins of Klmeena, Westport, County Mayo, Ireland, and Mrs. Kitty Cusack of Wilmette, Ill.; nieces Mrs. Regis Downey of Surrey, England, and Mary Catherine Patek of Cleveland, Ohio; and nephews, Tom O'Donnell of Richmond, Va., and William O'Donnell of Cleveland, Ohio.

Memorials may be made to the Sisters of Mercy, 101 Mercy Dr., Belmont, N.C. 28012. ▾

Millennium Series:

Rome beefs up security to protect millennium pilgrims

By LYNNE WEIL
Catholic News Service

ROME (CNS) — Petty crime is a perennial problem in the Eternal City, but its elected leaders are beefing up security to protect its monuments and visitors during the year 2000.

As many as 1,500 people will be added to local museum payrolls from December until June 2001 to accommodate the expected millions of additional guests and to guard against theft. The Italian government recently passed a measure adding the necessary funds to its cultural budget. The same measure is meant to help lengthen the hours of museums, archeological sites, libraries and galleries.

Officials have also approved additional funds for traffic enforcement, as well as an increase in fines for violators. Tour-bus drivers will receive especially close attention during the jubilee year — those who drive through, or park in, restricted areas could face fines exceeding $300.

Rome's police department is to have a direct connection to surveillance video cameras placed in Rome's four major basilicas, including St. Peter's. Police Chief Antonio Pagnozzi said the cameras' presence would be "discreet" and "completely in tune with the sacred nature of the liturgy and of pilgrimage." Officers will watch the images transmitted from the basilicas at nearby police divisions and at a central security office. ▼

"Johnny Appleseed" Catholic spreads message of faith

By DIANNE RIGGS
Correspondent

ASHEVILLE — Some people have a gift for teaching; others a gift for charity; still others a gift for healing.

E. Perry Coe Jr. has the gifts of discernment and generosity. Indeed, he has been called a "Johnny Appleseed" of religious and spiritual materials. Whether frequenting the Mass, a coffeehouse, a pastor's study, a homeless shelter or Asheville's city streets, his ever-present backpack is filled with books, copies of articles, magazines, tapes and videos.

"In four or five minutes' conversation with Perry, he reaches into that bag he always carries and comes out with something that directly applies to what I have been saying to him or a current theme in my own spiritual journey," said Don Kelley of Asheville. "So many times he's shown up at just the right moment for whatever was going on in my life at that time."

Coe began his ministry quite inadvertently while living in Atlanta, even before he became a Christian. He was so struck by a book he had read that he gave it to a number of Baptist pastors. Since that time he has given out thousands of pieces of material.

"Perry doesn't just give out books in a restrained manner," said Donna Haight, who had inquired about the Catholic faith. "He is more like an artist — passionate and exuberant."

While most of the material Coe distributes is by Catholic authors and artists, he is very open to unity and ecumenism, having followed a circuitous route to the church himself.

"I try to see or feel what a person desires, what they are asking in their spirit," said Coe. He also shares out of what is beautiful to himself. All of this comes from his faith in the Resurrection.

Coe, a member of the Basilica of St. Lawrence, was first introduced to Catholicism as a soldier in Vietnam. He witnessed a 14-year-old girl become a religious sister at an orphanage. Shortly after that, he suffered a severe mental illness and was sent home to the States. In the Philippines, a Catholic woman recommended St. Francis to him. Then at an Army hospital, he went to Mass. "That sort of opened me up spiritually," he said.

E. Perry Coe Jr. offers two books on the Catholic faith to Donna Haight, who has expressed interest in the church.

Through a long spiritual journey that took him to a number of religious circles, Coe finally stumbled upon Catholic author Father Benedict Groeschel who had a deep impact upon him. He began to pray the Rosary and develop a devotion to the Virgin Mary.

"I like the freedom to believe that is present in Catholicism," Coe said, noting the beauty of God's grace and "the possibility that everyone will be saved."

In 1986, Coe attended the national gathering of the Brothers and Sisters of Charity, a religious community founded by Brother John Michael Talbot, a Secular Franciscan, musician and writer. It was there that Coe's conversion to the Catholic faith occurred.

"I like the freedom to believe that is present in Catholicism," he said, noting the beauty of God's grace and "the possibility that everyone will be saved."

"I am aware of weakness and grace available," he said.

The Brothers and Sisters of Charity are crucial in Coe's identity. In the late 1980s, he became a Domestic member of the Franciscan-oriented order. Much of the music he shares with others comes from the talent of Talbot.

Coe is also attracted to the saints and desires to be one. "They were often the greatest sinners — yet recognizing it, were willing to forgive and give mercy to others."

All has not been easy for Coe, who still suffers from the mental illness begun in Vietnam. "Accepting who I am has been the hardest thing," he said.

Perhaps that is why Coe is at home with such a cross-section of people and feels a special calling toward those who are mentally ill or disabled. "Perry talks with and encourages the homeless (in Asheville) and knows most of them by name," said Mary Ann Frank, a member at St. Lawrence. "He knows where all of the resources are — food, beds, clothing, AA and NA meetings, you name it."

Last year, Coe introduced Mary Ann Frank and her husband, Don, to the Brothers and Sisters of Charity.

Coe believes that his ministry is a way of reaching out of himself, a way of being in service, a reason for living.

"We go to Heaven with each other," he said. "We are interdependent. We will make it with other people on the journey, not alone." ▼

Women religious run expanding ministry to Vietnamese refugees

By SUZANNE HAUGH
Catholic News Service

CHAMBLEE, Ga. (CNS) — 1998 was the Year of the Tiger and in the Chinese and Vietnamese culture it is a bad year for a child to be born, according to Sister Christine Truong My Hanh, program director of her order's ministry to the Vietnamese community in the Atlanta Archdiocese.

Sister Christine, a Good Shepherd Sister, remembers one woman who came to her for advice when she found out she was to give birth that year. The woman asked if she should have an abortion or keep the baby.

The nun said she told the woman, "Why ask me? Because you are here, I think you want to keep the baby."

The woman nodded yes and Sister Christine, who was born in the Year of the Tiger in 1947, made a phone call to a Marietta Catholic church where parishioners supplied the woman with blankets and money for baby supplies.

"There are so many little ways to help people keep their babies," the nun told The Georgia Bulletin, Atlanta's archdiocesan newspaper, in an interview at the Good Shepherd center in Chamblee.

Sister Christine's petite frame masks her almost larger-than-life history of ministering to the most down-and-out people in society. Among other things, she ran a rehabilitation program for prostitutes, started a restaurant in a refugee camp and found U.S. foster families for children after the Vietnam War.

Challenges faced by the Vietnamese refugee community in the United States are numerous. They include the breakdown in many families, increased gang activity among the young, alcoholism and addiction among many males, and overwhelming stress for working mothers who try to make ends meet. Many elderly Vietnamese also experience isolation because they often don't speak English.

Good Shepherd Services' ministry to Vietnamese refugees began in Chamblee in 1993, based in Sister Christine's two-room apartment. Now the programs operate out of two homes and a garage with a staff of seven, who ministered to 4,000 clients last year. Four staff members are outreach workers who serve as translators when needed or who check up on clients in their residences.

Volunteers also aid in the center's programs, which include individual counseling, parenting and English as a Second Language classes, helping young Vietnamese children with their schoolwork and providing the elderly with meaningful work through a community garden. The volunteers also teach a five-week summer school session to children from the Vietnamese community.

But there is always a need to find "more hands and more hearts" to help, said Sister Christine, who makes herself available to speak to churches and civic groups interested in Good Shepherd Services.

She sees a cycle in many families where the youths do not want to learn Vietnamese but lean toward English and American culture.

"They can't speak in the native tongue of their families," she said. "They dye their hair and think society will accept them as American. The family gets upset, the community sees them as bad kids and they feel like they don't belong anywhere."

One way Sister Christine tries to break this cycle is by offering a cultural enrichment program where the youngsters learn the Vietnamese language, traditional songs and dances and participate in Vietnamese festivals so that they retain and respect their heritage.

"Once they can accept who they are, then they can adapt to the culture much better," she said.

Good Shepherd Services expanded its ministry by opening another center in Lilburn last year.

Brigitte Nguyen, program coordinator there, said that when the center first opened, attendance was low.

"But now people have started to come. We help one person and then they tell another," she said.

The center hopes to provide youths with a positive alternative to joining gangs. The youths now have a place to go after school since many of their parents work. Those attending the center try to improve their language skills.

Nguyen, who came to the United States in 1991 and moved to Atlanta in 1993, understands the challenges the Vietnamese face in this country. She also knows how overwhelming leaving one's homeland can be.

"We leave a lot of memories and whatever valuables (in Vietnam)," she said, "and start everything over again." ▼

Authors document family strength, parish support in true crime story

REVIEWED BY JOSEPH R. THOMAS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

On a grassy plot in front of St. Cecilia's Church in the Fox Chase section of Philadelphia, a gold-toned six-foot Celtic cross fashioned by a neighborhood carpenter stands as a tribute to Eddie Polec, a 16-year-old former altar boy savagely beaten to death on the steps of the church in 1994 by a gang of thugs from a nearby suburb.

The cross bears the inscription "Blessed be the peacemakers." It is both a memorial to Eddie and a tribute to his parents, John and Kathy, and his three siblings for reasons summarized in the title of the Bryn Freeman-William Knoedelseder book, "In Eddie's Name: One Family's Triumph Over Tragedy."

It is that triumph that lifts the book out of the realm of being just another true-crime story. Not only did the Polecs triumph over indescribable grief, an unwanted media frenzy, front-page trial coverage and brazen lawyerly behavior, but they triumphed as well over familial trauma, political posturing and a faulty crime-prevention structure.

The truth is that Eddie Polec and other Fox Chase youngsters could have been saved from the marauding invaders had police been directed to respond to a series of frantic 911 calls over a two-hour period. Thus among the family's greatest triumphs was the perseverance that eventually led to the reform of the 911 system.

The family's story is told with passion by Freeman and Knoedelseder, a husband-and-wife team that covered the trial that followed the murder, arrests having come quickly thanks to energetic detective work and public outrage.

While St. Cecilia's is not the focal point of the story, it is apparent that the support of the parish — priests, nuns and people — was central in sustaining the Polecs in circumstances difficult to imagine. Eddie's slaying, for instance, was so brutal that even the most hardened reader is likely to cringe over details of the bludgeoning he was subjected to.

"In Eddie's Name: One Family's Triumph Over Tragedy"
By Bryn Freedman and William Knoedelseder
Faber & Faber (New York, 1999)
264 pp., $24.00.

Throughout, the authors document the strengths of the family, including their refusal to sue the city although they could easily have done so. Symbolic of their strengths, perhaps, are the comments of Billy Polec, Eddie's adoring younger brother, made after the verdicts against the six defendants proved to be less than the family, the police and prosecutors expected.

For 15 months after the killing he had kept his grief and his anger to himself, refusing to say anything publicly. But after the trial he responded to a question with these words:

"My brother was the most forgiving person you will ever meet in your life. And I wouldn't be surprised if he had a hand in saying to the jury, 'These kids are 16. Why don't you make them think about what they did, but one day let them go back to their families.' That's just the way Ed was."

Convicted of third-degree murder, rather than murder in the first degree, the defendants are now in jail with parole as a possibility. ▼

It's tempting, in reading today's Gospel about the foolish bridesmaids, to see it as a warning to "be prepared" in the way the Boy Scout motto suggests one should bring rain gear "just in case," because you never know when the weather might change. The implication is that it probably won't rain, but if it does and you made preparations ahead of time, you won't get caught off guard — and wet.

Although Jesus says the moral of his parable is to be alert because you never know, the reading from Wisdom indicates that he doesn't mean "just in case."

Both passages are talking about the coming of the Lord, but the Old Testament reading emphasizes expectant watchfulness and the promise that constant vigilance will be rewarded.

So Jesus is telling us that like the sensible bridesmaids we should not only light the torch "just in case" the Lord shows up, but we should keep it burning because he is going to be there, and we always want to be able to see him.

I know a deacon whose attitude exemplifies the sensible bridesmaids. Deacon Mike serves in a midsize parish in a college town. He gives homilies periodically, teaches, officiates at weddings, baptisms and funerals. He accompanies youth groups and leads retreats.

He works with the campus ministry at the large state university where he also is a professor. There he conducts Communion services, gives talks and teaches too — and goes on retreats.

As a professor, students know him as a man of faith, and he is always available and interested when they come to him for counsel or just to talk. He serves as a chaplain to the university's football team and continually finds ways to support the spiritual lives of players and coaches who seek him out for guidance and fellowship.

Recently his wife took a job as youth minister of a parish in a neighboring town. Deacon Mike now also gives the homily there once a month, leads an occasional confirmation session and substitute teaches in religious education classes "every chance I get."

Deacon Mike keeps a lit torch, expecting the Lord to come at every turn. As Scripture promises, "He who watches ... shall not be disappointed, for he shall find (what he anticipates) sitting by his gate."

Questions:

What are the distractions and worldly activities that allow your torch to burn down, keeping you from seeing God's presence? What effort will it take for you to keep vigilant?

Mary's life story 'not a boring movie,' Shriver says

By MARK PATTISON
Catholic News Service

HOLLYWOOD (CNS) — Portraying the life of Mary on the small screen is exciting, said Bobby Shriver, who with his mother, Eunice, is executive producer of the upcoming NBC program.

"This is not a boring movie" Shriver said in an interview after a Hollywood press conference promoting "Mary, Mother of Jesus," which will air Sunday, Nov. 14, 9-11 p.m. EST on NBC.

"You know how people said, 'This is not your father's Oldsmobile'? Well, this is not the Mary you know from Renaissance paintings," he explained. "We're not trying to make Mary rock 'n' roll, but to make her more modern."

Nor will the film be dependent on special effects, Shriver said. "There's some angels swirling around, but it's not like we have a lot," he said. "You don't need a lot to show water changing into wine."

The movie doesn't always show Mary witnessing the pivotal events in Jesus' life. Because Mary is mentioned so infrequently in the New Testament, outside of the infancy narrative, "she runs off to do certain things that we imagined she would have done," Shriver said.

The show's makers have created a film they hope will appeal to non-Catholics as well as Catholics.

"We try to imagine her life as a young Jewish girl born in this kind of world, and what was her life like," he said. "I imagine some people are going to be offended, and other people will say we did a good job. It's a tough job to imagine that. That's why we worked so long on the development (of the project)."

"Mary, Mother of Jesus" stars Pernilla August as Mary. August played the mother of Anakin Skywalker, a.k.a. the future Darth Vader, in the summer blockbuster "Star Wars: Episode I — The Phantom Menace." Christian Bale, who starred in this year's movie version of "A Midsummer Night's Dream," plays Jesus.

The TV movie takes a look at the events in Jesus' life as seen through the eyes of his mother.

NBC bills the movie as "a timeless story of love, sacrifice and faith" that "both humanizes and celebrates Mary's pivotal role as the mother of Jesus."

The announcement promoting the film said: "While Mary's concerns for her child's welfare and her desire to protect him are those of every mother, her remarkable faith is continually tested as she must endure Jesus' suffering and death, accept his miraculous destiny and dedicate the rest of her life to the sharing of his message."

Kevin Connor, who directed the cable TV feature "Mother Teresa: In the Name of God's Poor," directs "Mary, Mother of Jesus." Much of the filming was done in Budapest, Hungary, and Prague, Czech Republic.

"I hope this isn't seen as religion on TV — more like spirituality on TV or wisdom on TV," Shriver told TV writers in Hollywood. "We hope it's not going to be — and (that) you all won't write about it as — 'a Catholic movie' and people think, 'Oh, that's really boring,' and watch asteroids (on some other TV movie)."

NBC executives didn't roll their eyes when Shriver pitched the movie idea to them, he said. "There was a lot of interest. People go, 'You're doing what?' And then they're interested. They go, 'How are you going to do this?' and 'How are you going to do that?'"

"Mary, Mother of Jesus" had originally been titled "Mary and Jesus." Shriver said he had been pushing for a name change to "Mary of Nazareth." The current title, "Mary, Mother of Jesus," was announced earlier in the fall.

Eunice Shriver is new to the Hollywood production business, but Bobby has a little experience, having been one of the producers of the enormously popular action film "True Lies," starring his brother-in-law, Arnold Schwarzenegger.

Christian Bale stars as John, Permilla August, plays Mary and Simone Bendix play Mary Magdalene in the NBC-TV movie, "Mary, Mother of Jesus" to air Nov. 14.

Schwarzenegger's wife, Maria Shriver, is an anchor and reporter for NBC News. Her brother said the family connection played no part in NBC agreeing to air "Mary, Mother of Jesus."

"We thought they did a terrific job on these kinds of projects," Bobby Shriver said. ▼

The Pope Speaks

POPE JOHN PAUL II

Pope defends family after aid granted to unmarried couples

By JOHN THAVIS
Catholic News Service

ROME (CNS) — Pope John Paul II, reacting to a recent Italian regional law that provides child support to unmarried couples, defended the traditional family and said it must not be equated with irregular unions.

"I once again ask civil authorities to insure that the family founded on marriage be promoted and protected, without being confused with other very different forms of union," the pope said Oct. 31, during a visit to a parish on the outskirts of Rome.

The pope was reacting to a law passed by the Latium region in October. The law offers financial "assistance to family groups," including couples with children who are registered civilly, without specifying whether the parents need be married or unmarried.

The law drew a sharp critique from the region's bishops, and the pope said he agreed with the bishops' arguments. Several times in recent years the pope has warned against legislation in Italy that would blur the distinction between family groupings based on marriage and those of unmarried, cohabiting couples.

Latium officials have defended the program, saying it was not designed to promote irregular unions but to meet a real need. Many of the region's poorer children have parents who are unwed, they said.

During his visit to the church of San Benedetto Giuseppe Labre, the pope spoke at length to the children of the parish, joking at one point: "I don't know why young people follow me so willingly."

He said he was sure Holy Year 2000 would go well and encouraged the young people to join him at World Youth Day celebrations in Rome next August.

Pope urges world support for fight against cancer

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope John Paul II urged the church and society to do all it can to support the fight against cancer and to help the millions of cancer patients around the world.

The pope made the remarks at a Sunday blessing Oct. 31, a week before the Italian celebration of National Cancer Research Day.

"I want to encourage scientists and whoever supports their research, along with all those who offer daily care to people stricken by this illness, to continue in their generous work," he said.

"I also invite civil society and the Christian community to support every effort aimed at weakening the disease of cancer, so that hope may be given to the sick and their families," he said.

Hispanic Ministry studies and statistics

This month I would like to share with you some statistics that might be of interest to us all. Recently, a couple of studies on Hispanic Ministry have been done by the Bishops' Committee on Hispanic Affairs of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops in preparation for the Encounter 2000 that will take place in Los Angeles, California on July 6, 2000.

Those studies were conducted of all dioceses in the United States that in the year 1990 had a minimum Hispanic population of 25,000. It was found that in the six-year period between 1990 and 1996, the diocese in the whole country with the highest percentage increase in Hispanic population growth was Charlotte, North Carolina. It had in those years a percentage increase of 84.3 percent. The Diocese of Raleigh, North Carolina was number four on that list with a percentage increase in Hispanic population growth of 71.4%.

Here are some more statistics taken from the National Study: "Hispanic Ministry at the Turn of the New Millennium" done in May of 1999 by the Secretariat for Hispanic Affairs, Bishops' Committee on Hispanic Affairs of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops.

The Hispanic Reality at a Glance

Remembering Gary Cooper

Everybody knows his name: Gary Cooper, the famous Hollywood star we sometimes thought of as Lou Gehrig or Sergeant York. Yet because he preferred his family and the outdoors to the limelight, few fans ever knew much about what kind of a man he really was.

A new book, "Gary Cooper Off Camera, A Daughter Remembers" (Abrams), gives another picture of this American icon. Written by his only child, Maria Cooper Janis, we get to see the legendary actor in family photos, letters to his wife Rocky and personal father-daughter stories.

It is an authentic mosaic of a father, remembered by a daughter as gentle, giving and loving, a spiritual man who embraced the Catholic faith of his wife and daughter in his later years, dying at peace in 1961 at age 60. Actor Tom Hanks, writing an introduction, poetically recalls Cooper as an "artist of great mystery."

I had the privilege of meeting Maria Cooper Janis about 15 years ago at the Benedictine Abbey of Regina Laudis in Bethlehem, Conn. She was visiting Mother Dolores Hart, a beautiful woman we both call friend. Janis knew her much longer than I, for their friendship went back to the late '50s when Hart was a gorgeous young Hollywood star.

I soon got to know Janis as a deeply spiritual woman, an accomplished artist and the wife of the incredible pianist Byron Janis.

Maria Cooper Janis said the book came about because she had been working on documentaries about her father for major cable stations. She looked back at home movies, personal papers and family photos. "My mother, who's not well now, had kept albums, with everything labeled," Janis said in a recent interview with me. The tape was dried, but the pictures were fine.

"I thought maybe I could put these unpublished photos together to give people a feeling for what this era and our family were like — a real family unit, a threesome — extraordinarily wonderful and harmonious in spite of the celebrity, the fans, the privilege."

Janis doesn't go into the dark period in her family's life when her father had a long affair with the actress Patricia Neal. "My mother never conveyed any bitterness to me. Yes, I was angry at the moment. But I was able to talk to God about what I was feeling. I felt a spiritual support, so balanced by my mother's support. Maybe my father needed to find out what he really wanted in life. My parents learned they loved and respected each other. They chose each other in the end. I try to point this out in my book."

Janis, raised in her mother's Catholic faith, recalls how her father started going to Mass with them, becoming intrigued by the sermons of Father Harold Ford, nicknamed "Father Tough Stuff" by the actor. Ultimately he converted, becoming a quietly devout Catholic.

The book is important to his daughter. She says she thinks "people should know it's possible to have all the hoop-de-do of fame, fortune and celebrity, and still create a wholesome, positive family life, keeping a hold on one's personal ethics. My father never got caught up in the whole stardom, ego trip. He had very little patience for that."

I found Janis' book fascinating because it is truly a family love story.

Making a margin, living a mission

Bean counter, n. Informal. A person who makes judgments chiefly on the basis of numerical calculations, as an accountant, financial analyst, or statistician.

That is Webster's characterization of the unfair but popular view that most fiscal managers are insular number-crunchers whose creativity begins and ends with spreadsheets and financial tables. Bean counters are widely represented as Scrooge, the Grinch, and the lamentable Midas — all gloomy souls ensconced at counting tables in marbled vaults and granite banks.

That is a far cry from the group of "bean counters" I met last month at the Diocesan Fiscal Management Conference held in Phoenix, Arizona. Here were the Chief Financial Officers of archdioceses and dioceses of the United States exchanging ideas and information about the fiscal administration of their local churches. I had been invited to provide a motivational speech for their conference, but I must report — it was I who was moved by the enthusiasm these unsung heroes have for their special ministry.

There I was reminded of the story of Sister Margaret Hickey who headed up Providence Hospital in Washington, D.C. back in the 1970s. Publicly criticized for raising across-the-board hospital rates at a time when the homeless were being shunted from one District hospital emergency room to another, Sister Margaret asserted the Daughters of Charity were not reneging on their commitment to the poor.

"We have not forgotten our mission here at Providence Hospital. Our mission has always been and will continue to be a ministry of service especially to the poor and homeless. But without a financial margin, we won't be able to sustain our mission. It's fairly simple — no margin, no mission!"

Like Sister Margaret, all managers of church funds wrestle daily with marketplace forces that affect the financial margin. Whether at a soup kitchen, charitable nursing home, or parish school, there is some brave soul keeping track of the money. I doubt very much that any one of these folks takes on such a responsibility simply because they enjoy bean-counting. No. They are individuals who commit their knowledge and skills to the people of God with as much enthusiasm and hope for the mission as anyone else.

One of the earliest financial talents put to work for the mission of Christ was that of Matthew the Evangelist. As a customs officer, he exacted duty on all goods and commodities as they entered and left the territory of Herod. As a follower of Christ, Matthew became an intriguing example of how the Lord uses whatever gift one person may bring to him.

Because of Matthew we have the best accounts of how the temple tax was collected, the most details of how people went about paying their debts, and the most vivid account of the peril of riches. Accustomed to systematizing information, he organized Jesus' teachings in terms of numbers, like the three denials of Peter and the seven parables of the Kingdom. In the story of the wise and foolish virgins Matthew underscored the need to anticipate needs and expenses — or else miss out on the party.The Gospel according to Matthew also presents the only record of the parable of properly investing one's talents. The story is about the way God expects us to use all our gifts, spiritual, intellectual, financial, whatever, to undertake and fulfill our mission in life — whether that means counting beans, planting beans, or sharing them with hungry people who don't have beans. And, ultimately, hearing God's praise for a life of generous service: "Well done, good and faithful servant." (Matthew 25:21)

Questions for the life sciences

My first assignment as a priest was to St. Monica's parish in Sussex County, N.J. It was in the summer of 1960, and I learned a lot about dairy farming that year.

One of our parishioners was an artificial insemination technician. He explained how farmers could now improve their herds with the frozen semen taken from bulls. I thought to myself, those must have been bulls that longed for the good old days.

Today huge transnational corporations have taken over most of our nation's farms. They are using biotechnology in ways we never dreamed possible. Cloning to achieve genetic uniformity is only one of the ongoing experiments.

Scientists are also mixing human semen with animal semen to produce a hybrid animal. The idea is to harvest organs that are less likely to be rejected when they are transplanted into humans.

These new "life sciences," as they are now called, are supposed to pave the way for a brighter tomorrow. But will they? Not every invention works out as well as we might hope.

When I look at the huge quantities of nuclear waste we will have to live with for the next 25,000 years, I wonder about the highly touted benefits of nuclear power.

The miracle of science has many benefits. On a hot summer day when I turn on my air conditioner, I become a true believer. But in spite of all the advantages, I am becoming more and more skeptical about the life sciences. Take for instance the business of assisted pregnancy.

Last summer I read that 35 of the 49 human sperm banks across Canada were forced to close because of faulty testing and record keeping. The government stopped the distribution of semen frozen in flasks of liquid nitrogen because investigations revealed serious violations in the record keeping.

An unknown donor with AIDS, hepatitis C or syphilis easily could infect an innocent woman if controls are not stringently enforced. When you have sloppy testing and record keeping, the "life sciences" can turn out to be death sentences.

Scientific advances that can be used for profit-making purposes easily can become corrupted by human greed. Cutting corners to increase the margin of profit is almost a universal practice in the business world. Maybe science itself is not always to blame when problems occur, but the negative effect on human beings is the same nevertheless.

Some people complain how slow the church is when it comes to approving the latest scientific advances, especially in the field of biotechnology. But more and more of them are beginning to see the wisdom of using caution in these matters.

The moral issues involved are highly consequential. Scientists will probably clone a human being some day. Many of them are working on it right now, even though it is against the law. Will the clone be a normal human being? Will it be raised in a lab? Will it have human rights? These are moral questions we must answer.

I don't have all the answers. That's why I am grateful we have the teaching authority of the church to guide us in these matters.

Understanding the resurrection of the body

Q. Belief in the resurrection of the body is central to Christian faith. I know it refers to a "spiritual body," but could you explain this belief in light of what the pope said recently?

According to him, heaven and hell are states of being, not physical places, generally downplaying the terrors of hell. The Catechism of the Catholic Church, however, which the pope introduces as "a sure norm for teaching the faith," takes the traditional approach that says heaven is a "place" (No. 326) and that the teaching of the church affirms the existence of hell (No. 1035). How can these two viewpoints be reconciled?

A. Judging from the volume of mail I've received on the subject, our Holy Father's remarks struck a sensitive nerve in a lot of people. In fact, we find here another of those occasions when he challenges us — in encyclicals, other writings and weekly audiences — to take a fresh and thoughtful look at what we say we believe.

When we hear key words of our faith, we often pay more attention to familiar and popular images than to the doctrines themselves. "Heaven," "purgatory" and "hell" are all strongly evocative words for Christians. A little reflection should warn us to be cautious about the pictures and notions that pop into our heads.

What Pope John Paul II has done is simply make explicit what has been implicit all the time. Does anyone really believe, for example, that heaven and hell are places in our ordinary sense of that term? Are they somewhere out in material creation on an unknown planet? In a galaxy on the other side of a distant black hole?

The same must be said for purgatory. It "is not a place," he explained, but a "condition" of purification for the saved whereby Christ "frees them from their imperfections."

The Gospel stories of his appearances and actions after the resurrection, for example, make clear that the risen Jesus (and therefore we ourselves in our risen bodies) exists in a frame of space and time which is outside our normal experience.

He obviously did not dash in and out with the speed of light. He simply was not there, visible and touchable, and then he was there.

Interestingly, the catechism references you give hint that we need to walk carefully here. When it says heaven is a "place," it puts the word in quotation marks, indicating that, in this context, it does not have its usual meaning. Similarly, in the words of the catechism, the condition of self-exclusion from communion with God is what we call "hell."

As for the graphic biblical descriptions of heaven and hell, John Paul II repeats the best long-standing Scripture scholarship when he says the symbolic and metaphorical language we find in the New Testament only attempts to put into human words the reality of eternal "joyful communion with God," or "the complete frustration and emptiness of a life without God."

Far from downplaying the terrors of damnation, he contends that "the situation in which one finds himself after freely and definitively withdrawing from God, the source of life and joy," is one that can only be approached figuratively, with images like "inextinguishable fire" and "the burning oven."

Are any human beings (Judas? Hitler? Stalin?) actually in this condition of eternal separation? As he has in the past, the pope reminds us that this "remains a possibility, but is not something we can know."

We would do well, it seems to me, to dwell more on the conclusion Pope John Paul draws from see-

World Youth Day 2000 to include NC participants

By JOANN S. KEANE

CHARLOTTE — When youth and young adults around the world gather to jointly celebrate World Youth Day 2000 Italian-style next August, a contingency from the Diocese of Charlotte will be counted among the Roman ranks.

"There is no greater celebration of Catholic identity for the young Church," says Paul Kotlowski, diocesan director of youth ministry. Kotlowski, along with Colleen McDermott, director of campus and young adult ministry are spearheading this diocesan pilgrimage of faith.

For the Diocese of Charlotte, this international pilgrimage for youth and young adults is a first. While World Youth Day celebrations spring forth every other year, this is an introductory venture for the diocesan young people to join with Catholics from the four corners of the earth.

In many respects, the diocese is right on track with the sentiments of the Holy Father on the Great Jubilee year. In his Papal Bull, "Incarnationis Mysterium," Pope John Paul II discussed a central theme of the Jubilee being that of pilgrimage. "In the course of its history," he said, "the institution of the Jubilee has been enriched by the signs which attest to the faith and foster the devotion of the Christian people. Among these, the first is the notion of pilgrimage."

The Aug. 15-20 gathering of young people with the Holy Father in Rome is open to all — with a suggested minimum age of 16 — and pilgrims must be registered. Registration will be coordinated through youth or young adult, or campus ministry offices.

With preliminary expectations of 150 pilgrims, Kotlowski and McDermott have embarked on the enormous task of fine-tuning details for the diocesan journey. "We hope to have the information out to all the parishes before Thanksgiving," says Kotlowski, who points out parish groups intent on this opportunity should begin fundraising efforts.

McDermott and Kotlowski selected a Youth Day package that covers virtually every expense. In addition to airfare, hotel, World Youth Day registration and two meals a day, a side-trip to Assisi and Sienna will offer young pilgrims an additional slice along their Italian faith journey.

Kotlowski sees the entire pilgrimage as an opportunity for the teens and young adults "to become further affirmed in their Catholic identity," and hopes the experience provides "growth and appreciation of being part of a universal Church."

World Youth Day 2000, according to Vatican officials, is likely to be the largest event of the upcoming Holy Year. And while Rome readies itself for an influx of youthful visitors, the Pope extends his invitation in faith, calling young Catholics around the globe "to undertake with joy the pilgrimage to Rome" for World Youth Day next year. ▼

ing heaven and hell not as places of merriment forever or eternal fire, but having or not having "a living personal relationship with the Trinity."

We should pay more attention, he suggested, to significant spiritual moments in this life: the pain brought about by sin, the satisfaction we experience in doing good. The happiness and distress of this life are clues to the next.

The suffering caused by sin, he states, is often said to "make life hell," whereas when we enjoy properly "the good things that the Lord showers upon us every day of our earthly lives, we have begun to experience the joy and peace which will be completely ours in the next life." Obviously, the pope hopes we will all profitably reflect on that truth.

These remarks were given by our Holy Father at his Wednesday general audiences on July 21 and 28, and Aug. 4, 1999.

Priest helps comfort families of passengers on doomed flight

By TRACY EARLY
Catholic News Service

NEW YORK (CNS) — Many relatives of Egyptians lost on Egyptair flight 990 Oct. 31 were Muslims and had Muslim counselors, but they also welcomed the presence of a Catholic chaplain.

"When they see the collar, they are very receptive and grateful for the prayers," said Father James T. Devine, chaplain at Kennedy International Airport in New York.

Some of the Egyptian families involved were Christian, and some were Eastern-rite Catholic. "I told them that I would remember them at Mass, and they were very grateful for that," he said.

Father Devine told Catholic News Service in a telephone interview Nov. 1 that he got a call at his residence about 7:15 a.m. the day of the crash, a few hours after the plane took off at 1:19 a.m. from Kennedy with Cairo as its destination.

The plane, a Boeing 767, carried 199 passengers, a crew of 15 and three off-duty crew members. It was reported to have crashed in the Atlantic Ocean south of Nantucket Island at 1:52.

"They said the families would be notified to go to the Ramada hotel, so I went over there and the families were arriving. I began counseling and trying to be of comfort."
— Father James T. Devine, Chaplain at the Kennedy International Airport in New York

"I went over to the airport right away, and went to a press conference the authorities held to give reporters a briefing on the event," Father Devine said.

"They said the families would be notified to go to the Ramada hotel, so I went over there and the families were arriving. I began counseling and trying to be of comfort." He went again the next day, and planned to continue his visits.

Father Devine said one of the first people he talked with was a woman whose father and stepmother were on the plane, going to Egypt for a tour up the Nile. The couple had come from Los Angeles, where the flight originated, and had a two-hour layover that enabled the woman and her husband living in the New York area to have dinner with them.

"She was grateful for that opportunity," he said.

Father Devine said he also spent time with four young Catholic men who were Italians working for Alitalia. They provided the passenger check-in service for the Egyptair flight and served food to passengers during a delay before takeoff, he said.

"They knew some of the crew members, and were upset and distraught," he said. "They requested that we have a Mass, and we will do that this Friday — for all those affected by the crash but remembering especially the crew members and those close to them."

Cardinal John J. O'Connor of New York, who has been recuperating from surgery to remove a brain tumor, had called Father Devine earlier Nov. 1 to offer prayers and support, the chaplain said.

Father Devine, a former president of the ecumenical International Association of Civil Aviation Chaplains, said that many association members in foreign and U.S. airports called to tell him they would be offering prayers for victims of the crash. However, he said the association did not have a member at the Cairo airport.

A call to assist in an emergency situation is not new for Father Devine. Shortly after he was appointed as airport chaplain in 1988, a Pan Am 747 crashed in Lockerbie, Scotland, and Father Devine was called to counsel family members at Kennedy "waiting for the plane that never came."

In 1996, he responded with counseling and said special Masses after the crash of TWA flight 800. It went down off the southern coast of Long Island shortly after it took off from Kennedy. ▼

"We wanted to show that we are a versatile group, and we wanted to have a link with the United States through our music with American songs that the audience could identify with," said Hunt.

"The choir reminded me of the wonderful Latin tradition of the church combined with the nourishment that music is to the spirit," said Mary Ann Sullivan, who works at St. Peter Church, attends St. Gabriel Church, and hosted two of the choir members.

On this tour, it was a family affair with Hunt's brother Simon as the organ soloist on "Coronation Anthem: Zadok the Priest," arranged by G.F. Handel and "Fantasia and Toccata in D Minor," arranged by C.V. Stanford. Also, Simon's fiancée was one of the sopranos in the choir. ▼

Duke senior is leader on campus, in community

By JIMMY ROSTAR
Associate Editor

DURHAM — Charlene McCain knows all about juggling hectic schedules. A pre-med senior majoring in biology and the new president of the Duke University Black Pre-Health Organization, she is doing her best to help other students keep up with their frantic lives, too.

McCain is scheduled to graduate next year with an eye on medical school. A Charlotte resident before college, she spent her formative years with an optimistic outlook for a bright future — and with a keen sense of community awareness and connection.

"I think it's important to stay involved," says McCain. "By using your skills, you're able to somehow help people in whatever situation."

"We try to be an outreach for people so they won't feel alone trying to get through the pre-med classes. That really helps because being pre-med is hard enough, but you definitely need some guidance. That's what I've found in the group."
— Charlene McCain

The Duke University Black Pre-Health Organization provides peer support, networking and information to students planning to graduate to medical school or other areas of healthcare. Current membership comprises about 50 African-American students, and McCain says the group is open to anyone.

The group regularly hosts guest speakers in healthcare fields, does healthcare-related community service, and relays information to students and the community about ethnic healthcare issues like diabetes, hypertension and sickle cell anemia. Thanks to McCain, it also now participates in a mentoring program involving high school students interested in medical careers.

"I'm trying to initiate some new things this year," says McCain, who joined the organization as a sophomore. Her presidency runs throughout her senior year.

"We try to be an outreach for people so they won't feel alone trying to get through the pre-med classes," says McCain. "That really helps because being pre-med is hard enough, but you definitely need some guidance. That's what I've found in the group."

McCain's new post continues that personal commitment to being involved.

At age 17, she was baptized into the Catholic faith and was an active member at her family's parish, Our Lady of Consolation Church in Charlotte. She participated in the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults process, taught Bible classes to youth and, noted for her dedication to her parish and community, was in 1996 awarded the June Chavis Davenport Memorial Scholarship by the parish's gospel choir.

On campus, she has been a member and officer in "United in Praise," a primarily African-American, ecumenical gospel choir that travels to local churches and various regions in the country to share songs of worship.

Civic duty and academic life have been priorities as well. She has volunteered extensively both in high school and college, and has tutored elementary school children.

Long interested in science, McCain had inklings of interest in a health-related career in middle school. By her senior year at West Charlotte High School, she began to actively pursue the idea.

She says with a laugh that she hopes to "just keep it simple" with her future career, perhaps in the field of family practice.

"If God allows me to become a doctor and this is really for me," she says, "I would just like to be a doctor who shows not only professionalism towards her patients, but also at the same time treats people fairly."

COURTESY PHOTO

Charlene McCain is the new president of the Duke University Black Pre-Health Organization. She is a pre-med biology major in her senior year.

A faithful Catholic and the daughter of an African-American father and Japanese mother, McCain says an appreciation for religious and ethnic diversity helps her realize that she wants "to be someone who shows concern for people, regardless of where they come from."

It's a lesson that continues to serve her well — not only in her daily living, but in her involvement with the Black Pre-Health Organization, she says.

"Charlene carries for everybody," says her father, Gregory, of his daughter's concern for not only minority groups, but for all the community.

"We're just thankful to God for the type of person that she is," adds Gregory McCain, who still lives in Charlotte with his wife and Charlene's mother, Keiko. "She's really into wanting to help. I could just go on and on. She's a very giving person." ▼

Belmont woman's life like pages of history

By ALESHA M. PRICE
Staff Writer

BELMONT — In 1962, at a time when segregation was commonplace, a woman committed a quiet act of defiance that startled the people around her.

It was a hot day, and Pauline Leeper was on her way via bus from Belmont to Gastonia to go to the dentist. She decided that she would sit in the front of the bus, which was something that African-Americans were not allowed to do during that time in history.

Amid the shocked mumbles of the other passengers, the bus driver asked her to move three times. An African-American man on the bus sitting in the back in one of the "hot seats," the seats above the motor where African-Americans had to sit, pulled the cord out of fear and jumped off the bus in the middle of nowhere into a ditch. Leeper, inspired by the words of the Reverend Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., remained in that front seat until she arrived in Gastonia.

En route, she told the bus driver with a smile, "This is my seat, and I paid for it."

When she reached her stop, she said stiffly, "save my seat; I'll soon return." When she boarded the bus again, the seat was waiting for her.

She told people in Belmont that "the 'hot seat' days were over." After that, no one rode in the back of the bus in that area. That act was so inspiring that she was a feature on the early morning local news and featured on a page in Oscar DePriest Hand Sr. and Julia Neal Sykes' "Footprints on the Rough Side of the Mountain," a book about local African-Americans and their achievements.

Now 82, Leeper, a member of Queen of the Apostles Church, recalled that incident with a proud look in her eyes. Her life, at first glance, is not unlike many others, but it has been marked with other significant and remarkable events that make her stand out among other African-American women of her day.

"I have really enjoyed this life. I didn't think I would live this long," said Leeper.

She is one of eight children born to a father who worked in a mill in McAdenville and a mother, racked with illness, who worked as a housekeeper when she was well. Her grandmother, of Native American descent, was a modern-day medicine woman who used herbs and other natural remedies to tend to the medical needs of the Springwood, McAdenville and Belmont communities.

Mrs. Pauline Leeper, a member of Queen of the Apostles Church in Belmont, sits and reminisces about her days of poetry, records and civil rights protests, while looking at an article about her refusing to sit in the back of the bus from Belmont to Gastonia and holding a recording of her war protest poetry.

"She had a cart of medicines that she would take with her on her visits," said Leeper. "It was like she had a magic touch because she was able to cure some people that other doctors had said would die."

She and her siblings attended St. Benedict's School for "as long they could." The family went to Belmont Abbey for Mass, also segregated in those days.

"It was a two-way street because it seemed like our race was pulling away from them while they were pushing us away," said Leeper. "I can remember Father Charles Kaster saying that 'there wasn't a separate heaven or hell, and we would all be together in the end.' Some time after that, we sat together from then on."

Leeper, being one of the oldest girls, stopped attending school to take care of her parents, who had both become ill. As a teen-ager, she began serving food in the canteen of the mill as a teen-ager to help support her family.

"Most children back then didn't have the chance to finish school," she explained. "Things were so different back then; things were much harder."

After she married and had eight children of her own, she was determined that her children would finish school. The two oldest attended St. Benedict's School like their mother, and all eight graduated from college with most of them living and working in and around Charlotte and Gastonia.

Leeper would serve as the hostess of parties and gatherings in her house for her children and their friends during the holidays, after school, and at other times during the year.

"I enjoyed my children and their friends, and I wanted them to have a good time when they were at my house. The music almost shook the house, but I didn't mind. The dining room table was always full of food. I always told them you have to enjoy yourself while you can," she said.

She also cared for neighborhood children when she was not working at Holy Angels, Inc., a residential care facility in Belmont for children and adults with mild to severe mental retardation and other physical disabili-

Pope urges closer cooperation between Eastern and Latin rites

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope John Paul II urged closer cooperation and exchange between Eastern- and Latin-rite Catholics in North and South America and Australia. A better relationship would further the search for unity with Orthodox churches and enrich the Latin-rite churches, he said. The pope's remarks came in a message to Cardinal Achille Silvestrini, prefect of the Vatican Congregation for Eastern Churches. The cardinal was in Boston for a Nov. 7-12 meeting with about 100 bishops and priests from the Armenian, Chaldean, Maronite, Melkite, Ruthenian, Syrian and Ukrainian Catholic Churches.

Court allows Cleveland voucher program to add new students

WASHINGTON (CNS) — The U.S. Supreme Court is allowing Cleveland's school voucher program to continue and to include new students while a lower federal court hears a lawsuit aimed at stopping the program. In a Nov. 5 order, the high court agreed with an appeal from Ohio's Attorney General Betty Montgomery that the program be allowed to continue while a U.S. District Court hears a lawsuit filed by civil liberties and taxpayers groups. The suit says the pilot program in Cleveland is unconstitutional because it allows students to use state-funded vouchers to attend religious schools.

Arrested Chinese bishop not expected to be released soon

HONG KONG (CNS) — Bishop Julius Jia Zhiguo of Zhengding is under arrest and not likely to be released soon, sources say. Sources quoted an underground priest in northern China as saying Nov. 4 that public security officials had asked Bishop Jia's relatives to send him winter clothes and a quilt, implying that the bishop may be detained for some time. The priest, who was ordained by Bishop Jia, said the request had been made a few days earlier, reported UCA News, an Asian church news agency based in Thailand.

A man canoes in high water across St. Mark's Square in Venice Nov. 7. Heavy rains hit Italy that weekend causing flooding in northern Italy.

Zhengding Diocese is in Hebei province, in northern China. Bishop Jia will probably not be released soon, because the government does not want him to preside at a planned late-December liturgy celebrating the beginning of the new millennium, the sources told UCA News.

Bishops call South African euthanasia report 'comprehensive'

CAPE TOWN, South Africa (CNS) — The southern African bishops called a government report on euthanasia a "comprehensive and measured attempt to address matters of great emotion and controversy." While some of the commission's recommendations "offend Catholic teaching and a Christian or religious understanding of human life," South Africa is a pluralistic society "and organs of state such as the law commission are not there to uphold a given religion's teachings," said the Cape Town-based liaison office for the Southern African Catholic Bishops' Conference. In a briefing paper, the commission "would have failed in its duty had it not put forward the range of opinion and thinking that exists on this topic," the bishops said.

Israel to open emergency exit in Jerusalem church

JERUSALEM (CNS) — An Israeli government ministerial committee will oversee the opening of an emergency exit in Jerusalem's Church of the Holy Sepulcher, since churches that share the shrine have not implemented their agreement on the new door. The government announced the appointment of the committee Oct. 31 and named as its head Internal Security Minister Shlomo Ben Ami. He told the Ha'aretz newspaper that Israel bore the responsibility for the well-being of worshipers at the church and that in the face of the continuous refusal of the church leaders to open an emergency exit, the government was left with no choice but to intervene.

Fire ravages La Salette provincial house, killing priest

ATTLEBORO, Mass. (CNS) — A three-alarm fire ripped through the provincial headquarters of the La Salette religious community Nov. 5 in Attleboro, killing a visiting priest and destroying the nearly 100-year-old building known by many as "The Castle." The fire was reported at 4:22 a.m. and began on the left side of the third floor which was occupied by nuns and priests in the La Salette Shrine's sabbatical program. The priest, whose name was not released by fire officials, was described as in his 40s and was a member of Formation Consultation Services Inc. of Whitinsville. The La Salette community's complex includes the famous Shrine at La Salette, which is east of the destroyed building and escaped the blaze.

Vatican official decries neglect of penance before Communion

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Fewer Catholics worldwide are going to confession, leading to "distressing and worrying" abuses in the reception of the Eucharist, the Vatican's top official for church law said. Church norms require that those "who have violated any of God's commandments in a grave manner must purify themselves of the sin through the sacrament of penance before approaching eucharistic Communion," said Archbishop Julian Herranz, president of the Pontifical Council for the Interpretation of Legislative Texts.

Britain won't repeal law forbidding Catholic monarch

LONDON (CNS) — The British government has refused to change a law that forbids an English monarch to marry a Catholic or become a Catholic. In response to calls from politicians, Prime Minister Tony Blair announced he has no plans to repeal the 1700 Act of Settlement as part of reforms of the British Constitution. The process has so far seen some political authority transferred to Scotland and Wales and the voting rights stripped from hereditary peers in the House of Lords. Blair's comments came in a late-October letter to Lord James Douglas-Hamilton, a member of the Scottish Parliament who believes the provision against Catholics is a "harsh and intolerant 18th-century anachronism."

Catholic, Lutheran scholars gather for annual N.C. conference

HICKORY — "Who spoke? Otto Hermann Pesch. What did he talk about? The Trinity Doctrine. What did he say? He was in favor of it."

That was how the Rev. Dr. Otto Hermann Pesch humorously summarized his own keynote address, "Thomas Aquinas and Martin Luther on the Triune God: A Comparison in View of Their Understanding of Christian Existence," at the seventh annual Aquinas-Luther Conference Sunday night, Nov. 7. The conference is sponsored each year by the Center for Theology of Lenoir-Rhyne College. This year's topic was "Aquinas and Luther on the Holy Trinity."

Pesch, Roman Catholic professor emeritus of systematic theology at the University of Hamburg, Germany, gave his address immediately following an opening worship service attended by 200 people at St. Andrew's Lutheran Church. The Rev. Dr. J. Larry Yoder, professor of religion and philosophy at Lenoir-Rhyne College and pastor of Grace Lutheran Church in Newton, was installed as the new director of the Center for Theology at the beginning of the service. The Lenoir-Rhyne A Capella Choir and Brass Ensemble provided the music at the event. A reception following the service and the keynote address was held at the home of Lenoir-Rhyne College President Dr. Ryan LaHurd.

In his address, Pesch gave an overview of the writings of Aquinas and Luther as they pertained to the Trinity Doctrine, and talked about the different approaches of the two theologians to that topic. He also talked about the difficulty in finding a simple way to explain the Holy Trinity to the lay person.

The Rev. Dr. Michael C.D. McDaniel, founder and director emeritus of the Center for Theology and retired bishop for the N.C. Synod, called Pesch the "conceptual grandfather of the whole (Aquinas-Luther) series" in his introduction, because of Pesch's book, "The God Question in Thomas Aquinas and Martin Luther," which Bishop McDaniel read many years ago.

Pesch gave the summation speech at the first Aquinas-Luther Conference in the fall of 1993, and was present at the signing of the "Joint Declaration on the Doctrine of Justification" this year on Oct. 31 in Augsburg, Germany, because his

Dear Friends in Christ,

The Bishops' collection dealing with the root causes of poverty — the Catholic Campaign for Human Development — began in 1970, with the Bishops expressing both regret and hope. The regret was their sense that acts of charitable works and direct service to the poor, though helpful, were not changing the conditions causing the low income, the joblessness, the poor health delivery and the lack of affordable housing.

Their hope, expressed in an annual collection, was that the Church could help people in poverty to become the agents of change and decision-makers in the shaping of their own lives. The hope was also based on the belief that Catholics would see their Faith as intimately bound up with the fate and future of the poor among us. This Faith principle leads us in CCHD to work with the poor, not just on behalf of them.

The weekend of November 20-21 offers all of us the opportunity to respond to the hopes of the Bishops. This collection, just a few days before we, at the Thanksgiving table, thank God for our blessings, is intended to give us a chance to "hear the cries of the poor," and to respond. It is a challenge to reach out to the poor with the same sense of urgency that we feel in seeking our own health and security.

Please, then, remember our brothers and sisters with generosity and a sense of both justice and charity.

Sincerely in Christ,

Mauricio W. West

About 200 to raise their voices for Celebration of Years Nov. 21

By JOHN STRANGE
NC Catholic

RALEIGH — About 200 people will raise their voices in song and praise for the special diocesan Mass Nov. 21 in Fayetteville. But first they have to practice.

The fourth annual North Carolina Choral Festival will kick off the weekend Saturday, Nov. 20, in Fayetteville; participants will stick around to sing during the Celebration of Years Mass the next day at 4 p.m. in the Crown Coliseum.

"The liturgy is the focus," said Paul Monachino, minister of music at Sacred Heart Cathedral.

But first is the choral festival, which will be held at St. Patrick Church in Fayetteville. The day begins with registration at 9:30 a..m. and continues with a one-hour rehearsal. The festival will also offer "breakout sessions" for cantors, choirs at prayer, keyboards, and other topics, as well as lunch and more rehearsals. The day ends at 8 p.m. with a handbell concert by the Raleigh Ringers.

The choir will rehearse at the Crown Coliseum from 11 a.m. to 1 p.m., and again 2-3 p.m. before the big event at 4.

Darren Dailey, former music minister at St. Patrick and current director of music ministry for Grace Presbyterian Church in Houston, will be the festival clinician. "I'm hoping that people will experience the various styles of liturgical music available to them," said Dailey, "and take them back to their parishes."

Liturgical music, he said, "needs to represent who we were, who we are, and who we're called to be."

As such, he said, liturgical music in a parish needs to be diverse throughout the liturgical year. The music selected for the Celebration of Years was selected to meet that standard, Dailey said.

For example, the recessional — "Jesus Christ Is Risen Today" — with brass and percussion can be considered contemporary; the processional hymn — "The Church's One Foundation" — is traditional. The brass prelude of "Fanfare for the Common Man" by Aaron Copland is classical, while "Taste and See," a Communion song by African-American composer James Moore, has an African-American, contemporary flavor.

Dailey said that when he was music minister at St. Patrick Church, with some 4,000 parishioners, he knew he had done "a great job" when "someone is really touched by a piece of music we selected." Diversity, he said, almost guarantees that some of the music will appeal to most of the congregation.

Registration for the festival is $10, which includes lunch Saturday and Sunday. Participants can order music packets from Burrage Music Company in Raleigh at (919) 872-0211 or (919) 872-9454.

Monachino said choir members will not need tickets to be admitted to the Celebration of Years. In addition, a section of seats for choir family members will be reserved near the choir. Again, he said, no tickets are needed.

The Diocese of Raleigh is celebrating its 75th anniversary at the Crown Coliseum during the Mass, as well as the 100th anniversary of the founding of Catholic Social Ministries in North Carolina and the 25th anniversary of the appointment of Bishop Joseph Gossman as the fourth bishop of Raleigh.

Featured in the Mass will be Baltimore's Cardinal William Keeler, who will deliver the homily, and Archbishop Gabriel Montalvo, apostolic nuncio to the United States and the Holy Father's representative. The two Catholic leaders are expected to be joined by as many as 15 U.S. Catholic bishops and state dignitaries. The bishops will include Archbishop John F. Donoghue of Atlanta, Bishop William Curlin of Charlotte, Bishop Kevin Boland of Savannah, and bishops David B. Thompson and Robert J. Baker of Charleston, S.C.

Each parish will receive a minimum of eight invitations, depending on the parish's size, for parish leaders, such as the pastoral council chair and the chair of the parish's anniversary committee. Each parish will also send two altar servers for the event.

Next, as many as 304 tickets, again depending on the size of the community, will be sent to each parish to be distributed as the parish decides. These tickets are for reserved seating in the coliseum.

Further, as many as 8,000 of general admission seats will be left open. About 4,000 of those seats will be available through the parishes; the rest will be available at the door.

Parking will be free and is expected to be plentiful. ▼

Catholic War Veterans post honored at national convention

ARDEN — The Rev. Ralph Neagle Catholic War Veterans Post 1914 of Arden was honored in two program categories recently at the Catholic War Veterans of the U.S.A. national convention in San Antonio, Texas. Post 1914's newsletter, "The Updater," was selected as the best post newsletter in the country for its layout, format and content. The second recognition was for post members contributing the most Catholic War Veterans volunteer hours nationally in the Department of Veteran Affairs Volunteer Services (VAVS) program. From Oct. 1, 1998, through July 31, 1999, Post 1914 members contributed 2,682 volunteer hours to the VA medical system. In addition, Post 1914 Commander Herbert Reith was awarded the Catholic War Veterans National Distinguished Service Award for his service as the national VAVS deputy representative.

As Elder Ministry expands, leaders localize efforts

By JIMMY ROSTAR
Associate Editor

CHARLOTTE — As the diocesan Elder Ministry expands its efforts to reach a growing senior population in western North Carolina, ministry leaders are encouraging more localized participation by individuals and parishes in all of the diocese's vicariates.

Sandra Breakfield, program director of the ministry, said that as the Diocese of Charlotte moves into the 21st century, parishes must continue to address the needs of their senior parishioners — a group that will steadily grow over time.

"We want to make sure that we reach out to everyone," she said. "As the vicariates come together, they will be able to address and bring to the forefront the most pressing needs that they want to see met. We want to bring a sense of community and connectedness."

Breakfield commended efforts already in place in parishes throughout the diocese. Her office is a resource center for parish-based ministry to elders, and she serves as the primary liaison between diocesan and parish programs. She also coordinates several diocesan gatherings each year, like the Fall Day of Reflection and the Spring Fling.

"We're looking to get people together to give them a view of what elder ministry can be, give them some education on what the needs are and give some options that they might be interested in at the parish."
— Meg Smith

She shares existing models of ministry, helps develop new ones, promotes volunteerism and seeks ways to keep seniors involved in the vibrant life of the church. Moreover, the ministry reaches out to seniors themselves, calling on them "to share their wealth of knowledge, information and resources," Breakfield said.

And as the Elder Ministry strives to help meet the needs of these ever-growing numbers of people, thousands of whom are Catholic, Breakfield said the obligation to focus educational efforts on the parish and vicariate levels has become necessarily more prevalent.

"It is amazing when you look at what the projected change is going to be," she said. "The numbers are really quite awesome — which says to us that we've got to get (more) programs and plans in order now so that we're prepared as those numbers increase."

Enter Meg Smith, the new regional coordinator for Elder Ministry in the Hickory/Morganton area, whose area of responsibility covers the 16 counties in the Hickory, Boone and Salisbury vicariates.

Like Breakfield, Smith is a presence of Elder Ministry to parishes, and offers training and technical assistance specific to senior needs relating to faith, housing, care giving, transportation and planning for the future.

The ministry hopes to have four regional coordinators in place within the next couple of years.

Meg Smith

"We really think that everybody has something to give, and everybody has something to gain in dealing with the elderly," said Smith, who has worked for 15 years in North Carolina as a registered nurse. "We really want the parishes to be looking at what they can do, and what the vicariates can do."

Smith is already playing a key role in the ministry's work, having organized a training seminar for pastoral care to the elderly and sick in Hickory recently and assisting Breakfield plan a senior health safety fair Nov. 18 at St. Michael Church in Gastonia. The meetings are the products of entire vicariates' coming together in concern for its elders.

"We're looking to get people together to give them a view of what elder ministry can be, give them some education on what the needs are and give some options that they might be interested in at the parish," Smith said.

One goal is to establish a network of representatives in each vicariate who will foster working, educational relationships between the diocesan ministry and parishes.

"Education is the key — providing people with the education and the information about what the resources of the community are and helping them link up with what is available," Breakfield said.

Smith, who hails from upstate New York and is currently a participant in the diocesan Loyola Institute for Ministry Extension program, said her time with seniors has been truly rewarding.

"I have worked with a lot of elderly patients in home care and in the hospital," she said of her nursing days. "I have, every single time, learned more and taken away more than every visit that I've ever given because of the wisdom and the light that these people have."

Smith said meeting the needs of seniors — Catholic seniors in particular — means the diocese and parishes working together to offer an array of services and keeping elders active in church and social circles. "It's having your spiritual needs met, having your social needs met, having somebody there to care and be involved." ▼

U.S. embargo against Cuba has benefited Castro, priest says

NEW YORK (CNS) — The U.S. embargo against Cuba has greatly benefited Cuban leader Fidel Castro, a Havana priest said in an interview in New York. Cuban officials attribute problems to the effects of the embargo, and ordinary Cubans tend to accept what they say, according to Msgr. Carlos Manuel de Cespedes Garcia-Menocal, one of three vicars general of the Havana Archdiocese. The Cuban bishops would like to see the embargo lifted because that would lead to more rational discussion and because it is economically damaging, he told Catholic News Service.

U2 star Bono joins bishops in debt relief plea

WASHINGTON (CNS) — U2 lead singer Bono joined religious and political leaders in Washington Nov. 4 to urge Congress to relieve the debt of the world's poorest countries. Congress was due soon to vote on a key appropriations bill in which the Clinton administration has asked for a $370 million allocation to fund its declared debt relief commitment for the year 2000. Citizens should "call your congressman. Sit in his garden," Bono said. "It's immoral, it's obscene that at a time of unimaginable wealth here in the First World, we can't seem to get to grips with the unimaginable impoverishment of a billion people living on less than a dollar a day," he said on the steps of St. Peter's Catholic Church on Capitol Hill.

Symposium looks at ethics in managed health care

WASHINGTON (CNS) — If one lesson emerged from a Nov. 2 symposium on ethics in managed health care, it was that the debate is not only over different answers — those involved are still struggling over the questions. Two of the participants highlighted the polarities and different perspectives involved: Dr. Edmund D. Pellegrino, a prominent Georgetown University physician and professor of medical ethics, argued that managed health care as currently organized and operated "is not ethically defensible" from the doctor-patient perspective. Dr. Richard H. Bernstein, senior medical director of Aetna U.S. Healthcare, argued that "we must justly ration health care" and defended the role of managed health care in balancing conflicting interests and bringing cost management into systems that had been spiraling out of control in the 1980s.

Msgr. Koch, of Raleigh, dies at 83

SOUTHERN PINES — Msgr. Frederick A. Koch, 83, died at St. Joseph of the Pines Health Care Center Sunday, Nov. 7. He had been a priest of the Diocese of Raleigh for almost 56 years.

Msgr. Koch was born in Scranton, Pa., July 16, 1916, the son of Theodore and Wilhelma Guenthoer Koch. Early in his childhood the family moved to Staten Island, N.Y., where he attended St. Peter's elementary and high schools.

He received a degree at St. Mary College in St. Mary, Ky., in June 1939, and then entered the Sulpician Seminary (Theological College) of the Catholic University of America in Washington, D.C.

He was ordained a priest on May 23, 1943, in the Trinity College Chapel of Washington by Bishop J.M. McNamara, auxiliary bishop of Baltimore, for the Diocese of Raleigh.

Upon ordination, he served as associate pastor of St. Patrick Parish, Charlotte, and St. Paul Parish, New Bern. While at St. Paul's he was also chaplain at St. Luke Hospital.

In 1947 he was named the second editor of the North Carolina Catholic newspaper, a position he held until 1954, and again from 1967 to 1976. The paper was only a year old when Msgr. Koch first took the position.

In 1948 Msgr. Koch was named administrator of St. Eugene Parish in Wendell, and in 1952 he became pastor of St. Catherine Parish in Wake Forest. He held both positions while serving as editor of the diocesan paper.

In May 1954 Msgr. Koch went to Rome for advanced study in theology at the Lateran University and received the Licientiate in Sacred Theology in June 1955. He returned from Rome, and was appointed pastor of Newton Grove and director of the Diocesan Missionary Apostolate. There he was in charge of training the newly ordained priests during their first year of priesthood. He oversaw ministry in Wayne, Johnston, Duplin and Sampson counties.

In 1962, Msgr. Koch moved to the western part of the state at Our Lady of Mercy Parish in Winston-Salem, followed by Immaculate Heart of Mary Parish in High Point. He then returned to the east in 1967, serving as pastor of St. Michael in Cary and as the editor of the North Carolina Catholic. He also served as pastor of St. Patrick in Fayetteville from 1976 to 1981, and at Sacred Heart Parish in Pinehurst from 1981 to 1990.

Then, not wanting to retire, Msgr. Koch served as associate pastor at Sacred Heart Cathedral in Raleigh for the next three years. He retired in 1993.

In addition to serving as diocesan newspaper editor, Msgr. Koch held several diocesan positions. He was diocesan consultor for 20 years, a member of the Priests' Personnel Committee for eight years, serving as chair for four years. He was diocesan director of communications for 18 years.

In 1974, he was named a monsignor by Pope Paul VI.

He is survived by his sister, Marie Koch, of Southern Pines. ▼

Protests fizzle, good will prevails during pope's India visit

By JOHN THAVIS
Catholic News Service

NEW DELHI, India (CNS) — Despite much talk of fundamentalist Hindu protests and the potential for extremist violence, Pope John Paul II's visit to India went off without a hitch — much to the delight of church planners and government hosts.

Those expecting an interreligious battle in New Delhi were disappointed. In the end, protests fizzled and good will prevailed during the Nov. 5-8 visit.

That's not headline news, perhaps. But many Indians appeared tired of what they saw as "media hype" over the Hindu extremist agenda, with its demand for a freeze on Christian conversions and a papal apology for historical church misdeeds.

"This is a free country, a democracy, and there are small groups of protesters. I don't think it goes beyond that," Margaret Alva, one of 22 Christians in India's Parliament, said as she waited for the pope's arrival at the presidential palace Nov. 6.

Even Indian Prime Minister Atal Behari Vajpayee, whose Hindu nationalist coalition has links to some of the most strident Hindu organizations, told the pope that it was the "intolerant fringes" of Indian society who were causing problems.

The government allowed demonstrations but banned them near papal event sites, saying the pope should be welcomed as a guest and a holy man. That was a prevailing sentiment among Indians, according to Divine Word Father Dominic Emmannuel, spokesman for the Indian bishops' conference.

"The people making protests have managed to get a lot of attention because of the way they have handled the media," he said.

The much-ballyhooed cross-country caravan of Hindus protesting the church's history of missionary work in India rolled through the streets of New Delhi Nov. 4 "without many people noticing it," according to The Times of India. The caravan involved only 20 people, and about 300 others attended a closing rally.

Hindu holy man Shankaracharya Madhavananda Saraswati greets Pope John Paul II at an interreligious meeting in New Delhi Nov. 7.

A handful of demonstrators were arrested when they shouted slogans outside a memorial to Mahatma Gandhi, where the pope was making a visit. Reporters, meanwhile, ran up big taxi bills hunting for protest banners.

Contrary to press reports, security was less stringent than during most papal trips.

Although long-forgotten, the Hindu protests during the pope's visit in 1986 were actually bigger. During that visit, death threats were made against the pope, thousands of Hindus marched through the capital and police arrested at least 300 demonstrators, including those who burned an effigy of the pope.

This year, the protests have received more attention for several reasons, according to church sources. For one thing, the Hindu objections have been preceded by more than 100 sporadic acts of violence against Christian missionaries in a few Indian states. For another, the ruling political coalition has encouraged a national debate about Christian conversion.

Some of the Hindu requests made during the pope's visit bordered on the silly. For example, the National Volunteer Corps asked the pope to refrain from saying or doing anything "religious" during his visit to India.

However, deep differences were respectfully aired. Many Hindus, who regard their religion as "non-aggressive," have a hard time accepting the Christian idea of conversion. So when the pope defended the church's "call to conversion" in a speech to bishops, Indian television predicted a new flare-up in the simmering controversy.

"The Indian people might misunderstand this call, because they have not understood quite clearly what is the meaning of conversion in the Christian sense," said Father Emmannuel.

"They have understood conversion only as a change of religion. But for the church, conversion means first of all a change of heart," he said.

But if local Catholics were speaking gently about conversion, the pope was more blunt. At an interreligious encounter Nov. 7, he told Hindu, Muslim, Buddhist, Sikh, Jain, Jewish and other religious representatives that churches must have the freedom to make a "respectful appeal" to people's consciences, and individuals must have the "right even to change their religion, if their conscience so demands."

The interfaith event was a great success that displayed India's overwhelming sense of religious tolerance. The pope and Christianity were praised, commitments to dialogue were renewed and songs of prayer were sung for the pope's health.

But afterward, some of the participants voiced mixed feelings about Christianity's emphasis on evangelization.

"Everyone is free to be converted if he likes, but no one should press anybody," said Bhai Manjit Singh, the Sikh representative.

Samdhong Rinpoche, a Buddhist monk, said persuasion and motivation were unacceptable forms of conversion for Buddhism. The Hindu representative, Shankaracharya Madhavananda Saraswati, while stressing the "love" that prevails between Hindus and Christians, said he thought that one's original religion "remains inside the person forever," even after outward conversion.

The Jain speaker, Acharya Mahaprajna, said it was too bad that religions seemed more busy "increasing the number of their followers" than responding to the common challenges.

Ironically, the only reported security incident at a papal event came at the interreligious meeting. The blue-turbaned Sikh representative took his place near the pope 30 minutes late because police did not want him to enter with his full-length silver sword. He eventually convinced them that it was a symbol of his religious authority, not a security risk.

"I carry it with me all the time," he said. ▼

CCHD-funded program develops ideal recipe for change

CHARLOTTE — The Community Culinary School of Charlotte has developed the ideal recipe both for feeding hungry people and uniting food suppliers, food preparation employees and culinary trainees. The result of the school's work is that people receiving assistance from agencies in town serving the poor, the homeless and persons in recovery are getting a chance to fill a portion of the 6,000 job vacancies in the food service/hospitality industry in Charlotte.

Formerly known as the Charlotte Community Kitchen, the culinary school is a locally funded project of the Catholic Campaign for Human Development, the U.S. bishops' anti-poverty campaign. The stories of its participants and graduates are ones of triumph and hope:

CATHOLIC CAMPAIGN FOR HUMAN DEVELOPMENT
Working to End Poverty and Injustice in the United States

There is Bob McRae, who says his self-esteem was restored through work with the program. He became eligible for chef training at the school, graduated 14 weeks later and moved on to become a teacher's aide for the next class. He is also being honored with the Personal Achievement of the Year Award from the Homeless Shelter Network.

There is Sibyl Durant, a cold cook now in charge of salads, breads and desserts prepared for Friendship Trays, which distributes food to the needy. She emerged from a troubled past into a supportive and structured work environment at the school, which provided direction, encouragement and incentive.

And there is Dwayne Brown, whose dreams of becoming a professional football player were shattered when he was shot in a drive-by shooting. Through rehabilitation and bouts with depression, he enrolled in the first class of the school, helping the head cook and another chef with kitchen tasks. A graduate of that first class, he is now employed at McDonald's Cafeteria in Charlotte.

The Community Culinary School is an example of how CCHD helps people help themselves by working through the root causes of poverty and injustice. Linda Vogler started the school last year, integrating three community services — all of which are funded in part by CCHD: Community Food Rescue, Friendship Trays and the school itself. Four cycles of classes have been completed thus far, and the school seeks to ensure that graduates earn a living wage in their entry-level jobs. ▼ writings contributed to the development of it.

The conference was held from Nov. 7 to 9, and featured several prominent Catholic and Lutheran theologians from Europe and the United States. Dr. William T. Cavanaugh, assistant professor of theology at the University of St. Thomas in St. Paul, Minn., and associate editor of the journal "Pro Ecclesia," gave a speech Monday morning entitled "Participation in the Trinity in Aquinas and Luther." Monday afternoon, the Rev. Dr. Robert W. Jensen, the senior scholar for research at the Center of Theological Inquiry in Princeton, N.J., and president of the American Theological Society, gave a lecture entitled "Luther and the Trinity."

The Rev. Phillip M. Johnson, pastor at St. Paul Lutheran Church, Jersey City, N.J., associate editor of the "Lutheran Forum," and Senior of the Society of the Holy Trinity, gave the Monday evening banquet address entitled "'The Mystery of Godliness' and the Baptized Intellect."

Tuesday morning, the Rev. Dr. Brian E. Daley, S.J., professor of theology at the University of Notre Dame and editor of the journal "Traditio," gave a lecture entitled "The 'Errors of the Greeks': Thomas Aquinas, the 'Filioque' and Ecumenical Dialogue." Tuesday afternoon, the Rev. Dr. William H. Lazareth, bishop emeritus for the Metropolitan New York Synod and a member of the executive staff of the Center of Theological Inquiry in Princeton, N.J., gave a lecture entitled "Trinitarian Ecumenical Criteriology."

Each lecture was followed by a panel discussion, and then a summary panel discussion was held late Tuesday afternoon, near the end of the conference.

Bishop McDaniel commented on the importance of the work of many Catholic and Lutheran volunteers who help to put the conference together each year. Members of many churches in the community open their homes to provide places for conference guests to stay. Bishop McDaniel said that 158 people pre-registered for the conference this year, but that additional people registered during the three-day event.

The Hickory Lutheran-Roman Catholic Covenant Committee, consisting of representatives of Holy Trinity Lutheran Church, Mt. Olive Lutheran Church, St. Aloysius Catholic Church and St. Andrew's Lutheran Church, acted as co-sponsor for the event. Pastors of those congregations and the pastor to Lenoir-Rhyne College take turns presiding at the opening worship service each year. The ministers presiding over the opening service this year were Father Edward J. Sheridan of St. Aloysius Church, the Rev. Robert H. Shoffner of Holy Trinity Church, and the Rev. Andrew F. Weisner of Lenoir-Rhyne College. The organist at the service was Florence M. Jowers, assistant professor of church music at Lenoir-Rhyne College. ▼ ties. She helped with caring for the children, cleaning, and keeping up the spirits of the families and their children.

During that time, Leeper decided to go back to school. As a child, she would write poetry and other stories during her spare time, so she began attending night class in writing at the former Sacred Heart College. Some of her poems include "Say No to Drugs," "A Tribute to Dr. Martin Luther King," "Merely Trying to Help," which was made into a song, "Live Always," and "The World Needs More Love."

One particular poem about the Vietnam War set things into motion for a recording and a writing credit after she had received a certificate to write poems for recordings.

The teacher sent her poem "End the War," a mother's protest about her son being drafted, to the Hollywood Songwriters' Service. They sent it to a record company which made the poem into a song with a blues groove performed by a group called The GoodTimers.

"I was so scared that my son would be killed; I wanted the war to end, so I decided to write the poem," explained Leeper. "I helped to sell the records in and around Belmont, and they were sold in other places. I wanted my son to come home." Fortunately, her son did come home safely from Vietnam.

Her writing also earned her a trip to Hawaii, which she turned down because she "just didn't want to leave her children for any amount of time."

Some may wonder how Leeper has lived such a long and full life. Her words of wisdom are simple: "God has been good to me and has given me a long life. The better you live and the better you treat people, your life will be long and pleasant." ▼

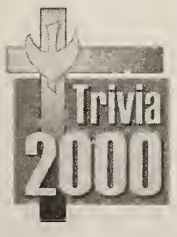
Trivia 2000: Feet first-aid proposed for Rome pilgrims

By JOHN THAVIS
Catholic News Service

ROME (CNS) — Rome cobblestones are notoriously tough on pedestrians, but pilgrims in the year 2000 may benefit from a novel service: first aid for feet.



An institute of Italian podiatrists has proposed a mobile station to minister to the expected millions of holy year visitors who will be forced to walk to major events because of new restrictions on tour bus access to downtown Rome.

"A typical tourist day in Rome, with overexertion, heat and perhaps inappropriate shoes, can cause blisters, calluses, tendinitis and metatarsal bone stress," warned Mauro Montesi, head of the association.

The first-aid station, positioned at St. Peter's Square and other gathering sites, would provide immediate treatment for emergency cases — along with advice on how to avoid sore feet in the future. ▼

MIT professor makes good case for changing the American labor market

REVIEWED BY ANNE BINGHAM
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

From 1979 to 1993, I had a front-row seat on the dismantling of the employment contract between business and American workers.

While this re-ordering might have been due to impersonal, global market forces, opinion at the union where I worked attributed it to good old-fashioned greed.

"Securing Propserity"
By Paul Osterman
Princeton University Press
(Princeton, N.J., 1999) 222 pp., $24.95.

Perhaps this was because we watched factory after factory close, costing our members tens of thousands of jobs.

Sometimes the factories were old or their industries dying, but just as often shutdowns happened in plants that were making healthy contributions to the corporate bottom line. In those days, a profit that was merely healthy couldn't compete with the truly obscene return available below the Rio Grande and across the Pacific.

So it's with a fair amount of interest that I picked up Paul Osterman's "Securing Prosperity," subtitled "The American Labor Market: How It Has Changed and What to Do about It."

A brief introduction sketches the relative employment stability and shared vision of labor-management rights and responsibilities that lasted from 1945 until the early 1980s. Then came the shift — to an economy built on contingent workers; corporate down-sizing with accompanying massive, permanent layoffs; and a labor-management mix wherein management has the rights but labor bears all the responsibility and most of the risk.

Osterman, professor of human resources and management at MIT's Sloan School, makes a good case that the resulting "prosperity" rests on a foundation of sand. It can last only as long as stock prices rise, stagnant wages keep inflation at bay, and politicians pretend to balance the federal budget by ignoring inconvenient debts and the Social Security offset.

To achieve a more solid foundation, he calls for a better safety net that includes improved unemployment insurance and more portable pension and health benefits. He recommends that regional employment networks be scrutinized to assess their effectiveness, with the goal of upgrading skills at the tech school level and improving skill portability. These measures would prevent the community and regional devastation caused by major corporate restructurings.

It is also time, Osterman declares, for public debate about the legitimate objectives of business. The current view — that the modern corporation should be an entity devoted solely to the accumulation of wealth for its owners (stockholders), regardless of its effect on those whose work creates the wealth — needs moderation to recapture the human element. ▼

Bingham formerly was managing editor for a labor union that merged with the United Paperworkers International Union in 1993.

'Crossing the Threshold of Hope' Spanish best-seller of decade

LIMA, Peru (CNS) — The Association of Spanish Publishers announced that Pope John Paul II's 1994 book, "Crossing the Threshold of Hope," was Latin America's best-selling Spanish-language religious book of the decade.

The "Catechism of the Catholic Church" was the second-best seller.

The association also announced the Spanish version of the pope's book, with more than 1 million copies sold in Latin America, was among the highest-selling books in all categories.

The surprise of the decade was "The Return of the Prodigal Son," a book of spirituality written by the late Dutch-born Father Henri Nouwen, which was the best seller among Spanish religious books from January to August. The book is a meditation on the image of God the Father that coincides with jubilee year preparations during 1999, the year Pope John Paul has dedicated to God the Father.

The pope also took ninth and 13th place among the top 15 religious best sellers. The books were "Orar" ("To Pray"), an anthology of his meditations on prayer published by Planeta-Testimonio, and "Fides et Ratio," ("Faith and Reason") his 1998 encyclical. ▼

In the ravine, squatting down and pointing up at the bridge his Honduran co-workers had built, was Franciscan Father Ronaldo Roll, originally of Brooklyn. Kyle Walterscheid, a seminarian for the Diocese of Fort Worth and a former engineer for the Texas Department of Transportation, squatted beside him, evaluating the sturdiness of this bridge, one of two which replaced ones washed out by last year's monster hurricane, Mitch. This simple but vitally important concrete bridge makes it possible for the mountain people living along this road to travel by vehicle to Tegucigalpa or Juticalpa.

A group of us, including Bishop Joseph Delaney, eight priests, our director of finance, another seminarian studying for our diocese and myself, were on a familiarization tour of a highlands region of the Diocese of Juticalpa, here at the beginning of the twinning of our two dioceses in late October.

In addition to the bridge project, Father Ron showed us a water project he had helped organize that brought clean, drinkable water flowing through PVC pipe to simple adobe homes in a remote valley.

The village church at Guayape where Bishop Delaney had celebrated Mass the night before had a new brown-and-yellow ceramic tile floor, not a month old, the first one to cover the dirt floor where people had worshiped for over a century. Again, a project empowered by Father Ron, working with the local lay leadership. The list goes on and on.

Father Ron is like the servant whose master gave him 5,000 silver pieces in today's Gospel. The servant on his master's return says to him: "My Lord, you let me have 5,000. See, I have made 5,000 more." His master says in reply: "Well done! You are an industrious and reliable servant. Since you were dependable in a small matter I will put you in charge of larger affairs. Come, share your master's joy!"

In Matthew 24 and 25 Jesus tells us there's a serious judgment coming; that we'd better get ready; that he has given us abilities and riches to use and increase for the purposes of his kingdom. Then tossing aside the parable format, he tells us plainly that how we have treated him in the guise of the poor — the hungry, the thirsty, the naked and those in prison — determines whether we fall into the group with the sheep or the one with the goats.

I have to think Jesus is speaking directly to you and me. I know few of us can be as dedicated to such service as Father Ron, but we are all expected to do something substantive. Personally, I want to end up in the group with the padre from Brooklyn.

Question:
Has God called you to some work of compassion or justice toward the poor?

"You are not in the dark, brothers, that the day should catch you off guard, like a thief. No, all of you are children of light and of the day."

— 1 Thessalonians 5:4-5a

Nun - lawyer says CBS' show 'Family Law' sticks close to reality

By MARK PATTISON
Catholic News Service

WASHINGTON (CNS) — A nun who was a practicing lawyer for years says the new CBS-TV drama "Family Law" sticks close to reality.

Sister Simone Campbell had a family law practice in Oakland, Calif., for 18 years prior to accepting the call to head her congregation, the Sisters of Social Service.

"I find it to be much more interesting than I expected it to be," she said about the series, but added its late hour rules out repeated viewing for her. "It's on past my bedtime."

"Family Law"
10-11 p.m. EST Mondays on CBS

"Family Law," which airs 10-11 p.m. EST Mondays on CBS, focuses on the family law practice of a ragtag group of Los Angeles attorneys headed by Lynn Holt (Kathleen Quinlan), who had to start the firm virtually from scratch after her ex-husband spirited away their joint law firm's assets and clients.

Other notables in the cast include Dixie Carter as Randi King, who learned enough about law in prison that she was able to get overturned her conviction of murdering her husband, and Catholic actor Christopher McDonald as Rex Weller, a smarmy lawyer known for advertising on TV who brings a built-in client base to the firm.

TV is best at showing emotion, said Sister Campbell in a telephone interview with Catholic News Service from her order's Los Angeles headquarters, and "the emotional issues are very true" on "Family Law."

As a lawyer, "I worked not to get affected" by her clients' situations, she noted.

"In real life, you put your emotions on the back burner. The show obviously plays more with that than would happen in real life," Sister Campbell said.

But on TV "it's important to show the emotional struggles, since half of the marriages end in divorce," she added.

Sister Campbell helped establish the Community Law Center in Oakland, which has since merged with that city's Legal Aid clinic for indigent clients.

Her case load dealt with divorce, custody and support issues. Broadly speaking, she said, her role was to "make the family work better" even if it was "not in the same configuration" as before.

Sister Campbell said sometimes her job was to represent the children affected "when the parents were warring with each other."

Other times, she added, she had to deal with conflicts arising out of changed attitudes among members of immigrant families, like when the wife in a household "wanted to be a woman in the U.S. culture and the man wanted the woman to be the way she was when they were married back in the homeland."

About the only false note she detected in viewing three "Family Law" episodes was Holt's firm accepting a malpractice case a week before it was scheduled to go to trial. Such a thing would not happen, she said, and even if it did the case would likely have been handled by a law firm specializing in malpractice.

But cases handled by Sister Campbell in her own legal career were not always cut and dried.

She recalled representing "a guy who had 22 kids by 18 women."

"The real problem was that he had lost his job" and had to adjust his child support payment obligations, she said. And then there was the couple who "fought over an aquarium tank," she added.

The pilot of "Family Law" didn't appeal to Gerri Pare, who is on the staff of the U.S. Catholic Conference Office for Film and Broadcasting. She called it "a jumble of characters and cases whose outcomes were predictable — making it uncertain if there will be dramatic conflict worth watching" beyond the first episode.

But "Family Law," through the first five weeks of the TV season, ranked 18th of 127 shows put on the air by the six commercial broadcast networks. That was the third-best performance among all new shows this season, and CBS has rewarded it by giving an order for a full 22-episode season.

The show seems to have a winning formula, but Sister Campbell offered some advice for its writers: "Focus more on the two sides of the story. It's not crystal clear, one side or the other. Keep it so that each person has a piece of the truth, and that the psychological dynamic is understood."

She added, "Everyone's right in family law, but no one has the whole picture." ▼

"Train of Life" (Paramount Classics)

Bittersweet Holocaust fairy tale in which the village idiot persuades his Jewish neighbors to buy a train, dress some of them as Nazis and pretend they are being sent to the camps while they are actually attempting to get to freedom and Palestine. Writer-director Radu Mihaileanu creates an occasionally poignant fable of hope flawed by contrived humor. Subtitles. Fleeting violence, implied sexual encounters, brief shower-room nudity and an instance of rough language. The U.S. Catholic Conference classification is A-III — adults. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is R — restricted.

The Pope Speaks

POPE JOHN PAUL II

Pope, in jubilee message, asks Romans to open homes to pilgrims

By CINDY WOODEN
Catholic News Service

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope John Paul II asked the citizens of Rome to open their hearts and their homes to Jesus and to the thousands of pilgrims who will visit the city in the year 2000.

"Christian Rome, do not hesitate to open the doors of your homes to pilgrims," the pope said in a Nov. 3 message to the city.

"Exercise fraternal hospitality with joy, particularly during the most meaningful and largest events such as World Youth Day," planned for Aug. 15-20, he wrote.

The press officer for World Youth Day at the Italian bishops' conference in Rome said Nov. 3 that organizers have just begun their appeal to families to host young people during the event.

While most World Youth Day participants will be housed in hotels, religious institutions or schools, the willingness of families to participate is important as a sign of welcome and involvement, the spokesman said.

Pope John Paul said those who offer hospitality and assistance to Holy Year pilgrims — especially to those who are poor, elderly, ill or have handicaps — will experience "the joy of those who welcomed Jesus in Galilee, Samaria and Judea."

The eyes of the world will be on Rome and how it celebrates the 2,000th anniversary of Jesus' birth, the pope said.

An "intensity of faith and Gospel love," especially in hospitality, will help the world see the transforming and life-giving power of Christianity, he said.

"For believers," the pope said, "the jubilee is a fitting time to leave aside their habitual way of living the faith and rediscover true friendship with the Lord.

"It is an opportune time to give conversion the meaning of a complete break with sin, experiencing the joy of pardon accepted and given," he said.

The jubilee, the pope wrote, "is a most favorable time to rediscover communion and brotherhood in parishes, movements and communities" by promoting inclusion and reconciliation.

Pope John Paul said Romans must be spiritually as well as practically prepared to host millions of visitors.

"It is important that upon their arrival our brothers and sisters find not only a city ready to receive them and able to show them places rich in the memory of history and of faith, but especially a community which incarnates the Gospel and shows concrete signs of the supreme precept of love," he said.

After you mail your college application

It's done — you think. Should you check it again? Go ahead, look through the envelope if you need to make sure: The check is there, the essays too, the letters of recommendation and — at last, presenting the most important piece of paper in the universe at this moment — your college application.

A seemingly innocuous set of questions and answers that only symbolizes the rest of your life! Are you ready to let it go and allow life to take its course?

I have a son who is 17 and a senior, so this is a rather personal topic at the moment and a matter of some anxiety.

For you see, my son, gifted as he is in many ways, has not exactly glimmered with motivation and academic enthusiasm the past three and one-half years. It's been a struggle, not because he can't make good grades, but because he can.

Like any good-natured, highly distractible young man, when he's confronted with that difficult, daily choice of study or "doing something else," he tends to pick the something else.

So here he is now, with grades that are not terrible, but do not guarantee admission into the college of one's choice, either.

Excuse us if things are a bit tense around here the next few weeks. You see, there's only one college my son is interested in. I won't name it, but it's the school both his father and I attended and at which his grandfather (my dad) was a professor for many years.

Somehow, around age 2, my son's blood turned into the colors of this university, and he's lived for the place and, in particular, its not-unsuccessful football team.

It's a large state university, so we don't have the angst of private-school admission and tuition, but there are problems. We don't live in that state anymore, so he'll be trying to get in as an out-of-state student. We just don't know.

He'll apply to a couple of other schools, though he doesn't want to. I guess he sees it as bad luck in a way.

He's putting all his eggs in one basket, and it's worrisome. He's meeting with his guidance counselor today to fill out the rest of the application. A couple of days from now, he'll have it all together, along with his best standardized test scores.

He'll stand at the mailbox and, in a moment of faith, let go.From that point, it's out of his hands.

All of you applying to college are facing that exact same moment. You never know what's going to happen. You may be a good student, but you're not the only one. There are always students out there, seeking the same spot you are.

So what are you going to do while you wait, and what are you going to do when you get your news in a few weeks or months?

You could, of course, pray. Not so much for the results you want, but for a spirit of openness and acceptance of whatever happens.

Faith is a trusting relationship with God. At its root, it involves believing that God is God and in control. After that, it means trusting that God wants the best for you, and accepting it with a gracious and grateful spirit.

I know it's really hard to understand, especially if the news is "bad," but faith means being grateful either way.

After all, you may have hoped to go someplace good, but could it be possible that God's care and love for you is going to send you someplace better?

Games grandfathers play

I already know what my grandson Bull's favorite Christmas present is going to be — a box of rocks. These will be river rocks worn smooth and just about the size and heft of a golf ball. In other words, perfect for throwing.

Actually, it's not going to be a box. I'm going to recycle a couple of two-gallon plastic buckets that held wall texturing mud and paint "Bull's Throwing Rocks" on the side of them.

We are lucky on the West Coast because there are any number of rivers where we can find these rocks. In other parts of the country, grandfathers are reduced to collecting dirt clods for the grandsons and the occasional granddaughter who also enjoys seeing a good dirt clod explode on impact against a deserted building.

Don't get me wrong. I respect a good dirt clod. In parts of Texas a lot of people even name their kids after them: Claude and Claudette. In other parts of the country dirt clods are more properly "clay clods," given the geography. These do not explode on impact as much as they splat and stick.

Yet, splat and stick can be fun. And the name Clay is nice.

That admitted, however, for pure throwing pleasure a river rock packs it. And Rocky is a great nickname.scrounge from my neighbor, Bud.

Actually, glass-smashing facilities have the potential of outpacing tree forts in popularity among sub-10-year-old males. I have always claimed this. There is nothing quite like the sound and excitement of seeing a rock hit a mayonnaise jar unless you have a connection who can supply you with an occasional gallon jug, the kind cider comes in. Then we're talking major fun.

You set up the jars and bottles on a shelf inside the target house, then fire away. For people who live in neighborhoods where houses are pretty close, it is wise to notify the neighbors in advance of what you are doing. Police have little sense of humor about being called out to investigate broken mayonnaise jars.

After 15 or 20 minutes of throwing the rocks, you sweep the glass into a recycle pile and re-collect the rocks. This is an ecological dream. The only real danger is that someone like "Plastic-and-Batteries 'R' Us" will glom onto the idea. Then you'd have rock harvesters stomping up and down rivers of the West trying to get a corner on the good throwing rock market. That would be terrible.

Anyway, please start setting aside your mayonnaise jars for us.

And the next time you hear someone say, "That's about as smart as a box of rocks," think of us.

For his birthday I am going to harvest a bucket of "skippers" for him. You know, throw those nice, smooth, flat rocks side-arm across a still piece of water.

I'll bet little Bull will be up to a half dozen "skips" in no time.

Finding a respectful distance

While many Americans sweated their way through last July's record breaking temperatures, the news that yet another calamity had befallen the Kennedy clan brought millions to their televisions. John F. Kennedy, Jr., his wife Carolyn and her sister Lauren Bessette slammed into the ocean 7 miles off Martha's Vineyard in a single-engine Piper Saratoga.

People followed the tragic news even when there was little to report. And when the bodies were recovered and their cremated ashes returned to the sea, and when family and friends gathered for the next day's memorial service, people kept watching even though their was little to see.

The Kennedy family's wish that the media keep "a respectful distance" challenged the professionalism and resourcefulness of commentators to come up with ways that honored that wish yet responded to the intense interest of the public. At the burial, cameras showed a glimpse of a small boat bobbing on the horizon. Visual coverage of the memorial service was limited to the exterior of Saint Thomas More Church in Manhattan.

Because my work with The Christophers revolves around the media, I was invited to provide commentary on the liturgical and spiritual aspects of Catholic ritual as well as the meaning of faith in the face of unrelenting heartbreak. I spent a total of eight hours on MSNBC's set with anchor Brian Williams, political analyst Tim Russert, Kennedy family historian Laurence Leamer and other sensitive and insightful folks.

At the very outset, I sensed that our commentary was different from the usual high-energy banter that accompanies most media reporting. Our participation, like the mood of viewers in front of their televisions, took on tones you might hear during a hushed, thoughtful heart-to-heart conversation at a funeral home. Our "respectful distance" actually created a poignant nearness to the experience, putting us in touch with our most personal feelings and responses to human tragedy. In the midst of this, Williams and Russert provided me with an opportunity I never had before on secular television. Without proselytizing, I was able to minister to the hearts and minds of millions of fellow travelers in this valley of tears. I was permitted to explain faith's impact on the grief-stricken, the spiritual dynamic of the healing process, and the fundamental themes of Resurrection and Everlasting Life.

The ever vigilant Williams, who impressed me with his ability to stay focused while monitoring several technical matters at once, softly observed that the demeanor of those who were leaving the church after the memorial service seemed remarkably different from when they entered.

"Father Tom, the family and friends, who were so agonizingly pensive before the service, now appear to be actually buoyant, joyful, some are even laughing. How does one explain this change?"

My response was one I could have said about any of those I have tried to comfort over the years. "They have just celebrated the light which is John, Carolyn and Lauren. The joyous gift they were in this life is now joined with God. Even in their loss, the family and loved ones believe that, and are transforming their grief by ministering to one another."

This is the belief I tried to share: God weeps with us. God comforts us. And, as time dissolves into eternity, He welcomes us.

Question Corner

FATHER JOHN DIETZEN

An "integral" confession

Q. We were taught that in the sacrament of penance, if there are no serious sins, it is sufficient and good to mention some past sin or present fault that we are bothered about and want to overcome. That is what I usually do, and it has helped a lot.

Recently I read in a Catholic magazine that this is wrong. We should not "confess just one sin," but every confession must be "integral." What does that mean?

A. An integral confession, in traditional sacramental terminology, simply means that if any serious, mortal sins have been committed since one's last reception of this sacrament, all those serious sins must be confessed.

Some ambiguity apparently has arisen over a practice in certain communal penance services at which each penitent is asked to "mention one sin" at the time of individual confessions at that service. There is nothing wrong with that, if one is speaking of lesser ("venial") sins.

It would be misleading, however, to imply that only one serious sin might be confessed if there has been more than one.

Some explanations of this subject have been, I believe, ambiguous, as obviously one was in your case.

What you are doing is fine and commendable. One of the advantages of this sacrament is that it helps us articulate and zero in on aspects of our life that, while a long way from seriously sinful, are leading us in directions we know are not good and virtuous.

With the influence of God's grace and life and love, which are the fruits of the sacrament of penance, such confessions, as the church's official Rite of Penance indicates, help us to "perfect the grace of baptism" and "to conform most closely to Christ and to follow the voice of the Spirit more attentively" in our lives (No. 7).

Bound by marriage

Q. Your recent question column dealt with Catholics who have affiliated with a different religion and marry out of the church.

Consider two Catholics who marry in the church, and years later are divorced. One of the spouses then embraces another religious faith and marries out of the church.

Does the church recognize that second marriage? Are not both parties of the first marriage still bound by that marriage?

A. According to Catholic belief and regulations concerning marriage, both spouses would still be bound by that first marriage.

As I said in the response to which you refer, according to Catholic canon law, when former Catholics who have affiliated with a different religion marry out of the church, that marriage is very probably valid, even in the eyes of the church, assuming there is no other impediment to the marriage.

A previous valid marriage would be such an impediment. One spouse's joining another faith does not change that.

Marriage among African Americans

A few years ago I (Terri) got into a conversation with a patient while doing an ultrasound procedure. We talked about marriage and the need for good preparation. I told her about the marriage programs we coordinate for the African American community of Chicago. Her response was, "I didn't think that there were many marriages among African Americans." At first I felt a bit offended by her apparently innocent response. However, after deeper reflection, I had to admit that very many share her beliefs about marriage among African Americans, including many African Americans.

The prevalent negative perceptions on marriage create a culture that seems unfriendly if not hostile to Christian marriage. This isn't something unique to African Americans. Perhaps, though, this lack of social support is felt more pronounced among African Americans.

From our perspective through our work in marriage ministry among African Americans, marriage is very much alive. It's just that the broader community doesn't know it. And the bar of expectations of marriage is getting lower and lower. Imagine being in a car on a multilane highway. Ahead are several cars with couples in them. Some couples are sitting apart from each other; some are cuddled next to each other. Our cultural bias tells us that the couples sitting right next to each other aren't married — at least not to each other. We live in a culture of cynicism about marriage. Who suffers? Families.

Talking with a group of African American and interracial couples at a recent marriage retreat in Milwaukee, it was clearly the common experience of feeling like "the last couple on earth" for the group. Feelings of isolation when disillusionment sets in are also common. Yet, their very presence at the retreat expressed a hopefulness and willingness to invest in their marriage.

How do we encourage married couples to persevere? What can we do to help married couples believe that what they're striving for is really doable? How can the Church marshal its resources to help the institution of marriage thrive among African Americans? While this is a problem of our modern society, it is also an opportunity for the Church to bring the gospel of Jesus Christ to a "niche market" in the African American community.

A plan in the works in Chicago is an archdiocesan celebration of African American marriage for the year 2000. Married couples from around the Chicago area will gather in celebration of their sacramental unions. Other ways to encourage marriage among African Americans are to make available to them marriage enrichment resources created with them in mind. Marriage programs designed for the dominant culture, even when we retrofit them, aren't inviting enough and aren't always relevant to the unique experiences nuanced by culture, history, politics, spirituality and economics.

These are simple ideas that will help. They aren't the total solution. However, either can be a step toward empowering African American marriages to be good news in a bad news world. Something else that is good about them: they can help any marriage.

Holy Land Christians announce protest closure of holy sites

By JUDITH SUDILOVSKY
Catholic News Service

JERUSALEM (CNS) — The heads of Christian churches in the Holy Land announced they would close all Christian holy sites to protest an Israeli government decision to allow a mosque next to a Catholic basilica in Nazareth.

"To express the disapprobation of all the churches at the way that their rights have been summarily violated ... all the sanctuaries of the Holy Land will be closed on Nov. 22-23," said the Nov. 4 statement signed, "with a heavy heart," by Latin-rite Patriarch Michel Sabbah of Jerusalem; Franciscan Father Giovanni Battistelli of the Franciscan Custody of the Holy Land; and the Greek Orthodox and Armenian patriarchs.

The Custody of the Holy Land functions as a Middle East province of the Franciscans, but with the specific mission of providing a Catholic presence and ministry at the holy sites and shrines.

"We trust that we do not need to take any further steps in the near future and that the government will rise to the challenge by applying law and order for all," the statement said.

The Christian officials described Israel's decision as "clear discrimination" against the Christian community and charged that the government had abandoned the rule of law by giving in to Muslim fundamentalists' demands in hopes of electoral gains. They said they viewed the decision with "grave concern."

"Despite the ruling of the court of law in Israel that the land adjacent to the Basilica of the Annunciation is state land, the government has supported a small group of fundamentalists who are intent on building a mosque only a few (feet) away from the historical Church of the Annunciation in Nazareth," they said. In their statement they noted that Christians and Muslims have existed peacefully in Nazareth since the Ottoman period some 500 years ago.

"The common bonds that link Christianity and Islam in this city are firm and have made the City of the Annunciation an example of traditional harmony and peace," they said. "This sense of peaceful co-existence and confident harmony has recently been shaken by a series of sad events that have been painful and counter-productive for the majority of both faith communities."

The Christian officials described Israel's decision as "clear discrimination" against the Christian community and charged that the government had abandoned the rule of law by giving in to Muslim fundamentalists' demands in hopes of electoral gains.

Two years ago Muslim fundamentalists took over a plot of land in front of the basilica intended for an Italian-styled piazza as part of the city's preparations for thousands of Christian pilgrims expected during the jubilee year. The fundamentalists claimed the land belonged to the Waqf, or Islamic Religious Trust. They erected a protest tent and declared their intention to build a mosque that would tower over the basilica.

In October, an Israeli court ruled that the land belonged to the Israeli government but, in an attempt to reach a compromise, the government decided to permit a much smaller mosque on part of the disputed land. The remaining land will be given to the Nazareth municipality, which was to build the piazza.

The tent was supposed to be taken down Nov. 8, and a cornerstone laying ceremony for the mosque is slated for Nov. 23. Construction on the site is not to begin until after March, which has been discussed as a time for a potential papal visit.

According to the agreement, Israel is to transfer some $95,000 to the shopkeepers in the area whose shops would have to be torn down, and the Waqf is to receive another 2.5 acres of land from the government for the construction of other institutions.

The Christian leaders called on Muslims to support their decision to close the churches.

"We pray to the Almighty that the wounds of Nazareth will soon be healed, and that it can re-discover its special role as a symbol of the traditional and centuries-long peaceful coexistence between Christians and Muslims and as a stimulus for the peace which the Holy Land needs so much," the statement said.

An Israeli official expressed regret over the churches' decision and said Israel was committed to freedom of religion for all.

In a Nov. 5 interview with Vatican Radio, Patriarch Sabbah said it was unclear whether the government's decision to allow the mosque would compromise a possible papal visit to Nazareth.

"The pope's visit depends on what concrete situation there will be in Nazareth. If the population will really be in division, if there will be disturbances — we don't know yet, nor can we predict. The story is not yet concluded, the last word has not yet been said," he said. ▼

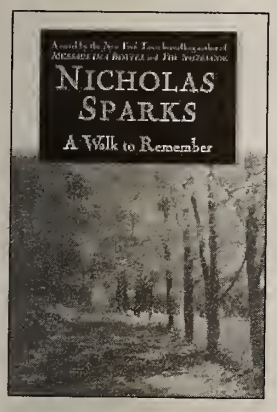
Author Nicholas Sparks remembers his Catholic roots

The bestselling writer hopes to move people with his latest book, "A Walk to Remember"

By DEIRDRE C. MAYS
THE MISCELLANY

In between selling millions of copies of his novels and touring the country on book signings, author Nicholas Sparks can literally count his blessings.

The writer's debut novel, The Notebook, spent a combined 132 weeks on the New York Times hardcover and paperback bestseller lists. "Message in a Bottle" spent over 30 weeks on the list and was made into a top box office movie. The author is happily married and has two young sons, Cody and Ryan, with a third on the way.



While promoting his latest effort, "A Walk to Remember," Sparks spoke with The Miscellany from his grandmother's home in San Diego. He discussed his spiritual life, his gratitude for blessings he has received, and the faith that carries him through in times of tragedy.

As someone who laughingly refers to himself as a Catholic poster child, Sparks, 33, is not far off the mark. He was raised by two Catholic parents in Nebraska, Minnesota and California. He went to the University of Notre Dame on a track scholarship (he still runs nine miles a day) where he met his future wife, Cathy, also a cradle Catholic.

The couple married in 1989 and settled in New Bern, N.C. The family belongs to St. Paul Catholic Church, and the children attend parochial school. The Sparks value their family life intently and are active in their school and parish. Sparks regularly attends Mass, "even while on tour."

The author places great import on his faith.

"At times it gives me someone to yell at and at times it gives me someone to thank," he said. "You have to have someone greater than yourself, it gets you through. If you believe you are the center of the universe it's difficult to live a fulfilling life. You are alone."

When it comes to the success of his writing, Sparks acknowledges his blessings.

"Everything you receive in life is a gift, but at the same time the Lord helps those who help themselves," he said. "The Lord gave me a desire to work hard, be willing to learn and have the patience necessary to do what I do."

His hard work and success has also been tempered with hard times.

"I have had my ups and downs," Sparks said.

Some of those low notes have been the loss of his parents over the last decade and the discovery that his sister, Danielle Sparks, has cancer. At those times, an active faith helps the author through.

In his books, Sparks said he cannot help but let his belief system shine through. He described "A Walk to Remember" as a novel about the beauty, power and innocence of a first, true love set in the 1950s.

"And of course morality plays into that," he explained. "I did not want to write a book that includes premarital sex — that does not prove true love, and it is not where my moral underpinnings lie."

He views novels with explicit sexual content as a lazy form of writing.

"It's a quick way to garner attention, but it doesn't last," he opined.

Spirituality plays an important role in who the author is.

"There are four areas: emotional, physical, mental and spiritual," he said. "It's one of the areas I'm always striving to improve and be the best I can possibly be."

Nicholas Sparks, the bestselling author from New Bern, N.C., talks about the importance of the Catholic faith in his life.

That, however, is not always an easy task.

"Sometimes, it feels like God plays poker with my life, but that is not unique to me," he said. "There are times when you come to question your faith. That's a very typical thing. Does my faith sustain me? Yes. I continue to go to church and pray, and in the end, my life has been very blessed in many ways."

He hopes people are entertained and moved by his work. Sparks himself tries to read about three books a week of different genres.

"I've always been a big reader. I always was a good student. I just decided when I was 28 to give writing 100 percent of my effort. With my first effort I was blessed and fortunate to have it turn out the way it did."

The celebrity that comes with success is just another aspect of his job. Sparks said authors can retain some of their anonymity because people evaluate them by their work and not what they look like.

"I'm never recognized; I prefer it that way," he said. "I have young children. That is one of the reasons why we live in North Carolina because people respect our privacy."

The Sparks try to raise their children with church teachings about charity, faith, honesty and morality.

"We probably work harder on those than anything else," Sparks said. "There are many many ways to raise children, but for us, you start with the basics of right and wrong. I would rather have a C student who was a quality person than a straight A student who was not."

Sparks is an optimist. He doesn't worry about his children's future.

"I tend to believe people have changed less than you think," he said. "People want to be good parents, good people, good spouses. Most have a good work ethic, most haven't changed. The media is so much more pervasive. You can see bad stuff instantly, so it seems like it's happening all the time, everywhere.

"Ninety-nine percent of people out there are pretty good people," he said. "I never believe the stuff about morality dying. People are still going to church. It's the rare that is written about and that makes it news. Spirituality and morality is very pervasive."

When it comes to his marriage, he finds his spirituality is fortifying.

"It keeps you doing the right thing when you'd rather not," he said. "It gives you more patience such as when you are in a fight, you realize you made a commitment before God, and you don't do stupid things that would threaten that. You know you are in it for the long haul. You can fight, get mad, but be comforted knowing that commitment means they are not going to leave, not going to do anything stupid, and that it will pass."

In need, Sparks turns to the Serenity Prayer for comfort.

"It's always appropriate when you are frustrated," he said. "It's the acceptance of things you can't change, it's always important to remind yourself of that." ▼

Youth group members strike a pose to benefit their church funds

By ALESHA M. PRICE
Staff Writer

CHARLOTTE — It was an autumn night of pageantry and splendor as young and older members from Our Lady of Consolation Church modeled fashions from area boutiques and clothing stores to benefit the church's various funds.

The Southern Renaissance Restaurant was the location for the "Reaping the Harvest Program — An Evening of Fashion and Fellowship," a Youth in Action-sponsored fundraiser on November 6. Youth ministers Nanette Lide and Leslie Johnson, with the help of many others, led their group of children and teenagers through clothing and scene changes, posing styles, and smiles for the audience of family, friends and parishioners.

"I was overwhelmed and very pleased [with the fashion show]. We had a great group of adult volunteers who helped with monitoring the dressing rooms and coordinating the flow."
— Nanette Lide, Youth minister

The night's festivities began with a candlelight dinner buffet of traditional Southern cuisine provided by the cooking staff at the downtown eatery. The dinner music was provided by Soothing Touch, a local gospel quartet made up of an Our Lady of Consolation Church parishioner and young men from Christ's Gospel Church. As they sang their harmonized tunes of praise and worship, the youth and adults were preparing for their first fashion sequence.

The show was divided into seven different fashion "scenes," each with a particular theme: Back-to-School, Sunday Worship, Honoring our African Heritage, Casual Wear, Prom, After Five and Wedding Bells. Robin Plummer added her own humorous narrative touch as she described what the participants were wearing to the audience.

The adults modeled clothes during the Sunday Worship, African Heritage, Casual Wear, and After Five scenes, while the children and teens strutted their stuff for the cheering crowd for all seven scenes.

The third scene with the African-inspired clothing led into a musical and dance intermission featuring the Kabaka Drummers and Dancers. This group, founded by Sandy Murdock with lead drummer Willis Joseph, performed the Lumba, a West African traditional dance.

The showstopper scenes of the evening included the Prom and Wedding Bells sequences in which the youth group modeled prom and bridesmaid dresses, tuxedos, and wedding gowns all donated by a local wedding boutique.

The night also included a raffle of a wood carved Sankofa bird. This is significant to the youth because the bird looks over its shoulder, a reminder to the kids to always remember their history and their past and to bring positiveness into all aspects of their lives as they move forward, said Lide.

"I was overwhelmed and very pleased [with the fashion show]. We had a great group of adult volunteers who helped with monitoring the dressing rooms and coordinating the flow," said Lide. "They are a great group of kids. They don't realize it, but they are ministering to me as I am ministering to them, and I felt much gratitude from them."

The youth group presented flowers to a tearful Lide and Johnson at the end of the fundraiser. The proceeds will benefit the church's resource room restoration fund, the retreat fund, the "Toys and Toiletries" collection for the battered women's shelter, and food for ten families through the city's Department of Social Services. ▼

Pilgrimage celebrates faith, culture

BY ALESHA M. PRICE
STAFF WRITER

WASHINGTON, D.C. - For some, the Nov. 12-14 pilgrimage to the Basilica of the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception was a renewal of their faith, and for others, it was an opportunity to learn more about their heritage. All 118 people left the nation's capital touched in some significant way from visiting the shrine, the Our Mother of Africa Chapel and St. Augustine Church in Washington, D.C.

Three busloads of people from across the diocese embarked upon the trip, sponsored by the African-American Affairs Ministry, with many expectations and hopes.

"I want to see the National Shrine and to have the experience of meeting other Catholics from across the diocese," said Jasper Dunlap from the St. Lawrence Basilica in Asheville.

St. Lucien Church in Spruce Pine parishioners Mike Lyons and his mother, Mary, both agreed that their "great devotion to the Blessed Mother and the desire to see the shrine for the first time" is why they decided to go on the trip.

Upon arrival at the shrine, many of the people were awestruck at the size and the outer construction. After a tour of the over 60 chapels in the upper and lower levels with a choir rehearsal in the background, people expressed what they had seen and heard in various manners.

It was a moving experience for Carol Cerar who attends Belmont Abbey Basilica. She was brought to tears at the sight of the Our Lady of Guadalupe Chapel because her birthday and the feast day are both on Dec. 12.

"The Blessed Mother symbolizes hope, and with this great edifice, I see hope for all people," reflected Gregory Lewis, a member of Our Lady of Consolation Church in Charlotte. "This is such a blessing, and it stirs my spirit."

The focal point of the trip was the Our Mother of Africa Chapel, with its renditions of the Madonna and Christ Child with African-American features, the crucifix made of ebony, a native African wood, and a wooden wall carving of the history of the African-American people from slavery to the civil rights movement.

The sculptures form a triangular pattern with the Christ Child pointing to His people, and the people in the wall carving looking at the crucifix. It has historical and religious significance and served as an important aspect of the trip for many of those in attendance. During the tour, many people lingered behind to either sit or stand in silence or pray silently while gazing at the Madonna and Christ Child sculpture.

The prayer service in the chapel included "Oh Freedom" and "We Shall Overcome" as the opening and closing songs. The prayers and songs all had one central theme — Christ as the Light of the World who has the power to guide His people out of darkness. The theme involved everyone living as one harmoniously as God's people and being able to share individual talents and ideas with everyone.

Esther Rackette, a St. Benedict the Moor Church parishioner in Winston-Salem, said, "The prayer service was truly uplifting. It is wonderful to see how we [African-Americans] are depicted in several of the mosaics in the shrine in addition to the Our Mother of Africa Chapel. It shows that we do have a presence."

The singing and the group prayer caught the attention of passersby who joined in the prayer service and the Mass at the Memorial of St. Francis Xavier Cabrini Blessed Sacrament Chapel. Father Mauricio West, vicar general and chancellor of the diocese, was the celebrant and homilist, and Rev. Mr. Curtiss Todd, vice-chancellor of the diocese, and Rev. Mr. Ron Steinkamp, permanent deacon at St. Pius X in Greensboro, concelebrated the Mass.

U.S. 'truth commission' needed on Central America, panelists say

WASHINGTON (CNS) — The United States needs its own version of the truth commissions that uncovered culpability for crimes committed during Central America's civil wars, said panelists at a Nov. 11 forum marking the anniversary of 1989 murders at Central American University. The panel at Georgetown University kicked off more than a week of events at Jesuit institutions around the country commemorating the 10th anniversary of the deaths of six Jesuits, their housekeeper and her daughter at the Jesuit school in San Salvador. "The United States needs its own version of a truth commission on Central America," said Robert E. White, ambassador to El Salvador in 1979-81 and now president of the Center for International Policy.

U.S. Catholics, Anglicans issue agreed report on church issues

WASHINGTON (CNS) — The Anglican-Roman Catholic Consultation in the U.S.A. has called for serious attention to joint decision-making by the Catholic and Anglican churches. "Our proximity offers us many opportunities for growth in communion which even now is real yet imperfect," the group said in an agreed report issued Nov. 15. "Among the salient practical issues posed is the question of joint decision-making." The report said Catholics and Episcopalians already experience real communion in many places, but the limitations and imperfections of that communion are "wrenchingly evident in the inability of people who work, study and pray together to share the Eucharist together regularly."

Sudanese bishop says buying back slaves is worth the risk

WASHINGTON (CNS) — A Sudanese bishop said buying back slaves, including children, who have been seized during Sudan's civil war outweighs the risk that slave traders may profit. "It really pains me when there are some people who question the morality of redeeming these kids and they say it might fill the wallets of the slave traders," said Bishop Macram Gassis of El Obeid, Sudan, at a Nov. 10 press conference at the National Press Club in Washington. The press conference was co-sponsored by Christian Solidarity International, or CSI, which claims it has helped free more than 15,000 Sudanese enslaved by militias of Sudan's National Islamic Front regime, and the American Anti-Slavery Group, which campaigns against slavery worldwide. The groups estimate that tens of thousands of black Africans, mainly women and children, have been captured during slave raids to carry out the government's policies of "forced Islamization and Arabization."

U.N. renews support for Palestinian millennial observance

UNITED NATIONS (CNS) — Bethlehem 2000, a millennial observance sponsored by the Palestinian National Authority, won renewed support from the United Nations Nov. 10. In a resolution adopted by consensus, the General Assembly commended "the efforts undertaken by the Palestinian Authority" and expressed appreciation for assistance the international community had given "this monumental commemoration." The resolution also called on the U.N. secretary-general to "continue to mobilize the pertinent organizations and agencies of the United Nations system" to ensure the project's success.

Indian bishops' president says pope spoke of 'inner conversion'

NEW DELHI, India (CNS) — The president of the Catholic Bishops' Conference of India has offered a clarification of Pope John Paul II's reference to conversion, which sparked controversy among the mainly Hindu population. Archbishop Alan de Lastic of Delhi told journalists at a press conference after the pope's departure from India Nov. 8 that the pope had spoken only of "inner conversion" in the final document of the 1998 Synod of Bishops for Asia. The archbishop's remarks were reported by UCA News, an Asian church news agency based in Thailand. The pope's "call to conversion" in the post-synodal apostolic exhortation, "Ecclesia in Asia" ("Church in Asia"), which he presented in New Delhi Nov. 6, has generated debate among various groups, with some alleging that the pope came to India to sanction conversions.

Vatican agency reports Chinese plans to crack down on church

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — China's communist leadership has outlined plans for a full-scale crackdown on the country's underground Catholic Church should diplomatic ties be re-established with the Vatican, according to Fides, the Vatican's missionary news service. The plan calls for the destruction of underground churches, seminaries and convents and the "re-education" through hard labor of underground clerics who fail to submit to the government-controlled Catholic Patriotic Association, Fides said Nov. 10. Fides said it obtained from sources in Beijing large sections of a secret 16-page policy paper prepared by the Communist Party's central committee.

Vatican official asks Georgia to consider release of CRS worker

TBILISI, Georgia (CNS) — A top Vatican official asked Georgian authorities to consider releasing a U.S. development worker who was arrested after a fatal traffic accident in July. Cardinal Angelo Sodano, Vatican secretary of state, said it would be a good humanitarian gesture to mark Pope John Paul II's visit. Loren Wille, 54, a Catholic Relief Services employee from Golden, Colo., was facing up to 10 years in prison in a case that his lawyer says may be politically motivated. ▼

Bishops open annual meeting, begin work on ambitious agenda as millennium approaches

By Catholic News Service

WASHINGTON (CNS) — The U.S. bishops opened their last meeting of the millennium Nov. 15 by beginning work on an ambitious array of documents on topics ranging from Catholic colleges to the elderly, from adult faith formation to the new millennium itself.

The bishops devoted the first morning of their Nov. 15-18 general meeting at the Hyatt Regency Capitol Hill in Washington to preliminary consideration of eight action items.

A ninth, involving changes in the structure of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops and U.S. Catholic Conference, was postponed until Nov. 16 because Archbishop Daniel E. Pilarczyk of Cincinnati, who chairs the bishops' Ad Hoc Committee for Revision of Statutes and Bylaws, was hospitalized in Washington with chest pains.

Bishop Joseph A. Fiorenza of Galveston-Houston, NCCB-USCC president, opened the meeting with a talk summarizing distractions and challenges facing the church as it enters the new millennium, but calling on the trust and courage exhibited by U.S. church leaders throughout its history.

"Our predecessors bequeathed to us a strong and dynamic church," Bishop Fiorenza said. "They faced the significant issues of their times, and, like them, we must face the issues that will come our way in the future."

Through this century, the bishops' agenda has dealt with the defense of life from conception through natural death "from the threats of abortion, hunger and poverty, racism, war and weapons of mass destruction, capital punishment and euthanasia," he added.

The review of those agendas "is a wholesome reminder that we are part of a great tradition of episcopal service which stretches across the centuries, and, in our case, from Archbishop (John) Carroll (of Baltimore) and the other bishops who have gone before us," Bishop Fiorenza said.

The tradition stretches into the new millennium "and we are the ones who, in Gods' providence, will bring the teaching of the apostles into the next millennium of Christian faith," he added.

FALL MEETING
NATIONAL CONFERENCE OF CATHOLIC BISHOPS
WASHINGTON

Among the issues to be tackled were Catholic higher education norms, pastoral messages on charity and on the blessings of age, and two messages — one long, one shorter — for the jubilee year.

The proposed norms implementing Pope John Paul II's 1990 apostolic exhortation, "Ex Corde Ecclesiae," have gone through a number of drafts during the past eight years. The papal document sets general norms for Catholic colleges and universities around the world but leaves it to bishops' conferences to make more specific applications in light of the situation in each country.

Bishop John J. Leibrecht of Springfield-Cape Girardeau, Mo., chairman of the bishops' Committee for the Implementation of "Ex Corde Ecclesiae," said the latest draft, which was to be voted on Nov. 17, builds in "more flexibility" than earlier versions.

The proposed document on the blessings of age is addressed not just to the elderly, but to all Catholics, Bishop Joseph P. Delaney of Fort Worth, Texas, said in introducing the text Nov. 15.

"It challenges faith communities to fully incorporate older persons into those communities," he said. The 6,000-word document was to be voted on Nov. 18.

Presenting two proposed statements on the jubilee year, Bishop Wilton D. Gregory of Belleville, Ill., said the bishops hoped to bring about "a national attitude adjustment" for the new millennium.

The bishops were to vote Nov. 17 on two versions of the message — a brief "popularized" version addressed to all Americans and a longer message directed to church leaders and lay Catholics.

The primary message of both texts is that "because of God's love for us through the life, death and resurrection of Jesus Christ, each person has the capacity for good," Bishop Gregory said.

Other action items receiving a first look Nov. 15 were:

— Proposed guidelines for the concelebration of the Eucharist.

— A 10,000-word pastoral message on charity that says Catholics "cannot remain idle witnesses" amid the tragedies of poverty, hunger, human suffering and other social sins.

— A pastoral plan on adult faith formation that stresses the importance of lifelong education to help adult Catholics make their faith stronger and more mature.

— A series of norms on admission of seminary candidates who had formerly been in other seminaries or religious order formation houses.

The meeting's first day also included the bishops' annual budget and planning decisions, including approval of a $52.7 million budget for 2000 and a diocesan assessment increase of 1.6 percent in 2001.

Due for discussion but no vote were draft documents on church art and architecture, the ongoing formation of priests and ecclesial lay ministry.

Added to an already crowded agenda at the last minute were reports on the effects of the U.S. embargo on the Iraqi people; the tense situation over the building of a mosque in Nazareth; and the cause for beatification of the late Archbishop Oscar Romero of San Salvador.

On the day before the meeting opened, about 60 bishops participated in a workshop on human stem-cell research.

Jesuit Father Kevin T. FitzGerald, a cancer researcher at Loyola University Medical Center in Chicago who is studying for a doctorate in bioethics from Georgetown University, told the bishops they face a "huge challenge" in making their voice heard on the controversial issues surrounding stem-cell research.

Additional coverage of the bishops' meeting will be featured in next week's issue.

Room at the Inn ministry celebrates five years of hope

By JIMMY ROSTAR
Associate Editor

Editor's note: The name of the resident included in this story has been changed in respect for her privacy.

CHARLOTTE — Maria's world was in turmoil.

A single mother in her '20s who suffered a lifetime of abuse, she was working two jobs to make ends meet when she became pregnant again. Homeless and broken in spirit, she discovered a place where she could face her future in an environment of love, support and optimism.

At this place, Maria built relationships with others and with God. She is now in college, working toward a degree. At this place, she did indeed find hope.

Room at the Inn in Charlotte is that place, a nonprofit, independent Catholic haven for single mothers and their children that focuses on helping residents achieve healthy, self-directed, faith-filled lives. It is a place that serves the spiritual, intellectual and human needs of those who call it home.

"Room at the Inn is about hope," says Cindy Brown, the ministry's executive director since May. "These are beautiful girls who come to us, and they receive support, a peaceful environment and the love of Christ here. We offer hope to them — hope for them as women, and hope for their children in the womb."

Incorporated in March 1994, Room at the Inn welcomed its first resident in December of that year. It has served more than 180 women and children, born and unborn, since then. The ministry provides residential, health care, child care and educational services to its residents. Because it is a faith-based organization, it also focuses on spiritual enrichment.

There have been two other projects established — Room at the Inn of the Triad in Greensboro and Angel Place in Raleigh — though each currently operates as a separate legal entity.

Room at the Inn is a licensed provider of maternity care and child care services, and is unique in that it admits women with previously born children.

Residents may stay for up to two years, and the ministry can house as many as six women and their children at one time. In 1998-99 alone, Room at the Inn served 22 women and 30 children. There is a staff of seven, five of whom are on site.

"Primarily, we are a Catholic home for unwed mothers," says Brown. "Catholicism is our essence, and we want the very best for the women that Christ brings to us."

From a faith perspective, that means mandatory Sunday attendance at the church of residents' choice, as well as faith-based counseling, direction from a spiritual adviser, and an upcoming chastity program. Prayer is an integral part of the day, Brown says, and a weekly Mass is celebrated at the house.

Cindy Brown, executive director of Room at the Inn

The mothers also maintain a comprehensive life skills training program designed to help them make the healthiest decisions for them and their children.

"The core of the program is education," says Brown, noting that residents agree to attend school appropriate to their situations. There is a no-dating policy, and residents run the household as an extended family — one that takes care of all the cooking, cleaning and other domestic chores.

Residents "are given foremost the hope of Christ, and through our services the means for attaining self-sufficiency and independence," Brown summarizes.

Working in this ministry has been a calling, Brown says. A cradle Catholic with a background in chemical engineering, she says her opportunity with Room at the Inn is the latest step in a faith journey highlighted by an ever-growing appreciation for the church's stance on life issues.

The ministry's work is garnering appreciation from those touched by it, as well as in the Charlotte community.

"There are so many people working to save unborn children, as we should," said Bishop William G. Curlin at the ministry's annual fundraising banquet Nov. 11. "It's God's work."

The banquet is largest single fundraising effort for the ministry, whose funding primarily comes from private donations. Like the mothers themselves, Brown notes, the ministry's benefactors are heroes of hope, too.

Bishop Curlin continued his comments by commending the ministry and those who support the respect life effort.

"As long as there are people like you in the world," he said, "the next century is going to be beautiful. You are the living Christ for us. You are the proof that God is alive in our world."▾

Annual Thanksgiving Dinner event to be hosted by St. Joseph Catholic Church

NEWTON — St. Joseph Catholic Church, in Newton, NC, will again sponsor a Thanksgiving Dinner for the local community this year. The dinner has become a local tradition over the last decade, with St. Joseph Church hosting the dinner in alternating years with First United Methodist Church, also of Newton. Anyone in Newton and the surrounding areas of Catawba County, can receive a free homemade Thanksgiving Dinner, complete with all the trimmings and dessert.

The event is designed to provide a Thanksgiving Dinner for individuals, or small families who do not have the means to prepare such a meal on their own, particularly shut-ins, elderly individuals or other single people who have no family or close friends with whom they can share the Thanksgiving tradition.

In 1997, nearly 400 people received meals, of which 300 were delivered, and similar numbers are expected this year.

Church members of St. Joseph Catholic Church, as well as volunteers from many other churches in the Newton area, donate the food, prepare the meals, and deliver boxed meals to people who request them. Volunteers also transport individuals who would prefer to enjoy their meal in fellowship with others at St. Joseph's Holy Family Hall, adjacent to the church. Some St. Joseph's members also eat their Thanksgiving meal in the Hall, beginning immediately after the 10:00 a.m. Thanksgiving Mass.

The event brings many church members together in the work of helping others and many parishioners comment that the Thanksgiving holiday has taken on more meaning for them and their children because of participating in this event. On years that St, Joseph's does not host the Thanksgiving dinner, the church hosts a similar event on Christmas Day. ▾

Anyone who would like to participate in this event, either as a volunteer, or as a recipient of a dinner, should call the church at (828) 464-9207 or (828) 465-2878.

Wilson matriarch watches N.C. Catholic Church grow

By JOHN STRANGE
NC Catholic Staff

WILSON — Almost 100 years ago, in the small town of Oxford, Bessie Richardson's grandmother would rest her hand on her granddaughter's head, and place the child in God's care.

"She would pray, and ask God to give me a long, healthy life. A Christian life," says Richardson, known as Miss Bessie at St. Therese Church. "I tell people who have children, 'Put your hand on them. And pray. Give them to God. Put your hand on them, and let him know you want him to take that child in his care.'"

Miss Bessie was born Aug. 17, 1899. When she was a baby, Father Thomas Frederick Price, co-founder of Maryknoll, was establishing the Nazareth Orphanage in Raleigh, a precursor to the Diocese of Raleigh, which is celebrating a 75th anniversary this November.

In fact, Miss Bessie says, there weren't many Catholic churches in the state at the time, and certainly none near Oxford. "I remember there was only one in Durham at that particular time. I believe there was one in Raleigh, and Wilmington. They were so scattered apart. There weren't any Catholics in North Carolina anyway."

She held on to her faith, Miss Bessie says, thanks to her grandmother. Her mother had died at a young age; her father had "strayed," and her grandfather was Cherokee, and was a "staunch Methodist."

There was only her grandmother to instill her faith. "It's something that never leaves a child's heart and mind," says Miss Bessie, sipping from her soup-bowl-size mug of coffee. "If I hadn't had her, I wouldn't have been me."

So Miss Bessie and her grandmother went to a Methodist church because there was nowhere else to go, "and I grew up there." They were welcome, she says, despite their Catholic faith.

She says she was 17 or 18 when she saw her first Catholic priest. "We didn't have any priests. They just came through. They rode on horses through the country to see if there was anybody they could find who was Catholic."

Bessie Richardson recalls a century of living the faith in North Carolina.

Miss Bessie's grandmother died when Bessie "was able to know something." She was about 12 years old.

After her grandparents died, Miss Bessie moved to Virginia to be with members of her extended family. She worked for some time for sisters in a Petersburg convent, and later she went to nursing school. "The sisters taught me how to scrub and clean up. They would work you to death. Two buckets of water, scrubbing on your knees. If you weren't praying before, you're praying now, because you're praying to get up off your knees."

In 1924, as the Diocese of Raleigh was being officially established, she was offered a job in Wilson to care for a family. There were children, and the mother was pregnant, and sick, and needed help.

"I came to Wilson to stay three months," she says. After the baby was born, she planned to go to New York. "When you're young, sometimes you got a traveling mind. I guess it was in me to kind of view the country."

But she stayed in Wilson for the rest of her life. Why? "I don't know — I just kept on staying."

She remembers little about the new diocese that was being formed at the time. "I don't think it was so important to people," she says. "If you didn't go to the Baptist church, you were nobody. So I was nobody."

She says she has never understood the prejudice of those days against Catholics. "They didn't understand. They didn't understand," she says, her voice rising in frustration and disappointment. "They didn't know any better."

She was married in 1926, but she says it didn't last long. She had no children, and when she took back her maiden name of Richardson, she knew it would stay that way.

"I didn't want to hang that up to nothing else. You want to live your life. You want to live a life that you can be happy in."

She remembers the first church in Wilson - St. Therese - which had its beginnings in an old storefront on Maplewood Avenue. She attended Mass there "a few times," but she hardly got the chance to go. "I was on the job morning and night."

It was only with the arrival of St. Alphonsus Church, a church built by the Redemptorist Fathers for black Catholics in Wilson in 1941, did she find her spiritual home. Father Francis Walsh was the first pastor.

"Father Walsh had a hard time building that church," says Miss Bessie. "The Wilson folk - the Protestant people - fought the Catholic church. They said there were enough Catholic churches here already.

"To me, Father Walsh was an angel, because you had to be to fight Wilson."

Miss Bessie finally had a church family. "St. Alphonsus was a glorious place to me. Everybody went there." There was a tobacco field nearby, and it wasn't rare, she says, for a man to walk into the church chewing on a leaf of tobacco. "It was a trial of my faith," she says now, "but I accepted it, because I was where I wanted to be, and I was happy."

St. Alphonsus closed in 1987, although the building serves the diocese as a center for African-American ministry. The parishioners of St. Alphonsus moved on to worship at St. Therese Church. "They accepted us just like they do anyone else."

Miss Bessie says that at one point she and Bishop Vincent Waters, the third bishop of Raleigh, met, and they became friends. "I don't know how, but we just got to be good friends."

"He wanted us to stay together. He wanted to build a church where everybody would be welcome, to serve and to help one another."

In 1953 Bishop Waters issued a ground-breaking pastoral effectively ending segregation in Diocese of Raleigh facilities.

"He said, 'This congregation is mixed. And it should be.' He said, "We are here for the same cause each one of us. We are God's children, and we are going to accept God as our father. And we are going to accept each one of us as our brothers and sisters. And that's what you had to do for that bishop."

Many Catholics, Miss Bessie says, "didn't want to understand, and they still don't understand. There is still confusion in people's hearts.

CRS official tours Sierra Leone, praises peace process

FREETOWN, Sierra Leone (CNS) — The same day that Sierra Leone embarked on voluntary disarmament of some 45,000 combatants, a U.S. bishop concluded his weeklong visit to the country with a message of support for its fragile peace process. "The Sierra Leonean leadership has taken a huge risk in calling for reconciliation with (the rebels) by inviting them to take a full place at the table, and I can assure you we will pray for you," said Bishop Anthony J. O'Connell of Palm Beach, Fla., treasurer of Baltimore-based Catholic Relief Services' board of directors. He spoke to church, government and nongovernmental organization officials at CRS Sierra Leone headquarters in Freetown Nov. 4.

Developer buys Los Angeles cathedral, plans mixed-use project

LOS ANGELES (CNS) — A developer has purchased the earthquake-damaged St. Vibiana's Cathedral in downtown Los Angeles for $4.65 million and plans to make it the centerpiece of a new mixed-use project. The cathedral's sale to Gilmore Associates was announced at a press conference Nov. 2 held in the old cathedral's parking lot and attended by, among others, Los Angeles Mayor Richard Riordan and Msgr. Terrance Fleming, vicar general for the Los Angeles Archdiocese.

Cardinal Arinze emphasizes saintly living at Mass in Indiana

NOTRE DAME, Ind. (CNS) — The greater your charity, the holier you are, a Vatican official told Catholics in the Diocese of Fort Wayne-South Bend gathered for Mass at the Basilica of the Sacred Heart on the campus of the University of Notre Dame. "It is not good theology to think holiness is only expected of priests, nuns and brothers. The others constitute 99 percent of the church," said Cardinal Francis Arinze, president of the Pontifical Council for Interreligious Dialogue. He was the principal celebrant and homilist at Mass on All Saints Day, Nov. 1.

U.S. official: Danube cleanup requires East-West cooperation

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Industrialization, dams and the effects of war along the Danube River have created a "sewer going right to the Black Sea," said a U.S. Catholic Conference official. "This is complex if it's going to be cleaned up, because you can't do it without cooperation. ... People in the East are going to need help, people in the West need to reduce pollution. It has to be a win-win (situation) or it's a lose-lose with this river," said Walter Grazer, director of the conference's Environmental Justice Program and policy adviser for European affairs. Grazer was among some 70 participants who attended an Oct. 17-26 symposium, "A River of Life: Down the Danube to the Black Sea." Participants traveled by boat along the river to the sea.

Mexican bishop expects indigenous to change, enrich church

MILWAUKEE (CNS) — Bishop Samuel Ruiz Garcia of San Cristobal de las Casas, Mexico, readily admits to being changed by the Indian people to whom he has ministered for the past four decades. And he said he expects they will change the church as well. "I am expecting an extraordinary springtime for the church" now that around the world there is an "emergence of indigenous communities conscious of their cultural identity," Bishop Ruiz said. He made the comments while in Milwaukee to address the national Call to Action conference held Nov. 5-7. The meeting drew about 3,500 people.

Cardinal blesses shrine sculpture as 'proclamation in stone'

WASHINGTON (CNS) – Calling the massive marble artwork "a proclamation in stone," Cardinal James A. Hickey Nov. 14 blessed "The Universal Call to Holiness" sculpture at the Basilica of the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception in Washington. It was Cardinal Hickey, archbishop of Washington, who suggested the theme of the sculpture to evoke a central message of the Second Vatican Council, stated in the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, that "all in the church ... are called to holiness."

NCC anniversary meeting features panel on ecumenical perspectives

CLEVELAND (CNS) -- The 50th anniversary celebration of the National Council of Churches in Cleveland featured Catholic leaders joining their Orthodox and evangelical counterparts in several panel discussions on ecumenism. Billed as the ``Great Conversation," the event was described by NCC officials as ``an opportunity to formulate ecumenical expectations for the next century." It drew an audience of several hundred people.

Planet's resources need management, U.S. biologist tells Vatican

VATICAN CITY (CNS) -- The overwhelming evidence of global injustice -- including 1.3 billion people living in acute poverty and 840 million ``literally starving" -- demands a new phase of planetary management, a U.S. biologist told a Vatican conference. One key to the solution must be more moderate resource consumption among the wealthiest countries, said Peter H. Raven, a professor at the Missouri Botanical Garden in St. Louis. He made the remarks Nov. 13 at a c onference on ``Science for Man and Man for Science," sponsored by the Pontifical Academy of Sciences.

Jesuit-run center says harassment linked to defense of prisoners

. MEXICO CITY (CNS) -- An investigation by a Jesuit-supported human rights center in Mexico whose staff has been harassed and threatened traced the threats to the center's work in defense of political prisoners in Guerrero state. Digna Ochoa, head of the legal defense department of the Miguel Agustin Pro Juarez Human Rights Center in Mexico City, was seized twice in recent months. The latest incident took place in her home Oct. 29, when she was interrogated by two men for eight hours. Interior Secretary Diodoro Carrasco met for three hours Nov. 9 with members of the Mexican bishops' conference and later with Jesuit Father Edgar Cortes, the center's director.

Encuentro 2000 to bring together cultures

By Patricia Zapor
Catholic News Service

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Previous encuentros may have been only for the nation's Hispanic Catholic community, but Encuentro 2000 will aim to bring together many cultures.

The planned July 6-9 event in Los Angeles "marks the first national gathering to recognize the richness of the church's racial, ethnic and cultural diversity," said Los Angeles Auxiliary Bishop Gabino Zavala, who chairs the subcommittee on Encuentro 2000.

He made the comments in a report to the U.S. bishops Nov. 15, the first day of their annual general meeting in Washington.

Such a focus is appropriate during the coming jubilee year, he said, because it "is a time for the church to examine what comprises its current racial, cultural and ethnic makeup, where it needs reconciliation and where change is necessary."

Liturgies and rituals will incorporate elements from a wide range of cultures, he said, and speakers will include Vatican officials, bishops and others who represent the diversity of the church. "Encuentro" is the Spanish word for encounter.

In preparation for the national event, some dioceses and regions are already holding their own related activities, Bishop Zavala said.

Catholics from 14 dioceses and 17 ethnic groups participated in a musical celebration in California in October, for instance.

"The sharing of stories, music and food created an ambiance that made all the participants aware of the presence of the other, the presence of Jesus," he said.

The Archdiocese of Indianapolis planned a one-day encuentro to be held in four different regions, Bishop Zavala reported. The Archdiocese of San Francisco is planning a presentation at the Palace of Fine Arts during Advent, which will focus on stories from different ethnic groups as expressed in song, dance, rituals and symbols.

And in El Paso, Texas, every parish is holding a monthly encuentro, which will lead up to a diocese-wide celebration in June, said Bishop Zavala.

Bishop Gerald Barnes of San Bernardino, Calif., chairman of the Committee on Hispanic Affairs, said during the report that this time in the church is "a critical moment, one that calls for the participation of people from every diocese."

In particular, he said, "there is a need for U.S. Catholics to become more aware of the cultural diversity of the church and its richness."

Catholics also need to reinvigorate parishes by taking advantage of that diversity, and to "develop a richer sense of how the church's sacramental life gives birth to and fosters mission, reconciliation, communion and solidarity," Bishop Barnes said.

Previous encuentros in 1972, 1977 and 1985 were gatherings of Hispanic Catholics that focused on their cultural heritage and developed plans for the growing role of Hispanics in the church.

After the presentation, Auxiliary Bishop Gordon D. Bennett of Baltimore was one of several bishops to speak in support of the Encuentro 2000 plans.

He saluted the planning committee for "having the courage to be the first (ethnic) group to break out and have something for the whole church. All the other ethnic groups that have and promote their own agendas could have done this, too." ▾

All are called to be saints, Cardinal Hickey says at Mass

By Mark Pattison
Catholic News Service

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Cardinal James A. Hickey of Washington said Nov. 15 that the newly installed "Universal Call to Holiness" sculpture at the national shrine is meant to portray that "we are called to be saints."

"We are all called to be God's children by adoption," said the cardinal, still enthused about the sculpture he formally dedicated a day earlier at the Basilica of the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception in Washington.

He was the homilist at a Mass celebrated at the shrine on the first day of the U.S. bishops' general fall meeting, held Nov. 15-18.

The theme of the sculpture was suggested by the cardinal, although "I cannot tell to this day where or when I got the idea" for such a "monumental" work, he told the congregation. But, he added, "I am grateful to the Lord that it did reach me."

The high-relief sculpture "captures so well the mission of this shrine, and the mission of us bishops," Cardinal Hickey said.

In describing the sculpture that was behind the assembly at the back of the shrine, the cardinal said it shows "the Holy Spirit is on top sending rays of great light to men, women and children of every language and race and culture."

"This beautiful work of art captures so well what our work is all about. It all captures so well the core mission of the bishops," he added. "We are not company executives or politicians. We are bishops and priests. Our fundamental mission is to help those we serve."

The 50- by 17-foot sculpture is carved in Botticino-Classico marble and adorns the interior back wall. Its installation completed the nave of the shrine's Upper Church.

Cardinal Hickey noted that he was a seminarian across the street from the shrine when in 1957 the large stone cross was erected in its apse. "It was a solemn moment. It was a solemn moment for me also. I felt somehow I was a part of all of this," he said. ▾

CCHS band marches again

CHARLOTTE — The first Charlotte Catholic High School marching band in 22 years made its debut at Keffer Stadium during the annual Cooke Cup football game Sept. 9. The band was accompanied by the new CCHS flagline. Both groups spent a week of intensive training this summer at a camp at Lees-McRae College in Banner Elk, mastering music and routines. Though delayed by lightning, the 67 Marching Cougars made their debut to a packed stadium. The band is directed by David Schoff and sophomore drum major Leslie Hall. Libby Lerner, a math teacher at CCHS, directs the flagline.

Human rights worker speaks at Morganton parish

MORGANTON — A Guatemalan human rights worker who investigated and documented human rights violations during her home country's decades-long civil war spoke at St. Charles Borromeo Church in Morganton Oct. 13 about her work. Irma Graciela Azmitia Dornates spoke of how her own life was affected by the war, during which her father, a brother and a pregnant sister "disappeared" at the hands of the Guatemalan military. She has worked with the Project for the Recovery of the Historic Memory, which has collected thousands of testimonies from people who reported human rights abuses during the war. She said her work with the project "gave me a chance to do something about the repression that I and so many others suffered." "It helped me to overcome the sense of powerlessness that I felt when my family members ... disappeared," she added. Her speaking tour is sponsored by Witness for Peace, a Washington-based human rights organization.

BMHS contributes to Floyd relief

WINSTON-SALEM — Students at Bishop McGuinness High School collected donations, food and clothing for the people in eastern North Carolina suffering in wake of Hurricane Floyd. The students collected $2,000 over a week. The funds will be sent to Ahoskie, where students worked with Habitat for Humanity last summer, and to St. Mary Catholic School in Goldsboro. The students also collected a sizable amount of food and clothing.

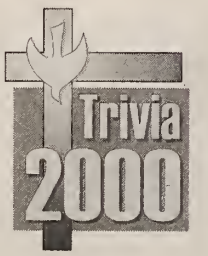
Giant field prepared for Holy Year 'Woodstock'

By JOHN THAVIS
Catholic News Service



VATICAN CITY (CNS) — In what's being called the "Woodstock" of Holy Year 2000, Rome planners are readying an 800-acre field for World Youth Day celebrations, expected to draw up to 2 million people.

The city is spending some $70 million to create a road network, water and electrical service, a security system and basic health care for those in attendance. The site, located on Rome's southern outskirts, has been a sheep pasture until recently.

Organizers expect to have 15,000 chemical toilets operating by the time young people arrive. That's about one per 100 people — not ideal, but the best the city can do, officials say.

Youths are being encouraged to spend most of the time at the meadow site, since Rome is hardly equipped to handle such a huge crowd. Many will camp out there, and they'd be wise to bring a pair of binoculars: Some sections of the field are more than a mile away from the papal altar.

For that reason, 12 giant video screens will be planted throughout the crowd — something Woodstock never had. ▼

Sponsor a Child at a Catholic Mission. It's Affordable!

Little Maria lives in a village in Guatemala in a two-room house with a tin roof and dirt floors. Her father struggles to support the family as a day laborer. Can you help a poor child like Maria? Become a sponsor today!

Your opportunity to help a very poor child is much too important to miss. And Christian Foundation for Children and Aging (CFCA), an international Catholic sponsorship program can show you the affordable way.

Through CFCA you sponsor a child for the amount you can afford. Ordinarily it takes $20 a month to provide one poor child with the life-changing benefits of sponsorship. But if this is not possible for you, we invite you to sponsor at a level you can afford (minimum $10). CFCA will see to it from other donations and the tireless efforts of our missionary partners that your child receives the same benefits as other sponsored children.

Your sponsorship pledge helps provide a poor child at a Catholic mission site with nourishing food, medical care, the chance to go to school – whatever is needed most. You can literally change a life!

And you can be assured your pledge has its greatest impact because our programs are directed by dedicated Catholic missionaries with a long-standing commitment to the people they serve.

To help build your relationship, you receive a picture of your child, information about your child's family and country, letters from your child and the CFCA newsletter. But most important, you receive the satisfaction of helping a poor child!

"I'm delighted to be CFCA's 100,000th sponsor . . . and I invite you to join me."

Archbishop James P. Keleher, Kansas City, Kansas – sponsors José Muños of Honduras.

Southern Catholic Conference focuses on Jubilee spirituality

By GRETCHEN KEISER
THE GEORGIA BULLETIN

ATLANTA—"It will begin with this sound," said the speaker, rapping her knuckles loudly on the podium several times.

"With a knocking at midnight on Christmas Eve in the city of Rome," Maria Harris continued. "The whole world will be attuned to the knocking on the Holy Door in Rome."

Speaking to approximately 1,300 people who teach in Catholic schools and parishes in Georgia, North and South Carolina, Harris described the Great Jubilee Year 2000, which will begin Christmas Eve, as "a powerful gift for all of us."

"We are called to celebrate it, but first we are called to the Scriptures of the jubilee," said Harris, who teaches Catholic religious education at the university and college level and has written several books on jubilee spirituality.

"You discover celebrating the jubilee does not come first. On the way to celebrating the jubilee there are five jubilee commandments ... You are to let the land lie fallow; you are to forgive debts; you are to set free the prisoners, especially children; you are to do justice; you are to throw the party of your lives ... to sing and to dance in the streets. It is a time of jubilee."

The keynote speaker at the Southern Catholic Conference '99 encouraged teachers from Catholic schools and religious education classrooms in the Province of Atlanta to apply the jubilee teachings found in St. Luke's Gospel and in the Books of Leviticus and Isaiah within their school environments. The Jubilee Year begins when Pope John Paul II opens the Holy Door at St. Peter's Basilica on Christmas Eve 1999 and closes on Epiphany 2001.

"Think about the possibilities of teaching the spirituality of the jubilee," Harris said in her talk Oct. 8 at St. Pius X High School, Atlanta, where the two-day Southern Catholic Conference was held.

The commandment that the Jubilee Year is meant to be a sabbath, or resting time for the land, means teachers need to "cultivate stillness and quiet" in their classrooms and create "the kind of classrooms where kids get the sense 'I'm really valued. There is something safe about this place.'"

"Attend to this," Harris urged. "Create an environment where people can work soft, not hard ... Let the land lie fallow. Let the kids lie fallow."

Forgiveness of the international debt of 36 poor nations in sub-Saharan Africa is being considered by the United States for the Jubilee Year, Harris said, "in order to feed the children" in those countries with funds that would otherwise go toward the interest on the debt.

Teachers face the challenge of forgiving individual students every day for disruptions they cause or because their personalities are hard to handle, Harris said. But she encouraged teachers to send students home every day with gestures of acceptance.

"Forgiveness is never easy ... Every day it must be fought for and prayed for and struggled for and won," she said.

When Jesus began his public ministry, in the synagogue in Nazareth, he read from Isaiah, chapter 61, about the year of the Lord's favor, Harris said, and about comforting those who mourn and giving them a garland instead of ashes.

"Even in our classrooms, there are children whose lives are filled with ashes," Harris said. "Give that child the oil of gladness. Give that child a mantle of praise instead of a faint spirit ... Isaiah says the spirit of the Lord anoints us to do that work."

The call to free prisoners during the Jubilee Year can be applied to children, she said. "We must care for the freedom of children ... Make sure they have enough nutrition, enough health care, enough education."

The speaker affirmed the profession of teaching and the teachers who sat before her in rows of chairs and in the bleachers of the St. Pius gymnasium.

"If you work with children, take a bow," she said, "because you are doing the work of jubilee."

The theme of the conference, "Celebrating the Jubilee," was set by the talk of the keynote speaker, who addressed participants both Friday and Saturday morning and also gave several workshops on the topic of the Jubilee Year. On both days, partici-

New McCourt memoir is no 'Angela's Ashes'

By JOSEPH R. THOMAS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

"'Tis," simply put, 'tisn't.

Which is to say that Frank McCourt's second memoir (Scribner, $26) isn't the equal of "Angela's Ashes," his Pulitzer Prize-winning account of growing up poor in Ireland. The Child of Poverty has evolved into the Organ Grinder, shaking his tin cup of Irish stereotypes as much for the entertainment of the masses as for anything else.

Additionally, the suspicion arises that, for McCourt, "'Tis," which takes up his story on his return to America at age 18, serves as a confession of sorts, a kind of public substitute for the private confession he could never bring himself to make despite a claimed longing to do so.

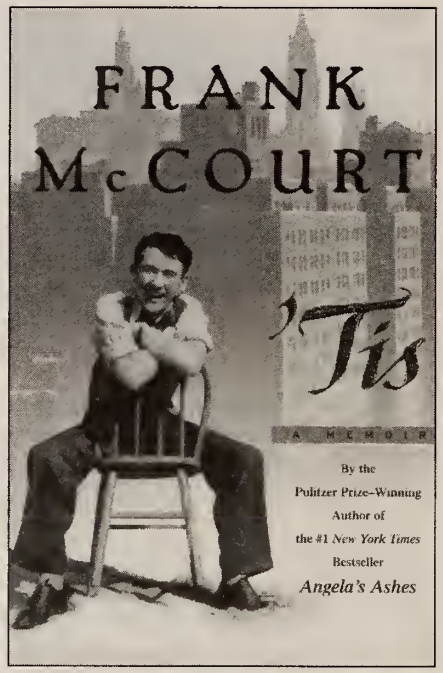
For instance, of a visit to Limerick in the uniform of an American soldier, he writes: "I sit in silent churches to look at altars, pulpits, confessionals, I'd like to know how many Masses I attended, how many sermons frightened the life out of me, how many priests were shocked by my sins before I gave up going to confession altogether. I know I'm doomed the way I am, though I'd confess to a kindly priest if I could find one."

It's a sentiment he repeats several times, weaving a sense of guilt, exaggeration, Irish anti-clericalism and poor theology into the whimsical but whiny tapestry that is the sum of "'Tis."

McCourt's portrait of himself on his arrival in New York in 1949 is that of an unknowing bumpkin, a charming lad and a quite willing pub companion, guilt-ridden and sexually repressed and doomed to hell for his sins because he had the misfortune of being born Catholic rather than Jewish or Protestant, although the aura of blarney seems evident in some of this.

Continuing to struggle with poverty (some of it surely stemming from his willingness to take his recreation in New York's Irish bars), he finds his salvation in a love for books and education. His professors seemingly are anti-Catholic, his co-workers are bigots as often as not, his landlords are pinch-pennies and he's filled with self-pity because his eyes are red-rimmed, his teeth are rotten, he is lonely, and girls — especially effervescent, book-carrying college girls — ignore him.

Still, McCourt does know how to make a point. His accounts of the prejudice he encounters (prejudice directed not so much at him as at other minorities), of the life of the newcomer, of the challenge of teaching in city schools, and of the tug of nostalgia all ring with authenticity, although the accounts are but an echo of stories told by countless others — original insights not being McCourt's strong point.



'Tis
By Frank McCourt
(Scribner, $26)

What gives "'Tis" its appeal — and it is appealing — is the manner of the telling rather than the substance. Even so, his style, comprised as it is of exaggerations, embellishments and run-on sentences humorously linking unrelated components, wears thin after awhile, the superficiality of it all being covered with a veneer of Irish wit while failing to mask unnecessary reliance on vulgarisms and the use of faux-quaint euphemisms to gloss over sexual struggles and desires.

Here, in a rumination about things religious, is an example of the McCourt style:

"Fifth Avenue is nearly deserted except for people making their way to St. Patrick's Cathedral to save their souls, mostly old women. ... When the priest dispenses Communion the pews empty and I envy the people coming back down the aisles with the

I'm hurrying across the parking lot toward the home improvement superstore, thinking about paint colors and door hardware and room dimensions. I am imagining a newly refurbished house, understated but elegant, free at last of the ugly fixtures and worn carpet and dingy paint. I am not expecting a spiritual challenge.

Intent on crossing the busy parking lot, I'm surprised when the young man in the blue jeans and T-shirt steps in front of me. I swerve slightly to avoid a collision, but he mirrors my swerve and smiles ingratiatingly.

"Sir," he says confidently, "could you help me and my girlfriend?"

Huh? What's this got to do with brass hinges vs. painted, quarry tile vs. carpet? Barely breaking stride, I mumble, "No, not today," then, incongruously, "Thanks," and go inside.

Standing in the plywood aisle a minute later, I shake my head. "Thanks?" I mutter to myself. "Duh!" I launch my search for the items I need.

Twenty minutes later, approaching the exit, I remember the man asking for help. The refrain from a song based on this Sunday's Gospel passes through my memory: "Whatsoever you do to the least of my brothers, that you do unto me." I take a dollar from my wallet and put it in my pocket, ready this time. But the man needing help isn't there.

Matthew's Gospel tells us that at the end of the day, the issue won't be whether or not the man was truly in need or just a scoundrel who preferred begging to work. The issue will be how deep our instinct to generosity goes, how ingrained our impulse to give has become over a lifetime of practice. Judgment will turn on how we perform the crucial Christian task of looking for the face of Jesus, especially in the faces of those who present us with the opportunity to share our gifts.

Questions:

Where do I have opportunities to share my gifts with people in need? What's one time in my life when the presence of Christ has become evident to me in the need of another?

"For I was hungry and you gave me food, I was thirsty and you gave me drink. I was a stranger and you welcomed me, naked and you clothed me. I was ill and you comforted me, in prison and you came to visit me."
— Matthew 25:35-36

John Logan's fictional account of Welles filming "Citizen Kane" plays hard and fast

By HENRY HERX
Catholic News Service

NEW YORK (CNS) — Providing a fictional account of how Orson Welles filmed "Citizen Kane" despite William Randolph Hearst's opposition is the overheated dramatization, "RKO 281," being repeated Tuesday, Nov. 23, 8-9:30 p.m. EST on the HBO pay cable channel.

Scriptwriter John Logan plays hard and fast with the facts and fables about the Welles classic film that was assigned the production number 281 by RKO Studios.

With James Cromwell as Hearst, John Malkovich as scriptwriter Herman Mankiewicz and Liev Schreiber as Welles, the cast is better than the story.

Directed by Benjamin Ross, the bankrupt Hearst is presented as delusional while his dim mistress, Marion Davies (Melanie Griffith), whines about everything.

The worst thing about this scenario is its picture of Jewish studio heads panicking over Hearst's threat to expose Hollywood as a hotbed of immorality and run by Jews.

Though this kind of baloney isn't very interesting, the production has lush sets and plenty of art deco furnishings.

As usual with pay-cable movies, the dialogue is awash in four-letter expletives and profanity as well as sexual references. ▼

Don't go to 'Dogma' for the theology, theologian advises

By MARK PATTISON
Catholic News Service

WASHINGTON (CNS) — According to a theologian at The Catholic University of America, there's precious little theological insight in the new movie "Dogma."

"There so little in the way of theology there," said Benedictine Father James Wiseman. He attended a critics' screening in Washington of the film, which was scheduled to open nationwide Nov. 12.

Writer-director Kevin Smith, who also appears in the movie, "obviously remembers a lot of stuff from his grade school days" and has thrown it all into the film, Father Wiseman told Catholic News Service.

"Dogma" focuses on the efforts of two angels (Matt Damon and Ben Affleck), long ago kicked out of heaven, who try to get back using a so-called loophole in Catholic dogma — a plenary indulgence.

Father Wiseman said people discussed plenary indulgences "a lot more in that time (of Smith's childhood) than you do today."

According to the plot, if the angels get back to heaven via the loophole, it proves that God's not perfect and existence would come to an end. The plot device, Father Wiseman said, is "off the scale, totally off the scale."

Chosen to stop the angels' scheme is a Catholic who works at an abortion clinic (Linda Fiorentino) and who is a descendant of Jesus since — in the movie's version of reality — Jesus had brothers and sisters.

Among the other imponderables in the plot are a 13th apostle named Rufus played by comedian Chris Rock and a female God played by rock singer Alanis Morissette.

God doesn't show up until the movie's end because, according to the film, he likes to come to Earth on occasion incognito to play skee-ball. But when badly beaten by three of Satan's minions, he languishes in a hospital near death, and heaven's emissaries don't know where God has gone. Fiorentino's character has to take him off artificial life support so God in human form can die and stop the angels' plan by returning in divine form.

Chris Rock, Jason Mewes and Salma Hayek star in the film "Dogma." The U.S. Catholic Conference classification is O — morally offensive. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is R — restricted.

The Catholic League for Religious and Civil Rights has been an early and vocal opponent of "Dogma" since league officials saw one version of the script earlier this year. The league organized a protest Oct. 4 in New York, where the movie was being shown as part of a film festival.

Father Wiseman, editor of the journal Monastic Interreligious Dialogue, said that he doesn't think "it would be injurious to faith" if a Catholic saw "Dogma." It is possible, he added, that a non-Catholic could come away with erroneous impressions about the church after having seen it.

A long disclaimer at the start of "Dogma" calls the movie a "comedic fantasy," while reminding viewers that "passing judgment is reserved for God and God alone."

But Father Wiseman wasn't buying the disclaimer. "I don't believe that. I thought they were trying to avoid criticism," he said.

He said scenes of mass killing in the film were insensitive, "especially in view of the shootings at Columbine (High School in Colorado) and Conyers, Ga."

And an early scene which showed a cardinal (George Carlin) dispatching the traditional crucifix representation of Jesus in favor of a sendup of the Sacred Heart statue called "Buddy Christ" was "very, very insensitive," Father Wiseman said.

One line in the movie — "The Catholic Church makes no mistakes!" — received generous laughter from much of the audience at the screening.

"To think that some people in the auditorium were belly-laughing at some of this stuff," he remarked. "They themselves are insensitive to genuine values."

The priest also noted that Pope John Paul II has called for the church to recognize and apologize for its failures during the first 2,000 years of Christianity.

The U.S. Catholic Conference Office for Film and Broadcasting gave "Dogma" a classification of O — morally offensive — for "anti-religious japes, some intense violence, sexual references, substance abuse, assorted vulgarities, profanity and recurring rough language."

Henry Herx, director of the office, in a review called "Dogma" a "sophomoric religious satire" whose plot hinges on a "false understanding of an indulgence as effecting the forgiveness of sins." ▼ wafers in their mouths and the holy look that tells you they're in a state of grace. They can go home now and have the big breakfast and if they fall dead while eating sausages and eggs they go straight to heaven. I'd like to make my peace with God but my sins are so terrible any priest would drive me from the confessional ..."

In "'Tis," McCourt takes us leisurely through his 29th birthday, his college graduation and his City Hall marriage, and then hurriedly through the birth of his daughter, the breakup of his marriage (like his father, he walks out) and then the deaths of his parents. That brings us to the mid-1980's, before his second marriage and his debut as a literary lion and suggests another volume is in the offing — for better or worse. ▼

The Pope Speaks

POPE JOHN PAUL II

Pope returns to Rome, hopes pastoral seed will bear fruit in Asia

By JOHN THAVIS
Catholic News Service

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope John Paul II, back from a five-day trip to Asia, said he hoped the pastoral seeds planted during his visit will bear fruit in the years to come.

The pope made the remarks from his apartment window Nov. 10 to several hundred pilgrims gathered in St. Peter's Square. The Vatican announced before the trip that the pope would not hold his regular weekly general audience that day.

The pope said he was able to share the hopes and expectations with numerous Asian bishops during his stay in New Delhi, India, where he unveiled a document on the future of evangelization on the continent.

In Georgia, he said, he visited the small Catholic community and was cordially welcomed by Georgian Orthodox Patriarch Ilia II, to whom he offered a special thanks. He also expressed appreciation to civil leaders of both countries.

"I ask you, dear brothers and sisters, to join me in asking God to make fruitful the seeds planted during this apostolic trip," he said.

The pope appeared in relatively good condition during his brief appearance. Many Italians were concerned about the pope's health after TV networks repeatedly broadcast images from a meeting in Georgia Nov. 8, in which the pope, his body shaking uncontrollably, was steadied by an aide.

Vatican spokesman Joaquin Navarro-Valls said the cold weather in Georgia had triggered the shaking, and that the pope's condition was good. For several years, the pope has suffered from a nervous system disorder generally believed to be Parkinson's disease. A constant tremor in his hand is now sometimes evident in his arm and leg, while his speech has become less distinct and mobility more difficult.

The day after the pope was shown shaking intensely, he appeared in good form celebrating a morning Mass in Tbilisi and later that day bantered with nuns at a church in the city.

Pope celebrates memorial Mass for deceased cardinals, bishops

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — During an annual memorial Mass for deceased cardinals, archbishops and bishops, Pope John Paul II underscored Christian teaching that death means passage to new life. Among the deceased prelates the pope prayed for by name was Cardinal George Basil Hume of Westminster, England. "Faith infuses in us the consoling certainty that death is a passage to eternal life," the pope said during the liturgy Nov. 12 in St. Peter's Basilica. "I dearly remember, in particular, the venerable Cardinals Carlos Oviedo Cavada (of Santiago, Chile), Raul Silva Henriquez (also of Santiago) and George Basil Hume," the pope said. "In their apostolic activity founded on faith and in their attentive pastoral service, they turned their gaze well beyond the earth's limits by hoping in the Lord," he said.

Giving thanks in the wake of the storm

Even at the time I remember thinking to myself how really stupid it was for me to have climbed up those stairs and to have walked across the scorched floorboards to retrieve that small satchel of memorabilia from under her bed. The smell was overwhelming and the passage made even more difficult because the apartment was in near total darkness, with the only light coming from the gaping hole in the roof used by the firefighters to fight the flames. I just wanted to help. Actually, I needed to help. I needed to do something as my sister stood outside the building looking at what was once her home. A small natural disaster, lightening, had destroyed five apartments in her building.

It wasn't just I who helped her out. Countless family members, co-workers and friends lent their time and effort to help her begin to reassemble her life. Insurance helped her replace the stuff in her apartment, but the people in her life helped her recreate her home.

I am especially reminded of this event from my past as I have been privileged to work in the area of disaster relief. We have all certainly heard or read countless accounts of the suffering resulting from Hurricane Floyd. An estimated 40,000 homes were damaged and nearly 50 people lost their lives. The monetary damage estimates alone are in the billions.

When the breath of destruction became clear, my office received numerous calls from individuals and parishes willing to send volunteers and supplies immediately. So many felt the need to help.

With money being the donation preferred by relief agencies during the early stages of floods, a call went out to our parishes and schools requesting help in raising funds to assist those impacted by Hurricane Floyd. The total raised from thousands of parishioners, school students and benefactors currently stands at $260,146.34. When you consider that just last November Catholics in the Diocese of Charlotte contributed $251,526.40 to hurricane relief, it's easy to see that this pattern of generosity is part of the life of our church community here in western North Carolina.

Unfortunately, the real impact of Hurricane Floyd is now being felt. As homes in eastern North Carolina have begun to dry out, teams are being recruited from parishes to help cleanup or demolish homes. The aftermath of the storm is expected to be felt well into 2000. I am confident that our generosity will continue.

Finally, the picture of our diocesan disaster relief to Hurricane Floyd is by no means complete unless we recognize the important role which prayer played in our responsiveness. In prayer we offered up to God our solidarity with the homeless, the wounded, the grieving and the marginalized.

With Thanksgiving approaching, I wish to express sincere gratitude to you on behalf of those who benefit from your generosity. You won't know their names or recognize their faces but you can be assured that Thanksgivings and Christmas 1999 will be remembered in their lives not just for the losses but also for the gain of support, prayer and fellowship with their friends in western North Carolina.

In defense of Pius XII

"What is truth?" Pilate once asked the Lord. Many are asking that question today as a book claiming that Pope Pius XII was "Hitler's Pope" is on its way to becoming a best seller. The author, British journalist John Cornwell, alleges that the man who was pope during Hitler's regime was anti-Semitic and therefore silent during the Holocaust carried out to exterminate the Jews. What is the truth?

One nun is trying to answer that question, offering her firsthand historical research, which she completed long before Cornwell's book appeared. She is Sister Margherita Marchione, of the order of the Religious Teachers Filippini, a Fulbright scholar, professor emeritus of Italian language and literature at Fairleigh Dickinson University in New Jersey and author of 30 books. Her greatest honor, she says, is to have been called "the defender of Pius XII."

This dynamic 77-year-old nun spoke at my parish, St. Marguerite Bourgeoys in Brookfield, Conn. My parish priests invited her because they knew she had documented the efforts of Pius XII and the Italian people to rescue Jews from the Nazis during World War II.

Her book, "Yours Is a Precious Witness, Memoirs of Jews and Catholics in Wartime Italy," was published by Paulist Press in 1996. It is must reading for anyone seeking the truth about the allegations against this pope who served in such treacherous times.

Sister Marchione told us the "lies about Pius XII" began in 1963 with the play "The Deputy," by Rolf Hochhuth. She called the play a fiction that was contradicted by the testimony of survivors.

She told the audience at St. Marguerite's that considerable defense of the pope came from the Jewish people themselves. She said Jewish scholar Jeno Levai testified at Nazi war-crime trials that the bishops of the Catholic Church "intervened again and again on the instructions of the pope. The one person who did more than anyone else to halt the dreadful crime and alleviate its consequences is today made the scapegoat for the failures of others."

Sister Marchione credits Pius with having saved the lives of thousands of Jewish men, women and children from 1943 to 1945. With the urging of the Vatican, at the risk of their own lives, priests and nuns opened their convents and monasteries to hide Jews. Her own order concealed 114 Jewish neighbors in three convents in Rome. Sister Marchione said while some Italians were Nazi collaborators, many more were compassionate friends to the Jews. Although two-thirds of Europe's Jewish population was killed, about 85 percent of the Italian Jewish population survived the war, she said.

In truth, Pius despised Hitler and the Nazis, she said. Still, too many remain unsatisfied that he didn't "speak out" enough to denounce the atrocities against the Jews. Yet, even one of his severest critics, Belgian historian Leon Papeleux, acknowledges: "It is indisputable; Pius XII felt himself impaled on the horns of a terrible dilemma: to speak out with no certainty that this would halt the crimes and with the risk of worsening the victims' fate; or to remain silent and risk the impression that the highest authority was covering the crimes with his silence."

Sister Marchione's final message was that Cornwell's book is "fiction," with a "real object of destroying the papacy and the church." She challenged us to make known the truth about Pius XII.

Thanks, again

The following quote is more than a hundred years old, but still holds true today: "The year that is drawing toward its close, has been filled with the blessings of fruitful fields and healthful skies. To these bounties, which are so constantly enjoyed that we are prone to forget the source from which they come, others have been added, which are of so extraordinary a nature that they cannot fail to penetrate and soften even the heart which is habitually insensible to the ever watchful providence of Almighty God."

A deep appreciation of God's blessings is obvious in these lines. Perhaps so much so that we might be excused for thinking the author spoke at a time of general tranquility and personal contentment. But not so. They are the first words of Abraham Lincoln's presidential proclamation for Thanksgiving in 1863 "in the midst of a civil war of unequaled magnitude and severity."

He knew the carnage, the hatred, the grief that was tearing apart the people of the United States. He knew his own private failures, disappointments and loss, including the deaths of his two young sons. Still, Lincoln was able to recognize blessings of no small significance: the continued peace with other nations, the preservation of civil order, the prosperity of business and industry.

"They are the gracious gifts of the Most High God," he wrote, adding, "It has seemed to me fit and proper that they should be solemnly, reverently, and gratefully acknowledged as with one heart and one voice by the whole American People." So a Thursday in November was set aside as a day of "Thanksgiving and Praise."

The actual idea — and urging — to proclaim such a day came from Sarah Hale, a magazine editor and champion of higher education for women. Some individual states, especially in New England, had occasionally observed a thanksgiving day earlier in our history based on the tradition of the Pilgrims and the Wampanoag tribe feasting together and popularly considered the "First Thanksgiving." Although, the practice of setting aside a day, particularly around harvest time, to celebrate and offer thanks to the Creator, is an ancient one. Not until the 1940's did it become a permanent national American holiday.

What Abraham Lincoln and all who celebrate Thanksgiving share in common is a recognition of our dependence on Divine Providence. It's not hard to be grateful for the good things we have been given. But can we appreciate everything that is part of our lives, including all that is painful and hard to bear, let alone manage to say "Thank You, God?" The answer is "Yes." It is exactly what we are asked to do.

God deserves thanksgiving not just when we feel content and happy with life, but when we don't understand and can't control our circumstances. Gratitude is an expression of our faith, opening our souls to God's grace and peace. More than that, I am convinced that a grateful heart is a happy heart.

In his first letter to the Thessalonians, Paul said, "Always seek to do good to one another and to all. Rejoice always, pray without ceasing, give thanks in all circumstances; for this is the will of God."

This Thanksgiving Day, "do good to one another." Thank the people around you and thank God. And don't forget to do it again the day after Thanksgiving, as well.

Coping with abusive In-Laws

Q. We have beeu married for 15 years aud have five children. I couverted to Catholicism early iu my marriage, and we are raisiug our children as Catholics. My husband's family goes to Mass daily, and their home is filled with religious articles. But when they come to visit, they use foul language, are hateful, and treat us and our friends horribly.

Through the years I've kept my smile, welcomed them and have always been cordial. But every visit ends with them exploding into a rage. I take the children out of earshot and pray daily for everyone to be civil. But it becomes more and more difficult as their behavior gets more bizarre.

Is there a Catholic program, Bible study or anything else my husband can direct them (and me) to in order to come to peace with this situation? It is sad.

My husband doesn't confront them when they are abusive. He remains "neutral" and caters to them until they feel he is doing what they want, which usually means neglecting me and the children in some way. He defends his action by saying he must honor his parents first and foremost, and to confront them would disrespect them. Any help for us?

A. Judging only from what you have told me, I doubt that there is any way you or he will change his parents. They could, and should, arrange for serious counseling, but they apparently feel they don't need it, and you cannot make them.

You and your husband, however, also could use some good help to deal healthily with a very hurtful circumstance in your lives. Perhaps he would be more open to such help if he realized that what he is doing has nothing to do with genuine respect and love for his parents.

First of all, his highest responsibility now is to his wife and children. Concern for them must take first priority, especially when they are being psychologically abused, as is happening here.

It needs to be repeated often that enabling someone to continue abusing other people is not love. Your husband's catering to them, allowing them to maneuver him and the rest of your family by their hostility, is no favor to them.

If he loves them, he will not allow them to further demean and injure themselves by succeeding in their angry attempts to manipulate your family. And if he loves you, it is not right for him to cooperate with their abuse by appealing to some wrong idea of respect for parents.

One reason I'm using your letter is that your situation is unfortunately not uncommon. In-laws, parents, spouses and children too often do great harm to the perpetrator of abuse as well as to the victims because of a misplaced and dangerous sense of loyalty and love.

Again, deliberately permitting someone to continue mistreating and hurting another is never an act of affection or love for anyone involved.

Mass in Transit

Q. Can you tell us where to learn the times of Masses in other cities? We've been told there is a number to call, but none of our friends knows about it.

A. A group called Mass in Transit has this information. It's a great service, available 24 hours a day. Their phone number is 800-627-7846. You must have the zip code of where you are going, which you can obtain from the post office. You will receive the name of the church, phone number, address and times of Sunday and weekday Masses.

The Joy of Advent

Advent: A joyful anticipation

During my years in the seminary, I came to a fuller understanding and appreciation of the liturgical year and the appropriate postures of the different seasons. Since I returned to the "real world" of parish life, I have tried to convey to the faithful our Catholic liturgical tradition.

Advent is, perhaps, one of the more challenging seasons to understand and live. For example, I remember that on the first Sunday of Advent a few years ago, I preached a homily on the need for preparation andpatience as we await the celebration. That apparently did not sway one sincere parishioner who greeted me after Mass with "Merry Christmas, Father Mark." My reply was, "Not yet, Happy Advent."

The word Advent comes from the Latin word adventus which means "arrival." It was originally a secular term used to describe the arrival of the emperor. For Christians, the accent of the season is on preparation. During the four weeks, we reflect on the prophesies of the Old Testament as our forefathers in faith longedd for the coming Messiah. In hope, we prepare our hearts to celebrate the joy and mystery of the Incarnation of our Savior, the Divine Son on Christmas.

Advent is also the time when we reflect on our readiness to meet the Lord when he returns in glory. This is the focus of the Gospel passage for the first Sunday of Advent. Jesus challenges his followers to, "Be constantly on the watch! Stay Awake! You do not know when the appointed time will come!" [Mk. 13,33]

Advent is a time of joyful anticipation. It is a period of preparation and waiting. Remember that according to our liturgical year, Christmas begins with the first vigil Mass on December 24 and lasts through the Feast of the Baptism of our Lord on January 9. Christmas is not a day but a season. I trust that all of you realize that our liturgical year is somewhat counter-cultural.

The society in which we live has already begun to celebrate Christmas and many will end on Christmas day, perhaps from shear exhaustion.

We may ask ourselves how we may prepare for the celebration of Christmas and the beginning of the Great Jubilee. My sugggestions are for families to spend some time together in prayer. It may be a good time to reflect on the Sunday readings, to give thanks for blessings and to participate in some charitable outreach. Most parishes and missions will offer the opportunity to celebrate God's mercy and peace during a Communal Penance Service. Our spiritual preparation is paramount. This does not have to be a season of fighting crowds at malls and constant activity. Remember that the spirit of Advent is hope and joyful anticipation.

pants were able to select from over 100 workshops taught by master catechists, youth and young adult ministers, or Catholic school educators on a wide variety of topics. Four workshop sessions were offered throughout each day. At lunchtime, those attending could talk to their peers, visit exhibits or join discussion tables set up around particular topics of interest with a facilitator.

Kathy Wolf, archdiocesan director of religious education, who coordinated the provincial conference, said the conference was the first held in Atlanta since 1994. It attracted a total of 1,300 people, with approximately 1,100 attending on Friday and approximately 750 attending on Saturday. Some participants attended both days.

In addition to Harris, a featured presenter was Donna Peña, a bilingual musician and liturgist, who led workshops and also gave a concert at Immaculate Heart of Mary Church, Atlanta, on Oct. 8.

"It is very important that the Catholic Church be a church of diversity and a church of more than one language," Peña said in a workshop on bilingual liturgy. "Even though English is the language spoken in America, Spanish is quickly coming along. The future of the church is going to be in the Spanish language. It is very important that the church come along with that. We should all become comfortable with that."

Playing her guitar and leading workshop participants in bilingual liturgical music, Peña encouraged them to help congregations sing the parts of the Mass in both Spanish and English.

Bilingual music is available through publishers GIA in Chicago and Oregon Catholic Press, she said, and the Lutheran publisher, Augsburg Fortress, has produced a new all Spanish hymnal, which can be an additional resource. Peña also recommended the World Library missalette for its presentation of Spanish and English translations.

St. Paul of the Cross parishioner Frances Kennedy, who is in the parish choir and works with the youth choir, said she was looking for bilingual music.

"We have a group of Hispanics within our community," said the Atlanta parishioner. "We have taken familiar parts of the Mass and used them in different languages," particularly on Pentecost Sunday.

In two workshops, Jim McGinnis, founder of the Institute of Peace and Justice in St. Louis and author of materials for families, schools and parishes on these topics, offered practical strategies for teaching students how to resolve conflicts without violence.

With dozens of participants offering ideas, the workshop discussed providing a "peace table" in classrooms where students learn to negotiate and "where you use words and not fists" to resolve disagreements. One middle school, McGinnis said, has a special flag that is raised every day the school is "fight-free" so students develop peer pressure for that atmosphere to continue in the school.

He said that in touring schools in India modeled on Gandhi's nonviolence, "every one had a vegetable and flower garden. The kids learned how to grow food. They were learning to appreciate life, how to tend life and nurture it. It has a powerful effect," McGinnis said. "A place of beauty can be used to gentle down. Beauty gentles. Trees and gardens make a difference."

He also spoke in his workshops of the need to prepare children to live in a world that is multi-racial and multicultural. "We probably grew up in a mono-cultural world," he said. "We are the bridge generation."

Sts. Peter and Paul School Principal Queen Grady said she found the keynote speaker and the workshops valuable for her work as a teacher and administrator.

"It has been a wonderful day," said the Decatur school principal. "The keynote speaker and this (workshop) —because we are focusing on nonviolence in all our schools. We are teaching our kids to be peacemakers. We try to be peacemakers ourselves in relating to one another."

Grady said the emphasis on verbal and non-verbal communication was relevant to her work.

"Students, teachers, parents-everyone wants to feel important" in the life of the school, she said. "It is our challenge to make them feel that way. When you set a positive environment in a school, you feel it the minute you step in."

Conference planners overall received positive feedback, Wolf said. "St. Pius High School was a wonderful host. They made my job easier."

"The overall feedback has been very, very positive," she said, particularly on the caliber of the speakers and workshop presenters, the planning, organization and punctuality of all the sessions. Coming together as Catholic school teachers and religious educators in the province "helps us to realize a lot of people are working together to pass on the faith to young people," Wolf said. ▼

Father West addressed the pilgrims during his homily: "The purpose of a pilgrimage is to move closer to God, and the primary purpose of this trip to the shrine is to do more for God. We have today, in the image of the Shrine of the Immaculate Conception, a sign of God's grace before us. Mary said 'yes' to God, and we must also willingly accept what God asks of us."

A chorus of amens was heard during the homily, throughout the Mass and during the individual Prayers of the Faithful spoken aloud. Some people began to weep, so overcome with emotion during the closing song "Sign Me Up," as Mae Culbert, from Our Lady of Consolation Church, spontaneously led the song in her soprano voice.

Clarence and Marie Malveaux from St. Gabriel Church in Charlotte both found that the trip renewed their faith as Catholics.

"I was born and raised Catholic but never had the full knowledge that I have gained today. I know where I come from, and I know where I am going now that I better understand the depth of my religion," said Mrs. Malveaux.

"I also enjoyed learning the knowledge that the Catholic faith offers. The importance of visiting the Our Mother of Africa Chapel is important in order to appreciate our heritage, where we come from, and the progress we have made through the years," added Mr. Malveaux.

On Sunday, the group joined the congregation at St. Augustine Church, the oldest African-American church in Washington, D.C., for a rousing and spiritual Mass featuring the youth choir.

"I have lived a long time, and this is the first pilgrimage I have been on. I am 76 years old, and the older I get, the more I know I have to give God praise and thanks," said James Bingley from St. James Church in Concord. "Our people have had a lot of faith in the past. Now, we have to have twice as much in order to hold the race together."

For four sisters, the trip was a joyful yet solemn reminder of their mother. Thomasina Carr, Clara Patterson, Dolores Manigo, and Helen Johnson, parishioners of Our Lady of Consolation Church, reflected on the passing of their mother while on the trip.

"This trip has really brought her to mind because I know how much she would have loved to have been a part of this pilgrimage," said Johnson. "The trip itself has been such an inspiration and has reminded me of how she taught us to be good Catholics."

Herb and Mary Pahren, parishioners at St. John the Baptist in Tryon, had been to the shrine 44 years ago during their honeymoon trip. They summed up the feelings of the majority of those who traveled to the shrine: "The Blessed Mother is the patronness of the United States, and the United States is a melting pot of all cultures, and this shrine shows the religious significance of each culture. ▼

Court takes case involving prayer at high school games

By Nancy Hartnagel
Catholic News Service

WASHINGTON (CNS) — The U.S. Supreme Court Nov. 15 agreed to hear an appeal in a Texas case that will decide whether student-led prayer before public school football games violates the constitutional separation of church and state.

The case, Santa Fe Independent School District vs. Doe, involves a suburban Houston school district and two families — one Catholic and one Mormon — who in 1995 sued the school district over its policies regarding prayer.

Anthony Griffin, the Galveston attorney representing the families, said the original lawsuit was prompted by the parents' unhappiness over "a series of incidents" in a predominantly Baptist school environment that discriminated against their children.

Speaking by phone Nov. 16 with Catholic News Service, Griffin said one of the Mormon children had asked a teacher about attending a Baptist revival that was announced in school.

"She was told, basically, 'you can't come, your religion is a cult,'" he said.

He also said the Catholic parents objected to their children's public school, in effect, teaching religion and "having prayers every morning."

After the parents complained about morning prayers, he said, one of their children was taken to sit on the school steps during prayer time and then was returned to the classroom.

Griffin noted that pre-football prayer was just one of several issues in "a wide-ranging pattern" that prompted the lawsuit.

In 1995, four students were involved in the case, he said. Currently, two students are involved because the other two have graduated from high school.

According to local press reports in Texas, the school district's policies allowed students to deliver any "message" or "invocation" over the public address system at home football games and to lead prayers at graduation ceremonies.

A federal judge ruled in December 1996 that these policies were permissible only if students were told by school officials to keep their messages or prayers "nonsectarian and non-proselytizing."

But, both school officials and the students' families challenged that ruling.

Last February, a three-judge panel of the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans agreed in part with the federal judge's ruling, but found that student-led prayers at public high school football games are unconstitutional.

The appeals court panel said in a 2-1 decision that football games are "hardly the sober type of annual event that can be appropriately solemnized with prayer."

This ruling was upheld in April by a 9-7 vote of the full court.

In deciding to hear the school district's appeal, the Supreme Court limited its review to the issue of prayers at football games.

"I think it's amazing that now the only issue left in the case is football," Griffin told CNS. "The 5th Circuit opinion is some 40 pages long. Football was discussed in two paragraphs," he noted.

He said arguments in the case likely will be heard this term, after additional briefs have been filed by both sides. A decision could come by late June.

In his brief to the Supreme Court, Griffin wrote, "The fact that graduation prayer or prayer before footballs games is led by students does not diminish the pressure to religious conformity. If anything, it may increase it."

Commenting on the Supreme Court action, an official of the American Center for Law and Justice in Virginia Beach, Va., called the case "a critical free speech case."

Jay Sekulow, chief counsel of the public interest law firm, said in a Nov. 15 statement, "The decision today to hear the case clearly puts the issue of student-led and student-initiated prayer squarely before the Supreme Court.

"This is a critical free speech case that has national implications in every school district in America."

The high court's last major school-prayer ruling — Lee vs. Weisman in 1992 — barred clergy-led prayers, including invocations and benedictions, at public school graduation ceremonies. ▼

Fire In The Mountains focuses on internalizing the faith

By Joanita M. Nellenbach
Correspondent

So I opened my mouth, and he gave me the scroll to eat. He said to me, Mortal, eat this scroll that I give you and fill your stomach with it. I ate it; and in my mouth it was as sweet as honey. (Ezekiel 3:2-3)

CLYDE - Internalizing the word of God - that was the idea behind Fire in the Mountains '99, held Nov. 13 at Haywood Community College.

Father David Valtierra, C.O., led some 150 attendees in discovering how to internalize the word. In his theme, "Be Still and Know Our Creator," Father Valtierra showed how to use Scripture to take God's word into oneself.

"Where are you on the journey of faith with the Lord?" Father Valtierra asked as he opened his morning session. "What have you brought in your heart to this gathering?"

Bishop William G. Curlin had already told the gathering what he had brought in his heart. Opening the program, Bishop Curlin stressed that Christ must be born in each person's heart.

"We wear religious symbols, but do we really believe that when we get up in the morning Christ rises in us?" Bishop Curlin asked.

After the bishop's remarks, Dr. Cris Villapando, director of faith formation programs for the Diocese of Charlotte, explained that the sixth annual Fire in the Mountains would be a day of Scriptural exploration.

"What is God telling us?" Villapando asked. "We want everyone here to eat the word of God so that we internalize it."

During a break in the program,

Musicians perform during Fire in the Mountains '99,

Villapando said, "The thing we're trying to do is move to internalization .... We need to create a habit in people that unless they internalize the faith all these lectures will be just passing titillation. We can talk to people until they're blue in the face, but we cannot convert people or transform people unless they internalize the faith."

Father Valtierra showed how to foster such internalization.

He began by reading Genesis 2:4-25, the second creation story, after which he invited the attendees to reflect privately on how the passage had touched their lives. People closed their eyes and the auditorium became silent as they thought about what they had just heard.

After several minutes, Father Valtierra suggested ways of relating Scripture to life. For instance, in Genesis 2:7, God breathes live into "the man's" nostrils; this can be seen as a metaphor for the life of faith. "Where did you receive the breath of (faith) life?" Father Valtierra asked. "Who blew the breath of God into you? Sometimes we are the life givers, imaging God for others; sometimes we are the recipients."

Father Valtierra next read the story from 2 Kings of Elijah taking refuge in the cave and hearing God's voice — not in earthquakes, fire, and hurricanes, but in a "tiny whispering sound."

This, he said, reminds us to "experience listening - in the quiet presence of God, the invitation to be quiet and simply listen."

Attendees broke into small groups to discuss what they had discerned in their personal reflections, and later shared some of their thoughts with the whole group. Internalizing, some said, involved listening and trusting: "God is creating something new in us, being able to let go and let God be in control." There were also the ideas of ongoing creation, and that there must be a daily commitment of time to listen to God.

But it's not easy. One attendee remarked that it's "dangerous to say 'yes' to God, because you don't know what you're letting yourself in for."

In the afternoon, Father Valtierra read the Gospel of Mark story in which four men lower a paralytic through a roof so Jesus can heal him. The four men can be a metaphor for each person in the room, Father Valtierra said: "Their faith gesture is the same as you in your ministries. They're practical and hands-on. They do what needs to be done. They make it possible to get to Jesus, and I think that's the gesture of faith in the story."

In contrast, he said, when we resist Jesus we are like the scribes, who also resisted Jesus.

Talking about his own reflections on the discussions after the Scripture readings, one man said he had discovered the "possibility of spiritual intimacy with strangers."

"It opens up possibilities for the future," he added. "Why can't tomorrow be like that? Why can't every day be like that?" ▼

Some people don't even know where they're standing, and some people don't even know what religion means. They don't know what baptism means."

But today, she is happy. "Wilson has come a long, long ways since I came here. The town has grown, and people have come to a better understanding."

Every Sunday she goes to St. Therese, where she is considered a matriarch, says Atonement Sister Maxine Towns, director of African-American ministry. "The people of St. Therese just love her to death. They have always held her in high esteem,"

When it is time for her guests to leave her home, where she still lives alone, Miss Bessie offers to pray for them. "Every day of my life I put my life in God's hands. I know he's got it, and he will use it," she says.

Hands are shaken, hugs are given, and her guests get into the car. Miss Bessie sits down on her porch, covers her face with her hands, and begins to pray. ▼

Pope: Thanksgiving should be time of appreciation for creation

By John Thavis
Catholic News Service

VATICAN CITY (CNS) -- Pope John Paul II said Thanksgiving should be a time to show renewed appreciation for God's gift of creation and the ``fruits of the earth."

``This observance should be an occasion to better appreciate the created world, which God entrusted to human beings so they could cultivate it and keep it as a precious gift," he said at an Angelus blessing Nov. 14, the day on which Italy marked its annual Thanksgiving celebration.

The pope said Thanksgiving, traditionally celebrated at harvest time, should highlight the special contribution made by farmers, many of whom are facing economic problems.

"We ask for a divine blessing on the countryside and the rural world, so that the Lord supports those who dedicate themselves to work in the fields," he said.

He expressed his esteem for all those employed in agriculture and his appreciation for the energy and commitment they bring to their work. ▼

Hmong celebrate their New Year, welcome new catechist

By ELLEN NEERINCX SIGMON
CORRESPONDENT

MORGANTON — "Nyob zoo xyoo tshiab!" ("Happy New Year!") Hmong Catholics and others attending a special Hmong New Year Mass and celebration exchanged this greeting, along with the traditional eggs, at St. Charles Borromeo Catholic Church on Sunday, Nov. 14. Many of the Hmong in attendance wore brightly colored native clothing elaborately decorated with beads that rattled and coins that jingled, adding to the music of the day.

The Hmong had more than the start of their New Year festival to celebrate. They were also rejoicing in the arrival of Pe Lee, the new Hmong catechist for the Diocese of Charlotte. Lee and his family moved from California to North Carolina at the end of July so that he could assume his new role.

"Hmong Catholics are concerned that they don't lose their culture, but they also want to remain faithful to Catholicism," said Father Bill Tanguay, director of Hmong and Lahu ministries for the diocese. "Mr. Lee is very good at these things." Father Tanguay and Father Ken Whittington of St. Charles Borromeo concelebrated the Mass, with Lee assisting. The Mass was mostly in the Hmong language, but parts of it were translated into English by Father Tanguay, and into Spanish by Father Whittington.

According to Father Tanguay, the Hmong have elaborate rituals for birth, death and marriage, and for their traditional celebrations. A large part of Lee's job is to combine these traditions with the traditions of the Catholic Church.

One example of this was Sunday's Mass and celebration. The group first

Arden parishioners blanket flood victims with concern, handiwork

By DIANNE RIGGS
CORRESPONDENT

ARDEN — Colorful quilts will soon be making their way into the hands of people in the Goldsboro, N.C., area devastated by Hurricane Floyd flooding. The 15 quilts are the products of a "Quilting Bee" which meets weekly at St. Barnabas Church in Arden.

"We decided to give all our quilts made before Christmas to flood victims," said Kathleen O. Walsh, leader of the group.

After receiving a tag that says "May this quilt warm your body and soul. Made with loving care and prayers by St. Barnabas Quilters," the quilts will be sent to the St. Vincent de Paul Society in Goldsboro for distribution to individuals. "It is important to us that the quilts go directly into the hands of people who need them and not sit in a warehouse somewhere," said Walsh.

The quilts are part of a larger project that began in August of this year. Walsh, who found herself with an abundance of fabric and a love of quilting, decided to see if others in her church shared the same passion. Soon, four or five women gathered weekly to "tie" quilts which Walsh had assembled. In the beginning, quilts went to a foster group home and safe houses. But when the floods came, the group's direction changed for the rest of 1999.

Members joined for various reasons. Most wanted a constructive way to help people, as well as a place to learn new skills and to enjoy the camaraderie present at a "bee." "It's the old stewardship idea," said Walsh. "If you have a talent, use it."

The work goes fast. Members are able to turn out two tied quilts per meeting. "It is important that the quilts are pretty," said Walsh, who believes that people who have suffered need something not only useful, but beautiful in their lives. The quilts are made from simple patterns, but the fabric colors are coordinated carefully. They are also easy to care for, being washer and dryer ready.

"Any parish could do this," said member Mary DeGroot. "All have needs. And, it's a great way to socialize."

The quilters hope to increase their membership in the spring and expand their outreach to local nursing homes. ▾

Pro-life leaders praise abortion limitations in budget deal

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Pro-life leaders are cheering a budget compromise between the White House and Congress over foreign-aid dollars for abortions and unpaid U.N. dues. Helen Alvare, director of planning and information for the U.S. Catholic bishops' Secretariat for Pro-Life Activities, called the deal a policy victory. Said Douglas Johnson, legislative director of the National Right to Life Committee in Washington: "If the administration abides by the law, 96 percent of the population-control budget will be fenced off from groups that promote legalized abortion." In the compromise, the White House agreed to new statutory language restricting assistance to foreign family planning organizations that spend their own money to provide abortions or lobby for liberalized abortion rights in the countries where they operate.

Pittsburgh churches join in erecting replica of Vatican creche

PITTSBURGH (CNS) — Eleven Christian faith communities, including the Catholic Diocese of Pittsburgh, are working together to erect a replica of the Vatican creche in downtown Pittsburgh. To be dedicated at a blessing service Dec. 6, it is believed to be the world's first replica of the larger-than-life renderings of the Holy Family, the magi, shepherds, animals and a stable that grace St. Peter's Square in Vatican City each Christmas season. "We are very proud to sponsor this spiritually uplifting and striking display," said Father Ronald Lengwin, secretary for pastoral life in the Pittsburgh Diocese and staff for the Christian Leaders Fellowship, the Pittsburgh group that sponsors an annual Christmas festival in the city.

Efforts focus on food, shelter after Turkey's second quake

ISTANBUL, Turkey (CNS) — Relief efforts in Turkey, already moving into the reconstruction phase after an earlier earthquake, were refocused on emergency food and shelter after the country's second major quake in three months, said a Catholic Relief Services spokeswoman. CRS, the U.S. bishops' international relief and development agency, and Caritas, the church's local charitable agency, were coordinating efforts to meet the emergency needs of victims of the Nov. 12 earthquake, said Franne VanDerKeilen, communications associate, from Istanbul, the Turkish capital.

Holy sites close in protest of mosque

Christian pilgrims wait outside the closed doors of the Church of the Holy Sepulcher after finishing the Way of the Cross Nov. 22 in Jerusalem. The church and other Christian sites in Israel were closed for two days in protest of Israel's decision allowing a mosque to be built in the shadow of the Basilica of the Annunciation in Nazareth.

Court takes case involving prayer at high school football games

WASHINGTON (CNS) — The U.S. Supreme Court Nov. 15 agreed to hear an appeal in a Texas case that will decide whether student-led prayer before public school football games violates the constitutional separation of church and state. The case, Santa Fe Independent School District vs. Doe, involves a suburban Houston school district and two families — one Catholic and one Mormon — who in 1995 sued the school district over its policies regarding prayer.

Indonesian bishops ask Catholics to build more humane nation

JAKARTA, Indonesia (CNS) — Indonesia's bishops asked Catholics to become more involved in national life and to care for victims of violence and injustice in order to help build a more humane nation. Catholics are called to cooperate in building a democratic Indonesia that respects all groups and individuals, because "human dignity lies in the responsibility and participation to maintain a more humane common life," the bishops said in their mid-November pastoral message, "Let Us Change." The message urged Catholics to repent for any previous lack of involvement through transformation and reconciliation in their personal and social lives.

Second parish denied registration under Russia's religion law

MOSCOW (CNS) — A second Catholic parish in Russia's Volga region has been refused registration under the country's 1997 religion law, the parish's administrator said. "They are telling us that our parish charter does not conform to Russian law," said the administrator, Franz Payanovsky, in a telephone interview from Togliatti, an industrial city of 870,000 on the Volga River. Local Justice Ministry officials rejected the parish's application for the same reasons used in denying the application of a parish in Syzran, a smaller city in the same region of Samara. In both cases, the officials objected to a bishop having the right to control parish property.

Aid agency urges WTO to make reducing poverty a priority

MANCHESTER, England (CNS) — The Catholic aid agency CAFOD is urging the World Trade Organization to make poverty reduction a priority during its conference in Seattle at the end of November. The Catholic Fund for Overseas Development, the official aid agency of the Catholic bishops of England and Wales, is sending three staffers to the Seattle conference Nov. 30-Dec. 3. One of the three, George Gelber, chief policy analyst for CAFOD, told Catholic News Service in a Nov. 17 telephone interview that the Seattle conference should aim to help achieve international targets set for poverty reduction.

Yugoslav bishop tells of poor conditions, urges continued aid

WARSAW, Poland (CNS) — A Yugoslav bishop said NATO bombing and sanctions had caused "very serious problems" for local people and urged foreign donors to continue giving aid. "The general economic situation is grave in Vojvodina and the rest of Yugoslavia," said Bishop Janos Penzes of Subotica. "Thanks to Caritas and other agencies, emergency supplies are still getting through," he added. In a Nov. 17 telephone interview, Bishop Penzes said hospitals in the Vojvodina region were still accepting patients and performing operations.

CHARLOTTE — Anyone acquainted with Mercy Sister Paulette Williams, principal of Charlotte Catholic High School (CCHS), knows she is someone who is usually aware of what is going on in her school and what her students and faculty are doing at all times. There is a first time for everything.

At seventh period on Nov. 18, the participants walked stealthily into the gymnasium and sat in excitement as they waited for their guest-of-honor to arrive.

Much to the shock and astonishment of Sister Paulette, students, faculty, family, friends and fellow Mecklenburg Area Catholic Schools principals gathered in the gymnasium to honor her with a surprise assembly and reception for her 20 years of service as an administrator.

"This was probably the first time I can remember that I was ever surprised," said Sister Paulette. "I was totally overcome and shocked to see everyone there, especially my parents and my brother. Usually, someone leaks the surprise, but this time I had no idea what was taking place."

Sister Act

Born and raised in Concord, Sister Paulette says that "the feeling to become a sister came to her often." That feeling led her to the Sisters of Mercy of the Americas Regional Community of North Carolina in Belmont in 1969, when she entered the convent.

Mercy Sister Mary Andrew Ray, Motherhouse coordinator, said, "over the years, I have known Sister Paulette to be kind, caring and a good organizer. She was elected to be a member of the Regional Council, the governing body of the Sisters of Mercy of the Americas Regional Community of North Carolina. We are very proud of her, and she is definitely a leader among the sisters."

Class is in Session

Sister Paulette attended the former Sacred Heart College for a year before transferring to UNCC to obtain a bachelor's degree in math and moving on to Notre Dame University, where she received her master's degree in administration.

"Even before I decided to enter the convent, I always knew that I wanted to be a teacher," said Sister Paulette.

She spent five years teaching math and religion at CCHS, and when it was suggested that she try her hand at being an assistant principal, she decided that it was a direction in which she should go. When the position of principal became available, Sister Paulette simply followed the path in front of her.

She has received many awards during her years as principal: the North Carolina High School Athletic Association Distinguished Service Award in 1991, the North Carolina High School Athletic Association Award of Merit in 1995, the Charlotte Jaycees Outstanding Educator Award for 1997-1998, and many others.

Dr. Michael Skube, superintendent of diocesan schools, said, "I have had the pleasure of working with her for the past 10 years, and one of the most important accomplishments is her overseeing of putting together the new facility for CCHS."

"CCHS and the Sisters of Mercy have been my life. The beautiful people I have met along the way have been my gifts," Sister Paulette explained. "The ministry of education is one of giving and taking; that is the attraction for me. It is hard to look at this as a job because I come to be with family everyday."

"Her staff look at her as an excellent administrator, and progress is continually made for the students," continued Dr. Skube.

Much to Her Surprise...

Sister Paulette was treated to many added surprises throughout the assembly, held on Principals' Appreciation Day in honor of her 20 years as principal and 27 years working in CCHS. The jazz band, cheerleaders, dance squad, honors choir ensemble and the other students all helped to make the assembly a memorable one for their principal.

"Whoever was able to pull the assembly off without her knowing did a good job," said Sister Mary Andrew.

David Shoff, the school's music director, wrote a new alma mater for the occasion and had the honors choir ensemble perform the new school song.

A committee produced the idea and plans to have a scholarship in honor of the principal. The Sister Paulette Williams Scholarship Fund will be awarded annually to a senior who demonstrates a love of Catholic faith, a dedication to CCHS, service and a commitment to excellence, said Jennifer Johnson, the school's development director.

"Sister Paulette's vision and commitment to the needs of the students and faculty have given all who have passed through these halls the opportunity to be successful," said Johnson.

The students and faculty presented her with a plaque which reads: "CCHS honors Sister Paulette Williams, RSM, for twenty years of ministry through unwavering faith, leadership and perseverance towards excellence and a commitment to Catholic education."

Steve Carpenter, assistant principal, who served as master of ceremonies at the assembly, said, "It was unbelievable that we were able to surprise her. She is an extraordinary administrator and is someone who is usually three steps ahead of everyone. She has a wonderful vision for the school, keeps that in mind, and leads us all in that direction."

"I am amazed of all that she does. Her drive for excellence, compassion and the Catholic faith has always stood out," continued Carpenter. "She has an enormous ability to understand the needs of her students, faculty and staff, how to approach them, and how to adjust to everyone's needs properly."

Father Mauricio West, vicar general and chancellor of the diocese, said, "Sister Paulette is an institution in this diocese. With 20 years as principal, she has the longest tenure as principal for CCHS and can be proud of her indelible mark on the many students she has seen graduate from the school."

"The assembly was the most special moment of my life," said Sister Paulette. "This community has always been very giving, and I feel extremely blessed to be ministering with people who are so caring." ▼

Pope canonizes new saints, including 10 Spanish Civil War martyrs

By JOHN THAVIS
Catholic News Service

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope John Paul II canonized 12 new saints, including 10 victims of the Spanish Civil War, and said they offered spiritual lessons for all modern Christians.

The pope appeared tired as he presided over the two-hour-long liturgy in St. Peter's Basilica Nov. 22, the last canonization ceremony of the 20th century.

With the latest group, the pope has named 296 saints in his 21-year pontificate, almost as many as were named by his predecessors combined since modern saint-making rules were established in the 16th century.

The 10 martyrs were all priests or brothers working in Spanish schools during the 1930s when extremist members of a Marxist rebel movement led attacks against priests and religious. St. Cirilo Bertran and eight fellow members of the Christian Brothers, and St. Inocencio de La Inmaculada, a Passionist priest, were all shot to death.

In a sermon, the pope said the martyrs were not war heroes but witnesses of the faith, who with their deaths gave "the last lesson of their lives."

The pope also canonized St. Tommaso da Cori, an Italian Franciscan well-known as a preacher and confessor until his death in 1729, and St. Benedetto Menni, an Italian member of the Hospitaller Order of St. John of God, who in the late 1800s founded an order of nuns who worked in hospitals.

Among the 11,000 people attending the Mass was Argentine President Carlos Menem, who traveled to Rome for the canonization of the country's first native-born saint. St. Hector Valdivielso Saez, one of the Christian Brothers martyred in Spain, was born in Buenos Aires to Spanish immigrants who later returned to Spain.

The pope, who has walked with increasing difficulty in recent weeks, proceeded slowly up the aisle of the basilica at the beginning of the Mass. He looked fatigued and coughed several times during the liturgy.

Later, addressing pilgrims from his apartment window above St. Peter's Square, he appeared frustrated that a costumed group of musicians and flag-wavers continued their performance as he was trying to speak. He rapped his lectern twice and raised his voice to a shout in order to make himself heard. ▼

Bishops approve tighter church control of Catholic Colleges

Ex Corde Ecclesiae: NCCB returns document to Vatican for final approval

By JOANN S. KEANE
Editor

BELMONT — American bishops reached consensus during their November meeting on 75 specific elements of a document that could relegate the orthodoxy of Catholic higher education to local bishops.

While the 223-31 vote on Nov. 15 sends two decades of debate back to the Vatican for sanction, it concludes the latest round of dialogue between the Vatican and the nations' bishops on the development of theological standards for the nation's 235 church-affiliated universities and colleges.

The document does not place bishops at the helm of college and university governance. Rather, the directive could institute a mandate [or endorsement] for professors of theology and theologians from the local bishop.

In this diocese, where Belmont Abbey College is the only Catholic college between the District of Columbia and Florida, a mandate could place Belmont Abbey's theological direction under the discretion of Bishop William G. Curlin.

Belmont Abbey College has been an institution in Belmont since 1886. And while the college has undergone changes throughout its century of service, what has remained constant is its commitment to its Benedictine roots.

Though this document out of Washington may contain some of the most hotly contested issues among Catholic institutions of higher education, it's the way of life for Belmont Abbey, where Scripture and Introduction to Theology are required courses for graduation.

"In the practical sense it will have little effect on Belmont Abbey," said Dr. Robert Preston, the college president. "What this affects is the teaching of theology," he says, adding, all of Belmont Abbey's full time theology faculty are practicing Catholics.

"The local ordinary is responsible for whomever gets up in the pulpit and preaches or teaches in the name of the Church," says Preston. This document is simply a logical application if you're going to have a Catholic university with Catholic theologians.

Faculty and administration of the Belmont college "recognize its responsibility to search for understanding in the context of the Scriptural message as it comes to us through the Church," states the college mission statement. "This requires constant application of the intellect and careful study of the human experience, together with reflection on, and reverence for, God. In its curriculum, the College exposes students to many of the world's major problems and helps them develop a responsible social consciousness guided by Catholic teaching."

Marcy Sister Sharon Euart, associate general secretary for the U.S. bishops' conference, collects bishops' votes on a document spelling out new norms for Catholic higher education. The bishops overwhelmingly approved the new norms Nov. 17 at their fall annual meeting in Washington.

Conventional wisdom traces the roots of ecclesiastical involvement at the college level back to the 1960s, when some Catholic colleges and universities sought independence from church authority. In the years that ensued, the topic of has been embraced, rejected, supported and scorned.

It's been 20 years since the Vatican instituted dialogue, seeking norms — worldwide — for Catholic universities and colleges. This request for consistency came from a then-newly elected Pope John Paul II.

In 1983, the new Code of Canon Law included a new law saying those who teach theological subjects in institutes of higher learning need a mandate to teach from the competent ecclesiastical authority.

The first draft for 49 educational norms for higher education was issued in 1985, and was received with a flurry of controversy. Three years later, a second draft received more favorable response, but the number of norms increased to 72.

In 1990, Pope John Paul II issued "Ex Corde Ecclesiae" [From the Heart of the Church], an apostolic constitution on higher education. The document set general norms for Catholic colleges and universities and colleges around the world, but requested bishop conferences around the world to establish local implementation in light of civil laws and conditions as applicable in their nation or state.

The National Conference of Catholic Bishops in the U.S. spent a substantial portion of this decade in dialogue with Catholic higher education leaders. In 1995, a near-unanimous vote by the bishops sought to implement Ex Corde Ecclesiae, by stating principals of mutual trust, cooperation and continuing dialogue between bishops and educators as a means of achieving the vision and goals of Catholic higher education as written in the papal text. Rome quickly rejected the American document, saying it clearly lacked juridical binding norms.

While this November's conference approved a revised document, the U.S. norms still require the papal seal of approval.

"At the Abbey, we're going to follow Catholic moral teachings...," says Preston. "It's always been that way." ▼

Prayer, support needed in wake of Vietnam floods, priest says

CHARLOTTE — The victims of the worst flooding in a century in Vietnam are in tremendous need of prayers, financial support and medical outreach, a priest serving the Vietnamese community in Charlotte said. Father Peter Tan Van Le, pastor of St. Joseph Vietnamese Catholic Church in south Charlotte, said the flooding that ravaged eight provinces in central Vietnam earlier this month has stricken thousands with disease, hunger and a ruined infrastructure. The floods killed some 600 people and caused damage estimated at $250 million. "It's an underdeveloped part of the country, and many cannot reach out to their own people," Father Le said of many parts of the flood zone. "Some people are far from the cities; people are dying hungry." St. Joseph Church was to take three second collections by month's end to contribute to the relief effort.

Plane crash leaves people wanting spiritual answers

PITTSBURGH (CNS) — In the aftermath of a tragedy like the EgyptAir crash, people are left looking for spiritual direction and a way of making sense of what has happened, said a Pittsburgh pastor who is also an FBI chaplain. "It goes to show what happens when real people look at life with defenses down," Father Joseph McCaffrey said in an interview with the Pittsburgh Catholic, diocesan newspaper. "It shows there is a spiritual sense to human beings that cannot be ignored." Father McCaffrey, pastor of St. James the Apostle in New Bedford, spent a week in Newport, R.I., in his role as a volunteer chaplain for the FBI's Employee Assistance Program.

Top U.S. Lutheran bishop praises Augsburg accord

WASHINGTON (CNS) — The presiding bishop of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America hailed the Oct. 31 signing of the Catholic-Lutheran joint declaration on justification as "a testimony to the distance we have come in my lifetime." Lutheran Bishop H. George Anderson, in a Nov. 17 address to the U.S. Catholic bishops during their fall general meeting in Washington, said, "Just as I thought I would never live to see the year 2000, I never thought I would live to see Lutherans and Catholics coming together like this." The joint declaration, called the Augsburg accord by some, says that Lutherans and Catholics have reached a consensus on the subject of justification by God.

Salvadorans mark 10th anniversary of Jesuit murders

SAN SALVADOR (CNS) — Ten years after their deaths, the six Jesuit priests murdered by the Salvadoran army for their promotion of social justice shine "like beacons ... transmitting their ideals and dreams," said a Vatican official. "They lived full lives ... transmitting their ideals of a country of justice. They showed us a motive for living," said Archbishop Giuseppe Pittau, secretary of the Vatican Congregation for Catholic Education. The archbishop gave the homily Nov. 16 at an open-air Mass on the grounds of the Jesuit-run Central American University in San Salvador, where the priests were killed.

Pope says health care providers must help society's poor

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Though health care providers face increasing economic challenges, they must guarantee care for society's poor and defenseless, said Pope John Paul II. "It is not tolerable that the limitation of economic resources, experienced today to different degrees, primarily affects the weaker segments of the population and the less wealthy areas of the world, depriving them of necessary health care," the pope told participants in a Vatican-organized conference on health care Nov. 19.

Burundi crisis demands global help, says British Catholic agency

MANCHESTER, England (CNS) — The English bishops' aid agency is calling for international help for the humanitarian crisis in Burundi. Julian Filochowski, director of the Catholic Fund for Overseas Development, or CAFOD, said more than 300,000 people had been rounded up from their homes in the capital, Bujumbura, and forced to live in camps during a recent security operation by the Burundi government. "A human tragedy is unfolding in Burundi, far away from the gaze of the media and the international community," Filochowski said in a Nov. 17 telephone interview with Catholic News Service. He had just returned from a 10-day tour of the Great Lakes region of Africa.

Vatican appeals for more aid in clearing land mines

By TRACY EARLY
Catholic News Service

UNITED NATIONS (CNS) — The Vatican appealed Nov. 19 for more international assistance to programs to clear land mines and help their victims.

Archbishop Renato R. Martino, nuncio to the United Nations, said many of the countries where the problem was most severe would need outside support, and said programs of international aid should include funding for this purpose.

He noted that many victims of mines that had exploded were children with "very special long-term needs." In many cases, the countries where these children live will be unable to meet their needs unless help comes from outside, he said.

Speaking to the U.N. General Assembly, the archbishop also called for an immediate stop to use of land mines. "It is an unbelievable and inhuman paradox that mines are still being laid, even in places where they had already been cleared," he said.

Archbishop Martino quoted a statement by Pope John Paul II on Feb. 28, the day before the Convention on the Prohibition of Land Mines went into effect, noting that the Vatican had ratified it and calling the convention "a victory of the culture of life over the culture of death."

The Clinton administration declined to sign the convention, commonly known as the Ottawa treaty for the city where it was signed in December of 1997, and said land mines were still needed to provide security for some areas, particularly South Korea.

Archbishop Martino told members of the General Assembly that the land-mines issue was a moral question, and not merely a political matter.

Calling land mines "both the seeds and fruit of war," he said they affected "the very life and dignity of countless people."

Although land mines are small, they are capable of "blocking the path to peace and development," he said. ▼

Introspection, community stream from Living Waters

By JOANITA M. NELLENBACH
Correspondent

MAGGIE VALLEY — The Augustinians probably didn't think of it that way, but a statement in their general chapter in June 1998 heralded the order's new foundation. Not three months after that meeting, friars arrived in Maggie Valley to staff St. Margaret Church and Living Waters Catholic Reflection Center.

The statement — "To look at nature as God's work is to do theology; to call for respect for it and its enjoyment by all is to practice justice and solidarity" — is carried out daily in the hospitality that is a hallmark of the Order of St. Augustine. And since Living Waters is only a few miles from the Blue Ridge Parkway and Great Smoky Mountains National Park, visitors to the reflection center can look at nature in some of its most glorious aspects and in an atmosphere that fosters introspection and community.

"I think people need a time and place where they can experience God; if people can give themselves that time, they benefit spiritually, mentally, and emotionally," said Brother Bill Harkin, Living Waters' associate director. "Just living here in the mountains, God is visualized much more. I'm a city person, but I'm just in awe when I look out the windows and see what God has created."

What God has created is the valley holding Living Waters. Jonathan Creek tumbles over rocks as it flows past the retreat center, built more than a quarter of a century ago by William Murphy. For a while, the building was a motel, then a motel and retreat center. It became a full-time retreat center in 1980.

Mr. William Murphy, who became Father William Murphy, was pastor at St. Margaret Church for 19 years until his death at age 99 in 1991. Until 1998, Franciscan Sisters of Tiffin, Ohio, staffed Living Waters. Sister Jane Schmenk headed the reflection center's staff from 1976 to 1998.

St. Margaret Catholic Church sits just above Living Waters.

"I think people need a time and place where they can experience God; if people can give themselves that time, they benefit spiritually, mentally, and emotionally," said Brother Bill Harkin, Living Waters' associate director.

"This place would not exist if it weren't for Father Murphy and Sister Jane," said Father Terry Hyland, director.

Living Waters' staff consists of Father Hyland, Brother Bill, and Father Frank Doyle, St. Margaret's pastor. The Augustinians are building on the work begun by their predecessors.

It's all about "finding God in friendship, finding God within, finding God in dialogue and conversation — that's very Augustinian," Father Hyland said.

Retreats are held year round with 24 scheduled from Dec. 31, 1999, through Nov. 12, 2000. Titles include "Conscious Breathing: Taking a Journey to Wholeness," "Our Hearts are Restless Until They Rest in You," "Augustinian Spirituality for Today's World," and "Soul Medicine for Speed Sickness."

Given Living Waters' setting, a variety of nature retreats are included in the list: "Recreate in Us A New Spirit, Lord," "Be Still and Know That I Am God," and "Drink the Living Water," are just some of the subjects available.

In addition, the center has scheduled more than 20 retreats for groups from around the country, including Alcoholics Anonymous, Engaged Encounters, and the annual retreats for priests from the Dioceses of Charlotte, N.C., and Knoxville, Tenn., and the Oratorians from Rock Hill, S.C.

"The challenge," Brother Bill said, "is to keep changing the programs to meet people's needs without losing what we have that people come back for year after year.

Apparently Living Waters is doing just that. More than 4,500 visitors spent time there this year. Some, such as Tom and Nancy Sparacino, come back again and again. The Sparacinos, parishioners at St. Lawrence in Asheville, have made about a dozen retreats in the last six years. Tom was at Living Waters just last month for an Emmaus team leaders retreat.

"Father Terry is just wonderful, very spiritual, a great facilitator," Tom said. "And the center is just gorgeous. Every time I go there I feel like I'm going home. I feel that's where I met Jesus."

One of Living Waters' advantages is its size; 55 is the maximum number who can stay at the center at one time. "We're small," Father Hyland said. "You could bring 20 or 30 people here and have a very nice retreat."

Another advantage is a new facility. The house which was home to the Franciscans has become a hermitage named Lecceto — named after an Augustinian hermitage for cloistered nuns, one of the order's oldest foundations, in Lecceto, Italy. Five people can stay there, or it could be used for one-day meetings. Sitting above both Living Waters and St. Margaret, it offers a spectacular view of Maggie Valley and the surrounding mountains.

All who come, whether to stay at Living Waters' main facility or at Lecceto up the hill, will find a respite from the crush of the busy world.

"We want to provide a welcoming place for people to talk about God within themselves and with others," Brother Bill said. ▼

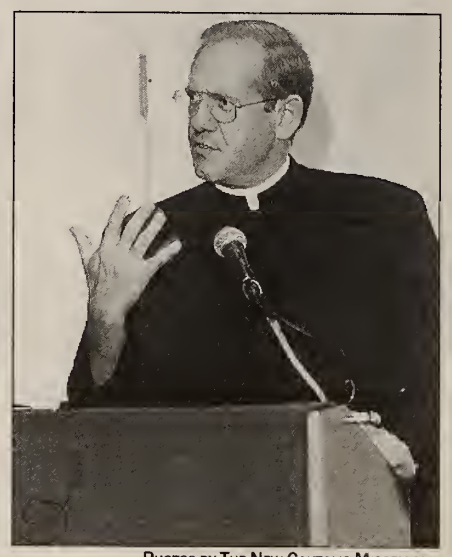
Life's work of Cardinal Bernardin examined at lectures

By JORDAN McMORROUGH
The New Catholic Miscellany

COLUMBIA, S.C. — The inaugural Joseph Cardinal Bernardin Lectureship, held at the University of South Carolina to honor the life of legacy of Cardinal Bernardin, featured perhaps the three persons most qualified to speak on the cardinal's life.

Three lectures on Nov. 18 from Msgr. Kenneth Velo, Father J. Bryan Hehir, and Eugene Kennedy, offering their personal reflections and a focus on the book, "On Common Ground," enabled attendees to better understand and appreciate Cardinal Bernardin's accomplishments.

And while the event was held primarily to honor the life and legacy of the cardinal, funds were also being raised to established a chaired faculty position in Cardinal Bernardin's name at the University of South Carolina, an effort that began before his death.



Photos by The New Cahtolic Miscellany

Msgr. Kenneth Velo was one of three speakers at the University of South Carolina's inaugural Joseph Cardinal Bernardin Lectureship on Nov. 18. The lecture series offered reflections on the accomplishments of the cardinal during his life.

Msgr. Kenneth Velo: "This Man Bernardin ... Was a Gift of Peace"

Following his introduction by Elaine Addison, Cardinal Bernardin's sister, Msgr. Velo initially described the cardinal as "a teacher, administrator, ecumenical leader, priest, bishop, cardinal, brother, friend."

However, he stressed that the cardinal always prefaced his remarks by saying, "I come to speak to you as a pastor."

Msgr. Velo served as Cardinal Bernardin's executive assistant from 1985 to 1994 and was one of the cardinal's closest friends during his ministry in Chicago. The cardinal himself requested that the monsignor offer the homily at his funeral Mass.

In an opening lecture in which he used imaginative photographs to chronicle the life of Cardinal Bernardin, Msgr. Velo talked of the young Joseph growing up in Columbia at the height of Depression. Following his father's death from cancer, his mother Maria worked long hours as a seamstress at Fort Jackson. "He knew the feeling of being poor," the monsignor emphasized.

As he got older, Joseph worked as an orderly at Providence Hospital, and later thought of a career in medicine. However, he was called to the vocation of the priesthood, and was ordained in 1952 to serve the church in the Diocese of Charleston. He taught at Bishop England High School and later worked in the Chancery offices as vicar general, vocations director, archives curator, and cemetery director.

On April 26, 1966, Joseph Bernardin was ordained as the auxiliary bishop of the Archdiocese of Atlanta. There he served as chancellor and pastor of the cathedral parish. Later, in 1968, he was appointed to be the general secretary of the newly restructured National Conference of Catholic Bishops in Washington, D.C. After five years, he was called to serve the Church in Cincinnati as archbishop. Then, 10 years later, he was appointed archbishop of Chicago by Pope John Paul II.

"1982 ushered in a new era of leadership for the church in Chicago as Charleston's son became Chicago's gift," said Msgr. Velo. "Cardinal Bernardin brought out hidden issues through brutal honesty. That honesty brought out the truth."

The monsignor described the November 1994 allegations of sexual abuse by former seminarian Stephen Cook against Cardinal Bernardin as, "the worst of times, and the best of times. It was the worst, but maybe the best came out," said Msgr. Velo, who elaborated on how the cardinal handled the situation publicly and later reconciled with Cook after the allegations were dropped.

Dealing publicly with another difficult circumstance, the monsignor recalled how Cardinal Bernardin spoke to the family of the Archdiocese of Chicago following his diagnosis of terminal cancer of the pancreas.

"He told us what was happening in his heart," said the president of the Catholic Church Extension Society.

Msgr. Velo then emotionally described how the cardinal "slipped away" on Nov. 14, 1996, saying the cardinal thought it would be like being home.

"He had an uncommon common touch. He had an uncommon common sense," the monsignor said in summing up his mentor's life. "He shared all of himself. He died too soon."

Father J. Bryan Hehir "Cardinal Bernardin: The Church and Public Policy"

In his talk, Father Hehir, professor of the practice of religious and society at Harvard Divinity School and faculty associate at Harvard University's Weatherhead Center for International Affairs, described his working relationship with Cardinal Bernardin from 1973 until his death.

Father Hehir's writing and research engage issues of ethics, foreign policy, and international relations, as well as Catholic social ethics, all areas in which he consulted and advised the cardinal for more than two decades.

"He was a pastor who was a churchman. He had an enormous capability to forge policy in the church," said Father Hehir of Cardinal Bernardin. "At the bishops' meetings he was a person to be dealt with. The cardinal was the man to see."

The recently appointed chair of the executive committee at Harvard Divinity School described the public life of Cardinal Bernardin in three stages:

- 1968 to 1978 — Dearden/Bernardin period
- 1979 to 1989 — Center stage
- 1990 to 1996 — Return to primacy of the cardinal as pastor

After Vatican II, Cardinal John Dearden of Detroit asked a young Bishop Bernardin to come to Washington to set up the newly redesigned National Conference of Catholic Bishops, said Father Hehir. In that role, he dealt with issues surrounding the Vietnam War and the Roe vs. Wade decision.

In the decade of the '80s, Cardinal Bernardin was at center stage, Father Hehir said. "It was remarkable in the way he carried it off, dealing with issues of the new Cold War, post-Vietnam debate, Central American wars, domestic policy, and abortion debate."

Following the 1980 bishops' meeting, Cardinal Bernardin was asked to chair an ad hoc committee on War and Peace, and that committee proved to be a case study of his leadership, said Father Hehir, who served in Washington at the U.S. Catholic Conference from 1973 to 1992.

"His mandate developed into full scale public policy analysis. It started a national conversation about the nuclear question," said the former director of the Office of International Affairs for the bishop's conference. "It became a major case study in religion and public life. It also raised questions in the universal church."

Then, in December 1983, one month after he was named chair of the bishop's Pro-Life Committee, Cardinal Bernardin gave a speech at Fordham University in New York where he first promoted the consistent ethic of life.

"How you defined the sacredness of human life was not one threat, but several. It was more than an ad hoc response to a moral question. It was complicated and not without risk," said Father Hehir, who has also served the U.S. bishops as counselor for social policy. "It's (the consistent ethic of life) always been a complicated sell. There are questions whether you can create a coherent policy around it."

Dr. Eugene Kennedy "Joseph, My Brother"

In his evening presentation at St. Peter's Church, the parish where Cardinal Bernardin was baptized, the cardinal's primary biographer said, "My brother Joseph was your brother Joseph. I was fortunate to be his friend."

Kennedy has authored four books on the late Cardinal Bernardin: My Brother, Joseph, a memoir of their friendship; This Man Bernardin, essays written to accompany John White's photographs of Cardinal Bernardin's Chicago years and the subsequent book of his final years; and Cardinal Bernardin, a biography of Bernardin's life, as well as conflicts and issues of his career.

Following an invocation by retired Bishop David B. Thompson, Kennedy said he thought Cardinal Bernardin would be elected pope someday, "but he had a greater calling.... He was called to live in our presence the life of Jesus. To be a saint for our times."

A professor of psychology at Loyola University Chicago for more than 25 years, Kennedy said the cardinal was the intellectual leader of Catholicism for the last quarter century. ▼

African-American ancestors and saints remembered at Mass

By ALESHA M. PRICE
Staff Writer

GREENSBORO — In African history, the various tribes used drums as a form of communication and a way to call the attention of a nearby village. Similarly, percussion instruments served as a "call to worship" in the second annual African-American Mass held at St. Pius X Church on Nov. 21.

In celebration of African-American Catholic History Month, the Catholic campus ministry of North Carolina A&T State University (NC A&T) and Bennett College and the Women's Friendship Club of St. Mary Church sponsored a Mass with the theme "Celebrating the Church in the African Diaspora."

"The purpose of the Mass is to give honor to our ancestors and to teach," explained Alberta Hairston, campus minister of NC A&T and Bennett College. "People, especially our students, need to know that they are part of history and the Church."

Michael Roberto, instructor of history at NC A&T, who attends St. Pius X Church, played the wood drums and other percussion instruments to begin the Mass.

"Percussion adds a spiritual dimension to the Mass which is vital to the celebration," said Roberto.

Hairston presented the introduction from Dr. Ben Jamal Ali's video series "The Triple Heritage": "The beginning of wisdom is to know who you are... Way back before slave days, we were in one huge village called Africa... But now we are scattered so widely the sun never sets on the descendants of Africa..."

In remembrance of the people of African descent in the Catholic Church, a "roll call of ancestors" was read with a background of colorful banners depicting the continents and the countries where slaves were transplanted and the descendants of those original slaves were born. Africa, Europe, South America, the Caribbean and North America were designated with many familiar names: St. Augustine, Blessed Josephine Bahkita, St. Benedict the Moor, Pierre Toussaint, St. Martin de Porres, Archbishop James T. Lyke of Atlanta and Sister Thea Bowman.

Genea Mobley, an elementary education graduate student at NC A&T who made the banners for the Mass, said, "People of African descent need to know that they have a place in the history of the Catholic Church."

"The banners are a visible reminder of where we come from. The roll call brings in the idea that Africans were brought not only to the United States but to all corners of the world," said Hairston. "This shows that from day one, we chose to be a part of the Church."

The Holy Cross Church Gospel Choir from Durham, N.C. led the procession with Father Paul Williams from St. Anthony of Padua Church in Greenville, S.C., as the celebrant.

In his homily, Father Williams said, "We are called by God to share with others, to willingly give of self and time, and to share the gifts God has given us. God's sovereignty demands that we strive to build up the kingdom of God, and every one of those ancestors gave their sovereignty to God."

Father Williams then led the congregation into an impromptu singing of "Amazing Grace," complete with choir and piano accompaniment.

"We are trying to take in all types of cultures," said Roxanne Jacot from St. Paul the Apostle Church on Greensboro. "This African-American celebration was very moving and spiritual, and the music was inspiring."

St. Pius X parishioners the Nsonwu family dressed in African attire, brought the gifts to the altar: "In the Catholic Church, many people don't know how many African-Americans and Africans have dedicated their lives to the Church and how important a Mass like this is to everyone," said Victor Nsonwu.

"This represents me as a black Catholic. I feel like I have been 'to church' when I attend a Mass like this because it goes to my soul," said William Boyers of St. Mary Church in Greensboro.

In 1990, the National Black Catholic Clergy Caucus decided to designate November as African-American Catholic History Month because of the amount of important events that have taken place in the month of November, such as the feast of St. Martin de Porres, the only saint of African descent in the Western Hemisphere, on Nov. 3 and the birth of St. Augustine, the first doctor of the Church from North Africa on Nov. 13. ▼

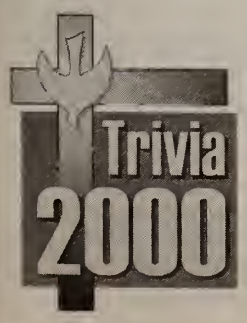
Trivia 2000: World church bells ring on Vatican jubilee Web site

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — If something about the Vatican's official jubilee year Web site has a familiar ring, it might be a recently added page with the sound of church bells from around the world.



"Bells for Peace" is the page's title, and it features recent papal writings on the subject.

A map of the globe shows more than a dozen red dots on which cyberpilgrims can click. With the right software, they will hear church chimes from Asia, Africa, Europe and the Americas. There are five church bell tunes available from North America.

The site's other offerings include information for potential year 2000 visitors to Rome. Gospel readings for each day and copies of major Vatican documents are also available. The text is written in several languages, including English.

New book by priest-editor examines meaning of Christmas symbols

SPRINGFIELD, Mo. (CNS) — "The Greatest Gift of All: Reflections and Prayers for the Christmas Season" by Father Mark G. Boyer, offers seasonal reflections, biblical quotations, prayers based on Psalms and has suggestions for evoking holiday memories.

Father Boyer, editor of The Mirror, newspaper of the Diocese Springfield-Cape Girardeau, has written individual meditations on the religious significance of bells, cards, holly, kings and reindeer, but he also focuses on Mary, Joseph, Jesus, St. Nicholas and other figures from the Christmas story and religious tradition.

The author, who has written 17 other books on biblical and liturgical spirituality, also explains the spiritual meaning found in ornaments, cookies, wreathes and camels.

There are 42 exercises arranged in alphabetical order. Each exercise includes a title, a selection from Scripture, a prayer, and an activity, called a "memories exercise."

In the introduction, Father Boyer says that the exercises are meant to help the readers connect God with the celebration of Christmas and to encourage personal contemplation and personal record keeping about personal experiences of Christmas.

The book also contains a section called "Blessings for Advent and Christmastime." ▼

Haught addresses conversation between science and theology

REVIEWED BY JESUIT FATHER CHARLES L. CURRIE
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

John Haught has once again made a significant contribution to the contemporary conversation between science and theology. In previous books he found an element of purpose behind the workings of the universe ("The Cosmic Adventure," 1984), challenged the ecological insensitivity of many theologians ("The Promise of Nature," 1993), and provided a masterful roadmap on science and religion's journey from conflict to conversation ("Science and Religion," 1995). Now in "God After Darwin," arguably his most important book thus far, he develops a theology that is very comfortable with — and is indeed enriched by — an understanding of evolution.

"God After Darwin"
By John Haught
Westview Press (Boulder, Colo., 1999), 224 pp. $25.00

Very importantly, he does not make the mistake of building his theology on evolution, but rather shows how an understanding of evolution can suggest fresh ways of thinking about God, ways that are sometimes rediscoveries of a forgotten biblical theology.

Haught faults both the "intelligent design" and materialist interpretations of evolution for suppressing a vibrant sense of life's openness to new creation. For him, God is less concerned with imposing a design on the continuing creation of the universe than with providing it with opportunities to participate in its own creation. Darwin's challenge turns out to be a great gift to theology by awakening a fresh way of thinking about the central claims of traditional theistic faith.

Haught proposes a theological engagement with neo-Darwinism that he calls "evolutionary theology." The otherwise-threatening randomness of evolution suggests that we think of God not as a coercive divine power but as a self-effacing, persuasive love, allowing for a considerable degree of autonomy and self-creativity. The Darwinian world of struggle and pain can lead us to contemplate the mystery of God made manifest in life's suffering, the epitome of which lies in the crucifixion of Jesus. Haught reminds us that the image of a self-emptying or "kenotic" God lies at the heart of Christian revelation.

In place of what he calls a "metaphysics of the past" in contemporary pessimistic interpretations of evolution, or a "metaphysics of the present" in much traditional thought, Haught advocates a "metaphysics of the future." He argues that such a metaphysics not only relates better to a biblical faith in being grasped by "that which is to come," but also provides an open-ended framework for the adventure of scientific discovery. The author notes that neither an emphasis on the explanatory primacy of the past (in much of contemporary science) nor the hierarchical view of being (in much of traditional philosophy and theology) leaves room for the emergence of genuine novelty, such as is suggested in current studies of complexity and chaos.

Developing and deepening themes from "The Promise of Nature," Haught links evolution, eschatology and ecology, emphasizing that nature is not just a gift or a sacrament, but an unfolding promise, with intrinsic, but by no means ultimate, value.

Haught's book is filled with fresh insights that will be an important part of ongoing conversations among scientists and theologians, and will open up wholly new perspectives for the serious general reader who might have thought that evolution poses a threat to religion and theology. ▼

A 10th-grader in religious education class, Patsy, had a knack for cutting to the chase. One evening, in a class about reconciliation, Patsy asked the question for the ages: "Why should you go to confession for a sin you know you are just going to turn around and do again the next week?" All eyes were riveted on the teacher as she explained that such an attitude indicated that one's heart was not fully prepared for repentance.

There was obvious discomfort among Patsy's teen-age classmates when it was suggested that reconciliation to God means committing oneself to change.

It wasn't the answer they had hoped for: Just keep going back to confession every time you do that sin and you'll be fine. On the other hand, they seemed somewhat relieved to be reminded that Jesus himself will actually provide them with the strength they need to change.

This isn't simply an adolescent concern. We all have bad habits, and it's the habitual sins that seem to be the hardest to overcome.

All of this week's readings offer repentance — turning to God — as the answer to Patsy's question. The Lord wants us to change our bad habits, to his ways, in this life to prepare ourselves to accompany him in the next.

During the season of Advent our spiritual concentration is on hope and waiting for the coming of the Lord. Readings for the second Sunday, however, emphasize our own preparation.

Peter gives us assurance that the Lord "shows you generous patience since he wants none to perish but all to come to repentance," and Isaiah promises God's powerful assistance in that matter: "Here comes with power the Lord God, who rules by his strong arm.... Like a shepherd he feeds his flock; in his arms he gathers the lambs, carrying them in his bosom."

Peter urges us to make necessary changes: "What we await are new heavens and a new earth where, according to his promise, the justice of God will reside. So, beloved, while waiting for this, make every effort to be found without stain or defilement, and at peace in his sight."

Again, the Gospel promises that a baptism of repentance leads to forgiveness of sins. In the words of John the Baptist, "I have baptized you in water; he will baptize you in the Holy Spirit." ▼

Question:
What sinful habit do you need to ask God to help you break this Advent season so you can be better prepared for his coming?

Out on Video

NEW YORK (CNS) — The following are home videocassette reviews from the U.S. Catholic Conference Office for Film and Broadcasting. Each videocassette is available on VHS format. Theatrical movies on video have a U.S. Catholic Conference classification and Motion Picture Association of America rating. All reviews indicate the appropriate age group for the video audience.

"Entrapment" (1999)

Mindless escapist caper in which a wily insurance investigator (Catherine Zeta-Jones) joins forces with the world's craftiest art thief (Sean Connery) to nail him red-handed. Jon Amiel's sluggish direction and the bogus emotions on display limit suspense in this glossy fantasy of double-crossing daredevils defying the odds and each other. A romanticized view of crime, fleeting violence and a few instances of rough language and profanity. The U.S. Catholic Conference classification is A-IV — adults, with reservations. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is PG-13 — parents are strongly cautioned that some material may be inappropriate for children under 13. (Fox, rental)

"Wild Wild West" (1999)

Glossy adaptation of the 1960s TV series in which two post-Civil War government agents — one trigger-happy (Will Smith) the other skilled at disguises and inventions (Kevin Kline) — must disable a behemoth killing machine operated by a wheelchair-bound madman (Kenneth Branagh) bent on bringing down the United States. Director Barry Sonnenfeld blends sci-fi contraptions, a comic tone and the Old West setting for a hollow, gimmick-driven plot with impossible stunts and decorative femme fatales for giddy escapist entertainment. Intermittent explosions and stylized violence, some sexual innuendo and double entendres and fleeting rear nudity. The U.S. Catholic Conference classification is A-III — adults. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is PG-13 — parents are strongly cautioned that some material may be inappropriate for children under 13. (Warner, $22.96)

"William Shakespeare's A Midsummer Night's Dream" (1999)

Fanciful adaptation of the Bard's comedy is updated to 1900 Tuscany in a magical forest, where the fairy Puck (Stanley Tucci) causes all manner of romantic mix-ups by casting spells on mismatched young lovers (including Christian Bale and Calista Flockhart), an aspiring actor (Kevin Kline) and the fairy queen (Michelle Pfeiffer). Some cast members excel while others do not in articulating Shakespearean dialogue in writer-director Michael Hoffman's whimsical adaptation whose luminous visuals look sprinkled with fairy dust. Romantic complications and fleeting nudity. The U.S. Catholic Conference classification is A-III — adults. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is PG-13 — parents are strongly cautioned that some material may be inappropriate for children under 13. (Fox, rental)

"Twice Upon a Yesterday" (1999)

Breezy romantic fable in which the clock is magically turned back so that a cheating boyfriend (Douglas Henshall) can have a second chance with his girlfriend (Lena Headey) only to discover that she too had begun a clandestine affair. Director Maria Ripoll's bittersweet tale follows four characters who learn that love can't flourish in an atmosphere of betrayal and deceit. Brief sexual encounter, a live-in relationship, intermittent rough language and a few instances of profanity. The U.S. Catholic Conference classification is A-III — adults. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is R — restricted. (Trimark, rental)

"Liberty Heights"

Ben Foster, Bebe Neuwirth and Frania Rubinek star in a scene from the film "Liberty Heights." Winning comedy-drama set in 1954 Baltimore as two Jewish brothers (Adrien Brody and Ben Foster) seek romance with non-Jewish girls and their decent father (Joe Mantegna) struggles to save his failing burlesque business with a smalltime numbers racket. Writer-director Barry Levinson uses gentle but telling humor to examine religious and racial prejudices in a warm-hearted portrait of a family and a class-conscious community. Sexual situations, fleeting rear nudity, occasional profanity and an instance of rough language. The U.S. Catholic Conference classification is A-III — adults. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is R — restricted.

Animated bedtime stories air Dec. 6 on HBO

By GERRI PARE
Catholic News Service

NEW YORK (CNS) — Reassuring bedtime stories are whimsically animated for the delight of little ones in the charming "Goodnight Moon & Other Sleepytime Tales," airing Monday, Dec. 6, 7:30-8 p.m. EST on the HBO pay cable channel.

With a velvety voice that would calm a tot caught in the jaws of a jaguar, Susan Sarandon liltingly narrates Margaret Wise Brown's 1947 children's story "Goodnight Moon" as darling images of a bunny rabbit going through his nightly bedtime ritual float across the screen.

Plumping up the half-hour program are momentary interviews with young children who offer their pint-sized views on things that go bump in the night, and who they fall in love with in their dreams.

Each story has a celebrity narrator or singer. Billy Crystal relates a little boy's practical solution to the nighttime monsters in his closet, Natalie Cole conjures up a family's summer evenings on "Tar Beach" and Aaron Neville sings Brahms' lullaby to colorful images of baby animals bedding down in the natural environments.

The back-and-forth of animated tales followed by real children's anecdotes flows quite smoothly and the result is a delightful program young and not so young children will enjoy. There are also classic lullabies sung by Tony Bennett, Patti LaBelle and Lauryn Hill. Produced and directed by Amy Schatz, it's a visual and aural treat. ▼

The Pope Speaks

POPE JOHN PAUL II

Pope says Asian trip was important for dialogue, evangelization

BY JOHN THAVIS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope John Paul II said his November visit to India and Georgia marked a new chapter in Asian evangelization and opened new opportunities in ecumenical relations. Speaking at his weekly general audience at the Vatican Nov. 17, the pope called the Nov. 5-9 trip "unforgettable" and said he was convinced it would bear fruit.

The pontiff, wrapped in a cloak against a chilly breeze, addressed several thousand visitors in St. Peter's Square. He coughed occasionally as he read his main talk and addressed pilgrims in several languages.

In India, where violent attacks against minority Christians have increased in recent months, the pope said the country's centuries-old tradition of religious tolerance appeared to be "in difficulty."

"Therefore it was important to reaffirm the church's strong desire for a fruitful dialogue among the followers of all religions, which can lead to renewed relations of understanding and solidarity in the service of the whole human family," he said.

The pope said he took care to emphasize that interreligious dialogue and evangelization "are not mutually exclusive." The church's efforts to proclaim the Gospel always respect the consciences of listeners, he said. On the other hand, the freedom to exercise one's faith in society is a fundamental human right, he said.

During his 30-hour visit to Georgia, the pope said, he tried to build "new points of contact" with the Orthodox Christian majority, in the hope that at the start of the third millennium Christians could announce the Gospel to the world "with a single heart and a single soul."

He said he enjoyed cordial encounters with Georgian Orthodox Patriarch Ilia II, meetings that held out promise of a "new phase" in ecumenical relations. Pope John Paul expressed joy at celebrating Mass with the small but fortified Catholic community in the country.

The pope said he wanted to pay homage to the witness which Christians in Georgia have given over the centuries, particularly during 70 years of communist rule, an era that he said had produced many martyrs, Catholic and Orthodox.

While the pope was in Georgia, he elevated to the status of bishop Father Giuseppe Pasotto, the Georgian-based apostolic administrator of the Caucasus region. While the move was strictly a change in title and not in the church's structure, it prompted a negative reaction among some Orthodox.

Patriarch Ilia, in an interview published Nov. 17 by the Italian newspaper Avvenire, said he thought there were "not enough Catholics to justify the naming of a bishop." But he said his church would accept the pope's decision and would not make any objections. He termed the papal visit "a step forward" in relations between the two churches. He said he was particularly impressed by the pope's courage in carrying out the visit despite the physical toll it took.

Advent: A time of anticipation and hope

When I was young, the Christmas season began with the appearance of Santa and his sleigh at the end of Macy's Thanksgiving Parade. This year I began to notice newspaper advertisements for Christmas merchandise several weeks before Halloween. About the same time, television commercials were warning, "If you don't order now, we cannot guarantee delivery before Christmas." We often hear the cry "We must get back into the real meaning of Christmas," but what do we really do to prepare? Advent is the season to think about the why of Christmas — why all the preparation, decorations, parties, and gift giving?

Advent is a time to prepare, a time to look into our hearts to see if there is anything that stands in the way of Jesus' coming. If Advent is to mean anything to us today, that meaning should be centered around family and home. Attending Sunday Mass together during Advent is one way of preparing for Christmas. Advent liturgies are beautiful and inspire a self-examination that might motivate changes in our lives.

One of our weaknesses is the delusion that we have plenty of time to straighten out whatever is wrong in our lives. There is a fable about three apprentice devils who met Satan just prior to leaving for earth. All three were trying to impress Satan with the ideas they had for the ruination of souls. The first said: "I'll tell them there is no God." Satan replied: "That won't fool many; most people know God exists." The second said: "I'll tell them there is no hell!" Satan said: "That will fool no one, for everyone knows there is a hell where they will be punished for their unforgiven sins." The third said: "I'll tell them there is no hurry to seek forgiveness of their sins." Satan exclaimed: "Go forth, my son. You will ruin them by the millions!" The moral of the story? Prepare now — don't wait!

Advent is a time of anticipation and hope. Most of us have had the experience of anticipating great moments in our lives such as graduation from school, marriage or the birth of a child. Sometimes the anticipation of important events can make us so nervous we don't think we'll survive. Imagine what it must have been like in the time before Christ when people were waiting with eagerness for the Messiah. They had been told of his coming by the prophets, so they waited with nervous anticipation for his arrival. Millions and millions of people waited until their deaths and never, in their lifetime, experienced the salvation found in the words of Jesus. Spend some time each day in prayerful thought about what is to happen in just a few weeks, the celebration of the entry into our world of the human God, Jesus Christ, and enjoy the anticipation that was the hope of our ancestors.

Advent is a time to reflect upon the quality of our lives. We look into mirrors in anticipation of important events, to make sure makeup is applied correctly, hair is brushed to perfection and clothes are properly pressed. Advent is a time to use the mirror of our minds to look into our hearts and souls. If we see a destructive pattern of self-centeredness, greed, uncharitableness or injustice, it is time to change in preparation for the arrival of the one who is to make his home in our hearts.

Rev. Mr. Vincent Shaw is the permanent deacon at St. Mary Church in Greensboro.

Celebration of the life of Msgr. Koch

Last week, I was privileged to be part of the celebration of the life of Msgr. Frederick Koch at his funeral Mass at Sacred Heart Church in Pinehurst, N.C. Father Charles Mulholland of Raleigh, Father Joseph Waters of Taylorsville and I were blessed by having Father Freddie as our first pastor as newly ordained priests for the Diocese of Raleigh back in the mid '50's. We were in a small rural community of Newton Grove, in the midst of the tobacco and cotton fields, adjusting to the phenomena of segregation.

A 'Yankee' pastor was guiding us.... Most of us Yankees ourselves, venturing into an unknown mission area, where Catholics were still quite suspect, to say the least. Father Freddie, during our first few months as priests, would patiently encourage us, as we returned to the 'main' parish at Newton Grove from our mission outposts on the weekend.

Collectively and individually he would give us a new insight of what Church was all about.... He was a good teacher... he was a breath of fresh air — before there was even a hint of a Council that would open the window to a new era of Church and worship experience.

So much of my own priesthood was built on those first twelve months with this insightful pastor. For many years, I enjoyed his weekly forays into Church and secular life as editor of the Diocesan newspaper. I always put a smiling face to his written word.

I write this as a public word of gratitude for this pioneer friend, priest, and pastor. He has taken his well-deserved place in the list of the early pioneers of our Catholic Church in North Carolina... He is a true TAR HEEL APOSTLE.

Thanks to the editors for including his memorial in a recent edition of The Catholic News & Herald.

Light One Candle

Hanukkah: The miracle of light

On the evening of 4 December, Jews around the world begin the celebration of Hanukkah, which commemorates both a victory and a miracle.

First, the holiday recalls the major and unexpected military success of the Jews over the larger Syrian forces more than 2100 years ago. Then, when the Temple at Jerusalem was rededicated for worship, the great menorah was lit with oil from the only unopened container left. The oil was only enough to last one day, but it kept burning for eight days. Today, Hanukkah, which means dedication, also lasts eight days and the brightness of each home's menorah increases by one candle each night.

The real victory that is celebrated is not simply triumph over enemies, but the freedom to live and worship as one chooses. And that is forever joined to the miracle of the oil. Not only because the oil burned eight times longer than it should, but also because of the power of faith: the belief it took to even light the menorah. It is the miracle of the light of faith overcoming darkness of despair.

Michael Strassfeld, in his book, The Jewish Holidays, remarks that "By lighting the menorah, we ignite the flame in our souls, the spark that can not be extinguished, that will burn not for eight days but for eternity. We place the menorah in our windows to be visible to those passing by, just as our inner light must shine against the darkness of evil and indifference and must kindle the spirits of our fellow humans. The menorah reminds us of the miracle that no matter how dark life may be, there remains a source of light deep inside us. The light in our souls reflects and refracts the light from the One who is all brightness. This light can accompany us on our way and illumine the darkest path. We need not walk through life's paths stumbling over obstacles as though we were blind. The plague of darkness is all around us, but the light is there for those who continue to fan it into flame."

The proximity of Hanukkah to the Christian celebration of Christmas focuses the vision of all believers on the miraculous power of the light — even after a history of anti-Semitism that has encouraged ghettoes and pogroms, the Inquisition and The Holocaust.

Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel, this century's "Jewish apostle to the gentiles," exerted a profound influence on the spiritual renewal of Judaism as well as on Christians. "No religion is an island," he asserted. "We are all involved with one another. God is greater than religion." His call to examine our common faith in the God of Israel resulted in the historical document issued at the end of the Second Vatican Council which affirmed the Church's kinship with Judaism.

Now Pope John Paul II has set Ash Wednesday, 8 March, 2000, as a day for Catholics to reflect on the pain inflicted on the Jewish people by many members of the Church during its 2,000 years. What a perfect opportunity for all Christians and Jews, and indeed all people of faith, to spend the time between these two holy days to forgive and seek forgiveness for sins of intolerance.

This grace-filled season reminds us of the never-ending miracle of light which pushes back the darkness and illuminates all alike without being diminished in the process.

The Spirituality of Recycling

Brown bottles this bin, green ones here. Aluminum cans this shoot. Real important to separate #2 plastic milk jugs from #1 clear plastic soda containers. Newsprint big slot right here.

Local residents at the Madison County Recycling Center twist and turn between bins and slots sorting their recyclables till they get the hang of it. No lids on containers they go into the "Oops" bin the only part of the operation destined for the landfill.

Since the mid-1980s both rural and urban communities have initiated recycling programs to deal with household and commercial waste. Fully 76% of Americans now consider themselves environmentalists, encouraging their participation in these programs. Typically American suburban communities achieve participation rates of 80% for curbside pickup, while semi-rural Madison County alone recycled three million pounds of material in 1998.

Concerns about pollution, global warming and the depletion of natural resources have persuaded many to conserve and recycle. Yet, critics of recycling frequently hide behind arguments from economics and politics: recycling is too costly, or it represents still further government regulation.

From a faith perspective consideration focuses on personal responsibility and the common good, as well as patterns of consumption. What moral response can address the disproportionate use of resources by Americans? With only 4% of the world s population, the U.S. regularly consumes over 30% of the world s annual resources and accounts for 22% of global emissions. And, according to economist Richard Barnet, over a lifetime a child born in the U.S. will consume three times more than an Italian child, but leave 280 times more trash than a Rwandan child. American Christians need an ethic of consumption.

The three "Rs" of managing waste are "reduce, reuse and recycle." A Christian ethic of consumption would address recycling as a spiritual expression of solidarity with creation and the rest of the world. From a flyer on "Recycling Trivia": "The energy saved from recycling one glass bottle is enough to light a 100-watt bulb for four hours." And, "It takes 95% less energy to make aluminum cans from recycled cans than to make them from raw ore." Part of global responsibility and an ethic of consumption recognizes the stewardship of creation and a fairness about the use of resources. Both reusing and recycling save resources, and hence, make them more available for others.

"To reduce" forms another part of the Christian ethic of consumption. It balances the importance of things. Do people own possessions or do possessions own them? A spiritual question. Consumption aims at completing a person, enhancing a person, making that person whole. Frivolous consumption, conversely,

Question Corner

FATHER JOHN DIETZEN
CNS Columnist

Is Advent much different from Lent?

Q. I am writing about a trend in our parish recently that has made Advent almost indistinguishable from Lent. Only penitential songs are sung, the Alleluia is only recited, not sung, no decorations of any kind are allowed until Christmas Eve.

The homilies are on sinfulness and repentance. Advent Masses are almost like Good Friday. It is all very discouraging and confusing to our family. Isn't the idea of Advent to be a preparation for Christmas, with some anticipation and festivity about it? Or is this changed?

A. Assuming you reflect the circumstances accurately, the observance of Advent in your liturgies is, to say the least, unusual. Whoever is responsible for your liturgical planning seems out of touch with, or perhaps never learned, the church's tradition and teaching about this beautiful season.

Certainly there is a penitential aspect to these weeks, but their framework, spirit and focus differ significantly from that which characterizes the time of Lent.

At least since the time of St. Bernard, nearly 1,000 years ago, the time of Advent has focused on the three comings of our Lord: his birth in the incarnation, the final coming at the completion of his work of redemption and, between these two, his presence and saving power at work in the community of faith through the ages.

Advent, in other words, is primarily a time of joyous waiting, anticipating the commemoration of his birth and celebrating his continued presence and saving grace among us. All this happens under our awareness that, by living the mystery of Christ, we await with him his final victory over sin and death.

The church repeatedly emphasizes that all Advent liturgies should reflect this watchful joy. In music, visual environment and the overall tone of the liturgy, it is quite distinct from the penitential time before Easter. As the introduction to the Sacramentary (Roman Missal) says, these weeks before Christmas are a "season of devout and joyful expectation."

Throughout the centuries, even before Christianity, the acclamation "Alleluia" ("praise to the Lord") has been by nature a sung prayer. Speaking instead of singing it is like reciting instead of singing "Happy birthday to you."

The church's liturgical documents generally simply assume Alleluia is always sung. (See, for example, the 1972 decree of the Congregation for Divine Worship governing chants at Mass, No. 7). The "Instruction on Sacred Music" of the U.S. Bishops' Committee on the Liturgy says, "If not sung, the Alleluia should be omitted" (55).

gathered outside in front of the church so that they could go around the tree. This was the first time, according to Father Tanguay, that this has been done in North Carolina. They walked around three times counterclockwise to say goodbye to the old year, and then three times clockwise to welcome the New Year. They then processed into the church, where many of the Hmong had already placed bowls containing rice, eggs, flowers and candles in front of the altar. "Everyone eats an egg during the New Year so that the life given to us through our ancestors can live with us through the New Year," said Father Tanguay.

The Hmong New Year celebration traditionally begins in early December and lasts from nine days to two weeks. In Laos and Thailand, Hmong villages shut down during this time. The young women stay in their villages while the young men travel from village to village for the celebrations. Many young men find their wives this way. In the United States, the Hmong people celebrate earlier, in November, when they have a few days off from work (usually during the Thanksgiving holiday). Since many of the events take place outdoors, they also celebrate earlier to take advantage of the warmer weather.

Sunday's Mass marked the beginning of this celebration for the Hmong in this area. After the Mass, the group watched girls and women in colorful costumes perform traditional dances. Then they ate a meal consisting of many Hmong dishes, especially rice, which is also a tradition for the Hmong New Year.

Lee and his wife, Shoua Chang, have lived in the United States since 1991. They have five children, ages 13, 11, 9, 7, and 6. Lee served the Diocese of Sacramento, Calif., as one of three catechists until he came to North Carolina. The family currently resides in Marion.

Lee first came in contact with Catholicism as a boy living in the Ban Vinai refugee camp in Thailand. "When I saw the priest and catechists, I thought in my mind, when I grow up, I should be one," he said. Lee went to Catholic school in Laos and later became a catechist in 1984, serving in the refugee camp. It was there that he first met Father Tanguay, who was there to serve in the camp and to learn the Hmong language.

One of Lee's duties will be to conduct Communion services for the Hmong communities at the Catholic churches in Hickory, Morganton and Albemarle. He will also teach children's, youth and adult classes, pray for and visit the sick, and help with birth, death, burial, and marriage rituals. "It brings a lot of consolation to the older people that they can be buried properly," said Father Tanguay.

Father Whittington welcomed all in attendance during the Sunday Mass. "As we look out today, we see a strong supporting group of Guatemalans and Anglos," he said.

"Jesus, in coming to the world, transformed the family," he added. "We are not just a natural family bound by blood, but now are a supernatural family bound by baptism. We are no longer Hmong, or Guatemalan, or American, but people of Jesus."

"I see our coming together today as a great gift from God. We grow rich with each other's cultures even as we become brothers and sisters in God." ▼ dissipates the spirit.

The Catholic Committee of Appalachia produced an innovative pamphlet called "Powering Down" encouraging a special sacrifice on each first Friday of the month. In keeping with Catholic tradition of Friday as a day of self-denial, it calls Christians to scale back on energy consumption, to do more with less and to live in harmony with creation. An ethic of consumption liberates people of faith from the "must-have" mentality of materialism, while it develops a solidarity with the poor and a respect for all created life.

A Christian ethic of consumption rises above simply saving a tree or preserving a mountain. Recycling, for example, connects people with future generations and recognizes the interdependence of all life. It also reflects about personal responsibility and patterns of consumption. In this light, recycling becomes a deeply spiritual matter.

Glenmary Father John S. Rausch teaches, writes and organizes in Appalachia.

Myths about church, Jesus persist after 2,000 years

By JAMES BREIG
Catholic News Service

ALBANY, N.Y. (CNS) — Many Catholics misunderstand the nature of the church itself, according to a panel of scholars who were asked to name the greatest myth or misunderstanding about the Catholic Church among its members.

The panel, which includes theologians and history professors, was responding to the latest in a yearlong series of questions by The Evangelist, Albany diocesan newspaper, as part of its coverage of the first 2,000 years of church history.

"The greatest myth or misunderstanding is imaging the church as having all the answers or accusing the church of thinking that it has all the answers," said Father James Dallen, professor of religious studies at Gonzaga University in Spokane, Wash. "The first view is idolatrous; the second, as superficial as the view it rejects.

"The church lives by faith, not by answers. So, of course, must its members: They must take the risk of faith and not seek another security."

A similar reply came from Benedictine Father James Wiseman from the department of theology at The Catholic University of America in Washington.

"The greatest misunderstanding, even among many supposedly well-educated Catholics," Father Wiseman said, "is that practically anything the pope says is infallible."

The concept of infallibility was also chosen by Francesco C. Cesareo, associate professor of history and director of the Institute of Catholic Studies at John Carroll University in Cleveland. "Many people believe that infallibility applies to every pronouncement made by the Roman pontiff," he said.

"However, both Vatican Council I, which defined papal infallibility, and the Second Vatican Council, which confirmed papal infallibility, were clear" that infallibility only applies, he said, when the pope "as supreme pastor and teacher of all the faithful ... proclaims by a definitive act a doctrine pertaining to faith or morals."

"Since the definition of papal infallibility at the First Vatican Council, only two doctrines have been pronounced under its auspices, that of the Immaculate Conception and that of the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin Mary," Cesareo said.

Maureen A. Tilley, associate professor of religious studies at the University of Dayton in Ohio, believes that the greatest myth about the Catholic Church among its members "is a twofold mistake about the nature of the church itself. It mirrors misconceptions about Christ.

"Some see Christ as truly divine, never subject to hunger or fatigue; they forget about his true humanity. Others see Christ as just a nice guy, a great teacher, a person who was in the wrong place at the wrong time and was executed by the Romans."

In addition, "there is the tendency to see the church as a super-institution, to envision it only as a perfect entity, created before time in the mind of God," Tilley said. "At the other extreme is the idea that the church is simply a human organization, the collection of individual Christians who are just going along, doing the best they can and making lots of mistakes along the way."

William R. Barnett, associate professor of religious studies at Le Moyne College in Syracuse, chose the misunderstanding of the full humanity of Jesus on the part of some Catholics as a common flaw.

"Many Catholics readily affirm the divinity of Jesus, referring to him as God without another thought," he said, warning Catholics against "emphasizing the divinity of Jesus at the expense of his humanity in their understanding and proclamation of the tradition."

Who makes up the church is a common misunderstanding, in the view of Father Conrad Harkins, associate professor of theology at the Franciscan University of Steubenville in Ohio.

"For many centuries," he said, "vast numbers of the Catholic people have been lulled into lethargic complacency regarding their relationship with the Lord." In the past, he added, "no one expected an 'ordinary Catholic' to be holy. If a young person aspired to holiness, he or she was packed off to a nunnery, monastery, friary or seminary."

Seeing Catholics in that way, Father Harkins said, is a "great misunderstanding. It leads to a mentality that considers the demands of the Gospel met if one is safely in the 'club' of the church, and misses the challenge of the Lord's invitation to each one to grow in a personal relationship with him."

John Dwyer, who teaches at St. Bernard's Institute in Albany, also finds misunderstanding in people confusing "the church" with "the hierarchy." Such confusion, he said, "lives on in phrases such as 'the church forbids this or that action' and in questions such as 'What does the church teach on this or another matter?'"

"The apostolic ministry of popes and bishops is important, even essential for the church," he added, "but popes and bishops should never be identified with the church. We — all of us — are the church."

Jesuit Father Robert Scully, assistant professor of history at Le Moyne College, believes that the greatest myth or misunderstanding about the church is "the belief that the contemporary church (in each century) has mirrored, or at least closely resembled, the earliest Christian community."

That notion is wrong, he said. "Although the seeds of the major doctrines emanate from Christ and the apostles, the church in the first century and in the 20th century (or almost any other century) would likely seem quite foreign to each other.

"The Second Vatican Council, especially through the important concept of the development of doctrine, has taught us that there have indeed been significant changes and developments in our understanding of many central, not to mention more peripheral, Christian beliefs," Father Scully said, citing concepts of religious liberty and freedom of conscience.

Jesuit Father Ben Fiore, a professor at Canisius College in Buffalo, believes that a common myth about Catholics is that Protestants are more knowledgeable about the Bible and rely on it more than Catholics do.

"It may have been true from the Protestant Reformation until Vatican Council II that Protestants made more of the Bible in the daily life and practice of the faithful than the Catholics did," he said.

"Since Vatican II, however, the situation has changed radically," he added. "The days when Catholics were inferior to Protestants in their awareness and use of the Bible are over." ▼

Room At The Inn
5th Anniversary

Our Mission

Responding to the call of Jesus Christ to respect and affirm life from the moment of conception, Room At The Inn is a safe haven for homeless, single, pregnant mothers and their children, born and unborn. Invoking the patronage of Saint Joseph, and guided by the Magisterium of the Catholic Church, Room At The Inn seeks to help these young families move toward a new life of hopeful, independent, and healthy living.

From The Hearts of Our Residents...

"Most importantly, Room At The Inn encouraged my relationship with Jesus."

"Room At The Inn helped me get my GED and taught me how to be a good mom. I will always be grateful for them being there for me."

"My spiritual life took on a whole new meaning while I was at Room At The Inn. Jesus has become more real, and I know that He is always there for me to lean on."

"My daughter and I could never have made it without Room At The Inn. I thank God for them every day and for all they did for me while I was there."

Our Goals

Room At The Inn uses an integral approach of providing the human, intellectual, and spiritual needs of the resident mothers by:

- Providing a safe, peaceful, and Christ-centered environment that includes daily group prayer, guided study, and Sunday attendance at the church of their choice.
- Supplying immediate and long-term shelter in a secure and stable environment for themselves and their children.
- Improving their health and the health of their children by insuring proper prenatal and post-natal care, immunizations, regular check ups, referrals to medical facilities for immediate care, and health education.
- Delivering on-site life skills education in early childhood development, parenting, nutrition, money management, and chastity to assist them in becoming responsible caregivers and providers for themselves and their children.
- Requiring enrollment in a GED or associate degree program to assist in the development of the necessary career and social skills they need to obtain long term employment.
- Offering individual and group counseling to assist them in the development of positive life changes and long term coping skills.

Our Credentials

Room At The Inn, Inc. is a 501(c)3 nonprofit corporation operating in Charlotte, North Carolina. Incorporated on March 9, 1994 with the Secretary of State, Room At The Inn is a pro-life ministry of the Catholic Church and is listed in the Official Catholic Directory (P.J. Kenedy and Sons). The residence in Charlotte is licensed by the state of North Carolina to provide maternity home care and child care services. Room At The Inn serves single mothers with or without previous children regardless of their economic, social, religious, racial or ethnic backgrounds.

Since Room At The Inn's inception, over 180 single pregnant women and their children born and unborn have benefited from the long-term residential, educational, health and child care services the program provides.

This Christmas, give The Gift of Life by honoring or remembering a loved one with a charitable gift to Room At The Inn. Send your tax-deductible gift to:

Belmont monks elect new Abbot

BELMONT — Benedictine Father Placid Solari became the Right Reverend Placid David Solari, OSB, SThD on Thanksgiving: elected by his confreres to serve his brother monks as abbot of Belmont Abbey.

With his election, Abbot Placid accepted jurisdiction as spiritual and administrative head of the abbey, also assuming the role of chancellor of the Benedictine Belmont Abbey college.

"It's an enormous honor to be asked ... to take on that role," says Abbot Placid. "It is very humbling." For the new abbot, it means giving up the role of dean of the college, a position he's held for four years. "Although," he says, "I will be very much a part of the college as chancellor, and intend to continue to teach a course, if that's possible."

While the abbot heads all functions of the abbey, first and foremost, he is spiritual father to the 20 monks in residence. "To make sure the monks can see God. That is what we're there for." says Abbot Placid. "We do a lot of other work, but there is a proper balance."

In some respects, Abbot Placid sees his role as orchestrating a vision of what Benedictine life ought to be at Belmont Abbey at this time and in the future. Fulfilling the traditional mission of Belmont Abbey and college and the local church as a monastic community, says Abbot Placid. Creating a synergy of what has been and

Rabbi hopes pope's millennium message heeded by all faiths

GREENSBURG, Pa. (CNS) — Rabbi A. James Rudin hopes people, no matter their faith, follow Pope John Paul II's advice when the third millennium arrives. "It's so important to use the millennium not as a time to have a nice drink and write our checks with the year 2000, but to use it as the pope suggests: as a time of introspection and repentance," said Rabbi Rudin. "It provides an opportunity for other religions to gather together with Christ and take stock. That's certainly how Jews can join with our Christian neighbors." Rabbi Rudin, national interreligious affairs director for the New York-based American Jewish Committee, was interviewed before a Nov. 28 talk at an interfaith gathering to open the Diocese of Greensburg's Jubilee 2000 celebration.

Israeli official rejects accusation of stirring antagonisms

ROME (CNS) — Israel's ambassador to the Vatican rejected a Vatican accusation that his government was stirring up religious antagonisms by its approval of a new mosque next to a major Christian shrine. Ambassador Aharon Lopez said the Israeli government had effectively defused Christian-Muslim tensions by allowing a smaller mosque to be built adjacent to the Basilica of the Annunciation in Nazareth. The whole episode was being "overdramatized," Lopez said Nov. 26 in a meeting with reporters in his Rome office.

Priests charged in Sudan refuse to accept government amnesty

ROME (CNS) — Two priests charged by Sudan with terrorism have refused to accept a government amnesty because it would imply confession of guilt, said MISNA, a missionary new service based in Rome. Fathers Hilary Boma and Lino Sebit of the Archdiocese of Khartoum, Sudan, have decided to continue with their trial, in the hope of receiving "full absolution" from the terrorism charges, MISNA said Nov. 26. The two priests were arrested in July and August 1998 after a series of bombings in Khartoum, the capital of Sudan. Initially, they were on trial with more than a dozen defendants before a military court; earlier this year, their case was transferred to a local civil tribunal.

Evangelical, Catholic scholars discuss communion, witness

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Meeting for the first time in the United States, an international dialogue team of evangelical and Catholic scholars discussed Christian witness, religious freedom, proselytism and the meaning of church communion. "As we listened jointly to the Scriptures, prayed together and spoke the truth to one another in love, we recognized and rejoiced in the fellowship we have in Christ based on our common faith in him," the 13-member group said in a communique at the end of the meeting. The participants cited a number of points of agreement but acknowledged "sharp differences" on other issues, including who should be regarded as "unchurched" or "nominal Christians."

Bishops see improved church freedom in Vietnam, call for more

WASHINGTON (CNS) — After a visit to Vietnam this year, four U.S. bishops came away appreciative of improvements in religious freedom but with criticism of some ongoing problems. In a statement issued Nov. 24, the feast of the Martyrs of Vietnam, Bishop Joseph A. Fiorenza of Galveston-Houston, president of the U.S. bishops' conference, described the Aug. 26-Sept. 2 visit as one of friendship and solidarity with the church of Vietnam. The bishops "came away with a new appreciation of the spiritual dynamism of a people who have suffered as much as any other in this violent century, and who have every right to look to the church in other countries to offer them solace, solidarity and support," Bishop Fiorenza said.

Colombian government, bishops set up fund to rebuild churches

BOGOTA, Colombia (CNS) — Government officials and the Colombian bishops' conference have created a fund to rebuild several Catholic churches destroyed by guerrilla groups and paramilitaries in rural areas in the country. Fernando Medellin, an official of the Ministry of the Interior that will head the fund, explained that the Social Solidarity Network will solicit donations from individuals and corporations to help rebuild churches destroyed by political violence. Medellin said that "unlike churches burned or destroyed by acts of God or common crime, churches destroyed as a consequence of political violence are not covered by insurance companies."

Charlotte couple takes on flooding damage in eastern Carolina

By ALESHA M. PRICE
Staff Writer

CHARLOTTE — Floodwaters have drained away, and the 1999 hurricane season is over. Clean-up efforts are now the focus for many eastern North Carolina residents who were the bull's eye for the now infamous hurricanes Dennis, Irene, and the most devastating of all, Floyd.

One couple from St. Patrick Cathedral decided to travel to Princeville, Rocky Mount and Tarboro to help with the assistance sponsored by the Salvation Army.

"I had no idea what to expect before I went there. Living in Louisiana for 20 years exposed us to hurricanes and floods on a regular basis, but this area has never had flooding like this before," said Rosemary Hubbard. "The smell of the mold is so sickening that it chokes you. Once you go over there, it changes you."

She and husband Allen traveled to some of the devastated cities and towns, mostly in Edgecombe County, to offer their skills to groups already in place.

"My husband had previously worked professionally with an African-American Baptist church community in Rocky Mount and had established a connection with many of the families. We also wanted to see what was going on with the Catholic churches," explained Mrs. Hubbard.

She spoke with Father JaVon Saxon from Our Lady of Perpetual Help Church and School in Rocky Mount, who said that 27 of their families have been left homeless from the floods. The school now has seven of its children attending with tuition waivers because their families are without homes and businesses. Father Saxon wonders how the teachers will be able to be paid in the coming months.

While Mrs. Hubbard worked mostly at the distribution center sorting clothes and handing out food and other types of assistance, Mr. Hubbard worked with a crew from the Charlotte area Habitat for Humanity, led by Bob Greene, executive director. He helped tear out ruined sheet rock, damaged wiring and insulation in many homes for two days in Chinquapin in Duplin County and also spent time in other cities also helping with distribution.

Mr. Hubbard said, "It is very depressing to see house after house destroyed. One family had been living in a house with no walls because they have nowhere else to go."

"I wasn't ready for the long lines of people waiting for aid. Most of them were in a daze, and some felt too humble to ask for things that they desperately needed. Even something simple like a toothbrush gave some people so much joy. It was heartbreaking," said Mrs. Hubbard.

Unfortunately, more of that same type of destruction seems to be everywhere in many of those counties. In Edgecombe County alone, which includes Tarboro, Rocky Mount and Princeville, there have been 7,550 applicants for federal aid with over $81 million dollars in assistance to that county alone.

The town that affected Mrs. Hubbard personally was Princeville, the oldest existing African-American town in the United States, incorporated in 1885 by free slaves. Out of 700 homes, 699 were destroyed. A $1.5 million school recently built in the town had to be bulldozed because it was destroyed by the floodwaters. All of the families in Princeville need to be adopted, suggested Mrs. Hubbard.

Mr. Hubbard, an environmental geologist, expressed concern over 400,000-plus water wells that are contaminated on properties in various counties. He said he cannot even make an educated guess on how the hurricane will impact natural resources for years to come because this type of devastation is unprecedented.

Mrs. Hubbard noticed how small gestures helped many of the people who were depressed and downtrodden. She saw someone playing a guitar in a free concert and watched a librarian read books to children to comfort them.

She noted how people will be psychologically damaged from this for years, especially children. She encountered one young boy from Rocky Mount who is now terrified of water in any form because he and his family were trapped in the attic of their house as the floodwaters slowly crept up the walls. Many of the children are

December 3, 1999

Dear Friends in Christ:

"I have been young and now I am old (PS. 37:25)" is the theme for the 1999 Retirement Fund for Religious Collection, to be taken the weekend of December 11-12.

Over the past decade, more than 30.5 million dollars have been raised on behalf of the Retirement Fund for Religious; certainly, this generous outpouring has helped defray some of the un-funded liability facing our elderly sisters, brothers and Order priests.

According to the latest survey data, 50 percent of the 73,197 women religious are older than 70; 26 percent are older than 80. Of the 17,170 men religious, 32 percent are older than 70; 11 percent are older than 80. With fewer wage earners, the religious orders continue to face a widening gap between income and expenses. Since 1987, 42 percent of our religious institutes have sold property, including some motherhouses to help fund their retirement needs.

When sisters, brothers or Order priests leave full-time paid ministry, they devote more time to prayer; they volunteer at soup kitchens; they tutor children and assist in various ways throughout their local communities. They continue in traditions of service and contemplation.

Great strides have been made, yet there is still much to be done in support of our retired religious, who continue to serve us all. Let us work together to bring hope and security to those who have given — and continue to give — so much. We ask your generous response to this appeal.

Sincerely in Christ,

Mauricio W. West

CSS aids flood victims, asks community to help

By ALESHA M. PRICE
Staff Writer

CHARLOTTE — When Catholic Social Services of Charlotte (CSS) asked two of its employees to travel to the devastated counties to work with flood relief efforts with Catholic Social Ministries of Raleigh (CSM), Barbara Douglas and Kim Vasquez quickly agreed.

Kathleen Walsh, director of CSM, contacted the Diocese of Charlotte to ask for volunteers to help with the victims in eastern North Carolina. CSS responded to that call with two of its own workers.

"In the early stages of disasters, typically, what is needed is money. Once the flood waters recede, and things begin to dry out, the massive clean-up efforts can begin," said Gerry Carter, director of Special Ministries for the Diocese of Charlotte. The Disaster Relief Program, under the Special Ministries' umbrella, is working with the interfaith task force on disaster response, a group of churches who are offering ongoing assistance.

"When CSM contacted us about human resources assistance, we were able to respond immediately," continued Carter.

Organizational Help

Barbara Douglas, administrative assistant for the Refugee Resettlement Office, and Kim Vasquez, caseworker for Programa Esperanza, went to Greenville and Tarboro to aid with paperwork and handing out supplies. Sending Douglas and Vasquez to CSM is the second part of a three-phase plan to help the flood victims, said Carter.

The first phase involves the collection of money, and to date, the Diocese of Charlotte has collected over $260,000 for the victims. The grand total for federal and state assistance to the flood victims is over $504 million dollars.

From Nov. 2 through 4, Douglas collected request forms and gave out Red Cross clean-up kits, water, and food supplies, while Vasquez translated the forms into Spanish and typed up two versions — in English and Spanish — and sat at the front desk. They also transported tools, baby supplies and food to Tarboro on Nov. 5 and 6.

They spoke with Father Bill Murphy of St. Catherine of Sienna in Tarboro to determine what those local victims needed. Vasquez also communicated with the Spanish-speaking members of the parish that emergency food stamps were available through the Department of Social Services.

Want to help?

If you would like to make a monetary donation to the flood relief efforts, you may do so through your parish or local church by indicating flood relief on the check. For those who would like to volunteer either during the week or on a weekend to travel to eastern North Carolina to help with clean up, overnight accommodations are available through Catholic Social Ministries of the Diocese of Raleigh. For more information, call Gerry Carter at (704) 370-3228 or Marlo Wallace at (704) 370-3228.

Both women are not new to this type of work. Douglas worked with victims of Hurricane Andrew mostly in Homestead, Fla., as a trained Red Cross volunteer with a disaster services background. Unfortunately, Vasquez lived it. The hurricane destroyed her Homestead family home, forcing them to start from scratch.

"I know what the people are feeling to see everything you have gone in an instant," said Vasquez.

One thing that affected Douglas the most was the trailer communities. She said they were "clean and dry but not like having your own home."

"I ask that people not forget about the victims. Simply because six months have passed doesn't mean that things are all right. Homestead took five years to rebuild. Who knows how long rebuilding efforts will take in eastern North Carolina," commented Vasquez.

"There is so much that has to be done before these people can go home," said Douglas. "With the holidays around the corner, when we celebrate so much of what makes us who we are, people should make a commitment to helping those people in some way."

Community Assistance

The third phase is the solicitation of volunteers from parishes, said Carter. When Joyce Brown read that CSS was asking the community at large to volunteer their time and skills to help people affected by the hurricane, she did not hesitate to travel with Rosemary and Allen Hubbard to work on behalf of St. Patrick.

"Early on, I had started thinking about how I could help, but I had only thought about making monetary donations through the church," said Brown. "When I read the bulletin, I thought that I should go and help."

On the weekend of Nov. 12 through 14, Brown traveled with fellow parishioners, the Hubbards, to Princeville, Tarboro and Rocky Mount to collect names of families who needed help, especially at Christmas. With the help of a teacher in Rocky Mount and other people, she gathered names of 35-50 people and placed them on the angel tree for 11:30 a.m. Mass at St. Patrick this past weekend. Within minutes, all of the names were gone. There is a great interest in trying to help, said Brown, but now, we don't have anymore names.

"Listening to people talk about their experiences was shocking," admitted Brown. "It was a surreal feeling especially in Princeville that Sunday because the town was totally void of people, cats and dogs, like something out of a science-fiction movie."

She said that one of the easiest things that people can do is to send cards and letters to the victims to let them know that they have not been forgotten.

Working for the Future

Several people have already answered the call for help to travel to the eastern half of the state. Unfortunately, much more help will be needed because experts are predicting that clean-up efforts will continue into 2001, said Carter. Tens of thousands of people have no insurance and no money to help with rebuilding.

"We are going to facilitate individuals and groups to go to eastern North Carolina do help with clean-up," said Carter. "The issue is that we may not be able to help the thousands of people, but even helping one or a few families with rebuilding their homes is something significant." ▼ having nightmares and are watching the bodies of waters to see if they will rise suddenly.

"What I have been hearing is that people feel forgotten and depressed because the attention has now shifted elsewhere," said Mrs. Hubbard. "More people from this area need to volunteer some of their time and talents to help."

The real, physical work is going on now and will continue well into the New Year. This is when people are needed the most. People need to pay more attention to what is needed to be done, said Mr. Hubbard.

What impressed both of them the most is how the churches and races have joined together to help volunteers and those in need and how people are still keeping up their spirits despite what they have experienced. The Hubbards will continue to help in whatever way they can and want others to join them in their volunteer efforts.

"Many of them have positive attitudes and are grateful for what they have," said Mr. Hubbard. "They are convinced that God has something planned for them. What He has taken away, He will provide later." ▼

Season's spirit floats through Lenoir parish

BY ELLEN NEERINCX SIGMON
CORRESPONDENT

LENOIR — A dozen parishioners from St. Francis of Assisi Catholic Church met on Sunday afternoon to eat pizza and construct a float for the town's Christmas parade the next day, Monday, Nov. 29.

"We have so many big projects going on.... We have to take time out for things like this, too," said Dale Rascoe, head of the Knights of Columbus for the parish.

One of the biggest projects the church has before it now is the construction of a new sanctuary. The cross-shaped building is starting to take shape, with a tentative schedule of spring of 2000 to lay the cornerstone, and summer of 2000 for completion.

The Knights of Columbus, the Catholic Daughters, and the Family Life Council of the church joined together to sponsor and construct the float, which depicted the Nativity. They built a stable on it and then added Christmas trees, wreaths, greenery, decorations, and lights. Several children from the church dressed in costumes and rode on the float during the parade.

Sandy Fekete, a parishioner, made five new animal costumes for the kindergartners to wear on the float. These included a rooster, a cow, a cat, a lamb, and a donkey. Three youth at the church, Lydia, Jesse, and Hannah Doll, dressed up as Mary, Joseph, and an angel, respectively, and several more parishioners dressed as angels followed behind the float on foot.

The float also included a banner with the name of the church, and a large sign at the front proclaiming, "Keep Christ in Christmas," which was the float's theme.

Lenoir has a Christmas parade annually. Rascoe said that the church has participated for the last five years, but that this was the most elaborate float so far. He also said that this was the first time that the three parish groups in the church had joined together for the project.

The parade started at 6 p.m. and followed a route through Lenoir's downtown area. ▼

Hispanic soccer team kicks up a storm of wins

BY ALESHA M. PRICE

CHARLOTTE — Former soccer pro Bob Janda knew he had much work ahead of him. As coach of the Catholic Hispanic Center Soccer team, he volunteered for the daunting task of transforming a group of non-soccer playing, non-English speaking kids into a virtually unstoppable team.

After talking to Vincentian Father Vincent Finnerty, director of the Catholic Hispanic Center, Janda went to the Masses at the center in the summer to talk to the congregation about forming an Hispanic boys' soccer team.

His Sunday recruitment resulted in gathering children, ages eight to 11, who wanted to participate in the extracurricular activity. Janda, who owns a small business, had played soccer professionally in South America and for the Madison Chargers in Wisconsin. He decided to combine his 20 years of volunteer work with the Hispanic community with his love of soccer.

"All I hoped was to get enough players for a team of 11 on the field, so we wouldn't get disqualified," admitted Janda.

Fourteen of the 16 boys and one girl had never played soccer at all. Therefore, he had to start teaching them the basics of the game in Spanish mixed with the English they would be hearing on the field. The most difficult challenge for him as coach would be trying to get them to understand the some of the adversities they would be facing, he said.

"The language barrier was a huge obstacle, and they competed against advanced teams in an established league," said Janda. "None of them had ever put on a uniform or had ever worked with referees and umpires."

They comprised one of seven

Official says Holy Land infrastructure not ready for pilgrims

JERUSALEM (CNS) — A Latin-rite Patriarchate official expressed concerns that Israeli and Palestinian infrastructure will not be ready for pilgrims at Christmas and might not be ready for the pope's scheduled visit in March. "I think a lot of infrastructure is just not there," said Father Robert Fortin, director of the Latin Patriarchate Jubilee Committee. "We have been terribly concerned about it for a long time."

Attack on Sri Lankan church kills at least 40 refugees

ROME (CNS) — At least 40 refugees were killed and 60 injured when a 450-year-old Marian shrine in Sri Lanka was shelled, according to church missionary news agencies in Rome. The Sri Lankan army and Tamil rebels blamed each other for the Nov. 21 attack at the Shrine of Our Lady of Madhu. Thirteen victims were children sleeping in a makeshift dormitory in a chapel on the premises, said the Vatican's Fides agency. Bishop Rayappu Joseph of Mannar said the attack represented an unprecedented desecration of the ancient shrine, where thousands of people have sought refuge from civil strife in recent years.

Pope likely to visit Fatima in May to beatify shepherd children

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Portuguese bishops and Vatican sources said it was likely that Pope John Paul II would visit Fatima, Portugal, next May to beatify two shepherd children who had visions of Mary in 1917. Although papal travel will be kept to a minimum during the jubilee year, it appeared the pope would visit the Marian shrine on the Feast of Our Lady of Fatima, May 13, the sources said Nov. 29. Local church officials in Portugal were said to be preparing for a possible May 12-13 visit by the pope, who has a special attachment to the Marian shrine.

Bishop's clinic protest case ends with no government appeal

NEW YORK (CNS) — The U.S. government will not appeal a federal court ruling upholding a decision to throw out criminal contempt of court charges against a retired Catholic bishop and a priest. The government's decision brings to a close a four-and-a-half-year court case involving retired Bishop George E. Lynch, 82, and Brother Fidelis Moscinski, 30, and their challenge to the federal Freedom of Access to Clinic Entrances Act. Bishop Lynch and Brother Moscinski said they were pleased with the outcome, even though it did not result in overturning the 1994 law enacted to prevent blockades of abortion clinics.

George Will says much to cheer about at century's end

DUBUQUE, Iowa (CNS) — As we head into the 21st century, Americans can cheer about the nation's social gains, including a booming economy, a declining crime rate and low unemployment, said George Will. But the nationally known columnist and television personality said there are still areas in need of improvement, including educational achievement and the level of morality. Will made the comments at Catholic-run Loras College in Dubuque. He delivered the Msgr. James Barta Distinguished Lecture in early November to a near capacity crowd of 1,800.

what can emerge.

Abbot Placid was born David Leo Solari in 1952 to the late J. Kenneth and Frances Meagher Solari of Richmond, VA. A monk of the Order of St. Benedict, he joined Belmont Abbey in 1974 and was ordained a priest in 1980. He has been a teacher of theology at Belmont Abbey since 1978 and has served as academic dean since 1996.

He is a member of the college's Board of Trustees Executive Committee. Abbot Placid is a member of the board of directors of the Ecumenical Institute of Wake Forest University. He attributes his ecumenical interest to mentoring on behalf of his predecessor, Abbot Oscar Burnett.

Abbot Placid was subpior of the monastery from 1990-1996, served as director of formation from 1991-1996 and as director of vocations from 1994-1996.

"We rejoice at the election of Father Placid as the new abbot of Belmont Abbey," said Bishop William G. Curlin. "He brings to his position years of experience both in academics and as an outstanding example of dedication to his vocation to the monastic life."

"I am confident that under his guidance, Belmont Abbey will prosper," says Bishop Curlin. "He is assured of the loving generous support of the many friends of Belmont Abbey and especially from all those who hold him in such high esteem."

In the Diocese of Charlotte, Abbot Placid has been assistant pastor of St. Michael Church in Gastonia [1979-1982] where he was director of parish religious education and had involvement with the diocesan youth ministry program. Most recently, Abbot Placid has been an instructor with the diocesan permanent diaconate program. ▼

On Jan. 15, the Benedictine calendar marks the feasts of Saints Maur and Placid, the first disciples of St. Benedict. At 10:30 on that January morning, Abbot Placid will receive the liturgical rite of the blessing of an abbot, a distinction to be bestowed by Bishop Curlin.

Vatican says fight against poverty should guide WTO meeting

By JOHN NORTON
Catholic News Service

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — As representatives from more than 100 countries began major negotiations in Seattle on world trade, the Vatican said discussions should be guided by the need to fight poverty.

In a 30-page pamphlet prepared by the Pontifical Council for Justice and Peace, the Vatican said the World Trade Organization should give priority to the needs of developing countries, increase working links with other organizations to promote development, and focus on full implementation of past agreements before tackling new issues proposed by some countries.

The WTO's third ministerial meeting, held Nov. 30-Dec. 3 in Seattle, launched the so-called "Millennium Round" of free trade negotiations. It was the first major round of trade talks since the "Uruguay Round," begun in 1986.

The Vatican enjoys permanent observer status at the World Trade Organization.

Bishop Diarmuid Martin, secretary of the Vatican justice and peace council, said the pamphlet, released at the Vatican Nov. 30, was a "stimulus for reflection" rather than a "formal document" of the council.

"The reflections are offered as a contribution to the search for new ways of strengthening a rules-based world system, in which trade and development are placed at the service of the global human community, especially in the fight against poverty," the bishop said in the pamphlet's introduction.

Quoting Mike Moore, WTO director general, the pamphlet underlines that the "aims of trade, development and the alleviation of poverty are inextricably linked."

Though previous WTO agreements have aided market liberalization in developing nations, more must be done to reduce poverty and marginalization in those countries, the pamphlet said. Over the past 10 years, the Least Developed Countries' share in international trade has dropped to just half of 1 percent, the Vatican said.

The Vatican pamphlet included several specific proposals:

— Reduce tariffs and subsidies on agricultural goods which hamper market access for developing countries.

"While subsidies may still have an importance for the agricultural development of the poorest countries, as a provisional help to gain competitiveness on international markets, they are no longer acceptable in their actual levels for developed countries," the pamphlet said.

— Formulate standards on genetically modified foods in accordance with sound science and the "principle of precaution" contained in an earlier agreement.

Scott Larsen of Philadelphia holds a huge red banner during an anti-World Trade Organization protest march at the University of Washington in Seattle Nov. 23. Officials estimate more than 30,000 protesters will be in Seattle when the WTO meeting starts Nov. 29.

Trade in genetically modified foods has significantly increased in recent decades, the Vatican said, and its "impact on plant, animal and human health is still to be definitively tested according to internationally recognized standards."

Health and quality nutrition should always be put before commercial targets, the Vatican said. It added that substantial financial support should be given to other types of agricultural research, "such as in organic agricultural systems being already applied with success in various local communities."

— Reinforce juridical and operational means to promote the transfer of technology, intellectual property rights and technical skills to developing countries.

The Vatican called for a "substantial increase of the regular WTO budget and of contributions for trade-related technical assistance" to fully integrate poor countries.

— Assist developing countries in implementing an environmental protection policy, including eliminating restrictions on trade in environmental goods and services to promote environmental technology transfer at lower costs to developing countries.

— Strengthen cooperation between the WTO and the International Labor Organization to protect workers' rights. Countries which fail to comply with the labor organization's 1998 declaration on basic workers' rights should not be automatically excluded from world markets, through economic sanctions and blockades, because it "would only penalize those who are in the most extreme poverty."

— Increase the ability of the Least Developed Countries to take advantage of opportunities provided by WTO agreements, like the mechanism to settle trade disputes between countries. A proposed Legal Advisory Center should be established without further delay, the Vatican said. The pamphlet also called for fast-tracking WTO membership requests by developing countries. ▼

Vatican says Israel's decision on mosque foments divisions

By JOHN THAVIS
Catholic News Service

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Vatican sharply criticized the Israeli government for "fomenting divisions" between religions by allowing construction of a mosque near a Catholic church in Nazareth.

The blunt Vatican statement by spokesman Joaquin Navarro-Valls was issued Nov. 23 as the cornerstone of the new mosque was placed on a lot adjacent to the Basilica of the Annunciation.

Muslim militants occupied the site nearly two years ago and announced plans to build a mosque; in October, the Israeli government stepped in and approved a smaller mosque for the site. Outraged church leaders in the Holy Land closed churches for two days Nov. 22-23 to protest the government decision.

The brief Vatican statement was its sharpest comment yet on the controversy.

"The decision of the Israeli government seems to lay the groundwork for future contrasts and tensions between the two religious communities, Christian and Islamic," Navarro-Valls said.

"I think the political authorities have a great responsibility in this case, because instead of favoring unity they are creating a foundation for fomenting divisions," he said.

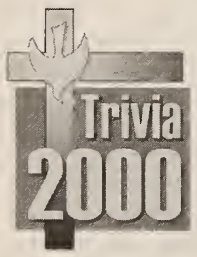
The spokesman noted that Muslim leaders in Palestine had recently asked that the mosque not be built next to the Nazareth basilica, thus showing their "solidarity with the Christian church authorities in the Holy Land."

Pope John Paul II was expected to visit Nazareth next March as part of a visit to the Holy Land. Construction of the mosque was scheduled to begin after his visit.

Both the Vatican and Palestinian church leaders, however, have hinted that the mosque controversy could alter the plans for the papal visit. ▼

Vatican to distribute 'The Pilgrim's Newspaper'

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Vatican is launching a biweekly newspaper and plans to distribute 1 million copies of each issue free.



Regular issues of "The Pilgrim's Newspaper" will be available in Italian, English, French, German, Spanish, Portuguese and Polish beginning Dec. 22, the Vatican said.

The newspaper "aims to become the traveling companion of every single pilgrim," said a statement from its publisher, the communication and documentation office of the Vatican's central jubilee committee.

Each issue will contain a detailed list of Holy Year events for the following two weeks, an explanation of the spiritual meaning of the events, information about the major pilgrimage and tourist sites in Rome and useful telephone numbers and addresses.

Volunteers will distribute the newspaper near the Vatican, Rome's major basilicas and other areas hosting a large number of Holy Year pilgrims. ▼ teams playing in the under 12 division of the Youth Christian Soccer League. This is an ecumenical league made of church teams like Our Lady of Assumption Church, Hickory Grove Baptist Church, St. John Neumann Church and others. This is the only Hispanic youth soccer team out of the 100 Hispanic young adult soccer teams in Mecklenburg County and surrounding areas.

After training and practice, they were ready for their games. Every time they stepped onto the field in their red and green uniforms, Janda felt their nervousness. The team was triumphant despite the fact they were a few steps behind everyone.

Janda said, "Initially, they didn't understand, but they got a feel for what they could and could not do. They challenged themselves to become part of an unfamiliar territory."

They met that challenge and were victorious during this fall's season; they went undefeated as league champions. They played everyone in the league once and met those same teams in the tournament, where they placed second overall.

"The majority of the kids are from Mexico with some from Peru, and they probably grew up kicking balls around in the street. Some of their skills can be said to be inherited because they grew up in an environment where soccer is prevalent," explained Janda.

This team has spawned another team of older, more experienced youth to form a team for the Challenge Soccer League in spring and fall, which may lead them to the Select League Category, both sponsored by the U.S. Youth Soccer League Teams.

"We used this team as a pilot project that will hopefully continue to develop," said Janda. "We want the program to grow, and the goal is for it to produce an athletic association for kids and adults at the Catholic Hispanic Center."

The team has lined up some corporate sponsors, and Janda is currently looking for more. For next year's youth team, the Police Athletic League of Charlotte will assist with transportation, insurance coverage and the use of fields, said Janda. He will concentrate on the team of older kids next year, while the parents who assisted him this year will take over the youth team.

"We used this team as a pilot project that will hopefully continue to develop," said Janda. "We want the program to grow, and the goal is for it to produce an athletic association for kids and adults at the Catholic Hispanic Center."

"I think this experience gave them more confidence in school, as far as discipline is concerned. It brought them closer to their families and gave them a chance to make solid friendships with other children," said Janda. "These kids will never forget this season, and this was as gratifying and as emotional for me as it was for them." ▼

The Board of Directors

The Foundation is governed by a Board of Directors composed of clergy and lay people. The Board's objective is to pursue an investment policy consistent with reasonable growth while prudently safeguarding the principal. The directors are leaders in their parishes and communities, and are accountable to both donors and recipients. This accountability includes the professional investment of The Foundation's assets while ensuring that the funds are disbursed according to the donor's wishes.

THE FOUNDATION of the Roman Catholic Diocese of Charlotte

The Foundation of the Roman Catholic Diocese of Charlotte is a nonprofit corporation, established to provide endowments for the Diocese of Charlotte and its parishes, schools, agencies and organizations. The Foundation encourages Catholics to be good stewards through gifts of assets, provides for the investment of those assets, and distributes the income to recipients. The principal remains untouched. Endowments through The Foundation are a means to greater financial stability and growth for our diocese and its entities.

Catholic Heritage Society

Honoring those who provide for the future.

The Catholic Heritage Society is the diocese's way of honoring the Christian generosity of Catholic friends who are providing for the future of the Church. Membership in the Catholic Heritage Society is open to anyone who agrees to make a planned gift to The Foundation, the Diocese of Charlotte, or any of its parishes, schools, agencies, or organizations. Consider the following planned gifts:

• A Bequest In Your Will is perhaps the simplest way to give. You can name The Foundation to receive a gift of cash or other property from your estate. You can stipulate that The Foundation receives a specified amount, a percentage of your estate, or the remainder after all other bequests are fulfilled.

• Gifts of Cash, Securities, Real Estate or other Tangible Assets sufficient to establish an endowment are an ideal way of giving to The Foundation, particularly when the donated assets are highly appreciated.

• Gifts of Life Insurance allow you to make a gift that might be larger than if you were to give an asset outright. You can give The Foundation a paid up policy that you already own, or you can purchase a policy to donate.

• Life Income Arrangements allow you to make gifts to The Foundation during your lifetime while retaining and even increasing your income from those assets for the remainder of your life. These include trusts and charitable gift annuities.

• Gifts from Retirement Plans are often an excellent method of making a planned gift to The Foundation. You can designate The Foundation as the remainder beneficiary of an IRA, 401K, or annuity to receive what is left in your retirement plan after your death.

• A Gift of a Life Estate in Real Property allows you to enjoy your home or vacation home during your lifetime, while giving you the satisfaction of knowing your Church will benefit from the gift after your death.

These and other opportunities for giving to The Foundation of the Roman Catholic Diocese of Charlotte can be explored with you. The Foundation staff will be happy to work with you and your advisors to help determine which gift is right for you. ◆

A MESSAGE FROM THE BISHOP

It is very gratifying to see the accomplishments of the Foundation of the Roman Catholic Diocese of Charlotte since its beginning five years ago. Through the Foundation, our community of faith has a tremendous opportunity to provide for the future of the church for generations to come.

I want to express my gratitude to all those who have helped make the Foundation so successful. I am particularly grateful to the individuals, living and deceased, who have established endowments in the Foundation to support the work of the Church. These individuals have shown great foresight and confidence in what the Foundation can become and have set a legacy for others to follow. I am also grateful to the pastors, principals, and agency directors who established endowments for their respective parishes, schools, and agencies. I encourage more of our individuals and Catholic entities to establish endowments in this Foundation. If you would like to add to an existing endowment or explore ways to create a new endowment, please call Jim Kelley, our Executive Director.

I also wish to express my sincere appreciation to the members of the board who serve our Catholic Community by sharing their time and talent with the Foundation. Through their commitment and the stewardship of our generous contributors, we can offer financial support to Catholic entities that will help us achieve our mission of proclaiming the Good News and teaching the Faith to succeeding generations.

As your Bishop, I know that what we do today with the Foundation will better prepare the Church to face the future.

Begging God's blessings on you and your loved ones, I am as always,

Devotedly yours in the Lord,

+ William G. Curlin

A MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

On behalf of the entire Board of Directors, I am proud to present the Foundation's 1998-99 Annual Report to the people of the Diocese of Charlotte. As this report reflects, our first five years have been ones of significant growth.

During the past year, four new endowments were added to the Foundation to support the following: Holy Angels Catholic Church, Room At The Inn, St. Gabriel Catholic School, and charitable ministries in the diocese. Those additions increase our number of endowments from 50 to 54.

Our total assets at the end of the fiscal year were $6,129,850, an increase of 16% over the previous year's amount of $5,269,918. Invested assets generated a return of 15.2% for the year ending June 30, 1999, after generating an average return of 16.9% the previous four years. We believe those numbers represent a significant accomplishment for our first five years.

In this year's report, we have included a story of an individual who established an endowment for the Catholic schools in Charlotte and a story of a couple who established a trust that will benefit their parish, an area Catholic school and the Diocese. We hope these stories will encourage other individuals, to do the same.

Our first five years have been good ones. All of us on the board are committed to expanding our current endowments and building new endowments to ensure the future of our diocese, parishes, schools and ministries.

Sincerely yours,

John Nussbaum Jr.

Education endowment to assist MACS students

By MIKE KROKOS
The Catholic News & Herald

CHARLOTTE — Joe Treacy was always committed to Catholic education. The 1967 graduate of Charlotte Catholic High School (CCHS), who also attended St. Patrick and St. Ann's elementary schools as a youngster growing up in Charlotte, spent a good portion of his adult life working to improve the parochial education offered to students. Treacy was a member of the Mecklenburg Area Catholic Schools (MACS) Board of Education from 1992-94 and a founding member of the MACS Education Foundation Board of Directors.

When Treacy passed away in 1997, he left $10,000 to the MACS Education Foundation, which raises funds for MACS schools, including CCHS. As a result, the F. Joseph Treacy, Jr. Endowment Fund was recently created in the Foundation of the Roman Catholic Diocese of Charlotte to provide tuition assistance to MACS students of single parents.

The money is earmarked for the continuation of Catholic education and the work Treacy was a part of as a MACS supporter, his widow, Sheila Treacy Williams, said. "Joe believed in evangelization, and he saw this as a way to reach out to others in the community, including non-Catholics entering our schools."

"Joe always tried to give back what was given to him," she continued. "He believed in MACS and in providing a Catholic education to all. Joe saw a place where he could make a difference (serving on the boards)."

"He also believed in the 'four r's': reading, 'riting, 'rithmetic and religion, and saw those as another reason to support Catholic education," Sheila Treacy Williams added.

While on the school board, Treacy served as chairman for two years. During that time, the decision was made to move CCHS to its present location on Pineville-Matthews Road. Treacy was also a very active member of the Capital Campaign Cabinet, which raised more than $3 million for the new high school.

As of June 30, the Treacy endowment totaled more than $11,864. The gift will continue to generate funds for MACS, because as an endowment, the principal is never used. The number of endowments in the Foundation is up to 54, and the total assets of the diocesan Foundation are at $6.1 million.

"Through his gift, Joe Treacy left a legacy that will allow MACS to grow and meet its needs in perpetuity," said Jim Kelley, executive director of the Foundation.

More and more individuals across the diocese are following the example of Treacy's legacy by remembering the church in their estate plans. Kelley added that individuals establishing endowments take another step in living out the life of stewardship. "Just as we make gifts from our monthly income, we also have an opportunity to give from the accumulated assets to endow schools, churches and other organizations in the Diocese of Charlotte," he said. ◆

Black Mountain couple sows seeds of stewardship

By JOANITA M. NELLENBACH
The Catholic News & Herald

BLACK MOUNTAIN — George and Edith Hilbert will never see the flowering of the seeds they've planted, but countless other people will enjoy the fruits of their generosity for years to come.

In late 1998, the Hilberts put 5,054 shares of Pfizer stock, worth almost $600,000, into a trust to benefit their parish, a Catholic school, and the Diocese of Charlotte.

"We couldn't have timed it better," Edith said. "It was right after Viagra (manufactured by Pfizer) came out."

The trust sold the stock. A charitable remainder uni trust, administered through Wachovia Bank, has been created for the Hilberts. The couple will receive lifelong income from the trust. After their deaths, the funds will go into an endowment in the diocesan foundation and be divided three ways: 50 percent will go to the Charlotte diocese, 25 percent to Asheville Catholic School, and 25 percent to their parish, St. Margaret Mary in Swannanoa.

"This is irrevocable," Edith said.

"We can't change our minds," George added. "We've been investing in Pfizer stock since about 1960. All we were doing was reinvesting. It got to the point where we said, at our age, what do we need more for."

They could have specified how the beneficiaries would use the money, but decided against that.

"They were very strong in saying they wanted the money to be used where it was most needed," said Cindy Rice, the diocese's director of planned giving.

Like the Hilberts during their lifetime, the beneficiaries will receive income from the endowment, but the principal will remain in the diocesan foundation to continue to generate income.

"It's a double thing," Edith said. "We get a benefit, and they get a benefit."

The Hilberts moved to Black Mountain from Schenectady, N.Y., in 1987. Married 50 years ago next month, they have no children. She was a secretary for General Electric; he was a salesman for firms in the transportation industry. And, they had invested in the stock market.

"Merrill Lynch had a plan where you could send in $40 a month," George said. "So, we did that, and we just left it there for years. If we sold it, we'd get clobbered with the capital gains taxes."

"We gain more by doing it this way," Edith said.

Among the benefits the Hilberts are enjoying is increased income from their investment. The Pfizer stock was paying them about $4,000 a year in dividends. However, the trust pays them nearly 10 times that much annually.

"In addition to the income, they get a significant charitable deduction on their income tax," Rice said, "and at some point the parish, the school and the diocese will be the beneficiary of a very generous gift." ◆

Joanita M. Nellenbach is a correspondent for The Catholic News & Herald.

"In addition to the income, they get a significant charitable deduction on their income tax and at some point the parish, the school and the diocese will be the beneficiary of a very generous gift."

N. Ireland Catholic leaders welcome coalition government

By CIAN MOLLOY
Catholic News Service

DUBLIN, Ireland (CNS) — Catholic leaders welcomed an agreement on the formation a new coalition government for Northern Ireland which they said will help build trust between Catholics and Protestants.

Archbishop Sean Brady of Armagh, Northern Ireland, hailed the Nov. 27 vote by members of the Ulster Unionist Party in favor of a peace formula that led to the formation of a cabinet in which Catholics and Protestants will share power.

He called the agreement a "further step towards building trust between the two communities." The Ulster Unionist Party is the largest Protestant party.

The agreement was needed before ministers could be appointed to the 10-member coalition cabinet and powers devolved from Britain's Parliament to the 108-member Northern Ireland Assembly created as a result of the 1998 Good Friday peace agreement.

Former U.S. Senator George Mitchell has brokered talks between unionists, who are predominantly Protestant and support continued British rule, and nationalists, who are predominantly Catholic and favor a united Ireland.

Archbishop Brady said that the most important contribution that Christians can make to the peace process is to "build trust and reconciliation."

The unionists voted in favor of the deal on the condition that the Irish Republican Army begin decommissioning of weapons by Jan. 31. If decommissioning has not started by then, David Trimble, the Ulster Unionist Party leader, will resign as first minister of the Northern Ireland assembly.

The bill allowing devolution of powers was to be passed through

Newly appointed ministers — Sinn Fein's Martin McGuinness (left), minister for education, and Bairbre de Brun (center), minister for health, social services and public safety — stand with party leader Gerry Adams at the Stormont Parliament Building in Belfast Nov. 29. Parishioners flee as naked man with sword attacks during Mass

LONDON, England (CNS) — Mass-goers at a church in south London fled in panic when a naked man wielding a sword burst into the church and attacked members of the congregation.

Eleven people needed hospital treatment after the attack during Sunday morning Mass Nov. 28 at St. Andrew's Catholic Church, Thornton Heath. A 55-year-old man was said to be in critical condition after being slashed in the face and neck and having his index finger and thumb severed.

Several parishioners subdued the attacker, a 26-year-old man from Thornton Heath who was arrested after the attack. Police gave no motive for his actions.

Witnesses said the naked man entered the church as the congregation finished the Creed.

Marie Parcou, 66, said the man was waving a three-foot sword with his right hand and silently slashing victims. She described the attack as like something out of a horror movie.

"I was just standing next to my husband, Jules, and all of a sudden the man repeatedly cut him with his sword," she said. "My husband was spouting blood and I had to pull him to the ground before the maniac chopped his head off."

Father John Lennon, 78, who was celebrating Mass, said the 400 worshippers gathered in the church were in a "terrible panic" during the attack.

"I have been a priest for 52 years and I have seen most things, but I have never seen anything like this," said Father Lennon.

"Coming down the aisle toward me was this naked man wielding a sword and hacking at people as he went. You can imagine the panic that set in," he told reporters.

Archbishop Michael Bowen of Southwark said Nov. 28 after visiting the parish: "My sympathy and prayers are with all those who have suffered from this tragedy: those who have been injured, their families, all those present at Mass this morning and the clergy and all members of this large and thriving parish community. I wish to pay tribute to those who acted so quickly and bravely to disarm the attacker and those who gave first aid to the injured."

The archbishop also thanked local members of the Salvation Army who allowed parishioners to celebrate the Sunday evening Mass in their hall.

An off-duty policeman was among those praised for tackling the attacker. Police officer Tom Tracey, a member of the choir at the church, described the man as "absolutely wild."

Attending Mass with his daughter, Tracey grabbed a pipe from the church organ and hit the attacker over the head. He was aided by a fellow worshipper, who grabbed a large cross to keep the man at bay.

Tracey told Sky News: "I looked over and I saw a man wielding a sword around. People were rushing past, and myself, along with several other male members of the parish, subdued the man just as he was near the altar.

"I was very scared but one feels obliged to try to prevent people being hurt and limit the damage as much as one can," Tracey said. "Thankfully, there were some other members of the parish who showed great bravery and backed me up." ▼

Book Review

Book documents monk's life as a Trappist at Mepkin Abbey in S.C.

REVIEWED BY PATRICK J. HAYES
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Adding to the recent spate of writing on the monastic life is a fine contribution by Paul Wilkes, "Beyond the Walls," in which Wilkes describes a series of encounters with the Trappists of Mepkin Abbey in South Carolina.

Wilkes himself has been something of a closet Trappist for most of his adult life, living for a time at St. Joseph's Abbey in Spencer, Mass., and writing about and frequenting several cloisters over the last 20 years.

"Beyond the Walls: Monastic Wisdom for Everyday Life"
By Paul Wilkes
Doubleday (New York, 1999),
245 pp., $21.00

His book is a spiritual chronicle. He does not simply rehash what he did while at the abbey, but gives the reader a peek into the monastic wisdom which he experienced. He is a devotee of Thomas Merton, but more so the Trappist life. He is also willing to invest in it by donating a portion of the book's sales to Mepkin Abbey.

Mepkin itself sits on abundant acreage once owned by Henry and Clare Booth Luce where they have their burial plot. Previously it had been a rice plantation. Today, the abbey is home to two dozen monks and 35,000 chickens. The eggs and manure that are generated there give the monastery its means of support.

The reader gets the impression that Wilkes is relaying what he managed to jot into a notebook while behind the monastery's walls. Some of this is hurried and labored, fresh and raw. The narrative, however, is balanced by eventual reflection on these notes, and the end product is of a higher grade. Although these reflective moments can sound somewhat preachy at times, they never betray anything less than an earnest, genuine voice.

Wilkes is always trying to understand himself better — as spouse, parent, writer. He finds that the stability of the monastery has a calming effect on the soul. It is especially in his relations with the monks at Mepkin that he is able to grasp who he truly is in life. Their insights are gladly received. For instance, their detachment from the outside world is the source for some of Wilkes' most compelling and melodic passages. I found his thought on detachment to be particularly engaging. "Detachment opens up to abundance," he says.

Wilkes also has a number of pithy statements strewn through the book which pop up and confront the reader, providing a spiritual jolt of sorts. Some might accuse him of trying to work through these realizations as a response to midlife crisis. He is fleeing to the abbey, they'll say. Yet, it seems to me, anyone who hungers after spiritual grounding has a makeshift abbey to which they must return, if only to check their moral compass.

Each chapter is arranged by month. They bear such titles as "Faith" or "Discernment." Wilkes has a soft-spot for solitude and the message he is sharing is as clear as a bell in the night air: Come apart from the rat race. Be still. Listen to the song of your own soul. ▼

A 10th-grader in religious education class, Patsy, had a knack for cutting to the chase. One evening, in a class about reconciliation, Patsy asked the question for the ages: "Why should you go to confession for a sin you know you are just going to turn around and do again the next week?" All eyes were riveted on the teacher as she explained that such an attitude indicated that one's heart was not fully prepared for repentance.

There was obvious discomfort among Patsy's teen-age classmates when it was suggested that reconciliation to God means committing oneself to change.

It wasn't the answer they had hoped for: Just keep going back to confession every time you do that sin and you'll be fine. On the other hand, they seemed somewhat relieved to be reminded that Jesus himself will actually provide them with the strength they need to change.

This isn't simply an adolescent concern. We all have bad habits, and it's the habitual sins that seem to be the hardest to overcome.

All of this week's readings offer repentance — turning to God — as the answer to Patsy's question. The Lord wants us to change our bad habits, to his ways, in this life to prepare ourselves to accompany him in the next.

During the season of Advent our spiritual concentration is on hope and waiting for the coming of the Lord. Readings for the second Sunday, however, emphasize our own preparation.

Peter gives us assurance that the Lord "shows you generous patience since he wants none to perish but all to come to repentance," and Isaiah promises God's powerful assistance in that matter: "Here comes with power the Lord God, who rules by his strong arm.... Like a shepherd he feeds his flock; in his arms he gathers the lambs, carrying them in his bosom."

Peter urges us to make necessary changes: "What we await are new heavens and a new earth where, according to his promise, the justice of God will reside. So, beloved, while waiting for this, make every effort to be found without stain or defilement, and at peace in his sight."

Again, the Gospel promises that a baptism of repentance leads to forgiveness of sins. In the words of John the Baptist, "I have baptized you in water; he will baptize you in the Holy Spirit."

Question:
What sinful habit do you need to ask God to help you break this Advent season so you can be better prepared for his coming?

"Here comes with power the Lord God.... Like a shepherd he feeds his flock. In his arms he gathers the lambs"

"End of Days" is overblown, violent millennium thriller

By GERRI PARE
Catholic News Service

NEW YORK (CNS) — It's Satan vs. Schwarzenegger in the violent millennium thriller, "End of Days" (Universal) — with violence as the victor.

An overwrought and overblown big-budget production, it presents a sneering Gabriel Byrne as Satan prowling the streets of New York City for a troubled young woman (Robin Tunney) born with the mark of the devil 20 years earlier. He must impregnate her in the last hour of the century so that his supremacy over heaven and hell can begin.

Byrne seems to be specializing in trashy movies with a bizarre perspective on Catholicism — in his last, "Stigmata," he played a priest out to save a seductive stigmatic from a murderous cardinal.

In this equally ludicrous plot, the pope has been aware of this woman since her birth but does not want her harmed to eliminate the millennium problem; however, a group of zealots set out to kill her before Satan can rape her.

Into this mess stumbles embittered ex-cop Schwarzenegger, a bodyguard who lost his faith when his wife and child were murdered.

After a violent encounter on the job with a mysteriously homicidal priest, Schwarzenegger finds the woman's photo in the priest's creepy hovel. Unbelievably, our hero is able to deduce the woman's name from words carved onto the priest's crucified body — which turns up on a hospital-room ceiling after a visit from Satan.

Upon confronting the woman, whom he meets as she is being attacked by zealots, the violence only escalates as he realizes Satan will stop at nothing to seduce her.

Friends and colleagues have been compromised by the evil one and only angry Arnold stands between the Prince of Darkness and Armageddon.

As directed by Peter Hyams, the flashy movie simply uses a biblical quote to unleash an ultraviolent — and utterly nonsensical — tale about the battle between good and evil played out in gritty New York City on New Year's Eve.

It's Schwarzenegger the terminator dropped into a story with a religious backdrop but no genuine spiritual concerns. In fact, the press notes present the baby girl born 20 years ago as the Antichrist while the movie focuses on Satan impregnating an innocent young woman who has no idea why she is being stalked. This contradiction only underlines how the movie is really about a continual stream of explosions, shootouts, brutal beatings and murders that are the mark of exploitative action movies.

A wholly gratuitous scene shows Satan simultaneously bedding the wife and daughter of one of his followers, ensnaring them in incestuous embrace that has nothing whatever to do with the story.

Action fans may enjoy seeing Schwarzenegger uncharacteristically brought low by a vicious mob that pummels and crucifies him, not to mention the further indignity he suffers at the end. But the movie's fiery special-effects mayhem becomes repetitive and burns itself out long before the end of "End of Days."

Because of excessive violence, frequent mindless mayhem, a perverted sexual encounter with nudity, some profanity and much rough language, the U.S. Catholic Conference classification is O — morally offensive. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is R — restricted. ▼

Recovery of lost NASA spacecraft is subject of Discovery Channel special

By HENRY HERX
Catholic News Service

NEW YORK (CNS) — The recovery of the only spacecraft ever lost by NASA is the subject of "In Search of Liberty Bell 7," premiering Sunday, Dec. 12, 9-11 p.m. EST on cable's Discovery Channel.

Liberty Bell 7 was the name of the capsule in which astronaut Virgil "Gus" Grissom made a 16-minute suborbital flight in 1961.

When the capsule splashed down in the Atlantic Ocean, its hatch opened prematurely and water poured into the cabin and Grissom's spacesuit.

Within five minutes, a Marine helicopter rescued Grissom but the waterlogged space capsule snapped its cable and sank to the ocean bottom.

Some 38 years later, an expedition was mounted to find and recover this lost piece of space history and the results are part of this documentary.

The snags and snafus encountered during the voyage, however, have less interest than the program's nostalgic account of the early years in America's space program.

With an abundance of film footage and interviews with past and present NASA personnel, the first triumphs in the Mercury program are recalled with enthusiasm.

The dark side to all this is the fact that Grissom and two other astronauts died in 1967 during an Apollo launch simulation when the pressurized cabin burst into flame.

The irony here is that the Apollo's escape hatch couldn't be opened in time to save the men, whereas that of Liberty Bell 7 seemingly popped open of its own accord.

One of the reasons for NASA's interest in recovering the capsule was to review the film taken by the cabin's camera.

This could have solved the mystery of what caused the hatch to pop open but unfortunately the waterlogged film proved unsalvageable.

Produced and directed by Peter Schnall, the program succeeds best as a homage to Grissom as a space pioneer and a review of how his death resulted in design improvements enabling the Apollo moon program to succeed. ▼

The Pope Speaks

POPE JOHN PAUL II

Pope says Christians should prepare for Advent with humility

By JOHN THAVIS
Catholic News Service

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Christians should prepare for this year's "Advent of the Great Jubilee" with a spirit of humility and penitence, Pope John Paul II said.

Speaking at a blessing Nov. 28, the first Sunday of Advent, the pope said the upcoming Holy Year called for an Advent focused on faith, free from any apocalyptic exaggerations.

"To prepare for Christmas this year means getting ready to go through the Holy Door, the symbol of passage to a new and eternal life, which was opened for us by Jesus Christ," he said.

This year's Advent should teach Christians to be more humble, to give more space to prayer and personal reflection, and to give of their time and energy to the most needy, he said.

Earlier, addressing the director and actors in the TV miniseries "Jesus" Nov. 25, the pope said he was pleased that the film would be transmitted in many countries during the Advent period. In the United States, CBS is scheduled to show the four-hour miniseries in May 2000.

The pope, who previewed the film privately, thanked those involved in the production and said he hoped more TV films could be made on religious and biblical themes.

"My strongest hope is that such films can contribute to help people of our age become more aware of the revealed message, offering satisfying answers to the questions and doubts which they are carrying in their hearts," he said.

"Jesus" was filmed in Morocco and Malta last summer and stars Jeremy Sisto as Jesus and Jacqueline Bisset as Mary.

A CBS statement earlier this year described the series as showing how Christ, "during his relatively short life, grew from a simple carpenter to a man whose spiritual teachings and loving ways continue to inspire billions of followers — nearly 2,000 years after his crucifixion."

Pope to patriarch: Catholic Church committed to Christian unity

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Catholic Church is committed to promoting Christian unity, Pope John Paul II told the spiritual leader of the world's Orthodox Christians. "The Catholic Church is prepared to do everything possible to remove the obstacles, to support the dialogue and to collaborate in every initiative aimed at making progress toward full communion in faith and in witness," the pope wrote to Patriarch Bartholomew of Constantinople. The papal message, released Nov. 30 at the Vatican, was delivered to the ecumenical Orthodox patriarch at his headquarters in Istanbul, Turkey.

Advent Reflection

SISTER PEGGY VERSTEGE, RSM
Guest Columnist

Appreciating the "deep down joy" of Advent

I mentioned to a friend that I had been asked to write a reflection about the third Sunday of Advent. He looked at me and slowly said, "The joy for Gaudete Sunday is about a deep down joy." I thought about his words. Advent joy is not the "hoopla" some people associate with joy; it is about waiting with hope and acting with justice.

Isaiah prophesizes that "the spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he has anointed me to bring the good news to the oppressed, to heal the broken-hearted and proclaim liberty to captives." Isaiah proclaims the year of Jubilee and the people respond with rejoicing: "The Lord God will cause righteousness and praise to spring up before all the nations." And St. Paul presses us onward, saying, "Rejoice always, pray without ceasing, give thanks in all circumstances."

Somehow, I could not forget the phrase "deep down joy." Can a person have a deep down joy and not express it? Would not such a joy be revealed as a light for others? Certainly such joy is not centered on personal happiness and success. A deep down joy is hope-filled and actively extended to others.

Different people who express such joy come to mind. One man is Eddie. He is so full of joy that he cannot contain it. Ed reaches out to people who have been maimed by life's difficulties. Even though Ed has had many setbacks with his own health in the last three years, he does not complain. Ed continues to reach out to others: the physically and mentally challenged, the elderly, and anyone in need. His smile and laughter brightens every room and group of people. When I wished a belated "happy 60th birthday" a few weeks ago, he simply said, "Pray I have more birthdays with zeroes in them."

Ed is fighting cancer right now. At the same time, he's planning to be part of the renovation project for the Jesuit House of Prayer and to go skiing with his four granddaughters next summer. This man is not in denial and he is not running from reality. Ed is full of joy and running over with hope.

Two other people are Jimmy and Kathy, who have a small business. Men and women come and go. When people leave the Hairplace, they depart with a new cut, another one of Jimmy's stories, and a better attitude about life. The couple share gospel hope without preaching it. Jimmy and Kathy work hard to tend the shop, their four children, a music ministry, and a small farm — but their deep down joy and love are gifts everyone receives.

In the apparition at Tepeyac, on Dec. 12, 1531, the Virgin Mary offered new life to indigenous people who experienced darkness and death after the Spanish conquest. By assuming the color and stature of the Aztec woman and addressing Juan Diego as a son and a friend, the Virgin restored dignity not to one person, but to a nation of people. The apparition on the cloak and the gift of roses in December were signs of God's active presence in the world. The story of Our Lady of Guadalupe was and is good news to the oppressed and the broken-hearted. The event heralded the creation of a new people — the mestizo.

Many have gone before us proclaiming hope and sharing the cause of our joy. As a Jubilee people, if we are to draw others to the story of salvation and to the restoration of justice in the land, are we not called to do the same?

Mercy Sister Peggy Verstege is the director of the Jesuit House of Prayer in Hot Springs.

Coming of Age

CHRISTOPHER CARSTENS

The kid glove for hurt feelings

You're talking with two other people. Your friend interrupts you again and again, taking the conversational ball away from you. Later that day you're alone together during a break. What would you do?

A kid in your group constantly teases you. He'll make fun of little things. Sometimes what he says really stings, but right afterward he'll say, "Just kidding!" and act like it shouldn't bother you. What would you say?

Your best friend has a boyfriend, and suddenly there's no shopping together, no calls, nothing. You're out in the cold. Would you say anything?

Hurt feelings come up in any friendship. Your emotions are involved, and how you express them determines how the relationship develops — or ends. People basically use one of three styles of communication.

— The passive response is not expressing yourself. Back down or say nothing.

Because we fear displeasing friends and not being liked, this can seem like a good solution. However, while you may avoid some unpleasantness, you jeopardize the relationship in the long run if you feel stepped on repeatedly.

— Aggressive responses involve blaming the other person. You attack or disrespect while expressing your feelings.

Aggressive behavior is punishing, hostile, blaming and demanding. It can involve threats, name calling and even violence. It's easily disguised as sarcasm, catty comments, gossip and "slips of the tongue."

The passive/aggressive choice is becoming silent and showing your angry, resentful feelings without saying the words directly.

You dish out hate stares. You pout. You shrug your shoulders and turn away. The only thing you do not ever do is tell the other person what upset you.

This pattern is the worst. You still feel the resentment, so you act in indirectly punishing ways. Your friend may feel upset and confused, because it's obvious that you're upset — but there's no clue about why. Solving any problems without more direct communication is just about impossible.

—The healthiest choice is assertive behavior. You express your feelings, thoughts or opinions directly, even though doing so may make you feel a little uncomfortable. You can respect the other's needs, but stick up for your own too.

When you're assertive, you do three things. You say what upset you, what the effect was on you and how it made you feel. A friend who cares about the relationship will try to make things right.

Let's go back to the friend who cuts you out of the conversation. An assertive response would be, "When you interrupt me in front of the others, I don't get to finish what I was saying, and it makes me feel like everybody else is more important than me."

To the teaser, an assertive statement might sound like, "When you pick on me and then say, 'Just kidding,' the other kids still laugh at me. I still get embarrassed and feel put down."

The friend who has left you out during a new relationship might hear: "When you don't call me, it means I don't know what's happening with you. It makes me feel like I'm not part of your life anymore."

None of those statements is an attack. Each lets the other know what the problem is, and each opens the door for a solution. That's the goal of assertive communication — preserving the relationship, not letting it get lost. It is a valuable tool for keeping your important friendships.

The thrill of Christmas

Last year at this time, a greatly gifted and respected friend, Gladys Hasty Carroll gave me her book "Christmas Through the Years," a truly wise and evocative procession of stories based on personal and family reminiscences of Christmases past — from 1898 through 1968.

What makes Gladys's stories so captivating is her belief that Christmas, for each of us, is cumulative. She explains that however Christmas may change from one year to the next, each holiday retains and adds to the thrill of all the Christmases one has experienced through his or her lifetime.

Like those cherished but fragile tree ornaments and chipped nativity figurines that reappear each year, one's collective memory of previous Christmases is a sacred treasury overflowing with the delight of giving, the comfort of receiving, and the renewal of hope and faith — and with time it grows richer.

"The twelve-year old boy approaches the holiday season clothed — however unconsciously — in that first Christmas which stamped itself upon his mind and wove itself into his life — the year he was two or three — and of the Christmas a long-eared puppy blinked at him from the top of a big stocking, another Christmas when he gave his mother the red box he made himself and which now holds her recipes on the kitchen counter.

"The girl of twenty comes to Christmas sensing not only the delight of holding her first big doll in her arms, finding a Persian kitten on the foot of her bed, knitting a pair of socks for her father, but also of carrying Christmas dinner and a basket of books and toys to children whose mother was in the hospital, of going with young friends to a midnight service, or receiving a bracelet marked with her name and the initials of a boy she may not have seen now for a long time.

"Middle-aged parents build each Christmas on the foundation of their own childhood Christmases, all their children's Christmases, and even their parents' childhood Christmases given to them long ago in stories perhaps forgotten in the rush of years, but coming back now in this quieter time of life."

In each instance, the thrill of Christmas is not in the objects, nor even in the senses it arouses. Rather, Christmas is within the human heart, if it is open; in the eyes, if they are lifted up; in the ears, if they are intensely alert.

This is so, as Gladys Hasty Carroll puts it, because "Christmas is drawn from the Source and the Cause of all wonder which too often seems so far away as to be all but inaccessible, but which at Christmas flows so close to us that if we will but receive it, whoever we are, wherever we are, we are flooded" with its thrill as if for the first time.

So, as we approach Christmas 1999, let's not be afraid to think back on each Christmas of our lives, the happy memories and the disappointing or sad or painful ones as well. They have all helped bring us to this moment. And so, of course, has the very first Christmas. One of my favorite carols is a beautiful reminder of that: "O Holy Night, the stars are brightly shining. It is the night of our dear Savior's birth. . . . A thrill of hope, the weary world rejoices for yonder breaks a new and glorious morn."

A thrill of hope. That is the gift God shares each Christmas, indeed, each day, if only we realize it.

Unabomber's brother speaks to victims of violence

A memoir by Theodore J. Kaczynski, the man who pleaded guilty to the Unabomber killings, is expected out this year. According to advance publicity the book, "Truth Versus Lies," is largely devoted to viciously tearing down his brother, David. That's because David alerted federal authorities that his only sibling might be the Unabomber. When David, along with his wife Linda and his mother Wanda, became almost certain Ted was responsible for the bombings that left three people dead and at least 22 wounded, David felt he had no choice. He had to make that heartbreaking decision.

From what I've read, Theodore Kaczynski refers in his book to his brother as homely, lazy and a Judas Iscariot, who "doesn't even have enough courage to hang himself." That is certainly far, far from the David Kaczynski I've gotten to know. I've spent time with him and found him one of the most compassionate individuals I ever met.

This came about last April when David was the keynote speaker for the annual anti-violence conference that Survivors of Homicide puts on in Connecticut. As a member of that group — all of whom have lost a loved one to murder — I help with the conference planning. Our president, Dr. Sam Rieger, thought of inviting David. We hoped that we could begin building a bridge of understanding between families on both sides who have been victimized by violence.

From what Rieger had heard about David, who works with a youth shelter in New York state, he felt our group could relate to him.

David spoke of how "the circle of pain from a violent act affects us all. The family of the wrongdoer is also devastated." He told of the intensity of the pain and loss he and his family have felt. He spoke of the love he has for his brother and how he is "puzzled and disquieted" by this "shadow of a brother I knew."

I was deeply touched when he said, "I believe one thing: The brother I grew up with, the person capable of trust and generosity, his forfeited hope, the essential human spark — all live inside him somewhere, however deeply buried they may be. It's precisely because my brother can no longer believe in them, that I must."

It took tremendous courage for David to make the choice for life — no more Unabomber victims, even if it meant turning in his brother. Last year, he and his wife received a $1 million reward from the U.S. Justice Department for their role in this investigation. They pledged the reward, after attorney's fees, to Kaczynski's victims and their families. I've also met Gary Wright, the 11th victim, another deeply spiritual man, who has become a close friend of David's. He speaks of forgiveness, saying firmly, "If I hated, that would only hurt more people."

Being with David, I felt not only his sadness, but, more important, what he has learned from pain. In his words, "There is a noble and generous quality in the human spirit, which tells us that violence and cruelty don't have to win out in the end, and we don't have to be reduced to their ugly terms and conditions because we have within us the capacity to rise above them." If only Theodore Kaczynski had understood this!

Distinguishing Eastern-Rite from Orthodox churches

Q. Your recent column about Eastern Orthodox and Catholic churches was interesting. We have some of each in our part of the country and have a problem about receiving Communion.

You explained that, according to our church's regulations, we normally receive the Eucharist in Eastern Catholic churches, not Orthodox churches. But how can one tell if a particular church is in full communion with the Holy Father, with the Latin or Roman Catholic Church? The church buildings and liturgies are usually indistinguishable.

A. All the Eastern-rite Catholic Churches in the United States are listed annually in The Official Catholic Directory, published by P. J. Kenedy and Sons. Most rectories have a copy, but of course the list may not be fully up to date.

Apart from that, there are a few general rules of thumb to distinguish between them. Most Eastern-rite churches will have either "Catholic" or "Orthodox" on the sign identifying the building, Byzantine Catholic or Greek Orthodox, for example. Usually one can tell that way.

Melkite Catholics, I believe, still follow the ancient practice of commemorating their bishop or the patriarch during the celebration of the Eucharist. Other Catholic churches commemorate the pope. Orthodox churches, of course, do not.

Many in the congregation going to Communion is another good sign. Some Orthodox leaders have recently urged more frequent Communion by their members, but if only a few receive the Eucharist, it's probably an Orthodox liturgy.

If you discover too late that you are not in a Catholic Eastern church, don't worry about it. We believe that the Orthodox churches have a valid priesthood and valid sacraments, including the Eucharist.

Annulment vs. "Pauline privilege"

Q. My son is marrying a Protestant young lady who was briefly married before. She left after two weeks of a terribly abusive marriage. She was never baptized.

After reading the brochure you sent me, I thought the "Pauline privilege" or "the privilege of the faith" would apply. But after they consulted the priest, they were told that an annulment would do.

I've been teaching CCD since I was 12 years old, am now 63 and am finishing another class, so I thought I knew at least a little. Now I'm thoroughly confused. I don't want to end up losing my son to the Catholic faith.

A. Sometimes an annulment process can be much simpler, and shorter, than going through a "privilege of the faith" or "Pauline privilege" procedure.

Much depends on the nature of the case. Circumstances in some marriage breakups are such that the longer judicial process for annulment is not necessary. From your brief description, I suspect this may be the reason for the information the priest gave your son.

I hope he is following through with the priest he talked with. Please encourage him to do that and to move as expeditiously as possible on whatever he and his prospective bride are asked to do.

Celebration of Years

Diocese of Raleigh honors history, Catholic Social Ministries, Bishop Gossman

By JOHN STRANGE
NC Catholic

FAYETTEVILLE — It was a busy day: In one special Mass Nov. 21, the Diocese of Raleigh celebrated the 75th anniversary of its founding, the 25th year with Bishop Joseph Gossman as its bishop, the 100th anniversary of Catholic social ministries in the diocese, and the coming of the "Great Jubilee" of the year 2000.

Until 1972, their was but one diocese in North Carolina. Over a quarter century has passed since the state was divided into two: The Diocese of Raleigh and the Diocese of Charlotte.

With trumpets blasting Aaron Copland's "Fanfare for the Common Man," parishioners representing nearly every Catholic community in the Diocese of Raleigh carried their communities' banners into the Crown Coliseum. Altar servers from every parish and mission then led the priests of the diocese, visiting bishops, Baltimore's Cardinal William Keeler and Bishop Gossman to the altar set up on a stage.

In his homily, Cardinal Keeler depicted the diocese as a community thriving on God's love and healing in the sacraments.

"In the history you celebrate," he said, "God's healing comes in various ways: in your 70 parishes and in the two dozen more missions and pastoral centers, God's word is proclaimed and taught."

The theme of Bishop Gossman's comments at the end of the Mass was gratitude. "As I stand here, remembering the past, rejoicing in the present, reflecting on the future, I am moved by feelings of profound joy and gratitude...."I want to express my sincere and heartfelt gratitude to my brother priests who so intimately share my ministry, to the consecrated religious who have labored so generously in our diocese for so long and to the people of our diocese, many of whom welcomed me 25 years ago and all of whom continue to this day to challenge, comfort, support and sustain me and who, against all odds, work to make me look good."

Celebrating the Diocese of Raleigh's Mass are Bishop William G. Curlin, Archbishop William Borders, retired archbishop of Baltimore, Archbishop Gabriel Montalvo, apostolic nuncio to the United States and Bishop F. Joseph Gossman, bishop of Raleigh.

Bishop Gossman said that in his "younger years," he never imagined he would leave Baltimore, where he was ordained a priests, and a bishop. But when he was named the new bishop of Raleigh 25 years ago, he discovered a diocese that covered 31,000 square miles, and boasted 38,000-plus Catholics (men, women and children), 72 priests, 137 religious sisters, "and fortunately included the Outer Banks."

"That seemed just about the right size for me — less than two Catholics per square mile, the same number of priests as Jesus had disciples and the Atlantic Seacoast besides.

"Much has changed in 25 years, but there remains one constant: God knew me well — for once here, I have never wanted to be anywhere else," Bishop Gossman said.The bishop also had words of gratitude and praise for Catholic Social Ministries, which has its roots in the day 100 years ago that Father Thomas Frederick Price, the first native priest of North Carolina and co-founder of Maryknoll, established the Nazareth Orphanage.

Several bishops from other dioceses attended the celebration. or example, retired Archbishop William Borders of Baltimore, Bishop Gossman's old boss, was present, as were Archbishop John Donoghue of Atlanta, Archbishop Oscar Lipscomb of Mobile, Ala.; and Abbot Robert Barnes of Holy Cross Abbey, Berryville, Va.

Other bishops attending were Bishops William Curlin of Charlotte; Robert Baker of Charleston, S.C.; Kevin Boland of Savannah, Ga.; Joseph Imesch, Joliet, Mich.; William Newman, an auxiliary bishop in Baltimore; Francis Roque, an auxiliary with the U.S. Military Archdiocese; and David Thompson, retired bishop of Charleston. ▼

Parliament Nov. 30 and the queen was to enact it Dec. 1. Then the Irish government will enact a bill ending the territorial claim on Northern Ireland contained in the Republic of Ireland's constitution.

Veteran justice and peace campaigner Msgr. Denis Faul said in a Nov. 30 interview, "Building trust and confidence is the biggest problem in Northern Ireland. Politicians talk about 'decommissioning,' but what the people want is security. They want to feel secure when they are going about their daily business and when they sit down with their neighbors."

Under the agreement, paramilitary groups are due to nominate representatives, whose identities will not be made public, to the Independent Commission on Decommissioning headed by Canadian Gen. John de Chastelaine.

Msgr. Faul said that the peace deal may not be all good news for Catholics. Under the power-sharing agreement, ministerial seats were allocated to the political parties on the basis of the number of seats they held in the Northern Ireland Assembly. As a result, Sinn Fein, the political wing of the IRA, secured the education and health ministries.

"These are two areas that impinge on the church and church teaching," said Msgr. Faul. "Sinn Fein is pro-abortion and their education minister, Martin McGuinness, has spoken frequently in favor of integrated education. The question now is, is Sinn Fein against Catholic education and the right of parents to educate their children according to Catholic conscience?"

Msgr. Faul also identified two areas where the peace process has yet to be fully implemented: the return of the bodies of the "disappeared" — the bodies of 10 IRA murder victims have still to be located — and the return of those exiled from Northern Ireland by paramilitary vigilantes.

Jesuit Father Brian Lennon, involved in community peace and reconciliation projects in Belfast, said in a separate interview that two other major hurdles were reform of the Royal Ulster Constabulary, Northern Ireland's police force which is unacceptable to many Catholics, and the issue of parades by Protestant organizations through Catholic neighborhoods.

Father Lennon said: "It's not as if the Northern Ireland executive is going to solve all our problems, but having it in place is a huge transformation.

"Furthermore, this is the first time that republicans (nationalist politicians linked to the IRA) will take responsibility for power with unionists. That is a massive change that cannot be underestimated. We are now about to make the future," he said.

Since the Northern Ireland "Troubles" began in 1968, more than 3,200 people have died in the conflict. ▼

Protests, events mark 10th anniversary of Jesuit murders

Diocesan parishioners among Fort Benning protesters

Thousands gather at the gates of U.S. Army's School of the Americas to urge its closing in Fort Benning, Ga., Nov. 21. The demonstration was organized by SOA Watch, a non-profit group that charges that graduates from the school have been implicated and indicted for torture, murder and massacres in Latin American countries.

COLUMBUS, Ga. (CNS) — An annual mass protest at the U.S. Army School of the Americas in Columbus, Ga., headed a long list of events marking the 10th anniversary of the assassination of six Jesuit priests, their cook and her daughter in El Salvador.

The turnout for the Nov. 21 protest at Fort Benning, where the School of the Americas has its headquarters, was nearly double that of 1998, according to Lisa Chen, spokeswoman for SOA Watch, which sponsored the protest.

Several hundred residents of western North Carolina are said to have participated in the annual event.

Of the 12,000 people gathered at the gates of Fort Benning Nov. 21, 4,500 risked arrest by crossing the line onto the base because they believe it's time to close the Army's School of the Americas that is housed at the Georgia military base.

In all, 65 people were given "ban-and-bar" orders forbidding them from such trespass in the future, and another 23 were arrested for having violated a previous ban-and-bar order, according to Chen.

The protest takes place each year near the Nov. 16 anniversary date of the Jesuit murders.

Most of the Salvadoran military figures linked to the killings were trained at the School of the Americas. But a postwar amnesty law has kept the accused from being brought to trial. In 1991, a group of lower-ranking officers and one colonel were found guilty of carrying out the killings and were briefly imprisoned before being released under the same amnesty law.

Ann Trigg of Whittier was among those who crossed the line at the protest this year. And while she was not arrested, she said the risk of being detained did not shake her belief that the school must close.

"It's been very well established that in fact there are numerous graduates from that school who actually are responsible" for atrocities in Latin America, said Trigg, pointing to the work of the United Nations Truth Commission, which reported documentation of human rights abuses in El Salvador.

Trigg, a parishioner of Our Lady of Guadalupe Church in Cherokee, said the event is "a very powerful, spiritual experience" attended by people committed to social justice. "You realize you are marching in the light of God. This is what we should be doing, and I just feel that so powerfully there at the vigil."

This year marked the 10th time this act of nonviolent civil disobedience was sponsored by SOA Watch, a nonprofit organization working to close the school. The school's opponents say it should be closed because some of its graduates have been linked to some of Latin America's worst atrocities of the last 30 years.

"It's a great honor to represent the people of Latin America," said Steve Jacobs, a member of the Catholic Worker House in Columbia, Mo., who has crossed the line three other times. "It's like they're calling out from their graves."

Jacobs, who led the procession wearing a blood-red chasuble, said that as he walked across the line he would be thinking about the late Archbishop Oscar Romero of San Salvador, who was murdered while celebrating Mass in March 1980.

Respect for life is a key reason for Betty Leone's attendance this year. A parishioner of Our Lady of the Assumption Church in Charlotte, Leone said the protest reiterates that "our interests should be respect for the lives of all of our brothers and sisters throughout the globe."

"I thank God that I am able to go down there and protest — because many people could not," she added, alluding to those who lost their lives at the hands of those accused of the Latin American horrors.

Maryknoll Father Roy Bourgeois, founder of SOA Watch, has been jailed five times in the last 15 years and spent four years in jail because of his nonviolent activities.

"It's important for some to cross the line and some to stay on this side," Father Bourgeois said. He didn't cross the line this year.

Father Bourgeois said the importance of the protest has its roots in spirituality, in standing in solidarity with the poor.

"People of faith feel, and believe, they are called to heal the poor — this is the essence of our faith," he said. "We are called to relieve the suffering of the poor, and people see the SOA as responsible for the death and oppression of the people in Latin America.

"That's solidarity at its finest when we connect our lives to the lives of the poor and oppressed." ▼

Quake-damaged upper Basilica of St. Francis reopens in Assisi

ASSISI, Italy (CNS) — Two years after an earthquake sent portions of its roof crashing to the ground, a restored and strengthened upper Basilica of St. Francis reopened in the central Italian pilgrimage town of Assisi.

A Mass to commemorate the event was tinged with sadness, as family members and others remembered the two Franciscan friars and two art technicians who died inside the church when they were buried by the falling debris in September 1997.

Cardinal Angelo Sodano, Vatican secretary of state, celebrated the liturgy Nov. 28 and blessed a new altar for the basilica. It replaced the one destroyed when a section of the church's vault came crashing down during the second of two deadly earthquakes.

Most of the upper basilica's frescoes by Italian masters Giotto and Cimabue were undamaged by the tremors. The two sections of ruined fresco have been filled in with plain plaster, the only visible remaining signs of the quake.

Two frescoed figures — St. Rufino, the patron of Assisi, and St. Vittorino — have been 80 percent restored, with thousands of tiny fragments pieced together by hand. They were displayed inside the church for the reopening Mass; restoration of the remaining figures is expected to take several years, and even then the frescoes will not be returned to their original state, according to experts.

The $30 million repair job accomplished on the basilica's structure was carried out by more than 600 workers. They strengthened the frame with steel rods, rebuilt walls, stone by stone, injected new mortar with syringes and painstakingly restored frescoes, mosaics and stained glass.

They also cleared out more than 1,500 tons of rubble from the vault of the huge basilica, reducing potential damage from future earthquakes. ▼

Germans to celebrate Christmas with flame from Bethlehem

FRANKFURT, Germany (CNS) — German Christians will celebrate Christmas this year with a special "light of peace" to mark the start of the Holy Year.

The light arrived in Germany Nov. 21 from the Church of the Nativity in Bethlehem and was to be distributed throughout the country. The project is a joint effort by the Protestant and Catholic churches in Germany, in cooperation with Christian scout movements.

The evening of Nov. 20, some 200 German pilgrims watched the flame being taken from the Eternal Light in Bethlehem, from where it was carried in a specially prepared miner's lamp to Tel Aviv airport.

The flame was placed in its own seat in business class, accompanied by a delegation from the German bishops' conference and representatives of the Protestant and Catholic scout movements.

At Frankfurt airport, the plane was greeted by some 800 Scouts as well as Protestant and Catholic bishops. After a ceremony in which two children carried the flame down the gangway, it was used to light many lamps, which were to be taken by the scouts to churches throughout Germany and neighboring countries.

On Christmas Eve in many churches, the light will burn by the manger in the Nativity scene.

The transportation of a flame in an airplane proved to be a headache for the Lufthansa security officials responsible for the flight. The flight had to be specially approved by the German Air Safety Board, with special precautions including the securing of the miner's lamp in a steel container strapped to the seat and a limit to the amount of kerosene carried in the lamp.

Bishop Hermann Josef Spital of Trier, who traveled to Bethlehem for the start of the journey, said the project will be a sign "that Christ brightens our lives and forms our age." ▼

Children receive treats in St. Nicholas pageant

In honor of the Dec. 6 feast day, St. Nicholas and his helpers made a visit to Our Lady of the Rosary Church in Lexington to hand out treats to the young parishioners during the 11 a.m. Mass on Dec. 5. Brian Scarpone, dressed as St. Nicholas, gives out oranges to Amy Hysell, 10, Katherine Barrows, 6, and Carly Wooten, 5, as others wait in line. The oranges reportedly symbolize the bags of gold that St. Nicholas tossed down the chimney of a poor family. "This involves the kids and is a way of evangelization for the parishioners," said Oblate of St.Francis de Sales Father Albert Gondek. "It teaches the parishioners about St. Nick and serves as catechesis."

Diocesan youth descend upon St. Louis to hear messages of faith and spirituality

BY ALESHA M. PRICE
STAFF WRITER

ST. LOUIS - What can draw a crowd of 23,000, mostly teenagers, to St. Louis, Missouri, for an entire weekend — a state fair, a concert or a contest? The 25th National Catholic Youth Conference took place from Nov. 18-21 and attracted thousands of young adults and their chaperones from dioceses around the country, including a group of 77 from the Diocese of Charlotte.

Over the course of four days, the group experienced a mix of Christian music, keynote speakers of all ages, workshops built around moral and social issues and fellowship with other young Catholics from across the country.

"One of the goals for dioceses like ours, where Catholics are such a small minority, is to be able to gather with other youth in a large setting," said Paul Kotlowski, diocesan director of youth ministry, who also coordinated the trip. "It is such an incredible expression and affirmation of Catholic pride and identity when 23,000 people can come together to celebrate Catholicity as the young Church."

Seventeen-year-old Kate Malone from St. Stephen Church in Elkin was selected through the Diocesan Youth Council to be the female representative at the conference.

"I decided that this was an opportunity for me to share my faith with others and to learn about the faith of others," said Malone.

The overall theme, "gateway@St.Louis.ncyc99," was significant because St. Louis is called "the gateway to the West," and the conference served as "the gateway to the millennium for the participants," said Kotlowski.

Gateway Park in downtown St. Louis was divided into eight sections, each representing the eight components of comprehensive youth ministry: advocacy, justice and service, prayer and worship, pastoral care, catechesis, leadership development, community building and evangelization. Each section featured interactive workshops and games to help the participants learn more about each component.

In the catechesis section, priests were on hand to supply the answers to questions from teens. In the justice and service section, the Catholic Campaign for Human Development sponsored an obstacle course where the teens pretended to be African refugees as they ran through the course.

The keynote speakers included Father J-Glenn Murray, director of the Office of Pastoral Liturgy and a teacher of homiletics for the Diocese of Cleveland, and Suzie McConnell Serio, a two-time Olympian, starting point guard for the WNBA's Cleveland Rockers and a motivational speaker.

Father Murray intertwined African-American spirituals throughout his keynote and urged the audience to join in the songs of praise. Serio talked about how her Catholic faith has helped her with being a mother of four and playing professional basketball.

Stephanie Ubowski, a 17-year-old student who witnessed the Columbine High School tragedy firsthand, and Chris Kielburger, the 16-year-old founder of Free the Children, an international children's organization that helps free children from poverty and exploitation, also spoke to the crowd of teens.

During Father Murray's morning address, Ubowski spoke about her ordeal of being held hostage during the April shooting rampage: "I had to lay my life into God's hands, and I had to trust God...Whatever the devil had in mind to do to our school that day had backfired in his face because people have...opened their hearts to Christ."

Kielburger was 12 when he decided to start his organization and has traveled to 35 countries and appeared on television as a representative for children all over the world.

U.S. budget pays part of nation's debt relief commitment

WASHINGTON (CNS) — The $390 billion omnibus spending bill President Clinton signed into law Nov. 29 contains $123 million for debt relief for poor countries. That figure is far more than the Republican-controlled Congress originally planned to provide, even though it is less than a third of the $370 million Clinton had asked in order to meet the U.S. debt relief commitment he announced in September. Perhaps as significantly, in a last-minute compromise, congressional opponents of the International Monetary Fund backed off their resistance to an IMF plan to make its contribution to debt relief. The new budget appropriations law includes authorization for a slightly modified version of the IMF plan.

Study suggests GenX Catholics more vocationally inclined

ST. LOUIS (CNS) — The first collection of research in a five-year project studying Generation X Catholics suggests that they are open to the possibility of ministerial service to the church, and that students involved in campus ministry are more likely to consider a vocation than others. And it suggests men are more inclined than women to pursue a religious vocation. The research also showed that college-age Catholics have relatively well-established patterns of worship retained from their high school days. The research information, which was released in November, is part of the St. Louis-based Aquinas Institute of Theology's project "Generation X: Good Ground for a New Call to Ministry."

Court plunges into questions of tax money for religious schools

WASHINGTON (CNS) — With a case over Louisiana's use of federally funded educational materials in parochial schools, the Supreme Court Dec. 1 once again waded into the murky question of just where tax money and religious schools can intersect. In oral arguments, the justices prodded attorneys for both sides in Mitchell vs. Helms to say where the constitutional line should be drawn separating acceptable tax-supported benefits in parochial schools from those that are unconstitutional. At issue is the way Louisiana spends its share of federal Chapter 2 funds, which provide instructional materials and equipment for use by children in public, private or religious schools.

Head of Pontifical Mission says flexibility is key to success

BETHLEHEM, West Bank (CNS) — The Pontifical Mission for Palestine has succeeded for 50 years because of its ability to adapt, said the organization's president. Msgr. Robert L. Stern, Pontifical Mission president, spoke at a Nov. 26 celebration in Bethlehem commemorating the mission's 50th anniversary. Over the years, the mission's flexibility has guaranteed that it meets the needs of the refugee population it serves in the Middle East, he said. "Program emphasis has shifted, and it is good to have this flexibility and constant change in our focus and priorities," he said.

Vatican delegation accompanies aid deliveries to North Korea

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Two Vatican diplomats visited North Korea in late November, the fourth in a series of humanitarian missions to the reclusive communist country since 1995, the Vatican said. Msgrs. Celestino Migliore, undersecretary for relations with states, and Paul Gallagher, a Southeast Asian specialist at the Secretariat of State, also met with government officials during their five-day visit, the Vatican press office said Dec. 1. The Vatican delegation accompanied a delivery of medical supplies to two hospitals in the Kujang district in central North Korea, then traveled to the eastern province of Wonsan to deliver a large shipment of food aid to centers for disabled and orphaned children.

Vatican blames exclusion of civil society for anti-WTO violence

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The violent demonstrations that disrupted the opening of a World Trade Organization meeting in Seattle show that the world body is doing too little to involve civil society in its decisions, a Vatican official said. "It is very clear that all over the world there is immense anxiety at globalization," Bishop Diarmuid Martin, secretary of the Pontifical Council for Justice and Peace, told Catholic News Service Dec. 1. "While condemning the violence, which is counterproductive, it is necessary to ask why there is this widespread anxiety," he said. "The WTO cannot proceed without the support of civil society, issuing decisions from on high. Civil society must be involved — citizens are the protagonists in development policy."

Book urges people to take stock, not stockpile, for new year

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Instead of stockpiling food and cash for the turn of the millennium, Americans would be wiser to take stock of their spirituality, say contributors to a new book, "The New Millennium Spiritual Journey." In the book released this fall by Skylight Paths Publishing in Woodstock, Vt., 25 leaders of various faiths share what they feel should really be people's priorities for the new millennium. "We don't want to convince you that this new millennium is somehow different from the one we are leaving behind. It's not," say the editors in the introduction. "What we do want to do for you ... is to offer tools you can use to take your spiritual temperature, and look as if through a wide-view lens at your life, in order to take charge of where you are heading and where you want to be going in your spiritual and religious life."

Belmont parishioner says service is use of God-given talents

By JIMMY ROSTAR
Associate Editor

BELMONT — When you meet Lorene Craig, you're likely to be called "good looking" or "beautiful person." Those are her favorite greetings for people she encounters — and she has encountered quite a number of folks during a life filled with service.

On Dec. 4, Craig was honored for her care in the community at the 14th annual Black Achievement Awards Banquet, sponsored by the Gaston County Organization for Community Concerns. One of more than a dozen citizens from throughout the county so honored at the banquet, Craig says her outreach to others is a calling.

The award included a plaque, gifts from well-wishers and a message from Belmont Mayor Billy Joye Jr. Craig says that she appreciates the recognition, but accolades are not why she likes to reach out.

"I was truly honored to receive that award, and I humbly accepted it," says Craig, a retired nurse and a parishioner of Queen of the Apostles Catholic Church in Belmont. "Anytime you get recognized for service to others, it makes you feel good. But we've all been placed here, and we need to use our God-given talents.

"Being a nurse, I've always felt I was placed on this earth to be of service. I'm just really thrilled to receive this award for doing something God has given me a talent to do."

She says she is especially thankful for the people who have supported her in her service, and was particularly interested in hearing the stories of others who received awards this year.

"I was honored to be along with such distinguished people," she says of the group, which included a 17-year-old high school student, a great-grandmother, an artist and a clergyman. "It's really fascinating to listen to the history of the people."

Craig worked for 22 years at Gaston Memorial Hospital. She is still a member of the Piedmont Nurses Association, and is called upon when people in and around Belmont need their blood pressure checked or their oxygen machine tubes changed.

Walter Davis of Belmont, who with wife Lovie nominated Craig for the award, says the honor is well deserved. "She always says everything is beautiful ... and she is a beautiful person," he adds. "She's always willing to give a helping hand, and people like her a lot because of the way she carries herself."

> "The Gaston County Organization for Community Concerns Inc. presents this award to Lorene R. Craig in recognition and grateful appreciation for your many years of service to your community. — Dec. 4, 1999"
> — Text of award plaque presented to Lorene Craig

Craig is active in church and civic life, too, and offers her nursing services when she can at health fairs and other gatherings. She is a member and officer in several civic, senior citizens and other organizations. And as a member of Belmont's Reid High School Class of 1955 — a group still passionately devoted to community service — she has been involved in a wealth of outreach and volunteer programs aimed at bettering the lives of others.

"I'm really blessed when people call me and ask me my advice," she says. "Sometimes people just feel sick, and you sit there and you talk to them."

Craig has learned what it means to accept help from others as well. She suffered a heart attack earlier this year, and while that has slowed her down a bit, it's made her appreciate even more the work and the gifts of all people.

"I told the man when he called me and said I had won the award that I know other people in Belmont who are in active service in this community, too," she says. "Now, I'm sickly and am trying to take care of myself.

"He said, 'Well, you might be right, Mrs. Craig, but this year is your year.'"

She says that in her profession as a nurse — and now that she is faced with her own health issues — she has learned to find meaning in all situations life has to offer.

"I would just look out the window of the hospital and thank God for His creation," she says. "It's good sometimes to be made to lay down; if you meditate on it, you can even benefit from being sick.

"When good things happen to us, it makes us feel good. But when bad things happen, you could also thank God because it lets you know that you are totally dependent upon Him for everything."

She adds that the love and support of others are blessings in themselves.

Craig is a convert to Catholicism, a faith she was introduced to by her late husband, James Anthony Craig. "I have learned a lot from being Catholic," she says, noting that she's even more focused to "greet everybody you see as if you're greeting Jesus."

Like so many other things and people that have brought her joy in her life, she speaks excitedly and lovingly of her husband. The two were high school sweethearts, married when Lorene finished nursing school, and went on to have two children, Toni and Nelson.

"He was a prayerful Catholic," she says of her husband. "Anytime the doors were open, he was in church."

Family life and close contact with friends have been gifts Craig still treasures. "My family and friends really supported me," she says of the preparation for the awards dinner. "And my classmates from high school came — can you believe this? I was just so thrilled."

Ervin N. Fewell, one of those Class of '55 graduates, drove up from Columbia, S.C., to attend the banquet. "She is a person who can organize and work closely with the community," he says of his friend. "She has done so many good things — for her classmates and her community. The name of our class was all over Gaston County and Mecklenburg County, too — and she is still a dedicated part of it."

Nelson Craig credits his mother as a hero of faith and kindness. "She's one in a million," he says. "Every day she struggled to show us the right way, and she still leads by example by doing good in her community and in surrounding areas. The people we are today, it comes from the parents that we've had. My mother's a really good person — really, truly, a very special person." ▼

Mercy Sister Mary Veronica Schumacher, former CEO of St. Joseph's, dies at age 74

CHARLOTTE — Sister Mary Veronica Schumacher, RSM, 74, died Friday, Dec. 3 at Mercy Hospital. She was received as a Sister of Mercy on August 15, 1950 and was in her 49th year.

A Mass of Christian Burial was held on Monday, Dec. 6 at the Cardinal Gibbons Chapel, Sacred Heart Chapel, Belmont, with burial at the Belmont Abbey Cemetery.

Sister Mary Veronica Schumacher, RSM

Sister Mary Veronica was born April 27, 1925 in Seymour, Conn. Her birth name was Lois Veronica Schumacher; she took the name Sister Mary Veronica upon entering the religious order of the Sisters of Mercy on Aug. 2, 1949.

She was a graduate of Sacred Heart Junior College and the Mercy Hospital School of Medical Technology. She received her Bachelor's Degree in Biology from Belmont Abbey College and went on to receive her Master's Degree in Biology from Catholic University, Washington, D.C., in 1962. Additionally, she received her certificate in Hospital Executive Development from St. Louis University.

Her first ministry assignment in 1949 was at St. Joseph's Hospital, Asheville, where she served on the laboratory staff as a medical technologist, and from 1951-1963, she served as Assistant Laboratory Supervisor. She served as an administrative assistant at both Mercy Hospital, Charlotte, and at St. Joseph's Hospital, Asheville. In 1963 she was asked to serve as Supervisor and Education Coordinator of the Laboratory at Mercy Hospital, Charlotte. She returned to the Asheville area to serve as President and Administrator of St. Joseph's Hospital, later serving as President and CEO of St. Joseph's Hospital and St. Joseph's Health Services. She had also served on the Board of Directors for Mercy Hospital, St. Joseph's Hospital and St. Mary's Hospital, Knoxville, Tenn.

She was instrumental in the 1996 agreement between Mission Memorial Hospital and St. Joseph's Hospital to establish a hospital partnership, the first of its kind in the United States. The hospital then became known as Mission + St. Joseph's Health System. It was on Oct. 26, 1998, when the Sisters of Mercy sold St. Joseph's Hospital to Memorial Mission Medical Center; Sister Mary Veronica was named Chairperson and CEO of Sisters of Mercy Services Corp., Asheville. In that capacity she continued to oversee the sponsored ministries that began in 1990 when the Sisters of Mercy arrived in Asheville to include: Mountain Health Services Inc., the Sisters of Mercy Urgent Care Inc., Mountain Health Contracting Services Inc., and McAuley Foundation Inc.

Additionally, Sister Mary Veronica honored her religious community by serving as local superior from 1967-1970 and more recently, from 1988-1992, as a Councilor on the Leadership Team of the Regional Community of the Sisters of Mercy of North Carolina. She was also a member of numerous professional medical organizations.

She is best remembered by her siblings as their guiding light. "We looked up to her and admired her dedication. We'll miss her tremendously." And although she was a voracious reader, she will also be remembered for her love of fishing, woodworking, playing the harmonica and bird watching.

Sister Mary Veronica was the daughter of the late Frank J. Schumacher and Florence Lucy Mayo Schumacher. The eldest of nine brothers and sisters, she is survived by her sisters, Florence Mastrogiannis of Ansonia, Conn.; Theo Hammack of Naugatuck, Conn.; Margaret Lesiw of Ansonia, Conn.; her five brothers and sisters-in-law, Bill and Barbara Schumacher of Shelton, Conn.; Frank J. and Doris Schumacher of Evansville, Ind.; George and Elsa Schumacher of Arlington, Va.; Dr. Robert and Cathy Schumacher of Ridgecredt, Calif.; and Vincent and Sandy Schumacher of Ansonia, Conn., as well as numerous nieces and nephews.

Memorials may be made to the Sisters of Mercy Services, Urgent Care Center, 345 Biltmore Ave., Asheville, NC 28801-4502. ▼ are suffering around us...I believe that we youth are not only the leaders of the future, not only the church of the future, but we are the leaders of today," said Kielburger.

St. Louis youth, from page 1

Young people raise their arms in prayer during the 1999 National Catholic Youth Conference in St. Louis. About 23,000 gathered for the conference Nov. 18-21.

Lucy Dillard, 15, from Our Lady of Mercy Church in Winston-Salem, was impressed by Keilburger and affected by his words: "It was empowering to think that someone so young could do so much. It is hard to imagine how many kids are out there who have so little, while we have more than what we need. I think that I could stand up for what was right if I saw an injustice or wrong being committed."

Many of the teens from the diocese were amazed at how many Catholic youth are active participants in their faith and were impressed over the large number in attendance.

"Living down South, you feel isolated as a Catholic," admitted Patrick Fleming, an eighteen-year-old parishioner at Our Lady of Grace Church in Greensboro. "This reaffirmed that we have a strong presence, even though it isn't visible. Having over 20,000 people there helped to rejuvenate my faith, which needed a spark."

Malone said, "I come from a small town with very few Catholics, so it seems there aren't many people who can relate to me. I felt so comfortable because I met so many people who have experienced the same things as myself."

Kotlowski said that the quality of prayer and worship that the kids experienced was unlike any they have experienced before. Thirty bishops and over 100 priests concelebrated the closing liturgy with included projection screens with banners and flags and a gospel with a sung response.

"This was a chance for us to celebrate, learn and pray together. The participants were evangelized, set on fire and came home excited and privileged to be Catholic," continued Kotlowski.

"This helped us to form strong bonds and become closer to people," said Michelle Shroads, 17, from St. Luke Church in Charlotte. "The youth are the future, and we need to be prepared for what lies ahead."

Eighteen-year-old Greg St. Martin from St. John Neumann Church in Charlotte, who is the leader of his parish youth group, said, "It renewed my faith, and I was able to meet people from all over the country. In society, you don't see positive images in the media; movies, books and TV shows tell you to do whatever you want. It was nice seeing kids who are my age who also feel that it is cool not having pre-marital sex or not doing drugs."

"The conference taught me to be proud of my religion, to be courageous and to be a witness," he continued.

This year's conference was hosted by the Archdiocese of St. Louis and sponsored by the National Federation for Catholic Youth Ministry Inc. The federation is made up of all dioceses in the country and is dedicated to the promotion of quality youth ministry and youth ministers by generating. The group also sponsors a conference for youth ministry professionals, explained Kotlowski. ▼

Asheville parishioners assist in Haiti missionary effort

By DIANNE RIGGS
Correspondent

When Joe Miller, an Asheville building contractor, went to Jamaica in 1997 as part of a week long work team from St. Eugene Church in Asheville, little did he know that two years later, he and his wife, Diane, would be in Haiti "assessing the needs" and planning how they could help in the work being done by the missionaries of the Poor in the Haitian port city, Cap Haitien.

"If you could imagine the worst show you have ever seen on television about poverty and the needs of people in a poverty stricken country, what I saw was worse," said Diane. She described small shacks made of intertwined grapevines covered with plastic bags, spanning large sections of Cap Haitien's hillside ghettos, and naked, malnourished children.

This past August Joe and Diane spent time with the "Brothers," as they call the Missionaries of the Poor, walking in the ghettos of the city, talking about the Brothers' plans for a church/school building, visiting with people in the Asile," a 200 bed shelter for the physically or mentally incapacitated with no where else to go.

The Jamaican-based Missionaries of the Poor are a religious order of brothers and priests, recently including nuns. They take not only a vow of poverty, but a vow to serve the poor the rest of their lives, said Diane. The order was begun in 1981 by Father Richard Ho Lung, who has been called the "male Mother Teresa." Today, the more than 100 members of the order are serving in Jamaica, Haiti, the Philippines and India. "They go into areas and create homeless shelters for the ill and abandoned," she said. The Brothers also, with the help of U.S. work teams, build simple homes and are active in helping children attend school and feeding hungry people.

Currently, the eight MOP in Haiti care for about 150 people in the Asile, feed about 300 who come to their gates for food, tutor and feed 50 children whom they have assisted in enrolling in the public school,provide water for the neighboring communities and minister the Gospel to the people in the ghettos.

"I see building a place of worship where they can come to know Christ as a number one priority," said Joe. One of the main needs that the MOP have expressed is the building of a 72 by 54 foot cement block building to be used as a church and a school. The church would serve the Brothers, the residents of the Asile and the neighboring areas, while the school area would offer educational opportunity to the children of the Asile and the local community. Joe estimates it will cost about $150,000 but emphasizes that the Haitians, who are able to make cement blocks, will gain employment as well.

"We are hoping to go down there in January to lay out the area for the foundation," he said. The Millers are also hoping to raise $30,000 in the near future from churches and individuals to fund that foundation.

In addition, they want to recruit ten churches who would send volunteers down to Haiti to act as "family" one or two times a year to build 10 by 12 foot shelters like the ones in Jamaica and work with the Brothers in the Asile, caring for the residents.

"At first, we worried about going to Haiti," said Diane. "We thought voodoo was everywhere. But when we arrived, we noticed all of the people were smiling. They were all walking with a purpose." She was surprised that with the living conditions being what the are, the people seemed happy. "They are a loving, caring people," she said.

Living conditions in Haiti are extremely substandard. Indeed, Haiti has been called the "Calcutta of the Western Hemisphere" said Diane. It is one of the most densely populated countries on earth, with only 35 percent adult literacy, 70 percent unemployment, a per capita income of $340 and inflation above 16 percent according to a 1997 U.S. Department of State bulletin. The cost of living is very high because most items must be imported. Most people have no electricity, no telephones and no drinkable water.

The typical poor Haitian's day is remarkably different from that of an American, said Joe. The entire purpose of the day is spent finding one's basic needs: a log to make charcoal for cooking fuel; bananas for a meal. "They were really ecstatic just to see us," he said. "When we took pictures and the flash went off, they would burst into clapping and cheering."

These experiences in Haiti and Jamaica have greatly affected the Millers' view of life, causing them to question the meaning of their lives and their priorities. "Our focus in the US is to obtain financial security and material possessions, and when you see what others are dealing with who don't have the necessities of life, like drinkable water, it's hard to go back to everyday life and feel like you're doing something important. You feel like helping people in need is what is really important," said Joe.

"I have come to know that through service, one grows closer to Christ," said Diane. "It's like you're blind and deaf, and then able to see and hear the truth." ▼

Day chosen as top lay person of 20th century

A group of church historians and theologians chose Dorothy Day as the 20th century's most outstanding lay Catholic. Day, co-founder of the Catholic Worker movement, spent her adult life as an advocate for the poor and the rights of workers.

Maryknollers win Catholic Volunteer Service Award

MARYKNOLL, N.Y. (CNS) — The Maryknoll mission family, which includes priests, brothers, sisters and lay people, has received the 1999 Father George Mader Award for fostering the role of missioners in the Catholic church and society.

Named as a co-winner was the Raskob Foundation for Catholic Activities.

The annual award, presented in November in Washington, is given by the Catholic Network of Volunteer Service to individuals or organizations that have been "exemplary in fostering the role of lay missioners in the catholic Church and society."

Created in 1987, it is named for a priest of the Archdiocese of Newark, N.J., who in 1963 founded the network, a nonprofit membership organization of about 180 U.S. and international volunteer and lay mission programs.

The organization's board of directors chose Maryknoll as one of the winners for its long-standing commitment to mission and the role of laity, according to a Maryknoll announcement on the award.

Executive director James Lindsay praised Maryknoll for not only providing mission opportunities for singles, married couples and families to work with clergy and religious "to further the church's mission," but also for sharing "experience and wisdom" through mission education and cross-cultural training.

Accepting the award was Vicki Armour-Hileman, a member of the leadership team for the Maryknoll Mission Association of the Faithful, the congregation's arm for lay, clergy and religious associates. She noted that about one-third of lay people serving overseas in missions are Maryknollers. ▼

Many refugees unaware East Timor is safe, says CRS spokesman

DILI, East Timor (CNS) — Many East Timorese are hesitant to return home because they do not know it is safe, said a Catholic Relief Services spokesman visiting Timor. Conditions in heavily damaged East Timor are better than in the government-run refugee camps of western Timor, but relief workers face a problem "getting the word out to refugees in western Timor that it is safe in East Timor — they can come back, there is food here, they can go back and restart their lives," said Tom Price, director of media relations for Catholic Relief Services, the U.S. bishops' international relief and development agency.

Pro-life leaders decry draft guidelines on stem-cell research

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Draft guidelines for human stem-cell research from the National Institutes of Health erode respect for human life and suggest "a utilitarian ethic," said pro-life leaders. Richard Doerflinger, associate director of the U.S. Catholic bishops' Secretariat for Pro-Life Activities, said Dec. 1 that the proposed guidelines "authorize use of taxpayer funds for research on stem cells obtained by destroying live human embryos." The American Life League said in a Dec. 2 statement that the guidelines smack of "a utilitarian ethic that places the alleged greater good of society above the intrinsic value of the tiniest person, the human being at fertilization."

Despite battle with Air Force, Catholic officer makes captain

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Despite his public stand against serving with women on two-person missile alert crews, Air Force Lt. Ryan C. Berry has been promoted to captain. The Catholic officer, whose cause was widely publicized last summer, said he believed mixed-sex duty would create "an occasion of sin." He feared that his battle with the Air Force over the issues of religious accommodation and a negative service record would prevent his promotion to captain. Without advancement, Berry would have been forced to leave the Air Force when his enlistment ended in 2002. According to a statement from the Washington-based Becket Fund for Religious Liberty, the public interest law firm representing Berry, the officer was notified of his promotion Nov. 18.

Testimonial project by Spielberg foundation readied for schools

LOS ANGELES (CNS) — Filmmaker Steven Spielberg wants Catholic schools nationwide to embrace the lessons from the 50,441 Holocaust testimonies collected by his Survivors of the Shoah Visual History Foundation. "I'm hoping that with something like this, with youngsters better educated, Columbine won't happen again," Spielberg said in an interview at a foundation fund-raising dinner at Universal Pictures. "We want to revise social sciences," he said. "You cannot just teach the Holocaust without teaching about black slavery, civil rights or the liquidation of the Native American population, and every other intolerance that you can imagine." Those issues have to be "taught comprehensively" and "taught together," he added.

In Mexico, U.N. official receives church report on Chiapas

MEXICO CITY (CNS) — During a five-day tour of Mexico, the U.N. human rights commissioner received a church report on rights abuses in the troubled southern state of Chiapas and urged renewed peace talks in the state. Mary Robinson, U.N. High Commissioner for Human Rights, met Nov. 27 in Tuxtla Gutierrez, Chiapas, with Bishops Samuel Ruiz Garcia of San Cristobal de las Casas and Felipe Aguirre Franco of Tuxtla Gutierrez. Bishop Ruiz, president of the diocesan human rights office, the Fray Bartolome de las Casas Human Rights Center, presented Robinson with a 20-page report that said abuses were being aggravated by a "low-intensity war" by the government against the mostly indigenous Zapatista National Liberation Army.

Feast of St. Nicholas a reminder of season's true spirit

By JIMMY ROSTAR
Associate Editor

"A thousand years from now, Virginia, nay, ten thousand years from now, he will continue to make glad the heart of childhood."

The year was 1897 when Virginia O'Hanlon, 8 years old, wrote a letter to the editor of The New York Sun asking about Santa Claus. The editor, Francis P. Church, didn't go into the chronicle of good St. Nicholas, one of Santa's historical predecessors, in his response to the little girl. But his message to her — replete with mentions of love and generosity and childlike faith — includes descriptions often applied to the fourth-century saint so warmly associated with the Christmas season.

What is known about St. Nicholas for sure is that he earned great esteem as a pious priest, served faithfully as a zealous bishop and his feast on the Roman liturgical calendar is observed Dec. 6. Much beyond that, his story is a blend of history, legend and celebrated spirit.

The beloved saint first rose to fame not at the helm of a flying sleigh taking off from the North Pole, but from the bishop's cathedra in Myra, the see city of a dilapidated diocese located in an area that is now Turkey. He is believed in some circles to have come from a family of privilege and, having been ordained to the priesthood by an uncle, gave away all he owned when he entered the monastery as a monk.

He gained a reputation as a man of immense holiness, and soon became a bishop known for his great love of the faith. At the church's Council of Nicaea in 325, he reportedly condemned Arianism, which holds that Jesus is not of the same substance as God, and signed a document attesting to Christ's divinity.

Nicholas was allegedly imprisoned for his religious beliefs and, by the mid-fourth century, had surely earned an authentic legacy as a true believer and advocate of Christ.

It is that latter distinction and his legendary benevolence that make him a reminder of the real reason for the Advent and Christmas seasons, says Father Thomas Stott, who has great admiration for St. Nicholas.

"The feast of St. Nicholas is a time to stop, look and listen," says Father Stott, pastor of Holy Angels Church in Mount Airy, where a relic of St. Nicholas is displayed. "It is a time to remind us of the genuine, eternal God becoming incarnate and being manifested on this coming Christmas Day. That's what the feast day is all about."

Adding to what is known as fact about him, the legends of Nicholas' good works became as widespread as his popularity through the centuries. Biographies vary on the lengths to which Nicholas reached out to the poor, although his charity seems to be generally agreed upon.

Popular — and not-so-known — stories of Nicholas' kindness involve him giving dowries for three daughters of a destitute father, rescuing three innocent men condemned to death by a governor, resuscitating three children killed by an innkeeper, and, by appearing to a group storm-ravaged sailors, guiding them safely to port after they invoked his aid.

Traditions like these not only gave way to increasing devotion by the faithful, but also led Nicholas to become the patron of sailors, prisoners and children, among others, as well as several European countries and Russia. It is from his patronage of children that led to gift-giving in his name at Christmas time, a practice whose origins are especially traced to Germany, the Netherlands and Switzerland.

Relics of St. Nicholas were relocated from Myra in 1087 to Bari, Italy, where a shrine dedicated in his honor became a popular pilgrimage center and further increased veneration of the saint. By this time, miracles throughout Europe and Asia were being attributed to St. Nicholas' intercession. It's estimated that there are more than 2,000 churches in Europe named in his honor, and St. Nicholas is one of the most frequently represented saints in Christian art.

Father Stott says St. Nicholas is but one example of how the saints are great teachers of God's grace.

"The plurality and diversity of the saints demonstrate the unfathomable depth of God," he says. "What God has allowed is that they be remembered; much of the stories are legends, but the person is remembered." ▼

Inquiry begins into Mother Teresa's intercession in alleged cure

CALCUTTA, India (CNS) — A church inquiry has began in the Archdiocese of Calcutta into an alleged miraculous cure through Mother Teresa's intercession.

The inquiry formally began Nov. 25 when an eight-member tribunal took an oath of office and secrecy at a 30-minute opening session in Calcutta, eastern India, to study the case.

A nun of the Missionaries of Charity, the order founded by Mother Teresa, was questioned as part of the inquiry Nov. 26, reported UCA News, an Asian church news agency based in Thailand.

Missionaries of Charity Father Brian Kolodiejchuk, postulator of the canonization cause of Mother Teresa, said the alleged miracle involved a 30-year-old woman in Raiganj, some 250 miles north of Calcutta, who had a stomach tumor.

When doctors found her too weak to be operated on, three Missionaries of Charity nuns placed on the woman's stomach a medal that had earlier touched Mother Teresa's body, and they prayed over the woman.

The woman immediately felt lighter and all pain disappeared, witnesses said. The next morning, the stomach returned to its normal size, said the priest citing the same witnesses.

"Proof of a miracle is not easy," Father Kolodiejchuk told UCA News, "and medical experts are called to testify whether such a cure could be explained by medical science."

The postulator declined to release the names of either the cured woman or the nun interviewed at a closed session in the Calcutta archbishop's house.

At the session, the postulator presented Archbishop Henry D'Souza of Calcutta, head of the investigation, his mandate of appointment and a petition to initiate an inquiry into the alleged cure.

The chancellor of the Calcutta Archdiocese, Father Hansel D'Souza, read the dispensation in which Pope John Paul II lifted the standard five-year waiting period for investigating the sainthood cause of Mother Teresa.

The oath takers included a medical expert to study the case and two others, who will examine the cure independently. No names were revealed, reportedly to avoid harassment, church sources said.

Father Kolodiejchuk presented Archbishop D'Souza with a list of witnesses and a questionnaire for their examination, and asked for the right to produce more names, if necessary.

The postulator said that while the first tribunal continues to question witnesses and to collect information on Mother Teresa's life and virtues, the latest tribunal would collect information only on the reported Raiganj miracle.

Although there have been reports of several miracles in eastern India, only the Raiganj case was chosen for investigation initially, as it seemed to fit the required criteria best, the postulator said.

If the cure is not proven to be "a real miracle," the tribunal will examine another case, he added.

Archbishop D'Souza described the oath-taking session as the first step to gather information on a possible miraculous cure.

In the second step, the tribunal will send a report to the Vatican Congregation for Sainthood Causes for examination. In the third and final phase, the report is sent to the pope for judgment. In general, two miracles need to be accepted by the church as having occurred through the intercession of a prospective saint.

Missionaries of Charity superior Sister Nirmala Joshi told UCA News that they were "very happy and still praying for Mother's canonization."

She said that many people have sent letters claiming cures and favors from Mother Teresa, but they "were not completely or medically documented."

Missionaries of Charity founder and Nobel Peace laureate Mother Teresa based her life and work in Calcutta, where she died of cardiac arrest Sept. 5, 1997, at the age of 87. ▼

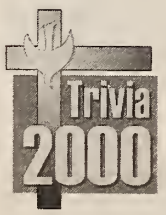
New videos feature pope's activities, jubilee themes

By LYNNE WEIL
Catholic News Service

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Vatican has issued 10 videocassettes featuring Pope John Paul II and jubilee year themes.



The countless miles of moving images from the pontiff's pastoral visits and Vatican activities were narrowed down to five half-hour installments.

Each had a theme: Human rights, interreligious dialogue, youth, families and Marian devotion.

Five other cassettes were dedicated to jubilee-specific subjects: pilgrims, the Roman catacombs, nativity scenes, the four major basilicas of Rome and religious ties between Rome and the Holy Land.

The series was to be issued worldwide in six languages, including English. Pope John Paul received a copy in Italian.

Italian film entrepreneur Alberto Michelini, the series' coordinator, said selecting "a few minutes" from the thousands of hours of material available was hard because "this pontificate has produced many beautiful moments."

Information on ordering the cassettes, individually or as a series, was available through the Vatican-linked agency Terzo Millennio at Via della Conciliazione 44, 00193 Rome, Italy. ▼

In Memory of our Daughter Angie Ann Anaya

February 12, 1982 — November 6, 1999

On November 6, Our Heavenly Father decided to take his daughter Angie Ann Anaya back home, leaving her birth parents and brother here alone, lost and without consolation after her departure. Not one day passes by without us asking Our Father to give us the joy of letting us see her for one more minute.

We want to thank all of you who so lovingly gave some of your time to be with us during our time of sorrow. Thank you for your flowers, your cards, donations, words of consolation and your company. We could not have made it through today if it wasn't for you, giving us moral and spiritual support.

The Anaya family thanks you from the bottom of our hearts for all that you have done for us until today. Our daughter is rejoicing in the Eternal Paradise and has joined a choir of angels, where we will meet her some day.

Past, present and future key elements of upcoming conference

Annual Martin Luther King, Jr. celebration scheduled

By JOANN S. KEANE
Editor

CHARLOTTE — The past, present and future of blacks in society and the church, is more than the theme of the Martin Luther King Jr. celebration. It is the reason for the year 2000 observance.

For those who lived through the tumultuous 60s, the civil rights movement is part of that past, while the accompanying struggles and strife are far from forgotten. Today, the life and work of the late Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. serves as a milestone. Preserving that memory for today's youth and future generations is part of the challenge that will bring the past and future together for present day solutions on Jan. 8.

"We must especially remind the younger folk who didn't live through it of what did happen, and what can, and likely will happen if they don't advocate much of what Dr. King taught," says Rev. Mr. Curtiss Todd.

The 15th annual Martin Luther King Jr. celebration is scheduled for Our Lady of Consolation parish in Charlotte. The daylong observance will culminate with the celebration of the Mass with Bishop William G. Curlin.

"It is a day to celebrate the importance of Dr. King and what he did for this country, society in general, and the world," says Rev. Mr. Todd, noting that Dr. King's work was formulated from a Christian perspective.

Father Mauricio West, vicar general and chancellor, sees the celebration as another way to "share the love of God with all our our sisters and brothers in a substantial way, without regard to the differences that would separate us."

For the past decade and a half, the diocesan African American Affairs Ministry has used innovative elements to strike a chord towards unity.

One successful element introduced last year was 'Word Events,' where Scripture springs to life via conference attendee participation. "By taking a passage from scripture and relating it to what is going on now," says Rev. Mr. Curtiss Todd, "the Word Events involve everybody; young, old, and middle-aged. Everybody was in on the discussion and developing and sharing their own Word Events."

Word Events will return this January with a new twist. Participants will be asked to infuse the message of keynote speaker, Dr. Morris F.X. Jeff, Jr. into group discussion. Rev. Mr. Todd, a permanent deacon of Our Lady of Consolation parish and vicar of African American Affairs Ministry calls this direction an excellent way to tie in Dr. Jeff's message with scripture, thus bringing a myriad of biblical messages to life in the Word Events.

Dr. Jeff, a noted speaker from New Orleans, is an "African-centered social worker, therapist, advocate, trainer, activist and consultant," with expertise in urban problems and solutions from an African perspective. In Louisiana, he is Director of the New Orleans Department of Human Services and adjunct professor at Tulane University.

For more information on the upcoming Martin Luther King, Jr. celebration, call the African American Affairs Ministry office, (704) 370-3339. ▼

CCHS nominates student for principal's leadership award

CHARLOTTE — Joseph Falencki, a Charlotte Catholic High School senior, has been nominated to compete in the National Principal's Leadership Award Scholarship Program (PLA), sponsored by the National Association of Secondary School Principals (NASSP). Herff Jones Inc. funds the Principal's Leadership Award Program.

One hundred fifty national PLA winners will be chosen this spring to receive $1,000 in college scholarships. Principals in high schools throughout the country could nominate one of their student leaders. Nominees were selected based on their leadership skills, participation in service organizations and clubs, achievements in the arts and sciences and academic record. They were also required to write an essay.

NASSP is the nation's largest school leadership organization with a membership reaching toward 43,000 middle-level and high school principals and assistant principals. It administers the National Honor Society, the National Junior High Society, the National Association of Student Councils and the National Association of Student Activity Advisors, collectively serving an additional 55,000 advisors and more than one million students. NASSP is also the sponsor of National Student Leadership Week and is the administrator of The National Alliance of High Schools. ▼

Vatican praises guidebook's insight into Rome's churches

By JOHN NORTON
Catholic News Service

ROME (CNS) — Vatican officials praised a new travel guide to Rome as offering a unique insight into the spiritual motivation behind centuries of church construction and art in the Eternal City.

"Pilgrimage: A Chronicle of Christianity Through the Churches of Rome"
Weidenfeld and Nicolson
(London, 1999), $40

During a presentation Nov. 29 of "Pilgrimage: A Chronicle of Christianity Through the Churches of Rome," Archbishop Francesco Marchisano, president of the Pontifical Commission for the Cultural Goods of the Church and of the Pontifical Commission for Sacred Archeology, said the book was a "work not only of artistic excellence, but also of religious excellence."

While most guidebooks limited themselves to artistic, geographical and historical explanations, "Pilgrimage" captured the religious intent behind Rome's most important churches, he said.

Written by June Hager, managing editor of the Rome-based monthly "Inside the Vatican," the book takes readers on a 2,000-year tour of Rome in chronological order, from the early catacombs through more than 40 churches, ending with the still unfinished glass and white concrete "Church of the Year 2000," designed by U.S. architect Richard Meier.

Hager's text is accompanied by 200 color photographs by Grzegorz Galazka, a noted Vatican photographer.

Interested tourists should plan on spending time with "Pilgrimage" long before taking to Rome's cobble-stoned streets; at nearly 10 inches by 12 inches, it is not easily slipped into a sightseer's back pocket. ▼

By JEFF HENSLEY
Catholic News Service

Part of a contest running in the daily paper asks contestants to fill in a blank with their most significant memory of this last century of the second thousand years since the advent of Christ's kingdom.

I first thought of my memory of the day JFK was shot. I had heard him speak outside the old Texas Hotel in downtown Fort Worth the morning of Nov. 22, 1963. Pretty significant, huh?

But when I gave it more thought, I had to be honest and say that the most significant moment of this century for me and my family came when my wife and I received our daughter into our arms on the fifth day of her life. The day of her adoption outshines any other event in our lives like the sun outshines the moon.

Today's Scriptures are full of promise for a day for Israel — and all of us adopted sons and daughters of Israel — as significant by comparison to the rest of our joint history as my daughter's adoption day was to my family.

Nothing else comes even close.

Mary, in her canticle from Luke, gives us reason to anticipate Jesus' coming with joy when she says, "My being proclaims the greatness of the Lord, my spirit finds joy in God my savior, for he has looked upon his servant in her lowliness; all ages to come shall call me blessed. God who is mighty has done great things for me, holy is his name. His mercy is from age to age on those who fear him."

And the Gospel reading from John describing the person and mission of John the Baptizer serves as a reminder to us that these are, after all, Advent readings, readings of anticipation of this great, life-changing event. "There was a man named John sent by God who came as a witness to testify to the light, so that through him all men might believe — but only to testify to the light, for he himself was not the light."

For more than a decade my wife and I made decisions based on our hope that a baby would come into our lives, changing us forever. In time, God honored our hope, faithful to us in love. All of us like Israel of old also wait in joyful hope for the one who changes our lives and all of human history by his coming, knowing, as words from Mary's canticle put it, that God will be faithful to his promises of redemption of the poor and lowly, "even as he promised our fathers, promised Abraham and his descendants forever."

Question:

As Christmas approaches, have you set aside time to contemplate what Jesus coming into your life means for you and how the babe of Bethlehem will change you?

'Toy Story 2' star leads charge for Chicago Catholic Charities

By MICHAEL D. WAMBLE
Catholic News Service

CHICAGO (CNS) — Sequels have become a recurring theme for Joan Cusack.

This holiday season, the comedic actress is starring as Jessie the Cowgirl, alongside the character voiced by Tom Hanks in "Toy Story 2," the follow-up to the 1995 computer-animated blockbuster.

But it's her return as spokeswoman for Catholic Charities of Chicago's annual Toy Shower that she hopes will make a lasting impact on the city's needy.

A native of Evanston, the actress best known for her Oscar-nominated supporting roles in the films "Working Girl" and "In and Out" was "cast" in this latest role by a persuasive party at the Catholic agency: her mother-in-law.

"I asked if she'd do it and she said yes," said Maryjeanne Burke, who chairs Catholic Charities' Toy Shower committee. "Now it's really a family affair, with the ladies in the family volunteering their time toward this worthy cause." Burke's daughter, Mary, is a member of the organization's advisory board.

The importance of giving back to others, Cusack said, always has been a family value. "The seeds to help others were planted in me by my family," she said, referring to the volunteer work of her actor-father, Dick, and the association of her mother, Nancy, with the Catholic Worker movement in New York and Boston.

"That (Catholic Worker) sensibility was very much part of my parents' lives. It serves as a challenge not just to meditate," Cusack told the Catholic New World, Chicago's archdiocesan newspaper.

Burke isn't the only one appreciative of her support. Father Michael Boland, Charities' administrator, is also ecstatic about the actress' involvement in the program.

"Joan is truly a member of the Catholic Charities family, and we are delighted to welcome her for the second year," he said.

In 1998, 15,000 individual new, unwrapped gifts were collected. Already Chicago Cubs slugger Sammy Sosa has donated 15,000 Beanie Babies to be given out to each child served by Catholic Charities.

This Christmas season, Burke said they've set a goal of 20,000 donations. Toys may be dropped off at various locations throughout the Chicago area.

Another program called Sponsor-a-Family for Christmas allows groups, clubs and businesses to come to the aid of two or up to 10 members of a needy family.

"When we started, 70 families received sponsorship; now that number has increased to 350," said Burke.

With Catholic Charities and in films, Cusack said, it's always important to remember that one's actions can impact and influence others.

During the sound studio production of "Toy Story 2," Cusack said she questioned the need for Jessie the Cowgirl to become a helpless damsel in distress.

"As a mom of a 1-year-old and an expectant mother-to-be, I've really begun to think about children and children's issues," she said.

"Through her voice, I tried to make her strong. Originally, Tom Hanks' character was to rescue her. So I asked, 'Can she rescue him a bit too?' And that was worked into the story. I was glad to add that for little girls out there," she said.

Script suggestions and especially, contributions to organizations such as Catholic Charities are ways of putting the spotlight on what's important in life, Cusack said.

"Being part of a community is an important part of life, and volunteering and giving of one's self to the community is rejuvenating and deeply rewarding," she said. ▼

"Inspector Gadget" (1999)

Dopey adventure comedy starring Matthew Broderick as a bumbling bionic policeman slowly learning how to use the various crime-fighting gadgets built into his body. Directed by David Kellogg and based on a TV cartoon series, this live-action Disney misfire offers a ludicrous assortment of special-effects gimmicks but does nothing with them except waste time. Comic violence and mild sexual innuendo. The U.S. Catholic Conference classification is A-II — adults and adolescents. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is PG — parental guidance suggested. (Disney, rental)

"Macbeth" (1948)

Murky but interesting version of Shakespeare's play in which the title nobleman (Orson Welles) is goaded by his ambitious wife (Jeanette Nolan) into killing the Scottish king (Edgar Barrier), then is undone by his conscience and the ambiguous prophecy of three witches. Also directed by Welles, the dark setting of bleak moors and cavelike interiors is visually very effective, but the sinister feudal proceedings lack dramatic consistency and the result is wildly uneven. Stylized violence and much menace. The U.S. Catholic Conference classification is A-II — adults and adolescents. Not rated by the Motion Picture Association of America. (Republic, $19.98)

"Othello" (1952)

Striking production of Shakespeare's tragedy in which the title Moor (Orson Welles) is sent to command the Venetian garrison on Cyprus where he is duped by his villainous aide, Iago (Michael MacLiammoir), into believing his innocent wife (Suzanne Cloutier) is unfaithful, with murderous results. Also directed by Welles, the result translates the stage play into an engrossing screen drama, brilliantly encapsulating the original through imaginative visuals and compelling performances, despite the low-budget production's technical inadequacies. Stylized violence, sexual innuendo and the harm of false pretenses. The U.S. Catholic Conference classification is A-II — adults and adolescents. Not rated by the Motion Picture Association of America. (Academy, rental)

The Pope Speaks

POPE JOHN PAUL II

Pope says rediscovery of value of family and marriage needed

By JOHN NORTON
Catholic News Service

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — By promoting authentic values of marriage and family in public opinion and civil legislation, society can cure its ills and the church can achieve greater unity, Pope John Paul II said.

Rediscovering the value of marriage and the family "is ever more urgent," since it is a point of discussion for a large part of modern culture and society, the pope said Dec. 1 during his weekly general audience in the Paul VI Hall.

"It is the conception itself of the family, a community founded on marriage between a man and a woman, which has been targeted in the name of an ethical relativism that is making advances in large sectors of public opinion and civil legislation," the pope said.

The pope, coughing frequently as he spoke, told the 7,000 pilgrims gathered that the crisis of the family was leading to a crisis in society.

"Not a few pathological phenomena — from loneliness to violence, to drugs — are also explained by the loss of the nuclear family's identity and function," he said.

"Where the family gives way, society loses its connective fabric, with disastrous consequences to persons, especially the weakest: from children to adolescents, to the disabled, to the sick, to the elderly," the pope said.

The pope said that God's fatherhood, marked by a richness of communion, generation and life, was the source of all human fatherhood and motherhood.

Within the family, the pope said, each person is entrusted with a specific duty.

He highlighted the important role men and women take on in marriage "in their reciprocal spousal relationship and their common commitment as parents, in as much as they are called to fulfill their natural characteristics in a deep, enriching and respectful communion."

The pope said the Christian family, as a "domestic church," was called to live in a special way the ideal expressed in Christ's prayer for unity at the Last Supper.

"From the experience of renewed Christian families, the church itself will be able to learn to cultivate, among all the members of the community, a greater family dimension, adopting and promoting a more human and fraternal style of relationships," the pope said.

At the end of the audience, the pope blessed a huge jubilee bell dedicated to peace among peoples. Weighing nearly nine tons and standing eight feet high, the bell was commissioned by parishioners from Limatola, a southern Italian town near Naples.

Advent Reflection

" ... Let it be as you say"

How do we make our Christmas a fruitful one? The answer is found in our Gospel reading from Luke on the fourth Sunday of Advent, the weekend before Christmas. It is there that we discover the approach of the person whose first Christmas remains the most fruitful Christmas of all time — Mary, the mother of Jesus. After absorbing the full impact of the angel's message, Mary gives her response: "Fiat" — "Let what you said be done to me" (Lk 1:38). This unconditional acceptance of God's will released the full power of God's love.

For us to share in this power, we must enter with Jesus into the womb of Mary and come to birth together with Jesus. This entering of the womb is, for God, a kind of dying. He enters the dark womb of a woman as into a tomb, to lie in waiting and helplessness like each of us. He truly is a helpless baby. That for God is a real emptying. He embraces this emptying to become one with our human nature.

If we are to share in His divinity, we must share in that experience; we must live in darkness and helplessness and waiting, preparing for our new birth in Him. This is what it means to share the life of Jesus — to embrace our human condition and live it out for love of Him who did the same for us.

Each person, like Mary, is pregnant with the Lord, struggling to give birth to the God within. This attitude saves us from inflicting our own God on to others, and reverences each person as a womb of God. Our love should be life-giving in that it brings forth the God who dwells in every person.

Like Mary, each person receives the Lord by the overshadowing of the Holy Spirit, and if we but open up to the Holy Spirit and surrender to His entry into our lives, we can declare like Mary: All generations will call us blessed, because He is almighty and has done great things for us.

Then, and only then, we can reach out to our brothers and sisters, shouting: I have come to you hastening to the hill country announcing the Good News of Jesus dwelling in your womb. And we do this simply, as Mary did in her visit to her cousin Elizabeth.

When the Lord comes into our lives, we often feel we have to move out of the seemingly narrow confines of our ordinary lifestyles and do something grand for the Lord. How different it was with Mary. When the Lord comes into her life, she immediately does something small, something domestic. She goes to the hillside to be with her aging cousin who is with child. Instead of concentrating piously on her own pregnancy, Mary turns her attention to the needs of those around her. How authentic that response is.

To trust the humble desire to serve in small, seemingly unimportant ways is what the true apostle does. Following Mary's example is what will make our Christmas fruitful.

The language gap between priests and laity

My friend, Bud, gave me this list of gender jokes the other day that were totally sexist and clearly socially backward. In other words, I laughed until I had to blow my nose.

The jokes focused on different understandings of the same word by men and women. For example, "vulnerable": female — opening oneself emotionally to another; male — playing football without a helmet.

This, naturally, led to deep theological reflection on my part, which led in turn to the realization that a similar language gap exists between the priesthood and most of us lay folk.

For example, "bishop": priest — the person from whom all authority, financial requests and much paperwork flows; laity — a chess piece.

Understanding these things would no doubt clear up many unnecessary tensions in parish life. Take another example, "holding hands": laity — something couples do with they stroll on the beach, or parents do with children when they cross the street; priest — topic of the next liturgy committee meeting because so many people are complaining about touching palms during the Our Father.

Or, "collars": laity — the hardest part of the shirt to iron or a synonym for "making an arrest"; priest — a slang word for him and his colleagues.

Even when we think we mean the same thing, there can be nuances of perception. For example, "shared decision making": laity — trying to get your way at the parish council meeting; priest — trying to remember to tell the parish finance committee chairperson about the new lighting he ordered for the sanctuary.

Sometimes the problem is the part of speech. For example, "cook": laity — a verb; priest — a noun. Or "project": laity — noun, something you do, often on a Saturday, like clean the garage; priest — verb, how you talk when the sound system takes a hike.

Or the connotation of a word, like "dinner": laity — a meal; priest — a location. "Run": priest — to direct a meeting; laity — to move just faster than a jog. Or "operation": priest — a euphemism for "parish plant"; laity — something we can talk about for hours, especially if it has been done on us and we are still fighting with the insurance company and hospital about being charged $75 for paper socks.

Maybe the National Council of the Laity and the National Federation of Priest Councils could get together and talk about this. They could co-author a lexicon: "Laity Are From Earth, Priests Are From The Seminary."

Of course, they would have to agree on the meaning of "agenda" first.

Your home can change the world

"Oprah! I was just on her show, and you'll never guess what happened!" The excited voice on my answering machine was 16-year-old Craig Kielburger who heads the Free The Children movement which fights child labor abuses around the world. He began the organization when he was only twelve years old. Through my work at The Christophers, he and his family and I have become good friends.

"During our interview she pledged 200,000 dollars to our cause!" Craig roared. "The show will air soon! Be sure to watch! Talk to you soon!"

When I saw the program, I was in awe and moved to tears of joy. There was Craig in the company of several other teenagers who were sharing their stories of how they are making a profound difference in our world through personal initiative. Each spoke of having an inner conviction that unless they responded in some way to their personal mission, others might suffer unnecessarily.

Oprah Winfrey asked each teen what it was that motivated them to get involved and make a positive difference. Though each phrased it differently, in essence, what they all said was: "It's the way I was brought up at home — my parents and their values."

Think about it: homes have always been fertile fields for planting and nurturing faith and values for the bigger world. Clearly, the parents of these teens know this. But, too many moms and dads might be surprised to know how often their offspring are disappointed in the lack of inspiration given them.

A young teenager told me recently that when she told her family that she wanted to go to college to become a teacher, her mother and father advised her to prepare for a career where she could earn more money. This young woman's interests, talents and values are leading her to help youngsters. She wants to make a difference for good. And that is more important to her and her future than all the things that money could buy.

Her parents and many others think they are just being practical and that they only want "the best" for their children. After all, money matters. They are absolutely right. But it is not and never will be everything. "The best" always has more to do with being and doing than with having.

Young people should expect guidance from their parents, not only in small things, but also in the big things of life. Right from the sanctuary of their homes, parents influence the world by encouraging their kids to get into the thick of things, to lead lives of purpose. When I say sanctuary, I mean exactly that. No matter how chaotic everyday life may be, every family deserves and needs a spiritual center for faith, hope, love — and action.

Those teenagers on Oprah are shining examples of how youth bring into the public square the goodness parents pass on to them from God. Because their parents started early to develop their "love your neighbor" outlook, they may someday touch the lives of countless persons.

To any pessimists who are wringing their hands over the next generation, I say, "Stop worrying and get to work." Every adult should be encouraging every youngster through words, and especially, by example, to live the best, the most generous life possible.

Making time for giving

Time is precious these days. Since the week before Thanksgiving, my thirteen-year-old daughter has reminded me — daily — of the exact number of days until Christmas. If I did not have Rachel counting down, a visit to the local post office where the millennium clock is prominently displayed would effectively remind me of the relentless march of time.

Too often, we are so busy in our day-to-day living that we find it difficult to slow down, take a break and spend time with those we love. Perhaps, that is one of the reasons the holidays are so special to us. Traditionally, during the Christmas season, we make a special effort to celebrate the birth of Christ with family and close friends. New Year's is a time to reflect on the past year and future resolutions and dreams.

Many people in the diocese also set aside time during the holidays to make special gifts to support their parish, Catholic school, Catholic agency, the diocese or the diocesan foundation. With the dramatic increases in investment markets over the past decade, those who decide to make gifts funded with appreciated securities may reap additional financial benefits this year.

If you own stocks, bonds or mutual funds that have increased in value over the years, using them to make gifts to the Church can bring you deductions on your tax return next spring. Keep in mind that gifts must be made before December 31, 1999, to be deductible on your 1999 tax return. Although mutual fund gifts can take from 6 to 8 weeks, it is not too late to make stock gifts before the end of the year.

Gifts of appreciated securities you have owned for at least one year provide you with a deduction for the full current value of the property. You are generally allowed to deduct the value of such gifts in amounts equal to as much as 30 percent of your adjusted gross income. In addition, you can avoid the capital gains tax on the stock's increase in value.

You may think that making a gift of securities will be too complicated. Actually, the diocese has a set of easy instructions to provide all the information needed to either make a gift through electronic transfer or to donate physical stock certificates for the benefit of your parish or a diocesan entity.

It is always a good idea to consult with your financial advisors about gift options best suited for your personal situation.

Gifts to your parish, Catholic school, agency or the diocese help to strengthen the community and provide the support needed for the ministry of the Church in western North Carolina. If you would like to make a meaningful gift this holiday season — one to sustain the Catholic faith — make your plans today.

For more information about making gifts of appreciated securities or other types of year-end gifts, please feel free to contact me at the Diocese of Charlotte, 1123 South Church Street, Charlotte, North Carolina 28203, (704) 370-3320.

Understanding "Haggadic Midrash"

Q. Your column has been a big help to me since I returned to the Catholic Church. My question is about the three magi.

One priest told us that the story of the wise men is only a fable, something he called "midrash." If this is so, why all the details about Herod, the killing of the innocents and so on? How can the ordinary person know what to believe?

A. First, let's be clear that we're not speaking here of anything which is part of required belief for Catholics or other Christians.

Particularly, it does not involve belief in "three kings" or wise men. The Gospel according to Matthew, the only one that tells the story (2:1-12), does not call them kings — they were probably astrologers — nor does it say how many there were.

Tradition in the Eastern Catholic churches, for example, speaks of 12 men coming "from the east," or from the rising sun, not three.

The answer to your question entails certain technicalities of Scripture interpretation dealing with the literary forms, or styles of writing, Matthew used in this Gospel.

As your priest hinted, we are fairly certain, from study of this Gospel and other writings of that period, that Matthew contains several examples of what is called "haggadic midrash."

These are stories, typical in Jewish tradition, employed to spin out and clarify the meaning of a particular event or teaching. Sometimes these narratives are quite long and complicated, depending on the skill and intentions of the teacher.

They were not meant by the author to be taken literally in our sense of that word, but to flesh out and illustrate the truth being considered.

Often I have referred readers, who wish to enlarge their knowledge of Scripture, to the New American Bible. Published under the auspices of the American bishops, the text and notes are a good starting place for gaining insights into subjects like this.

Question Corner

FATHER JOHN DIETZEN
CNS COLUMNIST

The NAB, recalling that this Gospel was written much later in the first century when Jesus had been rejected by Israel and had begun to be accepted by the gentiles, explains that the magi story projects this rejection and acceptance back in time to the infancy of Jesus.

There is no room here to go into detail, but several elements of the story hearken back to Moses, the exodus and prophecies that God would establish a new "star," or king, for his people. Thus, the magi narrative wraps together a major theme of Matthew's Gospel and locates it early in the life of Jesus.

Several levels of understanding are therefore open for us. One may accept the tale of the magi as happening exactly as it is narrated in the Gospel. Or one may believe it is partly fictional, but based on some actual journey of "wise men" to Jerusalem about the time of the birth of Jesus. Or one may see the story as wholly made up, intended to call attention to the fulfillment of ancient prophecies about the coming and the mission of the Messiah.

Any of these explanations is compatible with the Catholic understanding of the meaning and divine inspiration of the Bible.

Stories of Faith

Thank you to all who shared their "Stories of Faith" with The Catholic News & Herald.

Holy Week blessings

One evening in March, while away, my husband called me with an 'invitation' from the pastor of our church, asking me to be an apostle on Holy Thursday.

Holy Week came quickly. After the Washing of the Feet on Holy Thursday, the feelings that came over me were the closest to heaven that I believe I will ever feel while here on earth. I felt blessed, holy, thankful, unique and so very inspired.

The experience has made me want to serve God and my church in as many ways as I possibly can!

A second chance at love

To know the will of God is the greatest knowledge, and to do the will of God is the greatest achievement.

I came from the Philippines as a tourist in January 1990 after my husband died together with my retirement. I arrived in San Diego to my aunt. The following August, we were invited to a birthday party in Phelan where I met Albert E. Taylor Sr., a widower andan American Indian.

We became friends, fell in love and made arrangements to be married in the outpost wedding chapel in Hesperia on Aug. 23, 1990. Because I was born a Roman Catholic and felt uncomfortable about the ceremony, we decided to have a second ceremony on Nov. 18, 1990, with Fr. John in Phelan Catholic Church.

This year will be our 9th wedding anniversary.

Thanks to our Lord above that with my hard prayer, he has given me, Dina, 72, a loving and caring husband, Albert, 83. I now know, once the Lord's call comes, begin to go and never stop going!

Trusting in God

Some years ago, a book haunted me. It was about doing what you love, and the money will come. For me, this was an impossible task because I didn't love what I was doing. As a counselor in mental health, I felt burned out. Recently, I made a difficult decision to embark on an incredible search for more purpose to my life.

Trusting that God would provide for me no matter what, I had to be patient and believe that a plan would eventually be revealed to me. Along the way, I met some incredible people that I believe were sent by the Holy Spirit to guide me and speak divine words of wisdom through human voices.

Although I don't have the answers yet, a humble and arduous journey has begun to unfold.

A touch of peace

I fell in the bathroom and was in such pain that I knew I had broken a bone. I settled back, relying upon rote prayers, but to no avail.

Being born a Methodist, I didn't understand the Rosary, but the scriptures in the Scriptural Rosary I could understand, and I meditated on them. It wasn't long before that pain disappeared, and I felt as though I was being hugged very tenderly. A peace overwhelmed me as the Lord came to me in my deepest need. That experience made Mary more real to me than ever before.

Learning from our children

My son wrote a term paper for a religion course that he took in college. When I read it, I was astounded by the answers it gave to the many questions I have had throughout my life.

When God created man, he gave him a free will. Man chooses to either love God and worship Him or to worship this world and reject Him. God created man to share his love. However, God is a jealous being; He will not tolerate other "gods."

When man began to reject God, God did not understand why. Just as a man can never understand what it's like to be a woman and vice versa, so God could not understand what it was like to be a man.

At first, God became angry (Old Testament) and tried to win man back by showing him his power. Then, he decided to try to understand man. He became one of us. He (God) lived a human life as Jesus Christ. This is the redemption of man. As God, Jesus taught us the way to live.

After Jesus' ascension, God came back to us as the Holy Spirit. Everybody is waiting for the "Second Coming," but God has already come back. He is in each and every one of us.

When we hear the word "repent," it means to turn our worship of this world to a worship of God. Read the gospels; Christ tells us what to do. If we really mean it when we say we follow Christ, then, let's start acting like it.

Prayers for mercy and peace

On Friday, Sept. 3, my sister called saying that our mother, 89, was not doing well. Since it was Labor Day weekend, she thought we might want to make the trip to see her one more time.

I said that I was going to noon Mass and that I would remember her in particular. During the prayer requests, I stated that mother had pneumonia, was doing poorly and asked for prayers so that God would be merciful and grant her peace.

Afterwards, outside the church, my husband came hurrying towards me. My sister had tried to call me again and when she couldn't reach me, she called my husband at work to tell him that mother had just passed away.

Bishop's prayer for postal workers makes rounds

KANSAS CITY, Mo. (CNS) — As the U.S. Postal Service prepares for its busiest days of the year, people can remember postal workers with a prayer penned by Bishop Raymond J. Boland of Kansas City-St. Joseph.

The prayer was delivered for the first time on Sept. 8, 1986, when — as a monsignor serving in the Archdiocese of Washington — Bishop Boland gave the invocation at the National Postal Forum in Washington.

It immediately struck a chord with postal workers, and Bishop Boland subsequently received many requests for copies and permission to reprint it, including in needlepoint.

Between Thanksgiving and Christmas, the Postal Service nationwide will deliver some 20 billion holiday letters, postcards and packages, according to information from the U.S. Postal Service in Washington.

Here is the text of the bishop's prayer:

God, Our Father,

May everything we do be first class. Imprint your own loving Zip Code upon our hearts so that we may never go astray.

Provide in your gracious providence special handling for those of us who are fragile and keep us in one piece. We have been signed, sealed, stamped and delivered in your image and likeness and we beg you to keep us in your care as we go about our appointed rounds.

And when our days draw to a close and we are marked return to sender, be there to greet us at heaven's door so that nobody may ever say unknown at this address. Amen. ▼

'Cycle of response'

Catholic social service agencies apply expertise to long-term commitment to disaster victims

By MATT DOYLE
NC Catholic Staff

RALEIGH — If you spent time online with the state of North Carolina's web site, you would find page after page of information about hurricane response. There is information on everything from safe drinking water to how to deal with snakes in the aftermath of flooding.

The state also provides abundant information on preparing for the next big disaster, whatever that may be. Agencies are linked together in an electronic resource for the people of the state.

As the 1999 hurricane season came to a close in the Atlantic Ocean at the end of November, agencies were already studying how they responded to the series of storms this year and what they can do to be prepared for the next round. Catholic Social Ministries of the Diocese of Raleigh is one of those agencies assessing what has been done and planning on what it can do better.

With that in mind, one expert on preparedness and response spent time in the diocese listening and advising on emergency response. Gerald Collins may be one of the lucky people who is able to say they have found their dream job. He is director of Disaster Response for Catholic Charities USA.

Formerly an employee of the American Red Cross, Collins has joined the social outreach arm of the U.S. Catholic bishops and plans to use his background to develop programs that could change the perception of the Catholic Church in disaster response. He hopes to see a prototype of that change established within the Diocese of Raleigh.

Catholic Charities USA has given Catholic Social Ministries in Raleigh a $150,000 grant that will be used to work on disaster response and recovery programs, or as he describes it, the Church Disaster Mitigation Program. What Collins is trying to help church groups do is take the so-called cycle of disaster response and use it wisely.

According to Collins, the cycle has four main parts: response, recovery, mitigation and preparedness. He wants to see all the parts overlapping.

Collins said that while people are responding to a disaster and helping to put lives back together, they should be using that time as a teaching moment. What he wants taught is preparedness and mitigation; he is convinced the local churches, assisted by diocesan and national resources, are capable of shouldering the responsibilities.

It is Collins' contention that CSM is already in the disaster recovery business because of its long-term commitment to case work, that is hands-on involvement with the community.

In order to change how Catholic social service agencies perceive themselves and how they are perceived in the public, Collins said it must be understood from the start that when disasters strike, CSM is in it from the start. "Many people believe," said Collins, "that what Catholic Charities/CSM do is not a the heart of disaster response."

As far as Collins is concerned, that is simply not true. CSM takes referrals from the agencies normally associated with being the first people local level.

Most relief agencies fit into one of three layers of disaster relief that are known by their acronyms, NVOAD, VOAD AND VOLAG. To simplify the matter, these are shorthand names for voluntary agencies operating on the national, state and local level. Catholic Charities organizations, Collins said, are already a part of the network.

Now, Collins wants that same network brought home to local parishes. "Any church that has a room with a lightbulb," said Collins, "should be involved in teaching disaster preparedness.

"I have yet to see a church, no matter how large or how small, that does not have a stove, a male and a female bathroom, in most cases a shower and some kind of space ... for meeting." Collins said that means that church already has the framework for disaster preparedness and response.

Collins said North Carolina is in a position to implement his plan to integrate all facets of response and recovery because it is still working to undue the damage from Hurricane Floyd in September. He said that when he heard about the damage to eastern North Carolina he had enough knowledge of the area to realize that those in pain were overwhelmingly the poor, such as sharecroppers and migrants and too often, he said, "they are forgotten."

But, they would be well served by their neighbors, if they were prepared to respond. In order to illustrate the need for cooperation, Collins offered a little illustration.

If one person has a great talent for making peanut butter sandwiches, said Collins, then they should apply that ability. If another has a knife with which to cut those sandwiches into pieces for distribution, then that is what they have to offer.

He said they need to understand that one is responsible to make the sandwiches while the other must keep the knife sharpened to cut them. If the pieces work, recovery is easier.

However, what Collins is intent on avoiding is the possibility that one of the parties may decide to stop making sandwiches or the other to hide the knife. In those cases, one starves or the other is unable to help.

Collins said the community can work in concert and support one another in time of crisis. That is what he hopes to set in place in the Diocese of Raleigh. ▼

The bishop's message for Christmas

and the Jubilee 2000

Dear Brothers and Sisters in the Lord,

Christmas often brings memories of bygone celebrations of the Saviour's birth with loved ones and friends. I recall my first Christmas as a priest. The children in our parish school were busy during Advent decorating their classrooms. Each classroom had its Christmas manger, where straw was added daily to indicate the prayers and sacrifices the children offered during Advent. Their Christmas play was a great success, even when the baby playing the role of the Christ child decided to unexpectedly crawl off the stage.

Yet, the happiest memory I recall of that first Christmas as a young priest was my elderly pastor's joy. He was like a happy child as he watched the decoration of the church with trees and poinsettias. Each day during the Christmas season, he would spend hours sitting quietly in the church in front of the manger. I remember with special affection Christmas Eve. The pastor called each of his assistants to his room to give us a gift of fifty dollars, a month's salary at that time. Like Barry Fitzgerald in "Going My Way," he smiled as he advised us: "Don't spend it all in one place."

His most lasting gift was his example of Christ-like charity. He saw Jesus in everyone. He frequently reminded us that "whatever we keep, we lose; whatever we give, we keep forever." Those were the last words he spoke when he later lay dying. I recall his rich legacy of charity, especially at Christmas.

This year is a very special Christmas, the last in this century and the beginning of a new millennium. This is a good time to question what Christmas means to us. Do we acknowledge the birth of Jesus as the Father's great gift and proof of His love for us? Have we accepted God's invitation to enter into a special relationship with Him through His Son, Jesus? As Mary carried Jesus in her womb, do we carry Jesus in our hearts? Do we recognize Jesus in the Eucharist as our Bread of Life? Do we believe that He lives in us, and through us, continues to feed the hungry and clothe and house the homeless? Is our voice that of Jesus pleading for peace and justice in today's world? Is our response to the devastation of our brothers and sisters, who are the victims of Hurricane Floyd, Jesus' response to human suffering? Are our hearts equally moved by the needs of the poor in Western North Carolina? St. Paul reminds the church that as one body, whenever one suffers, we all suffer. Christmas is an excellent opportunity to address these questions. If we fail to do so, then the Divine Child remains quietly resting in the manger. The message of angels, who sang of "peace on earth and goodwill to all," was not to be heard only by shepherds, but echoed through the generations by our words and actions.

May this Christmas be for us a recommitment of our hearts and lives to Jesus. With His grace, let us carry His love throughout our world as heralds of His peace and joy. May the joy and love we celebrate this Christmas fill our days throughout the New Year. Praying God's blessing upon you and your loved ones, I remain

Devotedly in the Lord Jesus,

Canonization process for Juan Diego on track

MEXICO CITY (CNS) — Mexican bishops say the canonization process for Blessed Juan Diego is on track, despite a letter to the Vatican that questioned the indigenous peasant's historical existence. "We still have no date for the canonization of Juan Diego," said Cardinal Norberto Rivera Carrera of Mexico City Dec. 3. "If the studies end, it will be in May; if they are delayed, it won't be because of that letter but because they (Vatican Congregation for Sainthood Causes) have asked for another study." In late September the retired abbot of the Basilica of Guadalupe, Father Guillermo Schulenburg Prado, wrote to the Vatican secretary of state, Cardinal Angelo Sodano, to express doubts about the historical existence of Juan Diego. The letter was also signed by the present temporary rector of the basilica, Father Carlos Warnholtz.

Moscow Catholic cathedral to reopen 70 years after closure

MOSCOW (CNS) — The formal reopening of a Catholic cathedral in Moscow nearly 70 years after its Soviet closure is a "victory of God over atheism," said a priest whose U.S. foundation helped fund the structure's restoration. "At a time when the people have lost faith in nearly every institution in Russia, this church represents a visible sign of hope," said Father Marcel Guarnizo, president of the Virginia-based Aid to the Church in Russia foundation, which committed $1.5 million to the reconstruction of the Church of the Immaculate Conception. Father Guarnizo was ordained for the Apostolic Administration of European Russia. The Vatican secretary of state, Cardinal Angelo Sodano, four other cardinals and 30 bishops were expected to have attended the dedication Mass Dec. 12.

CMMB donates funds to support Chechnyan child refugees

NEW YORK (CNS) — Responding to an urgent appeal from the Caritas Internationalis network, the Catholic Medical Mission Board has donated $15,000 for shelter and medical care for children made homeless by the fighting in Chechnya. The 56 children under age 12 were discovered hiding in an unheated cellar in Grozny, the Chechnyan capital. Their evacuation was engineered by Caritas Austria and Caritas Ukraine. The children are now living in a former sanatorium in Ukraine, where they will wait out the war.

Croatian president dies; pope pays tribute

A man holds a portrait of late Croatian President Franjo Tudjman as a crowd of mourners pass Zagreb's main square on their way to Tudjman's burial Dec. 13. He died Dec. 10 at age 77. Pope John Paul II paid tribute saying Tudjman put Croatia on the road to independence.

House witnesses view Chinese membership in WTO with alarm

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Witnesses at a congressional hearing Dec. 8 condemned China's human rights record and said Chinese admission to the World Trade Organization would neither force nor persuade Chinese authorities to treat their citizens any better. The human rights and labor advocates who testified on Capitol Hill cited a number of Chinese violations, including crackdowns on the Falun Gong religious movement, the Tibetan people and independent labor groups; coercive family planning and organ harvesting policies; and police and prison brutality. They said these could worsen with China ensconced in the WTO.

Bishops from Ethiopia, Eritrea say they are working for peace

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Bishops from Ethiopia and Eritrea said they are working together to help end the war between their countries. "Our aim is to stop the war and to save the people," said Bishop Zekarias Yohannes of Asmara, Eritrea. Archbishop Berhanejesus Demerew Souraphiel of Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, agreed. "It is a difficult war, because it is between brothers and sisters," said Archbishop Souraphiel. "The division is created artificially, elsewhere," he added. "The people are one."

Pope says peace requires change in world's perspective

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — A "complete change of perspective" in international political and economic structures will be necessary to build lasting world peace, Pope John Paul II said. "There will be peace only to the extent that humanity as a whole rediscovers its fundamental calling to be one family," he said in a message for the World Day of Peace, Jan. 1, 2000. The 22-page message was released Dec. 13 at a Vatican press conference.

Iraq says conditions not right for papal visit

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — After months of inconclusive talks, Iraq has told Pope John Paul II that conditions are not right for his hoped-for pilgrimage to the country, the Vatican announced. Iraq cited the continuing Western economic embargo and the U.S.- and British-imposed no-fly zone as two insurmountable obstacles to a papal visit, Vatican spokesman Joaquin Navarro-Valls said in a statement Dec. 10.

Bishops stress Christian meaning of new millennium

MANCHESTER, England (CNS) — The bishops of England and Wales urged people to remember the "distinctive significance" of the new millennium by working for "a society of justice, love, truth and peace." In a Dec. 7 statement the bishops said, "It is important for us as Christians to keep our minds firmly on the distinctive significance of this occasion. The millennium is being celebrated because it is, in fact, the great jubilee of the birth of Our Lord Jesus Christ. Were it not for that great event, we would not be celebrating this moment at all. For us, as Catholics, celebrations begin on Christmas Eve."

Team studying Vatican papers says it'll push for more

NEW YORK (CNS) — Historians commissioned to review Vatican documents relating to the Holocaust indicated Dec. 7 their primary thrust would be pushing for the opening of all Vatican archives that might contain pertinent documents. "The search for truth, wherever it may lead, can be best promoted in an environment in which there is full access to archival documentation and other historical evidence," said the team of Catholic and Jewish historians in a joint statement read at a press conference. The team held its first meeting in New York Dec. 6-7.

In new ritual, pope to push open Holy Door at St. Peter's

By CINDY WOODEN
Catholic News Service

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope John Paul II will push open the Holy Door at St. Peter's Basilica on Christmas Eve, inaugurating the Holy Year for the new millennium with a new ritual.

The most noticeable difference from holy years past will be the absence of a hammer, said Bishop Piero Marini, master of papal liturgical ceremonies.

The wall sealing the Holy Door shut was to be dismantled after a brief Dec. 15 ceremony, taking away the symbolic value of having the pope strike the wall with the hammer three times, Bishop Marini said during a Dec. 14 press conference.

"Elements of the old ritual which have become obsolete will be replaced by others which better express the biblical and liturgical significance of the Holy Door," he said.

When Pope Alexander VI opened the Holy Door on Christmas 1499, "he used a mason's hammer, and the blows were not completely symbolic; the pope tried to break through part of the wall," the bishop said.

For centuries, the opening ceremony included a long pause to allow masons to finish taking the wall down before the pope crossed the threshold.

Pope John Paul will push on the huge, ornamental bronze doors with both hands, Bishop Marini said. Because the doors are extremely heavy, workmen inside the basilica will pull on them as the pope pushes.

Another change for the Holy Year 2000, the bishop said, is the end of having the basilica's confessors wipe the threshold and door posts with cloths soaked in holy water.

CSS Christmas program brings cheer to N.C. mountains

By DIANNE RIGGS
Correspondent

ASHEVILLE — Winter is coming, and with it, cold weather. But for 634 people in 152 families in North Carolina's mountain region, Christmas will bring warmth and joy in the form of new, gift-wrapped clothing, household items and toys.

All this is thanks to the many individuals and families who responded to Catholic Social Services Western Regional Office's 1999 Christmas program. "I was overwhelmed by the generosity," said Marie Bucher, Christmas program coordinator.

The program connects Asheville area churches with those in the more western part of the state. The urban area has many groups which supply toys and clothing to needy children, while the rural counties have very few, according to Bucher. Rural church pastors and outreach committee members were asked to identify families — Catholics and those of other faith traditions — who, due to recent unemployment, illness or other serious causes, would not be able to provide gifts for their children. Catholic Social Services' immigration and adoption programs also supplied names.

These families were anonymously linked with Asheville area parishes — St. Barnabas, Basilica of St. Lawrence, St. Eugene and St. Joan of Arc, all in Asheville, and St. Margaret Mary in Swannanoa — and Asheville Catholic School.

"Our program is unique in that we have gifts for both parents and children," said Missionary Servant Sister Marie Frechette, director of the Western Regional Office. For each person, a gift of clothing is requested. In addition, children receive a toy, while adults request a household item such as a blanket, bath towel, flashlight or set of tools, she said. If there is enough extra money donated, food vouchers are included.

For children and adults in the donor parishes, the appearance of the "angel tree" bearing the first names and requests of the families breeds excitement. "It is so much fun," said Linda Bailey of St. Joan of Arc Church. "When people see the tree up after Thanksgiving, they rush to it, wanting to find a tag that brings a personal connection to their own family."

St. Barnabas Church in Arden is one of five Asheville area parishes who participated as host parishes in Catholic Social Services Western Regional Office's Christmas program. Pictured are, left to right, Rev. Mr. Art Kingsley, the parish's permanent deacon, Harry Thomas, Pat Wilkie, Michele Riddle, Mary Naber and Ted Naber; seated in front Erin Riddle.

Many people in the five parishes want to do more than what is requested. "They try to personalize, get extra packages," said Bailey. St. Joan of Arc parish always does an extra "goody box" for each family, filled with things like candies, crackers, extra toys and hot chocolate, she said.

Bucher said that her constant prayers for the program are that "the right person gets the right gifts."

Three surprises happened this year, added Bucher. First, the program was able to increase the number of people being reached by 50 percent. She attributed this to "believing we could do more — and accepting more names." Second, Asheville Catholic School students asked to keep their family lists so they could do something at Easter. Third, normally an item as costly as a bicycle cannot be provided. However, St. Joan of Arc had two used mountain bikes and helmets that went to two children this year.

Sister Frechette believes the program has a big impact on the recipient counties and reinforces belief in the goodness of Christian works. "I think they have a sense of being overwhelmed that there are people out there buying them presents," she said. "It supports the fact that there is a God, and this God loves them and their family."

There are also spiritual gifts for the people who buy, pack and haul, said Sister Frechette: They may gain a new sense of wisdom or understanding.

"We all (in the parish) have so much," said Dodi Klein of St. Margaret Mary Church. "It makes us feel good in our hearts to give." ▼

GREENSBORO — Single Again Catholics is having a New Year's Eve party tonight at 9 p.m. Please bring snacks and beverages. For details about the donation, directions and location, call Lois at (336) 855-8471.

MAGGIE VALLEY — All are invited to ring in the New Year in silence and prayer with other Christians for a millennium mini-retreat at the Living Waters Reflection Center, 103 Living Waters Lane. Supper begins at 7:30 p.m. tonight, followed by a conference, faith sharing, quiet prayer and midnight Mass. Brunch is included the next morning. For reservations and other information, call the center at (828) 926-3833.

January

3 CHARLOTTE — St. Gabriel Church, 3016 Providence Rd., is having a support group for bereaved children starting tonight from 7-8 p.m. and continuing Mondays in January and February. The group is for children and teens, ages 5-15, who have lost loved ones in their immediate families. Eight professional counselors and four counseling interns from UNCC are serving as facilitators for specific age groups. There is no fee, but advanced registration is required. For details, call Mercy Sister Therese Galligan at (704) 362-5047, Ext. 216.

5 ALBEMARLE — Father Lawrence Heiney begins Thursday evening sessions from 7-8:30 p.m. tonight in the conference room of Our Lady of the Annunciation Church, 416 North 2nd St. The themes include "What is the liturgy of Vatican II?" and "How do we celebrate Mass accordingly?" Father Heiney is going to be discussing these and other acts of faith for six weeks. Call the church office at (704) 982-2910 for more information.

Please submit notices of events for the Diocesan Planner at least 10 days prior to publication date.

Editor's note: In response to a number of requests for an interpretation of the song "The Twelve Days of Christmas" as reported by Associate Editor Jimmy Rostar in last year's Christmas edition, the following is a condensed version of that story.

The 12 Days of Christmas

Holiday tune is an underground catechism

Oh come, all ye faithful, and turn on your radios, cassette decks and CD players. It's Christmas — time again for a bounty of holiday songs for your listening pleasure. There's the sacred and the silly, the hallowed and the hilarious. And plenty of all-of-the-above.

One carol in particular, "The Twelve Days of Christmas," may seem to belong in the nonsensical category: someone giving all kinds of gifts, and lots of them.

While its origin remains obscure, "The Twelve Days of Christmas" developed with a more serious meaning than an inventory of the gifts one's true love sent. You see, the song's originator may have lived sometime between mid-16th and early-19th centuries, when practice of the Catholic faith was illegal in England.

Not only did the carol remind Catholics of the first 12 days of the Christmas season — Dec. 25 through the Epiphany, traditionally observed Jan. 6. During that time of religious suppression in England, the carol was also intended as a clandestine catechism of sorts, an allegorical lesson that taught the most basic doctrines of the faith.

So, using gifts from this world, whoever came up with the idea for the song disguised heavenly gifts given by God to his people.

Some explanations vary a bit depending on sources, but here is the basic rundown of the 12 gifts that God, "my true love" in the carol, gives.

A partridge in a pear tree
Jesus Christ

Two turtle doves
The Old and New testaments of the Bible

Three French hens
The virtues of faith, hope and charity

Four calling birds
The four Gospels, or the Gospels' four authors

Five gold rings
The first five books of the Old Testament, called the Pentateuch

Six geese a' laying
The six days of creation

Seven swans a' swimming
The seven sacraments

Eight maids a' milking
The Beatitudes

Nine ladies dancing
The nine fruits of the Holy Spirit

Ten lords a' leaping
The Ten Commandments

Eleven pipers piping
The eleven faithful apostles

Twelve drummers drumming
The twelve doctrinal points of the Apostle's Creed

Instead, Bishop Marini said, Catholics from Asia and Oceania will mark the doorway with perfume and decorate it with flowers while traditional Japanese music plays.

The flowers and perfume are meant to honor Christ — the gate or doorway of salvation — and to be a sign of the joy which was part of the biblical jubilee years, the bishop said.

"The joy expressed by the flowers and fragrances adorning the door replaces the penitential sign of the purifying water formerly sprinkled on the door-jambs" by the confessors, he said.

Like the Catholics from Asia and Oceania, representatives from every continent will have a special role during the ceremony as a concrete sign that Christ's birth, death and resurrection are important for the whole world, Bishop Marini said.

Representing Africa, a group of Catholics from Onitsha, Nigeria, will play traditional horns in a call to all people to join the celebration, he said. Lay men and women from the Americas and Europe will form a procession to carry the Gospel to the basilica's main altar.

Bishop Marini said that as of Dec. 14, the Vatican had received requests for 55,000 tickets to watch the opening of the Holy Door and attend the Christmas Mass at midnight.

St. Peter's Basilica, he said, can hold a maximum of 7,000 people.

The bishop said it is up to officials at the Prefecture of the Papal Household to decide who gets tickets, but he is working closely with Vatican and Italian state television to ensure the event is prayerful and dignified for everyone watching, not just those inside the basilica. ▼

Pope calls for international solidarity in new millennium

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The international solidarity shown by the Vatican's humanitarian mission to the Middle East must be a "hallmark" of the new millennium, said Pope John Paul II. Meeting members of the Pontifical Mission for Palestine at the end of celebrations of the organization's 50th anniversary, the pope said Dec. 9 that wealthy nations and individuals should take greater responsibility for the world's poor. "The Pontifical Mission is an eloquent expression of that new culture of international solidarity and cooperation which is so necessary in the modern world, and which must be a hallmark of the new millennium," the pope said.

We need a little Christmas, say citizens; CSS and parishioners respond

By ALESHA M. PRICE
Staff Writer

WINSTON-SALEM — For many people, the holiday season is a time of joy and preparation for the coming of Christ, the exchange of presents and the merriment of decorating and entertaining. Unfortunately, for others who are not able to provide their families with the necessities and the Christmas extras, it is a time of concern. This is where the Piedmont-Triad Office of Catholic Social Services (CSS) lends a helping hand through the generosity of the people in area churches.

The Christmas Assistance Program is a project CSS sponsors with the help of the Holiday Services Task Force, a local organization consisting of churches and other agencies that exchange information about disadvantaged families. All of the agencies involved compare their client lists to help as many people as possible, said Becky DuBois, pregnancy support and brief services social worker for CSS, who coordinates the project.

CSS gives these names to St. Leo the Great Church and Holy Family Church in Clemmons for the parishioners to choose a family to adopt. This year, Holy Family Church is helping 55 client families, while St. Leo the Great Church is providing for 45 families. About half of the families are CSS clients, and the other half are families who call CSS for help.

Cindy Gross, St. Leo the Great Church director of volunteers, and Vicki Ceneviva are the coordinators of the collection efforts at the church. They receive most of the names from CSS and another organization, "Experiment in Self-Reliance," a program in Winston-Salem that helps people through the transition from welfare to working, said Gross.

"We have a very generous parish, and this shows a strong Catholic presence in the community and provides a great deal of satisfaction for the parishioners," continued Gross.

The families are given the gift suggestions, ages and clothing sizes of the individual members of the family and also buy food for the Christmas meals with additional food to last for the week or, in some cases, the rest of the month.

"These sponsor families are giving out of the spirit of Christmas and of love and generosity, [even though] many of them have to sacrifice and cut back," said DuBois. "This is an opportunity to give on a more personal basis by becoming involved with a specific family, rather than simply writing a check."

One family from St. Leo the Great Church has been involved for several years with helping families for the holidays through the Christmas project. This year, Donald, Louisa, Travis and Holly Leonard adopted a family of three.

"Christmas is a special time of year, and to be able to share with people who don't have what we have is a positive thing to do," said Mr. Leonard. "We plan in advance for this, and the money is used for a better cause."

Holly, 10, and Travis, 13, the Leonards' grandchildren, agree that "giving to people who don't have what they need makes them feel good because they are able to help."

Mrs. Leonard knows what it is like to be without the staples of life. Born in Germany, she and her family lived through World War II.

"There were hard times, and we were always hungry," she remembered. "I know first-hand how it feels to do without, and I feel we owe at least a little bit to those who are less fortunate."

The family not only helps with the Christmas Assistance Program but with other charities and organizations as well, such as, the Christian Appalachian Project and Covenant House.

Mrs. Leonard said, "The joy of giving is uplifting, and when I sit down to eat Christmas dinner, to know that another family is also eating because we have helped them in any way is satisfying to me."

"I hope that this project awakens in my grandchildren a sense of responsibility to their less-fortunate brothers and sisters — to give and not focus on themselves," continued Mrs. Leonard.

Andrew Egbert, part owner of Reynolda Cutting Tools Inc., a Winston-Salem-based company that manufactures form tools for automatic machinery, is also involved in the Christmas Assistance Program. Although he is a parishioner of Our Lady of Grace Church in Greensboro, this St. Leo School alumnus heard about the project about three years ago and wanted his employees to become a part of the efforts.

So, Wanda Griffin, the company's president, Shannon Simpson, Kim Myers and William Edwards agreed that this would be something that they should do as an office.

Egbert's father started the business, and after he passed away, the company decided to sponsor a family in tribute to his love of the holiday season.

"We all used to give each other presents in the office, and we decided

Jesuit finds HUD job a new place to serve poor

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Jesuit Father Joe Hacala's Roman collar probably stands out a bit in the federal government office building where he works. And it may strike some people as odd when they call the Department of Housing and Urban Development about a project proposal and wind up working with a Catholic priest. But to hear HUD Secretary Andrew Cuomo talk, HUD's Center for Community and Interfaith Partnerships, which Father Hacala was hired to open and run, creates exactly the right kind of interaction between government and faith groups. The center has made it possible for nonprofit groups, particularly religiously based organizations to "have an institutional seat at the table" in community development, Cuomo said Nov. 30.

Fiji Catholics prepare to be first to meet the new millennium

KANSAS CITY, Mo. (CNS) — The tiny island of Taveuni in the Fiji Islands will make history Jan. 1 when Holy Cross Parish there celebrates what is being dubbed the first Mass of the millennium. Taveuni has that honor by virtue of its geographic location: the international date line crosses the South Pacific island. But beyond geography, the honor seems befitting of a place where, according to a priest who is a native son, faith is a way of life and religious vocations are thriving. "Faith has become our way of life," Father Kusitino Cobona told The Catholic Key, newspaper of the Diocese of Kansas City-St. Joseph. "We are very much a religious people. Being a priest or being a religious is a way of sharing this faith."

Trial delayed for CRS worker arrested in Georgia

MOSCOW (CNS) — An American Catholic Relief Services worker facing charges of vehicular manslaughter in Georgia will have to wait until at least the end of January for his day in court, his lawyer said. Ivan Khokhlov, the lawyer hired by CRS to represent aid worker Loren Wille, said in a telephone interview from the Georgian capital of Tbilisi that he was mystified by the delay. "This has been taking too long. The accident occurred almost five months ago, and similar cases in Georgia can be finished in a couple weeks," said Khokhlov, a U.S.-educated attorney. "Either you have the evidence or you don't. ... This just indicates that the authorities continue to consider this a political case."

Santas gather in downtown Toronto

A group of Santa Clauses are refelected in a puddle of water in the heart of Toronto's financial district December 13. The multiple Santas gathered to launch the annual Winter Harvest Food Drive prior to Christmas. Sponsored by Daily Bread Food Bank, the Santas will gather on various street corners to encourage shoppers to donate food for the needy.

Priests, nun rescued after water, sewage flood Mary's tomb

JERUSALEM (CNS) — Five priests and at least one nun were rescued when a combination of rain water and sewage rushed into the Tomb of the Virgin next to the Basilica of Gethesemane during the first big winter rain Dec. 13. Israeli police and soldiers were called to the scene, and special army scuba divers were sent in to search for anyone trapped under the 49 feet of water after the priests and nun were rescued.

Thousands gather to pay tribute to fallen firefighters

WORCESTER, Mass. (CNS) — The people of Worcester and Worcester County gathered by the thousands Dec. 9 to pay tribute to six firefighters who laid down their lives in a fire at an abandoned warehouse building Dec. 3. People, in respectful silence, lined the route of a procession of an estimated 20,000 firefighters from Worcester, from cities and towns in Worcester County, from fire departments from across Massachusetts and New England and from departments throughout the United States, Canada and as far away as Ireland and Australia. They were joined by President Clinton, Vice President Al Gore, Mass. Sens. Edward M. Kennedy and John F. Kerry.

Tom Jones, Lionel Richie to perform at Vatican concert

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Internationally acclaimed singers Tom Jones and Lionel Richie will take the stage at the Vatican's annual Christmas concert Dec. 18, organizers said. Proceeds from the concert, the seventh of its kind, will go to construct 50 new churches in the periphery of the Diocese of Rome. Pope John Paul II is expected to meet with the musicians, but he is not scheduled to attend the concert.

Illustrator paints image of Mother Teresa for Franklin Mint

ST. PAUL, Minn. (CNS) — Commercial illustrator Dick Bobnick has painted several images for collectible plates sold by the Franklin Mint — Sean Connery as James Bond, for example, and scenes from the TV show "Gunsmoke." He now adds to his list Mother Teresa holding a rosary. The image for the plate collection came from Bobnick's admiration for the nun whose beliefs he says are "steeped in traditional Catholic values." Bobnick hopes the Teresa plate, which was released this summer, will be popular enough to warrant a full six-plate series.

Survivor of 1958 school fire dedicates new CD to victims

CHICAGO (CNS) — Michael Mason named his benefit compact disc "Angels of Fire" in honor of the 92 children and three nuns who died in the fire that tore through Our Lady of the Angels School in Chicago on Dec. 1, 1958. But the name also applies to him and those who helped put the memorial CD together. Mason, a jazz flutist, suburban firefighter and survivor of the fire, is donating all proceeds to the Illinois Fire Safety Alliance for its Burn Camp for Children and other programs. "I wanted this to be a positive project," said Mason, who was in first grade in 1958. Mason said he hardly considers himself a survivor, since his classroom was spared by the flames.

At religions parliament, DePaul faculty member draws protests

CAPE TOWN, South Africa (CNS) — A lecture at the World Parliament of Religions in Cape Town by a staff member of DePaul University, Chicago, drew angry protests from some Christian groups. Elizabeth-Anne Stewart, a faculty member in the religious studies department and campus minister at the Catholic institution, said the controversy over her lecture, "Holy Foolishness: A Christological Paradigm for the New Millennium," took her by surprise. The lecture was based on her book "Jesus the Holy Fool." At the Dec. 1 opening of the parliament, fundamentalist Muslim and Christian groups protested the meeting, some brandishing placards denouncing the parliament for calling Jesus a holy fool.

Outside Bethlehem, few shepherds fill the fields

By JUDITH SUDILOVSKY
Catholic News Service

BAYT SAHUR, West Bank (CNS) — Sabaha al-Hussein hoists the small white goat and brings it closer to her tent, where she has lit a fire on the ground to make sweet tea in a blackened kettle.

Another family member has taken their 80 goats out to graze several hundred yards away on what little dry grasses and bushes they can find in the brown hills just outside Bethlehem, where al-Hussein has lived all her life.

A Bedouin Muslim, al-Hussein, 60, knows well the Christmas story and of the shepherds who were the first to be told of Jesus' birth by God.

"They say the shepherds were in this valley when Jesus was born, and the angels came to tell them," she said. "They may have even been my ancestors, because all my family have been shepherds in this valley forever."

Shepherd families like that of al-Hussein's used to dot these hills, but today hers is one of the few left, and all of her nine children have gone to live in the city.

Today the financial mainstay of local residents is in olive wood and mother-of-pearl handicrafts, but they maintain deep roots to their land.

Many residents of Bayt Sahur refuse to sell their land, and although there has been emigration, the proportion is much less than from other villages.

"Our families are still holding on to their land. People don't sell their properties," said 29-year-old Azzam Elias, a truck driver whose university studies were interrupted by the Intifada, or Palestinian uprising.

Elias said his grandfather still talks of his youth as a shepherd and farmer in the area, and through these stories Elias feels his own deep bond to the land and its history.

"My grandfather is 80 years old, and if we were to bring him sheep and cows, he would gladly go out into the fields again. We can't just ignore this tradition, although it is easy to do in today's world, with all the coming and going and computers and technology," Elias said.

Looking toward the hill where al-Hussein tends her fire and her goat he added: "When her husband dies, she will leave this life. Her sons will come and take her to live in the city. But this is our past, our life."

As hopes grow for increasing tourism with the millennium, so does hope for the future, and Elias and his friends rarely talk of leaving the village.

Samer Badra, 27, who works as a Web master for the Latin Patriarchate Schools, spent three years in Rome but eventually returned home.

"You can't compare Rome to Bayt Sahur of course, but I wanted to come home. It didn't feel like Christmas in Rome. There were the prayers and the Mass and everything but ... here it is different, the joy and happiness is inside," said Badra.

Father Majdi al-Siryani, Bayt Sahur parish priest, passes al-Hussein's tent every day to and from his job at the Latin Patriarchate in Jerusalem. Driving through Bethlehem would be quicker, but instead he cuts through this valley.

"Here it smells like Christmas every day, especially in the morning when I see the shepherds," he said. "When I see the shepherd flock and the grottos, I feel far from the city. It is very peaceful. I feel the presence of God in the silence."

Inside the town of Bayt Sahur, which borders Bethlehem to the southeast, several small fields are touted as "Shepherd's Field." Father al-Siryani said at one time all of Bayt Sahur was pasture land for Bethlehem's shepherds, so no one knows for certain where the shepherds were at the time of Jesus' birth.

"As a community, (Bayt Sahur) still clings to its traditions," said Father al-Siryani, a native of Jordan who has been in Bayt Sahur for two years. "They don't kid around with it. They take it very seriously."

For instance, Father al-Siryani said his first Christmas morning in Bayt Sahur, he was surprised to find his church almost empty. According to their tradition, his parishioners were all out visiting their married female relatives and families who had experienced deaths during the past year. Later in the afternoon they come to Mass, the priest discovered.

These traditions keep the residents connected to their past, he said. ▼

Procession celebrates culture, honors patron of the Americas

By ELLEN NEERINCX SIGMON
Correspondent

MORGANTON — In 1531, a man named Juan Diego went to see the local bishop. He told the bishop that he had been walking by a hill when he saw a figure of a young Native American woman surrounded by bright light. He said that she told him she was the mother of God, and she wanted a shrine built there. The bishop did not believe him. Diego later returned, saying he had seen the vision again, and roses had suddenly appeared on the hillside. He said the woman had told him to take the roses and put them in his cloak. When Diego opened his cloak to show the bishop, the roses fell out, and on his cloak was a painting of the woman he had seen.

The bishop decided that Diego had seen the Virgin Mary, and he allowed a shrine to be built on the hill. This is the Hill of Tepeyac in Mexico City, and the cloak with the painting hangs in the shrine. Thousands of people gather there each year on Dec. 12 to pay their respects to Our Lady of Guadalupe, patron saint of the Americas.

Parishioners at St. Charles Borromeo Catholic Church — and in parishes throughout the Diocese of Charlotte — also celebrate this day every year.

This year, over 200 people gathered at the Morganton church to form a candlelit procession to the Catholic Worker House of Hospitality, a little over a mile away. They carried with them an image of Our Lady of Guadalupe to present to the house, which has been in operation for over two months. The house provides shelter for local homeless people who need help getting a new start.

Before the procession began, several people took pictures of family members and friends standing with a portrait of Our Lady of Guadalupe in front of the altar. It was then blessed with a prayer in Spanish, which translated was, "God of power and mercy, you blessed the Americas at Tepeyac with the presence of the Virgin Mary of Guadalupe. May her prayers help all men and women to accept each other as brothers and sisters. Through your justice present in our hearts, may peace reign in the world. Through Christ our Lord."

During the procession, guitarists led the group in the singing of many Spanish hymns in praise of Mary. In between the hymns, several people cheered, "Maria, Maria, rah, rah, rah," or responded, "Viva!" to other praises of Mary shouted in Spanish. Showers predicted for the evening held off until the group was close to the end of its journey, and the rain did not dampen the enthusiasm of the crowd or extinguish any of the candles. When the group arrived at the house, they took turns going inside for refreshments.

Another celebration planned at the Morganton parish this month also has its origins in Mexico. "Las Posadas" is a nine-day novena in preparation for Christmas that takes place from Dec. 16 to 24. The word posadas means shelter or lodging in Spanish. During this celebration, participants re-enact the story of Joseph seeking shelter for Mary, who is soon to have the baby Jesus. For nine nights, participants go from house to house asking for shelter, only to be refused over and over again. Finally, on Christmas Eve, they are offered a stable in which to rest.

The celebration at St. Charles will take place inside the church each night and will be followed by Christmas Eve Mass on the last night of the ritual. ▼

Hispanic community fills parish to venerate Our Lady of Guadalupe

BY LUIS WOLF
CORRESPONDENT

CHARLOTTE — Nearly 2,800 members of the Hispanic community filled St. Matthew parish on Dec. 11 to celebrate the feast of Our Lady of Guadalupe, patroness of Mexico and the Americas.

The Mass was celebrated by Bishop William G. Curlin and concelebrated by Vincentian Father Vincent Finnerty, director of Hispanic Ministry in the Diocese of Charlotte, Vincentian Father Jose Elzi and Rev. Mr. Rafael Torres. St. Matthew was full of music and color as 20 members of the community, dressed to reflect the many Hispanic regions, led the procession into the church carrying the flag of their particular country.

In addition to the regular readings for Mass, the story of dialogue between the Virgin and now-Blessed Juan Diego was read.

As is custom in Mexico, during the offertory, children deposited flowers at the altar in front of image of the Virgin.

During his homily, Father Finnerty emphasized the impact of the apparition of Our Lady to Juan Diego. Because of the apparition, hundreds of thousands were converted to the Catholic faith. Juan Diego, too, was a convert to the faith. Father Finnerty said people need three things to continue daily conversion: To love others as the Virgin loves us, to be as humble as Juan Diego, and to have the type of faith that Juan Diego had.

In closing comments, Bishop Curlin applauded those from Latino nations for their deep faith and love of Mary.

"Do not lose the richness of your traditions or your culture," said the bishop. "You have a strong faith and devotion that we need here in America."

In 1531, Mary appeared four times to Juan Diego on Tepeyac hill outside of Mexico City, instructing Diego of her desire to have a church built at that location. It would take the authentication of the apparition - through a life-sized depiction of the Virgin on the cloak of Juan Diego to convince the Church of the apparition. The church was erected about two years after Juan Diego approached the bishop of that region. The preserved mantle worn by Juan Diego is enshrined in the Basilica of Our Lady of Guadeloupe.

The feast day for Juan Diego is Dec. 9, and the marked day for Our Lady of Guadalupe is Dec. 12. ▼

Book Review

Astronomer says Christmas star was 'eclipse' of Jupiter

By NANCY HARTNAGEL
Catholic News Service

WASHINGTON (CNS) — In a new book, astronomer Michael Molnar says the Christmas star — the Star of Bethlehem in Matthew's Gospel — was a lunar occultation or "eclipse" of Jupiter, rising early on April 17, 6 B.C., in the constellation Aries.

Molnar said his findings are consistent with the biblical account and help explain why King Herod and the people of Jerusalem did not see the star, for the Magi saw it, not in the heavens, but on their astrological diagrams.

The author, former manager of the Physics Instructional Labs at Rutgers University in New Jersey, spoke by phone with Catholic News Service Dec. 8. His book, "The Star of Bethlehem — The Legacy of the Magi," was published by Rutgers University Press.

"The Star of Bethlehem indeed was Jupiter and what happened to Jupiter that made it special on that day," Molnar said. "It was 'in the East,' just like the biblical account says, and 'in the East' is a special condition that is a certain distance from the sun. That happened on April 17, 6 B.C., in Aries the ram."

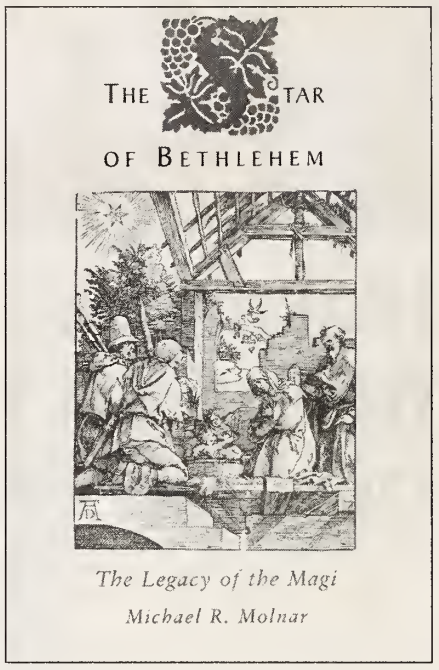
"The Star of Bethlehem: The Legacy of the Magi"
By Michael Molnar
(Rutgers University Press)

The lunar occultation was a second important thing, he said, and these conditions "happened approximately every 60 years, but not perfectly."

He called the 6 B.C. event "very unique," one that "defies statistical quantification."

Molnar said the Magi, who were scientists from the East, probably did not see much in the heavens that April 17. "The sky was too bright because it was early in the morning," he explained.

Days or weeks later, he said, they were able to see a bright Jupiter emerge higher and higher in the morning sky. Later still, he said, it "went before them" and "stood over where the young child was," in the words of the King James Bible.



The Legacy of the Magi
Michael R. Molnar

Molnar said this describes retrograde motion, "one of those important historical developments as to why the planets swung backwards in the sky. It's an optical illusion because the earth is moving around the sun."

According to his calculations, the Magi probably were in Herod's court inquiring about "the King of the Jews" in October or November of 6 B.C.

The Magi, who studied their sky charts for omens and portents, would have been watching for signs of the Jewish Messiah, said Molnar, because "there were rumors" and "a prophecy of Balaam about the Messiah coming in Judea." The Old Testament prophecy appears in Numbers 24:17.

"There are lots of Roman sources quoting this," he said, referring to the ancient historical and astrological texts he poured over.

Molnar said it's important to remember what the situation was like 2,000 years ago. "Astrology was extremely important to the pagan people," he said. "The Jews did not practice it, but all the pagans did."

Since Christ's birth, astronomers have theorized that the Star of Bethlehem was a comet, a nova or supernova, or a planetary conjunction Molnar noted. And many mistakenly looked for evidence of the star in the constellation Pisces, perhaps because it later became a Christian symbol.

So, it was a bit of serendipity — an ancient Roman coin — that pointed Molnar instead to Aries, where all the conditions came together.

In 1990, the astronomer said, he

The scene is sharply focused. In a well-proportioned room with white plaster walls and graceful windows, looking out on vineyards and rolling pastures, Mary kneels before an open book. Her finger rests elegantly on the page she was reading at the moment of the visitation. Her face is serene as she looks up at the angel.

He is tall, dressed in white, multicolored wings discretely folded. One hand is raised in a gesture of command and invitation. His face reflects the solemnity of the occasion.

This mental picture is an amalgam composed from a lifetime of paintings in museums and on holy cards. The same scene, slightly altered — a cityscape in the windows, a dawn setting, an older angel, a younger Mary — graces the interior picture gallery of millions, most of whom would easily identify it as the Annunciation.

In fact, though, when we hear this story on the fourth Sunday of Advent, Luke describes nothing of the scene. No room is pictured, no commentary given about Mary's appearance or posture. The angel could have appeared to her simply as a stranger handing on a message. The Scripture doesn't even say she saw an angel, only that one spoke to her. Far from serene, Luke's portrait of Mary is of a frightened and troubled girl, full of questions and confusion as well as deep faith.

At this season of sometimes false gaiety and sugar-coated nostalgia, we would do well to remember the reality of Mary's fear and the enormity of her trust; to recognize the good news of Christ's coming into our lives as less of a happy-greeting-card sentiment and more of a revolutionary life challenge; to embrace, like Mary, the awesome assertion that God's transforming love and presence is ours for the taking.

Questions:
When in your life has the invitation to do God's will been especially real to you? What is one concrete way you can foster a deeper sense of God's presence this Christmas?

"Stuart Little"

Stuart Little, voiced by Michael J. Fox, takes a moment to recover after being rescued from an accidental dip in a washing machine. The U.S. Catholic Conference classification is A-II — adults and adolescents. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is PG — parental guidance suggested.

New at the Box Office

NEW YORK (CNS) — Following are recent capsule movie reviews issued by the U.S. Catholic Conference Office for Film and Broadcasting.

"The Green Mile" (Warner Bros.)

Prison drama set in 1935 Louisiana where a death-row head guard (Tom Hanks) comes to believe in the innocence of a huge, gentle black man (Michael Clarke Duncan) whose miraculous healing powers affect those around him in startling ways. As adapted by director Frank Darabont from the serialized 1996 Stephen King novel, the movie is slow-moving but presents affecting character studies of good and evil men with spiritual undertones and a sobering depiction of capital punishment. Some violence including a horrific electrocution, occasional profanity and intermittent rough language. The U.S. Catholic Conference classification is A-III — adults. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is R — restricted.

"Stuart Little" (Columbia)

Fetching live-action fantasy in which a talking white mouse (voice of Michael J. Fox) is happily adopted as the son of a human family (led by matriarch Geena Davis) only to be targeted as a meal by mean neighborhood alley cats. As loosely adapted from E.B. White's 1945 classic by director Rob Minkoff, the cheery tale has ample visual appeal although purists may find the neatly happy ending a cop-out to the author's more probing tale of self-discovery. Scenes of menace and a few cuss words. The U.S. Catholic Conference classification is A-II — adults and adolescents. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is PG — parental guidance suggested.

"Cherry" (Cypress Films)

Inept romantic comedy in which a 29-year-old virgin (Shalom Harlow) spurns marriage yet wants to have a baby, then can find no likely candidate until suddenly pursued by a professional clown (Donovan Leitch) and her gynecologist (Jake Weber). Co-directed by Jon Glascoe and Joseph Pierson, the attempt to make the bogus situation and phony characters seem whimsical is painfully unamusing. Considerable sexual innuendo and occasional rough language. The U.S. Catholic Conference classification is A-IV — adults, with reservations. Not rated by the Motion Picture Association of America.

"A Christmas Wish" tells uplifting story of old-fashioned values

By GERRI PARE
Catholic News Service

NEW YORK (CNS)— A mystery in his late grandfather's past changes a young man's future in " A Christmas Wish," to be rerun Wednesday, Dec. 22, 9-11 p.m. EST on CBS.

Briefly putting his lucrative Wall Street career on hold, Will Martin (Neil Patrick Harris) returns to his hometown to comfort Gram (Debbie Reynolds) on her husband's death and to try to modernize Granddad's underperforming real estate business.

His own parents having perished in a car crash when he was very small, Will was tenderly raised by his loving grandparents, who were devoted to each other as well.

And so it comes as a shock when Gram tells Will of having found many mentions in Grandpa's diary of his visiting a "Lilian" every Christmas Eve while she took Will out Christmas shopping. She pleads with Will to find out who the mystery woman is and to tell her the truth, even if it is unpleasant. He reluctantly agrees, hoping the man the whole town admired as a generous businessman won't be revealed as having carried on an affair over the last two decades.

Meanwhile, Will's ambitious girlfriend, Julia (Alexandra Wilson), starts pressuring him about a commitment and his newly hired business manager (Gary Bayer) pushes Will to drastically raise the rents on their properties to current market value.

"A Christmas Wish"
Dec. 22, 9-11 p.m. EST
on CBS

Will, however, becomes sidetracked in investigating his granddad's history, in the process meeting a former secretary, Renee (Naomi Watts), a sweet single mom whose 6-year-old son Justin (Ian Meltzer) takes an immediate shine to Will and vice versa.

However, no one who was close to his grandfather ever heard of the elusive Lilian. If not a colleague or a girlfriend, could she be an illegitimate child, he wonders dismally, while trying to persuade Gram she may be best not knowing the truth — to no avail.

Realizing his bossy girlfriend is not right for him, and that his new manager cares nothing about the townspeople suddenly facing much higher rents, Will resists leaving the company in his ruthless hands and breaks off with Julia.

The wealth of Wall Street seems less alluring when Gram is still hurting, the Lilian mystery persists and his own soul-searching has just begun.

Viewers are in for a treat with this lovely story, directed with delicacy by Ian Barry from Beth Polson's script, based on Richard Siddoway's book.

The director gets very natural and credible performances from the cast, clearly advising them that less is more, and it proves true.

Old-fashioned values, where people are put before excess profits, come to be forefront as Harvard-educated Will discovers why his grandfather was so beloved. And Granddad's relationship with Lilian turns out to have other positive things to say about the man, as well as to enable Gram to reach out lovingly to a stranger.

Just as the story is discreet, the pacing is gentle as Will gradually discovers as much about himself as he does about the family secret. Nor does the movie fall into the trap of being overly sentimental; its only shortcoming is that Granddad sounds as if he was almost too good to be true instead of the wise, thoughtful man he was, who knew sometimes a secret is best kept from a spouse until she is ready to deal with it.

Overall, it is a beautiful film with uplifting themes that the family can enjoy together. ▼

The Pope Speaks

POPE JOHN PAUL II

John XXIII expected to be declared venerable, beatified

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope John Paul II is expected to declare Pope John XXIII venerable in late December and beatify him next September.

Famiglia Cristiana, Italy's top-selling weekly magazine, devoted the cover of its Dec. 12 issue to Pope John and said his beatification would take place Sept. 3.

Pope John Paul's calendar for the Holy Year 2000 includes a beatification ceremony Sept. 3 in St. Peter's Square, although the person or people to be beatified were not named.

Pope John headed the Catholic Church from 1958 to 1963 and convoked the Second Vatican Council.

Officials involved in sainthood and beatification processes told Catholic News Service the September beatification of Pope John was likely.

And, they said, it was almost certain Pope John Paul would formally recognize Pope John's heroic virtues during a Dec. 20 meeting with the Congregation for Sainthood Causes.

In an unusual move, the congregation's panel of physicians already has said the miracle submitted in Pope John's cause had no natural explanation. Review by a panel of theologians and official papal recognition of the miracle are still needed, but are considered almost certainties.

Pope appeals for end to capital punishment during jubilee year

By BENEDICTA CIPOLLA
Catholic News Service

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Holy Year 2000 represents a great opportunity for the world to abolish the death penalty, Pope John Paul II said.

"The great jubilee is a privileged occasion to promote throughout the world increasingly mature forms of respect for life and for the dignity of every person," said the pope during his Dec. 12 Angelus address.

Citing church teaching on capital punishment, the pope renewed his appeal for an international consensus on outlawing the practice.

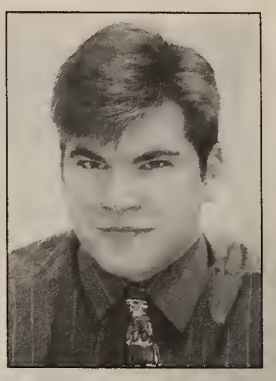
His message was then re-broadcast at Rome's Colosseum, where an anti-death penalty initiative started later in the day. Once the site of sacrifices of Christians to lions, the ancient amphitheater has been transformed into a symbol of life and mercy.

During the year 2000, the Colosseum's lights will turn from white to gold for 48 hours every time a death sentence is commuted or a country abolishes capital punishment.

Sponsors of the 2000 project include the City of Rome, the Italian Ministry of Culture, Amnesty International and the Catholic lay group San Egidio.

The pope has repeatedly called for the worldwide abolition of the death penalty, saying that instances where it is necessary to protect society are "very rare, if not practically nonexistent."

Christmas Memories



JIMMY ROSTAR
Associate Editor

Away in a manger lies the real meaning of Christmas

It's an early December day in an eastern North Carolina house, and boxes of Christmas decorations are strewn through the rooms. A young boy, perhaps 6 or 7, peers with wonder-filled eyes through the maze of cartons. He loves Christmas like no other time of the year, and he is looking for one box in particular. It is the one whose contents he alone is proudly responsible for assembling.

The box holds the family crèche, and I am the little boy.

More than 20 years later, setting up the manger scene is still the highlight of Christmas decorating in my home. Now, as it was then, placing the Holy Family and the Magi, the ox and the donkey, into their respective places in and around the crèche is a prayerful meditation on the season's awe and beauty. And as my parents had graciously done years earlier, my wife, Lynda, has relinquished family crèche decorating to me.

Like so many other holiday traditions, the recreation of the Nativity can be traced back centuries, through which it has become increasingly more popular. One of the earliest known depictions could be seen by the fifth century, where in the Church of St. Mary Major in Rome a chapel was created representing the Nativity. It is also where boards popularly believed to be the crib of Bethlehem are housed.

St. Francis of Assisi and the Franciscans of the 13th century, though, are who really popularized the crèche — the actual, three-dimensional representation of the Nativity. At Christmas in 1223, Francis created what is widely thought to be the first one, in the Italian town of Greccio. It was there that Francis built what he called "a memorial to that Child who was born in Bethlehem" — a rugged manger that the saintly man hoped would illustrate the hardships the Holy Family endured that sacred night.

Peasants who gathered in Greccio for Mass that Christmas Eve in 1223, while listening to Francis preach, reportedly saw the Christ child appear and smile from the crib Francis had fashioned.

The crèche became more popular at parishes in the decades following, and by the 16th century, the Nativity scene was widely seen at churches throughout Italy and in many parts of Europe. The practice of having crèches in private homes became more common, too, and it remains a favorite depiction of devotion.

I've heard it said about the Nativity scene that nothing other than the Mass on Christmas is a truer illustration of how heaven came to earth two millennia ago, and I agree. The crèche also powerfully recalls holiday memories most vivid in my own life: my father handcrafting me my own crèche, spending Christmases with my wife and family, and, this year, giving thanks for the birth of our daughter, Hannah.

Christmas is truly the brightest and most joyous of seasons, a time of the year when we give pause in gratitude and look ahead in anticipation for even brighter, more glorious tomorrows. And in our own homes, we can look to the crèche and remember that it was the Christ child, lying in a manger, who brought us new hope as our savior and Lord.

A message for your Christmas

Some Catholics are losing their faith in the meaning of Christmas. They hear that the story of Adam and Eve's fall from grace depicted in the Book of Genesis was just a myth. They also wonder about the implications of the theory of evolution on the doctrine of original sin. As a result they begin to ask why we need a Savior at all.

The story of Adam and Eve need not be taken literally; nevertheless, we do in fact need a Redeemer.

Evil abounds in the world. Read any newspaper on any given day of the year, and you will see how much malice and madness pervades this planet. Something is seriously wrong.

There are skeptics and unbelievers who scoff at the Christmas story. They boast that they do not need a Savior. But, millions of Christians view the Nativity scene with eyes of faith. For them Christmas is truly a celebration of the coming of our Savior.

For me, Christmas is especially meaningful, not only because I am deeply aware of my own need for a personal Savior, but also because I see that our world is in such a deplorable condition.

More than 100 years ago, Cardinal John Henry Newman commented on the same idea, namely that the fallen human condition is in itself a proof of the doctrine of original sin — "the defeat of good, the success of evil, physical pain, mental anguish, the prevalence and intensity of sin, the pervading idolatries and corruptions, the sad condition of the whole human race."

These realities help us to realize that we need a power greater than our own to restore us to health, sanity and salvation.

The Catechism of the Catholic Church has this to say about the doctrine of original sin. "(This doctrine is) the reverse side of the good news that Jesus is the Savior of all men (and women).... Salvation is offered to all through Christ. We cannot tamper with the revelation of original sin without undermining the mystery of Christ.... The account of the fall in Genesis 3 uses figurative language, but affirms a primeval event, a deed that took place at the beginning of the history of man" (Nos. 389 & 390).

A good friend of mine, Jose de Vinck Sr., wrote the following piece on the subject:

"Adam and Eve are an eloquent and mythical representation of the fact that human nature, endowed with the privilege of freedom, is also threatened by every possible form of temptation, from greed to lust, from selfishness to pride and every other possible form of sin. If we believe that human destiny is to be fulfilled in eternity by the beatific vision, by personal and conscious union with God, we are very much in need of a Redeemer who will protect us on our way."

This Christmas, please try to hold onto your faith, and keep it as simple as possible. Bow humbly before the Lord. Be grateful that God loved you enough to send His only begotten Son that you might enjoy eternal bliss.

You are not a poor and helpless creature abandoned to an incomprehensible fate.

Jesus was born in a stable 2,000 years ago to bring you the wonderful news that God's saving love has touched your life.

Be still and know that He is God.

The creation and life of man

Fables abound in every culture. From the ancient Aesop to the modern Thurber, fabulists satisfy our need to take life's lessons in medicinal doses as Mary Poppins recommends — with a spoonful of sugar. So, the best fables instruct us about life but always with great imagination and, often, with humor.

In the southern part of Venezuela, the Eñeka, Kariña, Akawayo and Pemón native people have lifted fables to an art form. Explanations for the harshness of the human condition and the contrariness of human nature are woven into creation fables. One of them goes like this.

When God created the donkey, He said, "As a donkey, you will work every day, carry whatever is given to you, and live for thirty years." But the donkey answered, "God, I'll do everything you ask of me, but thirty years is much too long. Why not just ten years of life?" And God agreed.

When God created the dog, He said, "As a dog, you must guard the household and live for twenty-five years." But the dog answered, "God I'll do everything you want, but twenty-five years is too long. Could you make it just ten? And God agreed.

When God created the monkey, He said. "You shall be a monkey, and jump from tree to tree, and entertain everyone for fifteen years." But the monkey answered, "God, "I promise to do all you demand, but fifteen years? Please make it ten!" And God agreed.

Finally, God created people, saying, "You will be the most intelligent creatures on earth, and you'll dominate the world, and live for thirty years." But the answer came: "God, I will be everything that you ask, but thirty years is not enough time. Why don't you give me the twenty years that the donkey didn't want, the fifteen years from the dog, and the five from the monkey?" And God agreed.

That is why people live thirty years, marry and work like a donkey carrying their families on their backs for twenty years. When they retire, they stay close to home like a dog for fifteen years. Their last years are spent like a monkey, hopping from one child's house to another and entertaining the grandchildren.

I like this little gem of wisdom because of the kernel of truth concealed in its humor. It tells us more about our view of ourselves than about our actual genesis.

From the very beginning, the Creator's plan for us has been modified by humankind's belief that we know better than God what is good for us. It seems that ever since Adam and Eve bit into that forbidden fruit so they could know as much as God and become like Him, people have resisted letting God be God.

The title "Creator" is meaningful only to the extent that it truly reflects our self-understanding. Creator is just another name until it becomes an acknowledgement of our dependence upon God for life itself, an attitude of trust in His promise that we do not live and die in vain.

When we become grateful to be children of God, a human family of brothers and sisters, we will better understand that our love for one another is a reflection of the encompassing and eternal love of God for all creatures and all creation.

Question Corner

FATHER JOHN DIETZEN
CNS COLUMNIST

Can a Godparent be changed years later?

Q. Is there a way we can change the godmother of our child? The person we chose several years ago has left the Catholic faith and is carrying on a lifestyle destructive for her and for the people around her.

She has had nothing to do with our son ever since and is certainly not the example we feel a godmother should be for him, now or later on.

Another relative has shown much love and care for our children and would be an excellent baptism sponsor. She is willing to be named as godmother. We've heard that's possible. Would you explain what we need to do?

A. Unfortunately, your circumstance is not unique. Some situations are more painful than others, but when a child's godparent has died or has proven unwilling or unable to serve appropriately in that role, it's understandable that good Christian parents want someone else in that capacity for their child.

Having a caring godparent is always important. It is particularly so should the parents die or become incapacitated, which of course is one reason sponsors should be chosen carefully.

The process of changing is not simple, however. The Congregation for the Sacraments, acknowledging such circumstances as yours, states that the bishop of a diocese may officially designate a substitute sponsor, whose name would be inscribed in the official parish baptism register. (Reply of Nov. 13, 1984, to bishops of the United States and Canada; in 1985 issue of Roman Replies of the Canon Law Society of America)

Baptism records can be quite important for civil and religious purposes in later years, which is why a parish priest or secretary, for example, cannot simply make such changes on his or her own initiative.

There may on occasion be a good reason for this kind of official change of godparents. However, a loving, concerned friend or relative, such as the one you mention, can usually do just as much for the child, now and in the future, without going through all this formality.

You might even make it "official" for your family by asking the adult you speak of to act as godparent for your child. When your son is old enough to understand, explain what you have done.

Among other advantages, it could help him be aware of the importance of baptism and how you are concerned that this sacrament be lived out properly in his life.

Finally, is it possible that a note from you to your son's present godmother would be an act of goodness toward her? And maybe move her to reflect a little on where she has turned?

After all, only a few years ago you did see her as having those qualities you want in a sponsor. If she has changed so drastically, maybe she would be helped spiritually to hear what you are telling me about your disappointed hopes in her, the hurt she has been to you and your son, and what you plan to do.

If you can bring yourself to do this, even though you follow up on your present plan, who knows what God's grace might do for her?

Family Reflections

Christmas and families

Christmastime is special for families. It is a time when it matters most that members come together. The collective story of family is punctuated by yuletide gatherings. Our identities are forged ever more deeply, and we continue to define for ourselves what it means to be "us" — a family.

For many families it is the rhythm of the yearly holiday cycle that feeds their family togetherness. The annual beat of special holiday family time shapes our identities and proclaims to us who we are and whose we are. Regardless of how frequent or infrequent our connections are through the year, these are special connections that cast in our memories the essence of being family.

The old Stephen Stills song says, "If you can't be with the one you love, love the one you're with." Family holiday experiences defy the notion that it doesn't matter who you're with. It says that if you can't be with those you love, find a way to make it happen.

Family members make extraordinary effort to be with one another, even when traveling long distances is necessary. Never mind that there are perennial issues of conflict between members. What we would not bear throughout the year, we put up with for the sake of family at Christmastime. This is the season when it really matters who we are with.

What draws us together is not just who we are, but also who we want to be. Members scattered far away from each other become pilgrims to a place they call "home." There seems to be a built-in homing sense that calls us home for the holidays. We long to feel whole, be connected and in touch with a vision of family, whether or not that vision is our reality.

Cynics may protest that the merrymaking and good-doing of Christmastime are superficial and just our way of assuaging our consciences for year-long selfish ways. However, we suggest that the holiday season is a time of year when we feel more intensely our natural thirst for God.

The pull toward home is our built-in nature that longs for truth and goodness. Though our nature to err impedes our lifelong search, we nonetheless cry out from the depths of our being to love and be loved.

Perhaps, we too readily, after the yuletide season passes, step out of the gravitational pull of family togetherness. But, if there are chances to heal old wounds, make new starts, mend broken bonds, and renew family ties, the holiday season creates such opportunities.

So, give in to the holiday penchant for almsgiving, caroling and cheerful greetings. Especially, release yourself to the natural longing to be with loved-ones. It's the Spirit working in us, calling us home.

William P. Clark II and J. Chapin Engler were recently installed to the Ministry of Acolyte.

St. Vincent seminarians from Charlotte diocese installed to Ministry of Acolyte

LATROBE, Pa. — Eighteen seminarians from eight dioceses and one abbey were installed to the Ministry of Acolyte on Nov. 8. The Most Rev. Joseph V. Adamec, Bishop of Altoona-Johnston, Pa., presided over the installation, held at the St. Vincent Archabbey Basilica, Latrobe. The installation was held Monday, Nov. 9.

Installed were William P. Clark II and J. Chapin Engler of the Diocese of Charlotte.

Clark is the son of Jacqueline Shiffer Wiggins of Lancaster, Pa., Ethel Clark of Lancaster and the late William P Clark. He is a 1980 graduate of Manheim Township High School, Lancaster. He earned a bachelor of science degree in biochemistry in 1985 and a master of science degree in biochemistry in 1990 from the University of Maryland.

Engler is the son of Peggy and John Engler of Charlotte. He is a 1980 graduate of Charlotte Catholic High School. He earned a bachelor of arts degree in philosophy in 1985 from the University of Notre Dame, South Bend, Ind.

The acolyte is appointed to aid the deacon and to minister to the priest. It is his duty to attend to the service of the altar and to assist the deacon and priest in liturgical celebrations, especially the Mass. He is also permitted to distribute communion as an extraordinary minister. ▼ to discontinue that to help a family for Christmas," said Egbert. "All of the workers have a person that they shop for individually, and the company also contributes a larger gift."

This is the third year that the company has sponsored a family with a single mother and children. One year, the company bought bicycles for the children, and this year, the company is giving the family a grocery store gift certificate for a month's worth of groceries.

"Everybody here feels fortunate to be able to help," said Egbert. "We are lucky to have what we have, and this is a way to have some fun shopping for others and to give back to the community." ▼ bought a Roman coin depicting Aries the ram looking over its shoulder at a star. The coin was issued at Antioch, capital of the Roman province of Syria, from about 6 A.D. to about 13 or 14 A.D., he said.

In trying to figure out why the Romans issued such a coin, he discovered that "Aries the ram was the sign of the Jews during those times."

This realization, coupled with research and scientific computations, led him to conclude that the star had appeared in Aries, "the sign of King Herod's kingdom."

He said the Romans, who were "notorious for propaganda," may have appropriated the portent — so significant to the Jews — as a way of cementing their control over Judea-Samaria, which they annexed for the first time in 6 A.D.

Until the coin, Molnar wasn't interested in trying to explain the Star of Bethlehem. "I figured it was one of those great mysteries of the Bible that would never be solved," he said.

He "tried to remain religiously neutral" in his writing to give the book a historical basis. But he said he's gotten great satisfaction from people telling him the book "reconfirms their faith."

"I'm also very happy that I've uncovered that there is a truth to all this, that we can understand better what happened 2,000 years ago," he said.

The astronomer, who is now working as a Web developer, couldn't resist pointing out that Jupiter is the brightest star in the evening sky this Christmas season.

"Just face a little toward the south and look up, and there it is," he said. "That's our Christmas star." ▼

Holiday tradition continues at St. Patrick School

By JIMMY ROSTAR
Associate Editor

CHARLOTTE — For about 20 years, Jerry Jones has spent his Christmas Days in the cafeteria of St. Patrick School and on the streets of Charlotte, serving and delivering food to people who otherwise would have no holiday dinner. For him, it's a Christmas tradition that sums up the true essence of the season.

Jones is a co-chairperson of the efforts behind the St. Patrick Christmas Dinner, hosted each Dec. 25 for hundreds of folks both at the school and through the Charlotte area. The dinner, says Jones, has become a holiday institution in Charlotte, serving a diverse population that comes together as an extended family on Christmas.

"We have folks coming here from the local shelters, elderly men and women in senior housing who have no family members around, families who are traveling — anybody who might be spending Christmas Day alone or in need," says Jones.

Coordinators work with more than two dozen service and housing agencies in town, compiling lists of clients and residents who might be interested in having Christmas dinner at the school. Busses from the Mecklenburg Area Catholic Schools system transport people to the dinner, and Jones says many meals are delivered as well — to people in scant apartments, under highway overpasses, on city streets.

The tradition got its start by St. Patrick Cathedral parishioners who adopted families in need during the holidays. The outreach grew by leaps and bounds each year, and eventually became such a large project that it was moved to the parish school.

The spirit of volunteerism drives the tradition, says Jones. The food, cooking and gifts are all donated, and an army of volunteers helps each year with serving and delivering dinners. Remaining money is used to purchase small presents, and leftover food is donated to a local shelter.

"This is Christmas for me," says Jones. "The number of people involved in this thing is really extensive, and we just try to bring a little bit of happiness during the holidays to those who could really use it."

For more information about the St. Patrick Christmas Dinner or how you can help (financial contributions, clothing, coats, toiletries and toys are especially needed), contact the St. Patrick Cathedral parish office at (704) 334-2283. St. Patrick School is located on 1125 Buchanan St. ▼

Pope lauds restored Sistine Chapel frescoes as 'visual hymn'

By JOHN THAVIS
Catholic News Service

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Blessing a restoration job financed largely by American benefactors, Pope John Paul II viewed resplendent frescoes in the Sistine Chapel and said they constituted a "visual hymn" to God.

On Dec. 11 Vatican officials unveiled the final phase of a 20-year cleaning project in the chapel, which began with Michelangelo's famed ceiling paintings and ended with a series of 15th-century frescoes on the side walls.

The 12 side wall frescoes, by artists including Sandro Botticelli, Pietro Perugino and Domenico Ghirlandaio, feature scenes from the lives of Moses and Christ, including Moses' crossing of the Red Sea and Christ's handing the keys of the kingdom to St. Peter.

Covering some 5,000 square feet, the works were restored to their original brilliant colors in a five-year project costing about $3 million.

"Most of it was paid for by American patrons, and the results are excellent," said U.S. Cardinal Edmund C. Szoka, who administers Vatican City and its museums. He introduced some of the individual benefactors to the pope at the end of a ceremony in the chapel.

U.S. Dominican Father Allen Duston, who raises funds for the Vatican Museums' restoration projects, said the patrons' generosity had allowed the museums to offer a unique, visual "witness of spiritual values."

The pope, who gave approval for the multiphase restoration of the Sistine Chapel shortly after his election in 1978, said he was pleased with the final results.

"We have reason to be happy if such an important expression of 15th-century art is shining again in its original colors, which were regained through a diligent and modern restoration effort," he said.

He said the frescoes continue to communicate important truths about the mystery of God, in a "language that does not grow old."

In 1980, when the Vatican's restoration team began daubing away centuries of grit and grime from Michelangelo's ceiling frescoes with a new solvent, some art historians criticized the technique and said it risked ruining the art works.

But with the passage of time, most of the criticism has evaporated, said Gianluigi Colalucci, who headed the restoration team.

"We've seen the excellent results from the cleaning of the Michelangelo frescoes, and what people were afraid would happen, hasn't," he said. "Now we've finished the job."

Some 3 million people visit the Vatican Museums every year, and most of them make their way to the Sistine Chapel. With the number of visitors expected to double during the jubilee year 2000, museum officials said they planned to extend visiting hours in order to thin out the crowds. ▼

U.S. nun, adviser say church vital for rebuilding East Timor

WASHINGTON (CNS) — The leadership of the Catholic Church will be vital in building up newly independent East Timor, said two Americans who have worked in Timor. Maryknoll Sister Susan Gubbins, who works in a rural parish in East Timor, and Arnold Kohen, a consultant for the Office of International Justice and Peace at the U.S. Catholic Conference in Washington, said lay people and clergy will be needed to help rebuild. Sister Gubbins said the church must work with international aid agencies so that local people are involved in planning and reconstruction in the violence-torn region.

New study finds mixed pattern in religious giving

CHAMPAIGN, Ill. (CNS) — Americans gave their churches more money in 1997 than in 1996, but in many cases gave a lower proportion of their income than before, says a new study. The report, by church consultants John and Sylvia Ronsvalle, challenged what they called an increasing emphasis on attracting endowment and building funds as vehicles for increasing people's giving. That policy "has not reversed negative giving trends during a multidecade economic expansion," they said. They suggested people will respond better to appeals directed at meeting pressing current needs of mission and charitable outreach. The Ronsvalles' latest findings appeared in "The State of Church Giving Through 1997," published by Empty Tomb, their nonprofit Christian research and service organization in Champaign.

Sri Lanka, rebels agree to civilian safety zone at shrine

COLOMBO, Sri Lanka (CNS) — The Sri Lankan army and Tamil rebels reportedly have agreed to set up a new civilian safety zone encompassing the Marian shrine of Our Lady of Madhu, recently hit by a mortar shell that left 38 dead. The English-language daily The Island quoted the International Committee of the Red Cross as saying that the agreement was reached to facilitate the transport of humanitarian aid to the embattled jungle area. The early December report said more than 300,000 people living in the area now held by the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam have not received food, medicine and other essential supplies since the rebels regained control of strategic areas of the Vanni jungle region in northern Sri Lanka in November.

Vatican officials downplay report of Sino-Vatican relations

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Vatican officials have again downplayed a recurrent report from Asia that the Holy See and China are about to establish diplomatic relations. The officials said Dec. 15 that while there has been a somewhat positive tone to recent contacts with the Chinese, it was unclear where the difficult dialogue would lead. "Perhaps in a month we can say more," said one source. Vatican spokesman Joaquin Navarro-Valls said Dec. 15 that there had been no new developments regarding China over the previous two months, except for recent papal messages to Catholics in China and in Macau, which returns to Chinese rule Dec. 20.

Canadian churches to ring in new year with 'sweep of sound'

OTTAWA (CNS) — From coast to coast, Canada's churches will be ringing in the year 2000 at noon local time Jan. 1 to honor Jesus Christ and mark the symbolic beginning of the third millennium of Christianity. The bell ringing is to start on the far eastern edge of Newfoundland and work its way westward through the various time zones to the western shores of British Columbia. The "sweep of sound," which will also include the playing of church organs, singing and native drumming, was initiated by Together 2000: Christians in Canada Honoring Jesus, a project cosponsored by the Canadian Council of Churches and the Evangelical Fellowship of Canada.

Archbishop says despite numbers, Vatican not a saint factory

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Vatican has not become a "saint factory," the chief guardian of the process said, even if Pope John Paul II has turned out sainthood decrees at a historically unprecedented rate. Archbishop Jose Saraiva Martins, prefect of the Congregation for Sainthood Causes, said factories, "each with their own specialty, produce a series of things which are always the same." With saint-making at the Vatican, the "production method is totally different" and the outcome is not things but people who are examples of holiness, he said. Archbishop Saraiva Martins presided over a Dec. 17 Vatican press conference to mark the publication of an updated "Index of the Status of Causes."

CHA names new vice president for sponsorship, mission services

ST. LOUIS (CNS) — Mercy Sister Beverly McGuire has been named to the new position of vice president for sponsorship and mission services at the Catholic Health Association of the United States. Sister McGuire, who joined the CHA staff in September as special adviser on sponsorship, will be responsible for the mission, ethical integrity, leadership development and sponsorship directions of the St. Louis-based association. The new position was created following the recent departure of Sister of St. Joseph Jean deBlois as vice president for mission services.

Six Indian nuns killed after collapse of building

CHENNAI, India (CNS) — Six Catholic nuns were buried in a southern Indian village after they were crushed to death when a century-old building collapsed. The six Cluny sisters were killed when St. Joseph Convent collapsed after torrential rains early Dec. 13. The convent was in Cheyyur Parish, about 50 miles southwest of Madras, the Tamil Nadu state capital, reported UCA News, an Asian church news agency based in Thailand. Lay and political leaders and hundreds of children — including Hindus and Muslims — attended the funeral services in Cheyyur Parish, where the nuns managed a school. The victims include the principals of the primary and high school sections of the Little Flower School in the parish.

You can express your commitment to your Church by making a bequest to the Diocese of Charlotte or to your parish. Simply have the following statement included in your will:
"I leave to the Roman Catholic Diocese of Charlotte (or ____ parish, city) the sum of $____ (or ____ percent of the residue of my estate) for its religious, educational and charitable works."

Remember God's Will In Yours.

"A valid Will stands as a continuing expression of our concern for loved ones, as well as an ongoing commitment to the Church and the community in which we live."

Catholic Social Services' Charlotte office hosts North Pole-like holiday venture

Editor's note: Last week, The Catholic News & Herald highlighted Christmas outreach programs sponsored by the Asheville and Piedmont-Triad regional offices of Catholic Social Services of the Diocese of Charlotte. This week, we bring you a story from the Charlotte regional office, where work to make the season bright continued into the week before Christmas.

By JIMMY ROSTAR
Associate Editor

CHARLOTTE — It is just days before Christmas, and phones jingle nonstop. Lists are checked, then checked twice. All is not quite calm, but faces are bright with holiday cheer. The Christmas spirit has come to town — and more specifically, to the Charlotte Regional Office of Catholic Social Services.

The diocesan office is especially busy this time of year, what with coordinating a massive outreach to a client list that includes hundreds of individuals and families. The lobby and CSS offices in the diocesan pastoral center are filled with food and gift items, which are given by the basketloads to people in need. Gifts in the form of clothes, household items and toys are being wrapped and delivered in hopes of making the season bright for area residents whose needs are especially felt during Christmas.

Each year, Catholic Social Services' Charlotte Regional Office presents its Christmas outreach project, an effort that unites the dedication of the CSS staff with the spirit of volunteerism from people of good will in the metro area.

"We've been very blessed," says Jeannie Beall, Catholic Social Services' supervisor of adoption/pregnancy services and brief services, who also oversees the Charlotte Christmas outreach program. "People come to us wanting to help, and if it was not for the church community at large, we could not even begin to touch base with all of the families that are being served."

Charlotte Catholic High School students assist with this year's Christmas outreach program.

The Christmas outreach project is coordinated each year by CSS staff members who compile lists of clients and sponsor families. Those who receive gifts are most likely already known to CSS' vast network of outreach programs and other ministries, including Programa Esperanza, Refugee Resettlement, counseling, crisis assistance, Elder Ministry and others.

Other referrals may come from community outreach agencies.

Parishes and other diocesan entities, diocesan ministries and offices, neighborhood groups, corporate sponsors, and private donors are among the program's many sponsors. Beall adds that those who give both gifts and time are key in the program's success.

Out of respect for clients' privacy, the CSS staff is the conduit between those who give the gifts and those who receive them.

"What's really unique about all of the giving is that people are willing to give so much to someone they do not know," Beall says. "They just trust that the agency is going to make sure that the people who are in need get the gifts. That is the true act of love and charity. That's what's so wonderful."

The scenes and memories of donors' generosity are numerous, Beall says: of high school students unloading gifts by the busload for needy children; of parishes giving hundreds of food and gift baskets for Charlotte families; of donors designating financial gifts for specific needs, like medicine for an elderly person or rent for a family running a bit short on money.

"What's happened over the years is that we have more and more people coming to us wanting to be sponsors," says Beall. "Sponsors over the years have continued to come back because it's something that they feel very good about. We've had families that have wanted to sponsor another family, to instill in their own homes the spirit of giving and that there are others who are in need."

Special attention is paid so that people of all ages are reached, says Beall. "Most everyone feels good that a child is going to wake up to a Christmas morning," she adds, "but there are those other individuals who, because of displacement or poverty or mental illness, are all alone and in need. Something can be done for them as well."

She says the program is part of CSS' yearlong mission of outreach, and that CSS staff members work with clients and donors all year through to see that human needs are being met. "The Christmas outreach is exceptional, but throughout the rest of the year we're doing this as well," she says. "We see needs on a daily basis — food needs, material needs, human service needs, getting rent and utilities paid." ▼

New Office of Economic Opportunity gets first director

By ALESHA M. PRICE
Staff Writer

MURPHY — As director of the Office of Economic Opportunity, Melissa Block has the interesting job of working in a quiet, yet challenging environment in the Bishop Begley Center for Economic Development in Murphy. Although Block is the only person who reports to work in the morning, she has already been busy with proposals and plans for the development of the office.

"I have never been a one-person office before, but there is so much to do and follow up on that I am always in contact with people," said Block. "I am not totally isolated because St. William Church is right next door."

The Bishop Begley Center, owned by St. William Church, was converted from a house into an office building by the parishioners. Also in the Begley Center are two other non-profit groups dedicated to economic development, The Mountain Micro-Enterprise Fund and the Self-Help Credit Union, which are satellite offices out of Asheville.

Currently, the Office of Economic Opportunity is developing programs that will assist people in this high-unemployment area in getting and keeping jobs — and also assisting with childcare, small business development, affordable housing and transportation.

Block, a New Jersey import, majored in anthropology at Montclair State University, where she received her bachelor's and master's degrees. She said that many people ask her how she became involved in social science with her chosen major.

"Anthropology is a valuable asset, no matter the career, because it allows you to understand where people are coming from, and I can see different points of view," explained Block.

She worked as an assistant to the program director for a social science research foundation in Manhattan and with program development for a cultural arts agency in New Jersey before she and her husband, Daniel, decided to move to South Carolina. She began working for the Affordable Housing Group, a Charlotte-based, statewide non-profit housing intermediary that receives federal and private funding to develop affordable housing and provide technical support to small non-profit agencies.

When she heard about the position as director for the new diocesan office, she decided to take a step in a different, but familiar direction.

"I had been working as a project coordinator for housing development, and I had learned so much about developing affordable housing and had gained some great experience," said Block. "But, I wanted to broaden my knowledge base and experience. I wanted to be at the grassroots level and working within the community. I thought that this would be a great opportunity."

She and her family — her son Gabriel, 1, and a baby on the way - moved to Murphy after she was offered the position. She enjoys life in a small town and likes working within her community.

"This community has great people, and I have been impressed with everyone's willingness to help," said Block, who has received support from five or six different agencies for a funding proposal I have submitted to the state.

The aim of the proposal, entitled "Roads to Self-Sufficiency," is to provide transportation and build self-sufficiency for people trying to move off of assistance programs. Refurbished cars and job assistance are the two areas of concentration for the program, said Block.

Father George Kloster, pastor of St. William Church in Murphy and the interim chairperson of the Office of Economic Opportunity advisory board, said, "She [Block] is very bright and creative and has a good sense of initiative, which is what is needed for a program like this. She is making networking contacts and trying to see some of the vision recognized."

"I think my place here is to identify what is realistic and possible. We have to make sure what we do is in line with Catholic economic teachings. We are formulating what our program will be, working toward setting specific goals, and trying to stimulate economic development with existing agencies through the help of various non-profit organizations, other faith communities and community outreach."

— Melissa Block, new diocesan director of the Office of Economic Opportunity, a program of the Office of Justice and Peace of Catholic Social Services

"I think my place here is to identify what is realistic and possible," said Block. "We have to make sure what we do is in line with Catholic economic justice teachings. We are formulating what our program will be, working toward setting specific goals, and trying to stimulate economic development with existing agencies through the help of various non-profit organizations, other faith communities and community outreach."

"We feel extremely fortunate to have a person with Melissa's intelligence, skills and commitment as our first director of the Office of Economic Opportunity," said Joanne K. Frazer, director of the Office of Justice and Peace.

"The Office of Economic Opportunity was begun largely through the efforts of Father Mauricio West, vicar general and chancellor of the Diocese of Charlotte," said Frazer. "Two years ago, the two bishops of North Carolina wrote a pastoral, "Of One Heart and One Mind," stressing Catholic teaching on economic justice, especially as it applies to work and wages. With the high poverty levels in the western part of our diocese, Father Mo determined that there should be a Catholic presence there."

Subsequently, this new endeavor, which began in October, became a program of the Office of Justice and Peace of Catholic Social Services in Charlotte, said Frazer.

"Our goal is to work in partnership with other denominations and organizations to change societal conditions and public policy to be more responsive to economic and community issues as they affect people who are poor," said Frazer.

Between 12 and 18 percent of Clay, Cherokee, Graham and Swain Counties live in poverty, and the office will try to help persons with job skills and placement, childcare, transportation and other areas.

"What I would like to see is for the quality of life to improve for people in the four counties by getting better jobs," said Father Kloster. "This is a vehicle for providing more opportunity and support for people who are disadvantaged by helping them to rebuild their own lives." ▼

'The Lord has been very good,' says diocese's founding bishop

By JIMMY ROSTAR
Associate Editor

HIGH POINT — Tremendous growth, the people's zeal for the faith and a dedication to Christian service are just a few indications of how God has blessed the Diocese of Charlotte and the church in North Carolina during the 20th century, says retired Bishop Michael J. Begley, bishop emeritus of the Charlotte Diocese.

The bishop, who now lives at Maryfield Nursing Home in High Point, is a self-proclaimed "gentleman of leisure" since his retirement from active ministry as first bishop of the Charlotte Diocese. His tenure as bishop from 1972-84 — and the period leading up to the present — coincided with the Catholic Church in the Tar Heel State blossoming by leaps and bounds.

And as the church looks ahead to the Holy Year and the Great Jubilee, Bishop Begley took some time to share memories of his early years as a priest — an era that nurtured his own faith and fostered the skills he would use as shepherd of a newly formed diocese.

File Photo

The early years

"There has been such tremendous growth," says Bishop Begley. "When I came here from Massachusetts in 1934, there were about 9,000 Catholics in the state of North Carolina. We've grown so much from that point. It's fascinating to me what it is that North Carolina offers."

For a newly ordained Father Begley back in '34, North Carolina offered an opportunity to serve in a missionary diocese. At the time, the Diocese of Raleigh spanned the entire state, as it would not be partitioned until the early '70s.

It was during a 1927 visit to the Northeast by Bishop William Hafey of Raleigh when young Michael, a native of Mattineague, Mass., was moved by the idea to serve as a missionary priest. He was ordained to the priesthood in May 1934, and he began his first assignment in North Carolina that June.

"We were a missionary diocese, struggling to get along," says Bishop Begley. "We welcomed assistance from everywhere; we had people helping from all over, people who did some good work for us."

Service quickly became the emphasis of his priestly ministry, and not only in pastorates throughout the eastern part of the state. He soon became known for his commitment to social justice issues, and during parts of the 1940s and '50s served as superintendent of the Catholic orphanage in Raleigh.

He earned a master's degree in social work from the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill in 1949, a time when Catholicism was still something of an enigma in North Carolina.

"I enjoyed that greatly," Bishop Begley says of the orphanage days. "I got to know many people, and we went along there very well for a number of years."

He fondly recalls his outreach to the children of the orphanage, whom he served as priest, counselor and friend. One woman who lived there as a child met up with Bishop Begley years later, and she reminded him of the impact he made.

"She said to me, 'You know, Bishop, I must say you certainly had an interest in us when we were kids at the orphanage,'" he recalls. "She said, 'We used to skip away once in a while, and you went out looking for us yourself. I've got to tell you straight: Most of us looked at you as a second father.'"

The story still brings him a smile. "I felt that if the kids had that much confidence in what we were doing, then we were getting something done," he says. "We were bringing people closer to the Lord."

He also served as director of what was then called Catholic Charities for the Diocese of Raleigh, which furthered his devotion to social justice and social work issues. His numerous positions in parishes throughout North Carolina also refined his role as a pastor. He helped establish new parishes and learned how they could survive in a missionary territory — work that would serve him greatly in years to come.

A new diocese is formed

On Jan. 12, 1972, then-Msgr. Begley was installed as the first bishop of the new Diocese of Charlotte. Just months before, he was serving as pastor of Our Lady of Grace Church in Greensboro. It was a time of great transition, Bishop Begley says, and a time that called for great faith.

"In 1971, the bishop (Bishop Vincent S. Waters) of Raleigh called me and said, 'Rome has decided that we must have another diocese,'" Bishop Begley recalls. "Charlotte will be the new diocese, and you've been selected as the new bishop. Do you accept?'"

Bishop Begley pauses to chuckle at the thought. "I said, 'Wait a minute. I'd like to think about that,'"

Dedicated church member gives of heart and home

By ALESHA M. PRICE
Staff Writer

GASTONIA — Jac Bereen has left his mark in the world, and many citizens may still have some of his handiwork in their closets or attics. As a clothing manufacturer, many people have worn the clothes made in his Clover, S.C., factory, Klearknit, established in 1952.

Not only did he contribute to the clothing styles of the time, but also later in his life, he wanted to give a gift to the church to which he was so dedicated. He decided to leave his home to St. Michael Church in Gastonia after his death.

Beeren passed away in October of this year, at the age of 94, but through a life estate gift, under the umbrella of estate planning and planned giving, his presence will be felt for years to come.

Frank Beeren recounted his father's life and talked about a man whom he described as "family-oriented, creative and hard-working."

Making clothes was a family endeavor begun when he was a young man in Helmond, Holland. Jac Beeren was born around the turn of the century into a large family. His father taught himself how to use a machine that made socks and taught two of his sons the procedure.

From that small act grew the largest knitting operation and textile manufacturing factory in Europe before World War II. He and his brother created Bereen Knitwear, employed over 2,500 workers and had operations in Holland, Belgium and South Africa. Little did they know that their success would come to a sudden halt.

During World War II, the Dutch underground blew up a Nazi troop train in the area, and they responded with executing ten of the most influential citizens in town and those suspected of being part of the rebellion. Beeren escaped that fate but was sent to Buchenwald, a concentration camp in Weimar, Germany, for four-and-a-half years.

After the war, the brothers returned to their company, now ruined by the Nazis, and had to begin anew. By that time, Beeren already had ideas of traveling to another country with his family to start all over.

He sold his interest in the family business and immigrated to the United States in 1950 to the small town of Elton, La., with the help of his sponsor, Father Fransen, a Dutch priest and friend who had also come to America. He decided to start another textile business but went bankrupt.

At the suggestion of a friend, Cary Boshamer, he moved to South Carolina and started up Bereen Knitwear with Boshamer in 1952, which later became Klearknit, a cutting and sewing operation. In 1960, Beeren moved again to Gastonia and built the home that he later left to St. Michael Church.

The lifelong Catholic became a member of the Gastonia parish, and Father George Kloster, while pastor of the church, came to know Beeren as a "friendly and intelligent man."

"He brought his European background as a very successful industrialist with him," said Father Kloster. "He was known as a kind and thoughtful person by the people in the parish he visited during their times of illness, even well up into his nineties."

Jim Kelley, diocesan director of development, Cindy Rice, diocesan director of planned giving and Don Hodgens, a local attorney, held a planned giving seminar at St. Michael Church, and after hearing the details of providing for the church after death, Beeren decided to leave his home to the church. Father Kloster put him in contact with Jim Kelley, who suggested that a life estate gift would be more beneficial to him.

Jac Bereen

With a life estate gift, he would deed the house to the church but would be able to live in it for as long as he pleased. From this type of donation, he received a charitable tax deduction and would be able to lower the estate tax upon his death, said Kelley.

"We want to encourage more people to give back to the diocese in gratitude for the blessings that God has given in their lives," said Kelley. "The fact that someone in his nineties wanted to do this for the Church says much about the type of person he was. Mr. Beeren left a legacy at his death that will benefit St. Michael's for years to come.

Frank Beeren said, "Donating his home was a novel idea. We broke ground when we did that because that type of donation had never really been done before that. It enabled him to stay in his home, even though, technically, it didn't belong to him."

The focus is on stewardship — time, talent and treasure. More people are deciding to give a portion of their assets to the Church after their deaths, after taking care of their loved ones. A life estate gift is only one way of giving back to the Church, so people should research the various options to find what is most beneficial to them: bequests, annuities, trusts, retirement plans, property or life insurance, said Kelley.

"His gift is incredibly personal. Most of us, in making charitable donations, give cash, which is generous and good," said Rice. "Mr. Beeren, however, gave his parish a gift of his home. I do not think you can make a more personal gift than that."

Father Kloster agreed that "donating his house to St. Michael's was a final act in a life of generosity, despite the many obstacles he had to face."

Frank Beeren recalled his father's good-natured attitude and his love for his family, friends and the Church: "He was a good man who never looked back. He didn't dwell on the past and wanted to give back some of the things that life had given him." ▼

Vatican ready to raise curtain on Great Jubilee of the Year 2000

By JOHN THAVIS
Catholic News Service

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — After years of spiritual and logistical preparation, the Vatican is about to raise the curtain on the Great Jubilee of the Year 2000 and its packed, 380-day calendar of religious events.

Pope John Paul II, the main architect of the Holy Year activities, will open the bronze Holy Door at St. Peter's Basilica on Christmas Eve, signaling the start of celebrations for Jesus' 2,000th birthday.

When the clock reaches midnight on New Year's Eve, the pope plans to deliver a special blessing to the world to mark the entrance into the third millennium of Christianity.

But as the millennium parties around the globe are dying down, the Holy Year will just be getting started.

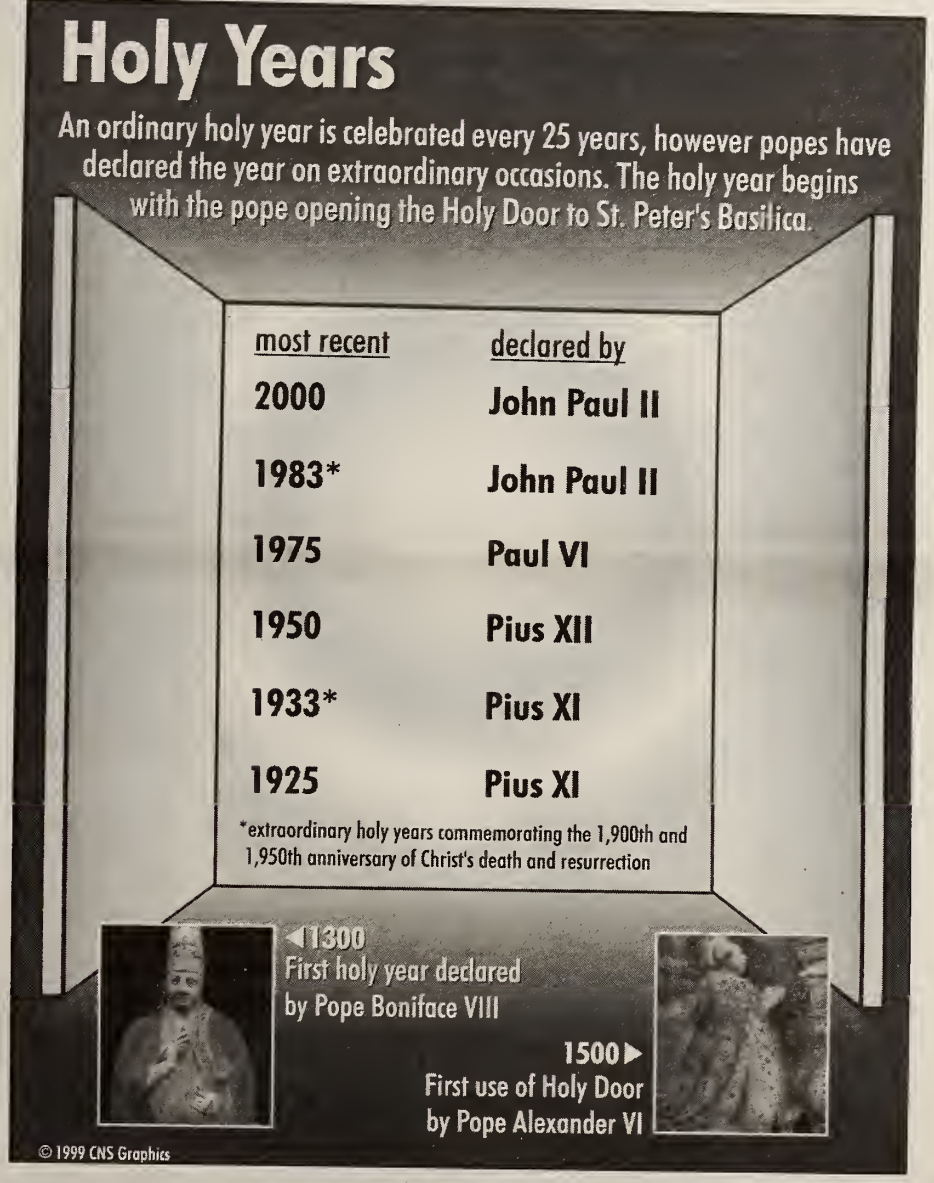
The Vatican will host more than 100 separate gatherings of professional and pastoral groups throughout the year 2000, turning the jubilee spotlight on groups like politicians, migrants, journalists, artists, farmers, children, elderly and others. The pope will formally close the jubilee Jan. 6, 2001, the feast of the Epiphany.

The Holy Year is expected to bring more than 25 million visitors to Rome, crowding the city's streets and sidewalks and contributing to a local economic boom. Most of the public works designed to make life easier for pilgrims have been completed, with one notable exception: A ramp leading to a five-story Vatican parking lot for tour buses has been held up indefinitely by archeological discoveries.

While the media has focused on new construction and crowd projections, the Vatican has been quietly leading a spiritual warm-up program for the jubilee, emphasizing penitence, charity and a return to the sacraments. As the pope said when he outlined Holy Year plans five years ago, one of the jubilee's main goals is to strengthen people's faith in a time of spiritual uncertainty.

The pope has encouraged individual acts of charity as well as global steps toward economic justice, including foreign debt relief. Likewise, he has touted the jubilee year as the perfect moment for individual examinations of conscience and a church-wide reflection on Christians' shortcomings through the centuries.

Picking up on a trend, the Vatican has promoted renewed interest in pilgrimages for the jubilee year. It has also expanded the practice of special Holy Year indulgences, saying that remission of temporal punishment for sins can be gained by going to confession and Communion, and then performing such simple acts as visiting the sick or abstaining a day from smoking.



In Rome, the traditional pilgrimages to the major basilicas of St. Peter's, St. John Lateran, St. Mary Major and St. Paul's Outside the Walls will be made by millions, including the pope, who plans to personally open the holy doors in each of the churches.

The ceremonial highlights of the Holy Year illustrate the main jubilee themes:

— On Jan. 18, the pope inaugurates the Week of Prayer for Christian Unity in an ecumenical service at St. Paul's Outside the Walls, where he is expected to amplify his appeal for a new push toward unity during the Holy Year.

Ecumenical and interfaith cooperation are the focus of later events, too. On Aug. 5 the pope leads a prayer vigil with Orthodox representatives, and Oct. 3 is a special day for Christian-Jewish dialogue.

— A study conference on the Second Vatican Council Feb. 25-27 will draw dozens of experts to discuss church renewal over the last 35 years. The pope has said the best way to mark the new millennium is to apply the teachings of Vatican II, individually and church-wide.

— On March 12, the first Sunday of Lent, the pope presides over a "Day of Forgiveness," when Christians are called upon to confess personal and historical faults. Because of its implications for the institutional church, this event has been the most controversial on the jubilee calendar.

Vatican officials have said the pope will issue a "mea culpa" statement with particular reference to Christian treatment of Jews and to the Crusades, which were the topics of two pre-jubilee study conferences at the Vatican.

— On May 7, the pope leads another ecumenical celebration at Rome's Colosseum commemorating the "witnesses to the faith" in the 20th century, particularly those Christians martyred in wars or under political repression.

— The June 18-25 International Eucharistic Congress in Rome will give the pope a chance to develop his message on the importance of the Eucharist and to urge nonpracticing Catholics to return to the sacraments.

Like other Holy Year events, it will also feature a special Vatican charity initiative: a collection to fund a health clinic near Rome's train station for immigrants, Gypsies and the poor.

— On July 9, in one of the more unusual Holy Year celebrations, the pope is expected to visit a Rome prison and celebrate Mass to mark the "Jubilee for Inmates."

— World Youth Day celebrations Aug. 15-20 could bring a million young people to a Rome park area for a papal Mass, a prayer vigil and other activities.

— Several canonizations and beatifications are foreseen during the jubilee year, including a possible Sept. 3 beatification of two popes: John XXIII and Pius IX.

— The "Jubilee for Families" Oct. 14-15 will bring representative families from all over the world to the Vatican. To underline his concern for the state of marriage in the world, the pope will preside over the sacrament of matrimony for several young couples.

While the jubilee activities will keep the pope at home most of the year, he has tentatively planned two trips: to the Holy Land in late March, where if current plans hold he would visit Jerusalem, Nazareth and Bethlehem, and to Portugal in mid-May, where he will beatify two of the shepherd children who had Marian visions at Fatima.

The rest of the year, he will be busy presiding over some 70 liturgical ceremonies in Rome and, as far as time and health permit, greeting a near-constant flow of pilgrims. Many will be coming to see the aging "pope of the millennium" and obtain his blessing. ▼

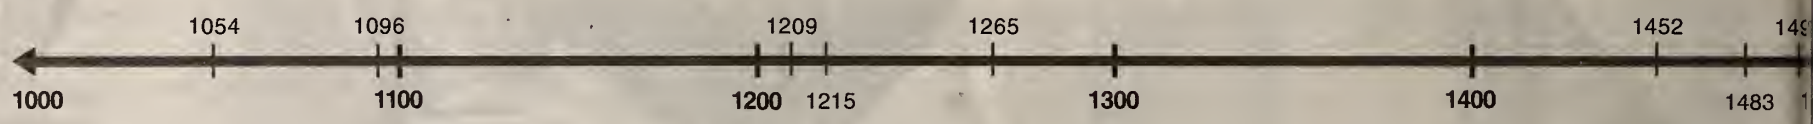
The last 1,000 years

1054 Great Schism. Mutual excommunications harden centuries of growing rift between East and West, dividing mainline Christianity into the Orthodox churches of the East and the Latin Church of the West.

1209-15 Mendicant orders. Itinerant preachers St. Francis of Assisi and St. Dominic found the Franciscan and Dominican orders, which have deep impact on spiritual and intellectual life of the church and continue to thrive today.

1452-55 Gutenberg Bible. First book printed with movable type marks beginning of mass media, a cultural revolution profoundly affecting religion, education, commerce, politics and culture.



1096 Crusades begin. Campaign by Pope Urban II to retake Holy Land from Islam starts almost two centuries of intermittent religious wars there, ending in 1291 with Muslim recapture of Acre. With the Crusades came the birth of military and hospitaller religious orders, rising importance of pilgrimages in religious life and increased East-West trade.

1215 Fourth Lateran Council. Key medieval council formulates doctrine of transubstantiation and makes church reforms, including obligation of annual confession and Communion at Easter time.

1265-73 "Summa Theologiae." The most notable work of St. Thomas Aquinas, who articulated a theological synthesis that would influence Western Christian thought for centuries.

1483-98 Spanish Inquisition. At height of its campaign against heretics under Torquemada, some 2,000 are executed, giving historical basis for later claims of Catholic cruelty and intolerance.

1492 Colonization of America. Columbus' voyage introduces Christianity in New World, starts global missionary expansion to Americas, Africa, Asia, Oceania; it also starts more than four centuries of European political and cultural colonialism.

Scholars say Gregory the Great, John XXIII top popes in history

By JAMES BREIG
Catholic News Service

ALBANY, N.Y. (CNS) — A panel of scholars has ranked Gregory the Great and John XXIII as the two most outstanding popes in the first 2,000 years of the Catholic Church.

The Evangelist, Albany diocesan newspaper, asked experts in church history and scholars from other disciplines to answer this question: "What pope of the past two millennia made the greatest contribution to the church?"

It is the second of 12 questions that the panel will answer during 1999 as part of The Evangelist's preparation for the coming third millennium. The panel is made up of scholars from Catholic colleges throughout the United States.

"In my judgment," said Father William McConville, professor of religious studies at Siena College in Loudonville, "the greatest pope was Gregory I (also known as the Great). He exemplified the essence of the Petrine ministry: 1) care for the people of Rome, 2) defense of the freedom of the church, 3) evangelizing zeal, 4) a sense of his collegial relationship with his brother bishops, and 5) holiness of life."

Gregory the Great, who reigned from 590-604, was also the choice of Joseph F. Kelly, professor of religious studies at John Carroll University in Cleveland, who called him "the first pope to recognize that the Roman world had passed and the newly arrived barbarians represented the future of the church. He kept up good relations with the Byzantine empire and less good relations with the Byzantine church, but he really turned the papacy's eyes to the West."

Lawrence S. Cunningham of the theology department at the University of Notre Dame, noted that Gregory "was the only pope to be named a doctor of the church."

He was "a brilliant writer whose 'Moralia in Job' was highly influential and still read in the Liturgy of the Hours," Cunningham added. "He had a great sense of pastoral care (writing a book on the subject). He also was an aggressive missionary, sending missions to England."

Pope John XXIII could be beatified as early as next year, said the promoter of his cause for sainthood in late April.

While four scholars opted for Gregory, five selected a 20th-century pontiff as the pope who made the greatest contribution to the church during its first 20 centuries: John XXIII, who reigned from 1958-63 and who convened the Second Vatican Council.

"In his short pontificate," said John Dwyer, who teaches at St. Bernard's Institute in Albany, "John XXIII gave the modern world an entirely new definition of the word 'pope' — a definition which was not authoritarian but pastoral.

"He emphasized that he himself was a bishop, and he did all that he could to associate his brother bishops with himself in the governance of the worldwide church," Dwyer said. "He decentralized church administration and insisted that bishops be treated as successors of the apostles and not merely as local agents of the curial bureaucracy."

William R. Barnett, associate professor of religious studies at Le Moyne College in Syracuse, said that "more than any other pope, John XXIII had the vision and courage to open the Roman Catholic Church to the modern world: in theology, in the governance of the church, and in improved relations with other Christian and non-Christian religious groups."

Doris Donnelly, professor of theology at John Carroll University, chose John XXIII for two reasons:

"The first has to do with his age. As a senior citizen, a man who was expected to be a transitional pope, John XXIII showed that age matters very little when one has energy of the spirit of God propelling him. Convening the Second Vatican Council was perceived by many members of the Curia as an act of someone in his failing years and as something that would not matter very much. But history says otherwise.

"The second reason I very much appreciate Pope John XXIII is his sense of humor, which buoyed him and those around him," Donnelly added. "My favorite story from his long repertoire of amusing anecdotes is one he told about three sure-fire ways to lose money — gambling, carousing and farming. Regrettably, he says, his father chose the most boring of the three."

Pope John XXIII's "convoking the Second Vatican Council is the religious event of the century," said Father Charles D. Skok, professor emeritus of religious studies at Gonzaga University in Spokane, Wash. "The council was the first time since the apostles that all the bishops of the world could gather together to make it truly ecumenical."

Jesuit Father Robert Scully, assistant professor of history at Le Moyne College in Syracuse, described Pope John XXIII as "the man who was supposed to be a 'caretaker,' but ended up influencing modern Catholicism probably more than any other individual. As a truly open-minded and loving person, he gave both the papacy and the church a new image and a new opening to the world."

While Gregory the Great and John XXIII dominated the nominations for the pope who has made the greatest contribution to the church during its 2,000-year history, they were not the only ones nominated.

Other scholars named as the top pope in history St. Peter; Gregory VII (1073-1085); Innocent III (1198-1216); Leo XIII (1878-1903); and John Paul II (1978-). ▼

500s Renaissance art. Prodigious istic and architectural output of figes like Michelangelo, Raphael, onardo da Vinci and many others der church patronage exemplifies the urch's embrace of art and architecre as means of religious expression.

1517-21 Protestant Reformation. Martin Luther posts his 95 Theses in 1517, challenging errors in the preaching of indulgences, is excommunicated four years later. His reform agenda, later systematically institutionalized by Calvin, marks the start of the second major division in Christianity.

1534 Act of Supremacy. Henry VIII establishes Church of England, invoking fullness of power over it by divine right.

1539-40 St. Ignatius of Loyola. Rule is approved for his Society of Jesus, an order with wide influence in church life, especially in education.

1545-63 Council of Trent. The Catholic response to the Reformation brings church reform legislation and spells out Catholic teaching on doctrines under challenge from the Reformation. Postconciliar reforms included establishment of seminaries, liturgy reform and a universal catechism.

1596 Union of Brest. Agreement uniting Ruthenian Orthodox and Roman Catholic churches of Poland becomes chief Roman model of restoration of church unity with the Orthodox for nearly 400 years.

1633 Galileo condemned. Vatican declaration that the heliocentric teaching of Copernican astronomy contradicts Scripture sets a framework of tension and antagonism between church and modern science lasting into 20th century.

1789-1801 French Revolution, Concordat of 1801. Monarchy is overthrown, church disestablished and secular government formed in formerly Catholic state; concordat guaranteeing freedom of worship and letting church name bishops ends wars between anti-Christian and Catholic forces, but papacy continues to condemn principles of the revolution for more than a century.

1848-70 Loss of Papal States. Nationalist movements in Italy diminish Papal States, culminating in 1870 with capture of Rome as Italian capital and restriction of papacy to the tiny enclave in Rome known as the Vatican.

1850s-1960s Marian dogmas and devotion. Papal definitions of Mary's Immaculate Conception (1854) and Assumption (1950) and new Marian apparitions (Lourdes 1858, Knock 1879, Fatima 1917) fuel intense Catholic devotion to Mary. Marian devotions spread, new religious orders are named for her, lay sodalities and Legion of Mary are popular, Marian congresses are held. Other Christians consider new dogmas and Catholic Marian piety ecumenical obstacles.

1869-70 First Vatican Council. The first ecumenical council since Trent, it affirms and formally defines the full, ordinary, immediate jurisdiction of the pope over the whole church and the infallibility of the pope when he solemnly defines Catholic teaching on faith or morals.

1878-1903 Pope Leo XIII. He launches Catholic intellectual revival in 1879 by ordering teaching of the theology of St. Thomas Aquinas in all seminaries; his 1891 encyclical, "Rerum Novarum" (on the condition of labor), marks start of modern Catholic social teaching.

1939-45 Holocaust. Hitler's World War II extermination of 6 million Jews provokes profound rethinking, in postwar decades, of Catholic and Christian attitudes towards Jews and Judaism.

1945-90 Rise and fall of communism. Religious persecution that started with Russian Revolution in 1917 reaches its zenith following World War II as communist hegemony spreads across Eastern Europe and into China, North Korea and North Vietnam, creating a new age of martyrs. Communism's collapse in Eastern Europe and former Soviet Union restores religious freedom to millions of believers.

1960-?? Catholic ecumenism. Catholic Church's entry into 20th-century ecumenical movement transforms Catholicism and the whole Christian unity movement. Collaboration, shared prayer, dialogue and joint declarations of common faith replace separatism, apologetics and emphasis on what divides.

1962-65 Second Vatican Council. Reform council seeks to re-engage church in contemporary world and to renew liturgy, Scripture study and virtually every other aspect of Catholic life, including better appreciation of other Christians and other religions; reformulates traditional teachings on religious freedom and the state's role in religious matters.

1978-?? Pope John Paul II. First non-Italian pope since 1523 sets implementation of Vatican II and new evangelization for third millennium as agenda of his pontificate, oversees new codes of church law, new universal catechism, Catholic-Lutheran declaration of agreement on justification. He travels over 700,000 miles, more than all previous popes combined.

Fourth, first centuries deemed pivotal to Christian history

By JAMES BREIG
Catholic News Service

ALBANY, N.Y. (CNS) — Over the course of 2,000 years of Christian history, does one period of time stand out as more pivotal than the rest?

That's the third question The Evangelist, Albany diocesan newspaper, posed to a nationwide panel of church historians and scholars as part of its ongoing series leading to the next millennium.

The newspaper has already asked the experts to name the top non-Catholic Christian of the past 2,000 years (Martin Luther) and the greatest pope in history (John XXIII).

This time, the participants were asked "Other than the life of Jesus, what time span has proven to be the most pivotal in the history of Catholicism?" Five scholars chose the fourth century, and three named the first.

Another two historians selected the 16th century — the time of the Council of Trent — as the most pivotal era in church history. Other scholars named the sixth, 11th, 13th or 19th centuries.

John Dwyer, who teaches at St. Bernard's Institute in Albany, said he chose the fourth century because at the Council of Nicaea in 325, "the church fashioned a formula of faith which has been indispensable for Christian life up to the present day."

"Other events of the period were no less important, but far less fortunate," he added. "In 395, the Emperor Theodosius decreed that Christianity was to be the official religion of the Empire. At that moment, the church entered into an alliance with secular power, which was fateful for the future and which would, in time, link the church in Asia and Africa with European colonial powers almost up to the dawn of the third millennium."

Father Charles D. Skok, professor emeritus of religious studies at Gonzaga University in Spokane, Wash., narrowed the era down to "the time of Pope Damasus and the Emperor Theodosius, roughly the year 380. It was at the time of Pope Damasus that the language of the liturgy was changed from Greek to Latin in the West. St. Jerome also translated the Bible into Latin to produce the Vulgate, the standard version used for centuries as the official Bible of the Catholic Church."

The same era was chosen by Lawrence S. Cunningham from the theology department at the University of Notre Dame. "In the space of less than 100 years," he said, "Christianity went from being a countercultural, persecuted church to one which first had official toleration (Constantine) and then became the official Church of the empire (Theodosius).

Dorothy Day leads historians' list of century's top lay people

By JAMES BREIG
Catholic News Service

ALBANY, N.Y. (CNS) — An American woman who advocated for the poor, stood up for the rights of workers, and protested against abortion and the Vietnam War has been chosen the most outstanding lay Catholic in the world during the 20th century.

Dorothy Day, co-founder of the Catholic Worker movement, was chosen by a panel of church historians and theologians asked to select laity who made the church better or lived their faith in exemplary ways during the past 100 years. Her name appeared on all but one of the nine ballots.

"Her outspoken and consistent pacifism, even in the time of World War II, kept that time-honored Christian ideal and alternative before the consciences of informed Catholics and non-Catholics alike," said Jesuit Father Ben Fiore, a professor at Canisius College in Buffalo, in a response echoed by many of his colleagues.

"She also came to know abortion as a hideous reality and rejected that as a choice," Father Fiore added. "Her social consciousness inspired countless others to follow her example."

Other lay Catholics receiving more than one vote were Catholic book publishers Maisie Ward and Frank Sheed; British author Gilbert Keith Chesterton; and French writer Jacques Maritain and his wife, Raissa.

The Maritains "were great voices in the world of philosophy, art, culture and religion," said Father Charles D. Skok, professor emeritus of religious studies at Gonzaga University in Spokane, Wash. "Their accomplishments kept the church from becoming peripheral in the 'modern' conversation."

The scholars' other choices ranged from the late Cesar Chavez, who organized farmworkers, to anonymous lay ministers, and even a rock singer popularly known as "The Boss."

The list was compiled by The Evangelist, newspaper of the Albany Diocese, as part of a yearlong series examining the first 2,000 years of church history.

Maureen A. Tilley, associate professor of religious studies at the University of Dayton in Ohio, named Day along with Patrick and Patricia Crowley, who founded the Christian Family Movement in 1949.

She also cited Dolores Huerta and Chavez, who helped found the National Farm Workers Association, now the United Farm Workers of America.

"Their struggle for legislation to protect farmworkers showed how Catholic teachings on social justice could be appropriated by the workers themselves to bring dignity and justice to their lives," Tilley said.

In addition to Day, Father Fiore cited Catherine de Hueck Doherty, "whose Madonna House in Combermere, Ontario, remains an effective center for the training of lay apostles who carry her vision forward," and Tony Walsh, whose Benedict Labre House in Montreal "was an early prototype of the type of outreach center that has flourished across North America."

Father Skok praised Day for "her absolute and total dedication to the poor and downtrodden; her complete loyalty to the church, in spite of churchmen who viewed her with suspicion and disdain; her unconditional pacifism; and her undivided heart at home both in contemplative prayer and in energetic activism."

He also nominated Baron Friedrich von Hugel, "a voice of sanity in the Modernist controversy," and Ward and Sheed, calling them "Catholic missionary voices through preaching, writing and publishing."

Franciscan Father William McConville, professor of religious studies at Siena College in Loudonville, named Day as "an unsettling yet comforting presence within the communion of saints" and Jacques Maritain for his "critical retrieval of the scholastic tradition in dialogue with the modern world."

William R. Barnett, associate professor of religious studies at Le Moyne College in Syracuse, selected Day as well as Penny Lernoux, longtime Latin American affairs correspondent for the National Catholic Reporter, and Catholic author Flannery O'Connor.

Lernoux, who died in 1989, "is significant because she brought to life the plight of the marginalized in Latin America that enabled many around the world to understand the intention of liberation theology in light of its successes and its limitations," Barnett said.

John Dwyer, who teaches at St. Bernard's Institute in Albany, chose French poet, philosopher and diplomat Paul Claudel; Day; Norwegian Nobel Prize laureate Sigrid Undset; and lay ministers.

Catholic lay ministers "are barely tolerated by the Vatican, which is ready to discard them as soon as that mythical day arrives when there are enough vocations to the celibate priesthood," Dwyer said. "But they are absolutely indispensable for passing on the faith to new generations, and every parish that shows signs of life is enriched by their dedicated service."

Jeffrey Marlett, assistant professor of religious studies at the College of St. Rose in Albany, said Chesterton, a British convert who died in 1936, "gave the English-speaking Catholic world a humorous, easily accessible, and faithful intellectual voice to counteract the opposition the church often faced then."

Marlett also selected Day and musician Bruce "The Boss" Springsteen as outstanding lay Catholics of the century.

Springsteen, "while probably not the most exemplary Catholic, has penned some of the most authentic, honest and yet still hope-filled popular songs in 20th-century popular music," he said.

"Often, his stories end in less-than-happy circumstances, but such honesty is precisely what elevates Springsteen above other musicians as well as others interested in the daily lives of 'real' Catholics," Marlett added.

Benedictine Father James Wiseman of the theology department at The Catholic University of America in Washington, named Day, Austria farmer and Nazi opponent Franz Jaegerstaetter, and the Maritains.

"Together the Maritains exemplify both the sanctity of marriage and the significant contribution that intellectual activity can make to the life of the Church," he said.

The choices of Jude P. Dougherty, dean of the School of Philosophy at Catholic University, were Chesterton; Sheed and Ward; German leader Konrad Adenauer; French-born author Hilaire Belloc; and Ralph McInerny "for his impressive scholarship, his delightful fiction and his role as an intellectual catalyst on the American scene." ▼ effects," he added. "As Karl Rahner noted, it was only after Vatican II that we see a move to become a true 'world church' as opposed to one married to the suppositions of Western culture."

William R. Barnett, associate professor of religious studies at Le Moyne College in Syracuse, said that "the fourth century was pivotal in the development of the theology of the church and of its institutional history in relation to its cultural setting."

Mary Meany, associate professor of religious studies at Siena College in Loudonville, said that "there is no doubt that the pivotal years in the history not only of Catholicism but of Christianity was the period 312-381.

"This was the period when the fundamental patterns of Christianity's relationship to the political, economic and social order was established, and it was the period when fundamental patterns of Christian culture developed," she said.

Among those declaring the first century as the most pivotal in Christian history was Father Conrad Harkins, associate professor of theology at the Franciscan University of Steubenville in Ohio.

"During this century, the followers of Jesus evolved from a Jewish sect to a worldwide religion embracing peoples of all nations," he said.

Benedictine Father James Wiseman, from the theology department at The Catholic University of America in Washington, said the choice of the period from the conversion of St. Paul until his death was "so obvious that I wonder how anyone could answer differently."

Paul's "boldness in opening the church to the Gentiles without requiring them to observe basic points of the Mosaic Law allowed the 'Jesus movement' to expand from being a Jewish sect to what it eventually became: a world church," he added.

The first century was also selected by Maureen A. Tilley, associate professor of religious studies at the University of Dayton in Ohio. From 60-160, she said, "the church, aided by the Holy Spirit, underwent a profound transformation. As the apostles died, the church lost all of the members who had known (Jesus) personally. It came to understand the implications of the fact that Jesus would not return soon."

Francesco C. Cesareo, associate professor of history and director of the Institute of Catholic Studies at John Carroll University in Cleveland, chose the period of the Council of Trent (1545-1563) as most crucial to the church.

"Certainly the theological clarifications decreed by Trent were significant and shaped Catholic teaching well into the present day," he said. "However, what makes this council so significant is that it renewed the life of the church. Realizing that reform would occur only if the clergy set the example, this council restored the pastoral responsibilities of the bishop, which had been by and large lost."

The same time span was named by Jesuit Father Robert Scully, assistant professor of history at Le Moyne College, "due to the combined influences of the Renaissance, the Reformation, and the Age of Discovery."

"The Reformation, although it caused a tragic split in Western Christianity, also brought about a renewal and intensification in spirituality and theological studies," he said. "Within Catholicism, it also spurred a range of new (e.g., the Jesuits) or reformed (e.g., the Carmelites) religious orders, as well as the influential decrees of the Council of Trent on doctrinal and moral issues." ▼

Students perform Christmas pageant with millennium theme

By ALESHA M. PRICE
Staff Writer

KERNERSVILLE — Plays and pageants abound this, and every, Christmas season. The Christ child is the focus of the Christmas story that people learn at an early age.

The students in faith formation classes from Holy Cross Church are no different. They participated in the parish's first Christmas pageant in several years, complete with the Holy Family, angels and shepherds — except, this play had a slight twist.

"Wee Three Kings," is a pageant about a modern-day brother/sister duo who travel back in time, courtesy of their parents' time machine, to the historical period of King Herod and Mary and Joseph's trip to Bethlehem. They meet two servants in Herod's court, and using virtual reality glasses, they show the servants the details of Jesus' birth.

"We got the play from Christian Carolina Supplies, which had all of the ideas, but we just expanded on whatever we needed," said Connie Cupello, the parish's youth minister. "We modified the number of cast members and a little of what was written."

Marie Kinney, the church's director of faith formation, said, "the preparation was hectic, but everything went well. We were expecting about 10, maybe 20 children, but were pleasantly overwhelmed that over 30 children wanted to participate. So, we had to expand the play to accommodate everyone."

A cast of 42 and a choir of 19, with an additional 24 stage helpers and set designers, performed their Christmas pageant for parents and families on Dec. 16.

"I liked being in the play because it is about Jesus," said five-and-a-half-year-old Michael Cuppello, who played Sheep 1. "The story of Jesus is special, and I liked being a sheep because it is a good part."

This version of Jesus' birth included the normal cast of characters: Joseph, Mary, the shepherds and their sheep and angels, and also King Herod, his servants, soldiers, and other members of the court. The children played several scenes, while the choir sang traditional religious songs during the different scenes. The lights were turned off, while the backgrounds, drawn on large poster paper, were carried on and held by stage hands.

One of the "wee" three kings, Patrick DiGiantomaso, 12, who played Balthazar, said, "It is important to know about the past and what happened before us. I learned a lot about what happened during that time, and I liked playing the part because I got to give Jesus the gold."

Students, playing the roles of Mary and Joseph, the three wise men and visitors witnessing the birth of Christ, re-create the Christmas story in the Holy Cross Church Christmas Pageant in Kernersville on Dec. 16.

"I liked being in the play because it is about Jesus," said five-and-a-half-year-old Michael Cuppello, who played Sheep 1. "The story of Jesus is special, and I liked being a sheep because it is a good part."

Cameron Kinney, 5-and-a-half, who specified that he was Sheep 2, agreed that "the play is special because it is about Jesus being born."

"I liked being in the play and I like Christmas because they are both about the birth of Jesus — and because we get presents," said Briana Madenjian, 8, who played Scribe 2.

Cupello said that the children seemed to enjoy being in the play and that "they realize what the importance of Christmas is because they are participating in the story, instead of simply being told. They seem to remember more when they are actually involved."

"This play tells about Jesus and the importance of his life," said ten-year-old Neal Goodman, who played the Old Scribe. "Christmas is a fun time of the year because everybody is happy."

Lindsay Haslebacher, 11, who played Rebecca, the overseer of Herod's palace, agreed, "I enjoyed the play because it was a chance to explain what Christmas is all about. Christmas is a time when people can get together to celebrate. It is special because you get to be with the people you love." ▼

Book Review

Merton's journals express miracle of God's presence

REVIEWED BY FRANK ALLEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

The well-known life of Thomas Merton (1915-1968), spiritual poet and monk, agent of change and recluse, continues to inspire people across the world.

Representing some of the best of Merton's prolific work, this "intimate" Merton, a concise selection of seven published journals, reveals the meditative inner core of a wide-ranging pathfinder thinker.

"The Intimate Merton: His Life from His Journals"
Edited by Patrick Hart and Jonathan Montaldo.
HarperCollins (New York, 1999)
374 pp., $28.00.

The journals cover almost 30 years (1939-1968), and this introspective man probably kept a diary his entire adult life. At times joyful, at times stressed, always concerned about integrity, Merton's lifelong search, exactly documented in these journals, was to explore territory between the physical and spiritual, between secular lucidity and divine mystery.

Merton's work includes magazines articles, essays, a novel, poetry, a play, the world-famous autobiography, "The Seven Storey Mountain" (in print since 1948), five volumes of letters, and many religious studies. The range of his literary output testifies to his eclectic interest.

When the journals start, in 1939-40, Merton was writing novels and teaching. Born in Prades, France, of a New Zealand father and American mother, inquisitive and rootless, Merton found a sense of spiritual "dryness" in modern life.

Converting to Catholicism, and after hearing Jacques Maritain lecture to the Catholic Book Club, he accepted the vocation of monk. Discovering austere "holiness and peace" of the Trappist (Cistercian) monastery of the Abbey of Our Lady of Gethsemani in Kentucky was the beginning of a commitment to "total simplicity and poverty" he honored the rest of his life.

This brainy, engaging convert to Catholicism possessed a monk's transcendent sense of agape, love of God's grace. Disliking popular culture, he relished good food and drink (particularly fresh coffee), friendships and loyalties ("people I have loved to be with and love to hear from"), current events, literature and music.

The man who sought obedience and privacy could not keep from taking innovative public positions (ecumenism, nonviolence, Tibetan mysticism) in the turbulent 1960s. While disturbed by "incompatibility" between solitude and involvement, he found in disparities of belief a red badge of faith. "This boiling is part of my life," he said.

As though a modern-day Columbus searching for the eternal Orient, not yet 53 years old, after three audiences with the Dalai Lami and visiting India and other Asian countries, Merton died at the East/West Conference in Bangkok, Thailand, on Dec. 10, 1968, accidentally electrocuted in a mix-up of electrical wires.

The editors, Brother Patrick Hart, who edited two journals, and Jonathan Montaldo, director of the Thomas Merton Center at Bellarmine College in Louisville, Ky., who also edited two journals, perhaps could have provided a glossary of important people in Merton's life, some of whom are identified only by initials.

His legacy continues to expand through Merton societies and numerous Web sites (http://go.to/merton is comprehensive) which provide current information on conferences, electronic publications, groups with an interest in religious publications, hypertext links, retreats, and ever-increasing commentary on his life.

On one level, seeing nature through Merton's eyes (his prayer-like description has the precision of an Andrew Wyeth painting), enables one to rediscover freshness of American landscape.

On a deeper level, the genre of a journal, which he mastered, perfectly suits a monk's need for rigorous self-examination. With the hardihood of an explorer, Merton blazed trails into spiritual frontiers that we still follow today.

At the center of his "deepest self," one touches the authentic hidden life of a man who struggled to express the miracle of God's presence. ▼

Allen, a longtime English professor and college administrator, is now a free-lancer.

3) Gospel: Luke 2:22, 39-40

BY BOZENA CLOUTIER
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

During the early, dark days of World War II, my parents found out that they were expecting their fifth child. At that time we were refugees — homeless, poor and on the run from the seemingly invincible Nazi offensive. The ensuing months were very difficult.

We were evacuated from one country to another, and my mother became ill. Then, as her due date drew close, our situation improved, and we found ourselves in the relative security of the Middle East, in what was then the British Protectorate of Palestine. We had a place to live and access to medical care so that mother was able to go to a hospital when labor began.

She had a boy, Christopher, and I remember how happy we all were that all had gone well. The baptism was to be in Bethlehem.

My memories are fragmentary, but I know we went first to Jerusalem and then to Bethlehem. I have a vivid recollection of my little brother lying quiet and wide-eyed on the spot where tradition says Jesus was born.

Now, decades later, I wonder what my parents were thinking as they stood there. I was too young to ask the question then, and now they are no longer here to tell me. I had the same question when I read Luke's Gospel passage about Mary and Joseph taking Jesus to Jerusalem: What was in the minds and hearts?

Again, they are not here to answer, but I think in both cases that answer might be similar: "We want the best for our baby. The very best."

Isn't that the hope all of us have in our hearts as we bring our little ones to the Lord? Whether we are parents or godparents, aunts, uncles or cousins, we want good rather than harm for these children. This Sunday we honor the Holy Family. We write the name of this feast with capital letters and rightly so, but that should not blind us to the fact that this family, like yours or mine, was also really and truly human.

Yes, even the divine child.

Question:
What helps you connect to the ordinary and everyday hopes and struggles of Mary, Joseph and the young Jesus?

Jodie Foster stars as Anna Leonowens, an Englishwoman hired to teach the 58 children of Siamese King Mongkut in "Anna and the King."

New at the Box Office

NEW YORK (CNS) — Following are recent capsule movie reviews issued by the U.S. Catholic Conference Office for Film and Broadcasting.

"Anna and the King" (20th Century Fox)

Lavish historical drama set in 1862 Siam where the absolute monarch (Chow Yun-Fat) and the widowed English schoolteacher (Jodie Foster) he hired to teach his 58 children about the West learn much from each other even as a duplicitous general plots to kill the king and all his heirs. After a sluggish start, director Andy Tennant goes beyond sumptuous visuals in exploring contrasting East-West cultures and beliefs while maintaining suspense about the assassination plot. Sporadic violence and references to polygamy and concubines. The U.S. Catholic Conference classification is A-II — adults and adolescents. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is PG-13 — parents are strongly cautioned that some material may be inappropriate for children under 13.

"Bicentennial Man" (Touchstone)

Futuristic fantasy spanning two centuries in which a family's robot (Robin Williams), found to have emotions and creativity, actively seeks to become fully human and marry the great-granddaughter (Embeth Davidtz) of the original family that encouraged his odyssey. Adapted in part from an Issac Asimov story, director Chris Columbus' bland tale gently examines what it is to be human. Mild sexual innuendo and references, and occasional profanity. The U.S. Catholic Conference classification is A-II — adults and adolescents. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is PG — parental guidance suggested.

"Angela's Ashes" (Paramount)

Faithful though emotionally bleak dramatization of Frank McCourt's Pulitzer Prize-winning account of growing up in 1930s and '40s Limerick where he lives in desperate poverty with his long-suffering mother (Emily Watson), alcoholic father (Robert Carlyle) and younger siblings until stealing his fare to America at age 19. British writer-director Alan Parker presents a realistic depiction of an impoverished youth, growing alienation from his family and Catholic upbringing, but the result lacks both the poetic flair and humorous punctuation of the book. Intense depiction of domestic crises, numerous sexual situations and references, alcoholic excess, recurring rough language and some profanity. The U.S. Catholic Conference classification is A-IV — adults, with reservations. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is R — restricted.

PBS special presents documentary time capsule of America this century

By HENRY HERX
Catholic News Service

NEW YORK (CNS) — Surveying the state of the union a century ago is the documentary time capsule, "America 1900," to be rerun Monday, Jan. 3, 8-11 p.m. EST on PBS.

Narrated by historian David McCullough, the program begins with New Year's Eve celebrations prematurely welcoming the year 1900 as the start of the 20th century, rather than waiting a year for its official beginning.

New Year's sermons and speeches took note of the nation's progress over the past century, its present prosperity and confidence in the future.

There was a sense that American was entering a new age prompted by the introduction of such inventions as the electric light, phonographs, telephones, automobiles, motion pictures and indoor plumbing.

And Americans seemed to relish their new status as a world power after the 1898 Spanish-American War and the conquest of the Philippines.

After establishing the country's mood of optimism as 1900 began, the program examines the year's events in terms of the issues and problems of the times.

Politically, it was an election year pitting incumbent President William McKinley against Democratic nominee William Jennings Bryan.

McKinley was attacked as an imperialist for using American troops to crush Filipino independence and sending an expedition to China to rescue Americans during the Boxer Rebellion.

Bryan, however, got more of a response by attacking McKinley as an ally of big business trusts and cartels.

In September, a coal miner's strike against the operators' monopoly controlled by J. Pierpoint Morgan drove the price of coal beyond the means of most Americans.

Fearful this would bring Bryan victory at the polls, Morgan gave in to the strike — except for union recognition — and McKinley was reelected.

The program also looks at how the American economy was changing with the growth of new industries, the influx of foreign immigrants and rural Americans leaving the land for jobs in the city.

Giving a sense of what life was like for city newcomers is Jesuit Father John Staudenmaier, one of the historians whose commentary fleshes out the period photographs and newsreels providing the program's visuals.

"America 1900"
Jan. 3, 8-11 p.m. EST on PBS

One of the strongest segments of the program deals with race relations, especially the inequities and injustices facing the African-American community.

There are also a number of profiles of era personalities such as environmentalist John Muir, photojournalist Frances Benjamin Johnston and North Carolina's George White, the only black U.S. congressman.

Produced by David Rubin, the result is a lively kaleidoscopic look at one year in the life of the nation.

Some viewers will be struck by the familiarity of the issues of the day, such as America's role as a world power, racial tensions, labor disputes, environmental movements and even a controversy over the definition of pornography.

What's different, however, and what comes across most clearly in the documentary is how new and exciting the world of 1900 seemed to people and their confidence the future would be even better.

Though things turned out somewhat differently than they expected, it is refreshing to recall the spirit of optimism which ushered in the century we are seeing closed. ▼

The Pope Speaks

POPE JOHN PAUL II

Pontiff moves Popes Pius IX, John XXIII closer to beatification

By CINDY WOODEN
Catholic News Service

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope John Paul II formally cleared the way for a year 2000 beatification of Pope Pius IX and moved Pope John XXIII a step closer as well.

Decrees advancing the papal causes were among 18 promulgated Dec. 20 at the Vatican.

In the case of Pope Pius IX, who led the church from 1846 to 1878, the Vatican recognized the miracle needed for his beatification.

Although a date for the ceremony was not announced, Pope Pius is expected to be one of the people beatified Sept. 3 at the Vatican. In the case of Pope John XXIII, pontiff from 1958 to 1963, Pope John Paul formally recognized that he practiced Christian virtues to a heroic degree.

Recognition of a miracle is still needed in Pope John's case; the decree of such a miracle is expected to be issued in the spring, which would make it possible for Pope John to be beatified along with Pope Pius. The medical consultants to the Vatican Congregation for Sainthood Causes already have said there was no natural explanation for the healing submitted in Pope John's cause.

Archbishop Jose Saraiva Martins, prefect of the congregation, told Pope John Paul, "With the recognition of the heroic virtues of Pope John XXIII, our memories turn back to the exultant days of the convocation of the Second Vatican Council," its sessions in the 1960s and its implementation. Pope John promoted ecumenism, the archbishop said. He showed special concern for improving relations with the Orthodox, whom he came to know serving as a Vatican diplomat in Bulgaria and Turkey.

"He worked in every way to lay the foundations for a new attitude in the Catholic Church toward the Jewish world," Archbishop Saraiva Martins said.

Pope Pius lived at a time of "great political and social upheaval, but did not allow himself to be defeated by the difficult events that marked his time," the archbishop said.

When Pope Pius was elected, the papacy still included temporal power over Rome and the papal states; the temporal power ended in 1870 when Italian troops occupied Rome.

The period of Pope Pius' pontificate also was one of great philosophical and theological debate. He issued the Syllabus of Errors, a list of 80 modern propositions which he believed were undermining religion, the church and moral values through the glorification of freedom and of reason without the balancing effect of responsibility and natural law. Pope Pius also solemnly declared the dogma of Mary's Immaculate Conception, and he convoked the First Vatican Council, which formally defined papal primacy and infallibility.

The Bottom Line

Bishops call 2000 a spiritual milestone

Here we are at the beginning of a new millennium, fortunate to be a part of an exciting adventure. That's how I prefer to label our entry into the year 2000.

We have been inundated with gloomy predictions about the new millennium. Some people even escalated the Y2K problems into an imagined doomsday. Fortunately, darkness and dismay are not the way of Christians. We are people of light.

The U.S. Catholic bishops wisely called on us to bring our light into the new year, shining stronger than ever before. In their fine document "Faithful Citizenship, Civic Responsibility for a New Millennium," they remind us that this is a rejoicing time, as well as a time for reflection on how well we are bringing Christ's life into this world. They ask us, as Catholics, to see this new year as a great "spiritual milestone."

Our bishops have put out a great challenge, charging us, in a sense, to celebrate our heritage as descendants of Christ by strong action. In their document, they did not mince words:

"The next millennium requires a new kind of politics, focused more on moral principles than on the latest polls, more on the needs of the poor and vulnerable than the contributions of the rich and powerful, more on the pursuit of the common good than the demands of special interest."

With gut honesty our bishops remind us, "Our culture does not lift us up." And they prove this by underlining ethnic cleansing, the inability to confront hunger, the poverty of so many children, 1.4 million abortions each year, the frequent eruption of hate and intolerance, dangerous schools that have become war zones and the gap between the rich and poor.

Our bishops want us to see, really see, that because we have been given the gift of our Catholic faith, we have much work to do. They spell it out: "As Catholics, we can celebrate the jubilee by recommitting ourselves to carry the values of the Gospel and church teaching into the public square."

I think it has become so easy for us to separate our Christian values from politics. Yet, as our bishops are reminding us, you can't separate faith from citizenship: "Building peace, combating poverty and despair, and protecting freedom and human rights are not only moral imperatives, they are wise national priorities." We must truly believe in the truth of their words.

Our bishops have wisely used the hoopla generated by the new millennium as a way of getting our attention. I think they had to remind us that this is a jubilee — a great birthday event for followers of Jesus. And then they chose to go a step further, challenging us to make the new century take shape according to God's blueprint by participating actively in politics and engaging in "civil dialogue on fundamental issues."

I leave you with their optimistic words to reflect on: "This dual calling of faith and citizenship is at the heart of what it means to be a Catholic in the United States as we look with hope to the beginning of the new millennium."

Hispanic Ministry

FATHER VINCENT H. FINNERTY
Guest Columnist

Father Finnerty brings to our attention concerns affecting our Hispanic brothers and sisters throughout the United States. We are blessed in having Father Finnerty direct our own diocesan Hispanic Ministry. Under his leadership, our Hispanic Ministry continues to successfully address the issues of which he writes in this column.

Rising visibility of Hispanics in the Church

Last month, I shared with you some statistics that appear in a study commissioned by the Secretariat for Hispanic Affairs of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops in January 1998. Today I wish to share with you some of the major findings of that study:

1) Hispanic Ministry has increased its visibility as an institutional force within the Catholic Church. However, it has not impacted the life of the Church as profoundly as it could or should, given the magnitude of the Hispanic "presence," and the goals and priorities established by the Bishops in recent years.

Staffing and budgets for Hispanic Ministry have increased, and Hispanic Ministry directors have greater access to the Bishops and their chanceries. However, major programmatic and policy goals for Hispanic Ministry established in the mid-1980s have not been met due to cultural and institutional resistance from non-Hispanics and increased demands on diocesan resources. In addition, the unexpectedly large increase in Hispanic immigration since 1980 has compelled the Church to devote a disproportionate share of its resources to basic pastoral and social services for Hispanic newcomers. This appears to have occurred at the expense of ongoing formation and leadership programs for longer-term Hispanic residents who increasingly seek vocations outside the Church.

2) Most dioceses have not made a diocesan-wide commitment to Hispanic Ministry, and thus, do not have programs in place to bring Hispanics and non-Hispanics together into the full life of the Church.

A large number of dioceses formally adopted the National Pastoral Plan for Hispanic Ministry in the late 1980s. However, only a minority conduct pastoral planning for Hispanics on a regular basis: moreover, such planning is rarely integrated within general diocesan planning and programming. As a result, the level of ongoing diocesan collaboration in Hispanic program development is extremely low. Except for Catholic Charities and the Department of Religious Education, most diocesan departments do not work closely with the Office of Hispanic Ministry and do not jointly implement programs at the parish level. Within the parishes, most Hispanics worship separately from non-Hispanics and do not share equally in the administration of parish life.

Hope this has been helpful. Next month we will talk about proselytism among Hispanics and Hispanic leadership within the Church.

Father Vincent H. Finnerty is diocesan director of Hispanic Ministry.

Your Year 2000 is secure

As the calendar measures it, we have reached another milestone in our life's journey — the year 2000 A.D. This is a good time to pause in order to map out our journey into the future.

It helps to realize, of course, that the designated route you choose is always subject to change. You will encounter roadblocks and detours and wrong turns that are beyond your capacity to predict. Relying on your own resources, the uncertainty of life is your only certainty.

Although you chart your course in fear and trembling because of the uncertainties that lay ahead, nevertheless you rejoice in the sure conviction that at every point along the way you can say, "My future is secure in God's hands!"

Several years ago, at year's end, a small Church group decided to test the power of expectation. Each person wrote down his or her New Year's expectations, put them in an envelope and sealed it. On the following New Year's Day, they met, opened the envelopes and read what they had written.

One man had stated, "In the next year all I can expect is more of the same old miserable life." Sadly, he admitted that his expectation had come true. He still felt miserable. A woman read ten worthy goals she had hoped to achieve. Happily, she said that nine of them had come to pass. She also admitted that because she expected to achieve her goals, she had really worked at them.

Another man had based his expectations on his zodiac sign, Capricorn, which predicted, "For you it will be a year of difficulty and frustration." He got what he expected!

Another woman, also a Capricorn, who knew nothing of the astrological prediction, had enjoyed a "beautiful" year. One person in the group had died during the year. His envelope was opened revealing his expectation: "As none of the men in my family have survived beyond age sixty, I expect to die during the coming year." He had died one month before his sixtieth birthday.

It would be too simplistic to imagine that the combination of positive thinking and a little hard work will fulfill our every expectation in the year 2000. Disappointment, grief, failure and frustration are built into the human condition. And whether we are going to turn thirty or sixty or ninety this year, any one of us may die before it's over.

Yet, as followers of Jesus Christ, we are an expectant people, a people of hope. We have a vision before us of the Promised Land. We have put our trust in Jesus' promise to be with us always — and that means in every moment, especially those of disappointment, grief, failure or frustration. We have put our trust in the Power of God to transform sorrow into joy, defeat into victory, death into new life.

Let us resolve that by our love for one another this New Year of 2000 A.D. will unfold, in truth, as the "Year of the Lord." Let us resolve that, a year from today, we will look back on 2000 as a time when we lived as though the good of countless others, known and unknown, depended on us.

Let us greet one another, saying:

"Happy New Year! Our time is secure in God's hands — and each other's — for when we do His will, our hands are the hands of God."

Fair Trade

In April 1997, Canada imposed a ban on the gasoline additive MMT whose primary ingredient is manganese, a known human neutrotoxin. The producer of MMT, U.S.-based Ethyl Corporation, sued Canada for $250 million claiming the public health law violated its investor protections under the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA). Ethyl argued the ban unfairly expropriated its assets by eliminating profits that Ethyl expected to earn in the Canadian market. Canada finally settled the suit with Ethyl for $13 million plus legal costs. In addition Canada changed its law to declare the additive MMT "safe."

Free markets, efficiency and profitability promise a world where everyone stands to gain. Indeed, the gross domestic products of countries involved in free trade continue to expand. The world bathes in a pool of prosperity. Moreover, free trade offers all people around the globe access to the fullest gifts of creation, while it sews the world together in a patch quilt of interdependence.

Yet beyond the euphoria about the positive side of free trade, the dark side reveals workers in sweatshops oppressed for the sake of production and abandoned communities devastated for the maximization of profit. The Canadian case over MMT demonstrates that unfettered free trade can affect important environmental, health and consumer laws of participating countries.

Because the global economy sees most environmental laws as a hindrance to the cheap production and free flow of goods, the land, the forests and other natural resources get sacrificed for production with little accountability for the environment. Creation becomes another input to production, not the common heritage of all.

Also, global production favors mass production. Local clothing, regional crafts and cultural ways of producing goods stand in defiance of the global economy. The same music, the same style shirt and the same hamburger sold the world over lend themselves to mass production where even unskilled workers can learn a few key steps for manufacturing. Style and taste become standardized, because mass production brings massive profits.

The world economy currently possesses an overcapacity for production, and thoughtless consumption stimulated by cheap prices produces throw-aways, garbage and pollution that denigrate the quality of life for everyone. Overcapacity motivated by the need for continual growth makes frivolous items that get discarded after a brief use. This approach demands ever larger landfills.

For people of faith unfettered free trade trips a moral switch. Cheaper goods, profits and abundance sound appealing, but they must weigh themselves against certain moral trade-offs.

Economics justifies the global economy by stressing cheaper prices for consumers. But, the economy must also serve the worker with just wages, and not just the consumer with cheap prices.

Father John S. Rausch writes, teaches, and organizes in Appalachia.

New Century Resolutions

So you thought New Years' resolutions were hard to keep? Let's see what you do with New Century resolutions. Or maybe we'll watch you try on a vow for the new millennium.

Feeling the pressure yet?

Yes, yes, we know that since there was no year "0," the 21st century and the second millennium really don't start until the year 2001. But who really cares? That's a huge calendar change — going from the old familiar "19" that we all know and love to the "2000" that sounds so futuristic, strange and mysterious. So please, just for the moment, you calendar purists keep silent and let the rest of us reflect.

Because we're creatures who live in the midst of time, we respond to changes and transitions marked by time. We may go to sleep depressed and anxious, but a new day brings the peace of being able to start over.

Anniversaries, birthdays and holidays usually give us opportunities to think over the meaning of those events and see how our lives match up to the possibilities we thought they promised. So that's why we make New Year's resolutions.

But as I said, though the whole thing is arbitrary (Why, after all, get all excited about 100-year spans and not 98? Why is 2,000 years or so since Jesus' birth a bigger deal than 1,999?) and not even accurate, the dawn of the new millennium and our church's celebration of the jubilee is making a lot of us think.

Are we living up to the promise and hope of human life on earth? Are you living up the promise of your specific, amazing life on earth?

It's something to think about and to consider in specific ways. As a Christian, you might try this: God created you in his image. What are some ways you can, in the next year, make that image more visible and vivid in the life you've been given?

God gave you the capacity to love, something no other creature but humans can do, since animal affection and loyalty isn't the same as love.

What can you do to be more loving? Can you look at other people through God's eyes, as brothers and sisters? Can you, little by little, build up the habit of thinking of others before yourself?

God also gave you an intelligent, rational mind. Are you using it? Is there any time left in the day for you to develop this mind? With television, computer and video games, are you just too darn busy? What would happen if you resolved to read just one book a week from now on?

Animals make things, but God gave you something greater, something you share with him: Creativity.

What can you do to nurture that gift, even in little ways? Could you put more imagination, rather than mere rote copying, into your schoolwork, tell stories rather than just watch them unfold on television or make music instead of just listening to it?

Finally, God gave you something else. It's called free will. Animals don't have that. What would happen if, each day you took two minutes to consider how freely you really acted that day? What would happen to your clothing choices, the language you use and your opinions? Would you still be so slavishly attached to the amorphous cruel dictatorship of "cool" or would something else finally have a chance to take over?

So what do you think about this resolution idea — allowing your own, loving, intelligent, creative and free divinely created self to emerge?

Wouldn't that be something to celebrate!

Hundreds to start millennium with blessing, run

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Hundreds of people plan to start the new millennium with a papal blessing and a run.

"The Millennium Marathon," a Jan. 1 event sponsored by the city of Rome and the International Amateur Athletics Federation, will begin at the Vatican and end at the Colosseum.

Pope John Paul II is scheduled to greet participants in the five-kilometer run during his midday Angelus address in St. Peter's Square.

Rumors are that a team of Swiss Guards will participate in the run; 15 members of the corps made their marathon debut in the 21-kilometer "Roma Urbs Mundi" event in October.

Pope to receive interreligious tapestry of crucifixion

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope John Paul II will receive an unusual interreligious gift during Holy Year 2000: a 60-square-foot Persian tapestry depicting the crucifixion.

Commissioned by a Jew and woven by a Muslim, the work features the stations of the cross surrounding a central panel of Christ crucified. An Iranian master working in the city of Qum took five years to hand-sew the tapestry, using more than 80,000 yards of silk thread.

The tapestry was described as a unique marriage of Christian themes and Iranian traditional technique. One earlier such work, a rendering of the Last Supper, was stolen from its Iranian studio in 1995.

Sponsor a Child at a Catholic Mission. It's Affordable!

Little Maria lives in a village in Guatemala in a two-room house with a tin roof and dirt floors. Her father struggles to support the family as a day laborer. Can you help a poor child like Maria? Become a sponsor today!

Your opportunity to help a very poor child is much too important to miss. And Christian Foundation for Children and Aging (CFCA), an international Catholic sponsorship program can show you the affordable way.

Through CFCA you sponsor a child for the amount you can afford. Ordinarily it takes $20 a month to provide one poor child with the life-changing benefits of sponsorship. But if this is not possible for you, we invite you to sponsor at a level you can afford (minimum $10). CFCA will see to it from other donations and the tireless efforts of our missionary partners that your child receives the same benefits as other sponsored children.

Your sponsorship pledge helps provide a poor child at a Catholic mission site with nourishing food, medical care, the chance to go to school – whatever is needed most. You can literally change a life!

And you can be assured your pledge has its greatest impact because our programs are directed by dedicated Catholic missionaries with a long-standing commitment to the people they serve.

To help build your relationship, you receive a picture of your child, information about your child's family and country, letters from your child and the CFCA newsletter. But most important, you receive the satisfaction of helping a poor child!

"I'm delighted to be CFCA's 100,000th sponsor . . . and I invite you to join me."

CRS invites assistance for Venezuela flood victims

CHARLOTTE — Venezuela has suffered its worst natural disaster of the century — a disaster striking in the height of the Christmas season. Due to recent flooding, more than 10,000 people are feared dead and 6,000 are reported missing. At least 150,000 people are homeless.

Heavy rains attributed to La Niña soaked the coast of Venezuela for over a week, causing countless avalanches of mud, rocks and boulders. Houses and entire villages have been swept away, and towns once thriving have completely disappeared under the mud and rubble.

Because of the expense of sending donated goods and the logistics of transporting items within the country, CRS says that financial assistance is the highest priority.

If your parish chooses to take up a special offering, please contribute in that way. Alternately, individual donations may be sent by check payable to the "Diocese of Charlotte — Venezuela Relief" and mailed to the Diocese of Charlotte Pastoral Center, 1123 S. Church St., Charlotte, N.C. 28203. All money collected will be forwarded to Catholic Relief Services, which is the U.S. Catholic community's official overseas relief effort. ▼ he continues. "He said to me, 'You don't have to think about it. Just do it. Let the Holy Spirit guide you.' And that's what we did."

After that, Bishop Begley continued as a champion of social justice. He was instrumental in the writing of "This Land is Home to Me," a pastoral letter by 24 Catholic bishops that earned national recognition for its sensitivity and honesty on the needs of Appalachia. He later made headlines by supporting a consumer boycott of J.P. Stevens products, sponsored by the Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers Union.

An enthusiasm for the Cursillo and charismatic movements — which he supported zealously as a bishop — is still a passion of Bishop Begley's, too. "These movements focus people on returning to realize that they are responsible to the Lord, and how this can be attained," the bishop says. "It's beautiful to see the fidelity of the people, believing with faith in God that amazing things can happen."

Above all, Bishop Begley says his main objective has been to be a good pastor. "I think the thing I know best is an attempt to save souls, to bring people to the Lord," he says.

A gentleman of leisure

This particular afternoon, Bishop Begley sits in a sunlit hallway near the chapel at Maryfield, where he has resided since 1997. He warmly reaches out to passers-by on their way to the worship space, telling them to pray and asking how they're feeling. And while he may now be a gentleman of leisure, he still has an eager devotion to the priesthood and to the church he has served for 65 years.

"The Lord has been very good," says Bishop Begley in a thoughtful tone. "I thank Him for all that has happened. We have much to be grateful for here, there's no question."

And what of the new millennium, during which the church in North Carolina is expected to continue in its growth and outreach? "The more the merrier," Bishop Begley says. "I hope we can continue to move along nicely."

Vocations Awareness

Vocations both a personal and community effort, says bishop

BY JIMMY ROSTAR
ASSOCIATE EDITOR

CHARLOTTE — Bishop William G. Curlin still recalls the day he told his mother he wanted to be a priest.

"She just smiled and told me that she'd wondered how long it would take for me to figure that out," he says. "She told me she sensed a long time ago that this was where God was calling me."

That family support is important in promoting vocations, Bishop Curlin says. But, he adds, one's calling begins with a very personal discernment of the gifts he or she can offer.

"The call to priesthood, diaconate or religious life is truly a mystery," the bishop says. "You cannot explain it in human terms because each man and woman, in his and her individual way, experiences some moment when they feel a desire to place their life in service to God and His people. It's a very profound experience of faith."

As the Catholic Church observes Vocations Awareness Week Jan. 9-15, Bishop Curlin emphasizes that prayer is essential in supporting vocations in parishes, families and communities. "Prayer will always be the foundation of vocations," he adds, "because it's through prayer that each of us is able to hear and discern God's will."

Encouragement of vocations can best be conveyed in the zeal of clergy and religious who are joyful in their commitment to the Lord, Bishop Curlin says. He adds, "The best promoter for vocations is a priest or religious or deacon who is happy in their calling, and totally committed to their ministry. They have reached a maturity of faith in their life where you see the love of God shining in them."

Bishop Curlin, currently serving as the director of vocations for the Diocese of Charlotte and who also held that position in the Archdiocese of Washington, D.C., says experience has taught him that there is no set timeframe in the journey toward the consecrated life.

"You bring your own experiences, your struggles and, sometimes, your failures with your faith in God," he says. "You bring a willingness to continue your growth so that over the years in formation and training, you're able to gain much knowledge about yourself, the world and your faith."

That journey of formation, Bishop Curlin adds, is perpetual. "It's a growth experience that continues all your life," he says. "Each day in ministry is a new beginning, and there are countless experiences which call for new growth in Christ."

While Vocations Awareness Week is a time set aside to focus on the priesthood, religious life and the diaconate, Bishop Curlin is grateful for the manifest ways all the faithful embrace their vocation here in western North Carolina.

"The good pastor and person truly happy in their vocation encourages our congregations in their various ministries," he says.

The Second Vatican Council, he says, brought great emphasis on active service in ministerial ways, thus allowing people with all vocations to more fully participate in the life of the church.

"While there is the consecrated ministry of the priesthood, religious life and diaconate, our priests, religious and deacons were encouraged to form, educate and challenge God's holy people to bring their gifts of service to the church," he says. "To me, that is one of the greatest effects of the Council."

Vatican asks for overhaul of commission for English translations

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Vatican has called for a complete overhaul of the commission which translates liturgical texts into English. Questioning the quality of the International Commission on English in the Liturgy's work as well as the way it functions, the Vatican ordered the revision of the commission's statutes. Cardinal Jorge Medina Estevez, prefect of the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Sacraments, said the new statutes must give his office a greater say in the work of the commission, known as ICEL, including Vatican clearance of ICEL personnel. Representatives of the 11 bishops' conferences which sponsor ICEL will meet Jan. 21 in London to discuss Cardinal Medina's letter.

Church in Eastern Europe finds its place in new democracies

PRAGUE, Czech Republic (CNS) — A decade after communist rule collapsed, church leaders in Eastern Europe say they still need time for public attitudes to evolve and for Catholicism to find its natural place in the region's new democracies. "Freedom is a thousand times better than slavery — this has been our most important experience since communism fell," said Cardinal Jan Korec of Nitra, Slovakia. "Yet while we have many reasons for satisfaction, there are disappointments, too. Freedom has opened the way to demoralizing tendencies — in the media, culture, and economic and social life. We weren't prepared for such a flood of bad influences," he said.

Black Catholic university awarded $1.9 million grant

NEW ORLEANS (CNS) — Xavier University of Louisiana has been awarded a $1.9 million grant to enhance the fund-raising capability of historically black colleges and universities. The grant was awarded jointly to Xavier by the Kresge Foundation of Troy, Mich., and the Southern Education Foundation of Atlanta. Xavier, the nation's only historically black Catholic college, was one of five black institutions named to receive grants totaling $18 million. Xavier intends to use its $1.9 million to build a more effective major gifts and alumni program as part of a five-year capital campaign to raise $75 million, the university announced.

New graduate program integrates Catholicism, psychology

ARLINGTON, Va. (CNS) — A new graduate studies program that seeks to integrate the Catholic faith with psychological sciences has opened its doors in Arlington. Bishop Paul S. Loverde of Arlington blessed the new campus of the Institute for Psychological Studies Dec. 12, urging those involved with the endeavor to "keep the true faith and live up to it in their lives." Housed in what used to be a bank, the institute has classrooms, a library, offices and a chapel, where Mass and confession will be available once a week. Its initial enrollment is 17 students.

Polish church welcomes move to restrict pornography

WARSAW, Poland (CNS) — Polish church leaders have welcomed a parliamentary vote to restrict the sale of pornographic material in the mainly Catholic country. "Curbing the distribution of pornography is a step toward civilization," said Cardinal Jozef Glemp of Warsaw. "Pornography is imagery which humiliates a person, exposing what should be protected through feelings of dignity and self-respect," he said. The cardinal was reacting to the mid-December vote by Poland's lower house of parliament to tighten the criminal code by imposing 10-year jail sentences for the sale of material depicting "sexual organs in contact."

Long lines at Holy Door leave little time for prayer on threshold

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — At the start of Holy Year 2000, long lines at St. Peter's Basilica's Holy Door left little time for prayer on the threshold. "The queue is too fast," said Carlos Roberto, a 24-year-old Brazilian Catholic on vacation in Rome. At noon Dec. 27, pilgrims passed through the Holy Door at a rate of about 90 per minute, granting them less than a second to pause before being swept in by the crowd. Only a few people managed to kneel in the doorway for a reflective moment amid the midday rush. "You have to come early in the morning if you want to stop," said one security official inside the basilica.

Supporting marriage is no excuse to bash gays, cardinal says

LOS ANGELES (CNS) — Cardinal Roger M. Mahony of Los Angeles urged California Catholics to back an upcoming referendum defining marriage as a contract between a man and a woman, but he said they should oppose anyone who "will use this measure to promote hatred against homosexual persons." In a statement on the issue Dec. 20 the cardinal reaffirmed the archdiocese's "well-established ministerial commitment to homosexual persons and their families." Californians are to vote on Proposition 22, a referendum on the legal definition of marriage, on March 7. The initiative says that only a union between a woman and a man is valid or recognized in California law.

Abbot Walter Coggin, third abbot-ordinary of Belmont Abbey, dies at 83

BELMONT — Right Reverend Walter A. Coggin, OSB, Ph.D., third abbot-ordinary of Belmont Abbey Nullius, died Dec. 28, 1999. He was 83.

A Mass of Christian burial was celebrated in the Belmont Abbey Basilica Dec. 31, 1999. Bishop William G. Curlin of the Diocese of Charlotte was the principal celebrant. Abbot Placid Solari of Belmont Abbey was the homilist.

A memorial Mass will also be celebrated Jan. 12 at 5 p.m. in the Belmont Abbey Basilica. Members of the public, Belmont Abbey College students, alumni, faculty and staff are invited to attend.

According to Abbot Placid, "It was in his role of teacher and mentor that Abbot Walter built his most enduring legacy, touching the lives of generations of Abbey students. Countless students have credited Abbot Walter's classes in philosophy and ethics with giving them the foundations for clear reasoning and proper values which have made them successful in life. Until the end, he remained a gentle and loving man, with a giant heart and a love for life."

Abbot Walter retired from teaching at Belmont Abbey College at the end of fall semester, after 60 years in the classroom. In October, the college's Board of Trustees voted to name the campus Student Commons building for him.

Dr. Robert A. Preston, president of the Benedictine liberal arts college, said Abbot Walter was a special favorite of students, faculty and staff alike. "As a former student of Abbot Walter's myself, I am particularly saddened by his passing," he added. "We enjoyed his presence on campus every single day. Likewise, his teaching skills and affection for his students endeared him to all."

Abbot Walter headed the monastic community from 1956-1970. He was the only abbot-nullius in the United States when the Abbey was a nullius diocese — a diocese unto itself — meaning its church was the only abbey church to hold cathedral status. As such, Abbot Walter possessed the right to attend and vote, like bishops, in the General Ecumenical Council of Vatican II as a Council Father. During this time he oversaw the complete renovation of the Basilica of Mary Help of Christians to adapt the church for the celebration of the liturgy in keeping with the reforms of Vatican II.

Abbot Walter also served as the fifth president of Belmont Abbey College, in the mid-'60s. During his tenure, he undertook an unprecedented renovation of campus educational and residential facilities. He resigned his office as abbot in early 1970 and accepted a position as professor of philosophy at the college.

Abbot Walter is held in the highest regard by generations of Belmont Abbey alumni, colleagues and current students, who have enjoyed his enthusiastic and wise explanations of philosophy and ethics.

Abbot Walter was born in Richmond, Va., in 1916, the son of the late Walter A. Coggin and Mary Veronica Moshay. He graduated from Sacred Heart Grammar School in Richmond and attended Benedictine High School there, later graduating from Loyola High School in Los Angeles.

He graduated from Belmont Abbey Junior College in 1936, also entering monastic life that year, making his novitiate at St. Vincent Archabbey in Latrobe, Pa. In 1937, he professed his vows as a monk of Belmont Abbey. He completed his undergraduate work at St. Benedict College in Atchinson, Kan., in 1939 and his seminary studies at Belmont in 1943. His master's degree and doctorate in philosophy are from the Catholic University of America. Abbot Walter was ordained a priest in 1943 at Sacred Heart Cathedral in Richmond.

He celebrated his golden jubilee of priestly ordination in 1993 and his diamond jubilee of monastic profession in 1997. ▼

Bishop Untener calls on Catholics to bring divorced home

By DAN DIGMANN
Catholic News Service

SAGINAW, Mich. (CNS) — Bishop Kenneth E. Untener of Saginaw is calling on Catholics in the pews to serve as church ambassadors of reconciliation to divorced and separated Catholics.

In a taped message that was played at the end of each Mass in all 109 parishes of the diocese during a December weekend, the bishop referred to brochures available in every parish that describe steps the diocese has taken to simplify the painstaking procedure to obtain a decree of nullity and explain how the people can initiate the process.

"I want you to put these in the hands of people who need to hear these words of welcome," Bishop Untener said in the taped message. "This is a golden opportunity to do a world of mercy, and the year 2000 is a fine time to do it."

The church teaches that a valid marriage lasts a lifetime and doesn't recognize the validity of a civil divorce. This can cause confusion for divorced Catholics about where they stand with the church. Are they excluded from the sacraments? Is it even worth going through the long and complicated annulment process to make it right with the church?

When the diocese began planning events for the coming of the jubilee, one of the issues that came to the forefront was reconciliation with divorced Catholics, said Father Richard Filary, judicial vicar of the dioc-

'Good Samaritan' provides theme of 27th March for Life

Students from Charlotte area to lead march; hundreds from N.C. expected to attend

By NANCY HARTNAGEL
Catholic News Service

WASHINGTON — Each year, the March for Life in the nation's capital draws tens of thousands of people from around the country to protest the U.S. Supreme Court decisions that legalized abortion in the United States. This Jan. 24, students representing Charlotte Catholic High School and Belmont Abbey College will lead the march, whose theme this year is "My neighbor is each human being in existence at fertilization."

"This is a really great honor for the young people of this diocese, who continue to be tremendously devoted to the pro-life cause," said Jack Sweeney, who for several years has coordinated Charlotte-area youth participation in the march. "The number of young people coming to the march from this area has grown dramatically, even in the past few years."

The participation of young Catholics in the Charlotte Diocese is just one element of western North Carolina involvement in the march. Parishioners of all ages from across the diocese will travel by the busloads to Washington later this month to join thousands in their opposition to abortion.

Busses in a number of areas in the diocese have been chartered by parishes and other institutions, and a bus sponsored by the diocesan Respect Life Office has also been scheduled to depart from the Diocese of Charlotte Pastoral Center.

Bishop William G. Curlin will celebrate a Mass for Charlotte Diocese marchers Jan. 23 at 10 a.m. in the Blessed Sacrament Chapel in the Basilica of the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception. At 8 that evening, he will concelebrate a Mass to open the National Prayer Vigil for Life in the shrine's Great Upper Church. Cardinal William H. Keeler of Baltimore, chairman of the bishops' pro-life committee, will be the principal celebrant and homilist.

"We're playing off of the Good Samaritan story about 'who is my neighbor,'" said Nellie Gray, march founder and president of the March for Life Fund. She was referring to the well-known parable in the Gospel of Luke as it relates to the theme of this year's march.

This year's March for Life in Washington D.C. will be held on January 24, 2000. For details, call the Respect Life Office at (704) 370-3229.

"The importance of this is 'at fertilization,'" she told Catholic News Service by phone. The fact that people can visualize the horror of partial-birth abortion and the abortion of "big babies," she said, "draws attention away from the one-cell baby who is also being killed with drugs and devices and so forth."

The annual march draws people from around the country to protest the Jan. 22, 1973, U.S. Supreme Court decisions — Roe vs. Wade and Doe vs. Bolton — that legalized abortion in the United States. The march proceeds from the Ellipse, just south of the White House, east on Constitution Avenue to the Capitol and Supreme Court.

"Any time that the 22nd falls on a Saturday or a Sunday, our policy now is just to bump it to the next Monday," said Gray.

During the prayer vigil in the evening of Jan. 23, there will be a rosary for life and night prayer in the Byzantine tradition in the Crypt Church on the shrine's lower level. Also in the Crypt Church, priests will hear confessions until 1 a.m. and Seminarians for Life International will lead holy hours throughout the night.

The prayer vigil concludes Jan. 24, with morning prayer at 6 a.m. in the Crypt Church, and a Mass at 7:30 a.m. in the Great Upper Church, with Cardinal Anthony J. Bevilacqua of Philadelphia as main celebrant.

Shrine spokesman Peter Sonski said the shrine again would host 400 students overnight Jan. 23. The young pilgrims sleep on the floor in the memorial hall and side chapels on the lower level.

Though the shrine has limited facilities, he said, the sleep-over has become a tradition and helps many who are traveling on a shoestring budget. "We're glad to continue the practice," he said.

There also will be a Mass for seminarians — sponsored by the Respect Life Committee of St. Joseph Seminary in New York — at 10 a.m. at St. Patrick Church in downtown Washington.

For details on the Diocese of Charlotte's participation in the March for Life, call the Respect Life Office at (704) 370-3229. ▼

In a society that stresses success in the secular world, Bishop Curlin says, the promotion of vocations stresses respect for God's will. "It's a highly materialistic age in which we're living, and yet in this very age, we're finding people crying out with a hunger for God like never before," he says. "There truly is a sincere search for God today."

For men and women whose search leads them to the priesthood, religious life and diaconate, the bishop says, encouragement and prayer from the community can be wonderful gifts — blessings that can help guide them in their decision to serve.

"Vocations should be a primary concern of every Catholic," Bishop Curlin says. "It goes beyond a diocesan office of vocations. This is everybody's job and, thanks be to God, there are families and parishes who consider the call to consecrated life a great blessing. All of God's people have to promote vocations through prayer and example. I pray each day that we will seek out and support people who may be discerning that unique call to service in the Lord."

esan tribunal.

"One thing with a lot of feedback was reaching out to those separated and divorced Catholics who feel they're no longer part of the church," said Father Filary, who is pastor of St. Hedwig Church in Bay City.

After speaking with pastors at parishes throughout the diocese, Father Filary said the tribunal identified two major stumbling blocks that keep people from seeking an annulment: fees and stacks of paperwork.

Effective last July 1, the tribunal eliminated the $300 requested fee for people seeking to clarify their status in the church. Now, rather than completing a lengthy questionnaire, the diocese has a team of nearly 40 lay people who were recommended by their pastors to personally interview and walk through the process with those seeking a decree of nullity.

Father Filary said it is hoped this will make it easier for people to come home to the church and decrease the time it takes to go through the procedure.

Bishop Untener said in an interview with The Catholic Weekly, Saginaw diocesan newspaper, that in making the process less difficult, the church is looking to help divorced Catholics.

"We're trying to make it more of a healing process," he said. ▼

Death penalty commutation celebrated by interfaith group

By DIANNE RIGGS
Correspondent

ASHEVILLE — About 20 members of the recently formed Western North Carolina chapter of People of Faith Against the Death Penalty gathered with bright candles and singing on the cold, windy evening of Dec. 16 to celebrate death row inmate Wendell Flowers' commutation of sentence by North Carolina Governor James Hunt the day before. This was the first commutation of the death penalty in Hunt's 15 years in office.

"It is cause for great celebration," said Noel Nickle of Asheville, one of the group's planners, at the celebration under the towering Vance Monument in downtown Asheville. "We should flood Gov. Hunt with letters of thanks."

Flowers had originally been sentenced to life in prison for murdering Wilkes County resident Thomas Greer. He was later sentenced to death for the controversial 1989 murder of inmate Rufus Watson.

The decision marked the first time in 13 cases that the governor granted clemency. In a statement, Hunt noted that while it was clear Flowers did not kill Watson alone, "there is no question that Wendell Flowers is a very dangerous criminal" and he "should, and will, spend the rest of his natural life in prison with absolutely no possibility of parole."

In Asheville and at other points in the state, death penalty opponents changed their mid-December plans from prayer vigils to celebrations.

"I feel the death penalty is wrong logically, morally and economically," said Warren Wilson College student Melanie Jordan, a Catholic. "I don't feel I or anyone has a right to take life." This sentiment was repeated by all of those attending who were interviewed.

People of Faith Against the Death Penalty is a part of the North Carolina Council of Churches, of which the Diocese of Charlotte is a member.

The WNC chapter of People of Faith Against the Death Penalty gather for a celebration in Asheville.

"I hope Wendell Flowers finds his way to redemption and some people to help him," said Dan Lobdell, a Quaker from Asheville.

The gathering held tones of both celebration and solemnity. While participants excitedly commented on the commutation of sentence, there was also a remembrance of those who had died and those still facing death. Gathered in a circle, holding candles, they sang a monastic chant and prayed for current death row inmates, their victims and the victims' families. Several members recited the names of "the 599 lives who have not been spared" since the death penalty was reinstated in the United States in 1976, and the names of victims.

PFADP is a statewide, interfaith membership organization, said a flyer, which was issued to those attending the gathering. The mission of PFADP is to educate and mobilize faith communities to act to abolish the death penalty in North Carolina. It is founded on a vision of restorative justice, seeking abolition of the death penalty through support for the needs of victims' survivors, the community and offenders.

Ursula Scott of Asheville said she feels the death penalty is wrong because innocent people are executed and there is great disparity in the levels and quality of defense of the accused. "It is racist," she said. "There are a disproportionate number of people of color (on death row). It is a major disgrace that the U.S.A. is the only industrialized nation with the death penalty." She added that she did not find convincing evidence for the death penalty being a deterrent to crime.

"From the time I became an adult, I have been opposed to capital punishment," said the Rev. Tony Sayer, a United Methodist minister and member of the group. "I am not a pacifist, but we are killing people who are already fully in our control. It is very cold, very heartless and very bureaucratized, and done in my name as a taxpayer. Even if I were in favor of the death penalty in the abstract, I would be opposed to the way we do it."

The WNC chapter of the PFADP is new, although its members were active for over two years, planning for the Nov. 11 and 12 visit of abolitionist activist Sister Helen Prejean, said Stephen Dear, executive director of the NC PFADP in Chapel Hill. "The WNC chapter is composed of veteran organizers and very committed people. There is a real mix in terms of ages and faith traditions," he said. They have a lot of energy and ideas and are a wonderful sign of hope for abolishing the death penalty and a restored justice system, he said. ▼

Youths can ensure peace in third millennium, pope says

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Young people, by their faith and example, can ensure that acceptance and peace mark the third millennium, Pope John Paul II said. "Jesus himself asks you to light a fire on earth, the fire of his love," the pope wrote to a youth gathering sponsored by the ecumenical Taize Community. The community's Dec. 28-Jan. 1 pilgrimage meeting was expected to bring some 100,000 young people to Warsaw, Poland, to usher in the new year together. In a letter addressed to Brother Roger, the prior of Taize, the pope said he hoped the gathering would be "a privileged time of mutual acceptance and of brotherhood, prayer and contemplation which will lead to an ever greater openness to God and to others."

Denver couple wins right to home prayer meetings

DENVER (CNS) — The city of Denver has agreed to pay a Denver couple $30,000 for interfering with their right to hold prayer meetings in their home. "We are delighted that the city of Denver has finally recognized the First Amendment rights of our clients," said Jay Sekulow, chief counsel for the American Center for Law and Justice, which filed a federal lawsuit against Denver on behalf of the couple, who had been ordered by the city to limit the number of prayer meetings they held in their private residence to one per month. In the midst of the lawsuit against the city and county of Denver, the city agreed to pay Diane and David Reiter $30,000, primarily for their legal expenses.

Cardinal OKs initiation of sainthood cause for Archbishop Sheen

NEW YORK (CNS) — Cardinal John J. O'Connor of New York has given provisional approval to initiate the sainthood cause of Archbishop Fulton Sheen. Archbishop Sheen, who died in 1979, rose to radio and television fame in the 1930s, '40s and '50s and was a popular speaker at retreats and conferences. His famous television series of talks, called "Life Is Worth Living," was broadcast Tuesday evenings in prime time on ABC-TV from 1951 to 1957. Archbishop Sheen was also director of Propagation of the Faith, wrote newspaper columns and conducted a successful convert ministry. His sainthood cause is being promoted by the Archbishop Sheen Foundation, based in the archbishop's home town of El Paso, Ill.

New babies will light up Rome's Via della Conciliazione

ROME (CNS) — The lights along the main street leading to St. Peter's Square will shine a little brighter during the Holy Year 2000 — at least sometimes. Whenever a baby is born at Rome's Gemelli Hospital during 2000, new lights on the Via della Conciliazione will burn brighter for 20 seconds before returning to their normal intensity. The Rome city office for the jubilee, Rome's Gemelli Hospital and ACEA, an Italian electric company, presented their joint project at a Dec. 23 press conference. The presentation was followed by a trial run of the lighting, described as a gift of art to Pope John Paul II for Christmas.

Vatican agency says 31 missionaries killed in 1999

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Thirty-one church workers were killed in mission territories in 1999, Vatican missionary news service Fides said. Fides, the news agency of the Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples, counted 15 martyrs in Africa, 10 in Asia and six in South or Central America. Rather than being a cause for mourning, Fides director Father Bernardo Cervellera said, martyrdom belongs to the joy of Holy Year 2000. "The jubilee year is a year of grace, conversion, (and) pilgrimage," Father Cervellera said in a Dec. 28 editorial preceding Fides' annual list of martyrs.

Congressman calls for disclosure on House chaplain selection

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Rep. John Dingell, D-Mich., ranking Democrat on the House Commerce Committee, called for a full release of all records, transcripts and other materials relating to the selection of the new House chaplain. In a Dec. 20 letter to House Speaker Dennis Hastert, Dingell noted that "questions have been raised both publicly and privately" about the decision by House leaders not to nominate a Catholic priest to the chaplaincy position despite the high recommendation the priest received from the bipartisan search committee. Dingell, who is Catholic, proposed that before House members vote on the new chaplain Jan. 27, they be presented with all committee records, transcripts, staff memorandums, correspondence and other materials relating to the chaplain search.

Czech bishop says fellow ex-dissidents must not seek rewards

PRAGUE, Czech Republic (CNS) — A Czech bishop who as a priest helped lead communism's overthrow in Czechoslovakia's 1989 "Velvet Revolution" urged fellow ex-dissidents to stop "expecting rewards" for their activities. "We undertook our struggle because of our consciences, not to gain admiration and respect. However disappointing the present may be, we can't keep living in the past," said Prague Auxiliary Bishop Vaclav Maly. "Society wasn't, isn't and never will be thankful — one can't expect this," said the 49-year-old bishop. He added that the Catholic Church should accept "minority status" while working patiently to "rebuild its position" in the Czech Republic.

Father Finn named new editor of St. Louis Review

ST. LOUIS (CNS) — Archbishop Justin F. Rigali of St. Louis has named Father Robert Finn editor of the St. Louis Review, replacing Msgr. Dennis Delaney, who has been appointed president of Kenrick-Glennon Seminary in St. Louis. Father Finn, 46, said it was "a great honor" to be asked to direct St. Louis' archdiocesan newspaper, calling it a tool for instruction in the faith and life of the church and also a means for evangelization.

Round-the-world bike trip to raise funds for scholarships

By TERRY MCGUIRE
Catholic News Service

SEATTLE (CNS) — After finishing a bike trip from Seattle to Atlantic City, N.J., in 1987 for the American Lung Association, some riders wanted nothing more to do with bicycles — and one cyclist even burned his tent.

But Len Beil was still reveling in the cross-country experience. "I thought, 'You know, I could just keep going.' I really loved it."

A dozen years and several fund-raising rides later, Beil is embarking on another major bike trip as he and 249 fellow cyclists pedal around 45 countries for a year. His enthusiasm for bicycling hasn't waned.

"I'm looking forward to seeing the wonderful parts of the world that I've not seen," he says, "and revisiting those that I have."

Beil, executive assistant to the president of Seattle University, is part of Odyssey 2000, an around-the-world bicycle trek sponsored by Tim Kneeland and Associates Inc., a Seattle-based, special events management company that focuses on bicycle tours.

The riders left Pasadena, Calif., on New Year's Day, departing amid fanfare as the lead unit of the Tournament of Roses Parade. When they return on Dec. 31, 2000, they'll again be in the parade the next day, having ridden 20,000 miles over six continents.

In addition to the adventure, Beil is personally riding to raise funds to establish scholarships for minority students and single parents attending Seattle University.

At the Jesuit-run university, and in his previous work as an affirmative action and equal employment opportunity director for USWest, Beil has seen the need to improve access to education.

"There are a number of people who don't have the advantages of education," he says, "and it's important for them to have that foundation to get ahead in life. So I thought I would do what I could, in some small way."

So far, he has raised $131,000 in pledges for the scholarship endowment, a figure well on the way to his short-term goal of $150,000. The first scholarships will be awarded for the 2001-2002 school year.

"I plan to be making donations yearly myself and to provide the opportunity for other people to do so as well," Beil says. "My long-term goal — and that's by the time I die — is to get (to) $1 million."

In making the trip, Beil, a member of St. Cecilia Parish on Bainbridge Island, will quit his job at Seattle University, where he has worked for eight years. He notes that the global ride will afford him plenty of time to "think, pray and evaluate" his future. When he returns, he'll decide, with the help of his wife, Stella Ley, what he wants to do next.

A year away from his wife and family — including his 15-year-old stepson, Kris, and his adult children, daughter, Cindy, and stepson, Nick — will be the most difficult part of the trip.

But Ley, who spent her honeymoon bicycling with Beil through New Zealand, will join him at some of the stops in Greece, Italy and France. Meanwhile, family and friends will be able to follow his ride on the Internet at www.lenbiel.com.

Followed by a full support staff, the riders will average 77 miles per day and have two days off per week. An estimated 18 plane trips, 11 boat rides and one train transport are scheduled to get them across oceans and countries.

Kneeland and Associates says the 20,000-mile trip is designed to hit the highlights while avoiding the uninteresting landscapes and the difficult terrain.

Followed by a full support staff, the riders will average 77 miles per day and have two days off per week. An estimated 18 plane trips, 11 boat rides and one train transport are scheduled to get them across oceans and countries. The cyclists will camp about 60 percent of the time.

The riders, whose average age is 49, range in age from 17 to 81. Beil will be rolling into the South African country of Swaziland on his 55th birthday next Feb. 22.

From Pasadena, the group rolls south into Mexico and Central and South America before crossing the Atlantic to South Africa. After flying to Greece, they'll pedal through parts of Europe, arriving in Vatican City on April 3.

After returning to the United States and Canada, they'll head back to Europe before flying on to Australia and then Asia next fall.

Beil will be packing a tent, bedding, rain gear, casual clothing, three sets of riding gear, a camera, and friendship pins, which he'll distribute along the way.

"I'm taking a book of Jesuit prayers with me," he adds. "I plan to visit as many chapels and churches and sights, if I can, along the way and make this a prayerful, spiritual journey." ▼

Jubilee Days:
The Many Faces of Holiness

By H. RICHARD MCCORD JR.
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Scientists, health care workers, senior citizens, children, agricultural workers, teachers, artists, single people and families have two things in common this jubilee year:

— First, for each of these groups — and many others besides — there is a special "jubilee day" on the church's calendar.

— Second, all in these groups are called to grow in holiness, especially during this "year of favor from the Lord" (Lk 4:19).

Civic life honors mothers, fathers and grandparents with their own "day" every year. However, in designating jubilee days, the church wants to do more than honor people and thank them for their service — important as that is! The jubilee year is a time to strengthen faith and open the door to holiness.

If the jubilee year is not focused ultimately on our growth in holiness as individuals and communities, then — to paraphrase T.S. Eliot — we will have had the experience but missed the meaning.

We attain holiness not by removing ourselves from the world and its responsibilities, but by finding God in the depths of ordinary life. Twenty years ago the U.S. Catholic bishops wrote:

"It is characteristic that lay men and women hear the call to holiness in the very web of their existence, in and through the events of the world, the pluralism of modern living, the complex decisions and conflicting values they must struggle with, the richness and fragility of sexual relationships, the delicate balance between activity and stillness, presence and privacy, love and loss" ("Called and Gifted: The American Catholic Laity").

Each jubilee day takes this teaching about holiness and anchors it in the lives of a particular group of people. By singling out just a few of the many possible groups, the church is teaching a broad and basic truth:

Every person is called to holiness in the concrete circumstances of work and relationships.

Each jubilee day anchors the theme of holiness "in the lives of a particular group of people. By singling out just a few of the many possible groups, the church is teaching ... [that] every person is called to holiness in the concrete circumstances of work and relationships," writes H. Richard McCord Jr.

What all the jubilee days have in common is the opportunity they provide for every person:

—To make a connection between faith and daily life.

—To discover the sacred embedded in the ordinary.

—To be the light, the salt and the leaven in the world that Jesus asks of his followers.

For Catholics in all periods of history, the saints make holiness real. We venerate them for showing us what it means to "put on the Lord Jesus Christ" (Rom 13:14).

During the jubilee year, numerous women and men will be canonized as saints. Everyone knows, though, that the Christian community is blessed with more saints than those on the official roster.

This, it seems to me, is where the value of the jubilee days lies. On these days we can be reminded that sainthood is a possibility even for us and that, among those celebrated on a given jubilee day, there are many unknown saints whose lives inspire the rest of us.

The jubilee days will be a way to pause to give thanks for the holiness we see in others' lives and to reflect on the holiness we might achieve in our own life, particularly in our work and our relationships.

I don't know yet what jubilee days my parish will observe. There are more than 30 such days, and no parish could handle such a schedule!

With or without a public celebration, however, on the Jubilee Day of the Sick and Health Care Workers (Feb. 11) I will focus on one nurse I've come to know through a parish faith-sharing group. She shows me what it means to be striving for holiness in a particular calling. To her work she brings generosity, compassion and an ability to see Christ in those she cares for.

I know there are countless others like her, but she will help to focus my gratitude for saintly people and my reflection on becoming holy. She will serve to remind me of the many gifts present in a community and how much we need one another.

Recently I walked across the street from my office in Washington, D.C., and visited the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception. A few weeks earlier a special sculpture had been installed and dedicated in this beautiful church. The sculpture covers an entire wall and is titled "The Universal Call to Holiness."

This marble carving depicts many people being drawn by the Holy Spirit toward a central point — people of all ages, races, walks of life. The artwork's most interesting feature is that no one is alone. People are walking together, supporting each other, even leaning on one another. Mary stands at the sculpture's center, beckoning the group onward.

God's call to holiness, though it comes to us individually, never is meant to be a solitary experience. We need each other on the journey or we'll never make it home!

I hope the jubilee days serve as a practical reminder that the many paths we walk in life are indeed part of the one Christian journey.

On the jubilee days we will pause to celebrate these distinct paths and to marvel at the fact that holiness has so many faces. ▼

McCord is director of the U.S. bishops' Secretariat for Family, Laity, Women and Youth.

In a Nutshell

One commentator said there is a jubilee day this year for almost all Catholics — those in consecrated life (Feb. 2), mothers (May 14), fathers (June 18), bishops (Oct. 8), clergy (May 18), senior citizens (Sept. 24).

Here are just a few others: women, March 25; single people, April 27; scientists, May 25; the military, May 29; teachers, Sept. 10; agricultural workers, Nov. 12; police, Nov. 19; people with disabilities, Dec. 3; entertainers, Dec. 17.

Jubilee Days, Parish Style

By JOHN B. REYNOLDS
Catholic News Service

Parishes nationwide are gearing up for their own jubilee day celebrations. While enthusiasm is high, some aren't so sure which way to go.

Paul Henderson, director of the U.S. bishops' Office for the Jubilee Year, isn't surprised. "Several parishes are just now beginning to put their jubilee day plans together," he said, stressing that plans need not be elaborate or expensive to be in keeping with the program's twofold purpose:

— Raise up and honor the people in a particular profession or state of life.

— Challenge those individuals to ask, "How do I take my faith and weave it into the marketplace?"

Henderson's office has some ideas to help parishes launch their activities. A basic suggestion — especially when the jubilee day falls on a Sunday — is to recognize the individual group (or groups) of people at Sunday Mass, possibly with a social gathering afterward.

Evenings of reflection and discussion might be appropriate, as well as special prayer services. Some parish priests may want to honor their jubilee day individuals with a blessing, perhaps something from "The Book of Blessings" or a similar source.

For parishes considering giving a gift to jubilee day honorees, Henderson suggests a copy of the pope's prayer for the Jubilee Year, a certificate or a pin. He also encourages parishes to pursue their own creative ideas, which may have more significance in their parish community.

For example, St. Peter's Catholic Community in Fallbrook, Calif., just north of San Diego, placed a small ad in a national art magazine in 1998 to invite artists to take part in a Christian art show. St. Peter's is a member of the local Fallbrook Ministerial Association which sponsored the event. It was so successful that the parish made plans to begin its year-2000 jubilee celebrations Jan. 7 with a second Christian art show.

This year, after reviewing about 300 slides submitted by artists, coordinators planned to exhibit more than 80 pieces of work from artists around the United States. St. Peter's likewise had plans for a much smaller parish art show to celebrate the Jubilee Day for Artists in mid-February. Terry Hawthorne, the parish's Jubilee Year 2000 coordinator, said the "smaller show will celebrate the work of the people right here in our own community."

The U.S. bishops' Office for the Jubilee Year has resources for parishes still formulating jubilee-year plans. Henderson encourages people to log onto his office's Web site at www.nccbuscc.org/jubilee for the information.

The national jubilee day schedule is listed there, along with a list of resource publications and a further explanation of the jubilee days themselves. The site also offers news and updates, a national activities calendar, and eight ways to celebrate the jubilee year.

In addition, people can mail their requests to: Jubilee Office; NCCB/USCC; 3211 Fourth St. NE; Washington, D.C. 20017, or fax them to 202/541-3242. Send e-mail requests to JUBILEE@nccbuscc.org.

Schedules of the jubilee days themselves, their Scripture readings and referenced blessing options are also available for a nominal fee.

Henderson thinks that these efforts aren't just some pie-in-the-sky ideas from the hierarchy that have nothing to do with the people in the pew. "It has everything to do with them," he said. "Rarely do we affirm people in their marketplace work. Jubilee days are a way for the church to recognize that part of being a Christian — regardless of profession or occupation — is to bring one's faith to one's work." ▼
