THE DUKE CIRCUIT RIDER

1952

The first edition of The Duke Circuit Rider was dedicated to James Cannon III, who had been named dean the previous year: "We consider ourselves indeed fortunate to have as dean one so thoroughly qualified by his own academic preparation and experience, his long and intimate knowledge of the school and of the church, and his personal interest in the friendship of the students."

OUR FIRST ANNUAL ...

Something new has been added to the Duke Divinity scene! Heard echoing through these Gothic arches are the hoof beats of a new comer — modern descendant and name-sake of the most famous figure of pioneer American Protestantism — The Duke Circuit Rider! With no pretensions of grandeur, he has set out for one single purpose — the presentation and preservation of a RECORD ... of the school-year 1951-52. It is because those of us who labor here day after day may in the future want an accurate record of our seminary days as well as a glimpse of old, familiar faces, that the Rider is sent forth on this, his first journey. This year of our Lord 1952 is truly a great time to be alive — a great time to be in seminary! It stands at the beginning of a new era in the history of Duke Divinity School — the beginning of our Alma Mater's second quarter-century and the beginning of the administration of Dean James Cannon III. In the Methodist Church, it is the year of the General Conference in San Francisco. In the U.S.A. it is the year of a General Election. In the world of nations, it is a year of war in Korea and continuing tensions between the Communist world and the relatively free world of the West. But perhaps most significant of all, certainly to the Rider and his constituents, is the gradually mounting tide of Spiritual Awakening which is beginning to be seen and experienced all across this continent and beyond!

Summer Institute 2009: Moving from Lament to Hope

DUKE DIVINITY SCHOOL'S first Summer Institute, offered by the Office of the Dean, encourages participants to re-imagine and re-envision their connection to Christianity within a broken world.

Scheduled for May 31 through June 5, the institute will explore a variety of methods for moving from lament to hope through faith. It has been designed for alumni, pastors, lay members of the church, and leaders from a variety of agencies and professions.

The Summer Institute will bring together concerned Christians for a time of reflection and dialogue in the cloistered campus setting of Duke University. Plenary speakers include Richard Lischer on spiritual autobiography, Jeremy L. Gregory Jones on leadership, John M. Perkins on reconciliation, Jeremy Begbie on theology through music, and Ira Byock, M.D., on conversations at life's end. The institute themes will center around the three tracks below. For a full faculty list, visit www.divinity.duke.edu/learningforlife/programs/summerinstitute/faculty.

"BUILDING HOPEFUL COMMUNITIES OF CARING AT LIFE'S END" will address the spiritual dimension of dying and focus on how communities can collaborate to care for those near death.

Faculty include Richard Payne, professor of medicine and divinity and director of the Duke Institute on Care at the End of Life; Ray Barfield, pediatric oncologist and associate professor of pediatrics and Christian philosophy; and Allen Verhey, professor of Christian ethics and author, editor, or co-editor of 12 books, including Reading the Bible in the Strange World of Medicine.

"SHAPING THE BELOVED COMMUNITY IN A DIVIDED WORLD" will explore the rewards and challenges of leadership in ministries of justice, peace, and reconciliation from theological, contextual, and practical perspectives.

Faculty include John Perkins, Mississippi civil rights activist and founder of the Christian Community Development Association; and Chris Rice and Emmanuel Katongole, co-directors of Duke's Center for Reconciliation. Rice is co-author of More than Equals: Racial Healing for the Sake of the Gospel with Spencer Perkins. Katongole is associate research professor of theology and world Christianity and the author, most recently, of A Future for Africa.

"NARRATING YOUR STORY WITHIN GOD'S STORY" will focus on inward reflection and community engagement by way of the ancient habits of lectio divina, the Eucharist, reading Scripture, and holy friendship.

Faculty include Richard Lischer, Cleland professor of preaching and the author of the theological memoir Open Secrets; and L. Gregory Jones, dean and professor of theology, and the author or editor of 13 books, including Everyday Matters: Intersections of Life and Faith. ■

THE DEADLINE FOR REGISTRATION is April 15, 2009.

Eight Join Board of Visitors

DUKE UNIVERSITY President Richard Brodhead has appointed eight new members to the Divinity School's 36-member Board of Visitors. James Harnish, a United Methodist pastor from Tampa, Fla., chairs the advisory group, which meets twice a year at Duke.

Lucinda Samford Cannon, of Opelika, Ala., is a real estate developer and educator active with local, state, and national associations of realtors. She serves on the boards of East Alabama Medical Center, Southern States Bank, Huntingdon College, and the W. James Samford Jr. Foundation, and coordinates "20 under 40," a program working with young adults to cultivate city leadership.

D. Stephen Lewis Jr. D'00, of Johns Creek, Ga., is a Baptist pastor and regional director with the Fund for Theological Education, where his work includes Project Rising Sun, a leadership academy for young pastors. He is co-facilitator of the Young Ministers' Roundtable and one of the Joshua Generation pastors with ABLE (Atlantans Building Leadership for Empowerment).

Brian K. Milford D'86, of Atlantic, Iowa, is superintendent of the Southwest District in the Iowa Annual Conference of the United Methodist Church. He has served parishes in Iowa and, for three years, in New Zealand. He has served on the St. Luke's Hospital Hospice board and the board of the Boy Scouts of America in Cedar Rapids.

Thomas J. Pace, of Houston, Texas, is senior pastor of St. Luke's United Methodist Church. He serves on boards with Interfaith Ministries in Houston, the Seniors Place, the Methodist Hospital Houston, the Methodist Mission Home in San Antonio, and is on the advisory board with Perkins School of Theology satellite programs in Houston and Galveston. He also chairs the board of ordained ministry for the Texas Conference.

Edwin S. Roberson, of Memphis, Tenn., is a United Methodist layman, chief executive officer of Novostem Therapeutics Inc., and chairman of Methodist LeBonheur Healthcare. He serves as treasurer of the Tennessee Republican Party and is the former finance chairman for U.S. Senators Bill Frist, Fred Thompson, and Lamar Alexander.

Connie Mitchell Shelton D'97, of Jackson, Miss., is senior pastor at Galloway United Methodist Church. She served as executive director of The United Methodist Hour radio and TV ministry from 1999 to 2005 in Mississippi and as co-director of Field Education at Duke Divinity with her husband, Joey, prior to their appointment to parish ministry in 2008.

Ashley Crowder Stanley T'77, D'80, of High Point, N.C., is senior minister at Wesley Memorial United Methodist Church. She has served in chaplaincy roles in Minneapolis, Minn., and Durham, as an adjunct faculty member at the Divinity School, and in parish ministry across western North Carolina. She is a former president of the Divinity School Alumni Association.

Kevin K. Wright D'08, of Charlotte, N.C., is minister of missions at Myers Park United Methodist Church and serves on the board of the South Tryon Community Coalition. He is serving as one of three recent-graduate members of the Board of Visitors.

Larry M. Goodpaster, of Charlotte, N.C., who is resident bishop of the Western North Carolina Conference of the United Methodist Church, joins the board as an ex officio member. ■

Responding to Domestic Violence

BY SHERRY WILLIAMSON

DURING INTRODUCTIONS at a "Responding to Domestic Violence" conference hosted in November by the Divinity School Women's Center, one participant asked to stand.

"This is the first time I've said this publicly: I am a survivor of domestic violence," said Denise [not her real name] in a shaky voice that grew stronger with each word. "I'm here because I want to learn everything I can to help save people."

Denise was among more than 40 participants at the conference led by the FaithTrust Institute about engaging community faith leaders in response to domestic violence.

A multifaith, international organization based in Seattle, Wash., the institute trains and educates congregations and faith leaders on religious issues related to sexual and domestic violence.

People in faith communities who want to educate and equip their clergy leaders to deal with domestic violence should start with their pastor, said the Rev. Dr. Aleese Moore-Orbih, director of training and consulting for FaithTrust.

The best approach is to find commonalities — such as the agreement that no one deserves to be abused and that Scripture should not be used to justify abuse.

"Remember that most of the time when clergy is not on board as an ally, it's not because they're against this type of work, but mostly because they either don't understand it or they already have too much on their plates," said Moore-Orbih.

If the pastor doesn't engage, she recommended trying the associate pastor, and if that fails, the women's ministry.

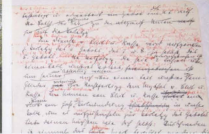

The conference concluded a series of Women's Center events to raise awareness about domestic violence. In addition to students, it was open to clergy and laity, educators, shelter workers, and health care and mental health professionals.

Students Stephanie Neve and Christa Mazzone Palmberg, who served as co-coordinators of the Women's Center, organized the events in collaboration with Professor of Theology & Women's Studies Mary McClintock Fulkerson, the center's faculty adviser.

Research indicates that in any congregation at least every third person has had some experience with domestic violence. "Religious teachings can either be roadblocks or resources in addressing domestic violence," says the Rev. Dr. Marie M. Fortune, the institute's founder and senior analyst.

"We want to help people understand the practical as well as the theological foundation of what needs to be done in those situations not only for the victim, but for the perpetrator and the family," Fortune says. ■

ELISABETH of BERLIN

BY BLAKE RADCLIFFE

AS CONTEMPORARIES whose resistance to Nazism came at great personal risk, Dietrich Bonhoeffer and Elisabeth Schmitz never met. While Bonhoeffer's courage has been documented since the end of World War II, evidence of Schmitz's defiance of Nazi ideology was lost for decades. The story of her heroism is just now being widely shared with the release of a documentary, Elisabeth of Berlin, which premiered at Duke.

Bishop Kenneth Carder, professor of the practice of Christian ministry, helped bring the film's world premiere to the Divinity School last October, with support from the United Methodist Board of Church and Society.

Schmitz was a lay member of the Confessing Church who had studied theology before becoming a history teacher, and her theological formation sharpened her critique of Nazism.

For divinity school students and alumni, Carder says, "This story teaches us that academic theology gives us the tools to participate in the great debates of our time, which demand great minds and courageous spirits to engage them."

The premiere was held in anticipation of the observance of the 70th anniversary of Kristallnacht, the Nov. 9, 1938, destruction of nearly every German synagogue and thousands of Jewish businesses. The presentation launched a year long series of forums at the Divinity School exploring the role of faith communities in civil society.

The series is led by Stephen Chapman, associate professor of Old Testament, who believes that Schmitz could see the outrageous treatment of the Jews because of her vantage point from the margins — both as a woman and as a lay member of the church.

"The stories of those on the periphery expand the imagination of what's possible to bear, and they also further our historical perspective," Chapman says.

"For pastors, a perennial issue is that of church and culture. The more powerful and comfortable that you become, the more difficult it is to see when persecution transpires."

Seventy years later, the size of these German congregations is not so important, he says. "We only care about how they failed to challenge the Nazis."

Elisabeth Schmitz (1893–1977) had studied theology at Humboldt University before becoming a public schoolteacher in Berlin. In 1935, she wrote a 24-page letter of protest and anonymously mailed 200 copies to the leadership of the Confessing Church.

Using theological language, Schmitz urged the Confessing Church to address the growing danger of Nazism. She timed the letter, mimeographed in her apartment, to arrive shortly before the Synod of Steglitz. The letter fell into the hands of Dietrich Bonhoeffer and Karl Barth, among others, but was not introduced at the synod.

Three years later, following Kristallnacht, Schmitz wrote to her pastor, Helmut Gollwitzer, urging him to denounce the violence. He agreed and became one of only a handful of pastors who condemned the injustice.

In the aftermath of the pogrom, Schmitz resigned, explicitly stating that she could no longer work for the Nazi state as a teacher expected to advance its ideology. In retirement, she was able to purchase a small countryside home from Jewish friends and use the site to hide others until they could escape to freedom. In each of these cases — especially her open letter, her resignation letter, and in her provision of refuge to Jews — she risked her life for others.

Despite her bravery, for decades after the war Schmitz led a simple life in anonymity, and when she died, seven people attended her funeral. During the past decade, she has become the subject of a biography, and the city of her birth, Hanau, has dedicated a memorial marker. On the 70th anniversary of Kristallnacht, German Chancellor Angela Merkel held up Schmitz as an example, calling her one of the few exceptions to the “silence that surrounded the pogrom.”

“This story teaches us that academic theology gives us the tools to participate in the great debates of our time, which demand great minds and courageous spirits to engage them.”

— BISHOP KENNETH CARDER

Elisabeth Schmitz's actions offer a central lesson to the church, Bishop Carder says. “The church has to live its own story but also engage the society in which it exists.

“Without a broad understanding of God's kingdom, political, economic, and social powers become controlled by self-interest. How did we let it happen that the imago dei in every person was not respected during slavery and then in Hitler's Germany? And today?”

The suffering of the Jews was not an abstraction for Schmitz, says Carder. “Walter Brueggeman's concept of the prophetic imagination grows out of our ability to grieve or lament. We enter into the suffering of another in a personal way. Seeing the other perspective deepens witness and lament and one's response.”

In Exodus 3:7, God hears the suffering of his nation and identifies with the oppressed, says Carder. “The disestablishment of the church is an opportunity. We belong in the margins.”

How are leaders of churches great and small to apply the lessons of Elisabeth Schmitz's life in their work and practice today? Some say even small efforts made in this direction will be of great consequence.

The Rev. Neal Christie, the assistant general secretary for education and leadership formation at the United Methodist General Board of Church and Society, described the board's support of the film in this context.

“Elisabeth ... ought to remind the church of the importance and ethical demand to advocate for others before the powers,” Christie says. “For the General Board of Church and Society, this is a core value and purpose.

“There is nonviolent power in a single letter written and circulated, much like there is power in petitions and campaigns that we circulate to our constituencies to demand justice for God's people.”

Steven Martin, the director of Elisabeth of Berlin, is a United Methodist extension minister in Oak Ridge, Tenn., and is one of Bishop Carder's former parishioners. He describes the practical lessons of Elisabeth Schmitz's life in terms of theology, and friendship.

“Goebbels said, ‘Everyone knows one good Jew, but we have to steel ourselves for the Jewish question.’ A lot of people chose his words over their friends' lives.

“After 12 years of relentless propaganda, it took a huge amount of clarity for Elisabeth Schmitz to see that a friend was a friend and that all the talk about the Jews was wrong. That is what is remarkable about her.

“Her friendship together with her theological training made the difference. The lesson of her piety is that you have to be steeped in the life of the church, and reach out to those that Jesus called ‘the least of these.’”

Bishop Carder finds in her story a call for regret and repentance, but also for hope. “One lone voice can make a difference,” he says. “The contribution multiplies, like the loaves and the fishes. Never underestimate what God can do with a little.” ■

LEADING LIVES

OF CONSEQUENCE

INSPIRED BY Duke Chapel's year long "Living Lives of Consequence" Dean's Dialogues, which began last fall with deans Sam Wells and Greg Jones, Divinity has devoted this edition to an exploration of four such lives.

Included are alumni Thomas J. Bickerton, a bishop whose vision of global health would end diseases of poverty in Africa, and Cynthia Hale, who bypassed the stained-glass ceiling as one of the few women leaders of a megachurch, and two recent additions to the faculty — Ray Barfield, a pediatric oncologist committed to better care for children at the end of life, and Norman Wirzba, whose teaching and writing explore the biblical imperative to care for creation.

As varied as these lives of consequence are, there are untold others, many lived quietly and obscurely. There are all those living in L'Arche communities founded by Jean Vanier, who rejected worldly success in the military and the academy to create homes for "the least of these." And there is Elisabeth Schmitz, whose courageous opposition to Nazi oppression is revealed in Elisabeth of Berlin, the documentary described on the preceding pages.

These stories underscore the Divinity School's growing commitment to developing and supporting wise, theologically grounded leadership for the church and other Christian institutions. This month, Leadership Education at Duke Divinity has launched Faith & Leadership, an online magazine dedicated to helping Christian leaders reflect, connect, and learn. This new resource for pastors, laity, and institutional leaders offers a rich mix of profiles, essays, video interviews, sermons, blog postings, and more.

children. An early champion of the effort, Bickerton rallied colleagues at United Methodist Communications, where he then served as president, and was soon enlisting the denomination's full support. (See p.14.) By late 2006, the people of the United Methodist Church had joined the United Nations Foundation, Sports Illustrated, and NBA Cares as founding partners of Nothing But Nets. A native of Wheeling, W.Va., who had never traveled outside the United States until his trip to Africa, Bickerton never dreamed he would battle malaria across the globe.

"This was one of those gifts that this office opens up, but that you can't predict," he says. "When Nothing But Nets came along, I had a world perspective that had been building since '86.

In 1986, the young West Virginia pastor was invited to join a 17-member team evaluating United Methodist missions in several African countries. During a visit to a local school, the entire class stood up and applauded when he entered their classroom. Bickerton, who was baffled by the response, turned with a questioning look to his host. "They think you are a professional basketball player," explained his Liberian colleague. As Bickerton was leaving, three small boys with a foam mini-basketball

"They think you are a professional basketball player," explained his Liberian colleague. As Bickerton was leaving, three small boys with a foam mini-basketball approached him and said, "Show us your moves, Mr. Missionary." "Luckily their hoops were lower than usual so I could do some jams, and they were impressed," says Bickerton. Twenty years later, Bishop Bickerton found himself standing court-side with former NBA player Sam Perkins and other pros. The link was Nothing But Nets. Lifesaving mosquito nets to African grassroots campaign to provide old United Methodist bishop for the Pittsburgh area is easily mistaken for a former basketball player. But Tom Bickerton, a self-described late bloomer who grew 4 inches and three shoe sizes in college, was never a standout on the hardwood. While he is an avid fan of Duke and pro basketball, he played his most impressive hoops more than two decades ago in a small village in Liberia.

FOR TOM BICKERTON, THE GOAL IS GLOBAL HEALTH

LEADING LIVES OF CONSEQUENCE

Mame Amissi Arriko hangs an insecticide-treated mosquito net in her home in Agboville, Côte d'Ivoire. In November, United Methodists from the church's Côte d'Ivoire and Texas annual conferences joined with partners to distribute 1 million bed nets to children of the West African nation.

ery system in Africa is not the government, but the church.

"We're the glue," says Bickerton. "Our partnership with Nothing But Nets represents a natural blending of sacred and secular agencies to achieve a common goal for the 21st century."

Bickerton's trip to Africa in 1986 was a long shot. When the 28-year-old pastor was invited to join a group evaluating United Methodist missionary teams in Liberia, Kenya, Tanzania, and Zimbabwe, he appealed to his congregation for support.

But his parishioners were less than enthusiastic. One woman, fearful for his safety, urged him not to go. The Sunday before the deadline to register for the trip, no money had come in, and Bickerton announced that he would decline the invitation. When he returned to his office, he found an unmarked envelope. Inside was a cashier's check for exactly the amount he needed.

"Whoever that person is — and I still don't know — changed my life," Bickerton says. "I came back a completely different person. My whole ministry changed."

His experiences in Africa broadened the scope of Bickerton's ministry, which to that point had not involved missions. He returned and began shaping a congregation with a global view of the church. He has since worked with Volunteers in Mission teams in his home state and throughout the world, including Russia, Israel, Argentina, and Mexico.

What struck him most about his first trip to Africa was the faith and joyfulness he encountered among people living in extreme poverty. On the flight home, he realized that he was returning to a country where most people had material abundance, but lacked the exuberant spirituality he so admired. "That contrast has intrigued me for 22 years," he says.

Elected in 2004 at the age of 46, Bickerton became the youngest active member of the U.S. episcopacy.

The tallest United Methodist bishop in the world with the largest shoe size, Bickerton is also considered one of the most optimistic.

"Knowing Tom in seminary and now as a bishop, one of his remarkable features is that he is relentlessly cheerful," Duke Divinity School Dean L. Gregory Jones says. "He has a 'can-do' attitude that is inspiring and hopeful, and that draws out the best in anyone around him."

Bickerton's cheerful determination is rooted in his upbringing in West Virginia, where his parents still live.

"In Appalachia you're bred knowing you don't have everything working for you, but you don't have to, because God has the full, wide picture in mind," Bickerton says. "If you trust in that, there's always a way through. I try every day to surrender to God's will for me."

Growing up, he was a frequent visitor to the glider on his paternal grandparents' back porch. On Sundays, he attended the United Methodist church with his Bickerton grandparents, who lived next door, and then headed for a home-cooked dinner at the nearby home of his mother's parents, whose families had immigrated a generation earlier from Lebanon.

"My Pappy and Nanny Bickerton formed my faith from a spiritual place, but my Cassis grandparents, who weren't Christian, were the kindest, most socially adept people I've ever known.

"Looking back, I got personal spiritual growth and an understanding of what it meant to be part of the world and to give back."

Five years after his appointment to the Western Pennsylvania Conference in the center of the Rust Belt, Bickerton retains his enthusiasm.

"I feel blessed to have come here from West Virginia, where I learned to understand what it means to lose security," says Bickerton. In 1998, his appointment as superintendent of the Wheeling District took him back to West Virginia's northern panhandle. Though the move returned him to his homeplace, Bickerton was dismayed to find himself in a landscape ravaged by the closings of steel mills and glass factories.

But the challenges there forged in him a sense of determination. "I try to bring a spirit of joy in the midst of cynicism," he says. "In many ways, the people of western Pennsylvania are very much like those people in Africa who have a joy and determination in the midst of their troubles.

"Pennsylvania was among the states that sent the most volunteer work teams to New Orleans following Katrina," Bickerton says. "They are the same folks who say, 'We're depressed; we don't have anything,' but when a disaster hits, they respond. My job is to remind them how much they can do."

Soon after he arrived at seminary, Bickerton forged a close relationship with Ken Goodson, the new bishop-in-residence.

"I'd drop in and talk with him and he'd talk about the yoke of obedience and what it meant to serve God. To this day, he remains my mentor and inspiration for ministry."

Among his Duke professors, Bickerton best remembers Tom Langford, Mickey Efrid, Moody Smith, John Westerhoff, and Frederick Herzog, whom he recalls as "operating with grace and gentleness."

UNITED, METHODISTS PARTNER TO ERADICATE MALARIA

BY JASON BYASSEE

UNITED METHODISTS are justly proud of their part as founding partners of Nothing But Nets, but the collaboration almost didn't happen.

Some in the church's leadership wanted to wait for a quadrennial General Conference to approve a mission of such scope and cost. Others feared it would compete for time and talent with their own mission projects. Still others worried about partnering with secular organizations like the United Nations and Sports Illustrated. (Would the cross-and-flame logo appear in the swimsuit issue?)

"It all moved faster than we like to move," Bishop Tom Bickerton explains. "Because we had not actively partnered with a secular agency in the past, there were several issues that had to be ironed out in order to move forward."

Between Bickerton's leadership and Nets' record of success, opposition within the church dissolved. To date, United Methodists have contributed more than $6 million of the $23 million the campaign has raised.

The Nothing But Nets brand began as the headline for a May 2006 Sports Illustrated column about malaria by Rick Reilly, who urged his readers to "Buy a net and save a life." In response, contributions poured in, eventually reaching $1.2 million.

It helped that support from United Methodists began rolling in before Nets became an official ministry. Part of the campaign's appeal is its price point. A $10 contribution buys and distributes a net that can protect a family for up to four years. The $60 average contribution from someone in a United Methodist pew — about the cost of dinner out for a U.S. family — can save six families in Africa.

And the church didn't have to launch the campaign, adds Bickerton. "The United Nations Foundation approached us."

It did so largely because of Elizabeth Gore, executive director for Global Alliances at the United Nations Foundation. A lifelong United Methodist and member of Foundry Church in Washington, D.C., Gore recognized the potential of Nothing But Nets to take her foundation's Malaria Initiative to a new level. She quickly had Sports Illustrated and the National Basketball Association (NBA) signed on.

The problem, Gore soon realized, was that malaria has no constituency. The NBA has millions of fans, but no members. Her church had those — with more than three million professing Methodists in Africa, with able leaders on the ground in the form of bishops, and distribution networks in the form of congregations.

And he appreciates that Duke is still teaching him, especially through the Episcopal Leadership Forum and other efforts of the school to support church leaders.

"Duke cared enough to want to help form bishops as we're trying to lead the church. They realized that we needed an incubator to stimulate conversation on how to lead — not telling us how to lead — but helping us explore how to lead in the midst of big ideas."

The answers to contemporary problems must come from many sources, he says. "All of us have gifts to share. Local church pastors have answers we bishops don't have; laity have answers that pastors can't generate. We need to listen and to align ourselves in such a way that we can walk into the future together."

While he is grateful for the leadership of his many mentors, Bickerton says he's now "looking down rather than up." What he sees gives him more hope than ever.

"I get awestruck by some of my young clergy who are identifying with the emerging generation and willing to take this church into the 21st century. They are out there making the church come alive in the world."

He points to Mt. Lebanon United Methodist Church Associate Pastor Kimberly Greway, who served in Zimbabwe as a Peace Corps volunteer before earning her M.Div. at Duke in 2005.

Greway is a charter member of The Nyadire Connection, a nonprofit dedicated to supporting the United Methodist mission complex about 100 miles northeast of Zimbabwe's capital city of Harare.

"I see young people like Kim, who are showing us how to do missions," Bickerton says. "And I look at what the Texas Conference is doing in Côte d'Ivoire."

He applauds the partnership between Bishop Janice Huie's Texas Annual Conference and the Côte d'Ivoire Conference. "People are working in hospitals and clinics, passing out bed nets with no concern about their own pensions or health care benefits. What they are concerned about is making the world a better place. Those are the heroes of the world today." ■

Gore contacted United Methodist Communications, where both general secretary Larry Hollon and Bickerton, who served as president, quickly saw the campaign's promise and soon had colleagues on board. During 2007, the campaign's first year, Bickerton traveled the country, rallying grassroots support among United Methodists in Miami, Washington, D.C., Chicago, Houston, Detroit, and Minneapolis.

"Bishop Bickerton has worked tirelessly for this," Gore said. "He hasn't slept in two years. We really need to thank his wife, Sally."

Part of the campaign's strength is its unifying effect on the whole church.

Gore notes that her grandmother's tiny, rural, conservative church in Whitesboro, Texas, and her own Foundry UMC "could not be more different." One is conservative, the other liberal; one rural, the other urban; one "closed-minded, the other open."

And "both are so into this campaign," Gore said. ■

LEADING LIVES OF CONSEQUENCE

CYNTHIA HALE'S RAY OF HOPE

BY KEN GARFIELD

AT A NEIGHBORHOOD evangelism program in her hometown of Roanoke, Va., 9-year-old Cynthia Hale turned to an adult family friend and asked, "Is God like my father?"

"Yes," the friend told her, "he is just like your father."

Nearly 50 years after that day when she accepted Christ, Cynthia Hale is the founding pastor of 5,100-member megachurch in Decatur, Ga., with a budget of $4.5 million. A profound achievement for any pastor, it is virtually unheard of among African-American women in a world where race and gender remain challenges to leadership in and out of the church.

There were obstacles along the way, including skeptics who questioned her call. "Some people are just negative," says Hale. "They'll try to shut your dreams down. I've always believed that I, along with other people, could change the world for Christ."

Hale began Ray of Hope Christian Church in 1986 with a small Bible study in her living room. Today, The Ray's two Sunday morning services average 1,500 worshippers, many drawn by the charisma and widening reputation of its leader.

According to Mark Chaves, Duke professor of sociology, religion, and divinity and head of the National Congregations Study, those figures make Hale an exception on multiple levels.

Based on the 2006-07 survey of 1,506 U.S. congregations, Hale's The Ray is among just 10 percent of American churches led by women. And the larger the church, the less likely a woman is in the pulpit. A 1998 survey of 1,234 U.S. congregations revealed that just 4 percent of churches with more than 350 regularly participating adults had a woman in charge.

While African-American women have had some success in getting their own churches, Chaves said many of these congregations are small and outside of mainstream denominations.

Such numbers mean little at The Ray. When members are asked whether a woman is able to preach the word, Hale says their response is short and sweet: "She does it every Sunday."

Cynthia Hale D'79 leads two morning worship services each Sunday at Ray of Hope Christian Church. As founder and senior pastor, she has attracted a membership of 5,100.

Going Her Own Way

When Hale lost out on a job to lead a church of 25, she realized it was going to be difficult for a woman to get a pulpit no matter its size. So she started her own.

Independence is a hallmark of Hale's leadership. While many other megachurches have shed denominational ties, The Ray is content to remain in the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ). The lay leaders appreciate that their denomination allows them to interpret Scripture for themselves. It allows a church like The Ray to embrace a style of its own, says Hale.

Yet there's nothing unorthodox about The Ray's mission, which is "to bring people into a personal relationship with Christ and then send them back into the world." The church offers literally hundreds of classes and ministries, and worship might best be described as high-energy.

Members embrace Hale's challenge to worship, learn, and serve. And they are fiercely proud that their spiritual leader is also a trailblazer.

When Hale shared that she had been invited to pray from the podium at the Democratic National Convention in Denver, the congregation erupted in applause. Hale stumped for Barack Obama and was part of a weekly conference call in which pastors prayed for him. The opportunity to lead a prayer at the historic convention, she says, was the highlight of her career.

On Sundays, the upbeat vibes are unmistakable as Hale shares hugs and conversation with folks between services outside the auditorium-style sanctuary.

Will Finch first met Hale 13 years ago at a church in Euclid, Ohio. She was there to speak. He was the guy who was supposed to turn on the microphone, supposed being the operative phrase: "She has a look that she gives people like, 'You better get it together.'"

Having seen the no-nonsense side of Hale, today he drives 50 minutes from his home in Loganville, Ga., because he is drawn to her more pastoral side. He has gone from 325 to 265 pounds after Hale preached on the importance of exercising and

The civil rights struggle and the murders of JFK and Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. opened her eyes to the harshness of the world beyond Roanoke, Va. In her own life, that harshness took the form of people's doubts thrown in her face.

JOHANNETA R. FLEIDER-PITTS

She appreciated how professors including Tom Langford, Roland Murphy, and John Westerhoff made the Bible come alive.

Westerhoff, who served as Hale's spiritual director, retired to Atlanta, where he is resident theologian at St. Anne's Episcopal Church. Duke might have served Hale well, he said, but she came to Durham with the potential to do special things in the pulpit.

"She was one of those students who stood out," says Westerhoff. "She always brought a creative edge to everything, something new, something original that wasn't just giving back the facts and information."

Don't be fooled by the fact that she leads a church whose worship style is "free and easy," as Westerhoff describes it. Beyond the emotion and theater that is part of the texture of the black church experience, he believes Hale's ministry is grounded in what she learned at Duke.

Theology and theater?

"She can do those things together," says Westerhoff.

Hale recalls debates at seminary about whether women were called to preach. But the arguments of doubters were doused by the weight of the evidence.

"The women there," she said, "were such strong preachers and such strong partners in ministry. The doubters had to get over it."

'A Magnificent Presence'

Hale spent seven years as a chaplain with the Federal Bureau of Prisons, work that she says prepared her to handle budgets and bureaucracy. Working with criminals also toughened her to the point that the unpredictable life of a megachurch leader does not faze her. She can, by all accounts, run a meeting, put out fires, and deal with the politics and personalities that are part of every church.

On a typical Sunday, after preaching two back-to-back services, Hale returns to her office wiping away tears. During the second service, a first-time visitor dressed in cut-off blue jeans had answered the altar call.

When Hale asked the men of the church to come forward to pray for him, more than 100 men responded, enveloping the stranger in prayer. Soon, Hale, the men, and the rest of the congregation realized the man was deaf.

"That's what got to me," says Hale afterward. "We had to communicate God's love to him through sign language." It was not the first time, says Hale, that she had been moved to tears in the sanctuary.

Yet more often than she cries, Hale laughs — either over something at church or in her life. Her willingness to reveal and share what she is feeling and thinking endears her to many, says former Duke classmate Michael Battle D'76, president of the Interdenominational Theological Center in Atlanta. "Cynthia Hale has a magnificent presence in the pulpit that demands attention."

It is nearly 1 p.m. Hale has been at church since the sun came up. She's preached two sermons and she's shed tears. But she is soon smiling as she raises her arms high in a V and says, "The congregation loves when I do this. That's my signature 'Hallelujah!'"

Hallelujah.

That one word, an exclamation in her case, is the answer to the question she posed as a 9-year-old: "Is God like my father?"

It is her response to the challenges she meets in life.

It is an expression of the call that caught fire at Duke.

Every time she faced a question about her call or her qualifications to start a church, she'd look to God.

"I always felt God leading me to respond, 'You tell them I called you.'" ■

LEADING LIVES OF CONSEQUENCE

RAY BARFIELD'S EPIPHANY OF PRESENCE

BY JONATHAN GOLDSTEIN

WHEN RAY BARFIELD was a second-year resident at Eggleston Children's Hospital in Atlanta, he learned how parents and doctors alike can lose sight of what's most important when a child is terminally ill.

Barfield was part of a team at the hospital — affiliated with Emory University School of Medicine — treating the 3-year-old son of an Emory pediatrician and faculty member. The child was in the intensive care unit, suffering from a relapse of neuroblastoma, an aggressive childhood cancer that is nearly always fatal when it recurs.

Barfield watched as other doctors, especially the boy's mother, proposed increasingly invasive treatments — even some that had proved ineffective against neuroblastoma. Meanwhile, the child was sullen, stuck in a sterile room, connected by uncomfortable leads and tubes to monitors, intravenous fluid bags, and other equipment. All the while he was running out of time.

"We were just desperate to treat this child," Barfield says. "He was in pain because of what we were doing, and no one was dealing with the fact that he was going to die. Almost no one survives a relapse of neuroblastoma."

Finally, the boy's mother — a mentor to Barfield — realized that medical intervention wasn't working. She took her son home, where he could spend his final hours with loved ones in familiar surroundings, his pain controlled by morphine.

"At home, his grouchiness went away," says Barfield, who is affiliated with the Institute on Care at the End of Life (ICEOL) at Duke Divinity School. "He had two or three good days with his family, and then he died peacefully."

It was a defining experience for Barfield, who last fall joined the faculty of the Divinity School and the Duke University School of Medicine and is developing a new model of pediatric care. Cooperating with physicians, nurses, faculty, and administrators from across the university, Barfield is working to help practitioners and families make better choices for children who are chronically or terminally ill.

In some cases, that means guiding families and physicians to the difficult conclusion that the time for hospitals, medicines, and surgeries is over. Sometimes a child is going to die, Barfield says. Accepting that can mean the difference between a death in which the child is comfortable at home, surrounded by family, friends, and spiritual support, or a death in a chaotic hospital environment, distracted by painful medical treatments.

His work also aims at involving congregations before a terminally ill child is just hours or days away from death. That way the church can provide much needed support, offering something as simple as prayer or as complex as helping the family choose the kind of care they want for their child.

Barfield's work complements the ongoing efforts of ICEOL, which will soon release The Unbroken Circle: A Toolkit for Congregations Around Illness, End of Life, and Grief.

This new resource for clergy, lay leaders, and health care providers will help them address end-of-life care in congregations, says director Richard Payne, a physician with many years experience caring for terminally ill patients.

"The model that Ray is creating and the toolkit we've developed for congregations make a powerful combination," Payne says. "We're giving children and families a better opportunity to find the support they need from the church, as well as from medical practitioners."

An associate professor of pediatrics and Christian philosophy, Barfield grew up wanting to become a doctor. But in college, he discovered philosophy and literature and decided to become a philosopher/novelist.

He deferred graduate study in philosophy at Columbia University for a year of travel in Europe with a backpack full of books and his guitar.

"During that time I occasionally stayed with the father of a friend — a professor of obstetrics and gynecology in Tübingen, Germany," says Barfield. "Those encounters reintroduced me to the thrill of medicine."

During a six-week stay on a Greek island in the Aegean Sea, he decided to do both medicine and philosophy, starting with medicine.

"Now I practice medicine on one side of Duke's campus, do Christian philosophy on the other side, and scribble novels secretly from 5 to 7 a.m. at home."

Barfield began his work at Duke last semester with a flurry of one-on-one meetings across the university. In six weeks he sat down with more than 40 doctors, professors, nurses, administrators, chaplains, and others whose work intersects with the care of chronically or terminally ill children.

His goal was simultaneously simple and profound: to sow the seeds for a culture of care that focuses on the whole child rather than simply attacking disease.

"Physicians are devoted, committed, good people," Barfield says. "But often Barfield says care for seriously ill children should involve nurses, doctors, clergy, hospice personnel, and others cooperating to meet the physical, emotional, and spiritual needs of the patient and his or her family.

they haven't been given the tools to think about whole people."

This manifests in many ways, he says. Sometimes children are given treatments without enough, or any, attention to relieving their pain. Overwhelmed by a huge number of patients, doctors may visit a child's hospital room without really being present with the patient and family. And both physicians and parents often fail to see when a different kind of care, such as hospice, is needed.

"We become myopic in the hospital," he says. "We think in terms of treating organ systems instead of how people experience illness. The way you achieve a good end of life is thinking about how to live well."

Barfield, whose clinical work focuses on Duke Children's Hospital & Health Center, has convened a variety of working groups to begin addressing some of the most important issues in improving the quality of care for children. Their topics include symptom management and reducing suffering, bereavement and end-of-life care, building bridges to hospice and churches, best practices in controlling suffering, improving communication among and between caregivers and families, and engaging parents to learn from their experiences.

A key to pursuing change is to work with those who spend the most time with patients, especially nurses, chaplains, and social workers.

"People often target culture change at the top of a system," Barfield says. "But care begins at the bedside. That's the place to start. That's where there is energy and more impetus for change."

Anthony Galanos, an associate professor of medicine in the division of geriatric medicine in the Duke University Medical Center, says Barfield's approach is promising.

Galanos, who already had been working to establish a care service for chronically and terminally ill children at Duke, is now a close collaborator with Barfield.

"A pediatric quality of life program not only will make more practitioners aware of suffering, but also of living — and what the practice of medicine can mean for all practitioners, from the respiratory therapist to the nurse to the doc to the housekeeper," Galanos says. "We all need a culture, a set of guidelines, to help us be the best we can be at caring for children."

Tonya Armstrong, an adjunct assistant professor with ICEOL, adds that the pediatric quality of life program

THE HERITAGE SOCIETY OF DUKE UNIVERSITY

TO HONOR THOSE WHO INCLUDE DUKE IN THEIR FINANCIAL AND ESTATE PLANNING

The Heritage Society honors the graduates and friends who make provisions for Duke in their will or through another type of planned gift.

Vital support for Duke University Divinity School is derived increasingly from individuals whose careful estate planning reflects their faithful stewardship of personal resources. Planned giving provides the opportunity to make more generous contributions than one might be able to afford during one's lifetime. These gifts are of lasting value and can provide for scholarships, professorships, the library, and other essential programs. Current statistics indicate that 80 percent of the general population has no will or other estate plan document. Christian stewardship requires that we do better. The newsletter Planned Philanthropy, which is distributed three times per year by the Divinity School, provides important information as a starting point for personal financial planning.

We are deeply grateful for the faithful stewardship that underwrites ministerial education at Duke. We wish to keep the Heritage Society roster current. Please contact the Divinity School if you wish to be included.

While additional members have indicated a preference to remain anonymous, the Divinity School is very pleased to recognize these members of the Heritage Society of Duke University.

MESSAGE FROM THE DEAN

This Annual Report recognizes and celebrates the many alumni, students, friends, churches, and foundations that provide support for programs and ministries of Duke Divinity School. We are especially grateful for financial support for our students as they seek to become vibrant leaders who will spread the Gospel's transformative message. We thank you for your faithful support of Duke Divinity School—where Christian leaders are prepared, renewed, and sustained for ministry.

Gratefully, L. Gregory Jones, Dean

have many patients and little free time. After he completes his rounds each week, Barfield makes a point of holding “teaching sessions” about engaging each patient and family. He also invites younger doctors to join him for some conversations with patients and their families.

“The new physicians are struggling with a lot, and there’s not as much room in their lives to think about the profound nature of working with sick, dying children,” he says. “But we can keep that conversation going.”

Barfield has spent a great deal of time considering what it means to work with dying children. Before coming to Duke Divinity School, he spent eight years working in oncology and bone marrow transplantation at St. Jude Children’s Research Hospital in Memphis, Tenn.

One patient in particular left a deep impression on Barfield.

Ali Mills was a 12-year-old girl with a big smile and a deep faith in God when Barfield met her at the hospital in 2004. She had survived neuroblastoma as a 5-year-old, and her family thought she had beaten the disease.

When the cancer returned, Ali underwent a bone-marrow transplant at St. Jude, and she eventually became Barfield’s patient.

Ali’s treatment went on for months, and Barfield found he was spending more and more time with her and her mother, Nancy.

Sometimes he would just come by to chat. Sometimes he would sing to Ali, who got a kick out of hearing Barfield sing the theme song to the SpongeBob SquarePants cartoon. Other times the conversation was more serious, focusing on the spiritual. Ali’s church eventually arranged for her to be baptized in her hospital room.

“Typically, doctors don’t serve as deep witnesses for their patients,” Barfield says. “They write orders, put

‘How We Die in America’

POLITICAL COMMENTATOR and author Eleanor Clift will join Duke Institute on Care at the End of Life Director Richard Payne on March 24 for a public conversation on issues surrounding how we die in America.

Clift’s most recent book, Two Weeks of Life: A Memoir of Love, Death, and Politics (2008), chronicles the end of her husband’s battle with cancer, which coincided with the controversial Terri Schiavo “right to die” case.

The book alternates between these two stories to provide a commentary on how we deal, or fail to deal, with dying in modern American life.

Formerly Newsweek’s White House correspondent, Clift also served as a congressional and political correspondent for six years. She is a regular panelist on the syndicated talk show The McLaughlin Group and serves as a political analyst for several news networks.

The event, to be held in Goodson Chapel at 5 p.m., will be preceded by a reception and book signing at 4 p.m. Both events are free and open to the public.

Sponsors include the Duke Institute on Care at the End of Life, Duke Divinity School’s Richard A. Gooding Memorial Endowment Fund, the Mary Duke Biddle Foundation, and the Kenan Institute for Ethics.

out fires, and get ready for the next day. In 15 years as a physician I had never really witnessed suffering. For the first time I got a direct experience of what it’s like to suffer — not for the week that I’m on service, but week after week after week.”

Ali died shortly after her 13th birthday, her body damaged beyond repair first by the cancer itself and then by chemotherapy and other harsh treatments. Barfield spoke at her funeral in Memphis. Her photo, perpetually grinning and youthful, sits on his office bookshelf, a reminder of what she taught him.

Through this and other experiences at St. Jude, Barfield refined his thinking about how medical practitioners can work with families, clergy, and others to best support their patients. There he began to formulate the questions and ideas that he’s now exploring at Duke.

Barfield sees involvement of the church as natural.

“For centuries this was the church’s domain: frailty, illness, fear, and grief,” Barfield says. “In recent years the church has relinquished much of that to the hospitals.”

That conviction comes from his own faith life as well as his experience in the medical world. The son of a Presbyterian minister, Barfield has great respect for theological inquiry. His wife, Karen, is an Episcopal priest.

The opportunity to work with the Institute on Care at the End of Life, whose work crosses disciplinary boundaries and focuses on the intersection of spirituality and medicine, especially attracted him to Duke.

“The institute is working on tools to help clergy in training and in the field to take a greater role in helping people — even those with terminal illness — live well in hopeful communities,” Barfield says. “We can’t just rely on the hospital at the end of life. It’s about a continuum, with the hospital, hospice, home health care, and congregations. That’s how you ensure a good end to life.” ■

NORMAN WIRZBA ON TAKING CARE OF CREATION

BY SHERRY WILLIAMSON

AS A NEW PROFESSOR of philosophy at Georgetown College in the mid-'90s, Norman Wirzba asked a Kentucky native what he should read to get a sense of place.

The friend recommended The Unsettling of America, a book by writer and farmer Wendell Berry that tells the story of agriculture's transformation into an industrial enterprise, and explains why it's so destructive.

The book ended up giving Wirzba an unexpected sense of home — reminding him of the Canadian farm where he was raised and eventually witnessed such destruction firsthand — and a sense of Kentucky, where he became one of the country's best-known "ecological theologians."

"As I was reading his book, I immediately realized that Wendell was giving voice to the same concerns that I understood implicitly but had never articulated," says Wirzba. "In many ways, it was the story of my own growing up."

Berry's description of agrarianism, a social and political philosophy that describes the cultivation of plants and the care of animals, or farming, as a means to a fuller and happier life, led Wirzba to think differently about his own work. As he continued reading Berry's works, he began to examine theological and philosophical questions and traditions in a new way. He also developed a close friendship with Berry and has since collaborated with him on numerous projects.

"Theologically, agrarianism has given me ways to think about what it means to be a creature in creation with other creatures," he says. "Philosophically, it has given me a way to think about what the good of human life is, and what are the practical skills we need to become responsible as Christians in creation."

As Duke Divinity School's first research professor of theology, ecology, and rural life, Wirzba is now extending the work he began in Kentucky — trying to understand the place of human beings in the world.

And that place, Wirzba believes, is in gardens.

"Gardens are microcosms of the world in which human life and the forces of a creative and productive life meet,” he says. “As we eat, drink, and breathe we are bound to the biochemical processes at work in a garden for not only our benefit, but our survival. Gardens, and by extension farms and the land, are the places where our bodies and souls are fed.”

What does Christianity have to do with gardening?

Everything, says Wirzba, who is currently teaching courses on “Food, Eating, and the Life of Faith” and “Theology and Ecology.”

It was no accident that Scripture located the first human drama in a garden — the Garden of Eden, literally the “garden of delight,” he says. In Genesis, God charged people to “till and keep” the garden, thus giving them their most fundamental identity and vocation.

“A garden is the place where people first taste and fully sense the grace of God — with their eyes, mouths, noses, ears, and fingers — and Scripture tells us that this goodness of God is not only to be received but shared.”

Scripture communicates the idea that people’s relationship to the earth is like a marriage in that it’s a faith agreement, a covenant with the animals and land to take care of them and help create conditions in which they can be most fully the way that God wants them to be, says Wirzba.

Preserving healthy gardens and the work of gardening is essential not only because people have to eat to live, but because the world is facing an unprecedented and widespread ecological disaster. “Ecologists are warning of the possibility that someday we won’t be able to feed ourselves,” he says. “It’s terrifying.”

Making the situation even more precarious is that more people worldwide live in urban areas than in the country for the first time in human history. The result, says Wirzba, is increased estrangement from ourselves as biological beings and a loss of understanding of biological rhythms and ecological realities.

While most urban dwellers have been taught to think of food as a commodity that is available anytime they want it, exactly how they want it, and under their complete control, “gardening shows you that life comes as a gift, always.”

Wirzba learned that and other “gardening” lessons following in the footsteps of his grandfather on the family’s 400-acre farm in Alberta, Canada, where they raised cattle, wheat, barley, and alfalfa using traditional practices. He recalls the unhurried rhythm of each day as they did the hard but satisfying work.

When his family opened a small cattle feedlot, Wirzba quickly saw how even such small scale industrial farming was destructive to land and animals. In order to fatten large quantities of cattle for sale to a processing facility, a feedlot takes cattle off pastures and puts them in confinement where they are fed grain, silage, or corn. This requires the use of fertilizers and pesticides, growing only one type of crop on farmland, more acreage, and large machinery.

“I saw that farms cannot be sustained on this model of getting bigger and bigger to survive economically,” says Wirzba, whose experience led him to reject farming as a career. “It also makes farming no longer enjoyable, but stressful. Good farming, like my grandfather did, has at its core the care of animals and the land as its first priority.”

In college, Wirzba majored in history until “falling in love” with theology and philosophy. After earning a Ph.D. in philosophy, he taught at Northern Illinois University and Loyola University in Chicago and at St. Thomas More College at the University of Saskatchewan in Canada. He then went to Georgetown as an assistant professor in the Department of Philosophy and later became the department chair.

Although he rejected farming as a career, Wirzba did become a theological gardener of sorts. “I am trying today to perform my work in the spirit of my grandfather’s work. It is the spirit I try to carry into my garden — both literally and figuratively,” he says.

Wirzba’s research, teaching, and writing interests are at the intersection of theology, philosophy, ecology, and agrarian studies. He focuses on understanding and promoting practices to equip rural and urban church communities to be more faithful and responsible members of creation.

As Christians start thinking more seriously about eating and food production, Wirzba hopes they will demand changes in the economy to create a more just food system — one in which all people can eat, farmers are properly compensated, and the land and animals are treated with care and respect.

Some, including Wirzba and his family, are planting their own gardens and buying local and organic foods when possible. After moving to Hillsborough last fall, the Wirzba family planted strawberries, raspberries, and other fruits, and prepared raised beds for spring planting of tomatoes, lettuce, beans, and other vegetables.

The growth of community-supported agriculture, in which urbanites and “Neither life nor food comes cheap. Until we see how precious life is, we’re not going to develop the kinds of affections and responsibilities we need to take care of it.”

churches partner with farmers to support sustainable agriculture, is a positive sign. There’s also a back-to-the-land movement in which young people are committed to small-scale agriculture that is supplemented by other income.

“It’s hard to argue against the good of a garden,” says Wirzba. “Once people get involved they witness the miracle and fragility of life, learning that sacrifice is at the heart of eating. Neither life nor food comes cheap. Until we see how precious life is, we’re not going to develop the kinds of affections and responsibilities we need to take care of it.”

Wirzba knows that none of these ideas is new. They have been indigenous to farm-based communities in all cultures and are central in all the great religious traditions. But worldwide growth of the ecological movement over the past 20 years has helped people realize their commonality in depending on food to survive.

“We’ve been sucked into this consumerist model and forgotten what our faith traditions have to say about eating,” says Wirzba. “Instead of focusing on the things that divide us, we can rally together to prevent millions of people from starving and millions of acres of land from being degraded.”

Wirzba’s not suggesting that everyone become a farmer. But he wants everyone to be aware of what’s at stake.

“We want not only to be able to eat, but we want to remain true to what God has called us to do — take care of creation.” ■

The Bible Goes Green

IS THE GOSPEL GREEN? The publishers of The Green Bible, which has more than 1,000 scriptural references to the earth and caring for creation highlighted in green ink, believe so.

Published in 2008 by HarperCollins, The Green Bible is not another translation but a new edition of the New Revised Standard Version of the Bible. The editors have highlighted passages they deemed to be of significance to environmental and ecological issues, similar to the “red-letter” editions that print Jesus’ direct statements in red.

The Green Bible contains a foreword by Archbishop Desmond Tutu and essays from respected theologians and conservationists worldwide, including Ellen Davis, professor of Bible and practical theology at Duke Divinity School, Pope John Paul II, and Wendell Berry.

The new edition also contains inspirational quotes from Christian teachings, a topical index, and a study guide. It is printed on recycled paper, using soy-based ink, and sports a cotton/linen cover.

“The awareness of the physical world as God’s creation is pervasive in the Bible — both the flourishing as well as the destruction or threat of destruction to creation,” says Davis. “You see it throughout the Old Testament, as well as in the New Testament, although it is less pronounced there.”

Davis says the publication of The Green Bible marks the growing recognition in the last decade that faith communities need to be part of the solution to the environmental crisis and have resources to address the problem.

“Scripture is saying that we are embodied and physically located people in our relation to God,” she explains, “and the well-being of physical creation is not separable from the integrity of our relationship to God. If our notions of spirituality deny the physicality of the larger world on which our lives depend, then we are deluding ourselves.” ■

Race: A Theological Account

BY J. KAMERON CARTER, Associate Professor of Theology and Black Church Studies
Oxford University Press, 2008, Hardcover, 504 pages, $35.00

REVIEWED BY CHERYL J. SANDERS

In his impressive first book, Race: A Theological Account, J. Kameron Carter pretty much accomplishes what he sets out to do, namely, to expose and explain how Christian theology and theologians have served the interests of slavery, colonialism, and other manifestations of white racism from the 18th century to the present. His account, however, involves much more than a critique designed to dismantle oppressive structures and ideas; he boldly exemplifies some new and different approaches to theological discourse that actually seek to remedy the problem of race. Carter respectfully acknowledges prior efforts of leading scholars of black religion and theology to address the racial dilemma in theology and culture. Yet, he demonstrates a welcome awareness of the shortcomings of black liberation theology and historical religious studies because of their failure to engage the depth of theological investigation and inquiry necessary to leverage a recovery of scholarship that is neither defined nor limited by the cultural and intellectual dominance of those who discount the humanity of the darker peoples of the world.

I found the scope of Carter's work

Abingdon Press, September 2008
Paper, 196 pages, $20.00

WHILE CONTEMPORARY pastors are called to speak from the pulpit and in public to those who don't always want to hear what they have to say, they also are called to speak the truth of God in Jesus Christ. Wells urges clergy to preach the Scripture in a manner that is both intellectually generous and authentically faithful and invites listeners to choose, with conviction and humility, how their own stories will be heard.

Edited by BEVERLY ROBERTS GAVENTA and RICHARD B. HAYS
George Washington Ivey Professor of New Testament
Eerdmans, October 2008
Paperback, 336 pages, $28.00

SEEKING THE IDENTITY OF JESUS gathers an interdisciplinary group of leading scholars — from the fields of biblical studies, theology, and church history — to focus on the complex problems surrounding the quest for the historical Jesus. Their perspectives are informed by Scripture, testimony from the church's past, and experience of the risen Jesus in the present.

to be absolutely breathtaking. His bibliography of ancient, modern, and postmodern sources spans many centuries and vantage points, supplemented by thorough text notes and a fairly comprehensive index. I frequently turned to the index to review key topics and names that surfaced in the text. Carter's train of thought is explicitly Christocentric, and the reader with little or no recent acquaintance with Christology and the history of Christian thought may struggle through the text, especially Part I.

But patience will be richly rewarded by a wealth of insights and analyses that cohere in a passionate investigation of how Christianity facilitated European conquest and policies of racial subjugation. Carter's tone is neither strident nor arrogant. Given that the nature of his topic demands extensive explication, he intersperses the text with prologue, prelude, interlude, postlude, and epilogue to keep the reader

Scripture, Culture, and Agriculture: An Agrarian Reading of the Bible

By ELLEN F. DAVIS

Professor of Bible and Practical Theology
Cambridge University Press,
October 2008
Paper, 238 pages, $23.99

ELLEN DAVIS'S NEW collection of essays explores Scripture's pervasive concern for the care of arable land. In so doing it develops a theology and ethics of land use through critical biblical exegesis. Davis's work explores the theme that we came from the earth and will return to it, and therefore we must care for it as a divine creation. Davis finds that many images of beauty in the Bible — in the Prophets, the Psalms, and the Song of Songs — show a righteous people living in harmony with the land and in full intimacy with God.

The Fourth Gospel in Four Dimensions

By D. MOODY SMITH

George Washington Ivey Professor Emeritus of New Testament
University of South Carolina Press,
October 2008
Paper, 286 pages, $29.95

THIS COLLECTION of D. Moody Smith's seminal works from the past two decades focuses on the four major issues that define contemporary studies of John. Smith places the Gospel within its Jewish milieu, examines the relationship between John and the historical figure of Jesus, considers John's account against the Synoptic Gospels, and explores how the Gospels, especially John's, became Scripture and are now interpreted in conjunction with one another.

Restoring Hope: Decent Care in the Midst of HIV/AIDS

Edited by JEFFREY V. LAZARUS,

TED KARP, TODD FERGUSON

and ROBIN SWIFT, Director,
Duke Clergy Health Initiative
Palgrave Macmillan, November 2008
Hardcover, 192 pages, $74.95

IN RESTORING HOPE, Robin Swift and her fellow editors have gathered essays that explore the concept of “decent care” based on philosophical and religious definitions of dignity, respect, agency, and integrity. Swift draws on her earlier experience working with HIV patients to illustrate the personal journey that one undertakes in caring for those with the disease. This book re-examines assumptions about health care and urges caregivers to support HIV patients to become full partners in designing and implementing their own health plans. ■ apprised of various twists and turns in the flow of his argument.

Carter brings a relentless logic to his analysis of the problem of Christology and race. His overall approach to the topic bears a striking symmetry, which comes across as clever but not contrived. What he does is to interrogate the writings of three figures from classical antiquity, Irenaeus, the anti-Gnostic intellectual, Gregory of Nyssa, the abolitionist intellectual, and Maximus the Confessor, the anti-colonialist intellectual; three early Afro-Christians from the slavery period, Briton Hammon, Frederick Douglass, and Jarena Lee; and three contemporary African-American scholars, Albert Raboteau, James Cone, and Charles Long. Rather than put all nine into conversation with each other, Carter enlists and interprets each of their contributions in light of his goal of recovering the radical Christian humanism needed to unravel the toxic merger of Christianity and Western civilization.

In each case, he provides a succinct overview of the key texts associated with the figures under discussion. I was especially grateful for his critical readings of the works of Raboteau, Cone, and Long. With a deep appreciation for the value of their contributions, he respectfully unveils the points where their work falls short of the desired liberating and humanizing discourse that can unseat the prevailing logic of white theological thought rather than mimic it.

Carter's project would have been greatly enhanced had he given attention to the work of Howard Thurman, who deftly articulated a vibrant and liberating Christology six decades ago in his classic little text Jesus and the Disinherited. In addition, Carter's omission of the contributions of womanist theologians and religious scholars signals a significant blind spot in his otherwise comprehensive theological field of vision.

The epilogue cites the story of Michael Eric Dyson, a tenth figure who embodies the overall symmetry with which Carter arranges his discussion of the nine thinkers evaluated in the book. Dyson is a 21st-century Afro-Christian public intellectual who has published his autobiography and contributed other writings to the corpus of modern African-American religious scholarship. He recalls his experience of one day reading Sartre's autobiography and then rushing to the corner store in his native Detroit to purchase a cigar in an effort to capture “a whiff of the Parisian café life,” just in time to be caught in a robbery and to feel the jolt of a sawed-off shotgun in his back.

Carter reflects upon this lesson that “learning takes place in a world of trouble,” drawing from it wisdom for restoration of relevance to modern theological discourse with respect to focus and locus:

The value I want to take from Dyson's autobiographical story lies in how it illustrates the need for theology, insofar as it has functioned as a scholastic universe animated by the theological problem of whiteness, to reevaluate how it does its work . . . in company with and out of the dispositions of those facing death, those with the barrel of a shotgun to their backs, for this is the disposition of the crucified Christ, who is the revelation of the triune God.

I receive these words as confirmation of my own work as a professor at a historically black theological school and as a pastor of a Holiness congregation that ministers to the urban poor, as I strive to fulfill a scholarly vocation while inhabiting a real-world environment where the pain, suffering, violence, and death that characterize urban existence bear urgently upon my pastoral ministry on a daily basis.

Moreover, it is my sense that the release of Carter's radical representation of the audacity of theological imagination is perfectly timed for our critical moment in history, now that the election of an African American as president of the United States of America has made the audacity of hope the order of the day. Race: A Theological Account lays the groundwork for a new generation of Christian intellectuals in our churches and seminaries to come to voice as witnesses for racial justice, healing, and reconciliation. ■

'A REMARKABLE RESPONSE'

Gifts and commitments of more than $10.8 million — including 33 new scholarship endowments and generous additions to existing endowments — lifted the Divinity School past its goal for the three-year Duke University-wide Financial Aid Initiative, which ended Dec. 31, 2008.

"This remarkable response means more graduates will leave with less debt, and the church will be the better for it," said Dean L. Gregory Jones.

"We are profoundly grateful for this remarkable support, yet we have more to achieve. Our greatest continuing concern is to have enough scholarship resources for every student so that debt does not interfere with ministerial formation and learning."

Recent gifts include:

- A commitment of $400,000 from the Ruth Lilly Philanthropic Fund, Indianapolis, Ind., to be matched by $200,000 from the Stange Financial Aid Initiative Challenge to establish The Reconciliation Scholarship Fund. These resources directed to the Divinity School by Bill McCutchen E'62 and his wife, Renie McCutchen WC'62, of Westport, Conn., will be for the Th.D. program, giving special consideration to students who work in the areas of Scripture and reconciliation. Bill serves on the Divinity School's Board of Visitors and Renie is on the advisory board for the Center for Reconciliation.
- A charitable gift annuity of $200,000, which will be added to The James L. Matheson Scholarship Fund, thanks to the generosity of Jim Matheson T'51, D'54, of Wardensville, W.Va.

- An additional $150,000 from the Pine Tree Foundation in Gladwyne, Pa., contributed for The A. Morris and Annabel Williams Scholarship Fund
- A gift of $25,000 from Merritt Jones T'52 and his wife, Susan Pickens Jones, WC'52, of Raleigh, N.C., to be added to The Jones-Pickens Scholarship Fund.
- A gift of $25,000 to be added to The William L. Carson Scholarship Fund from the Carson Foundation in Sparta, N.J.
- An additional $20,000 for The Clair M. and Mary Durham Herndon Memorial Scholarship Fund from the C.M. Herndon Foundation of Durham, N.C.

Gifts received in recent months for Divinity School programs include a grant of $429,855 from The Stewardship Foundation of Tacoma, Wash., to support the work of the Center for Reconciliation; $125,000 from The Foundation for End of Life Care; $100,000 from the Dade Community Foundation and $100,000 from VITAS Hospice Services, all of Miami, Fla.; $95,500 from the U.S. Cancer Pain Relief Foundation of Madison, Wis.; and $85,500 from St. John Health System, Warren, Mich., for the Duke Institute on Care at the End of Life; and $157,100 from The Foundation for Evangelism of Lake Junaluska, N.C., to support evangelism leadership and programs.

Support from graduates and friends for The 2008–09 Divinity School Annual Fund, which continues through June 30, 2009, continues to make a vital difference helping with financial aid for current students. Participation signals a faithful investment, and each Annual Fund gift, regardless of size, is greatly appreciated — now more than ever. ■

Anna Elizabeth Adams DYA'01, D'10

While a junior at N.C. State University, history and religious studies major Anna Adams began researching graduate schools for an advanced degree in the history of Christianity. But as she read the course listings at Duke and other seminaries, she found herself drawn again and again to the master of divinity degree.

"After a lot of thought and prayer, I realized that divinity school was where God was calling me — not to academia but to the church and parish life," says Adams, a 24-year-old middler from Greenville, N.C.

Seminary is stretching her intellectually and pastorally, Adams says. "I'm being prepared not only academically, but liturgically and spiritually. Here at Duke I've felt God's confirmation of my call as the Holy Spirit prepares me for pastoral leadership."

A summer 2001 alumna of the Duke Youth Academy for Spiritual Formation, Adams's return to Duke was made possible by financial aid.

As a candidate for United Methodist ordination, Adams knows she'll be asked whether she is in such debt that it would hinder her ability to pastor.

"Through the generosity of financial aid, I will be able to answer 'no' without hesitation," she says. "From the beginning of my ministry, my parish will come first."

"Through the generosity of financial aid ... from the beginning, my parish will come first."

She presented "From Russia with (God's) Love: Collaborating with Theological Librarians from the Former Soviet Union" Nov. 18 for the Duke University Libraries staff on behalf of the Professional Affairs Committee. ■

CLASS NOTES

50s

REINHARD BROSE D'58, who was unable to attend his 50th class year anniversary during Convocation, sent greetings from Berlin, Germany, where he serves as a part-time pastor in three retirement homes. Ordained in the United Methodist Church of Germany, he spent much of his career as a missionary to Brazil teaching theology and communications. He also served parishes in Kassel and Bremen, Germany, prior to his retirement in 1998. He recalls with thanksgiving the scholarship he received from an anonymous donor for his second year of studies at Duke.

60s

WALTER A. WHITEHURST D'61 and his wife, Betty, have published Following God's Call: Individual Volunteers in Mission (Abingdon, 2008), reflecting upon their long-term leadership with the United Methodist Volunteers in Mission programs. They are retired in Virginia Beach, Va.

SYL LORENZO SHANNON D'66, D'93 was named the 2008 recipient of the Distinguished Alumni Award Oct. 13 during the annual Convocation & Pastors' School. (See below.)

70s

RICHARD F. MCCLEERY D'71, D'74, a United Methodist/Society of Friends chaplain with Halifax Health, Hospice of Volusia, in Flagler, Fla., has published Of Sorrow and Laughter (Carabourne, 2007). He and his wife, Carole, reside in Palm Coast, Fla.

80s

WILLIAM S. "BILL" SHILLADY D'81 is the new executive director of the United Methodist City Society in New York, N.Y. He was formerly pastor

[ DISTINGUISHED ALUMNI ]

SHANNON RECEIVES DISTINGUISHED ALUMNI AWARD

WHEN SYLVESTER Lorenzo "Syl" Shannon D'66 arrived at one of his pastorates, the church had three different worship services — one black, one white, one Hispanic. When he left that church, there was one service with all Gods' people worshipping together.

Whether preaching in the pulpit at the Pentagon, conducting preaching missions around the world, or starting a college scholarship fund to bring hope from despair after the assassination of Martin Luther King Jr., his life's work has been all about breaking down barriers and bringing people together.

In honor of his contributions to education and ministry, the retired U.S. Army chaplain received the Divinity School's 2008 Distinguished Alumni Award last October.

"Dr. Shannon is an advocate of inclusiveness," said Eric Porterfield, D'94, D'96, former president of the National Alumni Council and chair of the selection committee. "He's not a gatekeeper keeping people out, but a person committed to breaking down barriers and bringing people together."

Shannon served with the U.S. Army Chaplain Service from 1966–1981, retiring with the rank of colonel. He was the first African-American chaplain to graduate from the Command and General Staff College and the first African American to serve as senior pastor of the Pentagon pulpit. He conducted preaching missions all over the world and received the U.S. Army Legion of Merit Award for service in South Vietnam.

After retiring from the army, Shannon served Presbyterian Church (USA) pastorates in North Carolina, Virginia, Kansas, New York, and Washington, D.C. In 1990 he became pastor of the historic Siloam Presbyterian Church, the largest predominantly black congregation in his denomination, located in Brooklyn, N.Y.

Shannon's commitment to helping others pursue education has its roots in the 1960s. After King was assassinated in 1968, Shannon and two clergy colleagues pooled their money and started a scholarship. To this date, they have helped 87 students from the United States, India, Korea, and Zimbabwe pay for college. ■ of Park Avenue United Methodist Church. Shillady represented Duke University at the Nov. 17, 2008, inauguration of Serena Jones as president of Union Theological Seminary.

GAYLE C. FELTON D'82, G'87 has written United Methodists and the Sacraments (Abingdon, 2008), a study guide of rituals and practices. She resides in Rougemont, N.C.

STEVEN C. MORTON D'83 has been elected to serve on the National Council of the Divinity School Alumni Association. He is a United Methodist pastor in Downingtown, Pa.

DEBORAH A. MCLEOD D'85 has been elected president of the National Council of the Divinity School Alumni Association. She is superintendent of the South East District of the Florida United Methodist Conference and resides with her husband, Thomas H. McLeod D'85, in Coral Gables, Fla.

LISA WITHROW D'88, who teaches church leadership and directs the Doctor of Ministry program at the Methodist Theological School in Ohio, has written Claiming New Life: Process Church for the Future (Chalice, 2008). During the past two years, she has enjoyed kayaking trips in Antarctica and the Arctic.

90s

JOERG RIEGER D'90, G'94, professor of systematic theology at Perkins School of Theology, Southern Methodist University, has been named the Wendland-Cook professor of constructive theology at Perkins. An elder in the North Texas Conference of the United Methodist Church, he is the author most recently of Christ and Empire: From Paul to Postcolonial Times (Fortress, 2007).

SCOTT T. KISKER D'93 published Mainline or Methodist: Rediscovering Our Evangelistic Mission (Abingdon, 2008). He is an assistant professor on the faculty at Wesley Theological Seminary, Washington, D.C.

MICHAEL SCHNEIDER D'93, a United Methodist pastor in Antwerp, Ohio, represented Duke University at the Oct. 7 inauguration of Wendy Deichmann Edwards as president of United Theological Seminary.

L. SHANE STANFORD D'94 is the author of When God Disappears: Finding Hope When Your Circumstances Seem Impossible (Regal, 2008). He and Barbara, his wife, reside in Petal, Miss.

AUDREY LANGLEY WILSON D'98 has served as the palliative care chaplain at the Durham Veterans Administration Medical Center since 2006. She has recently earned full board certification for chaplains.

00s

JASON C. DYKEHOUSE D'00 has completed a Ph.D. in religion with a concentration in Old Testament/Hebrew Bible at Baylor University. Jason, his wife, PAMELA LYNN

DYKEHOUSE D'00, and their children Caleb and Eliana now live in Corpus Christi, Texas, where she is pastor of St. Luke's United Methodist Church.

DONNA M. THOMPSON D'00, pastor of Saint Peter United Methodist Church in Hamlet, N.C., received the D.Min. degree from Wesley Theological Seminary in May 2008. Her project, "Revive Us Again: Reviving the Black Church Through Experiential Worship in the Methodist Revivalist Spirit," was developed to promote revival in the black church, but is relevant for any ministry setting. For more information, e-mail her at church.revival@yahoo.com.

MATTHEW SCHLIMM D'01 has been appointed an instructor in Old Testament at the University of Dubuque Theological Seminary. An ordained elder in the United Methodist Church, he has served as a ministry coordinator for the Duke Youth Academy for Christian Formation, and as an associate pastor and interim supply pastor for churches in Minnesota and Michigan. He is completing his Ph.D. in religion at Duke.

Artist CAROLE BAKER D'03, a research associate at the Divinity School, has completed "Mary: The Paper Doll Project," an interactive exhibit supported by grants from the Mary Duke Biddle Foundation, Duke Divinity Women's Center, and the Resource Center for Women and Ministry in the South.

An opening reception was held Dec. 11, 2005, at St. Philip's Episcopal Church (Durham, N.C.) where the exhibit was open through Dec. 25. Viewers could interact with four life-sized paper dolls of various cultural depictions of the Holy Mother: Our Lady of Lourdes, Byzantine Theotokos, Virgin of Guadalupe, and Madonna of Soweto. For more information or to arrange an exhibition, contact Baker at carole.baker@duke.edu.

Relearning Our Native Tongue

BY DAVID C. HOCKETT D'94

On Monday, Nov. 3, the evening before the historic election of Barack Obama to the presidency, I invited Jamie Slate, Ph.D., a local economics professor and member of our congregation, to offer a lecture and discussion about the economic crisis gripping our nation.

David Hockett

I had overheard conversations in hallways and our church parking lot blaming the Republicans, the Democrats, George Bush, greedy investment bankers, and the like. While the credit crunch had reduced the stream of cash into our economy, it had done little to hinder the flow of opinion, accusation, fear, and pious ramblings.

My hope was that Slate, an associate professor of economics at Catawba College, would help move discussions toward a more nuanced conversation that would take into account the complexity of the issues and possible solutions. Words matter, and, just as our economy was faltering, our ability to speak effectively and faithfully about a very serious concern seemed to be suffering.

Admittedly, this was potentially dangerous territory the night before the election. But the lecture, "Getting Here from There: Glass-Steagall and the Current Economic Crisis," was nonpartisan and explained the situation's broader historic, economic, and political context. Professor Slate demonstrated how deregulation of markets and institutions, which followed the 1999 repeal of the Glass-Steagall Act of 1933, allowed affiliations between securities firms and commercial banks and contributed to the crisis.

Our members listened attentively and asked questions that reflected deep concern for their own financial well-being, but also concern for their neighbors, children, grandchildren, and their church. Whether they were Democrat or Republican, liberal or conservative, they expressed a desire for greater levels of openness, equality, fairness, and accountability in our nation's economic dealings.

Professor Slate's willingness to share his wisdom and knowledge moved all of us to a more thoughtful and thorough understanding of this serious matter. In every congregation I have served I have been amazed at the knowledge and skill in a variety of areas and disciplines. Whether plumbers, doctors, accountants, gardeners, teachers, cooks, or yes, even economists, many parishioners have been willing to share their gifts.

As important as it is to expand our ability to discuss a variety of issues and concerns, it is equally important to remember that the church has a first language — the language of Scripture, of faith, of the saints. While we may adopt vocabulary from other tongues, it is that first language that must shape and define our conversation.

I am a pastor, and not a politician or an economist, primarily because I believe the most interesting questions and answers are theological. The lecture reminded us of the important economic and historic circumstances that contributed to the current crisis, and increased our ability to speak thoughtfully about these matters. And yet, with the shadow of the cross falling on the portable screen we had brought into our sanctuary for the PowerPoint presentation, I was reminded that the economy of our Lord's kingdom stands in gracious judgment over and against all of our markets, default swaps, bottom lines, and balance sheets.

It is our vocation as pastors and as disciples to speak first that language of our Lord's kingdom as we confess our greed, our lack of compassion for the poor, our stinginess, and our excessive consumption. We must extend to all the gracious invitation to live freely and generously out of a sense of God's abundance.

Since the lecture, there seems to be less parroting of partisan positions, fewer divisions along liberal/conservative lines, and a greater acknowledgment that the economic situation is larger and far more complex than we often admit. On that level I was pleased with the outcome.

But as a pastor, a theologian, and a friend of Jesus, I know there is something more. The goal is not a more economically savvy congregation, but the formation of a community of disciples who speak fluently the language of sin, conversion, sacrifice, hope, abundance, grace, jubilee, eternal life.

Forming communities that speak this language requires us as pastors and disciples to ask more difficult questions than, "What is Glass-Steagall?"

How might the church bear witness to an economy based not on profligate consumption, but on holding things in common and sharing generously with one another so that no one is in need?

When we can't even talk openly with one another about how much wealth we have, can we hold one another accountable for how we use our wealth?

In what ways have we treated the gospel as a commodity and the ministry as a career?

What might it look like to live freely and sacrificially out of a sense of God's abundance, thereby avoiding what Walter Brueggemann calls "the myth of scarcity?"

To be honest, I am not sure that we have made much progress in addressing these questions, and certainly not in living out faithful answers to them. Perhaps asking them, or at least knowing they need to be asked, is a beginning.

I know that answering them faithfully will require more than a single lecture and polite conversation. It demands that our communities be defined by practices that make answering the questions, and living the answers, possible.

In fact, might those practices be the answers themselves? Are they not the places where the language of God's economy becomes incarnate?

Where is the table of radical welcome

"It is our vocation as pastors and as disciples to speak first that language of our Lord's kingdom as we confess our greed, our lack of compassion for the poor, our stinginess, and our excessive consumption."

— DAVID C. HOCKETT D'94

with enough bread and wine to go around? Who speaks the word of grace and truth to a self-centered culture of death and lies? What community is united in intercession for the poor, the marginalized, and the stranger?

Each Sunday, we leave behind the stock market ticker on CNN and MSNBC and gather to hear the word read and proclaimed, to sing, to pray, and to share a meal. My hope and prayer is that there we will relearn our native tongue and become the embodiment of God's economy for the life of the world. ■

Making the Best of Hard Times

BY JAMES G. MENTZER D'99

It was the best of times; it was the worst of times." Charles Dickens used these words to describe the eve of the French Revolution. They could just as easily, though, describe today's financial turmoil.

The "worst of times" portion of today is pretty clear.

The recession of 2008 ran over investors like a freight train out of control. Market values sank to lows last seen in 2002 and consumer confidence plummeted.

Where, then, is the "best of times" part? Many economists suggest that a recovery will begin by the second quarter of 2009, although expansion of financial markets will not reach pre-crisis levels until 2010. At the same time, experts like Warren Buffett believe that public fears about the long-term prosperity of American business in general make no sense at all. In a recent op-ed piece published in The New York Times, he pointed out that in the 20th century, the United States endured two world wars, the Great Depression, a dozen or more recessions, oil supply shocks, the 1919 flu epidemic, and the resignation of a disgraced president. Yet during this same time period the Dow-Jones Industrial Average rose from 66 points to 11,497.

In the midst of negative news, what should you be doing to safeguard your investment portfolio? First, I hope that you are not doing "nothing." Prudent investors monitor their portfolios on a regular basis. At the same time, I hope you have not panicked and cashed out of the stock market. You will either never return or you will re-enter at a price point higher than right now. In other words, you will end up buying high and selling low — never a winning investment strategy.

Specifically, I would urge you to consider the following questions:

Can you tune out the noise? The Wall Street Journal offers a free website at <http://online.wsj.com/public/us> that provides an abundance of financial information without "end-of-times" sensationalism. Or consider the Bloomberg News Service (www.bloomberg.com), another excellent source of financial information. For assistance with personal investment decisions, consider Clark Howard's website at www.clarkhoward.com. For the concerned investor, this site offers a wealth of useful information on a wide variety of financial and consumer-related topics.

Have your investment parameters or needs changed? Is your investment timeline still long-term, requiring your investments to work on your behalf for more than seven years, or have you reached a point where thinking more short-term (less than seven years) makes sense? Only if changes have occurred in these areas do mid-term corrections to your investment portfolio make sense.

Do you still have confidence in your individual investment selections? Most of us employ a "buy and ignore" policy. Now is an ideal time to replace any underperforming or inappropriate investment choices in your portfolio. And if a particular funds manager is doing an excellent job during these trying times, now would be an excellent time to buy more.

What are your asset allocation parameters? A well-diversified investment portfolio is better equipped to weather downturns in the markets than a portfolio invested in only one major asset category. If your portfolio does not have a wide range of stocks, bonds, and cash positions, then now is the time to make changes in that direction.

How large is your cash reserve? Savvy investors keep an emergency fund equal to at least six months of living expenses so they will not have to withdraw from their investment portfolio for liquidity purposes during times of extreme market lows. In addition, consider stashing any assets that you expect to tap within the next five years into shorter-term fixed-income investments where fluctuations in your principal value are apt to be minor. ■

Changing Congregations

“The two-parent family with kids is still the main basis of American religious congregational life, but that kind of household is somewhat less common than it used to be. And each generation, as it reaches that stage of life, seems to be joining or returning to (a religious congregation) at a slightly lower rate than the one before it.”

MARK CHAVES, professor of sociology, religion, and divinity, quoted in the Dec. 21, 2008, issue USA TODAY on findings of his National Congregations Study

Reading the Tea Leaves

“I’m sure a lot of churches are reading the tea leaves, so to speak. When you’re faced with declining retirement or declining stock portfolios or loss of jobs in particular, that does cause people to cut back on most things, including their giving to their church.”

JACKSON CARROLL, Williams professor emeritus of religion and society, quoted in the Dec. 20, 2008, issue of The Herald (Rock Hill, S.C.) on giving to churches in a bad economy

Two Families of Anglicans

“It’s certainly going to be deplored by one part of the Communion and hailed by another. Are we going to end up with two families of Anglicans, and if so, are they in communion with each other in any way? There are so many possibilities and geopolitical differences, it’s really hard to predict where this will go.”

DAVID STEINMETZ, Amos Ragan Kearns professor of the history of Christianity, quoted in the Dec. 3, 2008, issue of The New York Times on the founding of a rival denomination to the Episcopal Church

Liturgy and Anarchy

“You need liturgical forms that allow for anarchy in the congregation.”

STANLEY HAUERWAS, Gilbert T. Rowe professor of theological ethics, quoted in the Nov. 13, 2008, issue of The News & Observer (Raleigh, N.C.) on welcoming those with disabilities to participate in worship

Segregated Worship

“Today, worshipping separately is both a bad and a good thing. Bad because it gives an impression of disunity. It says that we are first black and second Christian. It’s good in the sense that we get to worship in freedom.”

ESTHER ACOLATSE, assistant professor of pastoral theology, quoted in the Nov. 7, 2008, issue of The Star-News (Wilmington, N.C.) on segregation of Sunday morning worship

Graham’s Gifts

“He never got over the good fortune of being a Southern farm-boy-made-good, always acutely aware of his lack of advanced education. He had a certain kind of wide-eyed innocence as he reached out in amazement to all those people who flocked with him. He enacted America’s idealized self. He’s modeling the kind of person people wish they were.”

GRANT WACKER, professor of Christian history, quoted in the Nov. 4, 2008, issue of USA TODAY on Billy Graham’s legacy
