FOREWORD I

History as a report of what has happened comes out of life. This is true also about our Methodist history. From its very beginning Methodism has been an ongoing movement. Individuals and people were by the inspiration of the Holy Spirit converted, committed and commissioned to serve other individuals and nations with the new-creating Word of God. We can today see the footprints of these marvelous people all over the world and we sincerely hope that Methodism's endless line of splendor has not yet come to an end.

Interwoven in this Methodist movement are persons, institutions, initiatives, changes, fulfillments and much more. Some people have names well known to World Methodism and even to World Christianity. Other names are not so well known but beloved in their own part of the world for what they did in promoting the Kingdom of God. Some of these people, institutions, movements are already forgotten by most of us, but others are still in fresh remembrance.

These volumes are written to make history alive, that we should not forget our forefathers. If you find this story well written, it may partly be due to the authors and editors, and we certainly thank those who have edited these volumes, the late Dr. Elmer T. Clark and these last years, Bishop Nolan B. Harmon. But it is in the first hand thanks to those who wrote history with their life and work and so fully committed themselves to the Divine calling that history became alive.

FOREWORD II

In this modern age it is natural that the Methodist Church in various countries should seek closer union with churches akin to it in theological emphases and historical antecedents. Nevertheless there persists as strongly as ever the realisation of Methodists that, in John Wesley's phrase, they are one people in all the world. They honour their common beginnings in the 18th century, they rejoice in their theological emphases and social witness, and they believe that each member of the World Methodist Council can bring its own riches to the common treasury.

For all these reasons it is not only essential to have periodic meetings of the Council and its Executive, together with visits of ministers and laymen to various countries, but also an authoritative work of historical reference for Methodists everywhere. The French have a proverb that in order to jump forward one must step back. We do not go back to Wesley and our fathers as a means of escapism. In a word, it is not back to Wesley but forward from Wesley. We know our past in order that we may plan our future. Without such knowledge as this massive work of research supplies, we would not know our genealogy, nor the roll-call of our honoured dead, nor the legacy into which we have entered.

The Encyclopedia is of special interest in its worldwide reference. Even the most knowledgeable may be unaware of the inspiring story of Methodism in countries other than their own.

Most important of all in this ecumenical age is the need for Methodists to know their own history and distinctive witness in order that they may enter fruitfully into dialogue with members of other churches.

For all these reasons this work, which may properly be called unique, needs not only to be in public but private libraries. It has been edited with distinction and it will be welcomed and deeply appreciated by all those who know that our future is indissolubly linked with our past.

Cardiff, Wales, May 24, 1968

MALDWIN EDWARDS

President, International Methodist Historical Society.

PREFACE

This Encyclopedia is designed to give helpful information regarding the history, doctrines, institutions, and important personages, past and present, of world Methodism. For well over half a century Methodist ecumenical gatherings and historical societies have been requesting such a publication—one which might embody in a clear, comprehensive way the works and ways of the Methodist movement over the whole world.

In response to this expressed need, some years ago Dr. Elmer T. Clark, then both executive secretary of the Association of Methodist Historical Societies and the American secretary of the World Methodist Council, began to make plans and to collate material for what was then planned as a "Methodist Dictionary." Dr. Clark had numerous conferences with historians, publishers, librarians, and other interested persons both in Britain and in America. Repeated contacts were made with representatives of the Methodist "connection" in many lands, all of whom proved helpful and cooperative, and a vast amount of material began to be gathered from far and near.

Dr. Clark, however, because of advancing years, asked to be relieved of editorial responsibility in 1964, and to the regret of all has not lived to see the completion of this work. The present editor took charge upon Dr. Clark's retirement, and he, with a competent staff of writers, consultants, and collaborators, has endeavored to carry through and finish the work so well planned and begun these several years ago.

The Encyclopedia of World Methodism, as it came to be called, was sponsored and financed by the World Methodist Council and the Commission on Archives and History of The United Methodist Church, formerly known as the Association of Methodist Historical Societies. The Publishing House of The United Methodist Church, U.S.A., has generously assumed the expense both of publishing and promoting the Encyclopedia, looking to the editors to be responsible for the compilation of the complete manuscript, and for the relevance and accuracy of all items herein presented.

It should be noted that almost a century ago a Cyclopaedia of Methodism was compiled and published by Bishop Matthew Simpson of the Methodist Episcopal Church in America. Likewise, Canadian Methodism brought out the Cyclopedia of Methodism in Canada in 1881, edited by the Reverend George H. Cornish; and the Centennial Encyclopedia of the African Methodist Episcopal Church, edited by Bishop Richard R. Wright, Jr., was published in 1916. But Bishop Simpson's Cyclopaedia has long been outdated, and while it endeavored in its day to reflect Methodism in America, in Britain, and, as far as then was possible, in other lands, it naturally fell short of the comprehensiveness which a like publication must have today. Furthermore, epochal changes over the whole earth, as well as the enormous growth of Methodism itself, have occurred since 1876 when Simpson compiled his work, and with this growth has come a vast amount of new content, as well as of change, in world-wide Methodism. The present editors, however, would like to acknowledge their indebtedness to Bishop Simpson's Cyclopaedia as a pathfinder in this effort. The Canadian work is largely a biographical listing of the ministers and churches of that land, though we are indebted to it and to the Canadian editor for many informative articles which are to be found therein. The same is true also of the African Methodist Episcopal Church encyclopedia, which makes quite a contribution in outlining the personalities and institutions of that connection.

As world-wide Methodism itself has become more and more conscious of its unity, and more and more assured, as John Wesley expressed it, that "the Methodists are one people," the time has arrived for an encyclopedic publication to be produced not for one land or church, but for ecumenical Methodism itself. The editors and the sponsors of this work, therefore, hope to provide for the ministers and thinking laity of the Methodist connection everywhere, and for all other interested persons, the means whereby may be ascertained all manner of essential facts regarding Methodist history and development in the past, as well as its personal and institutional life of the present—and this in all lands and among all people where Methodism has made its home.

Since The United Methodist Church in America (which has underwritten the expenses of this project) with its eleven million members is the largest organized body among the Methodist Churches of the world, it is almost inevitable that the history, organization, institutions, and personalities of that church should take up a proportionately greater part of this work than do the other Methodist bodies herein presented. It is hoped that the world-wide Methodist public for whom this work is produced will understand and sympathize with this fact, as well as with the difficulties of securing comparable information from every other Methodist community throughout the world—though this last has painstakingly been attempted.

The Methodist Church of Great Britain has shared greatly in planning and collating the material for this Encyclopedia, and through a competent original planning committee and a talented editor, it is to be thanked for an enormous contribution to its publication. Admittedly, all the Methodisms of the world stand in debt to that of Great Britain as the cradle of the whole movement. Our British editorial staff therefore has taken great pains to set forth as far as possible all matters having to do with the beginnings of Methodism in Britain; and the historic sites, cities, important activities, and leading persons of the Methodist movement there, from its beginning until now, will be found in these pages. Many British writers have contributed interpretative articles of great value, as well as of historical import, to these pages.

In the coverage extended by this Encyclopedia to all organized Methodist Churches in various parts of the world, it will of course be understood that practically all these have stemmed either from British or American Methodism. Thus their particular organizational patterns, rituals, service books, and nomenclature have been primarily influenced by one or the other of these two motherland Methodisms from which they came. A more detailed description and heavier emphasis, therefore, has had to be placed upon the antecedent British and American "connections" and their fundamental organizational processes than it has been possible to give to different Methodist groupings in other parts of the world. The Methodist bodies today are not only many and varied, but have each in their turn modified through the years their respective original organizational and worship patterns. Obviously it would be well-nigh impossible to follow out all such changes in each church now treated in this work.

For instance, the organization of the General Board of Missions of The United Methodist Church, or as it is in England, the Methodist Missionary Society, can each respectively be described in overall and fairly specific separate accounts, bringing up to date their present activities. But it would be impossible in this work to attempt to tell how each of the separate Methodist connections in different parts of the world, or the different Methodist Churches as now organized, carry on the details of their particular missionary work. We do, however, in the overall article relating to each church or connection (apart from the United Methodist Church or the British Methodisms) endeavor to outline that church's general work in the field of missions, as also in that of education, publishing interests, etc.

METHOD OF COMPILATION

In compiling this work, it was necessary to secure an editor and in some instances an editorial staff in each respective land or in each organized branch of Methodism. These editors assumed the responsibility of furnishing primarily a general history of the development of Methodism in their particular region or separately organized church; and also of preparing biographies of those persons who, past and present, have had the most to do with its progress. The names of the respective editors with the countries or churches they have represented in this compilation will be found in the list of Area Editors.

In addition to the regional editors, as those for instance in South Africa, Germany, South America, New Zealand, etc., the large, separately organized Methodist connections which have stemmed from the Methodist Episcopal Church in America—such as the African Methodist Episcopal Church, the African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church, the Christian Methodist Episcopal Church, the Free Methodist Church, and others—have likewise each been represented by a special editor chosen in almost all cases from the particular connection involved. These persons have been responsible in their turn for compiling and sending in the material descriptive of the life, institutions, and personalities who have been a part of their church's institutional life. In one or two instances it was found difficult to secure an editor from the connection to be treated, and therefore it was necessary to secure other knowledgeable and competent editorial help.

AMERICAN HISTORICAL SOCIETIES

In the United States, the Methodist Historical Societies of the different annual conferences and regions were originally asked to nominate the persons and institutions whose accounts should be treated, in order that a history of the progress of Methodism in their respective areas might be obtained. Each official Historical Society was at an early date supplied with printed forms on which they nominated personalities, colleges, pioneer churches, camp grounds, and the like, which had meant much in their past Methodist life. They were also asked to indicate persons who might be able to write authoritatively concerning such items nominated for inclusion. In taking over from Dr. Clark the task of completing this work, the present editor followed this same course until from all the annual conferences in the U.S.A. he had secured listings which the regional Methodist leaders or Historical Societies felt would represent fairly their own organizations. The editor of the Encyclopedia and sponsoring authorities have been guided by each local Historical Society's judgment upon the names and institutions which they indicated should be included—or excluded.

In addition to these nominations from regional editors and Historical Societies, Bishop Simpson's Cyclopaedia of Methodism of a hundred years ago was carefully examined, as well as other books which might be expected to contain a treatment of important persons or events perhaps otherwise overlooked.

For the record of significant personalities, the editors searched Who's Who in American Methodism, edited by Carl Price (1916); and also Who's Who in Methodism edited by Elmer T. Clark (1952); as well as Who's Who in The Methodist Church, published by the A.N. Marquis Company (1966). Clinton Howell's Prominent Personalities in American Methodism (1945) was also carefully examined. It is inevitable that some omissions will be noticed which should have been included; and there will also probably be instances where the inclusion of certain items or biographies will be called in question. All has however been subject to editorial review and definite action with regard to every item. (The special guidelines which were adopted in selecting biographies will be indicated later in this Preface.)

CATEGORIES OF PRESENTATION

Beside the regional editors and those for the different large Methodist connectional bodies which have their own life and history, there are various categories of presentation in this work each of which was put under the supervision of a competent editor. Such separate, but important, fields as Methodist doctrine, education and educational institutions, eleemosynary institutions, worship practices and ritual—each of these categories was supervised by a special editor. In the list of Area Editors will be found the names of these special editors, and their responsibilities.

BIOGRAPHICAL COVERAGE

It will be noticed that a very large proportion of the Encyclopedia is taken up with biography—the lives of men and women whose careers had much to do with the Methodist movement in their respective lands and times.

This is because admittedly the story of Methodism cannot be told apart from the Methodists who have made it. We have therefore endeavored in this work to outline the lives and indicate the character of all persons who have had a significant part in its larger life. Some have been very important, some not so important, but each person appearing in this work has been nominated for inclusion by those who were in position to evaluate the lives so chosen, and to judge of their import in their respective fields of endeavor. If, therefore, biographies seem to take up more space than is usual in a work of this nature, it is because Methodism has always been best represented by persons rather than by historical or documentary records, or even by ongoing institutions. Furthermore, one of the chief uses to which an encyclopedia of this nature is to be put is that of "looking up" basic details about particular individuals.

THE INCLUSION OF LIVING PERSONS

The inclusion of the biographies of living persons in this Encyclopedia was a matter carefully considered. However, it was decided by a vote of the Editorial Board of the project in a meeting in 1964 that a truncated view of world Methodism would be presented if every living Methodist among its present-day millions should be excluded from these pages. Since, however, no life can be safely evaluated until its record is complete, it was decided that although those living Methodists who are involved in the larger work of their churches should be included, they should be treated in brief biographical sketches outlining only their biographical data with the more important positions they have held or now hold, and that no attempt be made to evaluate editorially their contribution. In the case of all those who have completely finished their course, however, and who may be seen in the larger perspective of the years, it has been our endeavor to summarize and evaluate in some perceptive way their distinctive part in the work of world-wide Methodism.

In deciding what living persons would appear in this work, it was determined that such persons should have, or have had, some official connection with the larger institutional work of one of our general Methodist Church bodies. There are many famous Methodists over the world whose names will be written large in universal history, but unless such persons have actually participated in a definite way in the organizational or some other fundamental aspect of the work of their respective general churches, it was decided somewhat regretfully that their biographies could not be included. Among the Methodists of the United States, for instance, there have been scores of Methodist members of the Congress, a great number of governors of states, captains of industry, and able representatives in almost every field of public influence—astronauts, beauty queens, athletes of olympic renown, physicians, lawyers, scientists, men and women high in all manner of professions and occupations. Many of these have proved to be of great worth in their own local Methodist churches, but the editors deemed it wise to place in this work only those whose lives and talents have in some special way been involved in the work of the general Church. There are a few exceptions to this rule, but such exceptions will be seen as so clearly important that the editors felt that these instances should be included, or the Encyclopedia would be lacking.

Specifically, we have tried to include all who have come within the following categories:

- (1) All bishops in the various Episcopal Methodisms.
- (2) All presidents of Conferences, as in England, and in the non-Episcopal connections. These will be found, as are the bishops, in their respective church tabular listings in the Appendix, with the years of their presidency. The biographical sketches of certain outstanding presidents and other leaders, as provided by the area editor in the respective lands or connections, are included alphabetically in the main body of this work.
- (3) General Church officers and executives who have been elected to their respective positions by a representative church board or agency, and who have served in such an executive position for at least eight years, or who were members of the Council of Secretaries in 1971. This will necessarily exclude those executives who have been selected or appointed to a lesser position in a general board.
- (4) College presidents who are now retired but who have served as president of a Methodist or Methodist-related institution for at least ten years before retirement. Also certain active college presidents have been so outstanding in the larger work of the church that the editors representing their particular region or connection have nominated them and written their biographical sketches for the main body of the work.
- (5) Certain city pastors, who by reason of their eminence and the status of the churches which they serve or have served, especially if such pastors have been members of any General Conference, or have served in a commanding pastorate or pastorates for at least ten years.

Some persons who might otherwise be qualified in the above listings may possibly have been omitted through inadvertence. It will be understood that all editorial decisions have been made in good faith. In some cases desired biographical accounts have not been furnished.

Also it will be understood that with scores of different writers supplying their respective accounts from different regions, it is almost inevitable that these will differ somewhat in length and in type of treatment. The importance of a character treated in these pages therefore is not to be measured by the length of his biographic sketch, nor should the inconsequential incidents often to be found in a biography be discounted, as these may reflect a life more aptly than do titles held or work done.

SITES AND HISTORIC SHRINES

The part played by the historical record is prominent in almost every item covered. Indeed the demand for the Encyclopedia has come largely from the Historical Societies, whose chief interest, as their name implies, is in recording the eventful past. Therefore, it has been our aim to record the beginning and development of Methodism in each place where it is now established, together with an up-to-date evaluation of its present status and potentiality.

Every effort has been made to include all noteworthy pioneer preaching places, churches, sites, and historic shrines reflecting significant beginnings in any land or mission field. Here the nominations of the respective Historical Societies and those of the editors representing the different lands of the world have had to be depended upon. We covet for this Encyclopedia that it may outline the development of Methodist history in each region of the world where there are, or ever have been (as once there were in Russia and mainland China) Methodist churches.

DOCTRINAL ARTICLES

While disclaiming the effort to set forth in a complete way the theological and doctrinal position of present-day world-wide Methodism, we have undertaken to present in a series of doctrinal articles (listed under their own subject matter) what we should like to consider the norm of Methodist teaching in regard to each such doctrine. It is not the aim of this Encyclopedia to reflect any specific present-day school of Methodist thought, since these admittedly vary greatly, but to present the basic teaching of John Wesley, and of the early Methodist fathers upon each subject herein treated, with an indication of such later developments as may be considered generally normative in present-day Methodist thought. Able scholars, and scholarly critics, in addition to the capable editor of these doctrinal articles, have assisted in these presentations.

THE UNITED METHODIST CHURCH

After the compilation of the Encyclopedia had proceeded far toward a conclusion, The Methodist Church, U.S.A., joined The Evangelical United Brethren Church in 1968 to form The United Methodist Church. In view of this late but important development, it became necessary to re-edit much of the Methodist material already in manuscript form, to make it conform to the late changes in organizational pattern and nomenclature. The editors are well aware, and trust that our readers will also be aware, that organizational changes due to the recent formation of The United Methodist Church are continuing to take place and will no doubt continue to take place in years yet to be, as happens with all living institutions. Also, just at this time, various Methodist bodies formerly connected to one or the other of the large Methodist connections are becoming autonomous churches—e.g. Burma, Cuba, Argentina, Chile, while other regions are expecting to become autonomous soon. Such recent and impending changes, while making our editorial task more difficult and forcing a delay in publication, gives great promise ecclesiastically for Methodism over the world. As the Baltimore Bicentennial of 1966 put it, Methodism is “forever beginning.”

Since the Evangelical United Brethren Church has now merged into American Methodism, it was necessary to secure the history and development of that church, not only in America but over the world, since that now belongs in this Encyclopedia as completely as does that of any other Methodist body. This called at a late hour for the preparation and inclusion of many more articles covering the biographical sketches, institutions, etc., of the Evangelical United Brethren Church exactly as had been the case with all other Methodisms included here. This should be understood by Methodists in other lands when they find in this Encyclopedia United Brethren in Christ, Evangelical Association, United Evangelical, and Evangelical Church accounts.

The Evangelical United Brethren, as their history will show, originally had a close affiliation with American Methodism so that no great strain was put upon either connection when The United Methodist Church was formed. It is hoped that this Encyclopedia will be of value to those in the former Evangelical United Brethren tradition by indicating to them much of the history and life of Methodism of which they are now a part; and that in turn Methodists will be able to find in the Evangelical United Brethren records and histories now incorporated in these pages much information that will be of help to them in this larger brotherhood of The United Methodist Church.

EDUCATIONAL AND ELEEMOSYNARY INSTITUTIONS

It was not found possible to set forth the record of every educational institution which had been sponsored by, or is now in connection with The United Methodist Church except those which are presently in existence, and which came into existence during the nineteenth century. Nor is it possible to list any but the chief educational institutions in connection with the Methodist churches of other lands. Reference may be made to the records of the Boards of Education and kindred agencies of the various Methodist Churches, by those who wish to make a study of the almost innumerable academies, schools, and colleges which flourished, or did not flourish, during the nineteenth century. We have not endeavored to describe those which ended before 1900. There are certain historic exceptions to this procedure, as for instance the first Cokesbury College, Transylvania College, and Angusta College in the United States. There are also certain other institutions which had such influence while they lasted that the Encyclopedia would lack something if their records should not be told.

We do however carry a table in the Appendix giving the names and immediate statistics of the many present-day educational institutions of The United Methodist Church. The more significant of these, we describe individually under their own names in the main body of this work.

The same sort of table will be found listing the hospitals and homes, orphanages, and the like, now in connection with The United Methodist Church in the United States. Of these, something like forty of the most important will be described under their own names in the body of the work. These forty were nominated by persons in what was then the Board of Hospitals and Homes of The Methodist Church and who were in position to make a competent judgment upon such an evaluation.

The same procedure which was adopted in the case of defunct Methodist colleges has been followed with reference to early camp meeting sites, and also many camp grounds, youth assembly sites, etc. Some have been begun within recent years and are still in existence. Certain of these are today sponsored and maintained by annual conferences, and quite often their records are mentioned in connection with the history of such conferences. However, there has been a plethora of camp grounds all over American Methodism during its past, and even in its present years, and it is not possible to identify and catalog all of them. Exceptional situations such as Chautauqua, New York; Asbury Park in New Jersey; and the Seashore Assembly on the Gulf Coast—these, and possibly a few others of high import in early days, have been described.

NOMENCLATURE AND STATISTICS

Mention has been made of the fact that British and American Methodism have been the two prime centers from which later Methodist Churches and missions stemmed. However, since the Methodisms of Britain and of America have come to differ in certain particulars, especially in nomenclature, organization, and the like, it is often necessary to explain certain of these differences in the more important instances where they occur. Happily there are not many such, and the differences noted usually have more to do with nomenclature than with fundamental life and processes.

The matter of including present-day statistics reflecting the strength and immediate moves of many present-day Methodist churches has given some concern since by its very nature an encyclopedia may not keep up with ephemeral changes. However, it was decided that while statistics might soon be "out-dated" in the ongoing of the years, this Encyclopedia to be relevant (even for years beyond its publication date) should indicate as best it can the present strength and status of all institutions and persons treated.

LOCAL CHURCHES AND CONGREGATIONS

In order to reflect adequately the life of present-day American Methodism, an invitation was extended in 1966 to every local church which numbered upon its rolls 2,000 members or more, to record its story in these pages in a brief, factual way. Some of these large churches are old and historic, some are quite new, as their respective histories will show. A wholehearted response was secured from the vast majority of the larger churches over the United States (there proved to be well over three hundred of them!) and their histories up to the present will be found briefly narrated herein under the names of the cities or towns where they are located.

CITIES, STATES AND CONFERENCES

Likewise, it was felt that the history of American Methodism in cities which numbered at least 100,000 inhabitants might very well be told in order to complete the setting forth of present-day Methodism in the United States. This has been done largely throughout this work. There are instances where the story of Methodism in a certain city is essentially the story of the first or leading Methodist church now there; and occasionally the story of Methodism and the growth of a particular local church will be the record of Methodism in its locale.

Also in view of the fact that American Methodism is proportionately such a large part of the ongoing of Methodist life in the present world, we have included in this Encyclopedia the history of Methodism in the different States of the Union; and also the accounts of the separate annual conferences of The United Methodist Church. We should have been glad to do this for all other Methodisms in other parts of the world, but it was not found possible (except to a degree in the case of Australia) to secure the annual conference records from the many annual conferences extant in other nations—certainly not without taking many more years to compile this Encyclopedia, especially since annual conferences and general Methodist Church alignments are changing rapidly in many lands.

METHOD OF PRESENTATION

While anxious to supply all requisite facts and information which an encyclopedia of this nature should have, we have avoided a too great dependence upon abbreviations, and we carry a list of those most frequently used. However, it is our endeavor to present full and readable running accounts of the lives, institutions, and subjects treated, rather than reducing each of these to a summary assortment of letters and figures.

ILLUSTRATIONS

The Encyclopedia is illustrated by photographs and other graphic material depicting persons or institutions herein described. It has not proved possible to secure illustrations from every region and from all the smaller Methodist groups, although in the effort to represent the wider Methodism as fully as possible, some lowering of the quality of reproduction has occasionally been accepted rather than the discarding of an illustration altogether. In the mainstream of Methodism, where illustrations have proved easier to secure, there has been little attempt to rank in order of importance the subjects which might be included, so that the presence or absence of an illustration implies no judgment about the relative significance of the subject: those utilized are representative samples of what was readily available. Nevertheless we believe that collectively the illustrations included do present a true cross section of World Methodism in its varied phases and at its different levels.

GENERAL INDEX

A general index has been provided in the Appendix to the Encyclopedia which will indicate the page upon which any name or item treated herein may be found. The entire work is, of course, arranged in alphabetical sequence as are similar publications. However, it was felt that since many names are mentioned in other than their own accounts and since many persons and locations are not treated in the main listing, this work would not be complete unless we should indicate in an overall index all the names and items of any import to be found in these Methodist annals.

ACCURACY IN PRESENTATION

While every effort has been made to insure accuracy in the factual presentation of the material herein, it is scarcely possible that a work covering such a vast development over the whole world, past and present, with scores of writers contributing to its compilation, can be published without minor errors being found here and there. In some lands and churches, records, especially early ones, have been poorly kept or may not be considered authoritative. At all events, the respective writers in the various lands and regions must be depended upon to give accurate accounts of their own Methodism with no possibility of other authorities being able to review closely such work. Where obvious errors will be found, these should be called to our attention for future correction; but where debatable matters of opinion or editorial evaluation are set forth, these must stand upon their own merit and be the responsibility of the writer and editors.

As the Encyclopedia has been in compilation for several years, certain of our writers who contributed during earlier stages of the work have passed away before they could see their work published herein. Their writings, although brought out here posthumously, will reflect a very real and present helpfulness much appreciated by the editors and others to whom their names and work will be very meaningful.

THE APPENDIX

An Appendix has been prepared which will gather a number of non-related items which have extensive historical value but which are too lengthy to place within given articles. The most numerous examples would be tabular listings of bishops and conference presidents, colleges, annual conferences, etc.

One series in this section is the collection of maps which depict the growth of the Methodist Episcopal and Methodist Episcopal South Churches across the United States.

IN APPRECIATION

The editors wish to thank all those who had a part in shaping or contributing to this Encyclopedia. A list of our writers will be found elsewhere in the work. As there are over twelve hundred contributors, it has not been found possible to give individual writers a complete citation except where a writer is himself included in the main body.

Wholehearted thanks go out to the many who have ably cooperated with our editorial staff in compiling this work. Especially are we grateful for the enormous work done by Dr. John Kent, editor for British Methodism, who is considered the leading authority on nineteenth century British Methodist history. He has been ably assisted by many co-workers in Great Britain. These have planned wisely, and shared largely in this whole compilation. Dr. Maldwyn L. Edwards, recognized as an authority on the Wesley family, has given interesting and scholarly studies in the Wesley personalities; and Dr. Frank Baker, presently in the United States, considered the foremost researcher and authority on early Methodist life and work, has not only written extensively for the Encyclopedia, but as a member of our editorial group has given his valuable time and judgment on many problems, especially those of Anglo-American correlation of the work.

The work of the original British committee planning for the Encyclopedia was under the direction of the Reverend Wesley Swift, after Dr. Frank H. Cumbers felt compelled to resign from his position as editor. With the death of Mr. Swift, Dr. John Kent became editor. Minutes of the original planning committee indicate that Dr. E. Benson Perkins, Dr. Frank H. Cumbers, Dr. J. Alan Kay, Dr. Frank Baker and Wesley Swift, secretary and convener, participated in the drawing up of the British list. Mrs. D. J. Kent played an indispensable role in the supervision of the British entries. This original list was prepared in 1959.

Material dealing with the great and growing Methodism of Australia was gathered over several years and was contributed directly from that land by the Reverend Raymond H. Doust (deceased) and Dr. Harold Wood. However, most of the Australian material was finally assembled and edited by the Reverend T. D. Noffs with the assistance of the Reverend S. G. Cloughton (New South Wales), the Reverend R. C. S. Dingle (deceased; Queensland), the Reverend Arnold Hunt (South Australia), and the Reverend S. J. Jenkins (Western Australia).

Special thanks are due to our editorial co-workers and the supervisory committee which met from time to time and gave its judgment and directions upon many matters having to do with the compilation of this work. Bishop Fred P. Corson and the late Bishop Odd Hagen, who were presidents successively of the World Methodist Council, gave advice and personal help; Dr. Lee F. Tuttle, the General Secretary of the World Methodist Council, is to be thanked for encouragement and helpful participation in the work of supervision. Dr. Albea Godbold, the former executive secretary of the Association of Methodist Historical Societies, also made a great personal contribution as chairman of the supervisory committee, in compiling the history of Methodism in the various States of the Union, and in the organizational development of each annual conference in the U.S.A.

Dr. John H. Ness, Jr., the executive secretary of the Commission on Archives and History of The United Methodist Church, has ably served on the overall supervisory committee. In addition, he has been responsible for, and has himself contributed, many of the biographies and institutional items reflecting the Evangelical United Brethren Church in its historic development and present-day United Methodist Church status.

The Encyclopedia owes a debt of gratitude to Mrs. Roger J. Martinson, who has not only acted as editorial secretary for the Encyclopedia but has been a participant in many decisive matters connected with the actual compilation of the manuscript. Mrs. Louise Queen has served as a member of the supervisory group and has acted as the compiler and editor of the illustrative material to be found in the Encyclopedia. She also has personally contributed many items of historic import.

Last, but not least, the Publishing House of The United Methodist Church should be accorded deep appreciation for making a great and unselfish contribution to world Methodism in publishing and promoting at great expense these huge and comprehensive volumes.

The editor, himself, cannot forbear expressing his own sense of renewed appreciation for Methodism both past and present as he comes to the completion of this work. To go over the accounts of the many Methodist men and women found herein is to live again with them, and to live with them is to be enriched in spirit and challenged in mind to be found worthy of the heritage they have left—a heritage we are convinced that many who are living today will in turn supplement by their own lives and service.

The Encyclopedia goes forth with hope and expectation that it will fulfill an inspirational as well as informative mission, and act as a strong connective bond tying together and holding together the Methodists of the world. The Methodists are indeed "one people" but they live in many lands and have compiled and are compiling many separate records as they have worked for the cause of Christianity. We commend this Encyclopedia to all with the hope that these pages will fulfill such a high mission.

HOW TO USE THE ENCYCLOPEDIA

The names of persons, places, and most institutions treated in this volume will be found listed alphabetically through these pages. However, institutions such as local churches, hospitals, chapels, and the like will usually be found under the name of the city or town where they are located. Exceptions are those unusual institutions whose names are perhaps even better known than the cities in which they are located.

Bibliographical references in most cases have been placed below each article, pointing the reader to further information. The more important of these works appear in abbreviated form with the article, but are gathered together in the appendix, where the alphabetical Bibliography should be consulted for fuller publishing data. Where there is no such entry in the general bibliography, these details are given in the reference at the end of the individual article, except in a few instances where full information was not available.

In addition to the main alphabetical bibliography, we have included in the appendix a subject bibliography listing standard works in many areas of study. In this subject bibliography, as usually in the articles in the main encyclopedia, works are listed only by their short titles.

A feature of presentation in the Encyclopedia is the use of capital letters to indicate that the name so treated is to be found elsewhere in the work as a separate item of its own. This obviates the prolific use of q.v. ("which see"). Exceptions in such capitalization appear when a name reoccurs in any one item.

CONTRIBUTORS

Note: We endeavor to indicate the Annual Conference to which each ministerial contributor of The United Methodist Church and of the United Church of Canada may now belong; and also we indicate the city or land of residence of all lay contributors where this could be ascertained. Such listing may not be exact, however, since ministers "locate" or transfer, and lay writers change their residence. It did not prove possible to indicate the Conference membership of ministerial writers in certain of the lands and churches outside the United States and Canada since there are no general "World Methodist Minutes" which might be referred to for such immediate listing.

Due to the length of time the Encyclopedia has been in compilation, the addresses of a few of our early contributors cannot be obtained. An asterisk by a name indicates that a biographical sketch of such person will be found in the main section of the Encyclopedia. Degrees held by our contributors have been listed where these could be obtained.

AAPJIE, HANS, Transvaal pioneer, was born in Makapan's tribe about seventy miles north of Pretoria, South Africa, went to the Cape Colony for employment in about 1874, was converted, learned to read and write and married a Christian. He returned to the Transvaal in about 1876 but only gained permission two years later from Makapan to preach and teach. The Chairman of the District visited this area in March 1882 and met a congregation of about 150 in a well-constructed church building. Twenty adults and forty children attended a day school run by Aapie in the same building. He taught them the letters of the alphabet out of the Bible. In April 1884, GEORGE WEAVIND, Secretary of the Transvaal Synod, visited this Society and baptized 116 adults and sixty-six children. In August 1885 Watkins baptized a further thirty-one children and fifty-four adults in this Society.

ABBOTT, BENJAMIN (1732-1796), early American pioneer preacher, born in NEW JERSEY, U.S.A., the son of Benjamin Abbott, Sr., and Hannah Burroughs, in 1732. His father was a substantial land owner, his mother a "godly woman of effectual prayer."

Following the early death of both father and mother, he learned the hatmakers' trade in Philadelphia. In early youth Abbott had fallen pretty deeply into the ways of sin. Soon after coming of age he hired himself for plantation work in south Jersey, and there purchased his own farm and married.

Upon hearing a Methodist itinerant, ABRAHAM WHITWORTH, preach with simplicity and power, Abbott first knew his sins forgiven, his conversion taking place October 12, 1772.

He immediately began to witness for Christ and became the first native Methodist itinerant for New Jersey. As a local preacher for seventeen years he carried forward a most effective work of evangelism, church building, and organization of new societies throughout south Jersey, PENNSYLVANIA, MARYLAND, and DELAWARE. Herbert Asbury says it is believed that Abbott obtained more converts than any other Wesleyan preacher except JOHN WESLEY, GEORGE WHITEFIELD, and possibly ROBERT WILLIAMS. Joseph Sickler in his History of Salem has asserted that "as an exhorter and weaver of spells over his listeners, Abbott had no equal in his time or possibly in all the history of the Methodist Church."

The work of Abbott was of great importance during the Revolution. In 1779, there being no official appointment in New Jersey, this lay preacher unofficially assumed the chief responsibility for leadership in Methodism. Scudder has asserted in his volume on American Methodism, "Here New Jersey was his vast circuit, and he was the chief instrument in preserving the spiritual life of its societies during the distracting period of the Revolution."

The final period of Abbott's life (1789-96) came with his ordination and reception into the traveling ministry at the Conference held May, 1789, at TRENTON, N. J. He was appointed to the Dutchess Circuit, where in the next sixteen months the membership increased from a scattered few to nearly 1,400. Revivals broke out in every part of the circuit and four new circuits were added. Throughout the few years remaining until his death, Abbott continued to preach and organize new societies in NEW YORK, CONNECTICUT, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Maryland. The Minutes of the PHILADELPHIA CONFERENCE, M. E. Church in 1796, recording his death, say: "Perhaps he was one of the wonders of America. No man's copy; an uncommon zealot for the blessed work of sanctification, he preached it on all occasions, and in all congregations . . . He was seldom heard by anyone to speak about anything but God and religion, and his whole soul was often overwhelmed by the power of God."

ABEL STEVENS concludes his story of Abbott by saying: "He had led hosts of souls from the lowest abysses of vice into a good life and into the church, from the Hudson to the Chesapeake. His singular yet most effective life will ever remain a marvel, if not a mystery. An extraordinary individuality of character, sanctified by extraordinary endowments of divine grace, must be its chief explanation. They fitted him for a peculiar work, and he did it thoroughly with all his might and to the end."

ABBOTT, DAVID GUSHWA (1863-1939), was a missionary of the M. E. Church in the Central Provinces of INDIA, now Madhya Pradesh State, 1900-1934. He began his ministry at Khandwa immediately after a severe famine, and superintended an orphanage and a refugee camp of a thousand persons. Subsequently he was at different times superintendent of every district and participated in the care of every educational institution in the Conference.

Born in a mining camp in CALIFORNIA during the period of the gold rush, he was educated at IOWA WESLEYAN COLLEGE and BOSTON UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY. He married Martha Day, formerly a missionary in Calcutta and Moradabad. His older half-brother, Edward Newson, had been a missionary in India for some years.

Abbott twice represented the Central Provinces Annual Conference in General Conference and often in the Central Conference, the Executive Board and the Mid-India and National Christian Councils. He made a three-year court fight to establish the right of Christian converts to draw water from public wells, the first high-court decision giving Christians the right to share, without discrimination, the use of public facilities. The principle, previously denied, is now guaranteed to all citizens by the Indian constitution.

Abbott died March 29, 1939, while walking near his home in Los Angeles. For two years prior to his death he had been president of the Interdenominational Missionary Association of Greater Los Angeles.

YOSHIMUNE ABE

ABE, YOSHIMUNE (1886-), Bishop of the Japan Methodist Church, educator and ecumenical leader, was born in Hirosaki in northern JAPAN, and baptized in the Methodist Church there in 1901. This church, said to be the oldest Methodist Church in Japan, was founded by Dr. Abe's uncle, YOTSU HONDA, who in 1907 became the first bishop of the JAPAN METHODIST CHURCH. From the Hirosaki Church have gone out over two hundred Christian preachers.

Yoshimune Abe graduated from Aoyama Gakuin, Methodist College in TOKYO, in 1908 and from its theological department in 1912. Then in the U. S. he received a B.D. degree from DREW Seminary and an M.A. from New York University, both in 1915.

Returning to Japan he served successively as pastor of the Aoyama College Church, Dean of the Academy, and Dean of the Theological Department, and in 1933 became president of the university. He held this post until he was elected Bishop of the Japan Methodist Church in 1939. In the meantime, in 1931, the D.D. degree had been conferred upon him by OHIO WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY.

Bishop Abe was active in the movement for the organization of the United Church of Christ in Japan, and served as Chairman of its Organizing General Conference in 1941.

His influence has extended beyond his own church and even into international relations. He was fraternal delegate to the M. E. General Conference in 1928. As National Chairman of the Y.M.C.A. of Japan, he attended the Toronto and Cleveland Conferences in 1931 and traveled in Europe. From 1933 to 1941 he was chairman of the National Christian Conference of Japan. In 1941 he headed a group of Japanese Christians who went to the United States to secure the understanding of missionary leaders regarding the organization of the United Church, and to strive for the preservation of peace between the two countries. During the war he served as President of the Central China Religious Federation, and, after returning to Japan at the end of the war, became President of the Japan Christian Peace Association. In 1949-50, at the invitation of the Board of Missions, he traveled in the U. S. A., speaking in twenty-eight states about the Christian movement in Japan.

Since 1955, Dr. Abe has been General Secretary of the Educational Association of Christian Schools in Japan, at the same time serving as pastor of a new congregation which he founded after the war. He renders invaluable counsel in the leadership of the United Church and to many educational institutions.

ABERCROMBIE, RALPH (1837-1914), British Methodist, was a son of RICHARD ABERCROMBIE. He was born at Whitby on July 31, 1837, and entered the UNITED METHODIST FREE CHURCH ministry in 1861. He was CONNEXIONAL EDITOR from 1883 to 1892, was one of the committee which edited the New Hymn Book of 1889, and in that year was elected president. He served on the committee which led to the Union of 1907. He died in Manchester on February 2, 1914.

ABERCROMBIE, RICHARD (1797-1881), British Methodist, was born in Norwich on January 24, 1797. He was converted while in the army in France after Waterloo, later accompanied LORENZO DOW in Ireland, and assisted in the establishment of Methodist work in GIBRALTAR, but was expelled from the Wesleyan Methodists in 1834 because of his Reform sympathies. He left the army in 1836, and immediately associated himself with the WESLEYAN METHODIST ASSOCIATION and entered the ministry, contenting himself throughout his ministry with serving in the poorer circuits. Two of his sons, RICHARD ELIJAH and RALPH ABERCROMBIE, entered the ministry. He died in London on July 2, 1881.

ABERNATHY, JOHN REAGAN (1879-1957), American minister, was born near Hamilton, Tex., October 29, 1879. He attended Proctor Seminary in Texas, Scarritt Collegiate Institute at Neosho, Mo., and VANDERBILT School of Theology. He was awarded the D.D. degree by OKLAHOMA CITY UNIVERSITY. Abernathy was married to Helen Hinman October 16, 1907 at Centralia, Mo.

"Brother John," as he was often called, joined the SOUTHWEST MISSOURI CONFERENCE in 1900, later transferred to the MISSOURI CONFERENCE, and then went to OKLAHOMA in 1908. He served a number of pastorates in Oklahoma City, was superintendent of the TULSA and Oklahoma City Districts, commissioner of education for the Conference, and associate pastor at St. Luke's Church, Oklahoma City.

Abernathy was prominent in civic affairs. In 1910 at Guthrie he organized the first Boy Scout troop in the state, and the Boy Scouts of America gave him the Silver Beaver award. He was one of the first ministers to become active in the work of Alcoholics Anonymous as a counselor. He was a life-long Mason serving the Lodge in almost every capacity, including Grand Master of the Grand Lodge of the State of Oklahoma, Deputy Inspector General of the Scottish Rite, 33rd Degree Mason, and Chaplain of India Temple of the Shrine.

Abernathy died December 31, 1957.

ABERNETHY, GEORGE (1807-1877), pioneer settler and governor of the OREGON territory, was born in NEW YORK CITY, October 7, 1807. For some years he was an accountant in that city, where he married Anne Cope on January 21, 1830.

In 1840 JASON LEE invited him to take over the financial management of the OREGON MISSION. He sailed with Lee and his party aboard the Lausanne, arriving in Oregon June 1, 1840, after a voyage that took them around the Horn.

This group of settlers cultivated land, opened an academy, and built a mill. Abernethy's warehouse in Oregon City was the territory's first brick structure. He bought a press and helped to establish Oregon's first newspaper.

Abernethy was well liked and trusted by business rivals and by those who otherwise were distrustful of missionary influence in public affairs. This popularity made him the natural compromise for governor of the provisional government in 1845 when a deadlock arose. He was re-elected in 1847.

A major event in Abernethy's administration was the Whitman massacre at Waiilatpu and the war carried out against the Cayuses who had committed the offense. Abernethy's handling of this action and his work to shake Congress out of its apathetic attitude toward Oregon won him wide approval. Oregon became a Territory in 1849.

After the secular department of the Oregon Mission was closed, Abernethy engaged in private business as a merchant. He was the first Oregon merchant to establish credit in New York. George Abernethy and Company, established in 1850, was the first wholesale house in the Territory. He built lumber mills, flour mills, operated numerous sailing vessels, and carried on trade with HAWAII, California ports, and ports on the Atlantic coast. Financial reverses and a flash flood on the Willamette which swept away his store and mills forced him into bankruptcy in 1861.

Abernethy operated a wholesale business in his later years in PORTLAND. He was elected as Oregon's first lay delegate to the General Conference of the M. E. Church held in BROOKLYN, N. Y. in 1872.

He died May 2, 1877, and is buried in Portland.

ABERNETHY, THOMAS SMITH (1803-1882), one of the five preachers who helped organize the ALABAMA CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church in 1832. His father was Henry Abernethy, who with his wife, Rebecca Firth, moved to Giles Co., Tenn. in 1812, where young Tom Abernethy joined the church in 1819. In 1823 he joined the TENNESSEE CONFERENCE, and was immediately transferred to the MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE and appointed to Marion Circuit in Ala. He served also Chickasawhay, Claiborne, Marengo, Prairie Creek, Greensboro and Erie Circuits and was a charter member of the Alabama Conference. In that Conference he served Black Warrior Circuit, Marion and Selma—he is said to have preached the first sermon ever preached in Selma—Marengo, Flatwoods, Poet Oak, Sumterville, Belmont, Uniontown, Lower Peachtree, Dayton Colored Mission, Spring Hill and Linden Circuits.

Thomas Abernethy was married three times—to Martha W. Lucy in 1827; to Eleanor L. Lucy in 1842; and to Ellen Collins Lordin in 1851. He left seven children by his first wife and three by his second, and his descendants have continued to give character and importance to many places and situations in Ala. Thomas Smith Abernethy, Jr., the son of his first wife, joined the Alabama Conference in 1854, and after serving in several stations, including Pensacola, died in 1871.

Thomas Abernethy died April 13, 1882 at Dayton, Ala., where he is buried under a monument which gives the essential dates of his life.

ABILENE, TEXAS, U.S.A. The first Methodist church organized in Taylor County, Tex. was at Buffalo Gap in 1877, a year before the county was organized with Buffalo Gap as the county seat. In 1881 a church was organized in the new town of Abilene, and two years later the county headquarters were moved there.

First Church has had an illustrious history, and is still a strong church with almost a thousand members, and church property valued at over $800,000. Three men who serve as pastors in the early days of this church became bishops of the M. E. Church, South. They were SAM R. HAY, EDWIN D. MOUZON, and H. A. BOAZ.

St. Paul Church had a unique beginning. In February, 1909, at the close of a revival meeting held by the famous evangelist, Abe Mulkey, a collection was taken to build a new edifice for First Church. Soon it was decided that instead they would start a new church organization and use the money for the new project. So St. Paul Church was born with 250 members and a $35,000 church building. J. T. Hicks was the first pastor. For the past 60 years St. Paul has enjoyed a steady growth with a number of the outstanding leaders of the conference serving as pastors, and many of the distinguished men and women of the city and the conference counted among its lay leadership. In 1968 this church reported a membership of 2,324, a church school enrollment of 1,660, a church structure valued at over $1,400,000, and parsonage property worth $58,000.

In 1968 there were 12 Methodist churches in Abilene with 7,407 members, and property valued at about $3,900,000.

McMURRY COLLEGE was established at Abilene in 1923 under the leadership of J. W. Hunt, pastor of St. Paul Church. He served as the first president of the college. In 1968 the school had assets of more than $9,000,000. The members of St. Paul have spearheaded every movement for the growth and development of the college.

ABINGDON PRESS, the trade name under which the Publishing House of The United Methodist Church publishes religious books—not simply for United Methodists but for a wide Christian constituency. This name was first adopted by the Methodist Book Concern of the M. E. Church in 1915. In 1923 COKEBURY PRESS was set up as the book publishing department of the Publishing House of the M. E. Church, South in NASHVILLE, TENN. At church union in 1939, when the publishing and sales operations of the uniting Churches became The Methodist Publishing House, the name Abingdon-Cokesbury was taken as a trade name for book publishing of that House, and it was used for fifteen years. In 1954 the Board of Publication of The Methodist Church, upon recommendation of the Publisher, went back to the single name Abingdon for the book press, and took the name Cokesbury to denominate the official Methodist book stores over the country. The Book Editor of The Methodist Church has always been the editor of the respective book presses of the Publishing House, and is editor now of the Abingdon Press.

Abingdon Press handles the publishing of many official United Methodist resources. In recent years it has issued such publications as The Interpreter's Bible and The Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible. Annually it publishes over one hundred books. In 1969 it received the John Barnes Publisher of the Year Award, the first time a church-owned press had been so honored.

ACUFF, FRANCIS (1770-1795), American preacher and son of TIMOTHY ACUFF, was born in Culpepper County, Va., and was reared in Sullivan County, Tenn., where his family moved in 1773.

As a young man, Acuff showed early signs of great promise of leadership and ability, and was admitted to the conference in 1793. He served the Greenbrier and HOLSTON CIRCUITS, then went to KENTUCKY where he died near Danville just three months after his appointment to the circuit. He died in August, 1795.

On May 1, 1796, FRANCIS ASBURY visited ACUFF

CHAPEL and found "the family sorrowing and weeping on the death of Francis Acuff, who from a fiddler became a Christian; from a Christian, a preacher; and from a preacher, I trust, a glorified saint."

ACUFF, TIMOTHY (1732-1823), American pioneer, was born in VIRGINIA. In 1773 he moved westward with his family and secured land by homestead in Sullivan Co., Tenn., which was then a part of NORTH CAROLINA. In 1785 he secured a grant of additional land for his service in the Revolutionary War.

He built ACUFF CHAPEL, the first Methodist meeting house in TENNESSEE. It was a school as well as a church. At that time the nearest church was PAGE'S MEETING HOUSE one hundred miles away, and the only other school within a 100-mile radius was one conducted by Samuel Doak at Washington. Timothy Acuff's son, FRANCIS, became a Methodist preacher.

Bishop FRANCIS ASBURY preached at Acuff Chapel more frequently than at any other place in the Holston country.

Acuff died in 1823 and was buried in the chapel graveyard.

ACUFF CHAPEL

ACUFF CHAPEL, the first Methodist meetinghouse in TENNESSEE, was erected in 1786. In 1785 a Methodist class, composed chiefly of emigrants from VIRGINIA, was organized in Sullivan County near where Blountville now stands. The chapel was built on land given by TIMOTHY and Anna Leigh ACUFF. Micajah Adams assisted Acuff in planning for the building. FRANCIS ASBURY preached at Acuff Chapel several times, as did a number of other Methodist pioneers. For a time the chapel was also used as a school. Timothy Acuff and his wife, along with numerous other early settlers of the area, are buried in the cemetery adjacent to Acuff Chapel. The successor to the Acuff Chapel congregation was Adams Chapel, which was built in 1887. Acuff Chapel was sold, moved from its original site, and used for a dwelling for a number of years. In 1962 the HOLSTON CONFERENCE Historical Society purchased the building and moved it back to its first location. It has been completely restored and was designated as a national Methodist historic SHRINE by the 1964 General Conference. A road marker has been erected beside Highway 126, noting the Chapel's history and its present location.

ACWORTH, GEORGIA, U.S.A. Acworth Methodist Church is an historic church in Cobb County, north GEORGIA, organized in 1858. It may be the only church in America built on land requiring an Act of Congress to secure. Now in its third building, it is situated on a bluff overlooking Acworth and Allatoona Lakes.

The site belonged to the United States Government and was included in a fifty-year Master Plan for recreation. At the urging of Mr. and Mrs. Ray Harrison it was sought as the site for the Acworth church's relocation. W. A. "Pete" Roton, chairman of the Official Board, and many others worked to get Congressional action transferring 7.4 acres to the church, the bill being signed by President Eisenhower in September, 1957.

On his March to the Sea, General W. T. Sherman stopped in Acworth on June 4-9, 1864, ordering every church to be destroyed except the Methodist, then being used for a hospital. It is said that the real deciding factor was the Masonic Hall then on the second floor of the church building, and Sherman, it is alleged, favored the Masons.

For many years Acworth was on a circuit, becoming a full-time charge in 1957.

ADAM, THOMAS (1701-84), British Anglican, rector of Winterringham, Lincolnshire, was one of the fathers of Anglican Evangelicalism and a close friend and correspondent of SAMUEL WALKER. Adam's Private Thoughts on Religion, posthumously published (1786), impressed such intellectuals as Samuel Taylor Coleridge and John Stuart Mill. In 1755 Adam was consulted by JOHN WESLEY, on Walker's advice, about separation of the Methodists from the Church of England, and strongly urged against it.

ADAMS, CHARLES VAN NESS (1885-1970), banker and churchman, was born Aug. 11, 1885 at Port Royal, Pa., the son of Furman and Sarah (Van Ness) Adams. His father was a preacher in the CENTRAL PENNSYLVANIA CONFERENCE. Young Adams was educated at the school which is now LYCOMING COLLEGE. Later he served as a member of its board. Entering the field of banking, he was president of the First National Bank, Montoursville, Pennsylvania, 1920-65, and then became chairman of the board of directors.

An active churchman, Adams was church school superintendent at Montoursville for 31 years. He became a lay member of the Central Pennsylvania Conference in 1940 and for 12 years was conference LAY LEADER. He served 10 years as chairman of the conference board of education. He was a delegate to 10 General Conferences, 1928-64, and the 1939 Uniting Conference. Elected a member of the GENERAL BOARD OF MISSIONS in 1936, he served continuously until 1964. During that period he was chairman of the board's finance committee for 24 years, treasurer four years, and vice-president of the world division 16 years. On retiring in 1965, he made his home in Williamsport, Pa. He died there Aug. 7, 1970.

ADAMS, FRED WINSLOW (1866-1945), minister and authority on liturgy, was born in Belfast, Me., Aug. 31, 1866, the son of True Page and Dorcas Ellen (Winslow) Adams. His father was a member of the EAST MAINE CONFERENCE. Fred attended BOSTON UNIVERSITY three years, Harvard one year, and Yale Divinity School one year. SYRACUSE UNIVERSITY awarded him the honorary D.D. degree in 1905. He married Harriet Heath, June 11, 1901, and they had two sons.

Admitted on trial in the NEW YORK EAST CONFERENCE in 1896, Adams served churches in BROOKLYN, Yalesville, and NEW HAVEN. In 1902, he transferred to the TROY CONFERENCE where he was appointed to First Church, Schenectady, for the next 13 years. Going to the NEW YORK CONFERENCE in 1915, he was pastor of St. Andrew's Church, NEW YORK CITY, for one year, and then had two years as superintendent of the New York District. In 1918 he went to Trinity Church, SPRINGFIELD, Mass., where during a 12-year pastorate, he led in building the magnificent edifice for which that church is still known. The ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE met there in 1947.

Adams was professor of Liturgics at BOSTON UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY, 1930-37. Fond of liturgy, he was able to express and incorporate his views in the church he planned and built at Springfield. Beginning in 1936, he served several years on the commission on worship of the FEDERAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. For a short time before his death he was a member of the commission on worship of The Methodist Church where he emphatically expressed views which his compeers called the "High Church Methodist tradition." He claimed that every true liturgical prayer should have a series of elements which he carefully outlined. He was known and was in demand for two lectures: "Mark Twain and other Marks," and "James Whitcomb Riley, Prince of Hoosiers and Prophet of Cheer." Small of stature, positive in thought, and dynamic in speech, Adams exerted considerable influence in the general church. He died in Cambridge, Mass., May 21, 1945.

ADAMS, JOHN (1791-1850), American preacher and revivalist, was born in Newington, N.H., Feb. 14, 1791. His parents were John and Abigail Coleman Adams. Like the two United States presidents named John Adams, his ancestry may be traced to Henry Adams, who came from Essex, Eng., in 1635.

As a young shoemaker of 17, Adams was moved by a sermon delivered by GEORGE PICKERING, the first Methodist he had ever seen. Continuing under Methodist preaching he was converted on June 23, 1810, and shortly thereafter united with the church and was appointed a class leader.

In 1812 he joined the NEW ENGLAND CONFERENCE. During his ministry he was stationed at widely scattered points, primarily in MAINE, MASSACHUSETTS, and NEW HAMPSHIRE. Even when stationed he traveled widely, both in America and abroad, conducting revivals, speaking at camp meetings, and doing the work of an evangelist, often receiving from 100 to 300 people into his churches within a short time.

Because of his effectiveness as a revivalist and because "reformation" was his primary theme, he was known among his contemporaries as "Reformation John Adams."

He died September 30, 1850 at Newmarket, N. H.

ADAMS FAMILY, THE, of VIRGINIA, has left a record of distinguished service. Ann Adams, wife of Colonel William Adams, was converted in a Methodist revival in 1773, and soon won her husband and ten children to the faith.

"Church Hill," the Adams home, located near the Falls Anglican Church in Fairfax Co., was built in 1750. Torn down in 1964, woodwork from the house has been incorporated in "the Methodist (headquarters) Building" of Northern Virginia, and in the Wesley Foundation Chapel at the University of Virginia. A Methodist class was formed at "Church Hill" in 1774 and continued to meet there until 1778. This society became Fairfax Chapel, and it has two modern-day descendants: Dulin and Crossman Churches at Falls Church. The work at ALEXANDRIA was an outgrowth of the Adams class, and Trinity Church, Alexandria, began with a part of the original congregation.

Ann (Lawyer) Adams was born in Stafford Co. in 1732. Her husband, also born in Stafford Co. Nov. 3, 1723, was from a family which settled as early as 1677 near what became the town of Falls Church. He became county sheriff Nov. 23, 1768. In early life he was an Anglican and was active in and attended the Falls Church. George Washington's Ledger shows that in 1770 he paid one pound to Adams as his subscription toward decorating the Falls Church. "Church Hill" adjoined land owned by Washington, and his Diary refers to surveying with Colonel Adams on April 4, 1799.

"Church Hill" was the congenial home of Bishop ASBURY on numerous occasions. His Journal for Sat., May 12, 1781, says, Reached Mr. Adams's about eight o'clock at night: I always come to this house weary, but generally get my body and soul refreshed.

Colonel Adams died Sept. 4, 1809. Following Methodist practice at that time, he by his will gave freedom to more than twenty slaves.

The ten children born to William and Ann Adams were prominent in Methodist circles. Simon Adams served in the Revolutionary War and settled near LEXINGTON, KENTUCKY, in 1786. He was active in spreading Methodism in that state. While returning from a visit to Virginia, he was robbed and murdered near Pineville, Kentucky, in December 1809.

William Adams, son of Simon and Catherine (Wren) Adams, was born in Fairfax Co., Va., June 29, 1785. He was "piously educated, . . . joined the church at an early age, and in 1813 commenced preaching." In 1814 he joined the traveling connection and continued effective until his death in Shelby Co., Ky., in Aug., 1835. He served many years as secretary of the KENTUCKY CONFERENCE. He was married in 1803 to Ann Standiford, and their daughter, Frances, became the bride of Methodist preacher, William Gunn (1797-1853).

The second "Church Hill" son, William Adams, Jr., died unmarried Dec. 3, 1779, after a brief useful life in the ministry.

The third son, Samuel Adams, died Aug. 7, 1805 after an effective life as a preacher. By his will he gave freedom to his slaves, and he donated "fifty pounds . . . to the building of Methodist meeting houses."

The fourth son, Wesley Adams, was a pioneer preacher in GEORGIA and FLORIDA. He married three times and had 13 children. One daughter, Elizabeth, married Richard Tydings, a preacher. Charles Darius Adams, a grandson of Wesley Adams, was a Methodist preacher. He died in Pooler, Ga., Dec. 6, 1923.

The fifth "Church Hill" son, John Adams, died at 70 years of age in Dec., 1839, at LEESBURG. He was a class leader in the Old Stone Church at Leesburg, and was buried in the church yard.

The sixth son, Edward Adams, was a class leader in Loudoun Co.

Sarah Adams, a daughter of "Church Hill," was married June 6, 1778, to WILLIAM WATTERS, first native-born American Methodist itinerant. She died Oct. 29, 1845, leaving an extensive estate. By her will she freed her slaves.

Ann, another daughter of "Church Hill," married Colonel George Minor of "Minor's Hill," Fairfax Co. Minor was converted to Methodism and contributed the land for Fairfax Chapel at Falls Church. All of the Minor descendants were prominent in Methodist circles.

Susannah, or Sukey, Adams was born in 1766 at "Church Hill." In 1782 she married Captain Lewis Hipkins. After his death in 1794 she married Richard Wren, and their son, Thomas Sanford Wren, became prominent in Methodism—as are many of the Wren family descendants.

The tenth child of "Church Hill," Margaret Adams, married John Childs, a Methodist preacher. Licensed to preach in 1789, he located, was re-admitted to the traveling connection in 1816, located again in 1823, and then returned to the active work in 1827. John and Margaret Childs had eight children, including Mary Y. Childs who married John R. Wren. One son, John Wesley Childs (1800-1850), entered the Methodist ministry April 29, 1826. He was married in 1834 by JOHN EARLY, later bishop, to Martha Binns Susannah Rives. Early was a brother-in-law to Margaret Childs. J. Rives Childs, author and foreign service officer, is a grandson of John Wesley Childs.

Frances Ann Cooksey, daughter of Samuel and Jemima

(Darne) Adams, married Alexander Gustavus Brown (1833-1900), who served in the itinerancy and as financial secretary of RANDOLPH-MACON COLLEGE.

Raymond F. Wrenn, executive secretary of the Northern Virginia Methodist Board of Missions, is a descendant of James and Anne (Adams) Wrenn.

He received a B.A. from CENTRAL WESLEYAN COLLEGE, WARTENTON, Mo., in 1875 and an M.A. in 1886. Following his graduation he taught one year in the preparatory department of Central Wesleyan and then attended GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE, 1876-77. Admitted to the ST. Church, he became professor of German of the Mount Pleasant German College and IOWA WESLEYAN COLLEGE until 1885 when he accepted a pastorate at Pekin, Ill. for five years. In 1890 he was appointed professor of Practical Theology at Central Wesleyan College, and in 1895 he became president. He died in office on Jan. 31, 1910. During his presidency, the faculty and student body were expanded, new buildings erected, and Mount Pleasant German College absorbed. He was a delegate to the General Conferences of 1900, 1904 and 1908, and was a member of the University Senate of the M. E. Church. German Wallace College, Berea, O., granted him an honorary D.D. in 1898.

ADELAIDE, AUSTRALIA, is the capital of South Australia. Known as the City of Churches, Adelaide is the business center for the pastoral and industrial interests of South Australia. Historically, the strength of Methodism in Adelaide has always been considerable and due, in no small measure, to the enthusiastic witness of pioneer Methodist ministers and laymen. Adelaide is the metropolis of the South Australian Conference.

The Central Methodist Mission, Franklin St., Adelaide, S. Aust., is one of the major centers of urban work with the Australian church. It is also known locally as "Maughan," James Maughan being the first METHODIST NEW CONNEXION minister in the state and the founder of the Mission's original congregation in 1863. In 1888 the New Connexion Methodists merged with the BIBLE CHRISTIANS, the Franklin St. church becoming the major church of the latter denomination.

The Central Mission proper was established as the "West Adelaide Methodist Mission" at the first conference following Methodist union in 1900. Its beginnings owed much to the "Forward Movement" in British Methodism.

CENTRAL MISSION, ADELAIDE, AUSTRALIA

The Mission's advocates believed that the work of HUGH PRICE HUGHES and others in the Central Missions of the mother church provided a pattern which could be successfully followed in South Australia. For years the Mission's work was hampered by long-standing debts and it was not until the ministry of W. H. Cann that the finances were put on a sound footing and the institutional outreach of the Mission grew. Further growth took place under Cann's successor, Samuel Forsyth, O.B.E.

The Mission stands at the center of a network of institutions and services—Aldersgate Village (Homes for the Aged), "Lentara" Children's Homes, Kupto Colony (a men's rural rehabilitation center), Goodwill Store, and Lifeline Counselling Centre. The Mission is the major shareholder in a commercial radio station and its "Pleasant Sunday Afternoon" and evening service are broadcast each week.

In 1965 all buildings on the Franklin St. site were demolished and a new Mission Center with church, chapels, halls and various ancillary facilities were erected, at a cost of one million dollars.

During the ministry of A. Erwin Vogt, L.Th., in 1949, there has not only been considerable development in the Central Mission complex but both state and federal governments look upon the Mission's social institutions as models for all agencies to emulate.

Kate Cocks Babies' Home in the Adelaide suburb of Brighton is an institution maintained by the South Australian Conference for the care of unmarried mothers and the provision of facilities for the adoption of their children. It had its origins in the concern of Miss Kate Cocks, M.B.E., the first head of Women Police in the state, who in the 1930's began to care for pregnant girls in her own home. The interest of the church eventually led to the establishment in 1937 of the present institution in what had earlier been the Brighton Training Home (Bible College conducted by W. C. Torr, a Bible Christian schoolteacher) and later Brighton College. Its original name was "Methodist Home for Babies and Unmarried Mothers."

Miss Kate Cocks was herself in charge of the work from 1935 until her retirement in 1950. It is estimated that over 3,500 children have passed through the Home since its inception. It is administered by the Conference Women's Welfare Department, located on Wattle St., Broughton, S. Aust. Deaconess P. Bonython has been the superintendent since 1957.

Lincoln College, an incorporated body associated with the South Australia Conference, is to be distinguished from Wesley, Lincoln, opened in 1952, is the church's residential college within the University of Adelaide. The Master, W. F. HAMBLY, was President General from 1963-1966.

Pirie Street Methodist Church in the heart of the city of Adelaide is the "descendant" of the first Methodist congregation to meet in South Australia. Sometimes termed "the cathedral church," it was established on its present site in 1851. For half a century it was the major Wesleyan church and the parent congregation of many churches in the suburbs and country. The inaugural service of united Methodism took place at Pirie Street on Aug. 14, 1899, and the church has been the scene of many Annual and General Conferences. Numerous distinguished preachers from overseas have occupied its pulpit. Pirie Street has long had a reputation for its fine choral work and for its contribution to church music in South Australia.

Some of the names which stand out on its roll of ministers are those of DANIEL J. DRAPER, John C. Symons, William Butters, HENRY HOWARD, John G. Jenkin, and W. FRANK HAMBLY.

Under the leadership of Trevor Byard, appointed in 1965, Pirie Street Church has entered into union with the historic Stow Congregational Church, forming the "Union Church of the City," as of June 1, 1969.

Prince Alfred College in the Adelaide suburb of Kent Town is a Methodist boys' school providing education and accommodation (for a limited number), from first grade to the matriculation (pre-University) level. In the early years of the Colony of South Australia the Methodist Church conducted several day schools in city and country centers. With the development of the State educational system these declined and were closed. However, the desire for a boys' school under Methodist auspices persisted, an early resolution giving as the purpose of such an institution "the education of our sons and the training of candidates for the ministry."

The foundation stone of the College was laid by Prince Alfred, the Duke of Edinburgh, on Nov. 5, 1867, and classes commenced two years later. In 1902 Way College, a Bible Christian Boys' College, was closed and many of the students and staff transferred to Prince Alfred College. A sister school, Methodist Ladies' College, took over the Way College property in 1903. The College is now an incorporated body.

Wesley Theological College, Wayville, was established in 1927 with the Rev. FRANK LADE as the first principal. Prior to the setting up of this institution, students for the ministry had been trained at a college at Brighton and earlier at Prince Alfred College.

As with all Methodist theological institutions in Australia, Wesley College receives for training candidates accepted by the annual conference. Matriculated students undertake work at the University of Adelaide and concurrently study for diploma or degree examinations set by the Melbourne College of Divinity. A joint lecturing program brings together the faculty and students of three seminaries—Wesley (Methodist), Parkin (Congregational), and the Baptist College.

Incorporated with Wesley College is the Chapman Alexander Bible Institute. This was established as a lay training center in 1914 through the generosity of some Methodist laymen as a result of the impact of the Chapman-Alexander Evangelistic Missions of 1909 and 1912. In 1927 the Institute was handed over to the SOUTH AUSTRALIAN CONFERENCE which now undertakes responsibility for carrying out the founders' intentions. Evening classes offer a variety of courses to interested laymen.

ADRIAN, MICHIGAN, U.S.A., is a small city in the southeastern part of the state and a Methodist center. In the summer of 1830, Adrian was made a preaching point on a large wilderness circuit, and a society of five members was organized.

In 1837, following the building of the first railroad of the area from Toledo to Adrian, Adrian became a station. The first church was begun in 1838. It was a thick-walled brick church which stood until 1965—during its last century a Disciples of Christ church. By 1842 the Adrian church had 350 members and was for some years the largest church in Michigan. Methodist growth had been so rapid that in the summer of 1851 a second church was organized, but this was given up in 1858. In 1863-64 a large new brick church was built on Broad St., which was used for 98 years.

In 1854 the Adrian District was organized with ELIJAH H. PILCHER as presiding elder. In 1856 the DETROIT CONFERENCE was organized in Adrian. The MICHIGAN CONFERENCE had previously met here in 1842 and 1849. The Detroit Conference has met in Adrian repeatedly through the years—in 1864, 1877, 1886, 1904, 1921, 1939, 1956, and 1961-66.

In 1859 a college was moved to Adrian from Leoni under the WESLEYAN METHODIST banner. In 1866 ADRIAN COLLEGE became a Methodist Protestant college. A church called "The First Methodist Church" was organized at the college on April 14, 1867—a small group supported by college people until 1879, who never possessed a building. In the 1870's the Congregational church in Adrian fell upon evil days, and in 1879 it became the Plymouth Methodist Protestant Church. This church was supported by people related to the college and home mission funds of its denomination. In 1939 the Plymouth Church was merged with the First Church.

James V. Watson published in Adrian a monthly religious paper, The Family Favorite, in 1849-50, and then an early Michigan Christian Advocate (which see), before he went on to the editorship of the Northwestern Christian Advocate in Chicago. The Adrian District Methodist, a monthly paper, was begun at Adrian in October 1873 by Orrin Whitmore, presiding elder. In Jan., 1874 this paper became the Michigan Christian Advocate and continues to this day.

A Uniting Conference, bringing together the M. E. and M. P. churches of Michigan, was held at Adrian in 1939.

The Adrian church erected a new building near the college in 1961-62 at a cost of about $800,000. Church membership has been increasing in recent years and in 1969 stood at nearly 1,300. The Detroit Annual Conference usually meets at Adrian College, with First Church sharing the responsibilities of host.

ADRIAN COLLEGE, Adrian, Michigan, chartered in 1859, traces its origin to the Wesleyan Theological Institute founded in 1845 by the WESLEYAN METHODIST CHURCH. The college was transferred to the METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH in 1868 and continued under these auspices until Unification in 1939. After this union the college was successfully integrated into the educational program of The Methodist Church in Michigan. The phenomenal growth of the college is reflected in a comparison of the value of holdings in physical plant and endowment: In 1939 its properties were worth $489,795; in 1966 the total value was $11,402,169. It grants the A.B. and B.S. degrees. The governing board consists of twenty-seven trustees elected by Detroit and Michigan Annual Conferences.

ADRIANCE, JACOB (1835-1922), American preacher and western pioneer, was born Oct. 22, 1835 in Aurelius, Cayuga Co., N. Y. He was converted at age sixteen and almost from the first felt that he was destined to preach. He attended Wilson Collegiate Institute.

In 1857 Adriance moved to NEBRASKA, settling in DeSota. He was received on trial in the Kansas-Nebraska Conference in 1858 and moved to Fremont, where he assumed charge of the Platte Valley Circuit, which had twelve points to visit over a 300-mile route and took a month to cover.

In 1859 he transferred to Pikes Peak, accompanying Presiding Elder WILLIAM H. GOODE to the Cherry Creek Mission. Together they became the founders of Methodism in COLORADO. He and Goode founded the first Methodist organization at historic Central City. Later he helped start congregations in Golden, DENVER, and Boulder. The Denver church became the famed Trinity Church. His great energy and determination won him great respect, even among the hard-bitten gold miners who had swarmed into Colorado. He organized the first Sunday school in the state. It was a union school with all groups cooperating in it. He was appointed chaplain to the lower house of the Colorado legislature as the Territory's provisional government was formed.

In 1860 Adriance returned to New York, where he married Fannie A. Rogers. They went back to Colorado that same year, and she frequently accompanied her husband on his circuit visits.

In 1862 he went to Nebraska where he located until being readmitted into the conference in 1864. He served several large circuits until deafness forced him to give up his church work.

Adriance kept a meticulous diary of his work in the mining area, and this has become a valued source of early Methodist history there.

He died Dec. 18, 1922 at Fremont, Neb.

ADVANCE FOR CHRIST AND HIS CHURCH. Under this name a formal quadrennial program of The Methodist Church, U.S.A., was carried on for the four years from 1948 to 1952. In a sense this move was a continuation of the CRUSADE FOR CHRIST, which had been a similar emphasis and movement during the previous quadrennium. The Crusade for Christ had proved highly successful, and in order not to lose the momentum of interest which the general church had achieved in world-wide rehabilitation, and especially in funds for missionary and church extension causes, "The Advance," as it was commonly called, was planned and put on by the General Conference of 1948.

The BOARD OF MISSIONS and the METHODIST COMMITTEE ON OVERSEAS RELIEF were the only beneficiaries of the Advance. The annual income from this source to the two agencies exceeded what they had received during the corresponding four years from the Crusade for Christ. There was a Week of Dedication as part of the Advance program, not for the purpose of emphasis, but in order that a special appeal might be made for specific objects as a part of the Advance. Contributions were made by individual churches to specific objects not otherwise provided for in the general program, and securing these special was made the responsibility of the respective district superintendents.

Following the close of the period for the Crusade in 1952, its emphasis and appeal was made a regular feature of missionary outreach of The Methodist Church. Thus "mission specials," and the Week of Dedication were made permanent in The Methodist Church.

Crusade Scholarships were a part of the Crusade movement, and this has resulted in the bringing in of numerous chosen young people to the United States by Crusade Scholarship funds. These funds have cared for their expenses and given them an opportunity to be trained for leadership. The scholarships have also been available for students of the United States.

Bishop COSTEN J. HARRELL was general chairman of the Advance Committee, and its executive director was Dr. E. Harold Mohn. The treasurer of World Service, Dr. Thomas B. Lugg, was made treasurer of the Advance. Each Jurisdiction was represented on the Advance Committee, and through the quadrennium, by able promotional work and emphasizing the idea of sacrificial givings and Advance Specials, it accomplished much for the church. The formal report of the Advance Committee to the General Conference of 1952 may be consulted for an overall description of its work and accomplishments.

N. B. 11.

ADVENT, The Second, and ADVENTISM. The return of Christ to earth to inaugurate the final RESURRECTION, the last judgment and the end of the world has been traditionally described as the Second Advent. The expectation of Christ's return has been part of traditional Christian belief from New Testament times. It is sometimes described as the Parousia (Greek for "coming" or "presence"), and it would be more correct to call it the final than the second advent, because Christ also returned to earth at his resurrection and he continues to return in so far as he dwells within men. Although many New Testament Christians expected his final return to take place in the near future, the Church came eventually to accept the belief that it would be long delayed. There have been numerous attempts to calculate the date of the Second Advent, and those who have made these attempts have usually come to the conclusion that it would happen very soon. But these detailed predictions have not been accepted by the main Christian churches.

The belief in the Second Advent was itself a modification of the Jewish Messianic hope. Many Jews expected a Messiah to come as the nation's deliverer to inaugurate a new and blessed era; and some forms of this expectation linked his coming with the future judgment and resurrection. Christians, however, believed that since Jesus was the Messiah, the Messianic age had already begun. But the last judgment and the final resurrection had not taken place, and they expected Jesus to return again to earth for these events.

There has been a great amount of detailed discussion of the New Testament teaching about the Second Advent. Most of the New Testament books contain a reference to it, and Paul expected it to occur in the near future (1 Thess. 4:13-18; 1 Cor. 15:20-57). The argument that he changed his views later in his life is put forward by some scholars but it has not won general acceptance. When a later generation of Christians realized that Jesus was not going to return as soon as the first Christians expected, they began to modify their views (II Pet. 3:1-10), and some scholars claim that this modification was already being made by the writers of the synoptic gospels, especially by Luke. But there is evidence even in these writings that his advent was expected soon (Mark 13:28-37; Luke 21:29-36). The gospel and letters of John contain an emphasis which has greatly appealed to modern interpreters. Although they retain the expectation of Christ's return (John 5:25-29; 6:40, 44, 54; 1 John 2:18; 3:2), they also affirm that men receive either eternal life or judgment in the present, according to their reaction to Christ (John 3:16-21, 36; 1 John 5:12). The return of Christ, some writers believe, will be preceded by special signs, many of which will be supernatural (Mark 13:1-21; II Thess. 2:1-12; Rev. 6:1-20:10). But in other passages it is asserted that his return will be sudden and unexpected (Matt. 25:13; Mark 13:32; I Thess. 5:2). New Testament writers have disagreed widely about Jesus' own teaching on this subject. According to the gospel writers, he predicted that he himself would return to earth. This is beyond dispute since the gospels not only contain prophecies of the Son of Man's return (e.g. Matt. 24:30; Mark 14:62; Luke 21:27; John 5:25-29) but they also identify Jesus with the Son of Man (e.g. Mark 8:31 and parallels; John 5:26-27). Many scholars, however, regard the New Testament as unreliable at this point, some of them denying that Jesus ever prophesied the advent of a Messiah, and others claiming that although he expected the coming of the Son of Man, he did not identify himself with him. Many other scholars contend that the gospels are correct in recording that Jesus prophesied his own return.

Scholars have also disagreed about the essential emphasis of Jesus' teaching on this subject. C. H. Dodd has claimed that Jesus' distinctive message was a realized eschatology, the teaching that the kingdom of God had already come in his own ministry. Dodd agrees that there are predictions about the future in Jesus' teaching, but he claims that the original and distinctive feature of his message is its teaching about the present. Dodd's view has been modified by Joachim Jeremias who speaks of an "eschatology in the process of realization." Rudolf Bultmann, on the other hand, claims that the distinctive feature of Jesus' teaching is his proclamation of the imminence of the kingdom of God and the challenge to decision which accompanies this proclamation. Oscar Cullmann, however, claims that in the teaching of Jesus, as in the rest of the New Testament, there is a tension between present and future eschatology. Jesus proclaims that the Messianic age has already come with his own ministry but at the same time he proclaims that it will come in its fullness at his Second Advent. Here is a tension between the "already" and the "not yet," which, Cullmann claims, runs right through the New Testament.

Although the interpretation of Jesus' teaching on this subject is highly controversial, there is no doubt that the New Testament writers themselves expected him to return, and that this expectation was one of the main themes of the early Christian message.

A much discussed problem connected with the Second Advent is the interpretation of the millennium (period of a thousand years) mentioned in Rev. 20:1-10. Many early Christians were premillenarians, believing that the Lord would return visible to earth before the millennium. By the end of the fourth century this view was rejected mainly because of the influence of Origen and Augustine. It has been revived from time to time, especially by mystical groups in the middle ages and by Anabaptists at the time of the Reformation. During the nineteenth and twentieth centuries it has been held by numerous members of the Holiness and Pentecostalist movements as well as by the Plymouth Brethren, the Mormons, the Christadelphians, the Jehovah's Witnesses, the Seventh Day Adventists and other groups. By contrast with the premillenarians Augustine suggested that the whole period during which the earthly church existed was the millennium. This interpretation is postmillennial since it assumed that Christ will not return visibly until after the millennium. Other interpreters feel no need to give an account of the millennium at all, and they argue that since there is no other evidence of millennial teaching in the New Testament, disproportionate emphasis has been given to the one passage in Revelation.

Other problems connected with the Second Advent are whether it will be visible and whether the resurrection which will follow it will be bodily. In connection with the final judgment some theologians have revised the traditional belief in eternal punishment and have argued that ultimately all men will be saved (universalism, a doctrine which was taught as early as the third century by Origen); others have argued that while the redeemed will live eternally, the damned will cease to exist (annihilationism, or conditional immortality). Another question is whether eternal life will be in time or beyond time. And yet another is whether men will sleep or will have a conscious existence between their physical deaths and the final resurrection. Those who believe in a conscious intermediate stage disagree about its nature, some regarding it as a probationary period, and others not.

The Wesleys. The Wesleys fully shared the traditional expectation. CHARLES WESLEY'S hymns refer to it, as for example, the hymn "Lo! He comes with clouds descending." JOHN WESLEY often speaks of the Second Advent, and he has outlined in considerable detail his beliefs about the future of mankind and the world. He claims that at the moment of an individual's death, when the soul is separated from the body, an intermediate state begins, in which the righteous man enjoys happiness and the condemned man is punished. A man's fate will be confirmed at the last judgment when all men, women and children will receive a sentence of acquittal or condemnation which will be final and irrevocable (Works V, pp. 174-180; VI, pp. 381-391, 496-497). He also argues that animals as well as human beings will share in the final redemption (Works VI, pp. 241-252).

In his Notes on the New Testament Wesley, closely following the interpretation of the German scholar Bengel, puts forward a striking but not generally accepted theory about Rev. 20:1-10. He claims that the destruction of the Beast, which he believes to be a future Pope, will occur in A.D. 1836. This event will be followed by two millenniums (periods of a thousand years), the first of which will bring an era of great blessedness when the Church will make remarkable progress. At the end of this first millennium Satan, who has been imprisoned, will be loosed, and the second millennium will begin, during which the saints will reign in heaven and people on earth "will be careless and insecure." At the end of the second millennium Christ will return visibly to earth in glory, Satan will be thrown into the lake of fire, the final resurrection and the last judgment will take place, and the new heaven, the new earth, and the new Jerusalem will appear (Notes on the New Testament, pp. 999, 1036-1041, 1051).

This interpretation of Revelation is not an example of premillennialism, the belief that Christ will return to earth before the millennium. Wesley clearly states that the beginning of each millennium will take place in the invisible world and will be unknown to men. Christ will not return visibly until both periods have been completed. This theory has not been generally accepted by Methodists and it is doubtful how much importance Wesley himself attached to it. But he did emphasize the Second Advent, the final resurrection and the last judgment, and he also stressed the importance of the Church's mission to all nations and its future glory on the earth (Works V, pp. 37-52; VI, pp. 277-288).

Methodist Teaching in the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries. The leading Methodist theologians of the nineteenth century, including ADAM CLARKE and W. BURT POPE in Britain and JOHN MILEY in America, believed in the visible return of Christ. They rejected premillennialism. They taught that there was an intermediate state in which men consciously existed between their deaths and the last judgment, but they did not regard this state as in any way similar to Purgatory. They believed that after the last judgment the redeemed would enjoy everlasting happiness and the condemned would suffer everlasting punishment. Pope also laid special emphasis on the future glory of the Church on earth, which he believed would be accomplished before the Second Advent. None of them attempted to defend the details of Wesley's account of Rev. 20:1-10, and Clarke stated that the key to the prophecies of the Book of Revelation was not yet known to men, and that much of the book's teaching should be understood as merely symbolical representation.

The great success of the missionary movement and the general social progress of the Western world had its effect on theologians in the closing years of the nineteenth century. The British scholar, J. AGAR BEET, for example, whose account of the Second Advent was sufficiently traditional to expect a visible return of Christ, argued that there was so much spiritual progress in the present age that Christ would not return in the near future—his coming would take place only in an age of spiritual stagnation. Beet was conservative in his outlook, but other theologians of this and later periods were strongly affected by the tides of liberal thought. Their influence reached its peak in the first thirty years of the twentieth century, and it survived even after the Second World War. These theologians saw the future, not in terms of a spectacular divine intervention, but in terms of the gradual growth of the Kingdom of God on earth. They also believed in the immortality of the individual, and they regarded the ultimate goal as eternal life beyond this world. But they laid great emphasis on the building of a perfect earthly community, in which all men would be obedient to God. The Church had a special task to play in the establishment of this community, and the task would extend over a long period of time. They recognized that there could be setbacks in the process of the Kingdom's growth, and some of them admitted that the Kingdom would never be perfectly completed on earth. They all affirmed that God's activity was necessary for the growth and perfecting of the Kingdom, and they discerned his activity in the inspiration of the indwelling Spirit and in the gift of an ideal for which they could work. Among British representatives of this type of thought are JOHN SCOTT LIDGETT, ARTHUR SAMUEL PEAKE, and T. F. GLASSON. Among American representatives are BORDEN P. BOWNE, HARRIS FRANKLIN RALL, and EDWIN LEWIS.

After the First World War a reaction against liberal theology began and this was evident in Methodist thought about the Second Advent. Indeed before this time the American, OLIN A. CURTIS, was emphasizing that any progress on earth was no more than a preparation for the ultimate goal of the new, eternal and spiritual race in Christ. The American, ALBERT C. KNUDSON, although his sympathy with the new reaction was strictly limited, said that the importance of the earthly ideal ought not to be exaggerated, and that the emphasis should be put on the social character of the life hereafter. In his later writings Harris Franklin Rall did not speak as confidently of the attainment of the earthly kingdom as he did in his earlier works. Other theologians, while not denying the possibility of progress on earth, refuse to link this question with their understanding of the Second Advent. They also emphasize that God and man will inaugurate the final events. Among British Methodists who make this emphasis are H. M. HUGHES and John Lawson, and among American Methodists are L. HAROLD DEWOLF, Mack B. Stokes, and Claude H. Thompson. These writers do not commit themselves to a belief in the visible descent of Christ at his Second Advent, but they claim that the world will end in a manner worthy of its creator, and that the God who passes judgment will be a God of love. They also believe that God gives men life immediately after death.

The contrast between liberalism and the reaction against it has not been as great in Methodist as in Continental theology, and the distinction between the two groups of scholars is often a very fine one. The main differences are about the relation of the final events to the social and spiritual progress of mankind, and the extent to which human cooperation plays a part in the coming of the Kingdom. The second group is also more ready than the first to speak explicitly of the Second Advent, although it does not claim to know what precise form it will take.

Of the twentieth century writers who have been mentioned, some teach universalism, the belief that all men will ultimately be saved (Lewis), and some believe that after death there will be an intermediate state of preparation (Curtis) or even of remedial punishment or spiritual discipline (Glasson, Hughes, Lawson), but these views are not shared by all of the two groups. Another viewpoint which is certainly not typical of Methodist teaching is that of the British preacher, LESLIE D. WEATHERHEAD, who, in addition to affirming a belief in universalism and in a period of discipline after death, argues in favor of reincarnation.

Since the end of the Second World War, existentialism and demythologizing have become central topics of theological discussion, and these influences are reflected in the work of the American theologians CARL MICHALSON and Schubert Ogden, both of whom reject the expectation of a Second Advent. Michalson claims that Christ has already given new meaning to life because in him God has granted to man the responsibility of ruling the world. Ogden argues that man's final destiny is to be loved by God, as he opens himself in faith to God and as he loves both God and men. This destiny is achieved in this life, and it does not depend on personal survival of death.

While some Methodists have adhered strictly to the traditional expectation of a visible Second Advent, the leading Methodist theologians of the twentieth century have all modified the traditional view, although the extent of their modifications has varied greatly. Controversy on this matter has been less heated in Methodism than in some other denominations. The dispute over the Second Advent has been part of the dispute about biblical literalism. It was one of the issues in the attack on Borden P. Bowne and H. C. Mitchell in the first decade of the century, and when HAROLD PAUL SLOAN attempted to secure a revision of the American Methodist "COURSES OF STUDY," the Second Advent was one of the traditional positions which he was concerned to maintain (1916-1928). The outcome of these controversies was that Methodism allowed a great liberty of interpretation with respect to this and related doctrines (see BIBLE, AUTHORITY OF).

Another source of division in both the nineteenth and the twentieth centuries has been the spread of premillennialism, the belief that Christ will visibly return to earth before the millennium. Although Methodists are far removed in outlook from premillennialists such as the Mormons, the Seventh Day Adventists, and the Jehovah's Witnesses, they have a greater spiritual link with the premillennialists of the Holiness and Pentecostalist movements, chiefly because of the traditional Methodist emphasis on perfection. Dissatisfied Methodists have played a large part in the development of the Holiness movement, and some of the leaders of twentieth century Pentecostalism, like, for example, C. F. Parham in America and T. B. Barratt in Norway, were formerly Methodists. But many of the Methodists in the Holiness movement, like PHINEAS BRESEE of the CHURCH OF THE NAZARENE, did not accept premillennialism. The doctrine has not been popular among practicing Methodist ministers and it has been consistently rejected by leading Methodist theologians. Its pessimistic attitude to human affairs has never been consistent with the typical Methodist ethos, and premillennialists have not usually found the Methodist Church to be a congenial spiritual home.

Although the traditional hymns, the liturgies, the creeds, and the doctrinal standards of Methodism include references to the Second Advent, the Final Resurrection and the Last Judgment, Methodism in practice allows great liberty in the interpretation of these doctrines. The traditional presentation of these doctrines needs revision in the twentieth century. But in spite of their differences of opinion most twentieth century Methodist theologians have preserved certain characteristics which have always been part of Methodism's heritage. These include a confidence in the ultimate triumph of God, a belief in life after death, an awareness of man's accountability before God, an emphasis on the inwardness of religion, and an urgent desire to preach the gospel to all nations and to improve both the material and the spiritual condition of mankind. ADVOCATE, CHRISTIAN, American bi-weekly journal for Methodist ministers, carries news items and articles on church polity and practice as these are related to current events. Published by the Methodist Publishing House, on order of the GENERAL CONFERENCE, at Nashville, Tennessee, with editorial offices in Park Ridge, Illinois, it is presently one of three publications comprising the official general church periodicals. The other two are Together and Religion in Life. The Central Christian Advocate, formerly in this group, was discontinued with the dissolution of the Central Jurisdiction.

CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE

PUBLISHED BY S. BANGS AND J. EMORY, FOR THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.—E. BADGER, EDITOR

Vol. I. NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 9, 1826. No. 1.

...of the Christian character is an abiding sentiment of remorse, and this sense there is understood as that which brings forth all the fruits. ...

For the Christian Advocate.
The address of God from the lips of those who have been his instruments, who make the ground to be covered with a store of gold, is those things having an end, than to those of their service. ...

...that the worst, when by death is the only way to escape, you may see all the things they have done for the souls of men. ...

MEMORIAL INTENTION.
The Methodist Episcopal Church, and the conference, the Methodist Episcopal Church, and the conference, the Methodist Episcopal Church, and the conference, ...

...to his face. He was solemn, dignified, and his great in all his actions. His countenance was much more distinct than the others, and he was ...

...the great first cause. And this something which every cause and effect, is contained by something which wholly independent of themselves—by some first cause. ...

As published today the Christian Advocate, with Together, perpetuates the name and the tradition of the weekly Methodist newspaper, the Christian Advocate, first issued September 9, 1826, by the Methodist Book CONCERN in New York City. This newspaper was begun under the direction of NATHAN BANGS, then senior Book STEWARD. Its first editor was Barber Badger who, though his name appeared on the masthead as editor, performed his duties under the close supervision of Bangs. Bangs became editor in title and fact in 1828, serving in this capacity from 1828 to 1832, and again from 1834 to 1836.

Begin as a part of Bangs's program to make American Methodism more American, the Christian Advocate at the outset had as its purpose "to promote the Kingdom of Christ on earth and to increase the sum of human happiness . . ." To "afford delight and instruction to all classes of men" was also included in its objective. Readers hailed it for "spreading Christian holiness throughout the land." Almost immediately successful—the first printing of 5,000 copies was soon exhausted—the Christian Advocate in 1827 merged with The Wesleyan Journal in Charleston, S. C., which had been begun in 1825. Following this merger, four other unofficial (conference or private) papers from PHILADELPHIA to the HOLSTON CONFERENCE joined the central organ. Out of the merger with The Wesleyan Journal came the title Christian Advocate and Journal, which held until 1828. In that year ZION'S HERALD, an unofficial publication of New England Methodism, was purchased by the Book Concern, so that the title of the Christian Advocate and Journal became the Christian Advocate and Journal and Zion's Herald. This title stood until 1833, when the Zion's Herald portion was dropped, to be bestowed upon a new publication of the Wesleyan Association in BOSTON. The New York paper continued as the Christian Advocate and Journal until 1866, when the title was changed to The Christian Advocate, with a New York dateline.

The widespread popularity of the paper, which by 1828 had the largest circulation of any publication religious or secular in the nation (25,000), prompted the rise of similar journals throughout the church, designed to serve smaller geographic areas. The 1830's were an age of sectionalism, and each section desired its own news organ to treat local events. Thus, at a very early period was raised the problem of how to make a national publication locally appealing. For the 1830's the solution seemed to be a multiplication of papers. In 1834 the Book Concern, at its Western branch in CINCINNATI, began publication of the Western Christian Advocate. Such a stir in other sections was caused by this action that the General Conference of 1836 accorded official sanction to several more sectional journals. These were the Southwestern Christian Advocate, Nashville, Tennessee; the Richmond Christian Advocate, Richmond, Virginia; the Southern Christian Advocate, Charleston, South Carolina; and the Pittsburgh Christian Advocate, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania. The newer papers were published by committees but underwritten by the Book Concern. Consequently they were not so directly identified with the Book Concern as were the papers in New York and Cincinnati.

During the next two decades such arrangements were made for still more papers: the Northern Christian Advocate (Auburn, New York, officialized 1844); the Cal- ifornia Christian Advocate (San Francisco, officialized 1852); the Pacific Christian Advocate (Salem, Oregon, officialized 1856). In addition to these papers sponsored by the Book Concern in New York, the Western Book Concern (after 1836 a separately chartered enterprise), with General Conference sanction, in 1853 began the Northwestern Christian Advocate in Chicago. In 1856 this Concern was authorized to publish the Central Christian Advocate, in St. Louis, a paper that had been begun locally in 1852. In 1868, the Western Concern, with General Conference approval, assumed publication responsibility for the Methodist Advocate, begun several years earlier as a private publication in Atlanta, Georgia. In 1876 the New York Concern was authorized to underwrite the Southwestern Christian Advocate in New Orleans, Louisiana. The Atlanta paper, long known as the Methodist Advocate-Journal, in 1925 became the South-eastern Christian Advocate, then later the Southern Edition of the Western Christian Advocate. In 1884 it was moved to Athens, Tennessee, then to Cincinnati. The Southwestern Christian Advocate, by 1896 being spoken of as the publication of the Negro members of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the South, was for a time the Southwestern Edition of the Western Christian Advocate. For the most part, however, it continued as a more or less separate publication and was the forerunner of the Central Christian Advocate, published for the Central Jurisdiction, 1940-1968.

The individual sectional papers begun during the nineteenth century came more directly into the tradition of the Christian Advocate during the early years of the twentieth century. In October, 1931, those that had not merged with older and larger papers became editions of The Christian Advocate—A National Weekly. Besides the papers already mentioned, others, including The Methodist (privately published in New York City from 1860 to 1884), the Omaha Christian Advocate (Omaha, Nebraska) and the Rocky Mountain Christian Advocate (Denver, Colorado) merged into the mainstream of The Christian Advocate between 1884 and 1917.

By 1940 The Christian Advocate—A National Weekly was being published in five editions: the New York, the Cincinnati, the Central (Kansas City), the Northwestern (for Chicago, but edited in Kansas City), and the Pacific (San Francisco). These editions were chiefly made up of standard material, modified by localized news pages for the different sections.

Methodist Protestant Papers. In a sense it might be said that the METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH was founded on and sustained by the strength of its church papers, which in 1941, together with the paper of the METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, SOUTH, merged into The Christian Advocate. Prior to the 1828 rift in the Methodist Episcopal Church, and even before the beginning of the Christian Advocate in 1826, a publication entitled the Wesleyan Repository was being published in Philadelphia by a Reformer, WILLIAM S. STOCKTON. As the organ of those Episcopal Methodists with republican sentiments, the Wesleyan Repository lasted from 1821 to 1824, when it was succeeded by a publication entitled Mutual Rights, published in Baltimore from 1824 to 1828. Those persons adhering to the editorial policies of Mutual Rights, which advocated lay representation in the courts of the church, became, generally speaking, the first members of the Methodist Protestant Church, when it was officially called into being between 1828 and 1830. In 1828 Mutual Rights became Mutual Rights and Christian Intelligencer; this, in 1831, was succeeded by The Mutual Rights and Methodist Protestant. In 1834 the paper became The Methodist Protestant.

During the 1850's controversy over the slavery issue led to a plea from the Northern and Western conferences of the Methodist Protestant Church for a church organ with an anti-slavery editorial policy. Unable to effect a change in the Methodist Protestant, which remained editorially silent on the subject, the Northern and Western conferences purchased the Western Recorder, privately begun by CORNELIUS SPRINGER in 1839 in Zanesville, Ohio. At this time the Methodist Protestant became the organ of the Southern and Eastern conferences. (In effect, the church divided over the support of the papers.) When the Western Recorder was purchased from ANGEL BASSETT, who had bought it from Springer, its title was changed to the Western Methodist Protestant. In 1860 its place of publication was moved from Zanesville to Springfield, Ohio. Until 1866 it was published as the Western Methodist Protestant, the title being changed in that year to the Methodist Recorder. This was the organ of the short-lived denomination known as The Methodist Church, which resulted from the ill-consummated union of the Wesleyan Methodist Church and the Western portion of the Methodist Protestant Church in 1866. In 1871 the place of publication of the Methodist Recorder was moved from Springfield to Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania.

Although The Methodist Church and the Methodist Protestant Church united in 1877 (both together becoming the Methodist Protestant Church), the Methodist Recorder and the Methodist Protestant, continued as separate papers until 1929, when they merged to become The Methodist Protestant Recorder, circulated from Baltimore. For a brief time (August 1940 to December 1940) this paper was published under the title The Methodist Recorder, signifying the merger of the Methodist Protestant Church into The Methodist Church in 1939.

Papers of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. When the North-South split occurred in the METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH in 1844, church papers being published in the South, as the responsibility of local committees, immediately became organs of the Southern church. These included the Southwestern Christian Advocate (Nashville), the Southern Christian Advocate (Charleston), and the Richmond Christian Advocate. In the ten-year interval between the division in the church and the establishment of the Southern Methodist Publishing House, the number of officially sanctioned church papers in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, increased substantially. By 1854 there were nine such organs being published in Nashville, Richmond, Charleston, St. Louis, Galveston, Louisville, Memphis, and San Francisco. The General Conference, however, assumed financial responsibility for only those in Nashville, Charleston, and St. Louis.

By 1858 it was evident that the denomination could not support such an array of publications and the General Conference singled out the Nashville paper for its official sanction, offering ownership of the other organs to the conferences. Thus, almost from the beginning of its publishing program, the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, had only one official paper, although from time to time during the 1800's and early 1900's, the Southern Methodist Publishing House assumed the cost of the Pacific Methodist, published in San Francisco. The Nashville paper had been privately begun as the Western Methodist in 1833. In 1836, when officially recognized, it became the South-Western Christian Advocate, and in 1846 the Nashville Christian Advocate. For a brief interval it merged with a Louisville publication to become the Nashville and Louisville Christian Advocate (1851-1854). Reverting to Nashville Christian Advocate in 1854, its title became Christian Advocate in 1858, and so remained until Unification.

Since Unification. On January 2, 1941, the five organs of the Methodist Episcopal Church (New York, Cincinnati, Central, Northwestern, and Pacific edition of The Christian Advocate), the Christian Advocate of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, and The Methodist Recorder of the Methodist Protestant Church, were merged into one periodical with five editions, one for each of the geographical jurisdictions of the church. Published in Chicago, this paper on all its editions bore the title The Christian Advocate, the editions being distinguished by number. The arrangement continued until 1951 when The Christian Advocate, modified by area news inserts, appeared. In 1956 the General Conference authorized a major change in the program of periodical publications, which resulted in a division of The Christian Advocate into two distinctly different publications: Together, which carried forward the family publication tradition of The Christian Advocate; and the New Christian Advocate, which carried forward the ministerial-journal tradition of the paper.

Both magazines, published monthly, were begun in October, 1956. The area-news-supplement arrangement was continued in Together, which has carried Area News Editions since 1957. These area news editions are called TANES: Together Area News Editions. In 1960 the New Christian Advocate, originally published in digest format, became the Christian Advocate, on a bi-weekly publication schedule and in conventional magazine format, which is its present style. Together continues as the monthly magazine for Methodist families, issued as a handsomely designed and colorfully illustrated publication employing methods of contemporary journalism both with regard to technical and editorial production.

Together and the Christian Advocate are produced under the supervision of an Editorial Director, elected quadrennially by the Board of Publication, which also elects the editors of the two publications. At present the Christian Advocate has a circulation of approximately 38,000; Together a circulation of approximately 700,000.

Character of the Advocate Over the Years. Since 1826 the church papers that form the background of today's Christian Advocate have played decisive roles in the history of the denomination. Begun strictly as newspapers, designed to inform the reader about happenings in the world around him as well as within the church, the early nineteenth century publications were made up of church news, sermons, items of general interest (more often than not clipped from other publications), and helpful features of various kinds to improve the physical and spiritual well-being of the reader. Without exception the early editors took positive stands on issues of the day, and employed both wit and sarcasm to make their points. Doctrinal controversy being of special significance, the editors of Methodist papers frequently crossed swords with their fellows in other churches (and often in their own). Because the Methodist itinerant ministers assumed responsibility as agents for the Methodist papers, these were usually more effectively distributed than papers of other denominations, and thus early became popular media for the advertising profession, which is said to have had its origin in the church press. Seldom able to support themselves by circulation income alone, the Methodist papers continually battled their own consciences (and the opinions of their readers) on the subject of the propriety of the advertisements, many of which were for cure-alls and other nostrums. Often economics won out, although ultimately by setting high standards of their own, the church press was instrumental in raising the standards of advertising in general.

As the nineteenth century grew older and secular publications multiplied, the church newspapers suffered declining circulations. To keep abreast of changing tastes, the newspaper format and concept of the church paper gradually changed to that of the magazine. The mechanization of the printing industry in the last two decades of the century brought about radical changes in style, until by the middle of the second decade of the twentieth century the papers bore recognizable characteristics of present-day publications. The change in format from newspaper to magazine was accompanied by a change in editorial approach, the news-centered item giving way to the editorial and the feature article. Throughout the nineteenth century the papers here mentioned were typically circulated to subscribers numbering from 10,000 to 50,000, at rates varying over the years from $1.00 to $3.00.

Testimony to the importance of the church papers of Methodism that are ancestors of today's Christian Advocate is the fact that many of their editors later rose to ranks of high official importance in the denomination. In the episcopal Methodisms, the step from the editor's post to the bishop's chair was often short and easily made. And in the Methodist Protestant Church scarcely was any influence more widely felt than that of the editor. Significantly, while the papers during the nineteenth century were powerful instruments of division within the denomination, during the twentieth century they became the most powerful "advocates" of union.

While not directly in the tradition of the papers that form the background of the Christian Advocate, it is interesting to note that during the nineteenth century especially in the Methodist Episcopal Church, several foreign language newspapers were either directly published or subsidized by the publishing houses of the denominations. By far the most successful and influential was Der Christliche Apologete, a German version of the Christian Advocate, which began publication in Cincinnati in 1839 and lasted for a century. Addressed to the German Methodists, this weekly paper was of major importance in the growth of the church among immigrants and first generation Germans in the Ohio Valley. Similar papers in Bohemian, Swedish, and Norwegian were also published during the latter part of the nineteenth century and the early part of the twentieth century under the sponsorship of the Methodist Book Concern.

AFRICA. This immense area was, for many centuries, known as the "Dark Continent," due mainly to the lack of knowledge of the continent because of its inaccessibility, and the generally assumed backwardness of its inhabitants. This lack of accessibility applied especially to the part of the continent below the Sahara Desert. EGYPT (and to some extent Ethiopia) and North Africa have been known to Europeans for many centuries. In fact, Egypt has long been recognized as having a civilization that dates back for many centuries, antedating that of Greece and Rome. In the years following World War II, however, much of the lack of information and consequent mystery about Africa and the Africans has been cleared up, due to the greatly improved communications media and transportation facilities. It is now known that the peoples of Africa have always had a culture of their own, and that their development has paralleled that of similar groups elsewhere at the same stages of their development.

The emergence of the new African nations into the political life of the Western world has increased the significance of Africa and the Africans for the rest of that world. Their presence in the United Nations and the associated agencies of that body is exceedingly important to the peace of the world. Certain facts, therefore, relative to the continent should be known in order to have an intelligent approach to a knowledge of the history of the Christian missionary enterprise on that continent. These facts have to do with the land area, its history, and its population.

The Continent of Africa is the second largest in the world. It comprises an area of 11,850,000 square miles and a population of 190,000,000. It is pear-shaped, with its biggest bulge near the Equator, and extends in length, from north to south, about 5,000 miles and in width, in some sections, about 4,000 miles. The fact that the continent has few indentations on its coastline, either east or west, was largely responsible, in the earlier centuries, for its inaccessibility. The further fact that it was (and is) one of the most tropical of the continents, and, therefore, afflicted with the diseases characteristic of the tropics, has made it difficult for survival in its humid climate.

One of Africa's great appeals to the industrial countries of the Western world has been, and still is, a large depository of raw materials needed by the rest of the world. According to John Gunther, Africa produces ninety-eight percent of the diamonds, fifty-five percent of the gold, twenty-two percent of the copper, as well as other materials like manganese, chromium, and uranium. Two-thirds of the cocoa and three-fifths of the palm oil of the world come from Africa.

While relatively little is as yet known of the history of peoples of Africa below the Sahara, the researches of modern scholarship have revealed that some of these people had considerable historical and political achievement, and some artistic and cultural attainments. Evidence has been found which reveals the existence of large African kingdoms below the Sahara, such as the ancient kingdoms of Ghana, Melle, and Songhay, all in the West Sudan and the Niger Valley; the great Niger River playing much the same role in the West as the Nile in the East. Here great kingdoms flourished for a period covering much of the middle ages, and comparing favorably with the Arabic and European cultures of that date. There is evidence, also, of works of art: paintings on rocks in South Africa; the Benin bronze in Nigeria, et cetera. But, as Gunther reminds us, "Africa South of the Sahara has little history until the white man came." This has, particularly, to do with written records, which do not exist as such.

The Christian missionary enterprise in Africa has, understandably, been influenced by the difficulties involved in the physical, political, and commercial problems encountered in the penetration of the continent. The first effort at Christian penetration of the continent came, of course, in what may be called the "Apostolic Age," evidence of whose beginning is to be found in the New Testament itself: Simon, the Cyrenian (Luke 23:26), probably a Jewish settler from Cyrene, in North Africa; other Cyrenians mentioned in the Book of the Acts of the Apostles (6:9, 11:20, 13:1); the Ethiopian eunuch (Acts 8:26-40). By the end of the second century A.D., there existed in Egypt and North Africa strong Christian churches. The church in Ethiopia was set up during the reign of Constantine. The church in North Africa had a brilliant career between the second and the fifth centuries A.D., particularly in the production of great leaders, such as Tertullian, Cyprian, and Augustine, but failed and was completely extinguished by the end of the Fifth Century, A.D. Some of the reasons given for the failure of the church in North Africa are: its own internal controversies; its failure to evangelize the indigenous population; and the "Vandal invasion" (the Gothic Tribes from Central Europe).

With the Moslem invasion in the Seventh Century A.D., the Christian penetration on the continent came to a close. Only two Christian movements remained from the early centuries: the Coptic Church in Egypt and the Church in Ethiopia (doubtless helped by occasional contacts with the Coptic Church in Egypt).

The next opportunity for the expansion of the Christian movement in Africa came in the 15th Century A.D., with the explorations of the Portuguese on the West Coast of Africa, below the Sahara. It was during the 15th and 16th Centuries that Portugal developed its huge political empire and its immense trade with the new countries discovered during this period. While one of the announced purposes of the explorations was to increase adherents to the Christian faith, the emphasis on trade overshadowed all other interests, including religion, and this trade developed almost completely into the traffic in human beings being forced into slavery for life. The slave-trade accompanied the Christian mission and was not regarded as inconsistent with that mission. Later, other European nations (Dutch, French, Spanish, English) became involved in this traffic in human beings, to the extent that this type of trade for them overshadowed all other types of trade. The inevitable result of this terrific grip of the African slave-trade upon the European nations, who were the leaders in the traffic, was the nearly total extinction of missionary interest in Africa during the 17th and 18th Centuries of our era.

One of the by-products of the Evangelical Revival which swept England and America during the latter part of the 18th Century was the conviction that something must be done to eliminate the African slave trade. Led by the Quaker community in America and a small group of Christian leaders in England, the African slave trade was outlawed by England and America in the early part of the 19th Century. This made possible a new interest in the missionary enterprise in Africa. A logical outcome of this new interest in missions was the founding of missionary societies. One of the earliest attempts to found such a society was made by THOMAS COKE, the well-known Methodist. It was hoped by the promoters of the society that it would be un denominational, but the plan met with little support and was dropped.

The failure of the interdenominational effort led to the organization of denominational societies, among them the Wesleyan Methodist Society. The Wesleyan Methodists were among the first to send missionaries to Africa. Their first mission was to SIERRA LEONE, on the West Coast of Africa, to minister to former American slaves who had been the servants of British loyalists during the American Revolutionary War. After the war these British loyalists took their servants with them to Nova Scotia. Because of the inhospitable climate, a home was found for these former slaves in Sierra Leone, where other Africans had already been settled. In 1811, the Wesleyan Methodist Conference sent GEORGE WARREN with three associates to minister to these people. Despite Warren's death in less than a year, his associates continued the work until his successor arrived. This proved to be the beginning of a permanent work in Sierra Leone by the Wesleyan Society.

The American Methodists began missionary work in Africa in the same way, and for much the same reason; namely, to provide religious leadership for former slaves from America who had been settled on the West Coast of Africa, under the auspices of the American Colonization Society. The name of the new colony was called "LIBERIA," in honor of their new-found freedom, and after a brief period of tutelage by the Colonization Society, they established themselves as a Republic, with a form of government modeled after that of the United States of America. The first missionary was MELVILLE B. COX (1833), who lived for only five months, but in that time began to stabilize the relations between the local Methodists among the former slaves and the METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH in America. The work was permanently established under the leadership of John Seys (1834-1844).

British and American Methodists have been active in promoting work in Africa since those early beginnings in the first third of the 19th Century. One of the most vigorous results of the efforts of the British Wesleyan Society was in South Africa. The Methodists in South Africa have for many years been completely autonomous and now number more than 650,000. British Methodists have missionary work in other parts of Africa, primarily in those areas where the British Government exercised political dominance. Despite the changes in political allegiance since World War II, Methodists in these former colonies of Great Britain have continued to look to the Mother Church in Britain for guidance; nor has the Mother Church failed them in this respect.

American Methodists, while interested in the promotion of missionary work in Africa, have normally not attempted to go into territory already occupied by their British brethren. There have been some exceptions, but, in the main, the two groups have arranged comity agreements which have reduced overlapping to the minimum. In addition to the work being carried on in Africa by the principal British and American Methodist churches, there are several independent Methodist denominations operating missions on the continent. Notable among these are the three Negro Methodist denominations: the A.M.E., the A.M.E. ZION, and the C.M.E. The FREE METHODIST CHURCH also has missions in several countries in Africa; the WESLEYAN METHODIST CHURCH, U.S.A., operates a mission in Sierra Leone. The total Methodist membership is 1,085,500.

For the administrative divisions of Methodist work in Africa and the history of the respective conferences, as well as the Africa Central Conference of The United Methodist Church, reference must be made to the Gazetteer and Statistics of Methodist Overseas Missions published periodically by the Board of Missions of The United Methodist Church. The work in certain of the larger centers, such as Leopoldville—now Kinshasa, Elisabethville, and others, may be found there under these respective names.

AFRICA, ALL AFRICA CONFERENCE OF CHURCHES (AACC). (See ALL AFRICA CONFERENCE OF CHURCHES.)

AFRICA CENTRAL CONFERENCE. The GENERAL CONFERENCE approved in 1920 legislation for the organization of CENTRAL CONFERENCES for designated regional areas. The form of organization, relationships, duties, powers, and privileges were defined. Thus the first assembly for implementing a South Africa Central Conference in Africa was called by Bishop EBEN S. JOHNSON which included the conferences of his area (Cape Town), namely, CONGO, Southern RHODESIA, Southeast Africa, and ANGOLA. It was held at Old Umtali, Rhodesia, June 21-25, 1921.

The second session was held in Cape Town, SOUTH AFRICA, Oct. 3-12, 1923 with eight delegates from the four conferences of the area. The following mutual interests and concerns were discussed: the Itineracy, Temporal Economy, Publishing, Missions and Church Extension, Education, Sunday Schools, State of the Church, Centenary Conservation and World Service and Medical.

The third session was held in Johannesburg, South Africa, Nov. 24—Dec. 5, 1927 with seven delegates from the four conferences attending. The Episcopal address expressed that of all the missionaries, a feeling of gratitude. "Touching the work committed to our charge in Africa, we have much cause for rejoicing. Notwithstanding the necessity for retrenchment that we have faced during the quadrennium, and the consequent reduction in places of our missionary staff, the work of God has gone on among us. Indeed there have been some glorious achievements. We had hoped to increase the number of our mission stations across the continent, but long distances separate us in Angola and the Congo. With profound gratitude, I report much increase in all fields. Missionaries may decrease; the native must increase." This was the last session of the South Africa Central Conference of the M.E. Church.

The General Conference, after the uniting of the three denominations in The Methodist Church (1939) approved of the continuing of more effective Central Conferences.

Thus the first Africa Provisional Central Conference was called by Bishop SPRINGER on June 4-16, 1943 with fifty-one delegates from the six conferences of his area. This was the only time that LIBERIA was included in the area for the Central Conference. Due to travel conditions none were able to attend.

The scope of interests and activities was increased to include woman's work, discipline and ritual, interdenominational relations. An executive committee for functioning between meetings was elected. Gradually administrative responsibilities were being accepted.

Having met the requirements of the Central Conference Enabling Act of 1948, Bishop BOOTH called the first session of the Africa Central Conference on Oct. 6-17, 1948 at Old Umtali, Southern Rhodesia. Fifty-three delegates from the five conferences attended. A commission was elected to write a supplementary Discipline for the churches of the conferences related. Arrangements were suggested for a uniform training of church leaders within the African background of culture and customs.

The second session of the Africa Central Conference was held on Oct. 1-9, 1952, at Katoko Kombe, Belgian Congo, following the General Conference of The Methodist Church. The main concerns of the conference were the meeting of the challenges for evangelism, education, training of leadership, increasing urban areas, maintaining a world-wide interest and program of extension in the area of the five conferences constituting the Central Conference.

The third session of the Central Conference was held at Elisabethville, Belgian Congo, on Oct. 10, 1956. An advance was made with the authorization of the General Conference to divide the area and elect bishops to be assigned by the Conference accordingly. Bishop Booth, who was previously elected in 1944 for Africa by the NORTHEASTERN JURISDICTION, was assigned for episcopal supervision of the two conferences of the Congo. Bishop Ralph Dodge was elected for eight years and assigned to the Salisbury Area which included Angola, Rhodesia, and Southeast Africa.

The fourth session was held on Aug. 20-29, 1960 at N Yodiri, Southern Rhodesia. Although the General Conference of 1960 authorized the election of a third bishop, this was not accepted and the two bishops were reassigned to the areas they were serving. The major attention was given to Central Conference administration, organization and rules of order, revision of the Discipline, publications and communications.

The fifth session was held at Mulungwishi, Democratic Republic of the Congo on Aug. 27—Sept. 4, 1964. The programs for the quadrennium of "One Witness in One World" adopted by the General Conference of that year was implemented by urging each participating conference to arrange and conduct an effective program of Evangelism. Bishop Booth retired from Africa after twenty years to take an Episcopal appointment in America.

The General Conference in the 1960 session granted authority to the Central Conference to elect for and by itself the episcopal leadership needed for its conferences. This conference was authorized to elect up to four bishops, if it was deemed necessary to supply each of those conferences with a bishop to lead the work there.

The following were elected for four-year terms and assigned as noted: Angola—HARRY P. ANDREASSEN; Congo—JOHN WESLEY SHUNGU; MOZAMBIQUE—E. A. ZUNGUZE; Rhodesia—RALPH E. DODGE.

The first session of the Africa Central Conference of The United Methodist Church was held at Gaborones, Botswana, Aug. 23-31, 1968. The joint Episcopal report included a survey of the work of all the five participating conferences with recommendations for the establishing of a third conference in the Congo and the inauguration by the Central Conference of the cooperative mission undertaking with the London Missionary Society at Maun, Botswana.

Since the four-year terms of all the bishops had expired the elections were held by ballot for the coming quadrennium. Bishop Dodge was elected for life and immediately retired. Bishops Andreassen, Shungu, and Zunguze were reelected for four years. Bishop ABEL MUZOREWA was elected for a four-year term to replace Bishop Dodge in Rhodesia.

AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, U.S.A. (hereafter referred to as the A.M.E. Church), the first national organization of any kind established by Negroes in North America, grew out of a small Prayer Band conducted by RICHARD ALLEN in ST. GEORGE'S Methodist Episcopal Church, PHILADELPHIA, Pennsylvania, in 1786. A desire to be free from paternalistic control and discrimination experienced at St. George's caused a group of Negroes to withdraw from the church in 1787 and form the Free African Society. From this organization emerged in 1794 a semi-independent church named BETHEL. Following much controversy and litigation, Bethel became an autonomous Negro Methodist church in 1816 and was the nucleus for African Methodism.

During the week of April 7-13, 1816, Richard Allen called a "Convention Meeting" of Negro Methodists in the Philadelphia-Baltimore vicinity for the purpose of organizing a Negro Methodist denomination. Response came from Negroes in PENNSYLVANIA, MARYLAND, NEW JERSEY, and DELAWARE, and the A.M.E. Church was organized. Richard Allen was elected bishop of the new denomination on April 10, 1816, and was consecrated the following day.

The work of the new Church was divided into territories, circuits, and stations among the seven founding travelling preachers, with a membership of nearly 5,000. Two annual conferences, Philadelphia and BALTIMORE, were created. By 1864, ALLEN, MORRIS BROWN, elected bishop in 1828, and DANIEL A. PAYNE, elected bishop in 1852, had organized conferences in New York (1822), Ohio (1830), Indiana (1840), Canada (1840), New England (1852), and Missouri (1855).

The years immediately following the Civil War witnessed a phenomenal growth of African Methodism in the south and southeast and further developments in other parts of the country. Conferences organized were: South Carolina, Louisiana, California (1865), North Carolina, Virginia, Georgia, Florida (1867), Alabama, Kentucky, Tennessee, Mississippi, Texas, Arkansas, Pittsburgh (1868). The half century preceding 1923 saw still other state conferences established: Kansas (1876), Oklahoma (1877), Iowa (1883), Illinois (1884), Michigan, Colorado (1887), Puget Sound (1892), West Virginia (1908), Northwestern and Nebraska (1920). Delaware did not become a state conference until 1923. With these conference organizations the A.M.E. Church became a national body (see also Negro Methodist Union Negotiations).

A summary of the denomination's statistics in 1964 follows: Episcopal Districts, 18; Active Bishops, 20; Annual Conferences, U.S.A., 79; Churches, 5,878; Membership, 1,166,301; Church Schools (Sunday schools), 6,543; Enrollment, 400,000; Ministers, 5,878; Colleges, 9; Theological seminaries, 8; Publications: Christian Recorder, A.M.E. Review, Voice of Missions, Woman's Missionary Recorder, Journal of Religious Education.

ADMINISTRATION

Bishops, The Council of, is the executive body of the A.M.E. Church with general oversight and authority during the interim between meetings of the General Conferences.

Church Extension, Department of: The Nineteenth General Conference meeting in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, in 1892 consolidated the administration of church extension activity. Prior to the organization of the Church Extension Department, grants, loans and donations had been negotiated and processed through the Department of Missions. The General Conference of 1888 authorized this relationship with the parent Home and Foreign Missionary Society. Bishop ABRAM GRANT, upon becoming president of the newly formed Church Extension Society in 1892, selected CORNELIUS T. SHAFFER for the position of secretary-treasurer. The General Conference of 1900 voted the first funds the Department received. The Church Extension Society assisted in saving and organizing almost 2000 churches between 1900 and 1925. L. H. HEMINGWAY, secretary from 1938 to 1948, was elected to the bishopric from this position.

Education, General Board of: The Thirty-Fourth General Conference meeting at Chicago, Ill., in 1952 voted to merge the Board of Education and the Board of Religious Education and create a new General Board of Education with three subdivisions: Division of Educational Institutions, Division of Christian Education, and Editorial Division. This was the first major structural reorganization in the higher education department of the denomination since the organization of the Board of Education under WILLIAM D. JOHNSON, the first secretary, in 1884.

In 1936 the Board of Religious Education had been established to coordinate the work of the Sunday School, the Allen Christian Endeavor League, and the Leadership Training program of the connection. Prominent in this reorganization was S. S. Morris, Sr., active in the Allen Christian Endeavor League since the 1920's. Bishop CHARLES S. SMITH is likewise to be acknowledged as the chief architect of the A.M.E. Sunday School Union in 1882.

Evangelism, Department of: The Thirty-First General Conference meeting at Detroit, Michigan, in 1940 created the General Commission on Evangelism (later the name was changed to Department of Evangelism) upon the recommendation of the Council of Bishops and in response to the urgent plea of several ministerial leaders, including N. H. Jeltz, W. Leake, U. S. Robinson, W. Eason, E. J. Odum and others. Bishop GEORGE B. YOUNG was selected by the Council of Bishops for the presidency of the Commission, and E. J. Odum was elected by the General Conference to be the first director-secretary. Upon the death of E. J. Odum in 1959, G. H. J. Thidobeaux was elected to the office.

Finance, Department of: The Fourteenth General Conference held at Nashville, Tennessee in 1872, formally organized the Department of Finance to centralize the collection and disbursement of connectional funds. Provisions for the functions of this department were made in 1844 and 1864 when the General Conference adopted a per-capita assessment plan to be administered through the annual conferences. The first secretary was J. H. Bury. The Department of Finance is supervised by a board composed of Episcopal District representatives. Seven secretaries of this department have been elected to the bishopric: James C. Embry (1896), BENJAMIN W. ARNETT (1888), JAMES A. HANDY (1892), JOSIAH H. ARMSTRONG (1896), MORRIS M. MOORE (1900), EDWARD W. LAMPTON (1908), and JOHN HURST (1912). In 1956 the General Conference adopted a general budget and general treasury plan.

General Board, The, is the administrative body of the A.M.E. Church and is composed of departmental commissions, general officers, elected delegates, and bishops. It coordinates and administers the program of the church through various boards, councils, commissions, committees, and organizations. Membership is by election of the General Conference.

General Conference, The, is the governing body of the A.M.E. Church. Composed of the bishops as ex-officio presidents (according to the seniority order of their election) and elected delegates (ministerial and lay), this body meets quadrennially. General Conferences have met as follows:

Judicial Council, The: The Thirty-Fourth General Conference meeting at Chicago, Illinois in 1952 established a Judicial Council composed of five ministerial and five lay members elected for terms of eight years on a rotating basis. The Council (an appellate body) is the highest judicial body in the Church. It is amenable only to the General Conference. Its jurisdiction includes appeals, questions of constitutionality, and rulings of bishops. Judge Perry B. Jackson (Cleveland, Ohio) is President of the Council.

Laymen's Organization, The: From its beginning to the turn of the present century the A.M.E. Church had been basically clergy controlled. Lay activity was prevalent chiefly at the local church level and in the exercise of the missionary function. Exceptions to this were H. T. Kealing and John R. Hawkins who had been elected to general officership as early as 1896. The General Conference of 1904 was the first to legislate on the matter when it decreed lay representation at the Annual and General Conference levels. Additional legislation by succeeding General Conferences extended lay rights to include membership on the Episcopal Committee and the Committee on the Revision of the Discipline, and finally to all committees of the General Conference. Today there exists in the A.M.E. Church a strong and vital Laymen's Organization providing opportunities for training, service and fellowship. Additionally, there are lay organizations in each local church, annual conference and episcopal district. The connectional lay group meets quadrennially.

Missions, Department of: The twelfth General Conference meeting at Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, in 1864 organized the Department of Missions by formally establishing "The Home and Foreign Missionary Department" which had been in existence but inactive since 1844. The first secretary of Missions elected by the General Conference was JOHN M. BROWN. The work of the Department is supervised by a board composed of the bishops, Episcopal District representatives, the secretary, and Women's Auxiliary representatives. The official publication of the Department is the Voice of Mission, originated in 1892. Six former secretaries have been elected to the bishopric: John M. Brown (1868), James A. Handy (1892), RICHARD H. CAIN (1880), WILLIAM B. DERRICK (1896), HENRY B. PARKS (1908), WILLIAM W. BECKETT (1916). John P. Collier, Jr. is the present secretary with offices in The Interchurch Center, New York City.

Pensions, Department of: The Thirty-Second General Conference meeting at Philadelphia, Pennsylvania in 1944 created a Department of Pensions. Bishop D. WARD NICHOLS was elected to the chairmanship of the Department and Daniel L. Witherspoon was elected secretary-treasurer. The newly authorized Department opened offices in the A.M.E. Sunday School Union Building in Nashville, Tennessee. The General Conference of 1948 elected Jesse E. Beard to the secretary-treasurership, Witherspoon having died earlier that year. In 1964 the General Conference elected James M. Cranberry to succeed Beard.

Publications, Department of: The General Conference of 1952 reorganized the administration of publishing. The Book Concern, whose history reached back to a provision in the first Discipline (1817) and which had been established by Richard Allen in 1818, merged with the Sunday School Union founded in 1882 by Bishop CHARLES S. SMITH under the management of the General Board of Publications. At the time of the unification of the two agencies (1952), William D. Johnson, Jr. was manager of the Book Concern and E. A. Selby was serving as secretary-treasurer of the Sunday School Union. By the order of the General Conference the secretary-treasurer of the Sunday School Union became the first secretary of the newly created department. The official name of the publishing house is African Methodist Episcopal Sunday School Union.

Research and History, Bureau of: The Thirty-third General Conference meeting at Kansas City, Kan. in 1948 created the Bureau of Research and History. This action ended a long period of neglect and support for historiography in the church. Some historical writing and research had continued, however, by men elected to that task by the General Conference. The earliest of these was Bishop DANIEL A. PAYNE. His work, History of the A.M.E. Church (1891), gives the most comprehensive coverage of the development and progress of the denomination from 1787 to 1856 that is available. The historical and statistical data in the unique Budget series of Benjamin W. Arnett, published annually from 1884 until his death in 1906 are also valuable. Bishop HENRY M. TURNER wrote the classic Genius and Theory of Methodist Polity in 1885. About 1916 John T. Jenifer produced Centennial Retrospect History of the A.M.E. Church. This was followed by the work of Charles S. Smith in 1922, who wrote a comprehensive sequel volume to Payne's work covering the period, 1856-1922, A History of The A.M.E. Church. The book Preface to The History of the A.M.E. Church (1950) by Bishop REVERDY C. RANSOM offers a sociological interpretation of A.M.E. history. In 1959 E. A. Adams compiled and published the Yearbook And Historical Guide to The A.M.E. Church. Bishop ROBERT R. WRIGHT has contributed three volumes to the literature of African Methodism: The Encyclopedia of African Methodism (1916), The Encyclopedia of African Methodism (revised edition 1947) and The Bishops of the A.M.E. Church (1963).

Women's Missionary Society, The: In May, 1944 at Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, the Women's Mite Missionary Society and the Women's Home and Foreign Missionary Society merged to form the Women's Missionary Society, an auxiliary to the Department of Missions in fund raising, promotion and cultivation. The Women's Mite Missionary Society (Women's Parent Mite Missionary Society) was organized in Bethel A.M.E. Church, Philadelphia, Pa., in 1874. The first president was Mrs. Mary A. Campbell, the wife of Bishop JABEZ P. CAMPBELL. Mrs. Christine Smith served as the last president of the group before the merger. The Women's Home and Foreign Missionary Society was organized in 1896 to assist the work of African Methodism overseas, having been convinced of its need by Bishop Henry M. Turner, then serving in Africa. Mrs. Lucy Hughes, the last president of the W.H.F.M.S., became the first president of the united organization. The Women's Missionary Recorder, founded in 1912, is the official publication of the Society which has branch societies and youth auxiliaries in practically every annual conference. The incumbent president of the Women's Missionary Society is Mrs. Anne Heath.

ECUMENICAL ACTIVITY

The A.M.E. Church has been a continuous participant in various ecumenical movements since 1867, when it was represented at the Fifth General Assembly of the Evangelical Alliance in Amsterdam, Holland, by Bishop Daniel A. Payne. African Methodists (BENJAMIN F. LEE, Robert A. Johnson, and John G. Mitchell) were members of the commission constituted by the A.M.E. General Conference in 1876 to convene the First ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE held in 1881 at London, England. They have participated in every WORLD METHODIST CONFERENCE since that time. In 1884 the A.M.E. Church aided in the celebration of the CENTENNIAL OF AMERICAN METHODISM held in Baltimore, Maryland. The A.M.E. Church was represented at the Parliament of Religions held in connection with the Columbian Exposition in Chicago in 1893.

In the present century African Methodism has been identified with the founding of the FEDERAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, the NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, the International Council of Religious Education, and the precursor WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES meetings at Stockholm, Lausanne, Oxford, Edinburgh, and Utrecht. A.M.E. churchmen were participants in the organizing conference of the World Council of Churches and each of its succeeding meetings. In 1966 the A.M.E. Church became the seventh full participating member of the CONSULTATION ON CHURCH UNION.

Department of Urban Ministries and Ecumenical Relations. In 1968 Bishop FREDERICK D. JORDAN was assigned to a newly established Department of Urban Ministries and Ecumenical Relations by the twenty-eighth General Conference meeting in Philadelphia, Pa. The creation of this position became a "first" in these fields among black Christian denominations in the United States.

HIGHER EDUCATION

From 1847 to 1890 eight colleges and seven theological schools were founded and organized by the A.M.E. Church. They are:

The A.M.E. General Conference of 1964 voted that there should be only two official seminaries operated and supported by the Church. They are Payne and Turner. In 1958 Turner Theological Seminary became one of the first four Negro schools to become a part of the Interdenominational Theological Center in Atlanta, Georgia.

NATIONAL MISSIONS

District Mission Schools. Immediately following the Civil War in the United States the A.M.E. Church and other independent Negro denominations, as well as white denominations, made extensive efforts to educate as well as evangelize the Negro freed man. One of the most heroic of these efforts was that of the Negro to help himself. Through A.M.E. annual conferences, divided into four educational districts, pastors were instructed to provide schools for the freed men and all people of color. Among these District Mission Schools were Selma Institute in Alabama, Abbeville and Sumter Schools in South Carolina, Payne and Normal and Preparatory Schools in Georgia.

Homes. The first home to provide professional care for elderly Negroes in the United States was organized in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania in 1864 and was incorporated in 1867. Stephen Smith (18?-1873), a wealthy mine and quarry owner, contributed the land, $40,000 in cash, and the stone for the building of the home which was named for him. Since that time his legacy has yielded the institution more than $100,000. Smith was an A.M.E. lay minister, member of the General Conference from 1836 to 1864, and organizer of two churches, Zion in Philadelphia and Murphy at Chester, Pennsylvania. The first location of the Stephen Smith Home was 340 South Front Street. In 1868 or 1870 it moved to its present location. For many years the home was considered an institution of the A.M.E. Church. In recent years it has become a voluntary community-supported agency of the city of Philadelphia.

In the early 1900s Bishop James A. Handy was instrumental in establishing two homes for aged Negroes in Jackson, Michigan and Baltimore, Maryland.

Hospitals. Douglass Hospital in KANSAS CITY, KAN., was founded in 1898 and became the property of the Fifth Episcopal District of the A.M.E. Church in 1905. Bishop Abram Grant accepted the institution on behalf of the Church. In 1924 a new site was purchased and the hospital was moved. With the aid of a large federal grant and several lesser donations in 1945, Douglass has become a representative health agency and nurse training school in the greater Kansas City area.

The organizational meeting for the founding of Provident Hospital and Training School for Nurses in CHICAGO, ILL., was held in the parsonage of Quinn Chapel in 1891 "at the solicitation of" Daniel H. Williams, the brilliant Negro heart surgeon. John T. Jenifer (1835-1919), who was then pastor of Quinn Chapel, became president of the hospital's governing board. He and Williams, who later organized and directed Freedman's Hospital in Washington, D. C., gave much of their professional lives and fortunes to the founding of the Provident institution.

Institutional Church. At the turn of the century the A.M.E. Church, sensing the need for a new approach to the religious life of the Negro in the urban centers of the north, midwest and west, developed in Chicago, Ill. the concept of the institutional church. The distinguishing feature of this new type of church was the fact that it constructed its program with the assumption that the "church exists for the people rather than the people for the church."

WORLD MISSIONS

South Africa. Negro Methodist work in SOUTH AFRICA was traditionally under British (Wesleyan Methodist) control prior to 1892. Until 1886 this arrangement was taken for granted by the Africans. In 1886 the Wesleyan Methodist Church required and instituted a separate meeting of their African pastors and placed a white president and secretary over them. In 1892 the African Wesleyan Methodist pastors, under the leadership of M. M. Mokone, withdrew from the Wesleyan Methodist body and created the Ethiopian Church, an independent organization, at Pretoria. The Ethiopian Church of South Africa was formally organized and opened in 1893. Between 1893 and 1895 Mokone was head of the African Church.

The 1896 annual meeting of the Ethiopian Church Conference held at Pretoria voted to unite with the A.M.E. Church. Later that same year James M. Dwane, representing the African Church, came to the United States to be received into the A.M.E. Church by Bishop Henry M. Turner. The historic ceremony took place in Allen Temple, Atlanta, Ga.

West Africa. Prior to the organization of a denominational program of missions, several significant efforts were made by members and ministers of the A.M.E. Church to extend their connection abroad.

Daniel Coker (1780-1846) sailed to West Africa (Isle of Sherbro) in 1820 with a group of expatriated slaves under the sponsorship of the American Colonization Society. Following an epidemic resulting in many deaths on Sherbro, the decimated group led by Coker returned to Sierra Leone, a British settlement of Negroes from Nova Scotia and England developed following the Revolutionary War. En route to Africa, Coker organized an A.M.E. Church on the ship, "Elizabeth." Later, in Sierra Leone he established an A.M.E. Church. The first A.M.E. annual conference was organized there in 1891 by Bishop Henry M. Turner, who also organized a Liberian Annual Conference later that same year.

India. The General Conference of the A.M.E. Church meeting in 1960 at Los Angeles, Calif. took the following action with respect to the establishment of missions in INDIA: "Be it hereby enacted into law by this historic A.M.E. General Conference, to provide a salary equal to that of a General Officer for a worker or a missionary to further establish and expand Christian missions in India under the guidance and direction of the A.M.E. Church. Native workers in India sincerely urge and request that the A.M.E. Church do this." This motion was implemented by the appointment of H. A. Perry to the General Office of "Representative to India." In 1964 Perry was reappointed but no appropriation was made for the work.

Caribbean. A group of approximately 2,000 free Negroes emigrated from the United States to HAITI in 1824 at the invitation of the president of the country to cultivate the land and engage in various occupations. This group included many members of the A.M.E. Church, a large number of whom had come from Bethel Church in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania.

Scipio Beane (1793-1835), an itinerant in the Baltimore Conference, while in Haiti (1826-1827) to regain his health, labored among the people. Upon returning to the Conference in 1827 he requested and was appointed there as the first A.M.E. missionary pastor of the denomination. During 1827-1828, Beane organized St. Peter's Church at Port-au-Prince.

Following the death of Beane in 1835, the A.M.E. Church in Haiti and Santo Domingo experienced a period of decline. About 1840 Henry Allen organized an independent "Haitian Union Methodist Society." New interest was shown in the work in the 1870's and by 1887 an annual conference had been organized.

In 1898 C. C. Astwood organized a church at Santiago, Cuba. By 1900 it was reported that there were two more stations in Cuba at Havana. A.M.E. missions were established in the LEEWARD ISLANDS at Antigua and on the Virgin Islands by 1900. In the Windward Islands work was founded at Dominica, Tobago, Barbados, Trinidad (Port-au-Prince) and St. Thomas before the turn of the century. On the island of Jamaica the A.M.E. Church began work in 1915 after being approached by several ministers of the United Methodist Free Church requesting merger. Mission points on the adjacent Bahama and Bermuda Islands were established in the 1870's by the British Methodist Episcopal Church, an autonomous African denomination which voluntarily separated from the A.M.E. Church in 1856 but reunited with the parent body in 1884.

South America. African Methodism was founded in Latin America through the work of independent Negro Methodists, John C. Uring and Hubert Griffith, an ex-Wesleyan Methodist minister. In 1873 they requested annexation to the A.M.E. Church. Bishop WILLIS NAZERY (a B.M.E. Bishop at the time) granted the petition, and organized them and several other B.M.E. churches and ministers in the Guianas.

Canada. Fugitive Negro slaves from the United States account for the sizable Negro population in CANADA at the beginning of the 1800's. Many of these slaves had formerly belonged to A.M.E. churches in the United States and desired to continue this relationship. In response to this interest African Methodist societies were organized in Canadian communities where Negroes were found.

PUBLICATIONS

Between 1858 and 1864 the first denominational Journal appeared, entitled The Repository of Religion and Literature, edited by John H. Brown. The A.M.E. Church Review succeeded the Repository and has been published continuously since its inception in 1884. The first editor of the Review was Benjamin T. Tanner. The editor of the Repository and three editors of the Review have been elected to the bishopric: John M. Brown (1868), Benjamin T. Tanner (1888), LEVI J. COPPIN (1900) and Reverdy C. Ransom (1924). The present editor of the Review is Ben H. Hill.

In 1841 the predecessor of The Christian Recorder was founded as The A.M.E. Church Magazine. It first appeared in 1844 as a monthly publication edited by George Hogarth. In 1848 it became a weekly paper and was renamed The Christian Herald. Augustus R. Green became its first editor. The General Conference of 1852 replaced the Herald with The Christian Recorder and elected M. M. Clarke as editor.

The Journal of Religious Education (1940), edited by Andrew White and published at Nashville, Tennessee, is the monthly publication in the field of Christian Education for the A.M.E. Church.

Missionary periodicals developed by the A.M.E. Church are: The Voice of Missions (1892) and The Woman's Missionary Recorder (1912).

The General Conference of 1880 and 1886 approved the publication of a Southern edition of The Christian Recorder. The paper was founded and edited by Henry M. Turner and first published in 1886 as a private enterprise. In 1888 it became a connectional organ.

The General Conference of 1952 meeting at Chicago, Illinois ordered the Southern Christian Recorder and The Western Christian Recorder to merge and created The Southwestern Christian Recorder. Following the merger, Singleton L. Jones was elected editor of the new publication. In 1960 the General Conference ordered one connectional paper, The Christian Recorder, and elected B. J. Nolan as editor.

Several editors of the four Christian Recorders have been elected to the bishopric: Jabez P. Campbell (1864), Henry M. Turner (1880), Benjamin T. Tanner (1888), Benjamin F. Lee (1892), Robert R. Wright, Jr. (1936), JOHN H. CLAYBORN (1944), EUGENE C. HATCHER (1952).

The Western Christian Recorder was founded in 1891 as a private enterprise and edited by J. Frank McDonald. Publication was suspended at the end of one year of operation. Later it resumed publication under the same editorship and continued to 1900. The General Conference of 1900, meeting at Columbus, Ohio, accepted it as one of its connectional organs. McDonald, who continued as editor, was elected a General Officer at the General Conference of 1912.

RELIGIOUS EDUCATION

The Connectional Sunday School Union of the A.M.E. Church was organized on Aug. 11, 1882 at Cape May, N. J. through the influence of Charles S. Smith. Earlier in that same year Smith had petitioned the Council of Bishops for authorization to organize the Sunday Schools of the A.M.E. Church into a Sunday School Union, "to systematize the Sunday School work among the colored people, to provide them with a literature and text books, to extend the work of the Sunday Schools . . . to provide for Sunday School Institutes, and to provide schools . . ." The petition was granted and the Sunday School Union was authorized but no funds were made available for its development.

In 1883 Smith instituted the observation of Children's Day to finance the work of the Sunday School Union. By 1884 a majority of the annual conferences of the connection had endorsed the agency and the General Conference meeting that year granted it official recognition as a department. Smith, the prime mover in its founding, became the first corresponding secretary, proposed its first constitution, and located its headquarters in Bloomington, Ind. In 1886 it moved to Nashville, Tenn., where a building was purchased for a publishing plant and the offices of the A.M.E. Sunday School Union. A.M.E. Sunday School literature was the first to be published in America for the exclusive use of Negroes. In 1886 the Sunday School Union was incorporated. In 1936 an effort, led by S. S. Morris, to coordinate the religious education concern of the denomination in the area of Sunday Schools, youth work, and leadership training resulted in the establishment of the Board of Religious Education.

In 1952, by action of the General Conference, the work of the Board of Religious Education was united with the Board of Education, which dealt primarily with general and higher education, to create The General Board of Education with three subdivisions: Division of Educational Institutions, Division of Christian Education, and Editorial Division.

Leaders in the Connectional Sunday School Union movement in African Methodism have been: Bishop Charles S. Smith, Conference Secretary, 1882-1900, Bishop WILLIAM D. CHAPPELLE, Corresponding Secretary, 1900-1908, Ira Bryant, Secretary-Treasurer, 1908-1936 and E. A. Selby, Secretary-Treasurer since 1936.

YOUTH WORK

Youth work in African Methodism, U.S.A., began with the formation of Christian Endeavor societies in local churches in the 1880's. In 1896 the General Conference adopted a resolution designating these local Christian Endeavor Societies as the official youth groups for the denomination. In 1900 these local groups were formed into a connectional society and designated the Allen Christian Endeavor Society. In 1904 the General Conference changed the name "Society" to "League" and adopted a pledge and constitution. In 1936 the Allen Christian Endeavor League merged with the Sunday School Union to form the Department of Religious Education.

The name of the General Secretaries of the Allen Christian Endeavor League from its inception are: Bishop B. W. Arnett, 1900-1904; E. J. Gregg, 1904-1908; J. C. Caldwell, 1908-1920; S. S. Morris, 1920-1959.

GRANT S. SHOCKLEY

AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL ZION CHURCH. A full history of this church in America is difficult to secure with exactness. Early leaders such as PETER WILLIAMS, Francis Jacobs, George Collins, Abraham Thompson, June Scott, Thomas Miller, and JAMES VARICK are of course all dead and not all of these were gifted in writing, or, because of circumstances, were not able to open their thoughts and deeds to posterity. However, these early founders of the church at least dreamed large dreams, for their concept of Methodism involved more than a casual approval of human rights and privileges.

Contrary to common belief, the movement of these Africans towards the establishment of a Negro church appears not to have been one of protest but of expediency. Caught up, as they were, in the early spirit of Methodism, they brought new dimensions to Christian interpretation. For where once the struggle for independence seemed insignificant within the church, their venture in the African Chapel demanded a liberal interpretation of the Christian way and the true spirit of brotherhood wherever men met for prayer and hymn. Thus the basic spirit of Old JOHN STREET CHURCH in New York was carried beyond its walls and influence.

WILLIAM STILLWELL, the appointed minister of this African Chapel, called Zion, and its companion chapel, Asbury, had after a time become so dissatisfied with the temporal affairs of the Methodist Episcopal Church that he informed his congregations he was withdrawing from the Methodist fold over the control of church property. Along with 5,000 others, the leaders of this African Chapel were granted sole right of control over any and all property which they should acquire, thus obtaining for themselves rights and privileges which later engulfed the NEW YORK METHODIST EPISCOPAL ANNUAL CONFERENCE in bitter controversy. In Stillwell's decision appears to have been the influence of his uncle, SAMUEL, one-time trustee of John Street and class leader of Peter Williams. The seeds of the Zion Methodist movement may well have been sown some years earlier (1781) in prayer sessions. Thus the date of 1796 stands merely as a new paragraph in the history of the church. Strangely enough the Methodist leadership which brought about the Stillwell secession tolerantly acquiesced in the requests of their African brethren in 1796 and formally agreed to this acceptance in 1801. Of this Stillwell secession in Methodist history, JOSUUA SOULE wrote to Bishop MCKENDREE in September, 1820:

You will doubtless see Bishop George in Baltimore or its vicinity and receive from him a narrative of the disastrous events which have transpired in this station. Suffice it to say that several hundred have separated themselves from the fellowship of our church, established an independent congregation embodied under a system of government which secures a perfect equality of right and power to every member, male and female—properly speaking, an ecclesiastical democracy in the most extensive sense of the word.

The final separation from the Methodist Episcopal Church did not come for Zion and Asbury Churches, however, until July 21, 1820, when the Resolution of Withdrawal was drawn and approved. It is to be noted that here again property control and not ill treatment brought about the breach. Even this act appears not to have been final, for conversations with the PHILADELPHIA CONFERENCE took place as late as December of that year and on into the following year as the Methodist Conference met in Milford, Delaware. Then a letter, the writing of which was urged by EZEKIEL COOPER, was sent to the Conference setting forth the contention "that it was well known that the conferences would not accept Negro ministers" and they requested the right to establish an annual conference to be presided over by Bishop McKendree or any other. The letter, signed by James Varick and George Collins for the African Chapel, was acted upon by the Philadelphia Conference in response to a committee report (members were Ezekiel Cooper, Thomas Ware, and Edward White). The report, signed by the conference secretary George Cox, was dated April 19, 1821. It made provision for a bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church to attend the conference of the African churches, a member (presumably of the New York Conference) to preside at the sessions if no bishop were present, and that a Methodist Episcopal bishop would ordain their deacons and elders providing the

New York Conference agreed. The New York Conference, however, responded that this was a General Conference matter and could not be acted upon by the annual conferences. Conversations at healing the breach were not resumed until long after when the General Conference met in Chicago in 1868, but no concrete action was taken at that or in the subsequent General Conferences. Meanwhile a new church had been organized.

Out of the early days of this new church at least five points of emphasis and goals can be noted: the desire to bring within the Christian fold more Negroes, both free and slave; the desire to intensify the spiritual development of both ministers and lay people through the exercise of their faith, their abilities and fellowship; the desire to launch out into missionary endeavor; the imperative of educational development and opportunity; and, finally, the imperative of economic development among free men. Close study will reveal that denominational efforts have continued along these lines.

Jealous always of the rights and privileges of people, the first major crisis within the church came about when one of its elected superintendents (Superintendent Bishop) became eager to set aside the decision of the General Conference of 1852 which held that the three superintendents were to be considered equal. Another facet of the controversy involved the change of the word African in the name of the church to Wesleyan, a change not authorized by the General Conference.

As a result of these differences of opinion, the New York Conference (A.M.E. Zion) ordered that the Bishop be tried. He refused to submit to the trial, and the conference refused to allow him the chair. In 1853 the conference conducted the trial and expelled the Reverend Bishop. The breach was finally healed in the ratification of what was called the Agreement of Newburg.

A second crisis developed in 1872, evidently as a result of the possibility of unification with the Methodist Episcopal Church. The movement evidently was a continuation of the enthusiasm of the Chicago Methodist Episcopal General Conference before which Singleton T. Jones had spoken. It appears that it was his idea that the sessions of the Zion General Conference should be held at a point where easy conversations could be carried on. The major part of the church met in Charlotte, N. C., where the Jones group finally agreed also to meet.

Three other significant developments in Zion Church history need to be mentioned. One was the widening of lay participation in these General sessions, climaxing in equal lay representation in 1928; and the other was the striking of the words "male" and "female" from the Discipline in 1876. Also, a Connectional Council was authorized in 1900. This group, composed of officers of the Boards, the General officers, and the Board of Bishops, meets annually and approves or disapproves the work of the departments.

The title of Superintendent for the top leadership of the church was not changed to the present designation of bishop until 1868, and then was ratified only as a compromise with the African Methodist Episcopal Church as one of the basic points looking toward organic union. The Zion Methodist group insisted, however, on the retention of all laws regarding laymen in the church and their participation in General Conference sessions (two from each annual conference). No doubt this insistence on lay privileges led to the failure of the movement for union with the A.M.E. Church, although the conversations were conducted throughout the 19th and into the 20th centuries.

The second step in the development of the episcopacy did not come until 1880 when the General Conference finally agreed to the election of bishops for life and consecration for the same. It appears that the power of the episcopacy increased with this act only to be challenged by actions of the General Conference in 1956 as efforts were then made to constitute a Judicial Council, after the pattern of that in The Methodist Church. This matter occupied the attention of each General Conference since that time.

Educational emphasis within the denomination actually began with the construction of the first church building in 1800, when a school room was provided. However, an earlier reference must be acknowledged. Efforts to establish a university (later called Rush University) were not successful despite the sympathy of many people, the gift of land in New York state, and the cooperative beginnings of a church-state project in Pennsylvania (Zion Hill Institute in Washington County). It appears that the Pennsylvania state venture hinged upon a grant from the State Legislature of some $5,000. WILLIAM HOWARD DAY, a resident of Harrisburg and one of the great lay leaders of the church, is said to have prevented its passage by influencing the governor to veto the measure. Day was opposed to any type of segregated school development. Just how much this single act influenced the attitude of the leadership of the church is not known, but Day did find himself in difficulty with the denomination, although later he was cleared of all charges.

In abandoning the Pennsylvania project the denomination gave the Allegheny Conference permission to continue with the venture if it could find the means as a conference. The defeat of the state-participating-relationship no doubt led to the decision to reject all interest in a denominational project in the North, and to concentrate efforts in the South. The General Conference authorized such action, and as a result Rush University was transferred to Fayetteville, North Carolina, and under Bishops J. W. HOOD and C. R. HARRIS was developed as Zion Wesley Institute, which will be traced in the development of Livingstone College (see SALISBURY, NORTH CAROLINA). The denomination, however, found interest in or developed more than ten different institutions, two of which are now being conducted as junior colleges moving towards development of a four-year status.

The Zion Church has been keenly interested in fostering the Wesleyan idea of ministerial improvement, and early utilized the annual conference sessions as a training ground. Local churches were expected to create or provide libraries in line with the church's emphasis on the education of children and their membership through the Sunday school movement. The close of the 19th century saw legislation which clarified the status of baptized children, provided for the production of church school literature, and the beginnings of youth instruction within the church.

This work of the denomination has been greatly emphasized in the past sixty years or more, chiefly under the guidance of JAMES W. EICHELBERGER, Secretary of Christian Education, while a wider experience of interdenominational participation has been spearheaded by Bishop W. J. WALLS.

Missions took the early church into New England and as far north as NOVA SCOTIA. Emphasis later shifted to the South (1860), when such men as John Williams, James Walker Hood, Deacon David Hill, Wilbur S. Strong (Alabama), Singleton T. Jones, JOHN JAMISON MOORE (West Coast, including San Francisco in 1852)—led by the superintendent and later Bishop JOSEPH JACKSON CLINTON—followed hard after the Union armies, organizing and admitting churches. Foreign missionary activity appears to have begun with the sailing to Africa in 1876 of Andrew Cartwright and the subsequent evolution of the "Training in America" policy of Bishop JOHN BRYANT SMALL, the first bishop assigned to a foreign field.

Women were instrumental in all these mission enterprises from the first. Eliza Ann Gardner and Malvina Fletcher were not only interested in home missions but foreign as well. Miss Gardner lent impetus to the work in Nova Scotia, and later to that in the South, while Malvina Fletcher was instrumental in fostering the work in the South through raising funds and securing passes for the mission workers. In 1880 the General Conference created the Women's Home and Foreign Missionary Society. FLORENCE RANDOLPH stands out as one of the most ardent presidents of this group and left office with the whole church possessing a new appreciation of its missionary responsibility. Mission work now takes the church into South America and the Caribbean as well as to AFRICA. The first native African bishop, S. DORME LARTEY, was consecrated in 1960.

Church Publications. The church has been closely identified with the development of the Negro press, both secular and religious. For example, The Anglo-African appeared prior to 1863. A new printing press was ordered in 1864, which indicated that this publication was actually a continuing one.

The Star of Zion was established in 1876 by J. A. Tyler, with the concurrence of Bishop J. W. Hood. It became the official paper of the denomination at the General Conference of 1880, and A. L. Richardson was elected editor when Tyler declined the office. Its editors, following Tyler and Richardson, have been J. McH. Farley, JOHN C. DANCY, GEORGE W. CLINTON, J. W. Smith, GEORGE C. Clement, J. Harvey Anderson, William Jacob Walls (Senior Bishop), W. H. Davenport, William A. Blackwell, and Walter R. Lovell. The paper is published in Charlotte, North Carolina, and has had great influence in the Zion connection.

The A.M.E. Zion Quarterly Review is an official organ of the church published at three-month intervals and devoted to matters of scholarly, historical, and current ecclesiastical interest in the larger context of church life. It was first published in 1890 at Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, under the editorship of George W. Clinton. The Review was accepted by the 1892 General Conference which met in Old John Wesley Church, Pittsburgh, and it has continued since that date. The present editor is David H. Bradley, who is also secretary of the A.M.E. Zion Historical Society. The quarterly magazine is published in Bedford, Pennsylvania.

The Missionary Seer is the official publication of the Home and Foreign Missionary Department. It was established in 1904 to promote the missionary interests of the church and has been published monthly since that time, being distributed throughout the denomination in America and overseas.

Pensions. The forerunner of the Department of Pensions and Relief can be said to be the Annual Conference Fund of the New York Annual Conference (1839), although the Department as such did not come into existence until later. The resolution to establish such a fund read: "Whereas, on account of the people's delinquency in many of our stations and circuits, our preachers fail to get means to support their families and are compelled to neglect their duties as ministers or suffer. We have therefore agreed in our associated capacity as ministers to establish a fund to be used in relief of our brother ministers connected with this conference, when they are in want of relief or help. We therefore adopt the following constitution." The resolution follows. By the end of the century an extensive if inadequate arrangement was in force as reported by the secretary, John F. Moreland.

The Church Extension Department was incorporated in 1905 as a Pennsylvania corporation "for the promotion of the temporal welfare of the church." Seven secretaries have headed this department.

The Book Concern was first established in 1841 and was located in New York City.

The Sunday School Department, as it was originally called, received no early action on the part of the General Conference, except through that of the established policy of the church and its annual conferences where insistence was made that attention be given not only to the teaching of children but the providing of libraries. The General Conference took more concrete action in 1888, when the work was fully organized with a superintendent and editor, and with T. A. Weathington as its financial secretary. The Sunday School Board, predecessor of the Board of Christian Education, Home and Church, came into existence in 1916. Its companion Board of Schools and Colleges was authorized much earlier in 1892.

Three other departments are of much more recent origin—the Bureau of Evangelism, the Department of Public Relations, and the Historical Society, the latter being proposed in 1944 and placed on a firm basis in 1956.

The African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church today is composed of 52 annual conferences in America, South America, the Caribbean, and sections of West Africa. Its churches number approximately 2,500, served by 1,575 ministers, and with a membership of 750,000. Sixty-eight superintendents and bishops have served the denomination, with twelve active bishops now and eleven general officers. (See also Negro Methodist Union Negotiations.)

AFRICAN UNION FIRST METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH. This body, known officially as the African Union First Colored Methodist Protestant Church of America or Elsewhere, was formed by the merger of the African Union Church and the First Colored Methodist Protestant Church. The African Union Church dated from 1813 in Wilmington, Delaware. A lawsuit developed between Ezion Church, a predominantly black congregation, and Asbury Church, the predominantly white parent congregation. The suit emerged because the members of Ezion did not wish to accept a white minister sent them as pastor. When Asbury Church won the court fight, Peter Spencer and his followers left Ezion and started the Union Church of Africans. In 1850, shortly after the death of Spencer, a schism occurred when a minority faction left to form a church with an episcopal polity. This later body became the Union American Methodist Episcopal Church. The Union Church of Africans emerged from this struggle as the African Union Church.

The first Colored Methodist Protestant Church has an obscure origin, but probably originated from a schism in the African Methodist Episcopal Church. On November 25, 1865, representatives met with representatives of the African Union Church and hammered out the merger that formed the African Union Methodist Protestant Church.

The doctrine is Wesleyan and the polity of the church is similar to that of the Methodist Protestant Church. There is no foreign mission program, and home missions are cared for by the women. In 1957 they reported 5,000 members in 33 churches.

AGENCY. The United Methodist Church, U.S.A., uses the word "agency" in its polity as referring to "a Council, Board, Division, Commission, Committee, or other body established to carry out the work of the church." The Constitution of The United Methodist Church, Article IV, 8 indicates the type of agencies which the General Conference may initiate and direct—such as publishing, evangelistic, educational, missionary, benevolent; and it is also empowered "to provide Boards for their promotion and administration." Similar regulations give the right to Jurisdictional Conferences and Central Conferences to establish Boards, et cetera. By usage which in time came to be common among all Methodists, these Boards, Committees, etc., are designated as "Agencies," and are so named when referred to in certain paragraphs of the Discipline. (Discipline 1968, paragraph 26-3.)

Chapter V of the Book of Discipline itself outlines and treats of The General Agencies of The United Methodist Church. "The General Agencies of The United Methodist Church are the regularly established councils, and boards, commissions, and the committees which have been constituted by the General Conference."

AGGREY, JAMES EMMAN KWEGYIR (1875-1927), one of the leaders of the A.M.E. Zion Church, was born October 28, 1875 at Anamabu in the Gold Coast Colony, West Africa. He entered the Wesleyan Methodist School at Cape Coast around 1883 and was converted at the age of 14. He was licensed to preach two years later and for a time followed studies leading to full-time Christian service.

Through the efforts of Bishop John Bryan Small of the A.M.E. Zion Church and the encouragement of a Mr. Anaman, he sailed for America July 10, 1898, where he was enrolled at Livingstone College, Salisbury, N. C. He graduated with the B.A. degree in 1902 and ten years later received an honorary A.M. from that institution and a D.D. from Hood Theological Seminary. For a time after his graduation he assisted at the college.

In November, 1905, he married Rose D. Douglass. To this union four children were born—Abna Azalea, Kwegyir, Rosebud, and Rudolf.

Meanwhile Aggrey became an elder in the Zion Church (1903) and began a profitable ministry in and around Salisbury. In 1920 he accepted a position on the survey (of African education) staff of Jesse Jones, supervised by the Phelps Stokes Fund. In 1921 he attended the first meeting of the International Missionary Council and the following year he attended the Foreign Missions Conference of North America in Atlantic City. During this time he was also attending Columbia University.

A second commission to survey African education in areas not contacted in the first survey left London in January, 1924. Two of the original members of the first commission were in this group—Jesse Jones and Aggrey.

James Aggrey became assistant vice principal of Achimota College in 1924 and served until his death. He had been given a leave of absence to write his dissertation at Columbia when death came suddenly on July 30, 1927.

AGRA, India, was one of the capitals of the Moghal Empire in INDIA and is the site of the world-famous Taj Mahal. It was also the headquarters of the British Province of Agra, which was joined with the Province of Oudh, former capital of the Moslem Kingdom of Oudh, to form the United Provinces. Since Indian independence the name has been changed to Uttar Pradesh, thus continuing the use of the initials "U.P.," by which common usage has designated the area for more than a century.

The Roman Catholic Church came to Agra in the days of Akbar, greatest of Moghal Emperors. The church maintains a college known as St. Peter's, and the Missionary Society has another college, St. John's. There are also Roman Catholic and Anglican high schools for boys and girls. The Baptists (British) have developed and maintained a boys' high school.

The M. E. CHURCH established simple primary schools in borrowed or rented premises in the quarters of the lowly and oppressed sweepers (scavengers) and chamars (leatherworkers), and maintained them with great difficulty for nearly three decades. Many families confessed Christ and strove persistently to establish for themselves and their neighbors a new pattern of life. They were severely handicapped by their environment; every possible obstacle to progress was theirs. Two missionaries, Sarah and Sadie Holman, decided that the school children needed to get away, at least during school hours, from their cramped and sordid environment. Their school was transferred to the church and parsonage, and relatives and friends were persuaded to build a new school structure on the church grounds. Other buildings followed and equipment was added. A high school intended primarily for the underprivileged attracted children from the most privileged homes. Present enrollment is 865, and the school is now known as the Holman Institute.

AGRA CONFERENCE. AGRA, India, is the great city of this conference, with a population of about 430,000. The conference was authorized by the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1952 and was organized in 1956. It includes districts that formerly were part of the DELHI ANNUAL CONFERENCE. There are presently seven districts of the conference, namely: Agra, Aligarh, Bulandshahr, Mathura, Meerut, Muzaffargarh, and Roorkee.

Besides Agra, the conference contains the cities of Aligarh, Bulandshahr, Dehra Dun, Chaziabad, Mathura, Meerut, Mussoorie, Roorkee and Vrindaban. Mathura and Vrindaban are sacred cities associated with Krishna. Aligarh is the site of Muslim University, Roorhee of a Governmental Technical University, Meerut has a teaching and Agra an examining university.

At last reporting the conference had sixty-five ordained pastors, and fifty-seven supply pastors, serving a membership, full and preparatory, of 130,087.

AHGREN, MAGNUS FREDRIK (1851-1937), Swedish minister, was born in Styrestad, Noorköping, Sweden, Oct. 15, 1851.

His special gifts as teacher and preacher were manifest early. In 1870 he came into contact with the Methodists, and two years later he became teacher at a Methodist day school in Örebro. In the same year he was sent to GOTHENBURG as a local preacher, working also at the printing office called Wesleyana. In 1873 he was accepted on trial in the conference and in 1875 became pastor in charge in Jönköping.

In 1876 Fredrik Ahgren went to America, where he studied at NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY, and was pastor in a Swedish-American Methodist church in CHICAGO. For some years also he taught at the GARRETT SEMINARY, Evanston. These years helped him to master the English language, and he in time became the best interpreter the Sweden Conference ever had.

In 1879 he returned to Sweden and worked as pastor in Gävle, UPPSALA (twice); at STOCKHOLM, in St. Peter, St. Paul, and Trinity, where he stayed for ten years (1896-1906); and again in 1913-16, Linköping and Östersund. Everywhere he gathered great crowds around his pulpit. Archbishop Söderblom at the Methodist Conference in Uppsala in 1926 commented appreciatively regarding Ahgren's influence on the students of theology at the University of Uppsala, and in Stockholm at Trinity he became the highly esteemed preacher of the "Upper Ten." When he was seventy years of age he acted as principal for the theological school at Uppsala. For many years he was president of the Epworth Youth Organization. He retired at seventy-five, and died on Sept. 11, 1937. Four times he had been a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE—and during the First World War he presided with appointment-making power at the Sweden Conference sessions in 1917 and 1918.

AHMAD SHAH, EBENEZER (1887-), was born in Jagraon, INDIA, on Oct. 25, 1887, the son of Ahmad Shah, a priest of the Church of England in the Punjab, and Sophia. He became a member of the Methodist Church at LUCKNOW while he was a lecturer in philosophy at Canning College. His annual conference put him on many committees and instructional boards.

He was also active in public life, serving in the State Legislative Council, 1927-44; on the National Defense Council during the second World War, 1941-45; as leader of a delegation to the Middle East in 1944, and to BURMA and MALAYSIA in 1945. He was chairman of the National Labor Tribunal of the Government of India, 1943-45.

His earned degrees were from Punjab University, B.A., 1910; Allahabad University, M.A., 1916; Oxford (England) University, B.Litt., 1922. He served many years as professor of philosophy in Lucknow University and as visiting professor or lecturer in philosophy in European and American universities. He was president of the Indian Christian Association of the United Provinces, 1936-39; member of the executive committee of the National Christian Council of India, 1931-35, and again, 1946-50.

When Ahmad Shah retired from his university posts, he signified his desire to give his remaining years to the Christian ministry, and in an extraordinary departure from precedent, the Lucknow Annual Conference of THE METHODIST CHURCH voted to receive him despite his age, and he was ordained as deacon and elder. Shortly thereafter, he was elected secretary of the executive board of The Methodist Church in Southern Asia, in which position he served with distinction.

Ahmad Shah married Salome Ishur-Ditt, a graduate of ISABELLA THOBURN COLLEGE, on March 2, 1917. She served in his stead in the United Provinces Legislative Council in 1946 while her husband was out of India. Both Ahmad Shah and his wife were awarded the coveted Commander of the Indian Empire title for their respective services.

AINSWORTH, WILLIAM NEWMAN (1872-1942), American bishop and college president, was born in Camilla, Ga., on Feb. 10, 1872. He was a son of the parsonage; his parents were James Thomas and Kate L. (McRaeny) Ainsworth. He was educated at Emory College, receiving an A.B. in 1891, and a D.D. in 1905. On Oct. 11, 1893, he married Mary Nicholson, a gracious lady who survived him many years.

He entered the SOUTH GEORGIA CONFERENCE in 1891 and held pastorates at Grace Church, Macon, Montezume, Bainbridge, Dublin, and MULBERRY STREET, MACON, all in Georgia. After that came his pastorate in the influential and historic WESLEY MONUMENTAL CHURCH, SAVANNAH. In 1909 he became president of WESLEYAN COLLEGE at Macon, but after three years in that office he returned to Mulberry Street Church, Macon. He was elected bishop by the General Conference of the M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH in 1918.

Bishop Ainsworth was a gifted preacher, with a strong "oratorical" voice and the measured, impressive delivery of a born orator. He was in demand as a speaker for the temperance cause, and later the Prohibition movement.

While serving as president of Wesleyan he befriended the Soong sisters of China, who were then students at Wesleyan, and MADAM CHIANG KAI SHEK lived in the Ainsworth home for a time. He was in the ECUMENICAL CONFERENCES of 1911, 1921, and 1931, and was an officer of the Ecumenical Methodist Council. His Episcopal administration included CHINA as well as conferences in his homeland. He retired in 1938, and died on July 7, 1942, at Asheville, N. C. He was buried in Riverside, Macon, Georgia.

AITKEN, ROBERT (1800-1873), British evangelical Anglican minister, better known as "Aitken of Pendeen." He was born in Roxburghshire, Scotland, the son of a schoolmaster. He attended Edinburgh University, 1815-1818, but did not take a degree, though he always added the claim A.M. to his publications. Brought up an Arminian, he was confirmed as an Anglican in 1821, and ordained by the Bishop of Oxford in 1824.

In 1829, while a curate in the Isle of Man, Aitken underwent a kind of evangelical conversion. He now associated closely with WESLEYAN METHODISTS, preaching in their chapels in the Isle of Man. From there he went to the north of England. In 1833-34 he conducted revival missions in Leeds. A sermon of his in WOODHOUSE GROVE SCHOOL helped to launch the famous school revival described in BENJAMIN GREGORY'S Autobiographical Recollections. In 1834 he actually allowed his name to stand as a candidate for the Wesleyan Methodist ministry. He wanted to act as a free revivalist, however, and the Conference committee appointed to consider his case reported unfavorably. Though he still regarded himself as an Anglican, he also offered himself as a mediator in the SAMUEL WARREN controversy of 1834-37, but his offer was rejected. After this he severed his connection with Methodism, and in CORNWALL in later life he never associated with it.

From 1836 to 1840 Aitken ran his own sect, The Christian Society, which had more than twenty societies scattered about the country. The attempt failed, however, and in 1841 Aitken returned to the Church of England (from which he had never been formally extruded) on a sacramental platform close to that of the Oxford Movement. His career continued to be erratic. He served under the famous Vicar of Leeds, Walter Farquhar Hook, for three years (1843-47), but again failed to establish himself.

In 1849 he retired to Pendeen, in Cornwall, a remote living which his wife obtained for him, and spent the rest of his life there. Self-important and ambitious, Aitken was always looking for a cause which would make his name. In 1854 he again turned to Wesleyanism, publishing a tract on the subject of union between the Wesleys and the Church of England. This formed the basis of an approach in 1856 to Convocation (the ruling body of the Church of England) by a small group of Anglican ministers, but the move led to nothing, because the proposed scheme did not take into consideration the suspicion which now filled Nonconformity at the thought of Anglo-Catholicism. The claim that Aitken combined "Catholicism" and "Evangelicalism" and was a significant influence leading to a future reconciliation of these groups does not bear serious examination.

Aitken died in 1873.

JOHN KENT

MOTOZO AKAZAWA

AKAZAWA, MOTOZO (1875-1936), bishop of the JAPAN METHODIST CHURCH, was born in a country village in Okayama Prefecture, where for generations his Buddhist family had been brewers of rice wine. Although he had some contact with Christianity as a boy, he seems to have drifted away from its influence, for when he was twenty-one he was sent to Honolulu to extend the family's sake business. Within a few months there came a tremendous change in his life, largely through the influence of the Rev. S. Kihara. He gave up the liquor business and began to help in evangelistic work. For more than a year he served as pastor of a small church on Maui.

Feeling the need for more education, he crossed the Pacific to California, and in 1897 enrolled as a student in the College of the Pacific, then at San Jose. He served as pastor of the Japanese mission there. Later he went to the University of Texas, where he was graduated in 1905. He had one year of seminary at VANDERBILT before returning to Japan to enter the pastorate.

The remainder of his life was spent in the Japan Methodist Church—as pastor (especially in Osaka and Kobe), as special evangelist for the Great Forward Movement (corresponding to the Centenary Movement in the U.S.A.), as president of the Lambuth Training School for Christian Workers, and as secretary of the Board of Missions. In 1930, on the death of Bishop Kocoko USAKI, he was named to fill the unexpired term, and was reelected at the two following General Conferences, serving until his death on May 12, 1936.

Bishop Akazawa was a man of deep spirituality and evangelistic passion, greatly beloved by his Japanese and missionary associates.

JOHN B. COBB, SR.

AKERS, MILBURN PETER (1900-1970), newspaperman and Methodist layman, was born in Chicago, May 4, 1900, the son of Edwin W. and Anna May (Wilson) Akers. He received the A.B. degree from MCKENDREE COLLEGE in 1925, and the honorary LL.D. and L.H.D. in 1952 and 1958 from ILLINOIS WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY and OTTERBEIN COLLEGE. He married Beulah M. McClure, Oct. 4, 1925, and they had one daughter.

In his profession Akers served as reporter for the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, 1923-27; telegraph editor, Illinois State Register, Springfield, 1927-30; Associated Press, Chicago, 1930-33, Springfield, 1933-34, and Washington, D. C., 1934-37; superintendent of reports, State of Illinois, 1937-39; assistant to the Secretary of the Interior, 1939-41; successively political and editorial writer, managing editor, and executive editor, Chicago Sun-Times, 1941-59; and editor, 1959 until retirement in 1965.

Akers was a trustee of MACMURRAY COLLEGE (Illinois). As chairman of the board of trustees of McKendree College, he was influential in helping that school to achieve full academic accreditation in 1970. He was a member of the Quadrennial Commission on Higher Education, 1956-60, and was executive director of the Federation of Independent Illinois Colleges and Universities. At one time he served on the NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, and on the Methodist Commission on Public Relations and Information. For some years he was in demand as a speaker at annual conferences and lay assemblies. He was killed May 27, 1970, in a traffic accident on an Illinois highway.

AKERS, PETER (1790-1886), American minister and educator, was born Sept. 1, 1790 in Campbell Co., Va. He revealed early evidence of leadership and ability when he taught school very capably at the age of sixteen.

His parents were devout Presbyterians and desired young Akers to be a minister, but he preferred law and moved to Kentucky. He taught school briefly at Mount Sterling, Ky., then moved to Flemingsburg, where he entered the law office of Major W. P. Fleming. In 1817 he was admitted to the bar, went into partnership with Major Fleming, and soon gained note as an unusually gifted attorney.

In 1818 he married Eliza S. Faris. A turning point came in the life of Peter Akers in 1821. His wife, who had lost two children and was seriously ill, was converted to Methodism by their physician, the Rev. Dr. Houston. On March 25, 1821, after a sermon by Houston, Akers and his wife joined the M. E. Church, thus bringing to Methodism one of its most eloquent and forceful figures. Mrs. Akers died shortly before her husband delivered his first sermon in July 1821. He was licensed to preach the following September and was recommended for admission to the KENTUCKY CONFERENCE. Admitted on trial, he was appointed to the Limestone Circuit.

In 1823 Akers fell seriously ill while serving the Fleming Circuit, and few thought he would recover. After that, however, he enjoyed a new flow of inspiration which made him one of the most effective evangelists that part of the church has known. People were awed by the power and eloquence of this large framed but gentle man, and responded in great numbers to his call to the church.

After serving at LEXINGTON, Ky. for a year, he became agent for AUGUSTA COLLEGE in 1827. Following that assignment he served LOUISVILLE, Danville, and Harrodsburg for several years. He returned in 1831 to his former post as agent for Augusta College.

It was in 1832 that Peter Akers went to ILLINOIS, where he served first as an evangelist. He became president of MCKENDREE COLLEGE—its first president—in 1833-34, and then founded Ebenezer Manual Labor School while also serving the new Beardstown appointment.

Akers was named presiding elder of the Quincy District, which he traveled for two years. Between the years 1840 and 1852 he served the Springfield, Jacksonville, and Quincy Districts. He then returned to McKendree College as president until ill health forced him to ask for transfer to the MINNESOTA CONFERENCE in 1857.

The great love his Illinois brethren held for him was shown when they asked him in 1865, at age 75 and superannuated, to return to Illinois. He did so and served the Jacksonville and Pleasant Plains Districts until formally superannuated again in 1870.

Akers was a delegate to eight General Conferences, leading many of the delegations, but this modest and genuinely humble man never sought ecclesiastical office. He died March 21, 1886, after having dedicated 65 years of his life to the church.

AKIN, DUDLEY DUNCAN (1844-1938), American minister, son of Joseph Akin, was born Feb. 16, 1844 at Lancaster, Garrard Co., Ky., and died Nov. 5, 1938 at Colorado Springs, Colo.

He served in the Union forces during the Civil War and was for some time imprisoned in the Andersonville Prison. He was licensed to preach Aug. 6, 1870 and joined the KENTUCKY CONFERENCE of the M. E. CHURCH, on trial, Feb. 23, 1872. After serving eight years in that conference, he was transferred to the SOUTH KANSAS CONFERENCE. From then until his retirement he was one of the leaders in that conference. He was appointed to the McPherson District in 1906, to the Hutchinson District in 1910, and retired in 1916. He served as conference secretary, 1887-1892, and was a delegate to the General Conference in 1904.

Akin was a member of the educational committee which located SOUTHWESTERN COLLEGE in Winfield, Kansas, and he helped in starting that institution. He gave forty-four years of active service to the church. He was a charter member of the CENTRAL KANSAS CONFERENCE, and was one of five charter members still living at the fiftieth anniversary observance of the organization of the Southwest Kansas Conference.

AKRON, OHIO, U.S.A. Methodist circuit riders came to what is now Akron as early as 1820. A Methodist class was formed in the community in 1830, and a frame church 40 by 26 feet was erected in 1836. The building burned in 1841 and another was erected. Then in 1872 a Gothic structure was built which had the distinction of being the first church in America with rooms especially provided for a graded SUNDAY SCHOOL. It became widely known as the "Akron Plan." The edifice had eight rooms for children under sixteen and eight for persons over that age. Teachers in the Sunday school assisted in writing the first graded lesson series. This church burned in 1911, and in 1914 First Church's present edifice was erected. A chapel was added in 1940, and an education annex in 1956. Trinity Church, a former German Methodist congregation, merged with First Church in 1955, and Wooster Avenue Church did the same in 1964. In 1969 Akron had 14 Methodist churches with 12,119 members. The three largest congregations with their memberships and the value of their plants were: First, 2,884, $1,486,356; Firestone-Park, 1,211, $414,500; and Christ, 1,155, $710,000. Centenary Church with 469 members is a predominantly Negro congregation. Akron has one A.M.E. ZION and five C.M.E. churches.

DOROTHAË DERRIG

ALABAMA is a state in the "deep South." From Tennessee, the Cumberland Plateau extends into the northern part of the state, while in the south, the Coosa Valley lies hemmed in by the Piedmont Plateau. Toward the Gulf lies the coastal alluvial plain. In earlier days, much of the state was covered by pine forests.

Traditionally Alabama has been a great cotton growing state, but recent years have brought diversified farming; salt, marble, and natural gas are plentiful; coal and iron are mined and processed; and cement is manufactured. Birmingham and Bessemer are great steel producing centers. Alabama was organized as a territory March 3, 1817, and it became a state December 14, 1819.

Before Alabama was a part of the Union, the Methodists had entered the region. The famous LORENZO DOW, though not under episcopal appointment at the time, preached the first Protestant sermon in what is now Alabama, in May, 1803, to settlers along the Tombigbee and Tensaw Rivers.

MATTHEW PARHAM STURDIVANT, sent out in 1808 by the SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE, was the real founder of Methodism in Alabama. In 1811, Alabama was attached to the WESTERN CONFERENCE, and in 1812 to the TENNESSEE CONFERENCE, one of the successors of the Western body. In 1813, when the MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE was formed, Alabama was included within its boundaries, and it so continued until 1832 when the Alabama Conference itself was organized. When first formed the Alabama Conference included all of the state below the Tennessee River, west Florida, and most of Mississippi's eastern tier of counties. The part of Alabama north of the Tennessee River was served by the Tennessee Conference until 1870.

The METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH organized a conference in Alabama in 1829 at Smith's Ferry, Perry County. After the division of the METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH in 1844, Alabama Methodism of course became a part of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. However, in 1867, following the Civil War, the Methodist Episcopal Church entered the state and organized an Alabama Conference. In 1876 the Negro ministers and churches of that body were set apart as the CENTRAL ALABAMA CONFERENCE. The presence of the Methodist Episcopal Church caused some tension, but both it and the Methodist Protestant Church continued active in the state until Methodist unification in 1939.

On October 7, 1808, the Tennessee Conference assigned JAMES GWIN to an area that included Madison County, Alabama, and reported on September 30, 1809, that the Flint Circuit (which included Huntsville) had been organized with 175 white and four colored members. This was the beginning of North Alabama Methodism.

In Florida, Protestantism was outlawed until the United States bought the territory from Spain in 1819. In that year Alexander Talley was sent to establish Methodism in Penscola. West Florida became a part of the Alabama Conference in 1832 and has so continued. In 1956 the body was appropriately renamed the ALABAMA-WEST FLORIDA CONFERENCE.

In its march across Alabama, Methodism established the state's first college at LaGrange (chartered in 1830), now Florence State College. East Alabama Male College, now Auburn University, was begun by the Methodists in 1858, as were Southern University at Greensboro in 1856 (now BIRMINGHAM-SOUTHERN COLLEGE), and Alabama Conference Female College at Tuskegee in 1854 (now HUNTINGDON COLLEGE, Montgomery). Centenary Institute at Summerfield, Dallas County, was launched by the Methodists in 1839 and served well for many years. In 1890 an orphanage was established in the buildings. The institution was moved to Selma in 1911. Now known as the Selma Orphanage, it is one of the finest homes for children anywhere.

ATIENS COLLEGE, founded in 1822, was incorporated in 1843, and Snead College was started about 1900. The Alabama and NORTH ALABAMA CONFERENCES (MES) operated the Memorial Hospital in Montgomery from 1922 to 1931. The North Alabama Conference maintains in BIRMINGHAM the Carraway-Methodist Hospital, a gift to the conference from Charles Newton Carraway. Fair Haven Home for the aging at Birmingham is operated by the two Alabama conferences. The North Alabama Conference has an assembly ground at Camp Sumatanga, and the Alabama-West Florida Conference maintains a similar facility in connection with the conference headquarters at Blue Lake near Andalusia. Both conferences support a number of homes for retired ministers and their widows. WESLEY FOUNDATIONS are maintained by both conferences at the state institutions of higher learning. The total church membership in the two conferences is over 327,000.

ALABAMA CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE was established in 1880. It was founded as the organ of the Alabama and NORTH ALABAMA CONFERENCES of the M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH. Prior to this time the Alabama Conference, organized in 1832, and the North Alabama Conference, set up in 1870, had been served by papers in neighboring conferences.

The North Alabama Conference in 1878 sent an invitation to the Alabama Conference session to join in the project of establishing a paper "to be conducted in the interest of Methodism in the two Conferences." Each conference authorized a committee to work on the objective. There was some hesitation, but the conferences approved in 1880 the election of the first editor, A. S. Andrews, pastor of First Church, Opelika, Ala. The first issue was printed May 25, 1881.

The title was changed to the Methodist Christian Advocate with the issue of Oct. 30, 1956. This was done to give the publication a name more inclusive of the territory it serves—Alabama and West Florida.

The roster of editors is: A. S. Andrews, 1881 (May-November); J. W. Christian, 1881-82; J. W. Rush, 1882-87; W. C. McCoy, 1887-90; J. M. Mason, 1890-91; Z. A. Parker, pro tem, two months; Thomas Armstrong, 1892-94; J. O. ANDREW, 1895-98; Henry Urquart, 1898-1902;

H. H. McCoy, 1902-03; Henry Trawick, 1903-05; J. D. Ellis, 1905-06; J. S. Chadwick, 1906-10; J. B. Cumming, 1910-12; J. M. Glenn, 1912-13; L. C. Branscomb, 1913-22 (in 1915 J. B. Wadsworth, a layman, was elected an editor with Branscomb, who at the time was also presiding elder of the Birmingham District. In this year, according to general understanding, the two editors worked without compensation from the Advocate); M. E. LAZENBY, 1922-35; FOSTER K. GAMBLE, 1935-41; Acton E. Middlebrooks, 1941-48; J. A. Gann, 1948-50; M. E. Lazenby (second tenure), 1950-53; Thomas P. Chalker, 1953-65; Herschel T. Hamner, 1965-

The Advocate several times has had a publisher (later termed business manager) as well as an editor. Among these: T. J. Rutledge, 1881; C. R. Lynch, 1882; S. M. Hosmer, 1895; H. W. Rice, 1929. Occasionally there have been associate editors, as J. W. Christian, 1881; M. E. Lazenby, 1920. Sometimes there have been assistant editors-business managers, as J. M. Wigley, a layman, and S. T. Slaton.

The first Publishing Committee consisted of Anson West, A. S. Andrews, R. H. Rivers, T. J. Rutledge, J. W. Christian, John A. Thompson.

The present Board of Trustees consists of five members from each of the two conferences.

The Advocate achieved strong stature in circulation for the first time during the editorship of L. C. Branscomb, when subscriptions rose to 27,000. This was then the largest circulation attained by a paper in the M. E. Church, South. The Advocate became well known across the denomination in those years.

The paper has known some uncertain seas, but in each instance the ship has been steadied. For example, at the 1916 session of the North Alabama Conference, a move was made for consolidating the paper with the Wesleyan Christian Advocate of the GEORGIA CONFERENCES. On that occasion a minority report, brought in by one person, I. K. Waller, prevailed and preserved the Advocate.

The most imposing issue doubtless is the Semicentennial Edition of Sept. 25, 1930, when M. E. Lazenby was editor. It was 58 pages, bound in glossy cover (there was no issue the next week), and gave brief historical sketches of institutions, individuals, and churches of the two conferences.

ALABAMA CONFERENCE. (See ALABAMA.)

ALABAMA-WEST FLORIDA CONFERENCE. This conference was formed in 1832 by dividing the MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE. When organized the Alabama Conference included all of ALABAMA below the Tennessee River, west FLORIDA, and most of Mississippi's eastern tier of counties. The part of Alabama north of the Tennessee River was served by the TENNESSEE CONFERENCE until 1870. At the time of its organization, the Alabama Conference had 8,196 white and 2,770 colored members.

In 1863, while the Civil War was raging, the Alabama Conference was divided to form the Mobile and Montgomery Conferences. The Mobile Conference included west Alabama and east Mississippi, while the Montgomery Conference took in east Alabama and west Florida. In 1870, there was a radical reorganization of the annual conferences of the M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH in Alabama. The northern half of the state was designated as the NORTH ALABAMA CONFERENCE. The eastern counties of Mississippi were given to the Mississippi and NORTH MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCES. The Mobile and Montgomery Conferences, after having existed only seven years, were merged to reconstitute the Alabama Conference. Thus when the Alabama Conference reappeared in 1870, it was limited to the southern half of Alabama and the part of Florida west of the Appalachian River.

On Oct. 17, 1867, the M. E. CHURCH organized the Alabama Mission Conference which included both white and Negro ministers and churches. The organizational session was held "in the college building" at Talladega with Bishop Davis W. CLARK presiding. The bishop declared, "I now convoke the Alabama Conference to be admitted as a Mission Conference until constituted a full conference by the proper authority of the church." (Lazenby, pp. 365-66.) It became a full conference in 1868. The entry of the "Northern" branch of Methodism into the state caused some tension.

In 1876, by permission of the General Conference, the Alabama Conference (ME) was divided along racial lines into two conferences, the white section retaining the original conference name, while the Negro group was called the CENTRAL ALABAMA CONFERENCE.

In 1939, the four white Methodist conferences in Alabama were merged into the North Alabama and Alabama Conferences of THE METHODIST CHURCH, and the Central Alabama Conference became a part of the CENTRAL JURISDICTION of the new church. In 1968, with the organization of THE UNITED METHODIST CHURCH, the Central Jurisdiction was dissolved, and the Central Alabama Conference was placed temporarily in the Birmingham Area of the church, pending full absorption by the Alabama-West Florida and North Alabama Conferences.

As Methodist union approached in 1939, the Alabama Conference (MES), afraid that its Florida territory would be taken from it and given to the FLORIDA CONFERENCE, memorialized the Uniting Conference to maintain the status quo. The boundaries of the conference were not disturbed, and in 1956 it appropriately changed its name to the Alabama-West Florida Conference.

The Alabama-West Florida and the North Alabama Conferences constitute the Birmingham Area of the church, and the two work together in supporting a number of institutions and causes. They jointly publish the Methodist Christian Advocate, and they share in the ownership and maintenance of colleges, orphanages, and homes for the aged. The Alabama-West Florida Conference has nine districts and approximately 130,000 members, and the North Alabama Conference has twelve districts and some 199,500 members.

ALABASTER, FRANCIS ASBURY (1866-1946), American educator, was born in Rochester, N. Y., June 10, 1866. His father was a Methodist minister for many years.

His early education was received in the public schools of Elmira, Cortland, and Auburn, N. Y. His high school education was obtained in Ann Arbor and Detroit, Mich. and Indianapolis, Ind.

In 1890, Alabaster received his B.A. from NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY, Evanston, Ill., graduating with honors. He continued his studies as a graduate student at University of Chicago, specializing in Greek and Latin. In 1898 he received his M.A. degree from University of Nebraska. DICKINSON COLLEGE, Carlisle, Pa., awarded him an honorary LL.D. degree in 1918.

Alabaster was named professor of Greek and Latin at NEBRASKA WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY in 1893, and was elected Dean of the College of Liberal Arts in 1911, a position he held until his retirement in 1943.

He was a member of Phi Beta Kappa and Phi Kappa Phi, honorary scholarship fraternities, and was a leader in establishing the Phi Kappa Phi chapter on the campus of Nebraska Wesleyan. He was a great favorite of the students and faculty alike. He was much in demand as a lecturer, as much for his humor as his wide range of interests. "Dean Allie," as his students called him, was well known for his lecture on unusual epithets, which he collected from old cemeteries and graveyards throughout the eastern United States.

For many years Alabaster was an active member of First Methodist Church near the college campus, and was active in the work of Nebraska Wesleyan's Alumni Association. He served as secretary of the Alumni Association for three years after his retirement.

ALAMOGORDO, NEW MEXICO, U.S.A. Grace United Methodist Church is a stately edifice of modern brick construction which was begun on its present site of a city block in 1957, the sanctuary being completed in 1961. Its unusual beauty comes from the modernistic multi-colored glass windows combined with contemporary architectural design. Features greatly appreciated are the exposed aggregate panels back of the altar, the concealed lighting of the mahogany cross, the Brides' Room, the carillon, and the overall electronic system. Two morning worship services are conducted in the sanctuary which seats over 600, and likewise two sessions of the church school in the education building erected to care for 700. The staff is composed of a minister, assistant minister, minister of education, business assistant, pastor's secretary, educational secretary, three choir directors, three organists, and two custodians.

The church was organized on Sept. 29, 1898, when the city was composed of tents, tumble weeds, mesquite brush, and native cactus, and has grown from a membership of fifteen on that opening day to 2,460 now. In its beginning Grace was part of a circuit, being connected with Tularosa, Capitan, and La Luz, but in 1912 it became a station charge. Today the church owns property valued at $507,313.

Being near the site of the first atomic explosion, the members are cognizant of man's spiritual need. Because of the location near Holloman Air Force Base and White Sands Missile Range, people from all over America and around the world may be found in the congregation on a given Sunday.

ALASKA. It might be said that the great northwestern area of North America known as the State of Alaska was "discovered" three times by as many generations of people in the United States, and that each "discovery" was followed by increasing interest on the part of American churches. In each of these new periods of interest, the Methodist Church was among those concerned.

The first "discovery" came in 1867 when Alaska was purchased from Russia by the United States for $7,200,000. The second, sending thousands of people from the States into the Territory, began in 1896 with the discovery of gold in the Klondike area. Finally, Alaska was "discovered" when it became an important frontier during and after World War II for the protection of North America from possible invaders, and when thousands of American youth were stationed there in the armed services.

In the first two decades after the transfer of Alaska from Russia to the United States, there was relatively little concern by either the people or the churches with the "vast wilderness of ice" which the nation had acquired. Even the military forces stationed in Alaska were slim. The Russian Greek Orthodox Church had for more than a century worked among the Indians, the Aleuts, and the Eskimos in the area, and had builded their faith among ritualistic-loving people. A few stateside churches sent missionaries to the people, but results were meager.

The late Bishop W. VERNON MIDDLETON noted in 1958, "The first concrete evidence of Methodist interest in Alaska was in 1885, when at the annual meeting of the Woman's Home Missionary Society of the former M. E. Church, a 'Bureau for Alaska' was created. A year later the church sent the Rev. and Mrs. John H. Carr to Unga in the Shumagin Islands to establish a church and school. . . . Unfortunately, Mrs. Carr died the next year at the age of twenty-two, and Mr. Carr returned to the States. In 1888 the Woman's Home Missionary Society commissioned a missionary to Alaska, but on her arrival she became ill and died shortly afterward. In the meantime various societies across America were raising money to establish a home for children in Alaska, one of the great needs of the territory. Dr. Sheldon Jackson (Presbyterian missionary), then agent for education in Alaska, came to the aid of the women and helped them to secure a 160-acre site at Unalaska for the first permanent Methodist work in Alaska. The JESSE LEE HOME was established as a home and school in 1890. . . . Within three weeks of opening, the Jesse Lee Home was filled to capacity." This early ministry was basically for the Eskimos and Aleuts.

Six years later, gold was discovered in the Klondike and then in other remote areas of Alaska. In the next few years many thousands of prospectors arrived, mostly from the United States. More than fifty percent of the gold hunters stayed only one year in Alaska before returning home, many of them poorer than when they entered the territory. Then the Missionary Society began to feel a concern for men seeking gold, and for men and women settling in a few hastily begun mining towns. The first churches were erected, and the first pastors were sent to serve them.

In 1904 the M. E. Church officially established the Alaska Mission. However, the General Minutes show that there was mission work in the territory as early as 1898. C. J. LARSEN of the WESTERN NORWEGIAN-DANISH CONFERENCE was superintendent of the mission and served as pastor at Juneau and Wrangel. From 1899 to 1902 the Alaska Mission appears in the index of the General Minutes, but no appointments or statistics are listed. The Alaska Mission was "organized and held in Tacoma, Washington, September 23-24, 1903" with Bishop JOHN W. HAMILTON presiding. Four ministers received appointments. The next year the session was held in Juneau with Bishop Hamilton again in charge. Thereafter the mission met annually until 1924 when the work was made a part of the Puget Sound Conference. In 1939 the Alaska Mission was reinstated, and in 1961 it became the Alaska Mission Conference.

In 1906 A. B. Leonard, a missionary executive, visited Alaska and reported churches in Ketchikan, Douglas, Juneau, and Skaguay. He said there were plans to establish new churches in SEWARD and Fairbanks that year.

Methodist churches in Alaska have increased as communities have grown and changed, and as centers of industry have developed. Anchorage has become an important port city, and Matanuska Valley is an agricultural area. Today there are 30 churches and preaching places, two hospitals, two community centers, and a relocated Jesse Lee Home serving the young state. Population is growing, the airplane is the principal means of travel, and new industries based on the area's almost unlimited resources are emerging.

In addition to its ministry to Aleuts, Indians, and Eskimos, The Methodist Church is making its largest contribution (numerically) to the permanent white and mixed populations of the growing cities. Unlike the earlier one-year transients, these residents are building their homes and careers in Alaska. Also, the churches are ministering to men in the armed service of the nation, many of them stationed in lonely and isolated posts. Recently it was estimated that there were 76,000 service men in Alaska most of whom had connections with Protestant churches "back home." Army and navy chaplains serving in Alaska cooperate in many ways with the Methodist and other ministers working there.

In 1960, after years of study, fund raising, and preparation, ALASKA METHODIST UNIVERSITY was established on a 500-acre campus in the outskirts of Anchorage. This has been Methodism's largest single contribution to the educational needs of the new state. It is a liberal arts institution with high educational standards, and with "the cross at the center of the educational process and goal." Alaska University means, for one thing, that Alaskan youth need not leave their home state to secure an education in a church-related arts college. There are presently 400 students enrolled, and a highly competent Christian faculty. Methodists from the older states have contributed about $4,000,000 for the buildings, program, and scholarships of the university.

Leading in the campaign to establish the Alaska University, and then to raise funds for its erection and support, has been P. Gordon Gould, a former pastor and mission superintendent in Alaska. Gould was born in Alaska, received his early training in the Jesse Lee Home, and was the first Alaskan to become an ordained Methodist minister. He spoke to church audiences across the United States on Alaska's "most significant need"—a church-related liberal arts college.

On March 27, 1964, a severe earthquake which centered in Anchorage wrought widespread destruction of property in parts of Alaska. There was heavy damage to several of the buildings of Alaska Methodist University; the Jesse Lee Home which had been moved to Seward in 1925 was ruined beyond repair; in Turnagain, Seward, Seldovia and elsewhere churches and parsonages were damaged or demolished.

On learning of the losses, Methodist churches in other areas on a swiftly made plea from the COUNCIL OF BISHOPS undertook an "Alaska Earthquake Appeal" which raised some $1,750,000 to help rebuild the institutions. The funds provided made it possible to relocate the Jesse Lee Home on a 25-acre campus in the more favorable climate of Anchorage; to restore damaged buildings at Alaska University, replace furnishings and scientific equipment, and provide some tuition aid for students whose families suffered economic reverses in the earthquake; and to assist where necessary in rebuilding or relocating churches and parsonages. Two years after the earthquake, a Methodist leader said, "The spirit of the frontier continues—and this has become Alaska's finest hour."

In 1967, the Alaska Mission Conference had 16 pastoral charges, 4,070 members, and property valued at $4,193,060. The mission conference officially dates its beginning from the session of the Alaska Mission held in Juneau in 1904.

GRANT HALL, ALASKA METHODIST UNIVERSITY

ALASKA METHODIST UNIVERSITY, Anchorage, Alaska, grew out of a study of the needs of the Territory of Alaska by the BOARD OF MISSIONS of The Methodist Church. In January, 1957, the Division of National Missions elected a board of trustees, and on February 4, 1957, the university was chartered by the then Territory of Alaska. The university opened for instruction in October, 1960.

Established initially as a four-year-college of liberal arts (fully accredited in December, 1964), it now includes the College of Business Administration and Economics. It grants the B.A. and B.S. in Business degrees. The governing board of twenty-nine trustees includes six permanent trustee positions (bishop of the Portland Area; officers of the National Division and the Woman's Division; and the superintendent of the Alaska Mission), with the balance elected by the board.

ALASKA MISSION CONFERENCE. (See ALASKA.)

ALBANY, GEORGIA, U.S.A. First Church was organized in 1841 and established an early outreach for social and human problems, and remains a successful downtown place of worship.

This church has helped organize and provide members for seven other Methodist churches in Albany. Despite the membership contributions to new churches, 125 years after its organization Albany First Church maintains a membership of 2,374. Albany itself has grown from a mere village in 1841 to a population of approximately 75,000 by 1966.

In its long history, the church has belonged to three conferences—the old GEORGIA CONFERENCE that embraced the entire state prior to 1866; then the FLORIDA CONFERENCE, to which all of southwest Georgia was assigned from 1845 to 1866; and now the SOUTH GEORGIA CONFERENCE, from the time of its establishment in 1866 to the present time.

Many consecrated and devoted men have served Albany First Church as pastors since 1841, but no pastor served as long as four years until Henry D. Moore began a quadrennium in 1865.

The church became a station with a full-time pastor in 1855, under the ministry of Peyton P. Smith. The first permanent church building was erected in 1854 on a lot at the corner of Flint Avenue and Jackson Street, on which lot the church still stands, with its present expanded facilities and property valued well above one million dollars. A new church was erected in 1901-02, and an education building was completed in 1930. In 1952 the congregation moved into the present sanctuary seating 1200, and about 1963 added a building valued at $650,000 which houses many additional classrooms for the church school. There is a chapel, a parlor, and a dining room in which some of the most helpful functions of the church are conducted.

The late Augustus W. Muse, Sunday school superintendent from 1874 to his death in 1922, was a noted church pioneer who probably did more for Methodism in Albany, Ga. than any other one person.

The records are not definite as to the exact number—twelve are presently in the active ministry—but First Church has sent forth into the ministry a considerable number of young men.

ALBANY, NEW YORK, U.S.A. Because Captain THOMAS WEBB was barrack master in Albany before he went to New York in 1766 to help PHILIP EMBURY, it can be said that Albany was one of the first cities in America in which Methodist services were conducted. Webb preached to the soldiers, and also held services in his own home. Apparently Webb did not organize a Methodist society in Albany, though FREEBORN GARRETTSON seems to suggest that he found Methodists there when he preached in the city more than 20 years later. By 1876 there were six Methodist churches in the city with about 1,800 members. In 1963 First Church merged with Trinity. In 1968 Trinity Church reported 1,349 members and a plant valued at $2,113,079. In that year there were five Methodist churches in the city with about 4,100 members. W. EARL LEDDEN was elected bishop in 1944 while serving as pastor of Trinity Church. The 1948 Northeastern Jurisdictional Conference was held in Trinity Church.

ALBERT COLLEGE, Belleville, Ontario, Canada. In the early 1850's the Methodist Episcopal Church in Canada had revived and grown sufficiently to make possible the establishment of its own college, VICTORIA College (UNIVERSITY) being no longer suitable because of the bad feeling between Wesleyan and Episcopal Methodists. The Episcopal leaders were convinced that such an institution was necessary to save young men "for the country and the Church" and to broaden the educational opportunities for young women. At the General Conference of 1854 this conviction became a reality.

With much effort plans were laid and funds collected for Belleville Seminary, which was incorporated and formally opened on July 16, 1857. From the outset it was designed as a preparatory school for men and women, in which no religious tests would be required. In accordance with the general policy of the church, public money was not accepted for the maintenance of the seminary.

After a short period of affiliation with the University of Toronto, a university charter was secured, by which the seminary became Albert University, with power to confer degrees in arts. Within the university there were two colleges—Albert College for men, and Alexandra College for women. In the former, Bachelor's and Master's Degrees were granted; in the latter the degrees were Mistress of Liberal Arts and Mistress of English Literature. The charter was broadened in 1870 to permit work in all faculties.

Under the energetic presidency of ALBERT CARMAN, Albert University made a notable contribution to the educational history of Ontario. Its graduates were numerous and respected. In 1884, however, church union dictated a reorganization by which Albert University was amalgamated with Victoria, and it became once again a preparatory school under Methodist auspices.

Since 1884, Albert College has continued in operation in Belleville, Ontario, first under the Methodist Church and after 1925 under The United Church of Canada. New buildings have been added, and the student body has increased. Above all, the college remains a school in which a sound secondary education is imparted in a Christian context. In so doing the college perpetuates and embodies the intentions of its founders.

ALBERTA COLLEGE (former Methodist college in Edmonton, Alberta). In the spring of 1903 THOMAS C. BUCHANAN sponsored the formation of a college in Edmonton under the auspices of the Methodist Church. In 1904, the college was incorporated by the legislative assembly of the North West Territories, and J. H. RIDDELL, of WESLEY COLLEGE, Winnipeg, was appointed as first principal. Classes began on Oct. 5, 1903, with an enrollment of sixty-seven in a large room over a store in Edmonton. The departments of study were arts, matriculation, music, and commercial. The college was originally called Mc-Dougall College, after the pioneer Methodist missionary, GEORGE McDUGALL, on whose property the building was erected in downtown Edmonton.

When the University of Alberta was established in 1908, the arts classes at the college were discontinued, and the students became the nucleus of the first student body of the provincial university. In 1909 a theological department was added to Alberta College, and this part of the college became affiliated with the University of Alberta.

J. H. Riddell was succeeded as principal of Alberta College in 1917 by Francis Stacey McCall, an early graduate who continued as principal until 1947. The college maintained a steady growth, with the erection of a new wing in 1926, an auditorium and gymnasium in 1951, and large new classroom facilities in 1953 and 1959.

On the retirement of McCall in 1947, George Harrison Villett became principal until his death in 1959, to be followed by Hartford A. Cantelon. Sidney R. Vincent was appointed in 1965.

Under the aegis of the Board of Colleges of the United Church of Canada since 1925, Alberta College has continued to fulfil its role as a coeducational residential junior college.

ALBERT'S CHAPEL, an octagonal structure known as the "Round Church," is located at Sand Ridge on Route 33, Calhoun Co., W. Va. It is claimed that someone in the community, after reading a sermon by T. DeWitt Talmage on the text, "It is He that sitteth upon the circle of the earth" (Isa. 40:22), concluded that a church ought to be round, and it resulted in the building of this architecturally odd edifice.

Albert Poling, a veteran of the Spanish-American War, for whom the church was named, was designated by the district conference to see that a church was built in the community. Voluntary labor felled trees for lumber and did the actual work of construction. The land for the church and the adjoining cemetery was given by Wesley and Asbury Poling. The church which will seat about 125 was dedicated in 1903. One of five churches on the Sand Ridge Circuit, Albert's Chapel reported 42 members and an average church school attendance of 23 in 1969. Each year many motorists stop to visit the "Round Church."

ALBION COLLEGE, Albion, Michigan, was chartered in 1835 by the Michigan Territorial Legislature. While the college did admit male students, degrees were granted only to women until 1861, when the name was changed from Albion Female Collegiate Institute and Wesleyan Seminary to Albion College. The institution has been greatly assisted by the Kresge and Ford Foundations in the development of its plant and endowment. The college and the local Methodist church jointly erected a sanctuary and religious education building and share the facilities. A Phi Beta Kappa chapter was installed in 1940. Degrees granted include the B.A. and M.A.

The governing board of thirty-three members include six elected by the DETROIT ANNUAL CONFERENCE, six by the alumni, and fifteen by the board.

ALBISTON, ARTHUR (1866-1961), Australian preacher, educator, and theologian, was born at Emerald Hill near South Melbourne, Aug. 19, 1866. His father, Joseph Albiston, was one of six ministers sent from the British WESLEYAN METHODIST Conference to be missionaries in AUSTRALIA. He arrived in Victoria in Feb., 1854.

His early education was received in a state school, but later, at thirteen or fourteen years of age, he was sent to Wesley College. In those days the theological institution was housed in Wesley College and students for the ministry were trained there. Through the influence of a young theological student, John Nall, he gave himself to Christ. This he said "was the beginning of my call to the work of preaching the Christian Gospel." While at Wesley College Arthur won medals in mile races, and also rowed in the college "four."

After leaving Wesley College he graduated Master of Arts at Melbourne University. It was while he was studying at the university that a fellow student, the late ALBERT T. HOLDEN, suggested to him that he should preach. In due time he became a local preacher.

In his final year at the university he met HENRY BATH, who had a very great influence upon his future life and preaching. Bath's personal influence was "overwhelming and overpowering." He tells of a deep spiritual experience which would not have been possible except for the influence of Bath. It was through these experiences that Arthur Albiston became the celebrated preacher that Methodism honors. Through it all there was the influence of his own father, whom he described as a man of one book, who prayed and thought in terms of Scripture and through whom he learned to do his own thinking.

After a year as a local preacher in Castlemaine where his father was superintendent, Arthur began his ministry in 1889 as fourth minister in the Hawthorn Circuit. In 1891 he visited England and Europe with his father. The following year he spent as fourth minister in South Melbourne. He was ordained in 1893 and was appointed to the Mildura Circuit as Superintendent Minister.

In 1919 Albiston was elected President of the VICTORIAN AND TASMANIAN CONFERENCE. In 1920 the conference appointed him as full-time theological tutor to assist Dr. Sugden, Master of Queen's College. For seventeen years he held the position of theological tutor and professor of theology, and for one more year continued as professor emeritus.

In 1938 he was elected President-General of the Methodist Church of Australasia. He was then 71 years of age. He visited all the Australian states, going to Central Australia and ALICE SPRINGS, and NEW ZEALAND. As President-General he exhibited accuracy of definition, clarity in interpretation, and firmness in decision in matters of procedure and law.

He was a minister of the Methodist Church for 72 years. He was both "a prince of preachers" and a saint of God.

JACOB ALBRIGHT

EVANGELICAL UNITED BRETHREN CHURCH, was born near Pottstown, Pa., May 1, 1759. He served in the local militia during the closing years of the Revolutionary War. In 1785, Albright married Catherine Cope and settled on a farm in northeastern Lancaster Co., Pa. In addition to farming, he conducted there a successful tile and brick factory and became known as the honest tile maker.

In a period of unrest, brought on by the sudden death of several of his children and the preaching of Anthony Houtz, an evangelistic Reformed pastor, at their funeral, Albright turned to his neighbor Adam Riegel, a follower of the United Brethren in Christ. Riegel gave him counsel and led him through prayer to experience the peace of God. In the home of another neighbor, Isaac Davies, Albright was led into the fellowship of a Methodist class and found the orderly religious experience his soul craved. This class eventually licensed him as an EXHORTER, a lay preacher in Methodism.

Albright felt called to preach to his German brethren near his boyhood home, but he was deeply conscious of his lack of technical preparation. Finally, the Spirit of God prevailed, and in 1796, he started out to obey the call. On horseback, he traveled to the many German people of Pennsylvania and neighboring states, preaching in churches, schools, and private homes. In 1800, he organized three classes in three separate southeastern Pennsylvania counties. By 1807, the first conference was held with five itinerant and three local ministers and a membership of two hundred. The name, "The Newly Formed Methodist Conference," was adopted at Albright's suggestion. Albright strongly favored the spirit and organization of Methodism. Two things ultimately prevented his bringing his movement into the M. E. Church: the lack of interest in continuing the German language in American Methodism, and the loss of his membership in the Lancaster County class due to absences required by his preaching.

Worn out by intensive itinerant labors and a tubercular condition, Jacob Albright died at the home of a friend at KLEINFELTERSVILLE, Pa., May 18, 1808. He was buried in the family plot nearby, whereon a memorial chapel was built by an appreciative denomination fifty years later. The work which he began grew into The Evangelical Church, which merged in 1946 with the Church of the United Brethren in Christ to become The Evangelical United Brethren Church.

ALBRIGHT COLLEGE, Reading, Pa., chartered in 1856, traces its origin to Union Seminary founded by the Central Pennsylvania Conference of the Evangelical Association at New Berlin, Pennsylvania. In 1887, its name was changed to Central Pennsylvania College.

Meanwhile, in 1881, Schuylkill Seminary was formed by the East Pennsylvania Conference of the Evangelical Association in Reading. After a brief move to Fredericksburg, Pa., it returned to Reading and in 1923 became Schuylkill College.

Albright Collegiate Institute, named after the founder of The Evangelical Church, JACOB ALBRIGHT, was established at Myerstown, Pa., in 1895, merging eventually with Central Pennsylvania College in 1902, under the name of Albright College. Then, in 1928, it consolidated with Schuylkill, under the name of Albright College of The Evangelical (later Evangelical United Brethren) Church, in Reading, at its present location.

Albright's charter pledges the college to provide for the "moral, literary, and scientific education of all persons of both sexes." Its privileges are open to all whom they may benefit without distinction of race or creed.

As a Christian college, Albright aims to remain true to the fundamental, moral and religious principles of its denomination, which is democratic in policy, emphasizing individual worth and high moral responsibility. It seeks to make possible the highest intellectual development in an atmosphere of Christian ideals.

Full-time enrollment in 1966-67 academic year at Albright College is 1126, consisting of 651 men and 475 women. Other statistics include: Library, 101,000 volumes; total faculty, 93; campus acreage, 65; number of buildings, 28; value of physical plant, $10,684,515; endowment, book value, $2,551,655; and current income, $3,013,773. Gifts and grants received during the past five years total $3,006,290. There are over seven thousand living alumni including 5,050 graduates and 2160 former students.

Among the distinguished alumni of Albright College are Dr. Arthur R. McKay, President, McCormick Theological Seminary, Chicago, Ill.; George C. Bollman, President, George W. Bollman Hat Company, Adamstown, Pa.; Clarence W. Whitmoyer, President, Whitmoyer Laboratories, Myerstown, Pa.; Judge J. Sydney Hoffman, Judge of the Superior Court of Pennsylvania; William E. Dearden, Vice President, Hershey Chocolate Corporation, Hershey, Pa.; and Dr. Cyrus E. Beckey, Academic Dean, Kutztown State College, Kutztown, Pa.

Albright College is located at the base of Mt. Penn in the northeast section of Reading, Pennsylvania. The campus lies at the edge of one of the residential sections of the city. By its location, the college enjoys the benefits of a suburban environment as well as the advantages of an urban center.

ALBRIGHT CHAPEL

ALBRIGHT MEMORIAL CHAPEL, Kleinfeltersville, Pa., U.S.A., a shrine of The EVANGELICAL UNITED BRETHREN CHURCH, was erected to the memory of JACOB ALBRIGHT, founder of the Evangelische Gemeinschaft (EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION). A victim of tuberculosis, Albright had taken seriously ill in May, 1808, in Harrisburg, Pa., and was returning home by horseback. He could go no farther than the home of George Becker, Kleinfeltersville, about twenty miles from his home. He died there on May 18 and was buried two days later in the Becker family cemetery.

On Oct. 13, 1850 an appreciative church dedicated a memorial stone chapel near his grave in commemoration of the fiftieth anniversary of the establishment of the denomination. In the same year the Becker family deeded the land upon which the church was built and included the adjacent cemetery plot, a total of one acre, to the East Pennsylvania Conference for the denomination. Due to faulty construction the building was completely rebuilt in 1860.

The General Conference of The EVANGELICAL CHURCH in 1934 recommended that the Historical Society of the Church become the custodian of the property. The title was transferred in 1941 to this general church agency. With the formation of The United Methodist Church, the chapel and grave became one of the national historic shrines. The present ownership is vested in the COMMISSION ON ARCHIVES AND HISTORY OF The United Methodist Church. The Commission formed a committee of five local persons and its executive secretary to advise in the administration of the program and property. The former practice of annual pilgrimages has been re-initiated.

JOHN H. NESS, JR.

ALBUQUERQUE, NEW MEXICO, U.S.A. The M. E. CHURCH was the first Protestant denomination to establish work in Albuquerque. The New Mexico Mission was organized in 1872, and for the next seven years the superintendent of the mission and other preachers occasionally visited Albuquerque. In 1879 N. Hewitt Gale was appointed to take charge of the denomination's work in Albuquerque. On April 18, 1880, THOMAS HARWOOD, superintendent, officiated at the organization of a church with five members. This was the beginning of First Methodist Church.

In 1887 the M. E. Church established two educational institutions in Albuquerque—the Boys Biblical and Industrial School for preparing Mexicans for the Spanish-speaking ministry, and the Harwood School for Girls. The first school closed in 1931, while the latter, sponsored by the Woman's Home Missionary Society, continues to this day. In 1911 the society established a sanatorium in Albuquerque which became the Bataan Memorial Methodist Hospital in 1952.

In 1881 the DENVER CONFERENCE of the M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH organized a New Mexico District with eight charges, one of which was Albuquerque. The denomination had begun work in Albuquerque in June, 1879. On January 15, 1882 a church was organized in Albuquerque, and a building was erected during that year. This was the beginning of Central Methodist Church. The congregation built a new church in 1912 and another in 1951.

The work of the M. E. Church among Spanish-speaking people in Albuquerque was formally organized by Thomas Harwood in 1880. In time two more Spanish-speaking congregations were organized. Then in 1924 the three congregations were united to form El Buen Samaritano Methodist Church. This church has more than 600 members today, and it holds bilingual services. Aldersgate, another Spanish-speaking church, was organized in 1959.

First M. E. Church sponsored the organization of an A. M. E. Church in Albuquerque in 1882. Now known as Grant Chapel, it has over 400 members. This church emphasizes child care, and it promotes projects for young people and adults in the community. Phillips Chapel C. M. E. Church, which has about 80 members, was established in 1935. The Free Methodist Church organized a congregation of 21 persons in the city in 1957.

At unification in 1939, The Methodist Church had two English-speaking and one Spanish-speaking churches in Albuquerque with a total of nearly 17,000 members, and property valued at more than $5,000,000. Central Church with 4,552 members is the largest. Two others have more than 2,000 members, and three more have memberships ranging from 1,350 to 1,750.

In 1968 Albuquerque was designated as the city of residence for the bishop of the newly created Northwest Texas-New Mexico Area of the South Central Jurisdiction.

Bataan Memorial Hospital. The beginnings of this institution date from 1912 when Thomas Harwood deeded ten acres to a group of women of the M. E. Church for a sanitarium for tubercular patients. In 1952 the Deaconess Sanitarium was discontinued and the proceeds of $1,500,000 were used to build Bataan Memorial Hospital, so named because the 200th Coast Artillery of New Mexico fought at Bataan in the Philippines at the beginning of World War II. In 1965 the Woman's Division of the General Board of Missions transferred title to the hospital to the New Mexico Conference, which in turn sold it for $2,000,000 in 1969 to the Lovelace Foundation for Medical Education and Research.

Central Avenue Church. The congregation which became Central Avenue M. E. Church, South was organized Jan. 15, 1882, though the denomination began conducting services in the town in June, 1879. In 1939 the church reported 1,100 members. The present church edifice was erected in 1951. The design of the sanctuary is unique in that its architecture conforms to that of a church which Gregory, sixth century bishop of Tours, says he saw on one of his pilgrimages, as recorded in his History of Tours. The plant, which occupies a city block adjacent to the University of New Mexico, is valued at $813,000. In 1969 the church reported 4,552 members and a total of $226,000 raised for all purposes.

First Church. This church was organized with five charter members April 18, 1880, under the leadership of Thomas Harwood, superintendent of the New Mexico Mission, M. E. Church. It was the first Protestant congregation in Albuquerque, and its first building was erected in 1881. N. H. Gale, who was appointed to Albuquerque Nov. 1, 1879, was the first pastor. From the beginning First Church has stood at Fourth Street and Lead Avenue in downtown Albuquerque. A new education building was erected in 1949 and a new sanctuary in 1955, both structures combining in their architecture Indian, Spanish-American, and traditional Protestant forms. In 1939 the church had 1,447 members. Through the years First Church contributed members and financial support to eleven new congregations established in Albuquerque. In the mid-1960's the church reported more than 3,100 members, but by 1969 the number had dropped to 2,023. In that year the plant was valued at $1,144,888 and the total amount raised was $127,586.

HARWOOD SCHOOL, ALBUQUERQUE, NEW MEXICO

Harwood School is an institution related to the Boards of Missions and Education of The United Methodist Church. It was established in 1887 under the leadership of Thomas Harwood and his wife who enlisted the cooperation of the Woman's Home Missionary Society of the M. E. Church. Started as a school for Spanish-speaking girls, the institution now ministers also to girls of Italian, Syrian, Russian, Negro, and other national and ethnic origins. Some students come from broken homes, others are referred by the department of welfare. The teachers are approved by the state board of education. The students receive individual attention which promotes understanding and Christian commitment. The school has no endowment. In 1970 it reported eleven teachers, 71 students, a budget of $158,600, and a plant valued at $500,000.

The first units of the church edifice were erected in 1952 and 1954, and the sanctuary which seats 800 was completed in 1962. ALDER, ROBERT (1795-1870), British Methodist, and also a leading influence in the development of Canadian Methodism, entered the Wesleyan ministry in 1816. He was sent to Nova Scotia and Montreal, returning to England in 1828. He served as a secretary of the WESLEYAN METHODIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY from 1833 to 1851. As British representative, he helped to negotiate the union of the Methodist Conference of Upper Canada with the British Conference in 1833, and was also largely responsible for the British demands which led to the collapse of the union in 1840. However, he took a prominent part in promoting the reunion of the two conferences in 1847, and was president of the first reunited Canadian Conference. He resigned from the Wesleyan ministry in 1853 and received Anglican ordination, subsequently becoming Archdeacon of Gibraltar.

ALDERSGATE COLLEGE, Moose Jaw, CANADA, is a college of the FREE METHODIST CHURCH. It was organized in 1940 under the name of Moose Jaw Bible School. The first principal was Miss Florence Pickert (1941-47), and her successor was M. C. Miller (1947-54). Subsequent terms have been of shorter duration. The school was founded to provide training for ministerial and lay workers in the church.

The name was changed to Aldersgate College sometime after 1958, and with added buildings and increased faculty, it now provides basic business training and offers courses on the junior college level. University of Saskatchewan affiliation, when granted, will provide transfer to Canadian colleges and universities with full credit.

ALDERSGATE STREET was a street in London upon which stood the meeting place in which JOHN WESLEY had his heart warming experience. In his Journal for Wed., May 24, 1738, he writes: "In the evening I went very unwillingly to a society in Aldersgate Street, where one was reading Luther's preface to the Epistle to the Romans.

About a quarter before nine, while he was describing the change which God works in the heart through faith in Christ, I felt my heart strangely warmed. I felt I did trust in Christ, Christ alone for salvation: and an assurance was given me, that he had taken away my sins, even mine, and saved me from the law of sin and death."

Aldersgate Street has been shortened to "Aldersgate" in Methodist nomenclature, and has come to represent in a sense an experience as well as a place. The name has become somewhat synonymous with the visitation of the Holy Spirit when men pray as they often do for "an Aldersgate experience." Aldersgate Street today is a busy thoroughfare in the heart of London, with stores and storage rooms where residences, and possibly meeting rooms, originally stood. But over the entire Methodist world many churches and chapels have been given the name Aldersgate.

ALDERSGATE SUNDAY. The WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL, assembled in Oxford in 1951, commended the observance of the Sunday immediately preceding Wesley Day, May 24, as a World Methodist Sunday, without excluding the observance of Wesley Day itself. The value of so using Aldersgate Sunday in remembrance of the faith of our fathers, and rededication to our world mission, was emphasized by resolution of the World Methodist Council at Oslo in 1961.

ALDERSON, EUGENE WEBSTER (1854-1939), American preacher, was born Oct. 15, 1854 in Hart Co., Ky., son of A. L. Alderson of the LOUISVILLE CONFERENCE. He was licensed to preach at the age of nineteen, went to TEXAS in 1875, and engaged in teaching for a few years, being the founder of the North Trinity College at Gainesville. In 1879 he joined the NORTH TEXAS CONFERENCE and served successively in the leading appointments of the conference. He became unusually competent in defending Methodist theology and polity in the years when debate was vigorous between denominations. His logic was relentless, his knowledge wide and deep, but withal he was courteous to his "opponents." He was a delegate to four General Conferences, where he always had great influence. At the 1910 General Conference, M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH, in Asheville, N. C., he was chairman of the Committee on Revisions (of the Ritual) which proposed, and the conference adopted after much debate, a series of revisions chiefly in the burial and baptismal offices.

Alderson was a man of genuine scholarly attainments and yet popular with youth and laymen. A truly great preacher, he undoubtedly shaped much of the doctrinal stance of North Texas Methodists in his lifetime.

ALDERSON, WILLIAM HULBURD (1896-1968), pastor and conference leader, was born at Princess Anne, Md., April 19, 1896, the son of George T. and Alphonsa (McConnor) Alderson. He held the A.B. degree from the University of Delaware (1915), the B.D. from Drew (1921), and the honorary D.D. and LL.D. from SYRACUSE and Bridgeport Universities, respectively. On June 15, 1921, he married Laura M. Hall, and they had three children, William H., Edith (Mrs. Hugh Stevens), and Robert B.

Alderson served one year in the air corps during the first World War. He was admitted to the WILMINGTON CONFERENCE in 1918, and was ordained DEACON in 1919 and ELDER in 1921. In the latter year, he served as field agent for DREW THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY. In 1922 he transferred to the NEW YORK EAST CONFERENCE where his appointments were: Islip, 1922-25; New Britain, 1925-32; Brooklyn North District, 1932-39 (seven years); and First Church, BRIDGEPORT, 1939-64. He served as chairman of several annual conference boards: missions, 1944-49; pensions, 1948-63; education, 1952-56; and urgent needs crusade, 1964. Regarding Alderson as an able district superintendent, Bishop FRANCIS J. MCCONNELL nominated him to write the chapter entitled, "In the Cabinet" for the book, The District Superintendent, His Office and Work in The Methodist Church, which was published in 1954.

It was said that as a well-known and widely loved minister, Alderson spoke in Bridgeport not only to his own parish but also to the whole city. During his long pastorate there he served on the boards of the United Fund, Rehabilitation Center, Associated Charities, Red Cross, Child Guidance Clinic, YMCA, Mayor's Commission on Human Rights, the Council of Churches, and other community organizations. He was a trustee of Drew University and a member of the Board of Associates of the University of Bridgeport. He had two terms as state grand chaplain of the Masonic order, and while in New Britain was president of the Rotary Club.

Alderson was a delegate to six General Conferences, 1932-36 and 1952-64. He was chairman of that body's committee on entertainment, 1960-64. A delegate to seven Jurisdictional Conferences, 1940-64, he was chairman of the Jurisdictional committee on expense and arrangements for 14 years, and at different times was a member of the board of appeals, and the commission on evangelism.

Retiring in 1964, Alderson served interim pastorates in the next few years at Mamaroneck and Schenectady, New York. He died of a heart attack Jan. 22, 1968, while in DALLAS, Texas, attending a meeting of the General Conference committee on entertainment.

ALDRED, JOHN (1818-1894), New Zealand Methodist minister, was born in Suffolk, England. He was brought up in the Church of England, but later joined the Methodist Church and became a minister in 1839. He arrived in NEW ZEALAND on the mission brig "Triton" in 1840.

Aldred joined GEORGE BUTTLE and SAMUEL IRONSIDE at Ahuahu (near Kawhia) for a few months to learn the language, and then proceeded to Te Aro (Wellington), where he was the first resident Methodist minister. From that base Aldred traveled far and wide and, among other things, became the first clergyman of any church to visit the Chatham Islands. During his ministry, his time was about equally divided between the Maori and the European work.

He was later appointed to Nelson (1843), Hutt (1849), and Christchurch (1854). In this latter place, he again had the distinction of being the first resident Methodist minister. Three more short ministries followed—Hutt (1859), Wellington (1862), and Dunedin (1864). In 1867 an accident near Port Chalmers compelled retirement from active work. He died in Christchurch on Jan. 14, 1894.

ALEGRETE, RIO GRANDE DO SUL, Brazil. Instituto Rural Metodista de Alegrete is located in Alegrete, state of Rio Grande do Sul, deep in the cattle country of South Brazil. This is the first and at present only industrial school operated by Methodists in Brazil. Approximately one hundred children from eight to ten years of age are taken off the streets and taught trades that will give them a chance in life.

The products of the students' work make this institution almost self-supporting. The president of the Board of the Instituto is a layman, Antonio Salomao.

DIONISIO DI ALEJANDRO

ALEJANDRO, DIONISIO DEISTA (1893-), first native Filipino to be a bishop of The Methodist Church, was born at Quiapo, Manila, Feb. 19, 1893. His ancestry was Filipino with a slight admixture of Chinese. He was baptized at the age of thirteen in San Isidro, Luzon, by Bishop GEORGE A. MILLER, and was educated in that city. He came to the U.S.A. subsequently for further training and was graduated from ASBURY COLLEGE, Wilmore, Ky. He took further ministerial training at the UNION THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY in MANILA and then served as pastor in the PHILIPPINE ISLANDS Conference, coming into that conference in full connection in 1918.

He was ordained by Bishops EVELAND, STUNTZ, and J. W. ROBINSON, and served as pastor of KNOX Memorial, Central Student Methodist, and Ellinwood churches in Manila. He was the first Filipino delegate to the Central Conference of Southern Asia and attended the 1948 and 1960 General Conferences of The Methodist Church.

Bishop Alejandro was first elected to the episcopacy in 1944 by the Philippine Islands Central Conference, but was not consecrated until after World War II in 1946, since no bishops of The Methodist Church could be present to consecrate him. He helped to reopen the Union Theological Seminary after the war and taught there and at HARRIS MEMORIAL SCHOOL (for deaconesses) in 1946. He also is credited with starting the Ilocano and Tagalog editions of The Upper Room after the war.

Despite arrest and questioning by the Japanese during their occupation, Bishop Alejandro managed to carry on his work as leader, organizer, and counselor of Philippines Methodism during the war. As a Philippines Central Conference representative in the episcopacy, Bishop Alejandro served for four years, 1944 to 1948, not being reelected for the ensuing three quadrennia, but he was elected again in 1960. He retired at the Central Conference in 1964, and continues to make his home in Manila.

From 1873 to 1875 he was professor of Greek and Latin at Warren College in Kentucky. He was pastor at churches in Lake Mohonk, N. Y. and New Brighton, Staten Island from 1875 to 1877. ALEXANDER, ROBERT (1811-1882), pioneer American preacher whose family came to America from Scotland in the 17th century. His father left the Presbyterian Church and became a Methodist. Robert Alexander was born in Smith Co., Tenn. in 1811. He was admitted into the TENNESSEE CONFERENCE in 1830, transferred to ALABAMA and then to MISSISSIPPI, and was appointed missiary to TEXAS in late 1836, and there he spent the rest of his life.

Texas independence in 1836 led to the establishment of a Methodist mission there. Some of Stephen F. Austin's group of settlers wrote to the bishop who was to hold the MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE in Natchez, asking for missionaries. The bishop read the letter to the conference and asked if anyone would volunteer. Robert Alexander did and received the appointment, and along with him went MARTIN RUTER and LITTLETON FOWLER.

The new missionary entered Texas in Sabine County, but shortly moved on to newly founded Austin. The constituency to be served came largely from the 300 families Stephen F. Austin had brought across the Sabine River from the United States in 1821. Alexander labored in Texas forty-four years—thirteen as pastor, twenty-three as presiding elder, four as Bible agent, and four years as a superannuate.

A vigorous promoter of education, he helped organize several colleges, one of them Ruterville College which later became SOUTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY at Georgetown, Texas. Likewise he gave effective effort in the production of church papers, one of which became the Texas Christian Advocate, now The Texas Methodist.

On three different occasions the bishop appointed to serve Texas was unable to attend the conference, and the preachers on these occasions elected Robert Alexander to preside and make the appointments.

When the TEXAS CONFERENCE met in 1840 there were twenty-five preachers and 1878 members. At Robert Alexander's death in 1882, Methodist preachers in Texas numbered around 500 and there were six conferences, with 20,000 members.

ALEXANDER, WILLIAM MARVIN (1877-1940), minister, educator, and board secretary, was born at Hartsville, Tenn., Oct. 4, 1877. His parents soon moved to Augusta, Kan., where he grew to manhood. He won the B.A. degree at CENTRAL COLLEGE (Missouri) in 1906, and later the M.A. at SOUTHERN METHODIST UNIVERSITY. Both institutions conferred the D.D. degree on him in 1925. He married Carolyn Wells, Dec. 26, 1906, and they had one daughter.

Admitted to the MISSOURI CONFERENCE (MECS) in 1903, Alexander was a pastor for 13 years. He served briefly at St. Joseph, Brookfield, and Fayette, and had four-year terms at Palmyra and Hannibal. He was presiding elder of the Fayette District one year, and held the Hannibal District two years, leaving the one in 1921 to become president of Howard Payne College, and going from the other in 1924 to become professor of sociology and the rural church in Central College. He served in the latter position until 1930.

Alexander was a delegate to six General Conferences, 1922-40, and the 1939 Uniting Conference. In 1930 he was elected secretary of the department of schools and colleges, General Board of Education (MECS), and served with distinction until unification. In 1940, he became associate executive secretary, Division of Higher Education, GENERAL BOARD OF EDUCATION, THE METHODIST ALEXANDRIA, LOUISIANA, U.S.A., First Church. As early as 1811 the Rapides Circuit is listed as an appointment in the WESTERN CONFERENCE, with Thomas Nelson named pastor in charge.

In 1814 John Shrock was appointed to the Rapides Circuit and did much of his fiery preaching from the Parish Court House steps. Shrock was a zealous preacher flaying the sins of the day in strong language. He is remembered for the fact that he aroused indignation among the early settlers in referring to Alexandria as a "hard place."

In 1834 the name of Rapides Circuit was changed to Alexandria Circuit. When the LOUISIANA CONFERENCE was organized by Bishop SOULE in 1847, the Alexandria Circuit became a station. The first building was erected prior to the Civil War and was burned by the Federal troops on their retreat after the Battle of Mansfield. Three other buildings have housed the congregation through the years.

During the first World War, while a revival was in progress in the church, the flooring broke injuring a large number of people. One lady became so excited she climbed through a window, thinking the church had been bombed by the Germans.

Present plans call for complete new facilities costing over a million dollars. The church now has a membership of 1,775 and church school enrollment of 1,062. Recent pastors who have served the church are Byron C. Taylor, Virgil D. Morris, J. Henry Bowdon, Guy M. Hicks, and Ben R. Oliphint.

ALEXANDRIA, VIRGINIA, U.S.A., was founded in 1748 as Virginia's chief Potomac river port. It achieved prominence during the Revolution as the home town of George Washington and of George Mason, author of the Bill of Rights. In 1800 it became part of the District of Columbia, but was retroceded to VIRGINIA in 1847.

Alexandria has been a Methodist center since the 1770's. Bishop ASBURY visited the city 25 times, four of them with Bishop COKE. On May 26, 1785, the two bishops visited General Washington at his home here, soliciting his support of a petition to the Virginia legislature for the emancipation of Negro slaves. Though refusing to sign the petition, Washington promised to lend his support to the cause if it should come before the legislature. Bishop Coke was in Alexandria on April 30, 1791, when he received the letter which notified him of the death of JOHN WESLEY.

The first Methodist church in Alexandria, since 1883 called TRINITY, was formed in 1774 by twelve persons under the leadership of JOHN LITTLEJOHN, an 18-year old layman, and 17-year old WILLIAM DUKE, one of the preachers of the Frederick (Maryland) Circuit. It was the third religious organization in the city, antedated only by Christ Episcopal Church, and the Presbyterian Meetinghouse. A church was erected in 1792, until which time services were held in the Fairfax County Court House.

A second building, dedicated in 1804 by Asbury, was removed and re-erected on its present site in 1942.

Former pastors of Trinity include PHILLIP CATCH, WILLIAM WATTERS, ROBERT STRAWBRIDGE, FREEBORN GARRETTSON, EZEKIEL COOPER, NICHOLAS SNETHEN, NORVAL WILSON, STEPHEN GEORGE ROSZEL, STEPHEN ASBURY ROSZEL, JOHN LANAHAN, and Bishop ROBERT R. ROBERTS. Lyttleton Morgan and GEORGE G. COOKMAN were chaplains of the U.S. House of Representatives and Senate, respectively, while pastors here. ALFRED GRIFFITH was the minister of Trinity when he introduced into the General Conference of 1844 the motion asking for the resignation of Bishop JAMES O. ANDREW—a motion which precipitated the split of the northern and southern sections of the M. E. Church. Two members of Trinity have become Methodist Bishops: BEVERLY WAUGH and ALPHEUS W. WILSON.

Alexandria was a center of the Reform Movement of the 1820's which led to the organization of the METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH. The Alexandria M. P. Church was one which in 1939 remained out of Methodist reunion and formed the Bible Protestant denomination, which now has two congregations in the city.

Roberts Memorial Church was organized in 1834 by Negro members of Trinity. First named for Charles A. Davis, who was pastor of both churches, its name was later changed when Davis became a minister of the M. E. Church, South. The name now honors Bishop Roberts. Roberts Memorial was one of the founding churches of the Washington Annual Conference of Negro Methodists.

Alexandria was a part of the "Old" BALTIMORE CONFERENCE, and was headquarters of a presiding elder's district, usually named Potomac, from 1801 to the Civil War.

Following the PLAN OF SEPARATION of 1844 the Baltimore Conference did not immediately leave the M. E. Church. This left Alexandria and all of Northern Virginia in the northern branch of the church. The M. E. Church, South, just organizing, was quick to find sympathizers in the area. In 1849 LEROY M. LEE of the VIRGINIA CONFERENCE (MES) lectured in Alexandria on behalf of Southern Methodist views. A number who heard him were tried and expelled from the M. E. Church (later "Trinity"). Eventually about 200 were expelled for their southern views and formed the WASHINGTON STREET, M. E. Church, South. LEONIDAS ROSSER, pastor, toured the South, appealing for funds with which the church was built in 1850. Following the Civil War, in 1866, this and other churches in Northern Virginia, in the DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, and in MARYLAND joined with "old" Baltimore Conference churches of southern sympathies to form the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church, South. From that time on, Alexandria was usually the residence of a PRESIDING ELDER of that conference.

All Northern Virginia and many communities in Maryland were intensely Southern in their sympathies. The Old Baltimore Conference was the name insisted upon by its preachers and people as it held the records dating from the CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE, and of the old undivided conference. This was due to the fact that the secretary of the undivided Conference, JOHN S. MARTIN, adhered to the South and managed to take the conference records with him—smuggling them out of Baltimore under hay in a ship bound for NORFOLK while a provost guard of Northern soldiers was searching for them—so the story goes. The War coming on intensified the division of the Methodists, and "Roman was to Roman more hateful than a foe," for years and years afterward.

Alexandria had been founded chiefly by Scottish merchants, and was a place of strong federal sentiment until the eve of the Civil War. Southern sentiment flared into prominence when Alexandrian, General Robert E. Lee, accepted command of Confederate troops, and Alexandria became the first Southern town to be occupied by the (Northern) Army of the Potomac. From this time on Southern Methodism prospered in all Virginia. Trinity Church began a long decline, to be saved long after by Methodist union and relocation. As the population of Alexandria grew by immigration from all parts of America, the city's attitudes again shifted away from regional attachment toward a cosmopolitan outlook. Differences between Northern and Southern Methodism in time vanished.

Methodist Union in 1939 coincided with the beginning of the city's greatest population growth. There were in 1966 seventy-two Methodist churches in Alexandria and the two adjoining counties of Arlington and Fairfax. These churches had 55,000 members. There were eleven other churches of the Methodist family, listed with approximate membership: Three E.U.B. (1,500), two A.M.E. ZION (600), two BIBLE PROTESTANT (700), two WESLEYAN METHODIST (400), one FREE METHODIST (300), and one C.M.E. (300).

The Alexandria District of the Virginia Conference of The Methodist Church was formed at the time of Methodist Union in 1939, from parts of five districts of the three uniting denominations. Northern Virginia, perhaps more than any other area, greatly benefited from the merger. Overlapping of work, which had been harmful, was eliminated, and so many new churches were established that by 1962 no district in Methodism was larger both in membership and number of ministers. In that year the district was divided. The resulting Alexandria and Arlington Districts both have offices in the headquarters building of The Methodist Church in Northern Virginia, built in 1962 on land which had been sold only once since it had been owned by George Washington. Here also are the headquarters of the Northern Virginia Methodist Boards of Missions and of Education, and the library of the Methodist Historical Society of Northern Virginia. This is a memorial to JACOB SIMPSON PAYTON, long-time Washington editor of the Christian Advocate, who lived in the Alexandria District.

Adjoining the district headquarters is the seven-story Hermitage in Northern Virginia, a home for aged persons operated by the Virginia Conference.

Alexandria was the birthplace of Bishop PAUL B. KERN, whose father was pastor of Washington Street Church.

RAYMOND FITZHUGH WRENN

Washington Street Church was formed shortly after 1844 when Methodism experienced its great schism over the slavery issue. However, its spiritual legacy goes back to the coming of the Wesleyan itinerant preachers around 1770. Francis Asbury first mentioned "the school in Alexandria" in his Journal in 1772 and first visited the Methodist Society here in November 1783. From the labors of Asbury and others came Alexandria Station Church, later known as Trinity.

Shortly after the Plan of Separation was agreed upon at the General Conference in NEW YORK in 1844, those in the Alexandria Station Church who held with the Southern view withdrew and formed a new congregation.

To the new and struggling congregation on Nov. 1, 1849, came Leonidas Rosser. He found the group without church or parsonage and involved in litigation as they were attempting to hold the old Station Church building.

Embued with the zeal of an Asbury, Rosser set out upon an extensive trip south to collect funds for his new church. A Negro congregation in CHARLESTON, S. C., contributed liberally, and a Huguenot church in the same city gave $350. He returned to Alexandria with $10,000 toward the building of an edifice on South Washington Street.

When Rosser left Washington Street Church in 1851, the new building had been built, parsonage furniture acquired, a library established, and the church rolls numbered some 325 members.

Then came the Civil War and on Jan. 6, 1862, Washington Street Church was appropriated by the Federal Government as a hospital, and this purpose it served for the duration of the war. On Oct. 8, 1865 the church was reopened for worship. In 1905 the U.S. Court of Claims awarded the church $4600 for "the said use and occupation, including damages incident thereto" during the war period.

The present Reconstruction Gothic facade to the main building was added in 1875-76. In 1907 a new educational building known as the George R. Hill Memorial was dedicated with William Jennings Bryan as the speaker. This building was demolished in 1953, and on Mother's Day in 1954 the present structure of Colonial architecture was opened as the new educational building. Ministering today to over 2500 members in a city and surrounding area numbering nearly a half million people, the church's influence cannot be measured.

Washington Street Church has grown with the city of Alexandria, with the nation's capital, and indeed, located as it is, with the nation as a whole. From its ranks have come preachers, bishops, missionaries, congressmen, and men and women prominent in every walk of life. It has historically taken great interest in mission work both at home and abroad and has exerted a far-reaching effect upon the city of Alexandria, the Commonwealth of Virginia, and the nation.

ALFALIT, an inter-denominational literacy organization which serves all of Spanish-speaking America. Its origins are to be found in a memorial fund for Bishop JOHN BRANSCOMB established by the Methodist women in Florida, to be used in Cuba. Two factors combined to make it a continent-wide movement: the expansion and success of the work itself, and the Castro revolution, which forced its leaders out of the country. It combines literacy work with evangelism, community development projects, and the production and distribution of simple reading materials for the new literates. Although its headquarters are in Alajuela, COSTA RICA, some of its strongest work is to be found in Nicaragua, the DOMINICAN REPUBLIC, BOLIVIA and ECUADOR, countries where the Alfalit movement includes thousands of people.

ALGERIA and TUNISIA, countries of North Africa, are contiguous, and Methodist work there is integrated in a single administration. Algeria is much larger, having an area of 919,591 square miles and a population of 13,000,000, while Tunisia has 58,000 square miles and about 4,600,000 people.

Algeria was anciently under the control of the Romans, Vandals, Arabians, and Turks, but it became French in 1830 and remained so until 1962, when it became independent by a plebiscite and became a member of the United Nations.

The early history of Tunisia centered at Carthage and it was said to have been founded by Phoenician refugees around 800 B.C. Its history was similar to that of Algeria, and it became a French protectorate in 1881. Demands for independence began after World War I, but this was not achieved until 1956, when the country became a member of the United Nations. An American-type constitution was adopted the following year and Tunisia became a republic.

American Methodist work was started in Algeria and Tunisia in 1908 under the direction of Bishop JOSEPH C. HARTZELL. Delegates to the 1907 World Sunday School Convention in Rome, visiting Algiers, were convinced of the strategic position and opportunity in this area of Islam. Edwin F. Frease was the first superintendent. In 1909 the WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY of the M. E. CHURCH assumed the support of two Englishwomen who had conducted an independent mission since 1893. Other European women were accepted, and the first American woman missionary arrived in 1922.

Work centered in Algiers, Constantine, Fort National, Oran, Tunis, Bizerte, and several small towns. The rigid form of Mohammedanism, and the Algerian Revolution in 1962 limited evangelistic work, but wider contacts were made in medical and social centers, hostels for young men and women, and the distribution of the Bible and religious literature.

The European population, which is largely Catholic, was about one million before independence, and is now 80,000. The work is organized as the NORTH AFRICA PROVISIONAL CONFERENCE, a part of the Central Conference of Middle and Southern Europe, UMC.

ALICE SPRINGS, Northern Territory, Central Australia. John Flynn Memorial Church, erected in 1956, is a tribute to the memory of the late John Flynn, who gave his life to bring Christian fellowship to all who lived in the scattered and lonely settlements of inland AUSTRALIA.

Vast distances and much forbidding terrain made his task particularly difficult. In spite of the impossible, Flynn, with the unusual gifts of vision, faith, and courage, pioneered a chain of inland hospitals and was instrumental in the establishment of the Royal Flying Doctor Service of Australia, which now covers all inland areas of the continent of Australia.

The Memorial Church, erected by the Australian Inland Mission of the Presbyterian Church of Australia, is of unique architectural design and is conceived as three forms in one: a circle of stones within an oval court, and, uniting them, a rectangular church. "The circle of stones," in aborigine legend, makes it a place set apart. "The oval court" signifies the open spaces, and "the rectangular church," in which the congregation is contained, bridges east to west, and unites the whole.

The John Flynn Memorial Church is given over to the United Church in North Australia, which is not another religious denomination, but a cooperative movement of the Congregational, Methodist, and Presbyterian Churches in Australia. The whole of the Northern Territory of Australia comes under this cooperative activity. It is a daring experiment in church unity.

A multiple ministry serves the church with ministers from each of the cooperating denominations being appointed in turn and having responsibility for pastoral care of the local community; pastoral visitation in the sparsely populated district which covers an area of 300,000 square miles; and specialized social, welfare, and education activity among the 7,000 aborigines of the area.

ALL AFRICA CONFERENCE OF CHURCHES (AACC). In January 1958 a conference of Christian leaders from all over Africa was held at Ibadan, NIGERIA. This was generally considered to be the most widely representative conference of any kind which had been held in Africa at that date. It was decided to constitute a more permanent body under the title "All Africa Conference of Churches," which has held assemblies at Kampala, Uganda in 1963 and at Abidjan, IVORY COAST in 1969. Its 83 member churches include twelve Methodist groups. Methodists who have played important roles in the AACC include its first General Secretary, D. G. S. M'Timkulu of SOUTH AFRICA, his successor S. H. Amisah of GHANA, and its first Associate General Secretary, J. S. Lawson of Togo. Its headquarters in 1970 were in Nairobi, KENYA.

ALL-INDIA MISSIONS TABLET INDUSTRY is a medical supply work which is in a father-son succession, consisting of Hugh H. and Kenneth Linn, who have produced this notable auxiliary of the Church in INDIA. Hugh H. Linn was superintending the Methodist hospital in Vikarabad, in Hyderabad State, when he began making the medical tablets that he had such difficulty in obtaining commercially. Cinchona febrifuge was in early years his main product. Friends asked him to provide pills for use in their hospitals, dispensaries, schools, and for distribution in villages. Gradually he added better machines and increased the number of medicines made. At length he was released from other responsibilities and gave his entire time making and distributing medicines for use in missions. His son, Kenneth Linn, took degrees in pharmacology and joined his father. Medicines have been sold to mission institutions and church workers of all denominations at prices that meant substantial savings and still yielded profits to be used to help in the healing ministry. Over forty million tablets have been made, and quantities of medicines and ointments produced elsewhere have been supplied.

ALLAHABAD AGRICULTURAL INSTITUTE was founded in 1910 by Sam Higginbottom, American Presbyterian missionary, after a term of service in Ewing Christian College at Allahabad, India. He believed that a missionary program in India had to include instruction in agriculture. Accordingly he studied agriculture while on furlough and raised money with which to start the institute. He started with support from the Presbyterian Church in the United States, and in 1944 broadened the support to include other churches. The Methodist Board of Missions and the Methodist Church in Southern Asia responded eagerly. The institute instructs candidates for agricultural degrees from the University of Allahabad, operates a large model farm, does considerable research in agriculture and animal husbandry, and has established a factory for the manufacture of farm implements. The latest enrollment statistics show about 550 students.

ALLAN, CHARLES WILFRID (1870-1958), British minister, was born in 1870 of Methodist parents, and was early inspired to pattern himself after the well-known Wesleyan missionary to CHINA, DAVID HILL. Accepted for the Wesleyan ministry, he was trained at Headingley College, whence he was appointed in 1895 to Hill's district of Central China, laboring with him during the last year of Hill's life and continuing in the same area for a further twenty-three years. In addition to evangelical warmth and great pastoral devotion, he proved himself a very able linguist, because of which he was invited in 1913 to help in preparing the Union Version of the Bible. His greatest work was probably for the Christian Literature Society in Shanghai from 1930 until 1943. He edited several Chinese periodicals, published innumerable books, and even translated Hasting's Bible Dictionary into Chinese, as well as preparing a Chinese commentary on Isaiah. The best known of his several English works were: The Lives of Chu and Lu, Our Entry into Hunan, Makers of China, the scholarly Jesuits in the Court of Peking, and a revised edition of William Scarborough's Chinese Proverbs.

After repatriation from Japanese interment, he became a SUPERNUMERARY minister in HULL, where he died May 12, 1958.

FRANK BAKER

ALLAN, THOMAS (1864-1932), Australian minister, was born in 1864 at Mt. Barker, South Australia. He was ordained as a minister of the Primitive Methodist Church of South AUSTRALIA in 1888, and in 1896 he responded to the call for volunteers to work among miners in the newly discovered goldfields of Western Australia. He was the only Primitive Methodist minister in Western Australia and shortly after his arrival the union of his church and the Wesleyans was consummated. He was then appointed to the rapidly growing city of Kalgoorlie in the heart of the goldfields. He returned later to serve at Boulder, and was appointed chairman of the Goldfields District in 1906. He was elected president of the Conference in 1910. For some years he served as Secretary of Home Missions, and in this office he played an important part in establishing Methodism in the area being opened up along the great southern railway. His most enduring work, however, was done as Secretary-Organizer of the Methodist Homes for Children in PERTH. Its successful establishment was due in no small measure to his extraordinary influence and prestige throughout the state. Before his death, which occurred suddenly in 1932 at Perth, he was invested as a "Member of the British Empire" in recognition of his services to church and state.

ALLAN LIBRARY. The WESLEYAN METHODIST Conference of 1884 accepted with grateful thanks the gift of the very valuable library of Thomas Robinson Allan (1799-1886), a lawyer and Methodist layman. The housing of the library proved difficult, however. When the books were kept at the Central Hall, Westminster, a great number of the volumes could not be put on shelves and had to remain in boxes, so that the library was not used to the best advantage. In 1919 an agreement was entered into with the London Library, one of the most important libraries in the United Kingdom, for the purchase of the Allan Library. The Wesleyan Conference of 1920 approved of the arrangements, and a trust deed governing the administration of the funds was created. Under this trust deed the conference appointed trustees to administer the funds accruing, for the purpose of enabling Wesleyan ministers and others whom the trustees may approve to pursue their studies and research work in the London Library by payment in part (as they may judge fit) of both the entrance fee and annual subscription. In making awards, the trustees are to bear specially in mind the need to help those ministers and others who live in districts where suitable libraries are not available. The president of the Conference for the year is the ex-officio chairman of the trustee meeting and is entitled to vote.

ALLEGHENY COLLEGE, Meadville, Pa., was established in 1815 by a group of citizens of Meadville, then a frontier community of four hundred residents. The college was chartered in 1817, under Presbyterian auspices, and in 1833 became related to the PITTSBURGH CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church. Timothy Alden, its first president, determined upon a strong liberal arts college, seeking further funds and books from among his friends in New England. Under his leadership, an academic library of more than 5,500 volumes was created through the generous gifts of William Bentley, Isaiah Thomas, and James Winthrop. MARTIN RUTER, Allegheny's first president under Methodist connection, was a zealous educational leader and president of the first Methodist Academy in New Market, N. H. On Allegheny's faculty with Ruter was MATTHEW SIMPSON, later a bishop and one of the most influential Methodists of his day.

WILLIAM MCKINLEY, twenty-fifth president of the United States, was a student at Allegheny at the outbreak of the Civil War. Miss Ida M. Tarbell, first Lincoln biographer, was graduated in 1880 and established the excellent Lincoln collection in Reis Library. Bishop JAMES

M. THOBURN, pioneer mission leader in India, and his sister, Isabella, founder of ISABELLA THOBURN COLLEGE, were Allegheny graduates.

A Phi Beta Kappa chapter was installed in 1902. Degrees granted are the B.A., B.S., M.A. in Ed.

The governing board is made up of fifty members, sixteen of whom are nominated by the WESTERN PENNSYLVANIA CONFERENCE of The Methodist Church.

ALLEINE, RICHARD (1611-1681), and JOSEPH (1634-1668), English Puritan divines. Richard was born at Ditcheat, Somerset, educated at Oxford, and ordained in 1641. Joseph was born at Devizes, Wiltshire, educated at Oxford, and ordained in 1655. He married Theodosia, Richard's daughter, in 1655. Both men were ejected from the Church of England in 1662 for nonconformity. Richard died at Frome, Dec. 22, 1681; and Joseph (after periods of imprisonment) at Taunton, Nov. 17, 1668. JOHN WESLEY composed his COVENANT SERVICE from directions published by the two Alleines. Wesley also reprinted part of Joseph Alleine's best-selling treatise on conversion, An Alarm to the Unconverted (1672) in his Christian Library (vol. 24).

ALLEN, ALEXANDER JOSEPH (1884-1956), an American bishop of the A.M.E. Church, was born Sept. 22, 1884 in Columbus, Ga. He was the son of the Rev. George W. and Phoebe (Harvey) Allen. He was educated at CLARK COLLEGE, ATLANTA, GA., and the Yale Divinity School, New Haven, Conn., from which institutions he received the A.B. and B.D. degrees, respectively. He also held the honorary degrees of D.D. and LL.D. from PAUL QUINN COLLEGE and WILBERFORCE UNIVERSITY. In 1915 he married Jewett Washington, to which union four sons were born. He served as pastor in MASSACHUSETTS, RHODE ISLAND, PENNSYLVANIA, and OHIO. He was elected to the episcopacy from the staff of the AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY and assigned to the then newly created Sixteenth Episcopal District of his church which was Latin America. In 1948 he was reassigned to the Third Episcopal District, and in 1956 to the Fourth, both of which were in the U.S.A. Bishop Allen served as the first president of the Educational Board of his church. He was the first son of a general officer to be elected a bishop.

ALLEN, BEVERLY (1760?-1810?), American preacher and known as the first apostate Methodist elder, began preaching in 1778. From his home near what is now Durham, N. C., he worked with JAMES O'KELLY on the New Hope Circuit which included the region in the vicinity of DURHAM, Chapel Hill, and RALEIGH. Next, with PHILIP BRUCE, he took Methodism into the Cape Fear Valley. FRANCIS ASBURY first met Allen in July, 1780, and wrote in his journal, "A promising young man, but a little of a dis-senter."

According to the GENERAL MINUTES, Allen acted as an assistant (in effect a PRESIDING ELDER), 1782-84. In 1783 he organized the Salisbury Circuit on the Yadkin River in central NORTH CAROLINA. In 1784 he was appointed to Wilmington. He was elected an elder at the CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE in 1784, but was not ordained until the meeting of the first annual conference at the home of Major GREEN HILL in North Carolina, April, 1785. At that conference Allen was appointed to GEORGIA, the first preacher to be assigned there. THOMAS COKE said, "Beverly Allen has all Georgia to range in." But Allen did not go to Georgia; he spent the summer of 1785 as a free lance preacher in North Carolina and that fall went into SOUTH CAROLINA. Asbury was definitely displeased, writing in his journal, "I was grieved at Beverly Allen's conduct; hurt to the cause of God may follow."

In 1786 Allen married into one of the first families in the low country of South Carolina, and for five years was popular and prominent as a preacher and presiding elder in Charleston and its environs. Then suddenly in 1792, because of a morals charge against him, he was expelled from the connection.

After his expulsion, Allen moved to AUGUSTA, GEORGIA, and went into business. Becoming involved in debt for which he was about to be prosecuted, he shot and killed the officer sent to arrest him. Fleeing to Logan County, KENTUCKY, then known as "Rogues' Harbor," Allen practiced medicine for some years. As a boy the famous PETER CARTWRIGHT boarded in Allen's home while attending school in Russellville, and several years after becoming a Methodist preacher, Cartwright visited Allen and was with him when he died. Allen, who had embraced Universalism, frankly said he thought the mercy of God would cover every case except his own. Cartwright judged the man leniently, giving him credit for the good he did and saying he lived and died a friend of the Methodist Church.

ALLEN, FRANCES GRACE (1864-1957), American missionary, was born near Palmyra, Mich., July 12, 1864. Her father's family were Methodists from the days of Wesley and her father was a local preacher in the M. E. CHURCH before joining the FREE METHODISTS in MICHIGAN.

The family moved to KANSAS, where Grace taught in the public schools. In 1888, she went to MOZAMBIQUE with the second party of missionaries to be sent out by the Free Methodist Board. In 1891 she was transferred to NATAL, a new field. She founded the girls' school at Fairview and served as principal. In 1926 she took charge of the mission in Pondoland. Traveling by means of a cart or riding horseback, she supervised two main and seven outstations with the schools.

Miss Allen served fifty-two years in AFRICA, and is considered one of the church's greatest missionaries. She died in OKLAHOMA CITY, Okla., April 15, 1957, at age 92.

There are a number of brief references to him in John Wesley's letters, which leave the impression he was a man of great integrity, trusted by Wesley himself. Allen died at Liverpool, Feb. 20, 1810.

He married Sarah Adams on Feb. 19, 1942. He was received on trial in the Atlanta Conference of the M. E. Church in 1938 and came into full connection in 1940. His appointments included Covington, Ga., 1939-41; Georgia Oliver, Atlanta, 1938-39; Eastpoint and Fairburn, Ga., 1942; Asbury in Savannah, Ga., 1942-48; Central Church, Atlanta, 1948-56. He then taught philosophy and religion at Clark College for one year (1956), when he became editor of the Central Christian Advocate in New Orleans. He was a delegate to the General Conferences of 1956, 1960, and 1964. He is a trustee of Bethune-Cookman College.

Bishop Allen was elected bishop on the second ballot at the Central Jurisdictional Conference held in Nashville, Tenn., in Aug., 1967, which conference was called to elect a bishop to replace the late Bishop MARQUIS L. HARRIS. He was assigned to the Gulf Coast Area comprised of the CENTRAL ALABAMA, FLORIDA, MISSISSIPPI, and UPPER MISSISSIPPI Conferences of the Central Jurisdiction, with headquarters at Waveland, Miss. In 1968 he was assigned to the superintendency of the HOLSTON CONFERENCE, United Methodist Church.

RICHARD ALLEN

ALLEN, RICHARD (1760-1831), American preacher and founder of the A. M. E. Church, was born Feb. 14, 1760 in Philadelphia, Pa. His parents were slaves and were sold to a farmer near Dover, Del. when Allen was very young.

In 1777 Allen was converted and he began to preach about 1780. So impressed was his master with young Allen's preaching that he allowed meetings to be held in his house. In due time, Allen's master was himself converted and allowed Allen and his brother to purchase their freedom.

He traveled and preached in DELAWARE, NEW JERSEY, PENNSYLVANIA, and MARYLAND. Allen was present at the CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE, the organizing conference of Methodism in America held in BALTIMORE, MD. in 1784. The next year he traveled as an "assistant" on the Baltimore Circuit, and held meetings in Baltimore. One of those who noticed Allen's progress as a preacher was Bishop FRANCIS ASBURY, who frequently gave Allen preaching assignments.

In February, 1786 he came to Philadelphia and preached at St. GEORGE'S METHODIST CHURCH and at various places where there was a large Negro population. In 1787, after his influence had drawn more and more Negroes to St. George's Church, there was a dispute as to whether the Negroes should have a separate church. Finally, Richard Allen and his followers formed the "Free African Society."

In July, 1787, was dedicated the first church to be used by Allen. This meeting house was called Bethel, a name suggested by the dedication prayer delivered by JOHN DICKINS, a white clergyman, who asked that this meeting house "might be a Bethel to the gathering of thousands of souls." Dickins was the delegate at the famous Christmas Conference who made the motion to form the METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH. The new church had regular ministers sent by the Methodist Conference.

Allen's ordination as a DEACON was at the hands of Bishop Asbury in 1794. This made Allen the first Negro to receive ordination from the M. E. Church. In 1816, the year he was ordained an ELDER, Allen saw that other Negro churches had been formed in NEW YORK, NEW JERSEY, DELAWARE, and MARYLAND, and he got sixteen of them together and formed the AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH at a convention held in Philadelphia, Pa.

The new church elected Allen as its first bishop, and he guided the steady growth of the church until his death March 26, 1831.

ALLEN, WILLIAM (1834-1908), American pioneer preacher and philanthropist, was born in Kentucky in 1834, came to Texas in 1856, and settled near Gainesville. He was licensed to preach in 1860, joined in 1861 what was then the EAST TEXAS CONFERENCE (MES) and was stationed at Decatur. Bishop ENOCH M. MARVIN ordained him as DEACON, and two years later he was set apart as ELDER by Bishop H. H. KAVANAUGH. The East Texas Conference Journal of 1862 indicates that no minutes were kept of its sessions from 1862 to 1865 due to the Civil War.

When the War Between the States broke out, he became chaplain, continuing that service to the end of the struggle. He was received into full connection in 1865, and then asked to be located. Thereupon he established a school in a community called Bethel, which seems to have been located about twenty-five miles north of DALLAS. There he taught for fourteen years.

Though serving as "preacher in charge" for only two years, his heart was in the cause of the church. He evidently prospered financially. For some years he was a trustee of SOUTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY, and his biographers give figures to show that he was one of its heaviest financial contributors. Likewise he gave bountifully to the building of homes for superannuated ministers, the Methodist Orphanage at Waco, the Ann Browder Mission Home in Dallas, and to the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society of North Texas. His monetary support of the Methodist work for students attending the state school at Denton was so generous that they named the chapel in his honor.

He was a member of the Texas State Senate for four years. Five books came from his pen. He died at Frisco, Texas in 1908.

ALLEN, YOUNG J. (1836-1907), American Methodist missionary to China and often called a "missionary statesman," was born on Jan. 3, 1836, in Burke Co., Ga. Orphaned, he became the ward of wealthy relatives. He was reared a Primitive Baptist, but became a Methodist at Salem Methodist Camp Ground in Newton Co., Ga. when he was seventeen years old. He attended EMORY AND HENRY COLLEGE in VIRGINIA, and later Emory College at OXFORD, GA., where he was regarded as the outstanding student. He was greatly admired by such other students as ATTICUS HAYGOOD.

In 1858 Allen graduated from Emory, sold his plantation and slaves, married Mary Houston, was admitted on trial to the GEORGIA CONFERENCE, and offered himself to the Board of Missions of the M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH. The Allens were appointed to CHINA and reached Shanghai in July, 1860. Young J. Allen learned the language, and in his first service he so clearly enunciated John 14:31, "Arise and let us go hence," that the entire body of native hearers rose and left the room!

The Civil War came in America, and for four years the missionaries had no salary and no word from home. In order to support his family, Allen took a position as teacher and translator for the Chinese government. He became convinced that missionaries ought to break down the Chinese attitudes that were barriers to their becoming Christians. So he organized and supervised small schools. Later he was the founder and for ten years the president of the Anglo-Chinese College in Shanghai (later merged with Soochow University). He helped establish the Methodist Press. With LAURA HAYGOOD he helped start the McTyeire School for upper-class girls.

The literary work of Young Allen was colossal and would comprise a library of nearly 250 volumes, most of them translations. He authored three books, and founded and edited The Review of the Times, the first newspaper of world events printed in Chinese for the average reader.

His counsel was often sought by Chinese liberals. K'ang Yu-wei, a chief advisor to the emperor, was not a Christian, but he acknowledged that his interest in reform was due chiefly to the writings of Young J. Allen and Timothy Richard. The Chinese called Allen Lin Lo-chih, and in the last decade of the nineteenth century his name was probably more widely known than that of any other foreigner in China.

He returned to the United States five times to attend mission conferences, and to speak to churches, camp meetings, commencements, and annual and General Conferences. He was three times a member of the General Conference, and on his last visit to the States refused to be nominated for the episcopacy.

Allen crowned his work of forty-seven years by attending the Centennial Conference of Missions in China. He became ill a week later, and died on May 30, 1907, in Shanghai.

ALLEN HIGH SCHOOL. (See NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE, C.J.)

ALLEN UNIVERSITY, the first effort in higher education among Negroes in SOUTH CAROLINA, began as Payne Institute in Cokesbury in 1870, under the auspices of the A.M.E. CHURCH. In 1880 the South Carolina Annual Conference relocated the school in Columbia, where it was chartered and renamed ALLEN UNIVERSITY. From the very beginning of the school's history a theological department, the William F. Dickerson Theological Seminary, was an integral part of the institution. About 1882 a department of law was added but later discontinued. Allen has held accreditation for a number of years. B. J. Clover is president of the school as this is written, and L. E. Crumlin is dean of the seminary.

ALLENTOWN, PENNSYLVANIA, U.S.A., was founded in 1762, but because much of the early population was of German descent, Methodism was slow to gain a foothold there. Bishop ASBURY passed through on July 22, 1807, noted that the town was "beautifully situated," and went on. In 1843 a Methodist church with six members was organized with Newton Hester as pastor. The next year a building was erected at Law and Linden Streets, and the church was called Linden Street. At first there was some persecution because the Germans objected to the worship of God in English, and because they regarded the Methodists as intruders in their territory. Even so the Methodists reported 40 members in 1844. In 1872 a second church called Chew Street (later Calvary) was organized. In 1921 when the Linden Street and Calvary Churches had 482 and 133 members, respectively, they merged to form Asbury Church, the new building of which was dedicated in 1922. In 1939 the church had 1,011 members, and in 1969 the report showed 1,449 members, a plant valued at $1,186,000, and $134,883 raised for all purposes.

ALLEY, JAMES MURDOCK (1867-1955), Irish minister and statesman, was born in DUBLIN, a son of the manse. He was educated at the Methodist College, BELFAST. His extensive itinerant ministry took him to all parts of Ireland, and he was appointed to many important positions. He was secretary of the Irish Conference, 1913-21, and was chiefly responsible for the 1915 Act of Parliament which constituted the Statutory Trustees of the METHODIST CHURCH IN IRELAND, of which later he was for many years secretary and treasurer. From 1920 he was one of the Irish members of the Legal Hundred until that body ceased to exist, and he was elected president of the Irish Church in 1922. Other posts held were those of general secretary, and treasurer of the Home Mission Department.

JAMES M. ALLEY

Alley's obituary in the Irish Minutes of the Conference observes that no summary of the offices held could indicate adequately the extent and variety of his service. His advice and help were in constant demand, his remarkable gift for friendship was such that he was beloved in all parts of the land, and when the time came to give up the last of his official positions he had the distinction of being elected an honorary member of the conference for the rest of his life.

ALLEY, JOHN (1799-1847), Canadian bishop, was born in Haldimand (later Cobourg), Upper Canada, Sept. 21, 1799. His parents moved to the state of New York in 1811.

When Alley entered the ministry in 1830, he joined the NEW YORK CONFERENCE, later also serving in the TROY and BLACK RIVER CONFERENCES.

Alley became very interested in Methodism in CANADA, which was made up at that time of the METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH OF CANADA and the WESLEYAN METHODISTS. There was a great deal of bitterness between the two factions, and Methodists in New York generally sided with the Wesleyan group.

While serving in the Black River Conference Alley paid a visit to his birthplace and became acquainted with ministers from both sides. He then saw first hand that some of the ideas held by Methodists in New York about the Canadian Methodist Episcopal group were entirely wrong.

Upon returning home Alley published a series of letters in the Northern Christian Advocate which did much to clear up areas of misunderstanding and to create a more favorable attitude toward the Methodist Episcopal denomination in Canada by members of the M. E. Church in New York.

In 1845, with the health of Bishop JOHN REYNOLDS failing, a special General Conference was called by the Canadian Methodist Episcopal Church to elect a new General Superintendent. Remembering the persuasive and diplomatic way he had represented the church's viewpoint to Methodists in New York, the conference unanimously elected Alley as bishop. He was ordained at the hands of Bishop Reynolds, who was assisted by David Smith and PHILANDER SMITH.

Bishop Alley was to have a short episcopacy hampered by illness and injury, but he was able through great force of will to give Canadian Methodism a much needed vitality it had lacked during the last few years under an aging leader. His work was hampered by rheumatism brought on by a severe cold contracted while moving from his home in New York to his new post. Then while attending the annual conference of 1846, his leg was badly broken in a runaway horse accident. The injury was complicated by a painful bone disease from which Bishop Alley died June 5, 1847. He is buried near Hamilton, Ontario.

ALLIN, THOMAS (1784-1866), British minister, was born at Broseley, Shropshire, on Feb. 10, 1784. He joined the METHODIST NEW CONNEXION in Hanley, and entered its ministry in 1808. He was twice president of the Conference, 1822 and 1846, and served as missionary secretary and ministerial tutor. He wrote voluminously in defense of the polity of the New Connexion. His office of corresponding secretary made him for fifteen years the virtual executive of the denomination. He died in Longton, Staffordshire, on Nov. 7, 1866.

OLIVER A. BECKERLEGE

ALLISON, CHARLES FREDERICK (1795-1858), prominent Canadian layman and benefactor, was born in Cornwallis, NOVA SCOTIA, Jan. 25, 1795. His grandparents had settled there after migrating in 1769 from Newton Limavady in IRELAND. Charles Allison was educated in a local school, and in 1812 moved to Parrsboro, where he found employment as a clerk. Five years later he went to Sackville, across the New Brunswick border, and entered into partnership as a general merchant with William Crane.

Allison was raised in the Church of England, but according to T. WATSON SMITH,

During a serious illness, he was visited by William Smithson, with whom he had become personally acquainted as a fellow worker in temperance effort. . . . In response to his inquiries the sufferer tearfully admitted his sincere desire for conscious salvation, and gratefully listened to proffered counsel. Having resolved to enter into communion with the Methodist Church, he in 1833 joined Richard Bowser's class.

He became a devout and staunch supporter of the Sackville Methodist Church. Convinced of his responsibility as steward of his wealth, he became, in D. W. Johnson's words, "according to his means, among the most generous benefactors of society in any age."

In January, 1839, Allison wrote a letter to William Temple, chairman of the New Brunswick district of the Wesleyan Methodist Church, in which he proposed to "purchase an eligible site and erect suitable buildings in Sackville . . . for the establishment of a school [in which not only the elementary, but higher branches of education may be taught] to be altogether under the management and Control of the British Conference." He pledged, in addition, £100 per annum for ten years toward the support of the school.

At a joint meeting of the New Brunswick and Nova Scotia Districts held in July, 1839, Allison's generous offer was accepted gratefully, and a committee was appointed to put it into effect. He withdrew from business to give his personal oversight to the venture. The cornerstone was laid by him on July 9, 1840, and the building was ready for occupation early in the summer of 1842. Subsequently, when the need for a ladies' academy was recognized, Allison again contributed generously to its establishment.

He died in 1858, leaving £500 for the academies and half that amount for the university whenever it should be organized, all in addition to his previous gifts.

When making his offer, he had remarked: "The Lord hath put it into my heart to give this sum. . . . I know the impression is from the Lord, for I am naturally fond of money."

ALLISON, DAVID (1836-1924), Canadian scholar and administrator, was born in Newport, NOVA SCOTIA, July 3, 1836. He was educated at Halifax Academy, MOUNT ALLISON Academy, and WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, CONNECTICUT.

Upon graduation in 1859 he became principal of Stanstead Academy, and the following year came to Mount Allison Academy as instructor in classics. When the university opened he became professor of classics. On the retirement of HUMPHREY PICKARD in 1869, Allison was appointed Mount Allison's second president, and during his nine-year term, the college grew and its work developed.

In 1878 Allison left Mount Allison to become chief superintendent of education in the Province of Nova Scotia. In this position he wrote most of the texts on British history used in the schools, as well as an English grammar. Subsequently he resumed office again as president of Mount Allison, and served until his retirement in 1911.

As a Methodist layman, Allison worked for the church in many ways.

A member of the Nova Scotia Historical Society, he was keenly interested in local history and wrote a paper on the Settlement of Early Townships, which is in the Society's collections.

D. W. Johnson speaks of him as "a man of striking personality, great energy, and commanding ability. In his prime he was a magnetic leader and a prince among teachers." Allison died in Halifax, where he had lived since retirement, on Feb. 13, 1924.

ALLISON, JAMES (1802-1875), Wesleyan Methodist missionary in SOUTH AFRICA, was born in Edinburgh, Scotland, on July 4, 1802, and came to South Africa with the Irish party of 1820 settlers. On Jan. 4, 1827, he married Dorothy Thackwray, who died at Pietermaritzburg on June 23, 1864. His second marriage was to a widow, Mrs. Mary McCarthy Dunn (born Rae). He became a catechist at Platberg, near Thaba N'chu, in 1837 and was received into full connexion as a minister in 1843. His outstanding qualities and success led to his designation in 1846 for pioneer work among the Swazi. Allison founded a station at Mahamba but was forced to abandon it in 1847 after a clash between the Swazi paramount chief and lesser chiefs in the area. Accompanied by some Swazi converts, he migrated to Indaleni in NATAL. In 1852 he resigned from the ministry after differences with the mission authorities and founded an independent mission at Edendale, near Pietermaritzburg, to which most of his Indaleni congregation removed. The dispute was settled in 1861 and Edendale was handed over to the WESLEYAN METHODIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY. But in spite of the reconciliation Allison did not return to the ministry. He died on April 1, 1875, and was buried in the ministers' section of the Wesleyan Cemetery in Pietermaritzburg.

ALMA COLLEGE. During the nineteenth century the M. E. CHURCH OF CANADA showed remarkable audacity and foresight in establishing educational institutions. One of these was Alma College, founded by a progressive group of citizens of the railway center St. Thomas, and of Elgin County, inspired by ALBERT CARMAN, a bishop of the M. E. Church. Sheriff Munroe, Judge Hughes, and Archibald McLachlin, with Bishop Carman, secured approval by the 1877 session of Niagara Conference for the founding of an "Educational Institution designed to afford young ladies a liberal course of instruction in all that tends to make their lives useful and happy, and their tastes elevated and refined . . ." It was hoped that a school for the sons as well as the daughters would evolve, a school "without distinction of race or creed, whose teachings and curriculum of studies are free from sectarian tenet and dogma and which admits to its Board of Management a fair representation of local interests . . ." The General Conference of the church gave its approval, and a charter was granted by an Act of the Ontario Legislature in 1877.

The site chosen for the college was six acres adjacent to a ravine that winds through the city of St. Thomas. The area has since been increased to ten acres. The architect drew the plans for a collegiate Gothic building a hundred feet in length, seventy-three feet in width, and five stories high, at a total cost of $50,000. This imposing ivy-covered building is still the main building of the college.

The school, named "Alma" in honor of Mrs. C. Munroe and her daughter, was formally opened on Oct. 13, 1881. B. F. Austin was installed by Bishop Carman as the first principal, with Mrs. Margaret Capsey as lady principal or dean (1881-92). The first student to enroll was Mary Burns, afterward the wife of T. W. Crothers, at one time Minister of Labor, Ottawa. Marilla Adams, who gained distinction as an artist and teacher, graduated in 1884, and died in Nov., 1966, at the age of 103, eighty-two years after she graduated.

Matriculation subjects were offered from the outset. In 1885 a course in "practical cookery" was added, probably the first to be taught in a high school. Among other courses were a kindergarten teachers' course (1885), natural science including geology and astronomy, Latin, Greek, French, and German, and commercial (1887). Special emphasis was given to art, music, and Bible knowledge.

Today the majority of the students are enrolled in the five-year arts and science program prescribed by the Department of Education of Ontario for Grades 9 to 13 inclusive. The school has always endeavored to meet the needs of the students by offering a wide range of options. The graduates of the secretarial and commercial courses continue to be in great demand. The Music and Art Departments have attracted many outstanding teachers.

Many additions and improvements have been made to the original structure. The McLachlin wing was added in 1888, the gymnasium and swimming pool in 1923, the Garden Theater in 1930, the Ella D. Bowes Chapel in 1948. In 1959 the Perry Dobson Music Building was completed; in 1963, the new gymnasium; in 1964, the Dobson Memorial Library and the W. F. Thomas Arts' Theater; and in 1965, the BARBARA HECK dining hall and residence.

Under the direction of principals Benjamin F. Austin (1881-97); Robert I. Wamer (1897-1919); Perry S. Dobson (1919-47; 1951-53), who was also president (1953-62); Bruce Millar (1947-49); Stephen J. Mathers (1949-51); and Mrs. Steele Sifton (1953-), the college has attracted students from Western Ontario and from various countries. Many of those from other nations have been the daughters of missionaries or of business or government personnel in foreign service. During the Second World War the college was a haven for girls of St. Hilda's School in Whitby, Yorkshire, who were evacuated to Canada. Students have come from church-affiliated schools in Angola, Trinidad, and Hong Kong. Hence, on one occasion, a chapel service was led by an African student, in Umbundu, with the responses from the students in English.

The relationship of the college to the church is closely maintained through the Board of Colleges of The United Church of Canada. The college receives no government grants or assistance, but is dependent on fee income for its operation. The church makes a grant toward religious instruction. The college continues to follow the wishes of the founders in providing a sound fourfold education.

Alma College is more than a school; it is a home, a worship center, and with its traditions and its ivy-covered walls, it seems "a castle."

ALMANACS. The Methodist Almanac, The Southern Methodist Almanac, The Methodist Year Book, The Southern Methodist Year Book, The Methodist Protestant Year Book, The Southern Methodist Handbook.

Almanacs, comprising calendars, astrological calculations, national statistical information, agricultural advice, proverbs, and vignettes tantalizing the curiosity, have ever appealed to the American public. It is said that these items, typified by the famous Poor Richard's Almanac, together with medical books, were the most numerous publications of the American press in colonial times.

In 1834, following a proposal to the General Conference of 1832, the Methodist BOOK CONCERN issued the first Methodist Almanac under the editorship of David Young. This 48-page publication, typical of the prototype (except that it carried almost exclusively Methodist information plus a catalog of Book Concern publications as supplementary material), was the forerunner and direct ancestor of the year books published by the three Methodist churches which united in 1939 to form The Methodist Church. The immediate success of the first Methodist Almanac assured the continuation of this publication by the Methodist Book Concern, and its gradual expansion into a booklet of several hundred pages a century later. At that time the Book Concern of the M. E. Church issued its last year book—this was in 1933.

During the middle years of the nineteenth century, as the program of the Book Concern became geographically diversified, special editions of the Almanac were issued each year, particularized for different sections of the country. By this time the books had become valuable as media for secular advertising both for New York firms and those farther west, such as in CINCINNATI. In 1885 all the editions were combined and thenceforth published as the Methodist Year Book, a title that in 1880 had replaced the habitual "Methodist Almanac." The Year Book, without calendar, astrological calculations, and advertising, continued to be published through the hundredth number. Best known of the M. E. yearbooks is the 1884 Methodist Centennial Year Book, a publication of 412 pages that has long stood as a landmark volume for information about the M. E. Church.

In the course of the years, similar publications appeared as items in the publishing program of the M. P. Church and the M. E. Church, South. When the latter church began its publishing house in NASHVILLE in 1854, among its first advertised items was the Southern Methodist Almanac, duplicating at least in form the Methodist Almanac of the Northern Church. The Southern Methodist Almanac appeared until the outbreak of the Civil War, and in 1862 the Southern Methodist Publishing House issued the Confederate States Almanac, often cited as one of the reasons for the harsh treatment suffered by the Nashville-based enterprise when the city fell to Union forces in 1862. When the Southern Methodist publishing program was recommenced following the war, Southern Methodist Almanacs again made their appearance. Until after the turn of the century Southern Methodist Handbooks and Southern Methodist Year Books were published, sometimes by the denominational publishing house and sometimes by individuals. The Southern Methodist Handbook, published by THOMAS N. IVEY, was issued throughout the first quarter of the twentieth century. At least for a portion of this period, the denomination was also officially publishing a Southern Methodist Year Book as a section of the annual minutes of the church. In the latter form the Southern Methodist Year Book was continued through 1940.

In 1882 the M. P. Church commenced publication of the Methodist Protestant Year Book. Although the original Year Book did not continue, another Methodist Protestant Year Book was begun in 1918 and was issued for at least two years.

Although never among the more prominent items of any of the Methodist denominations, the almanacs are significant both as period pieces and as forerunners of statistical and quick-reference publications currently issued.

ALMORA, India, is the headquarters of the government in an area known as Kumaun. Along with the adjoining area of Garhwal, and other territories in the lower and medium ranges of the Himalayas, it was ceded by NEPAL to British INDIA in 1816. There are summer residences and health resorts to which people come to escape from the intense heat of the plains. Kumaun includes, in addition to Almora, Naini Tal, Ranikhet, Dwarahat, Sat Tal, and Pithoragarh, all important centers of Methodist work.

It was to Naini Tal that CLEMENTINA and WILLIAM BUTLER fled from BAREILLY on the eve of what was known as "the mutiny" but is lately and more frequently called "the first war of independence." Naini Tal was outside the area originally planned for Methodist work in India, but plans were revised and the first house of worship of the M. E. Church in India was built there with funds mostly provided by British friends. The cornerstone was laid by Henry Ramsey, commissioner of the Almora Division. In time the Methodist Church developed three large schools—Humphreys High School in a central location for local residents, the Philander Smith College for Boys (originally Oak Openings School), and Wellesley School for Girls, established primarily for boarders who came from widely separated homes on the plains. Many missionary children were enrolled in these boarding schools, where English was the medium of instruction in all classes. The M. E. Church built summer homes for its missionaries, so that they could spend their vacation, necessary for health reasons, where they could be with their children for a few weeks each summer.

When the European and Anglo-Indian population in India was radically reduced with independence, these schools were closed and their properties sold to the state government. The money realized from the sales was re-invested in schools elsewhere in Uttar Pradesh.

Almora was the home of Pandit Govind Ballabh Pant, first chief minister of Uttar Pradesh after Independence and later deputy prime minister in Nehru's national cabinet. Pandit Pant was a student in Ramsey High School at Almora and several times made generous personal contributions to the school. A number of his relatives in Almora became Christians.

Missionary work was begun in Almora in 1850 by the London Mission, which developed high quality boys and girls schools in Almora. The first missionaries were the Rev. and Mrs. J. H. Budden. Two of their daughters became Methodist missionaries.

Ramsey High School for boys, for a few years an intermediate college, was named for Henry Ramsey, an official of fervent Christian spirit and benefactor of Methodists. The girls' school, called Adams Higher Secondary School, was raised to high school status shortly after its transfer to the Methodist Church. It has become an asset of immeasurable value to the church and to the people of the area. In 1926 when the London Mission decided that it was overextended and should withdraw from Almora, all the work was made over to the Methodist Church. This included the first leprosarium in India. MANOHAR MASIH, who had been deputed by the London Missionary Society to prepare for service, was appointed superintendent, and developed a number of clinics in rural areas. He became a member of the North India Annual Conference.

Dwarahath, some twelve miles from Ranikhet, was an early outpost of Episcopal Methodism in India. Many prominent missionaries of the early years served in Dwarahath. Schools for girls and boys were developed, and reached high levels of educational effectiveness. The girls' school, which developed a boarding department and educated many orphan girls, was closed some twenty years ago. The boys' school with strong support from the local community has been lifted to the higher secondary school level.

Ranikhet became a summer resort for British troops. The WESLEYAN METHODIST CHURCH developed a junior high school there, but made it over to the Methodist Church of Southern Asia about 1920. With generous support from local Hindus and Moslems, it has been lifted to the higher secondary school level. This is a mountain resort of great beauty.

In Sat Tal, ten miles from Naini Tal, and approximately five miles by bridle path from the end of the railway, the Methodist Church has a retreat and conference center on adjoining properties. The Ashram at Sat Tal, founded by E. STANLEY JONES, is the progenitor and model for other ashrams around the world.

ALPHONSE, EFRAIM (EPHRAIM) JUAN (1896-), minister, educator, and linguist of the Republic of PANAMA and Caribbean Methodism, was born on the island of Carenero on June 24, 1896. This is said to be the island where Christopher Columbus "careened his ships in the year 1502"—now in the Province of Bocas del Toro, Republic of Panama. Efraim Alphonse was the son of John Benoni Alphonse and Carlota Reed de Alphonse. He received first an elementary education and completed his education at Calabar College in JAMAICA. On Oct. 22, 1919, he married Philibert Hyacinth Oglivie (Romelis) and to them were born eleven children—eight of whom survive. One is a minister of the Methodist Church in BIRMINGHAM, ENGLAND; another an educational missionary in the CONGO in Africa, serving under the Board of Missions of The United Methodist Church, U.S.A.

Efraim Alphonse felt the call to a teaching ministry under the preaching of M. C. Surgeon of the British Methodist Church in Bocas del Toro, Panama. Young Efraim—with what in his islands is called a "six standard education"—went out in 1917, and began a pioneering work with scarcely any preparation. He learned the dialect of the Indians as he listened to them, soon mastered it, and began to teach it as well as to preach and evangelize. In time he reduced the language to writing, composing a grammar which the Smithsonian Institute of Ethnology published. In time he became a translator in that language for the American Bible Society, translating four Gospels, Acts and Romans, writing hymns, and the like. He went for more collegiate training in 1924, when he took a course in theology and then returned to the Indians. He spent a total of thirty-seven years among them.

The LATIN AMERICAN MISSION engaged Alphonse as a traveling evangelist during the years 1950 to 1954 and sent him to cover such countries as HONDURAS, Nicaragua, COSTA RICA, Barbados, TRINIDAD, and subsequently the BAHAMAS, especially the tourist city of Nassau.

He has been twice to England on a missionary deputation and also to PORTUGAL for their centenary service there. He was in England for the bicentenary anniversary of the establishment of British Methodist work overseas, especially that in the West Indies.

For ten years he was superintendent minister of Methodist work in Jamaica, and finally in Panama City as deputy chairman and then as chairman of the whole Central America area of the British Methodist churches. He took part in the organization of the autonomous Methodist Church of the Caribbean and the Americas in May, 1967.

Efraim Alphonse has written several books, among them: Among the Valiente, God at the Helm, and an unpublished novel, Black Man, Bear My Cross. He is the author of a hymnbook in the Valiente language. In a literary contest for natives of Latin America, Mexico to Argentina, he won the first prize in the World Dominion Essay Contest. He is considered a linguist of the first rank.

The Panamanian government conferred on him the highest honor in July, 1963, making him a member of the Orden de Vasco Nunez de Balboa. In August of that same year, the Municipal Council of the city of Panama gave him the freedom of the city and a key, as under Resolution No. 41 of Aug. 22, 1963. This was signed by the President and Vice President of the Republic.

He retired in February, 1967, though he has continued to serve as a member of the faculty of the Methodist Theological Seminary in Alajuela, Costa Rica.

ALTUS, OKLAHOMA, U.S.A., First Methodist Church, was organized in a dug-out at old Frazier, two and one-half miles west of Altus, on Oct. 31, 1887. At that time Altus was a part of the state of TEXAS. The Frazier settlement was moved to Altus in 1890 because of a flood. The turn of the century marked the beginning of a new era. In September, 1901, a new structure (the present building) was erected to the great satisfaction of all its members and of the entire community. The opening service was attended by people from the entire countryside, who came in wagons, hacks, buggies, and on horseback. R. A. Walker was then minister.

The church has since added an educational building and kept the church up-to-date with modern improvements, such as air conditioning, public address system, etc. The present (1968) membership is 2,048.

ALVAN DREW SCHOOL, Pine Ridge, Kentucky, U.S.A., a home mission project of the WOMAN'S HOME MISSIONARY SOCIETY of the M. P. CHURCH, in the early 1920's. It was established by a group of Methodist educators from New England who purchased land, constructed buildings and gathered a highly capable staff of teachers.

One of the early leaders in establishing the school which served the needs of this area of KENTUCKY was Mrs. M. O. Everett. Under the superintendency of Dr. and Mrs. T. R. Woodford it reached a peak enrollment of around 300 pupils. The school also had its own farm, a store, and a church.

Alvan Drew School graduated its first class in 1926. The last class to graduate was in 1947, when the school was discontinued. Some of the buildings formerly used by Alvan Drew School are now part of the Dessie Scott Children's Home.

AMARILLO, TEXAS, U.S.A. Methodism was established in Amarillo in 1888. Following the adjournment of the NORTHWEST TEXAS CONFERENCE at Weatherford on Nov. 19, Jerome Haralson, presiding elder of the newly created Vernon District, and Isaac L. Mills, pastor of the Clarendon Mission, went to Amarillo and there at a church in the courthouse on Nov. 23, they organized a Methodist church. The next year a five-point Amarillo Circuit was formed, and in 1891 Amarillo became a station which reported 145 members in 1892. In 1909 the church had 885 members, and a second congregation was formed, the original body then being called Polk Street Church. Amarillo became the head of a district in 1910. At unification in 1939 there were in the city four churches with a total of 4,600 members. In 1969 there were 11 congregations, 12,000 church members, property valued at $5,285,000, and budgets aggregating $825,000 per year. The A. M. E. CHURCH and the C. M. E. CHURCH each have one congregation in Amarillo.

Polk Street Church was organized in 1888. It was given its present name in 1909 when a second congregation was formed in the city. Through the years as the mother church of Methodism in Amarillo, Polk Street Church has sponsored the organization of ten other congregations. The membership of Polk Street rose above 500 in 1906, and since that time it has been a strong church notwithstanding its sharing of members and resources to form new congregations. In 1920 when there were two Methodist churches in Amarillo, Polk Street reported 1,642 members; in 1939 when there were four churches it had 2,830 members; and in 1969 its rolls showed 4,234 members. In the latter year its property was valued at $2,031,859, and it raised for all purposes $337,836. Two pastors of Polk Street Church, SAMUEL R. HAY and O. EUGENE SLATER, were elected bishops, the one in 1922 and the other in 1960. Members of the congregation are found in positions of responsible leadership throughout the city.

AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY. On the call of the Revolutionary patriot, Elias Boudinot, the American Bible Society was founded on May 10, 1816, with its "sole object" to "encourage a wider circulation of the Holy Scriptures without note or comment." Until 1900 its channel of distribution in the U.S.A. and main sources of support were widespread local auxiliary societies, through which millions of Bibles and Testaments were brought to the increasing population. Thereafter, as denominational agencies multiplied, auxiliaries began to drop out. Support has since been sought from individuals, churches, and legacies. "Agencies" directly administered by the Society have undertaken distribution, especially to underprivileged groups.

Work abroad, begun in 1820, saw the first permanent "agency" in the Levant in 1836, followed by others in Latin America and Asia, and by direct supplies to missions in Africa. Now by collaboration with the BRITISH AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY (and others), American support serves almost every country on the globe, most of which are dependent on the Bible Societies for Scripture supplies.

Several hundred languages in many lands have first received the Scriptures through translations published by the Society. A staff of expert linguists and exegetes now assists translators in Africa, Asia, Latin America, and the Island World. In a number of countries the Society has fostered the formation of national societies as essential arms of the respective national churches, and has continued to assist them financially. It was a leading participant in forming in 1946 the "United Bible Societies," a world fellowship of now some thirty-five national societies. This has eliminated competition and duplication of operations the world over. Important responsibilities of the United Bible Societies have been borne by the staff of the American Bible Society, which provides a large part of its budget.

Throughout its history the Society has adhered to its original missionary policy of supplying the Scriptures to the multitudes at cost or below, and making free grants where justified. It has supplied millions of Scriptures without charge to the armed forces of the U.S.A. (to both sides in the Civil War), and millions more to war-torn countries, especially after the first and second World Wars. It has given special service to the blind for more than 125 years, and has sponsored periods of world-wide Bible reading. The Society's circulation in the U.S.A. in 1966 was 757,058 Bibles, 2,309,269 Testaments, 8,062,226 Gospels and other integral portions, and 17,773,560 Selections. World circulation by the Bible Societies was approximately 1,140,000 Bibles, 1,020,000 Testaments, 12,200,000 Gospels, and 8,300,000 Selections. These were in 452 languages and dialects. Its budget for 1966 was $6,645,000 (not including cost of Scriptures sold), of which $3,885,000 had to be secured from living donors. Its headquarters is the new Bible House at 1865 Broadway, New York City.

The Methodist churches have had an important relation to the Society. A Methodist, William Burd, was among the founding delegates in 1816. The ubiquitous NATHAN BANGS was briefly an unsalaried secretary (1827-28). When the Methodist Missionary Society was approved by the 1820 General Conference the latter removed "and Bible" from the Society's title. Due probably to difficulties in securing Scripture supplies for their increasing number of Sunday schools, the Methodist General Conference of 1828 established a Methodist Bible Society which merged with its Tract Society and Sunday School Union in 1833. As soon as the American Bible Society was able to provide a wide-spread supply of Sunday school Scriptures, the General Conference of 1836 liquidated the Methodist Bible Society. In 1840 the Society elected EDMUND S. JAMES to be Financial Secretary, and he addressed many conferences in behalf of the Society. At the same time a provision was added to the Discipline requiring every church to report its contributions to the American Bible Society and its auxiliaries. In 1846 the M. E. CHURCH recommended in the Discipline that all pastors preach annually on the Bible cause and take a collection. This provision continued in the M. E. Church until the church centralized its benevolent organization, at which time the American Bible Society continued to be a part of denominational benevolences.

Somewhat similar provisions were made in the M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH. The reunion of the churches continued the relationship. The Discipline of 1968 (Par. 1417) reads, "To encourage the wider circulation of the Holy Scriptures throughout the world, and to provide for the translation, printing, and distribution essential thereto, the American Bible Society shall be recognized as one of the general missionary agencies of THE UNITED METHODIST CHURCH, and the COUNCIL ON WORLD SERVICE AND FINANCE shall make appropriate provisions for participating in its support." Ever since the time of E. S. James in 1840, one of the principal executive secretaries of the American Bible Society has been a Methodist: E. S. James (1840-44); Noah Levings (1844-49); Joseph Holdich (1847-78); A. S. Hunt (1878-98); WILLIAM I. HAVEN (1898-1928); ERIC M. NORTH (1928-56); LATON E. HOLMGREN (1955-). Others of the staff at headquarters and in the field have been Methodists, notably John R. Hykes (China, 1893-1921); CARLETON LACY (China, 1921-41); J. L. McLaughlin (Philippines and Chicago District, 1906-40); HUGH C. TUCKER (Brazil, 1887-1934); F. C. PENZOTTI (Latin America, 1883-1906); J. P. Wragg (Atlanta and New York, 1901-29). There have been three Methodist presidents out of the twenty: William Henry Allen (1872-80); Enoch L. Fancher (1885-1900); and Daniel Burke (1944-62). At present (1966) there are eleven Methodists on the Board of Managers. Sixty-two denominations were represented by delegates at the Society's 1966 Advisory Council.

AMERICAN UNIVERSITY, Washington, D.C., was chartered by Congress, Feb. 24, 1893. The initiative for the founding was taken by Bishop JOHN FLETCHER HURST of the M. E. CHURCH, who became its first chancellor and directed the purchasing of a seventy-five acre campus in northwest Washington. His plans, and those of his immediate successors, included only graduate and professional studies. Experience proved, however, that the university needed an undergraduate school to support the graduate program, and in 1925 the College of Liberal Arts, now the College of Arts and Sciences, was established.

While the university was Methodist in origin, there was, during the first half-century of its life, no formulated plan for the church to participate in financial support. In 1952, the General Conference made it a part of the World Service program—general benevolences—of the church. In 1956, as a part of the church's special four-year emphasis on higher education, $1,000,000 was set aside from general benevolences for a School of International Service. The school was opened in 1958 by President Dwight Eisenhower.

The relocation of WESLEY THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY on the campus of the university, and the development of the Lucy Webb Hayes Collegiate School of Nursing, closely associated with Sibley Hospital, greatly augmented The American University's service. The projected concentration of Methodist institutions in the area around the university will create one of the nation's largest Protestant cultural centers.

The university consists of eight major schools: Arts and Sciences, Business Administration, Government and Public Administration, International Service, Graduate, Law, Nursing, and Continuing Education. Wesley Theological Seminary is affiliated academically with the university.

The governing board of forty-eight active trustees, nine honorary, are elected by the board and confirmed by the BOARD OF EDUCATION of The United Methodist Church.

AMES, EDWARD RAYMOND (1806-1879), American bishop, was born on May 20, 1806, at Amesville, Ohio, a town named for his father. He attended Ohio University, supporting himself by teaching. While there he opened a school at Lebanon which in later years became MCKENDREE COLLEGE.

He was licensed to preach by PETER CARTWRIGHT and joined the ILLINOIS CONFERENCE in 1830. When the INDIANA CONFERENCE was formed, Edward Ames became a member and continued serving circuits and stations in Indiana except for two years spent in St. LOUIS.

EDWARD R. AMES

He became a PRESIDING ELDER, and in 1840 was elected missionary secretary, to serve in the West and among the Indians. The council of the Choctaws elected him a chaplain.

Back in Indiana in 1844, he served churches and districts until 1852. He was named to succeed Bishop MATTHEW SIMPSON as president of INDIANA ASBURY UNIVERSITY but declined. He was a delegate to the General Conferences of the M. E. CHURCH in 1844, 1848, and 1852, when he was elected bishop.

During the Civil War, Bishop Ames was an opponent of slavery. He was appointed a chaplain in the Union army. Secretary of War Stanton issued an order permitting him to take over the churches of the M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH, and install northern pastors in the pulpits. This was done in TENNESSEE, LOUISIANA and other states. McKendree Church, NASHVILLE, and Church Street Church, KNOXVILLE, were seized and their pastors displaced. This seems to have been done without the knowledge of President Abraham Lincoln, and when Andrew Johnson became President, he ordered these churches returned to Southern Methodists, but there was a lengthy delay in complying with the order.

After the war Bishop Ames was active in extending the work of Northern Methodism throughout the South. Because of his political activity he was offered important positions in government, but he declined.

He died at BALTIMORE on April 25, 1879, and was buried in Greenmount Cemetery there.

He was a delegate from the CENTRAL PENNSYLVANIA ANNUAL CONFERENCE to the M. E. General Conference in 1884 and to all other General Conferences from 1900 to 1928—more times than any other layman of his conference. He was a member of Old Pine Street Church in Williamsport.

Ames wrote the report of the Committee on TEMPERANCE at the General Conference in 1908, which resulted in the creation of the Methodist Board of Temperance, Prohibition and Public Morals. He was always on the Temperance committee, and was twice on the Committee on Judiciary. He sponsored the original motion for full representation of laymen in the annual conferences at the General Conference of 1916, and was regarded as the father of the movement. It was enacted into the law of the church in 1932.

AMSTUTZ, HOBART B. (1896-), bishop of The Methodist Church who served in the countries of Southeast Asia and PAKISTAN, was born in Henrietta, Ohio, on Sept. 18, 1896. He was educated at NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY and GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE, EVANSTON, Ill. In 1938 BALDWIN-WALLACE COLLEGE conferred upon him the D.D. degree.

He married Celeste T. Bloxsome of Pennville, Ind., in 1923, and in 1926 he and his wife went to MALAYA as missionaries. Most of their service was in SINGAPORE, where Amstutz was pastor of the noted Wesley Church. He was also at one time a teacher and principal of the Anglo-Chinese School, principal and founder of Trinity Theological College, professor in Union Theological Seminary, and superintendent of the Singapore and Kuala Lumpur districts.

He and his wife were in Singapore at the time of the Japanese attack on the Malay Peninsula in 1941. Mrs. Amstutz managed to escape to INDIA, where their daughter and son were in Woodstock School, in Mussoorie, remaining there until the close of the war. However, Amstutz elected to stay in Malay and continue in ministry with the people among whom he had done missionary service for so many years. When Singapore fell, he was interned with other Americans and British. His imprisonment lasted three and one-half years, but during the time his chief suffering was due to malnutrition. After his liberation he toured the churches and schools of the Peninsula, helping to reopen and reorganize them, and planning with the national leaders for the future Christian institutions and missionary service.

Hobart Amstutz was elected a bishop by the Southeast Asia Central Conference in 1956. As a member of the COUNCIL OF BISHOPS, he has been depended upon to give guidance and speak authoritatively upon conditions in Southeast Asia and to serve upon certain important committees, such as COSMOS. He retired at the Central Conference of Southeast Asia in 1964 and subsequently was recalled and given the episcopal supervision of the West Pakistan Area, where he and Mrs. Amstutz were in residence in KARACHI until the General Conference of 1968.

ANAHEIM, CALIFORNIA, U.S.A., was originally settled in 1857 by a group of Germans from SAN FRANCISCO. By the articles of incorporation the colony attempted to prohibit any minister of the gospel from settling among them to preach. However, in time the M. E. CHURCH succeeded in establishing German language work in Anaheim. In 1883 when the Southern California Conference organized a German District, the record shows that the presiding elder, C. A. Bollinger, also served as pastor of the Anaheim and Pasadena charge. The denomination maintained a German language church, known as Broadway, in Anaheim until 1942.

English-speaking circuit riders visited Anaheim in 1875, and the Anaheim-Artesia Circuit was formed in 1878. Ten years later a church costing $1,800 was built, and the presiding elder of the LOS ANGELES District reported, "Anaheim . . . a population of 3,000, which so long defied our endeavors to get a foothold, has finally yielded to the persistent faith and sacrificing toil of the pastor, D. O. Chamberlayne, and we now have a good property in the heart of the city." The membership grew slowly, seven in 1888 and only 35 in 1900, but by 1920 there were 412. During the 1920's there was friction in the church over the Ku Klux Klan. The pastor, James A. Geissinger, opposed the Klan while the pastor of another denomination in the community served as the Klan leader. Eventually the anti-Klan sentiment prevailed in the Methodist congregation, but not without a split which resulted in the organization of what is now known as the East Anaheim Church. In 1969 The United Methodist Church had five churches in Anaheim with 4,255 members, property valued at $1,894,000, and $239,000 raised for all purposes during the year. There are two FREE METHODIST churches in the city.

ANCORAIMES, Bolivia, is a city where the Methodist Church has undertaken for some years a general rural reconstruction program, especially among the Aymara Indians. There is a good church building where a missionary of the Division of World Service of the BOARD OF MISSIONS, U.S.A., serves as pastor. The town is in the Lake Titicaca District of the BOLIVIA PROVISIONAL CONFERENCE.

Aymara Girls' School, in Ancoraimes, is a student home for Aymara Indian girls and young women. In 1966 it had an enrollment of thirty-five. These students attend the Methodist grammar school in Ancoraimes and the School of Christian Vocations, with classes in domestic science, gardening, and child care.

The Aymara Indians have an awakened interest in education, but girls have received the least opportunities. The Girls' School, unique in its area, responds to this need. It was organized in 1954 through the efforts of Berta Garcia, a Bolivian nurse who represented the Methodist Women's Confederation of Latin America. Late in 1956 it came under the Woman's Division of the Methodist Board of Missions, U.S.A. The present buildings, constructed in 1959, provide dormitory rooms, classrooms, a chapel, and a dining hall. The director in 1966 was Julia Williams.

Frank S. Beck Medical Center, a Methodist clinic, serves an area along the shores of Lake Titicaca populated by about 100,000 Aymara Indians. There is no other modern medicine nearby. The facilities include a six-bed clinic for surgery, X-ray facilities, and laboratory, caring for an average of twenty-four patients daily. A weekly traveling clinic reaches several nearby towns.

Through the interest of FRANK S. BECK, founder of the American Clinic in LA PAZ, medical attention was offered from the earliest years of Methodist rural Indian work on the Bolivian high plains. Cleto Zambrana, pastor and educator, served as medical practitioner in the area in the early years. A number of nurses have served medical needs. In 1956 the first resident physician, PABLO MONTI of Argentina, began work, attending an average of four patients a day. He was followed by other doctors from Argentina and BOLIVIA. Graduate nurses from the Methodist School of Nursing in La Paz have served their year of rural service at this center. The latest phase of the work has been in public health by missionary nurses.

The present clinic facilities were inaugurated in Sept., 1965. A five-ton mobile medical unit takes medical aid to the area around Ancoraimes.

School of Christian Vocations is an institution in Ancoraimes for youth of the Aymara Indians, offering pre-professional training on the secondary level in a three-year curriculum adapted to the needs of the primitive rural area. Fields emphasized are Bible study, teacher training, and trade subjects such as agriculture, carpentry, metal work, typing, tailoring, and weaving.

The vocational school was organized in 1957, supplementing the existing system of rural elementary schools operated by The Methodist Church in the lake area. A Bible school was opened by Keith Hamilton in 1955, and the project became a part of the "Land of Decision" emphasis for Bolivia in 1956-60. Milton Robinson was in this work until 1965, and the present director (1966) is Carl Williams.

Enrollment in 1966 was sixty-five boys and fifteen girls. Graduating classes number about ten students each year. Some graduates have taught in the Methodist schools of the area; others have continued studies in government normal schools, in Wesley Seminary in MONTERO, or in secondary schools in La Paz.

This school has responded to the rising interest in education among the Aymara Indians following the social revolution of 1952.

ANDERSON, DAVID LAWRENCE (1850-1911), missionary educator, was born in Summerhill, S. C., Feb. 4, 1850. After two years in Washington College (now Washington and Lee) and a period on the staff of The Atlanta Constitution, he entered the Methodist ministry and was soon a PRESIDING ELDER in the NORTH GEORGIA CONFERENCE. On Dec. 31, 1879, he married Mary Garland Thomson of Huntsville, Ala., and they went to CHINA as missionaries in 1882, where he became presiding elder of the Soochow District.

In 1899 he launched the establishment and development of Soochow University. On furlough in 1900 he collected $50,000 in NEW ORLEANS for the new university, a fund that was later raised to $100,000, and in 1901 on his return to Soochow the university was formally opened.

He was several times a delegate to the General Conference of the M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH, the last time in 1910, when it is reported that he made a deep impression on the Conference with his presentation of the missionary call.

ANDERSON, ELIZABETH PRESTON (1861-1954), American temperance and suffrage reform leader, was born April 27, 1861, in Decatur, Ind. Her father, Elam S. Preston, was a pioneer minister in the NORTH INDIANA CONFERENCE, M. E. CHURCH.

She was educated at Fort Wayne College, DEPAUW UNIVERSITY, and the University of Minnesota.

A dynamic and forceful leader, she was moved by what she saw in Page, N. D. to form a local chapter of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. That same year (1889) she was named assistant organizer and evangelistic superintendent of the NORTH DAKOTA W.C.T.U. From 1893 until she retired in 1933 she held the presidency of the state organization.

The National W.C.T.U. elected her assistant recording secretary in 1904. She became recording secretary in 1906 and held the post for twenty years.

She married James Anderson, a minister of the M. E. Church, in 1901.

When the North Dakota state constitution was adopted, a prohibition clause was included, due in large measure to the efforts of Mrs. Anderson. As president of the North Dakota W.C.T.U., she attended all but two sessions of the state legislature, and is credited with having initiated action on two dozen or more laws dealing with protection of the health, safety, and morals of North Dakota's younger generation. Through the suffrage departments of the state and national W.C.T.U., Mrs. Anderson also gave vigorous support to legislation extending voting rights to women.

In recognition of her public spirited work which reflected great credit to the state, a life-size portrait of Mrs. Anderson was presented to the state of North Dakota and hangs in the state capitol.

Mrs. Anderson died Nov. 30, 1954 in Fargo, N. D.

ANDERSON, JAMES ARTHUR (1857-1946), American minister, church leader and historian, was born at Brownsville, Tenn., on Nov. 13, 1857. He died in Conway, Ark., on Sept. 13, 1946.

He attended VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY and was licensed to preach in 1877. He was admitted into full connection in the ARKANSAS CONFERENCE two years later at the age of twenty-two. He retired fifty-five years later at the age of seventy-seven, after serving for nineteen years as a pastor, nine years as editor of the Arkansas Methodist, and twenty-seven years as PRESIDING ELDER. He became a recognized authority on Methodist Church law early in his ministry. As a young presiding elder of twenty-five, he appealed a ruling of the presiding bishop, which was later sustained by the College of Bishops of the M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH, then having constitutional appellate power.

Anderson was one of the founders of HENDRIX and Galloway COLLEGES, and was largely instrumental in uniting the educational interests of Arkansas Methodists in one institution of higher education (Hendrix College) at Conway, Ark. Both Hendrix College and the University of Arkansas recognized, with honorary degrees, his outstanding service to church and state in Arkansas.

Anderson was a member of five General Conferences of his Church and two Methodist ECUMENICAL CONFERENCES (1891 and 1931). He was a frequent contributor to a wide variety of publications, including a section on the "Churches of Arkansas," in D. Y. Thomas' four volume history Arkansas and Her People, and the author of two full length books: Religious Unrest and Its Cure; and what was undoubtedly the crowning achievement of his eventful career, Centennial History of Arkansas Methodism, published in the year of his retirement from the active ministry.

At the time of his death, his life long friend, O. E. GODDARD, said of Anderson: "At the age of twenty-five he had gained recognition as a conference leader. At seventy-five, he was still the dominant spirit in his Conference—the only preacher I ever knew to maintain leadership for more than half a century."

ANDERSON, KARL EDWIN (1867-1946), was one of "the twelve apostles" sent to Southern Asia by the M. E. BOARD of MISSIONS near the close of the nineteenth century. They had responded to an appeal from Bishop JAMES MILLS THORBURN, whose episcopal area then stretched from the Persian Gulf across INDIA, BURMA, MALAYA, the Dutch East Indies, and the PHILIPPINE ISLANDS. The same territory now has eight Methodist bishops. Bishop Thorburn wanted candidates who would accept half or less of the regular missionary salary and would promise to remain unmarried for three years.

When the bishop's call came, Karl Anderson had completed his seminary studies and had served pastorates in Iowa. He was engaged to marry Emma J. Wardle, but their missionary vocation was so strong that they agreed to the bishop's terms. He arrived in India on Dec. 5, 1897. Six years later he married Miss Wardle.

He was born in Greenview, Ill., on Jan. 28, 1867, of parents who had migrated from SWEDEN. He served English-speaking congregations in Madras and Bangalore.

At various times Anderson was superintendent of the Madras, Bangalore, and Kolar Districts. His most notable missionary service was given in Bangalore Richmond Town Church, connected with the Baldwin High Schools, and in the Bidar district, where he pioneered in developing district jatras, or camp meetings.

During the third term of their service, Anderson was plagued by recurring illness, and decided to settle in Glendale, Calif. Anderson died in Glendale, on Sept. 5, 1946, and Mrs. Anderson, April 23, 1963.

A son, Richmond Karl Anderson, is a medical administrator and research director who has served with the Rockefeller Foundation, spending eight years in India with public-health training and with improving medical education.

A daughter, Dorothea (Mrs. Bernard Kemper) served a short term as an educational missionary in Southern India, and later taught religious education in the San Francisco Theological Seminary and in the public schools in California.

ANDERSON, SIDNEY RAYMOND (1889-), evangelistic missionary and leader in the East China Conference, was born in Rising Star, Tex., on Dec. 7, 1889. He was graduated from VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY Divinity School in 1914, and went to CHINA that same year as a missionary of the M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH. In 1920 he was married to Olive Lipscomb, of Mississippi.

Their term of service comprised 49 years, mostly in SHANGHAI, where they developed the Moore Memorial Church into one of that city's leading institutions, with one to two thousand persons involved daily.

As a Conference leader, Anderson helped organize and develop the adult education program and young people's conferences.

After 1951 the Andersons spent twelve years in HONG KONG, caring for the refugees from the ten mainland Methodist conferences, opening schools and clinics, and working in a program of personal counseling.

They retired in 1963 to live among the Chinese in San Francisco, and later moved to Wesley Woods, Atlanta, Ga.

He undertook a program of standardization of all the schools and colleges belonging to the church, the raising of educational requirements for entry into annual conferences, development of a department to encourage young people to enter the church and to provide for their training, and support for church-affiliated schools and colleges.

ANDERSON, INDIANA, U.S.A., First Church. Methodism came to Anderson in 1826. In 1839 a tract was donated for a church and cemetery, and for several years the congregation worshiped in an uncompleted frame building with a dirt floor and pews made of split logs set on pegs. In 1850 a frame church 36 by 50 feet was erected on another lot, and in 1871 a brick edifice 50 by 80 feet with a seating capacity of 500 was built. A fourth structure of stone was erected in 1900. As other Methodist churches were organized in Anderson, the mother congregation was called Meridian Street Church, but in 1900 it took the name of First Church. At that time it had 625 members, and three other Methodist churches in the city had a total of 566. W. H. Bransford was pastor of First Church, 1931-59. It had 1,650 members when he began and 3,502 at the end of his pastorate, most of the growth coming after World War II. In 1950 an education building was erected, the only part of the church plant left standing after a disastrous fire in 1960. Plans for rebuilding were projected, and in 1965 First Church's fifth sanctuary was dedicated. In 1969 the church reported 3,073 members, property valued at $2,491,900, and $295,-628 raised for all purposes. In the same year Anderson had eight other Methodist churches with a total of 2,803 members.

ANDREW, JAMES OSGOOD (1794-1871), American bishop, was born in Wilkes Co., Ga., on May 3, 1794. He was the son of John Andrew, the first native Georgian to enter the Methodist ministry.

James Andrew joined the SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE on trial in Dec., 1812, when the conference included much of GEORGIA and NORTH CAROLINA as well as SOUTH CAROLINA. He was sent to the Saltcatcher (Saltkehatchee) circuit in the lower part of the state. Following this appointment he served in succession the Bladen and Warren circuits which were mainly in North Carolina; CHARLESTON, S. C.; WILMINGTON, N. C.; COLUMBIA, S. C.; and AUGUSTA and SAVANNAH in Georgia.

He was a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE at BALTIMORE in 1820, and four years later he became PRESIDING ELDER of the Edisto District, which covered all of lower South Carolina and Georgia. He was a delegate to the General Conference again at Baltimore. He was returned to Charleston in 1827 and the following year was delegate to the General Conference at PITTSBURGH. His appointments were then Greensboro and Athens, Madison, and Augusta, all in Georgia, and in 1832 he was the leader of his delegation to the General Conference at

JAMES O. ANDREW

PHILADELPHIA, where he was elected bishop. His episcopal assignments included most of the conferences in the South and as far west as OHIO, KENTUCKY, and MISSOURI. He lived in Augusta, Ga.

In 1838 he became president of the board of trustees of a Manual Labor School at Covington, Ga., but this school did not meet the needs of the conference and Emory College was founded at Oxford, only a few miles from Covington. He moved his family to this new town.

Bishop Andrew was married three times—to Ann Amelia McFarlane in 1816, to Mrs. Leonora Greenwood in 1844, and to Mrs. Emily Sims Childers after the death of his second wife in 1854.

His first wife owned a Negro girl, and the slave became the property of the bishop on her death. The laws of Georgia did not permit owners to free their slaves, but Bishop Andrew declared that the girl was at liberty to leave the state at any time when provision could be made for her maintenance elsewhere. But he became more seriously involved with slavery because his second wife owned slaves inherited from her first husband. Immediately on his marriage, the bishop executed legal papers renouncing all ownership of the slaves and securing them to his wife. The law of the church disapproved of slaveholding in states which legally permitted their freedom, which was not the case in Georgia.

The abolition sentiment was strong in the General Conference of 1844 and the Northern delegates were in the majority. The case of Bishop Andrew led to a lengthy debate. He offered to resign his episcopal office but this the Southern delegates would not permit. Agreeing with their Northern brethren that slavery was a moral evil, they contended that any surrender to Northern abolition sentiment would be disastrous to the church in the South where slavery was an established institution and where laymen and ministers of all denominations were slaveholders.

After several days of debate the Northern delegates, by a vote of 110 to 68, secured the adoption of a resolution asking, but not demanding, that Bishop Andrew cease from exercising the functions of the episcopacy so long as his connection with slavery remained. At the same time it was decided that his name should stand in the minutes, hymn book and Discipline as usual and that his support as a bishop should continue. The conference declared that its action "was neither judicial nor punitive. It neither achieves nor intends a deposition, nor so much as a legal suspension. Bishop Andrew is still a bishop; and should he, against the expressed sense of the General Conference, proceed in the discharge of his functions, his official acts would be valid." However, when the episcopal assignments were published his name did not appear.

On the passage of the original resolution the Southern delegates presented a long document of "protest." It was pointed out that Andrew had violated no law or rule of the church, that he had not been charged or brought to trial for any offense, and that the Northern delegates, by mere force of numbers, had substituted expediency for law. Thus a precedent had been established, which subjected "any Bishop at any time to the will and caprice of a majority of the General Conference, not only without law, but in defiance of the restraints of and provisions of the law." If a bishop could be deposed for one thing he might also be deposed for any other thing, and if a bishop could be so treated so might any other minister or even lay member. The General Conference thus asserted its supremacy and placed itself above the law and the Discipline.

In this situation the General Conference adopted the historic PLAN OF SEPARATION, which provided for two branches of the church, each with its own General Conference. The Southern conferences decided to unite in a separate connection.

Bishop Andrew continued his episcopal work in the Southern Church. Five times he visited TEXAS and presided over conferences there. He died in NEW ORLEANS on March 2, 1871.

ANDREW COLLEGE, Cuthbert, Ga., was chartered by the GEORGIA Legislature in 1854 as a senior college for women, making it one of the oldest institutions of its kind in the United States. The college was named for Bishop JAMES OSGOOD ANDREW, who in 1856 dedicated the school to the "service of God."

During the Civil War, schoolwork was suspended for three years, and the buildings were used by the Confederate government as a hospital. In 1866 the school reopened and included in its curriculum a course in physical education, the first such course to be required of women in the South. The school was reorganized as a junior college in 1917 and became coeducational in 1956.

The governing board has thirty-six members, plus three ex officio; it is self-perpetuating; the majority must be Methodist ministers.

JOHN O. GROSS

ANDREWS, CHARLES GREEN (1830-1900), American minister and educator, was born in Madison County, Miss. His parents were wealthy and socially prominent in the area.

He was a graduate of CENTENARY COLLEGE in La., where he received his B.A. degree in 1850. Twenty-one years later he was to return to his alma mater to begin a long and distinguished term as the president of the college.

Andrews first entered the MISSISSIPPI ANNUAL CONFERENCE (MES) on trial in Dec., 1858, at Woodville, Miss.

In Nov., 1865, Andrews was elected secretary of the Mississippi Annual Conference, a post he held for 34 years. In 1880 he was chosen as president of the conference in the absence of the bishop. He was a member of every GENERAL CONFERENCE from 1870 until his death.

As a delegate to the first Methodist ECUMENICAL CONFERENCE at CITY ROAD CHAPEL, LONDON, in 1881, he delivered an address on education. He also attended the Ecumenical Conference of 1891 in WASHINGTON, D. C.

Always interested in the church's program of higher education, Andrews was instrumental in the establishment of MILLSAPS COLLEGE, JACKSON, MISS. and helped to guide its early progress as a member of its Board of Trustees.

One of those baptized and received into the church by Andrews was the distinguished CHARLES BETTS GALLOWAY who was later elected to the episcopacy.

Andrews died Jan. 7, 1900, and was buried in Rose Hill Cemetery, Meridian, Miss.

until 1864 when he was again able to return to the pastorate.

He became pastor at Stamford, Conn. and later served several NEW YORK CITY churches. His election as bishop came in 1872. He was assigned to DES MOINES, IOWA.

In 1876 Andrews was asked by the BOARD OF MISSIONS and the bishops to go to Europe and INDIA to organize or reorganize Methodist work there. On this assignment he formed annual conferences in south India, SWEDEN, and NORWAY. He also visited GERMANY, SWITZERLAND, and ITALY.

On his return in 1880 he was assigned to episcopal supervision in Washington. For the last six years of his active service—1895 to 1904—he was in New York, where he retired. In 1901 Bishop Andrews was a delegate and a presiding officer at the Third ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE in WASHINGTON.

In 1907, three years after he retired, Bishop Andrews crossed the continent to attend a meeting of bishops at SPOKANE, WASH. He was then 82 years old, and the trip overtaxed his strength. He died in BROOKLYN, N. Y., Dec. 31, 1907, shortly after returning from the Spokane meeting. He was buried in Oakwood Cemetery, Syracuse, N. Y., near the grave of his brother, Charles, who was Chief Justice of the New York Court of Appeals.

ANGOLA, named for Ngola, a sixteenth century chieftain, is a Portuguese territory in southwest AFRICA. Portugal has occupied Angola for nearly 500 years, the oldest area of European settlement in Africa south of Sahara.

Methodist missionary work in Angola was established in 1884-85. In 1884 the GENERAL CONFERENCE (ME) had elected WILLIAM TAYLOR as Missionary Bishop for Africa, and he sent William R. Summers and Charles W.

Gorden to set up headquarters at Luanda. Taylor arrived in 1885 with a company of forty, including evangelists, agriculturists, artisans, linguists, and printers. He proposed to organize a series of "self-supporting stations" similar to those he had already instituted elsewhere. From Luanda some of the party moved up the river Cuanza and along an old slaveroad, setting up units, the fifth and final being at Malange, 200 miles from Luanda. The Angola District was organized with Amos E. Withey as presiding elder. Eight thousand acres of land was later acquired at Quessua, near Malange, where agricultural, industrial and educational work developed. Heli Chatelaine, one of the pioneers, discovered the structure of the Kimbundu language, and devising a phonetic system of spelling made some extensive Biblical translations. In 1897 Chatelaine, with Swiss support, instituted an independent Mission Philafricaine in which he worked until his death in 1908. This byproduct of Methodism is still active.

The Board of Foreign Missions of the M. E. CHURCH took over the work in 1897, following Taylor's retirement in 1896. The CONGO MISSION Conference was organized by Bishop J. C. HARTZELL, Angola being a District. The WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY sent Miss Cora Zentmire in 1899, but she died within two years.

In 1902 Angola became the West Central Africa Mission Conference, the Angola Mission Conference in 1920, the Angola Provisional Annual Conference in 1940, and the ANGOLA ANNUAL CONFERENCE in 1948.

By the middle of the twentieth century the membership exceeded 30,000; there were 150 churches, 900 preaching places and 200 Sunday schools, enrolling over 20,000. The churches were practically all self-supporting. The Emanuel Theological College was organized at Dondi in cooperation with the United Church of Christ, U.S.A. and the UNITED CHURCH OF CANADA. Training schools at Quessua include elements for evangelistic work, teaching, agriculture, industries and nursing. Four district central schools hold 1,500 enrollment, and there are numerous village units. A press and a 20-bed hospital are at Quessua. Ten other Protestant missions are at work in Angola, the oldest being the Baptist Missionary Society of Great Britain, which dates from 1878. The American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions undertook work in 1880.

In 1961 rebellion erupted in northern Angola. The result was almost half a million refugees in neighboring countries, great loss of life, persecution of the church and its leaders, expulsion of missionaries, and considerable loss in the growth and vitality of the church.

ANGOLA ANNUAL CONFERENCE. The present conference is organized with the following districts: Luanda, Cuanza North, Dembos, Malange North, and Malange South.

Luanda, the capital of Angola, is a modern port city with a population of 170,000—about 150,000 of whom are Africans and 20,000 Europeans. In Luanda itself there are two self-supporting Methodist congregations, with a membership of about 2,354 and with African pastors and staffs.

Present-day Methodist work in the conference is divided into two major regions: Luanda and Malange. These regions are subdivided into districts, but since the uprising in 1961 three districts have been closed, though new churches have sprung up. The Methodist Church in the Angola Conference has approximately 38,000 full and preparatory members, at last reporting, served by 61 ordained and 68 supply pastors.

The Conference is attached to the Salisbury Area of The United Methodist Church.

ANKER, HARRY P. (1888-1958), an American missionary to the CONGO, was born on Oct. 13, 1888. He graduated from Hope College in Holland, Mich., and from VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY and did further work at the University of Chicago when he was home on furlough. On Oct. 24, 1914, he married Eva Van Erden and was assigned to AFRICA in 1916, spending 38 years of his life in service there. He was stationed at Wembo Nyama in the Central Congo most of this time, doing a great deal of teaching and was the head of the Bible School. For a long time he was the bishop's representative and was active on a number of committees. He was known for his fairness in dealing with others and also for his unusual sense of humor.

In 1954 he retired for reasons of health and for a time resided in Clearwater, Fla. There he taught for a period in Trinity Bible College. On May 27, 1956, he became the first pastor of a new church, Skycrest, in Clearwater.

ANN ARBOR, MICHIGAN, U.S.A. First Church, dates back to the preaching of JOHN BAUGHMAN on the Detroit Circuit in Nov., 1825. Baughman organized a society of five members July 29, 1827. An early member was Benjamin Packard, one of the founders of ALBION COLLEGE.

Ann Arbor was made a station in 1835. A great revival broke out in the winter of 1837-38, and 118 people joined the church, including JUDSON COLLINS, who was a graduate in the first class of the University of Michigan in 1845, and later served in the first Methodist mission to CHINA. A church was begun in 1837, and dedicated in the MICHIGAN CONFERENCE sessions in 1839.

In 1866 the present site at the corner of Washington and State Streets was acquired. The second church seating 1,200 people was built and dedicated Aug. 21, 1867; it stood until 1940.

In July 1871 the WOMEN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY of the church was organized with 53 charter members. The WOMEN'S HOME MISSIONARY SOCIETY was organized Nov. 14, 1883; its organization was delayed by relief work for sufferers from forest fires in northern Michigan. The first mission circle for girls was organized in 1876. A small Chinese Sunday school was maintained for a time.

Famous ministers who have served here through the years include ELIJAH PILCHER; HENRY COLCLAZER; SETH REED; Benjamin Cocker, who stood for woman's suffrage in 1870; LEWIS R. FISKE, later president of Albion College, 1877-1897; William Shier; Edward S. Ninde; ARTHUR W. STALKER, who served 25 years, 1905-1930;

FRED B. FISHER, who resigned from the bishopric in India to come back here; CHARLES W. BRASHARES, Fisher's successor, who after fourteen years as pastor was elected bishop; and Hoover Rupert.

Among the ministers going out from this church have been Wellington Collins, Judson Collins, Leander Pilcher, Isaac Elwood, James Jacklin, Arthur Stalker, George Brown, Charles Allen, MERTON RICE, and Edward Ramsdell. At least ninety foreign missionaries have gone out from Ann Arbor First, including Gertrude Howe, who served 50 years in China; and Thomas Johnson, who served 46 years in India; and fifty-five missionaries have gone into the home field.

The Church's location near the central campus of the University of Michigan has proved ideal. A Wesley Hall for student work was acquired in 1922. The present building was erected in 1940, and one wing was added in 1956. The WESLEY FOUNDATION for student work is housed in one wing of the church. The property was valued at $1,245,098 in 1968; the membership was reported to be 3,040.

ANNANDALE, VIRGINIA, U.S.A. Annandale Church, served as the community "Meeting House" from 1840 to 1950, until the population explosion in what became a WASHINGTON, D. C. suburb brought scores of other churches. Many of these community churches, including the Roman Catholic church of Annandale, were organized within the walls of Annandale Methodist.

In its wide and varied history as community center it has served as hospital for the Union Army during the Civil War, housed the first public school in Annandale, sponsored the first Boy Scout troop in the area, and housed civic clubs, fraternal orders and many other community activities. It was once the rallying point for a protest meeting to the state's governor (with the governor present) for better roads.

From 1946, the 100th anniversary of the church, to 1967 the church grew in membership from several hundred to nearly 3,000, keeping pace with the population explosion. It still has three sanctuaries, the first, a "little white church" landmark now being shared by the congregation of a small sect; the second, converted into a youth activities center; and the third, the place of worship for the congregation who use it for three identical worship services each Sunday morning, with the largest average attendance of any church in the VIRGINIA CONFERENCE.

Officially designated as a central suburban church, Annandale Church is ringed by a score of new congregations, which it helped organize and establish. It is an experimental church, seeking always new approaches to meaning and relevancy. Some of the successful probes are Yokefellow Groups (psycho-spiritual growth groups), Festival of Religion in the Arts, Walk-In Counseling, Coffee House, and the Annandale Christian Community for Action.

It is regularly the home for other denominations, scout groups, Alcoholics Anonymous, Red Cross, American Field Service, civic associations, and many other community groups.

The door to the conference room, a multi-purpose room in the recently completed administrative and educational wing, is the front door from the old Adams House, Bishop ASBURY'S base of operations in the area. Through this door Asbury passed many times, and in that house Annandale Church had its inception.

ANNAPOLIS, MARYLAND, U.S.A. Calvary Church. As early as 1746 GEORGE WHITEFIELD preached in Annapolis. JOSEPH PILMORE preached there on July 12, 1772. FRANCIS ASBURY made his first visit on Nov. 25, 1773. Subsequently small classes were held in the homes of Mrs. Catherine Small and Mrs. Catherine Wheddon. It was not until 1785 that a society of Methodism was actually founded.

The first building was erected in 1786 on a site not far from the governor's residence. In 1789 the Annapolis Methodists moved into a building which was formerly an armory. This was located on the grounds within the present State Circle at the head of Maryland Ave., and was known as "the old blue church." Another site was chosen on State Circle in 1817 where another church was erected. General Lafayette visited this church in Dec., 1824. This building was replaced by a new structure in 1860 and was known as Salem Church. The church took the name of Calvary in 1921.

ANNISTON, ALABAMA, U.S.A. First Church, is a downtown church whose modern colonial style adds grace to a city known for its beautiful buildings. Anniston itself is a city of approximately 35,000 and a metropolis of North ALABAMA. First Church, with its towering spire lighted at night and uplifted cross on the top, is a landmark in the city. The building was completed in 1957 at a cost of approximately one million dollars. It is noted also for its magnificent Schlicker Organ and a beautifully designed stained glass window picturing the birth, crucifixion, and resurrection of Christ. The building was erected during the pastorate of R. Edwin Kimbrough.

First Church, Anniston is one of the historic churches of Alabama Methodism. It has been served by distinguished ministers, among them Bishop HOYT M. DOBBS—who was elected to the episcopacy while pastor of this church—and W. C. HENRY, minister, seminary professor, and member of the JUDICIAL COUNCIL OF THE METHODIST CHURCH. The Anniston Church has been host a number of times to sessions of the NORTH ALABAMA CONFERENCE.

The present membership is 2,200. The church supports a medical missionary to AFRICA and is known for its zealous missionary interest. For many years First Church has had a Missionary Memorial Fund, whose proceeds are used to help educate a student from some foreign country who is studying in this country, and planning to return to his native land for Christian service.

ANNUAL ASSEMBLY, British. (See WESLEYAN METHODIST ASSOCIATION.)

ANNUAL CONFERENCE (The United Methodist Church, U.S.A.). This is the basic organization in The UNITED METHODIST CHURCH and is so declared in the Constitution in these words: "There shall be Annual Conferences as the fundamental bodies of the Church . . . with such powers, duties, and privileges as are hereinafter set forth."

Annual conferences in American Methodism had their beginnings in 1773 when THOMAS RANKIN, who was sent by JOHN WESLEY to the new world, convened a company of Methodist preachers in PHILADELPHIA. At this time the appointments of the preachers were made, and by the question and answer process, characteristic of Wesley's conferences, the affairs of the SOCIETIES were regularized. In the earliest years as many as three, but more frequently two, such conferences were convened annually.

Following the CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE of 1784, as the response to Methodist preaching gathered momentum and the circuit riders moved in ever-widening spheres, it became too difficult for all preachers of the Methodist societies to gather in one place, so it was arranged that they should assemble on a geographical basis to report the year's activity; each to have his character examined; and be stationed for the ensuing year.

The annual conference with fixed geographical boundaries became firmly established in Methodist polity by the GENERAL CONFERENCE OF 1796 when six conferences were formed; namely, NEW ENGLAND, PHILADELPHIA, BALTIMORE, VIRGINIA, SOUTH CAROLINA, and WESTERN; the latter being unbounded due to the anticipated expansion of Methodism into frontier territory.

Methodism is a church characterized by many conferences but the annual conference "is the basic body. . . ."

It is the organic center of the minister's church relationship. In the beginning only ministers attended the annual conferences; and from the beginning only those fully ordained and meeting certain qualifications were admitted to membership. Laymen were in time recognized as being important to the annual conference, and today play a vital role in its affairs. The minister, however, has a unique personal identification with his annual conference. He belongs to the annual conference as a lay person belongs to the local church. His name appears on its roll and the official record of his ministry is kept in its journal. The annual conference respects and responds to his call to the ministry, evaluates his qualifications, approves his training, and in the end recommends him to the bishop for ordination.

In the annual conference the minister comes to recognition among his peers. Here he may be elected by them as delegate to the General and JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCES. Here he may be nominated to important boards and committees, and comes to exercise wide influence in the church beyond the bounds of his annual appointment or conference.

When a pastor's years of service are completed, he asks the annual conference for retirement from the "traveling ministry," and when it is granted, it is from the annual conference that he receives his pension. In retirement, the minister continues to enjoy all the rights and privileges of the annual conference, and is still eligible for election as a delegate to the General and Jurisdictional Conferences.

Each year the annual conference passes on every minister's character, and should one be charged with words or actions unbecoming to a minister, it is from among his peers that a court is established for his trial.

A ministerial member may be related to an annual conference as a novitiate on trial, as a full connection member under appointment, as a supernumerary, on a leave, or retired. Each status is granted or denied him by appropriate action of the annual conference.

A ministerial member in good standing in any annual conference may be transferred to any other annual conference at the request of the presiding bishop of the conference into which he is going, and with the permission of the presiding bishop of the conference to which he belongs, provided the member himself gives consent to the transfer. It is possible for a minister to serve in a special appointment beyond the bounds of his own annual conference—as a connectional editor for instance—but no minister in effective relationship may be appointed to a charge (pastorate) in a conference to which he does not belong.

Lay persons do not "belong" to the annual conference in the substantive, binding, and personal sense that characterizes the membership of the clerical members. Lay members are elected from each pastoral charge. They must be at least 21 years of age and must have been members of The United Methodist Church for at least two years, and of the local church they represent for at least one year. The president of the Conference WOMEN'S SOCIETY OF CHRISTIAN SERVICE, and the conference lay leader are also to be members of the annual conference. Lay members are chosen by the CHARGE CONFERENCE. Recent General Conferences have changed the above regulations somewhat.)

Through the years an element of basic equality has been evident in annual conference membership since charges large or small have been represented alike by one minister and one lay member each. The balance swung in favor of the ministers when large churches had more than one conference member appointed to serve them. This has now been corrected by providing that a charge having more than one ministerial member may have an equal number of lay members. General and Jurisdictional Conference delegations are also equally divided between the laity and the clergy.

Lay members participate in all matters of annual conference business except those pertaining to ministerial relations. These are acted upon by ministers only. With the exception of the Board of the Ministry, and the Committee on Conference Relations, there is lay representation on all boards, commissions and committees, and in many instances laymen chair these bodies. On several annual conference boards the Discipline specifies the number of lay persons to be included in the membership, and in the case of the Commission on WORLD SERVICE AND FINANCE, it is ordered that the laymen shall be a majority. Through the hands of this commission pass all financial matters pertaining to the business of the conference; hence it is a most important commission.

A further illustration of the basic character of the annual conference is noted in the fact that amendments to the Constitution of The United Methodist Church and changes in the Discipline may originate in the annual conference. Moreover, an amendment to the Constitution having received a two-thirds majority of General Conference members present and voting, then returns to the annual conferences where it must receive a two-thirds majority of all members of the several annual conferences present and voting in order to be approved. Favorable action in the annual conferences is determinative for all constitutional changes within the church.

The annual conference is an important factor in episcopal administration. A bishop presides over the annual conference, and though the conference selects the place for holding the session, the bishop sets the time. Should no bishop be present, the conference by ballot, without nomination or debate, elects a presiding officer from among the traveling elders, who during the session discharges all duties of a bishop except ordination. The bishop is related intimately to the annual conference through his appointive powers, and his concern for the well-being of the pastors, the welfare of all charges in the conference, and the outreach and witness of the church.

The annual conference sets the number of districts, thereby determining the number of district superintendents. The bishop appoints the superintendents, but the annual conference by setting the salaries, allowances, and administrative apportionments for the office, determines to a significant degree the quality of the men who may be appointed.

The annual conference chooses its own staff. The secretary, treasurer, statistician and such other personnel, paid and unpaid, are elected by the Conference, and, as in the case of the district superintendent, in most conferences the annual conference, or a board authorized by it, sets the salary, allowances, and office expenses of this administrative personnel.

All apportionments to local churches, with the exception of the Episcopal and General Administration funds, are determined by the annual conference. The total "askings" are established here and also the bases for apportionment to the various churches. All requests for funds to meet administrative costs, or to support institutions or programs sponsored by or related to the church, must be reviewed by the conference Commission on World Service and Finance. Its recommendation then goes to the annual conference for final decision.

Further insight into the significance of the annual conference may be noted in its relation to other United Methodist institutions and structures. Though the hope for a Methodist institution or agency may arise out of the concern of an informed group, it usually crystallizes into substance only when the annual conference becomes the mothering agency. The general boards of The United Methodist Church are creatures of the General Conference; yet their effectiveness and influence depend almost entirely upon the annual conferences through which they must work.

It is clear that the annual conference deals with significant aspects of the witness and mission of The United Methodist Church. It is the keystone in United Methodism's connective structure. It is the gathered assembly of the churches within geographical regions. In it the separated units find oneness. It is the base from which the churches resolve common problems, express similar concerns, and interdependently proclaim the gospel.

The annual conference in session has many facets. At times it appears to be a political forum. Within the framework set for it by the General Conference, the annual conference makes its own rules, and the decisions of the bishop as presiding officer are always open to appeal. Debate on the conference floor is frequently impassioned and sometimes so virulent that an outsider might conclude that opposing personalities are irreconcilable enemies; yet when the final vote is taken and the majority confirmed, the lines re-form and the next problem is confronted without reference to personal differences on the preceding matter. Asbury's Journal for May 1, 1787 reflects the nature of an annual conference at this point when he says, "We had some warm and close debate but all ended in love and peace."

The annual conference sometimes resembles the meetings of stockholders of an industrial corporation. Close attention is given to money matters, receipts, apportionments, indebtedness, pensions, minimum salaries, parsonage and car allowances, and of late years health and hospital benefits for ministers and lay employees of the churches and the conference. None of these financial matters is dealt with casually. It is almost a tradition with the annual conference that no more dollars are budgeted for the year to come than have been received in the year just closed. Thus an annual conference must give major attention to financial minutiae.

An annual conference also can be likened to a spiritual rally. There is always much singing and prayer. The session invariably opens with the observance of the SACRA-MENT of Holy Communion, and devotional addresses begin or close each day. Several times during the session a visiting bishop, noted preacher, college president or seminary dean appears as "conference preacher" or "lecturer," and without fail the message carries a note of inspiration as well as admonition and guidance for pastors and laymen alike.

Annual conference is a great time for book buying and the distribution of the printed literature of the church. Many an informal discussion is held in the book display room where the gossip runs high on how the voting will go, what will happen to the proposals before the conference, and who will be appointed where for the coming year.

Historically, the annual conference session was the one occasion throughout the year when the pastors saw one another and had the opportunity of sharing their concerns and hopes for a creative and faithful ministry. Today, pastors and lay members see each other far more frequently, but the annual conference is still the main occasion when all of them are together with the interests of the church as the center of their concern. The spiritual and religious significance of these conference meetings remains an important factor in the on-going life of the church.

Though the annual conference is basic to the church's polity, it is so structured that it can respond creatively to a changing world. Annual conference procedures have changed many times through the years. Geographical boundaries which in early years followed pioneer trails, waterways and mountain ranges, in recent years have tended to conform to state lines. The size of the annual conference has also been subject to change. In early days it was geographically large. Then as the membership of the church increased and territories became more heavily populated, large conferences were divided. In recent years the pattern has been reversed with the conferences of some episcopal areas merging to make the area and conference boundaries coterminous.

In the years immediately preceding 1784, annual conferences frequently met in two sessions, "a preliminary meeting in which business was submitted to a regional group, and a final meeting in which the business was finished." Of recent date some annual conferences are experimenting with an adjourned session held during the year when matters which cannot be dealt with in a brief annual conference session can be explored at some depth.

The annual conference is a continuing entity, and more and more it tends to look ahead and project plans for extending and strengthening the mission of the church. It is possible that long range planning will become increasingly the chief business of the annual conference as other conferences within United Methodist structure deal with current issues confronting the church.

The annual conference has a basic place in United Methodist history and structure, and in generations to come it promises to continue to be the springboard of a triumphant and expanding church.

ANTHONY, BASCOM (1859-1944), American preacher, was born July 14, 1859, at Plainville, Ga. His parents were James D. and Emily (Baugh) Anthony of Gwinnett Co., Ga.

He was admitted to the SOUTH GEORGIA CONFERENCE in 1881 and in the years that followed served as pastor of many churches in south and southwest GEORGIA. He was appointed presiding elder of the Macon, Dublin, Savannah, and Thomasville Districts. After his retirement he supplied for a short time at the church in Sandersville, Ga., where his father had been pastor when he was a child.

His many years of service to the Methodist Church were recognized by EMORY UNIVERSITY in conferring an honorary D.D. degree upon him. He represented the South Georgia Conference at seven GENERAL CONFERENCES.

He was one of the unique and colorful figures of Georgia Methodism, even in his retirement years. He had a very distinctive way of praying that made people feel that if they looked up they would see the Lord. Anthony stressed the humility of Christians in his practice of addressing the Lord as "Master."

Bascom Anthony devoted his entire ministry to Georgia Methodism. Even after his strength failed, making it difficult for him to stand for the sermon, he continued to preach, the stewards placing for him a chair in the pulpit.

During his long retirement he became a contributing editor of the Wesleyan Christian Advocate, The Macon Telegraph, and The Savannah Morning News, where his work became popular. His book, Fifty Years in the Ministry, was published in 1937. A fine, earnest man, noted for his frankness, blunt manner of speaking, and familiarity with a wide range of subjects, he died in Tampa, Fla. on Jan. 16, 1944.

ANTHONY, CHARLES VOLNEY (1831-1908), American preacher and western pioneer, was born in Portage, Allegheny Co., N. Y., on Feb. 22, 1831.

When he was seven, his family moved to a farm near FORT WAYNE, IND. He lived in Fort Wayne until he left to join his brother, Elihu, in Santa Cruz, Calif., in 1851. Anthony joined the Methodist church in 1853 in CALIFORNIA. He returned to Fort Wayne College to prepare for the ministry. In 1855 he joined the newly organized CALIFORNIA CONFERENCE.

Although he had no academic degrees, Charles Anthony was an excellent example of the remarkable pioneer preacher-scholar of that day. He read the Bible in Hebrew and Greek every day. His favorite book was the Greek New Testament.

While pastor at Vallejo in 1856, he became a close friend of Admiral Farragut, then commander of the U. S. Navy Yard. In 1882-85 Anthony served as presiding elder of the Stockton District. He was a member of the 1872 and 1892 GENERAL CONFERENCES of the M. E. Church, and was a member of the General Missionary Committee from 1884 to 1888.

His well-known book, Fifty Years of Methodism in California, was written at the request of the Conference but was printed at his own expense. Charles Anthony died Jan. 14, 1908 in Watsonville, Calif.

ANTHONY, JAMES D. (1825-1899), American preacher, was born in Abbeville Co., S. C., Oct. 12, 1825. He was the son of a minister in the M. E. Church, Whitfield Anthony.

In 1835 the Anthony family moved into Cherokee Indian country in what became Cherokee Co., Ala. On July 4, 1839, when he was 14 years old, young Anthony lost his right eye in the explosion of a powder horn.

In 1843 the family moved to Vann's Valley, Floyd Co., Ga. James Anthony was converted at a CAMP MEETING held near his home in Oct., 1844. His license to preach was granted at Rome, Ga. in Oct., 1846. In December of that year he was admitted to the GEORGIA CONFERENCE (MES).

He worked tirelessly in the cause of Methodism in GEORGIA and ALABAMA, and soon became a much loved and respected figure. He served a number of appointments in the Georgia, Mobile, and SOUTH GEORGIA Conferences. As a young preacher in Sandersville, Ga., where his son, BASCOM ANTHONY, later served as a supply pastor, James Anthony had a memorable encounter with General William Tecumseh Sherman, as the Union Army arrived on its march to the sea during the War between the States. As a result of Anthony's plea, first in the name of Christ and then in the name of the Masonic order, the new Methodist church and the Masonic Temple were spared from destruction.

Anthony's autobiography, recounting his years as a minister, was published in 1896. The "bishop of the wiregrass," as he was fondly called in south Georgia, died Jan. 26, 1899 in Savannah, and was buried in Sandersville, Ga.

ANTIGUA is a self-governing associated state within the British Commonwealth. It is one of the Leeward Islands of the Eastern Caribbean. Antigua has an area of 108 square miles and its dependency, Barbuda, 62 square miles. The population is 61,000 (1967 estimate). The capital, St. Johns, has an excellent harbor, as does Falmouth on the south coast.

Visited by Christopher Columbus in 1493, Antigua was occupied by neither Spanish nor French, because of the scarcity of water. The English established a settlement in 1632, the Treaty of Breda in 1667 certifying that sover-eighty. Because of its position and harbors, Antigua early became the base for British naval activity. From 1725, "Nelson's Dockyard," inside English Harbor, was the Caribbean fleet's home port and major repair facility. The colony also developed as the focus of British administration for the Leeward Islands.

Antigua was the first of the West Indian islands to receive Methodist preaching and to organize a society. NATHANIEL GILBERT, lawyer and planter of Antigua, was converted by JOHN WESLEY in 1758, while visiting ENGLAND. Returning to Antigua in 1760, he began preaching in his own home. His brother Francis, a physician, joined in the effort. When Nathaniel died in 1774, the society numbered over 200. Soon after that, Francis Gilbert returned to England because of ill health, and the society continued under local leadership. With Wesley's approval, Francis Gilbert's wife urged FRANCIS ASBURY to go to Antigua, but he declined. CLASS MEETINGS and PRAYER MEETINGS were maintained by a Negress and a mulatto, Sophia Campbell and Mary Alley.

In 1778 JOHN BAXTER, a shipwright and local preacher, went to the naval dockyard at English Harbor, and assumed leadership of the Antigua society. Within a year, he had gathered 600 slaves into society classes, while retaining the good will of the planters. Mrs. Mary Gilbert returned to Antigua in 1781, following the death of her husband, Francis, and devoted herself to work with the Negro women. Her means and social position proved of much advantage to the mission. In 1783, Baxter built the first Methodist church in the West Indies, in Temple Street, St. Johns.

At the historic CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE at BALTIMORE, Md., JEREMIAH LAMBERT was ordained elder and appointed to Antigua, but he developed tuberculosis and returned to America. Arrangements were also made for Baxter to come to America for ordination. He arrived at Baltimore for the conference on June 1, 1785, was ordained as deacon by THOMAS COKE that day and as elder on June 2, and was appointed to Antigua. For several years this appointment appeared in the Minutes of the American M. E. Church. Returning to Antigua, Baxter assumed all the functions of his office and began regular visitation to other nearby islands.

In 1786 the British Methodist Conference appointed WILLIAM WARRENER to Antigua. He was ordained by John Wesley as the first missionary to be sent out to non-English people by the British Methodists. In late 1786, Coke, intending to visit NOVA SCOTIA, was blown south by storms and landed at Antigua at Christmas. He found Baxter and proceeded to visit a number of the neighboring islands under Baxter's guidance. Coke confirmed the work, organizing it into a spreading circuit with Baxter at the head. In succeeding years Coke made several visits to Antigua, and the Antigua District was constituted in 1806.

Warrener returned to England in 1797, and Baxter died in 1807. Other ministers took their place, but a lack of adequate leadership caused a decline in the quality of church life around 1811-12. By 1820, however, the circuit was strong enough to form its own missionary society, and in 1823 membership reached a peak of 4,560. The Methodist community at this time represented over one-third of the population. All of the island's five Methodist ministers were drowned near St. John's harbor in 1826. Between 1846 and 1866 personal quarrels among church leaders divided the Methodist community, economic difficulties led to emigration, and membership declined by nearly a thousand. Under the autocratic chairmanship of Thomas M. Chambers (1872-87), controversy continued, and against opposition the staff of the circuit was reduced. Despite the chairman's and Synod's protests, the district was included from 1884 to 1904 in the autonomous West Indian Conference. When the area returned to the jurisdiction of the British Methodist Conference, the district was appropriately named the Leeward Islands District. The chairman resided in St. Kitts until 1950.

In May, 1967, when the METHODIST CHURCH OF THE CARIBBEAN AND THE AMERICAS was organized, the organizing conference was held in St. Johns, Antigua, and Antigua was chosen to become the headquarters of the new autonomous conference. The government of Antigua granted a site for the conference headquarters. The historical connection which Antigua had with Britain and America from early days was another reason for the choice of Antigua as the headquarters of the new church. On the eve of entry into the new church in 1966, the Leeward Islands District had 85 places of worship, with 35 ministers (including 25 West Indians), 15,479 full members and a total community of 58,270. It was responsible for thirteen primary schools with 1,525 pupils, and one secondary school with 150 students.

ANTI-METHODIST PUBLICATIONS (American).

Late Colonial to the Early National Period. The Methodist Episcopal Church was the last of the mainline Evangelical denominations to organize in the United States and its emergence was received with marked suspicion, even hostility. Some Methodists had supported the American cause in the Revolutionary War. Others remained loyal to the king or refused, for conscience' sake, to bear arms. Theirs had the stronger impact and for years after the war, despite protestations of loyalty to the new republic, Methodists were regarded as more English than American. They were identified closely with JOHN WESLEY who, with the movement he fathered, had for decades been the focal point of ecclesiastical contention. Over the years a sizable anti-Methodist literature had been produced and some of it, particularly that critical of Wesley, had been reprinted in America. Soon, however, an indigenous American anti-Methodist literature evolved from controversies over Methodism's distinctive emphases in doctrine and polity.

The initial attacks were cast in a Wesleyan mold, mainly reflecting a negative reaction to the theology of the Methodist Revival. One of the earliest was a sermon published by Presbyterian Henry Pattillo in 1788 in which he assaulted Wesley for his "extreme ignorance" of predestination. Wesley's understanding of perfection was repudiated by Elijah Norton who, in The Methodist System and Church Annihilated by the Scriptures of Truth (1812), warned that no one could be saved who shared such erroneous opinions. In a strange, if not ironic twist, Methodists were accused of blasphemy by Frederic Plumer, a freethinker and admitted anti-Trinitarian, in The Mystery Revealed (1813). In this early period the most sustained theological controversy was that between the Methodist itinerant, MARTIN RUTER, and Francis Brown, Congregational minister and president of Dartmouth College. From 1814 to 1816 the two men debated the merits of predestination, producing in the process five major publications. In the same vein was Presbyterian Seth Williston's A Vindication of Some of the Most Essential Doctrines of the Reformation (1817), designed to refute NATHAN BANGS' The Errors of Hopkinstianism Detected and Refuted.

Methodist polity became an issue as soon as its results posed a threat to the territorial arrangements of other denominations. James Wilson, pastor of Beneficent Church in Providence, Rhode Island, in his Apostolic Church Government Displayed (1798), sought to remove the authoritative ground from under the episcopacy. To the same purpose was John Kewley's An Enquiry into the Validity of Methodist Episcopacy (1807). Kewley, a former Methodist turned Episcopalian, held that the Methodist episcopacy was a merely human contrivance issuing from Wesley's vanity and spiritual pride.

In these early controversies Methodists sometimes found themselves at a disadvantage. Congregational and Presbyterian clergymen, with their superior formal education, triumphed over Methodist spokesmen whose grasp of historical theology was not always equal to the demands made upon them. Nathan Bangs and Martin Ruter were exceptions. So was TIMOTHY MERRITT. But their efforts were piecemeal and uncoordinated at a time when the circulation of anti-Methodist pamphlets and tracts was increasing sharply. To counteract this activity the TRACT SOCIETY was established in 1817 and the following year saw the first issue of the METHODIST MAGAZINE. With these two instruments Methodism's apologetical task was launched. They were joined in 1826 by the CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE, which at once demonstrated its superior ability to respond immediately to sectarian sniping. Within its first month the Advocate was at war with the Congregational Boston Record, and the Presbyterian New York Observer over Methodist use of the CAMP MEETING.

To carry on its defense, 19th century Methodism produced a number of gifted writers and editors including William McKendree Bangs, JOHN EMORY, WILBUR FISK, Samuel Luckey, GEORGE PECK, Benjamin Franklin Tefft, D. D. WHEDON, and Daniel Wise. From the 1820s onward their abilities were fully employed. Methodism had become a force in the religious life of the nation with effects that other denominations found unsettling. Throughout the century Methodists were engaged by all the major churches and by many of the sects in often prolonged and bitter controversy. Certain issues were common in nearly all of the disputes. Even so, there were recognizable variations in content and thrust which were insisted upon by denominational advocates as indispensable to true religion. For this reason the controversial literature can best be examined in the context of the denominational agitation which inspired it.

Early National Period to the Civil War. (a) Congregationalists and New England. Congregational opposition to Methodist expansion into New England was vocal and bitter. Rejected out of hand was Methodism's "monarchical and aristocratical" polity which, according to Congregational apologists, elevated the clergy to a privileged rank at the cost of subverting the democratic rights of the laity. In the early 1800s Congregationalists had been upset by a number of cases where Methodist clergymen, accused of crimes actionable in the civil courts, had been tried in advance by church tribunals and adjudged innocent. They supposed that this issue had been settled in the 17th century when it was decided that the power of the civil authority was not only superior and anterior to any discipline taken by the church, but independent of it. Here, two centuries later, were the Methodists attempting to pull down the wall of separation. It was held that this foolish attempt by Methodists to influence civil authority posed a threat to the nation's political stability and had to be curbed. Charges of anti-republicanism were repeatedly sounded. John Barber's Thoughts on some parts of the Discipline of the Methodist Episcopal Church (1829) was one of the earlier and fuller statements. The Congregational Quarterly Christian Spectator took up the attack and throughout 1829 was doing battle with the Methodist Magazine, the Christian Advocate and ZION'S HERALD. The issues were rejoined in the 30s, 40s and 50s. In 1846 Z. K. Hawley published one of the best remembered controversial pieces, his Congregationalism and Methodism, in which Methodism is dismissed as inconsequential while Congregationalism is credited with having made New England "the brightest spot within the circumference of the globe."

Drawing upon literature of this kind and combining it with personal observation, Parsons Cooke, pastor of First Church, Lynn, Mass., issued two ambitious volumes in 1855 which represent the acme of anti-Methodist publications from Congregational sources. The first was A Century of Puritanism and a Century of its Opposites. In it Cooke expressed several convictions: (1) Arminian doctrine was inadequate to "supply the energy of a religious body without artificial and unscriptural appliances such as Methodism has"; (2) Methodist camp meetings ("comic operations") have occasioned spurious conversions (wasn't "backsliding" a word peculiar to the Wesleyan vocabulary?); (3) the elasticity of Methodist doctrine has issued in the revival of heresy; and (4) the whole of Methodist organization, like a leech, draws its life blood from the healthy, living bodies of other churches. The Second Part of Cooke's Centuries covers much the same ground but in sharper language. Its thesis is explicitly stated: "the M. E. Church of the United States is a corrupt and corrupting corporation, and the best interests of religion require that it should cease."

Congregationalism, led by The New Englander, pursued an anti-Methodist crusade to the eve of the Civil War, although both the ground and the tone of the con-tion were somewhat altered. Argumentation became more substantive and less ad hominem. Theological discussion assumed more sophistication and precision. Throughout the period Methodists relied heavily upon D. D. Whedon, perhaps the most formidable of their champions. From his editorial chair at the Methodist Quarterly Review he energetically pressed Methodism's theological claims and, unintimidated by name or reputation, took on all its opposers.

While Congregationalists led the attack against Methodism in New England they were by no means the only antagonists on the field. Writers for other traditions added to the growing pile of anti-Methodist pamphlets, but their statements tended only to elaborate and reinforce Congregational concerns. The eccentric Elias Smith, editor of The Christian's Magazine, writing nearly a generation after Methodism's formal organization, still viewed it as a British outpost on American soil. The Unitarian Christian Disciple and Theological Review criticized Wesley for his credulity and superstition and ridiculed his spiritual offspring in America for their fanaticism and mock humility. The eclecticism which characterizes these contributions is nowhere better exemplified than in Asahel Bronson's A Plain Exhibition of Methodist Episcopacy (1844). Not only did he borrow freely from fellow critics in New England, he also availed himself of the arguments contained in MUTUAL RIGHTS, the principal literary organ of the Reformers in the M. E. Church who had advocated a more democratic form of church government.

(b) Presbyterians. Presbyterian attacks on Methodism intensified in the 1820s at a time when suggestions for greater cooperation (even union) among the churches were being seriously advanced. Closer relationships between Presbyterians and Methodists were out of the question as far as Samuel Pelton was concerned. In The Absurdities of Methodism (1822) he argued that truth could not be sacrificed merely for good fellowship and the truth was that Methodism was more Roman than Protestant. Pelton was answered by Laurence Kean in 1823. Immediately he rejoined with A Reply which added nothing new except an intensifying of the aspersions which were freely traded.

This exchange of insults was courtly compared with that ensuing from Presbyterian-Methodist debates in the South. In 1827 the Lexington Presbytery, deciding to move against growing Methodist power in Virginia, issued a Pastoral Letter which provoked a feud lasting the better part of two years. Henry Ruffner prepared and published anonymously a Review of the Controversy between the Methodists and Presbyterians in Central Virginia (1829) as a simple statement of fact. But its objectivity was a pretense, and it too became an element in the dispute.

The Presbyterian campaign spread to other parts of the South. One of the most salient outcroppings was seen in 1827 with the first appearance of the Calvinistic Magazine. For its duration, consistency and unqualified hostility it ranks as foremost among the anti-Methodist productions of the 19th century. From the emergence of the movement in England to its rise and development in America, every aspect and facet of the denomination's history was searchingly scrutinized and derided. Wesleyan hymnology was excoriated. Wesley's translation of the New Testament was dismissed as a mutilation of scripture sense. All the old objections to Arminianism and episcopacy were recataloged. The question of Methodist loyalty was reopened with the "discovery" that FRANCIS ASBURY, contrary to widely held opinion, actually tried to strangle American independence in its cradle and perpetuate monarchy and the Established Church. Pick any volume or number at random, the reader will not be disappointed in his expectations.

G. W. Musgrave offered a summary of the Presbyterian position in The Polity of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States (1843). It was based in part on his observations of the Methodist Protestant agitation in Baltimore, but he was most indebted to such Presbyterian sources as Ashbel Green's Christian Advocate (Philadelphia), the Princeton Review, and two of William Annan's controversial writings, The Difficulties of Arminian Methodism (1832) and his anonymously issued A Dialogue between a Presbyterian and a Methodist (1834). Musgrave was an inspiration to Frederick A. Ross who intensified the anti-Methodist campaign in the South by his editorial labors on the revived Calvinistic Magazine. His rejection of Methodism as a debauched pietism precipitated a mighty counter-attack. Two new Methodist publications were founded to do battle, Russell Rneau's Arminian Magazine (Rome, Georgia) and The Jonesborough Monthly Review edited by WILLIAM C. BROWNLOW.

The Princeton Review was not to be compared with the Calvinistic Magazine in its scholarship and general tone. However that may be, it was strongly opposed to Methodism's doctrinal position and led the attack against its Arminianism and theology of grace. Methodism's reliance upon false doctrine was diagnosed by Henry Brown in his Arminian Inconsistencies and Errors (1856). He expressed a widely shared Presbyterian conviction when he said that Methodist difficulties were traceable to an imprecise doctrinal statement. His suggestion: adopt a common confession, preferably the Westminster.

(c) Baptists. The bitterest and most sustained confrontations between Baptists and Methodists took place in the South. Between them there was an active dislike and mistrust. Baptists repudiated the centralization of power manifest in Methodist connectionalism and the episcopacy. For their part Methodists could accept neither the radical decentralization of Baptist organization nor its insistence upon believers' baptism. Compared with other ecclesiastical debates, that between Baptists and Methodists was slow in starting, but once under way was carried by its momentum well into the 20th century. The earliest prolonged dispute was between William F. Broadus and HENRY SLICER. In A Sermon on Baptism (1835) Broadus took exception to the Methodist practice of infant baptism and baptism by any mode other than immersion, and he maintained his position despite Slicer's several replies and rejoinders.

Baptist militancy against Methodists, and everyone else, was best expressed in the person and work of James Robinson Graves, preacher, author, editor, controversialist and denominational gadfly. Some of his most vigorous writing was directed against Methodists whom he considered the "most belligerent and offensive of all Protestant sects." He published what is perhaps the best and most widely known of all anti-Methodist works, his monumental The Great Iron Wheel (1855). Methodism was pictured as a vast piece of machinery kept in motion by bishops whose despotic powers rested upon passive obedience and non-resistance. Under episcopal direction the iron wheel of Methodism transgressed the rights of its own clergy and laity and moved inexorably to crush the civil rights of free men everywhere. William G. Brownlow, who had moved so decisively against the Calvinistic Methodist, did the same against Graves from his new position as editor of Brownlow's Knoxville Whig. He responded in The Great Iron Wheel Examined in language as offensive as that used by Graves.

A recurrent Baptist criticism fastened on Methodism's practice of granting church membership to regenerate and unregenerate alike. This is the burden of Amos Cooper Dayton's Theodosia Ernest (1856), a fictionalized account of how one young Methodist came to see the light and joined the Baptists. Writing tit for tat, William Pope Harrison published Theophilus Walton (1858), a fictionalized account of how one young Baptist came to see the light and joined the Methodists. In reply Dayton prepared Baptist Facts against Methodist Fictions (1859), the evidential basis for the portrait of his heroine.

(d) Episcopalians. Nothing emerges more clearly from the controversial literature of the 19th century than the durability of John Wesley as the whipping boy for the failures and shortcomings of American Methodism. To the Anglicans and their American counterparts, the Episcopalians, he was a schismatic. In common they agreed that from Wesley's unsound teaching on the WITNESS OF THE SPIRIT issued a succession of false assurances which culminated in the organization of an unauthorized church with an illegitimate episcopal succession. These points were debated by William White, bishop of Pennsylvania, and JOHN EMORY as early as 1817. Episcopalians hammered away at Methodism's doctrine of the church and the form of its episcopacy. William Edward Wyatt, in an 1820 sermon, and George Thomas Chapman, in two volumes of sermons published in 1828 and 1836, attempted to prove that Wesley had no intention of establishing an episcopacy. Wyatt went so far as to suggest that THOMAS COKE's overture to Bishop White (see Coke-White correspondence) respecting the reunion of Methodists and Episcopalians was actually instigated by Wesley.

Discussions on Christian unity took concrete form in 1846 with the organization of the Evangelical Alliance. Episcopalians struck a sour note in the moderate buoyancy of the period by publishing a series of "Sketches of Sectarianism," one of which, entitled "Methodism as held by Wesley," ridiculed American Methodism's attempt at self-legitimation. Efforts by Methodist peacemakers to bridge the ecclesiological gulf were repulsed. JOHN P. DURBIN's overtures were turned aside by William Herbert Norris in two tracts published in 1844, the first of which, Methodism and the Church opposed in Fundamentals, was an uncompromising statement of the Episcopal position.

The terms of the Episcopalian-Methodist debate did not alter during the next half century. The exclusive claims of the Episcopal Church were renewed while Methodism's insistence on its right to be called a church was dismissed as pretentious. A hope was repeatedly voiced that Methodists would eschew their errors and return to Mother Church. The American Quarterly Church Review devoted itself in part to this end.

(e) Lutherans and German Reformed. By and large the Lutherans and German Reformed had no axes to grind with Methodism until the 1840s when, like others, they became aroused by the impact of the church's phenomenal growth. The division of Methodism in 1844 was used by editors of many church papers as an occasion for making observations respecting Methodism's tendencies. The editor of the Baltimore-based Lutheran Observer echoed the thoughts of many when he asserted that Methodism's success had led to the loss of its integrity, while its ecclesiastical vision had been blurred by particularism.

The German Reformed found revivalism distasteful and disapproved of Methodists as its most facile practitioners. The representative statement was supplied by John W. Nevin, Reformed theologian, educator and editor, who indicted Methodism for its adherence to the "new measures" in The Anxious Bench (1843).

Post Civil War Period. The organization of the Evangelical Alliance, begun in the 1840s, was effected in 1867. In its wake the old controversies over church union were revived and aged polemists sought to do again what they had done a generation earlier. In 1880 James R. Graves revised his Great Iron Wheel and published The New Great Iron Wheel as a full-scale attack on the M. E. Church, South. Relations with Episcopalians were exacerbated by the conditions for church union set forth in the Lambeth Quadrilateral and by the self-generated proposal that the Protestant Episcopal Church change its name and become the Church of America.

There had been some criticism of Methodism by Roman Catholic writers earlier in the century, but in their controversies Methodists were more often the aggressors. Orestes Brownson took occasional pot shots at Methodism in his Quarterly Review, but it was not until after the Civil War that a Catholic anti-Methodist campaign was mounted. During these years Methodist influence in national affairs was running full tide. Catholics charged Methodists with hypocrisy for criticizing the Catholic way in church-state relations on the one hand while, on the other, doing everything in their power to use the state for their own ends. John Gilmary Shea, writing in The American Catholic Quarterly Review (January, 1882), charged that Methodists had aligned themselves with the Republican Party in a bid to control the government.

Serious disagreements among denominations continued into the 20th century, but the period of nearly chronic abuse was about over. Although considerably attenuated, the stream of anti-Methodist literature did not cease; however, its texture was altered by the introduction of criticism from non-religious sources. One of the earliest representatives of this new genre was Henry B. Dawson, editor of The Historical Magazine. Throughout the 1860s he impugned Methodist participation in the Revolutionary War and sought to discredit its historical literature for a corrupting subjective bias.

From the 1880s until the end of the period Methodism shared fully in the caustic judgments of a group of self-appointed critics-at-large. "The Great Infidel," Colonel Robert C. Ingersoll, lectured and wrote extensively against Methodists for their superstition and repressive influence. In Kansas, Edgar Watson Howe, publisher of The Globe, turned his back on his Methodist upbringing, ridiculed the church and delighted in exposing the shortcomings and peccadilloes of the clergy. From Waco, Texas, William Cowper Brann performed similarly in his leonoclast.

Brann's sardonic tone was reflected in some of the realistic fiction of the day. The most striking instance was Harold Frederic's The Damnation of Theron Ware (1896). Young Ware, a rising preacher, becomes unsettled by his introduction to German higher criticism and the corrupting influence of some "liberated" acquaintances. The resulting moral and spiritual degeneration is paralleled by Ware's emancipation from the Methodist system whose deficiencies are laid bare.

The inheritor of these diverse strands, the one who wove them together into a new pattern, was the 20th century literary and social critic, H. L. Mencken. From the time he aimed his first barbs at the Methodists in his free lance column in the Baltimore Evening Sun until he relinquished the editorship of The American Mercury in 1933, he missed no opportunity to throw dead cats into their sanctuaries. He considered Methodists to be the degenerate descendants of the New England Puritans who, like their bluenose forebears of the 17th century, were actively seeking to control the life and mind of the nation. Mencken's contempt for the Methodists was monumental. With characteristic insouciance he dismissed them with the remark, "So far as I am aware, no man of any genuine distinction in the world today is a Methodist."

Around the "Baltimore Sage" gathered a group of like-minded associates, "Menckenites," who shared not only his prejudices, but his facile, if frequently outrageous, use of the English language. One of these was Herbert Asbury who recounted a sort of spiritual odyssey in Up From Methodism (1926). He scolded the church for its ignorance, narrowness, hypocrisy and arrogance, the embodiment of the worst features of its pioneer bishop, Francis Asbury. Even more damning was Sinclair Lewis' Elmer Gantry, the highly controversial, best-selling novel of 1927. While overdrawn, Gantry emerges as the epitome of ministerial insensitivity, ignorance, superficiality, opportunism and spiritual poverty; in short, a clerical mountebank. Gantry, quick to take the main chance, put aside his Baptist upbringing and became a Methodist when he saw the advantages of having a "really big machine" behind him. It may have been behind him, but he so drove and manipulated it that at the close of the book no one can doubt that he is well on his way to achieving the desire of his heart, the bishop's chair, worthy successor of Bishop Wesley R. Toomis, Lewis' burlesque of the episcopacy.

While Elmer Gantry was a commercial success, there was convincing evidence that the public, no less than the clergy, was tiring of the repeated and unqualified abuse heaped upon organized religion. The nihilism of the Mencken school of criticism precluded any positive suggestions or corrective measures. It was palpably inadequate. Methodists, like other Evangelicals, were aware of the disorders in their own house. Church papers were filled with articles citing this or that shortcoming. Satires were published by Methodist authors which delineated both Methodism's greatness and its smallness. In 1928 DAN B. BRUMMITT released Shoddy, a novel which explored the careers of two ministers, one of whom, through self-seeking and calculation, attained the episcopacy but with it spiritual blight. The other achieved self-fulfillment by freely giving himself to his flock and its needs. Later in the period the dark side of ministerial character and the system of ecclesiastical preferment was reexamined by Gregory Wilson, a pseudonymous author, in The Stained Glass Jungle (1962). This was followed in 1965 by Charles Merrill Smith's How to Become a Bishop Without Being Religious which humorously, yet seriously, raised the question of the place of a genuinely religious man in the structures of the church. A generation separates the productions of the late 1920s and early '30s from those of the mid-'60s. All of them were written at a time when Methodism was searching for a new definition of its life and mission. They sustain the observation that if denominational warfare was coming to an end, there was no cessation of the church's ongoing task of critical self-examination.

ANTI-METHODIST PUBLICATIONS (British). Any vigorous and successful movement which opposes the conventions is likely itself to encounter opposition. This was certainly true of the Methodist Revival. The most permanent monument to this counter-attack is furnished by the various forms of printed polemic, though these were occasionally either encouraged by or resulted in physical persecution by individuals or mobs.

Throughout the eighteenth century the expanding periodical press frequently echoed the chorus of protest against Methodism, mainly by printing unfriendly reviews or letters from correspondents, though occasionally by articles and news items with an anti-Methodist slant. On the whole, however, both newspapers and magazines played fair, publishing the replies which Wesley and his followers sometimes offered in their own defense. Methodists also featured in eighteenth century plays and novels, usually as figures of fun. The most characteristic attack upon them, however, was in the prolific and multifarious pamphlet literature of the century, whether in cultured and reasoned prose, in illiterate invective, or in satirical verse or lampoon.

The general reason for these attacks was that the Methodists dared to be different. Perhaps it can best be summarized in one word, their "ENTHUSIASM," a word then used in its original sense of "inspired by a god," thus implying a presumptive and boastful claim of being nearer to God than was possible to ordinary humans. This enthusiasm was revealed in the Methodists' teaching, with its emphasis upon CONVERSION, upon a divinely implanted personal assurance of SALVATION, upon the possibility of being made perfect in Christian love. It was revealed in their meetings for worship and fellowship, in their exuberant hymn-singing, in the intimate confessions of their "BANDS," in their WATCHNIGHTS and LOVE-FEASTS, so wide open to satire by unfriendly observers. Sometimes the attacks were upon this enthusiasm in general, with only incidental mention of particular practices and leaders; sometimes a reasoned attempt was made to list and document a series of specific charges; too frequently reason gave place to personal abuse of Methodist leaders. Some satire was motivated by a sincere desire to maintain the status quo, as well as by genuine distrust of the unfamiliar; often the motive was to gain a quick penny, a cheap laugh, or personal revenge.

It is difficult to discern any pattern in the fluctuating numbers of anti-Methodist books and pamphlets published during successive years throughout the century. All the evidence is far from collected. Those which were mainly anti-Methodist in their purpose run into hundreds; those with occasional anti-Methodist references or an anti-Methodist slant probably number thousands, a figure enormously swelled by innumerable passages in newspapers and magazines. We deal only with the first class, noting in passing that the standard work on the subject, Richard Green's Anti-Methodist Publications, is very far from complete. After a flood of over sixty publications directed against the Methodists in 1739, there followed a steady flow of about twenty a year for six years, and for the remainder of the century a trickle punctuated by sporadic freshets, as in 1759-61 (allied with the controversy over CHRISTIAN PERFECTION and George Bell's prophecies of the end of the world), in 1768 (when some Calvinist Methodist students were expelled from OXFORD), and in 1775 (mainly in response to Wesley's Calm Address to our American Colonies).

The first printed attack appeared in a London newspaper, Fog's Weekly Journal, of which Number 214 for Dec. 9, 1732 carried a lengthy anonymous letter from Oxford (dated November 5) satirizing the Methodists, who had "made no small stir in Oxford," and suggesting as possible motives for their ascetic practices either penurious envy, "a veil for vice," or "enthusiastic madness and superstitious scruples." This called forth a widely advertised defense by a sympathetic witness (who may have been WILLIAM LAW; though this pamphlet also is anonymous) entitled The Oxford Methodists.

Although Methodist beginnings in the HOLY CLUB later proved of enormous significance, Oxford was a community set apart, largely ignored by the busy world of London and other centers of commerce and fashion. It was some years later, while JOHN WESLEY was still engaged on his disappointing mission to GEORGIA, that one of his pupils, a late recruit to the Oxford Methodists, unwittingly focused the attention of this larger public upon himself. GEORGE WHITEFIELD had experienced an evangelical conversion in 1735, shortly after joining the Holy Club, and had been ordained DEACON in 1736. The following year, eager to second Wesley's efforts in Georgia, and to use the interval of waiting as fruitfully as possible, Whitefield preached widely in his native area of Gloucester, BRISTOL, and Bath, and also in LONDON. He was much more flamboyant and dramatic than either John or CHARLES WESLEY, and almost overnight found himself a popular preacher, though only twenty-two years old. Inevitably the general public began to take sides over this latest orator. Unfortunately he provided fuel for the fire kindled by his enemies by hurrying into print, in 1737 with some sermons, and in 1738 (after a brief visit to Georgia), with insufficiently edited extracts from his journal, which exhibited some of the more effusive and less critical elements of Methodist "enthusiasm."

By this time John Wesley had returned from Georgia, had been introduced by the MORAVIANS to a new religious dimension, and like Whitefield had come to emphasize spiritual regeneration rather than liturgical correctness, personal assurance of salvation rather than rigorous asceticism. In 1739 both men eagerly proclaimed this new teaching, and being frequently denied the pulpits of the parish churches they went to the masses of people who were prepared to hear them in the open air, both in the metropolis and in BRISTOL, then the third largest city in the kingdom.

Both the proclamation of neglected (though completely orthodox) teachings and the readiness to flout ecclesiastical conventions in order to preach the gospel angered the more conservative clergy. Spokesmen for many such was Joseph Trapp, a London clergyman who preached a series of sermons which went through four editions in that climactic year of 1739 under the title of The Nature, Folly, Sin, and Danger of being Righteous Overmuch: with a particular view to the doctrines and practices of certain modern enthusiasts. Edmund Gibson, the Bishop of London, entered the fray with a pastoral letter largely devoted to "A Caution against Enthusiasm." This Whitefield answered, and there followed a chain-reaction of similar pamphlets pro and con. Typical of the more scurrilous productions was The Methodists: an Humorous Burlesque Poem: address'd to the Rev. Mr. Whitefield and his followers: proper to be bound up with his Sermons, and the Journals of his Voyage to Georgia, &c. It will be noted that Whitefield was the focal point of these attacks.

A similar pattern is to be seen in succeeding years, still with Whitefield as the chief target. Although an article in the Gentleman's Magazine for 1739 criticized Wesley by name (or rather in the fashion of those days as "the Rev. Mr. W-s-l-y"), he first drew concentrated attention because of his sermon Free Grace attacking the extreme Calvinist position on predestination—the sermon which also brought about his rift with Whitefield. Through the years that followed others of John Wesley's publications led to pamphlets or books attacking his rather than Whitefield's views, and especially his teaching on Christian perfection. Gradually he came to be recognized as the leading spirit of British Methodism in its various forms.

It was in an attempt to put an end to attacks by thoughtful churchmen who simply did not understand Methodist principles that in 1743 Wesley published his famous apologia, An Earnest Appeal to Men of Reason and Religion. Although this succeeded to a limited extent, it also provoked further attacks, such as The Notions of the Methodists fully Disprov'd, and Remarks on a Book entitled An Earnest Appeal. By 1744 the Methodist Societies were so obviously successful that the Bishop of London moved from general warnings to a specific (though anonymous) attack, in his Observations upon the Conduct and Behaviour of a Certain Sect, usually distinguished by the Name of Methodist, first printed in folio, and frequently reprinted in quarto. This he followed with The Case of the Methodists briefly stated, more particularly in the point of Field-Preaching, which he endeavored to prove violated the provisions of the Toleration Act. Thomas Herring, Archbishop of York, circulated Gibson's attacks, adding his own covering letter. Richard Smalbrooke, Bishop of Lichfield and Conventry, printed his 1744 Visitation Charge to his clergy, in which he castigated the Methodists. These and similar works Wesley answered in A Farther Appeal to Men of Reason and Religion, in three parts.

In spite of Wesley's lengthy apologia, however, criticisms by churchmen continued intermittently throughout most of the century, the same charges being constantly reiterated, occasionally with such force and by such influential leaders that they demanded an answer, even though this perforce covered the same old ground. Thomas Church, Vicar of Battersea and Prebendary of St. Paul's, engaged Wesley in a kind of pamphlet warfare at a consistently thoughtful and scholarly level. In 1747 Gibson issued another Visitation Charge to his clergy directed against Methodism, leading to a rebuttal by Wesley. In 1748 George Lavington, Bishop of Exeter, similarly published an anti-Methodist charge to his clergy, which through a tragedy of errors led to the three progressively expanding parts of his well-known The Enthusiasm of Methodists and Papists Compar'd—which in turn led to a paper warfare both with Wesley and with Whitefield. Of far greater weight was a two-volume work by William Warburton, Bishop of Gloucester: The Doctrine of Grace: or, the Office and Operations of the Holy Spirit vindicated from the Insults of Infidelity and the Abuses of Fanaticism (1763), which again was answered by both Wesley and Whitefield.

The Methodists suffered in the theater also, so that their suspicion of this literary medium was greatly increased. Strolling actors with makeshift lines upon makeshift stages early found them good for a laugh, but in 1760 the Methodists graduated to the legitimate theater and the attention of major playwrights. Their chief opponent was Samuel Foote, who satirized Whitefield as "Dr. Squintum," but also ridiculed the whole Methodist emphasis upon conversion and personal spiritual experience as hypocrisy or superstition. Even Lloyd's Evening Post condemned the "ribald and blasphemous outpourings" of Foote's The Minor, and described the whole thing as "steeped in lewdness." In the following year of 1761 two similar plays appeared—The Register Office, by Joseph Reed, and The Methodist (supposedly a continuation of The Minor), which seems to have been written by Israel Pottinger, but was too libelous for public production. The plays were a far cry from Oliver Goldsmith's She Stoops to Conquer (1773), where Tony Lumpkin's song was merely an incidental and unmalicious piece of satire, even though it did in fact reflect the popular opinion that the Methodists were hypocrites:

When Methodist preachers come down,
A-preaching that drinking is sinful,
I'll wager the rascals a crown,
They always preach best with a skiful.

In 1768 Methodists at Oxford once more became news, though they were Methodists owing allegiance to Whitefield and the COUNTESS OF HUNTINGDON rather than to the Wesleys. Six young men were expelled from St. Edmund Hall by the Vice-Chancellor, Dr. Durell, because they were "enthusiasts, who talked of inspiration, REGENERATION, and drawing nigh to God," holding meetings in private houses to spread these views. In the pamphlet warfare which resulted Whitefield issued his last publication, A Letter to the Reverend Dr. Durell.

The death of Whitefield in 1770 did little to take the pressure off of Wesley. Indeed, because of Wesley's adoption of an Arminian position towards predestination, especially as set forth in the Minutes of his Conference that year, the opposition to him by Calvinist evangelicals increased. His most formidable opponents were AUGUSTUS M. TOPLADY, Richard Hill, and ROWLAND HILL, all men of high sincerity and warm Christian enthusiasm, but bitterly opposed to the doctrinal stand taken by Wesley and his societies. They were angry also because the term "Methodist" originally given to both wings of the revival was increasingly being confiscated by Wesley's followers. Unfortunately much of this Calvinist-Arminian controversial literature degenerated into personal invective, in which Wesley was not completely blameless.

The most dangerous opponent of Wesley's organized Methodism at this period was probably Sir Richard Hill who with his Pietas Oxoniensis had proved the chief proponent of the six expelled Oxford students. In 1772 Hill issued a major attack on Wesley entitled A Review of all the Doctrines taught by the Rev. Mr. John Wesley, following this in 1773 with Logica Wesleiensis: or, the Farrago Double Distilled. Wesley carefully replied to both, and enlisted as the literary champion of his doctrinal views the Rev. JOHN WILLIAM FLETCHER, whose famous Checks to Antinomianism issued from this controversy with the Calvinists.

Another pamphlet controversy flared up in 1775 after Wesley, converted by Dr. Samuel Johnson's support of government policy in his Taxation No Tyranny, made use of Johnson's work in his own well-known pamphlet. Again there was much slinging of mud, especially by Wesley's enemies, witness Toplady's An Old Fox Tarr'd and Feather'd. Occasioned by what is called Mr. John Wesley's Calm Address to our American Colonies.

By now Wesley was in his seventies, but he remained the target for rancorous attacks by younger men, such as that by Rowland Hill entitled Imposture Detected, aimed at the anti-Calvinist slant of Wesley's address at the stonelaying for the New Chapel in City Road, London, in 1777. To 1778-79 belong a series of eight scurrilous poems lampooning Wesley and the London Methodists, mostly having symbolic cartoons for frontispieces. The titles of two are sufficiently descriptive: The Fanatic Saints; or Bedlamites inspired; and Perfection: A Poetical Epistle, Calmly Addressed to the Greatest Hypocrite in England. It is difficult to see how such virulence could be aimed at an old man who in general had by now secured the respect and even affection of multitudes, unless it were motivated by envy. To this later period in Wesley's life belongs also the classic novel satirizing Methodism, the Rev. Richard Graves's The Spiritual Quixote, or the Summer's Ramble of Mr. Geoffrey Wildgoose; a comic romance. (3 volumes, 1772-73). This is comparatively kind in its poking of fun at the Methodists in general rather than at their leader in particular. Smollett's Humphry Clinker (1771) is also devoted to the adventures of Methodists, though he similarly smiles rather than sneers. References to the Methodists in the earlier works of Fielding and Richardson are much more incidental, though also somewhat more critical.

Methodism served to arouse other Christian communities to some of their own spiritual shortcomings, but as most of us are averse to having our faults indicated it was perhaps natural that those thus criticized, no matter how circumspectly or gently, should begin some vigorous faultfinding on their own. This was especially true (as has been noted) with the Church of England. In 1760 the Roman Catholic bishop Richard Challoner published A Caveat against the Methodists, which reached a third edition in 1787. In 1766 "an Independent" noted "the encroachments of the Methodists and the Sandemanians" as important among The Causes and Reasons of the present Declension among the Congregational Churches in London and the Country. In 1770 Gilbert Boyce made public letters which he had exchanged with Wesley about the Baptist position, entitled A Serious Reply to the Rev. Mr. John Wesley in Particular, and to the People called Methodists in General, and in 1788 William Kingsford published his Vindication of the Baptists from charges made by Wesley. In 1778 John Helton issued his Reasons for Quitting the Methodist Society to join the Quakers. In one way and another most of the major religious communities crossed swords with Wesley, though it is nevertheless accurate to claim that he strove to maintain a catholic spirit.

In 1791, within a few months of Wesley's death there appeared a number of exposés seemingly designed to catch the market for topical sensationalism by indulging in the pleasant literary pastime of "debunking" a popular hero. A distant kinsman, John Annesley Colet, issued An Impartial Review of the Life and Writings, Public and Private Character, of the late Rev. Mr. John Wesley, much of which he later admitted was pure invention. Joseph Priestley published a collection of Original Letters by the Rev. John Wesley and his Friends, illustrative of his early history. The letters themselves were genuine, having originally been stolen from Wesley by his jealous wife; nevertheless Priestley's general intention seems to have been to underline his view that Wesley was "strongly tinged with enthusiasm, from the effect of false notions of religion very early imbibed." The well-known bookseller James Lackington—who had been set up in his business by Wesley's pioneer Lending Fund—published his Memoirs, vehemently assailing his benefactors, a fact which he lived to regret, though the recantation in his Confessions was unable to undo the mischief caused. Even the first full length biography of Wesley, John Hampson's Memoirs of the Late Rev. John Wesley (3 volumes, 1791), contained much polemic against him from this disappointed preacher.

After Wesley's death Methodism was never again quite the unified community which it had been during his lifetime, nor ever again so fresh and challenging in its spiritual vigor. Anti-Methodist literature in Britain, therefore, is mainly a phenomenon of the eighteenth century. Not that controversy disappeared. While the parent body imperceptibly accommodated itself to the religious establishment, though at the same time remaining distinct and independent, paper warfare constantly raged between children and parent. Nor was the world outside uninterested in the spirited protests against Wesleyan Methodism from the METHODIST NEW CONNEXION, the PROTESTANT METHODISTS, the WARRENTITES, and the WESLEYAN REFORMERS. Indeed these controversies frequently achieved headlines in the national press, while churchman and non-churchman alike took sides with the protagonists and entered the literary fray. Nevertheless these remained basically internal controversies rather than concerted attacks from without. From time to time local squabbles between the Methodists and an Anglican clergyman or a renegade Methodist preacher would give rise to ephemeral literature unfriendly to Methodism. Frequently individual Methodists or groups of Methodists would find themselves the target for printed abuse because of their association with the temperance movement or the working-class movement, but no branch of Methodism as such could be claimed to stand solidly behind these movements—not even the PRIMITIVE METHODISTS—so that no direct attack on Methodism itself was thereby involved.

This has in general remained the situation until the present time, perhaps with the exception of a movement within the Church of England in the second half of last century which claimed that in their increasing alliance with the Nonconformists the Methodists were deserting their founder, to whose high church ideals the Established Church itself remained loyal. This point of view was set forth both in pamphlets and in more substantial works such as H. W. Holden's John Wesley in Company with High Churchmen (1869), and R. Denny Umlin's John Wesley's Place in Church History (1870) and The Churchman's Life of Wesley (1880). The main spokesman in defense of Methodism was the very capable JAMES H. RIGG.

ANTLIFF, SAMUEL (1823-1892), British Methodist, was the brother of WILLIAM ANTLIFF. He was born at Caunton, Nottinghamshire, on July 5, 1823, and became a PRIMITIVE METHODIST traveling preacher at the age of seventeen at Chesterfield. He was an early advocate of temperance in the denomination. From 1868 to 1880 he served as secretary of the Overseas Missionary Society; in 1873, when he was president of the Primitive Methodist Conference, he was also sent on a deputation to the colonial missions. In 1871 he visited CANADA as a conference representative to the Primitive Methodists there, and in 1876 he again went to Canada and to the United States. He was one of the founders of the Primitive Methodist boys' boarding school, Elmfield College, at YORK, and acted as its secretary. In 1891 he was elected a delegate to the ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE held in Washington, though illness prevented his attendance. He died in 1892.

ANTLIFF, WILLIAM (1813-1884), British Methodist, was born at Caunton in Nottinghamshire of humble parents. He became the best-known figure in the middle period of PRIMITIVE METHODISM. Beginning to preach at sixteen, he entered the Primitive Methodist itinerancy in 1830 and served for thirty-one years in various circuits, including an outstanding period (1834-35) at NOTTINGHAM, when the circuit was threatened with collapse by the secession of a number of local preachers and about three hundred of the members. Antliff organized a town mission in the spring of 1836, sometimes preaching four times on a Sunday, usually in the open air, and succeeded in restoring the confidence of the circuit. He served as Connexional Editor (1862-67) and as principal of the SUNDERLAND THEOLOGICAL INSTITUTE (1868-81), the first Primitive Methodist experiment in theological college training. He was chosen as president of the Primitive Methodist Conference in 1863 and 1865. He published The Life of the Venerable Hugh Bourne (1872). An outstanding preacher and a man of skilled judgment in legal issues, he received the D.D. degree from WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, Middletown, Conn., in 1870. He died Dec. 7, 1884.

ANTWERP, Belgium, an ancient, historic city and port with a 1966 population of 243,426, has two Methodist churches of considerable influence.

Antwerp Methodist Church (French) of the Belgium Conference was organized in 1922 in an old German church, 11 rue Bex, and was moved to 8 rue Coundin in 1936. The congregation joined the Flemish Methodist community, moving into new premises, Verdussenstraat 40, in 1966. Pastors have been W. Thomas, 1922-47; A. Wemers, 1948-49; W. Thomas, 1949-53; J. Wemers, 1954-55; A. Lheureux, 1956-61; and M. Vandezande, since 1961.

Antwerp Methodist Church (Flemish) of the Belgium Conference was organized downtown, at 29 St. Jansplein, in 1925. As stated above, this community with the French Methodist community moved into the new premises on Verdussenstraat 40, in 1966. The pastors of this church have been A. Parmentier, 1925-37; Th. Kerremans, 1937-38; W. Thomas, 1939-44; J. Janssens, 1945-49; Cl. Bruggeman, 1940-50; M. Vannieuwenhuysse, 1951-61; M. Vandezande since 1962.

AOTEA, early NEW ZEALAND Wesleyan mission station, was situated at Rao Rao Kawere on the shores of the Aotea Harbor on the west coast of the North Island. Mission work was established there in 1840, by H. H. TURTON. This came as a direct result of urgent representations made by local Maoris direct to the superintendent, J. Waterhouse, while he was visiting Kawhia. Turton was later replaced by GIDEON SMALES, who labored there with considerable success for twelve years.

For some years during the Maori War period of the 1860's the work was continued by CORT H. SCHNACKENBERG, who later based his work on Kawhia.

APOSTOLIC METHODIST CHURCH. The Apostolic Methodist Church was organized in 1932 in Loughman, Fla., by E. H. Crowson and a few others. In 1931, Crowson, an elder in the FLORIDA CONFERENCE of the M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH, had been located (deposed from the itinerant ministry) for "unacceptability." The new group published a "Discipline," rejecting episcopal authority and charging that the M. E. Church, South, had departed from its standards of belief and holiness. The pre-millennial return of Jesus and holiness of a "second blessing" type are emphasized. In 1933, F. L. Crowson, the father of E. H. Crowson, was tried by the Florida Conference and suspended. He withdrew and joined his son's new group.

The group has only a few congregations and less than a hundred members. It operates the Gospel Tract Club at Zephyr Hills, Fla. It is not listed in the 1969 Yearbook of American Churches, Lauris B. Whitman, editor.

HENRY G. APPENZELLER

APPENZELLER, HENRY GERHARD (1858-1902), one of three pioneer Methodist missionaries to KOREA, was born in Souderton, Pa., Feb. 6, 1858. His parents were German Lutherans of the Appenzell people of SWITZERLAND. He taught school briefly, joined the First Methodist Church of Lancaster, Pa., and entered Franklin and Marshall College at the age of twenty. He was licensed to preach, served a small mission church, and then entered DREW THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY in 1882.

While in Drew he became interested in mission work in JAPAN and Korea. On Dec. 17, 1884 he married Ella J. Dodge and shortly after went to Korea. He completed his seminary work in January, was ordained by Bishop C. H. FOWLER in SAN FRANCISCO, Feb. 3, 1885, and set sail for Japan.

Arriving in SEOUL in June, 1885, with government permission to teach but not to preach, he opened a school, to which the King gave the name of Pai Chai Hak Dang. In 1886 he was able to hold the first public service for Koreans. He founded First Methodist Church, Chung Dong, Seoul and was its pastor for years, completing the first foreign style church building in 1898. He also served as superintendent of his mission until 1892. In those days of arduous travel he made two trips to Pyongyang, one to the Manchurian border at Wi-Ju, one to Kongju and Pusan, covering six of the eight provinces and some 2,000 miles.

He served on the Bible Committee and Board of Translators, and for many years was president of Korean Religious Tract Society. He wrote and translated many tracts and was manager of the bookstore where they were sold. He helped establish a Methodist Publishing House. For four years he edited and published a weekly journal, the Korean Christian Advocate. With GEORGE HEBER JONES he edited and published a monthly journal, The Korean Repository, an English language authority on Korean matters. He was a charter member and for four years pastor of Seoul Union Church (English language).

So strenuous was his activity that he grew old fast, was gray at 40, and went on his second furlough in 1900, "worn in features, an old man though in middle life." Urged to take a church in America, he felt the need in Korea and returned in 1901. The next June, en route to a meeting of the Bible translators at Mokpo, he was lost at sea in a collision about 100 miles south of Chemulpo, June 11, 1902.

Three of his four children gave a total of sixty-eight years to missionary service in Korea. A son, Henry Dodge, was for twenty years head of the school his father founded. A daughter, Alice Rebecca, the first American Christian child born in Korea, was for years president of EWHA COLLEGE. A daughter Mary also taught at Ewha.

APPLETON, WISCONSIN, U.S.A. First Church began in 1848. At that time only fourteen people were banded together in the first church service, held in what was known as the "Johnston Shanty." But each of the fourteen was determined to do his part toward organized church life and church membership grew rapidly.

With labor and sacrifice they erected a small building on College Avenue, the town's main street. It burned within a few years. Undaunted, they set out to construct a new building, on Lawrence Street. For several years they were unable to get enough funds together to build beyond the basement wall. But they roofed that over in a crude manner, and there they held services. Finally, in 1878, a modest building was completed.

In the 1920's the Lawrence Street building was sold; the membership had outgrown its quarters, and the present edifice was built. The Centennial was observed in 1948, with a week of devotional meetings and pageantry. Appleton Methodists added a splendid new educational unit in 1964, containing fifteen classrooms, a spacious reception lounge, a combined fellowship hall and dining room, and a well-equipped kitchen.

Many dedicated pastors have served First Church through the years. One of the recent, RALPH TAYLOR ALTON, left here to become bishop of the WISCONSIN area in 1960.

APPLEYARD, JOHN WHITTLE (1814-1874), Wesleyan missionary in SOUTH AFRICA, was born at Cirencester, Glos., England on June 15, 1814, entered the ministry in 1838 and came to South Africa in 1840. He married Sarah Ann, eldest daughter of JAMES ARCHBELL, on April 13, 1841.

Appleyard possessed outstanding linguistic gifts and acquired a knowledge of Hebrew, Greek, Latin, Syriac, and Chaldean. He commenced the study of Xhosa soon after his arrival in South Africa and in 1850 published a major work which included an authoritative Xhosa Grammar and a pioneer comparative study of the Bantu languages (The Kafir Language, Grahamstown and London, 1850). Even more significant was his work as a Bible translator. Earlier missionaries had translated portions of the Bible into Xhosa, but the first New Testament (1846) and complete Bible (1859) were the work of Appleyard, with some assistance from four other missionaries. Between 1860 and 1864 he revised the entire Xhosa Bible singlehanded and supervised its printing for the BRITISH AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY. This revised version of 1864 came under fire from missionaries of other societies and an interdenominational committee was appointed to produce a new translation in 1868. Appleyard was a member but died before the revision of the New Testament was complete. Although the new translation (published in 1888) was of a high standard, many Xhosa speakers still prefer Appleyard's translation which is closer to the spoken language. In addition to his translations, he composed a number of hymns and several religious works in Xhosa.

Appleyard had trained as a printer and was appointed editor of the Wesleyan Mission Press, first at King William's Town, and after 1854 at Mount Coke. His health was never robust and he died at King William's Town on April 4, 1874.

APPOINTMENT. In Methodist nomenclature an "appointment" is the station, or pastoral charge, or other position in the church to which a preacher is formally assigned by a bishop, or in non-episcopal Methodism by the established appointive power. "Reading the appointments" has been traditionally the final act of any annual conference in Episcopal Methodism, and when the bishop reads the appointments, such formal, public pronouncement "stations" the preachers for the ensuing year. Disciplinary regulations governing the making of the appointments, and many other matters having to do with these, are carefully outlined.

The reading of the appointment by the bishop fixes these appointments, and no parchment, or other certification, is ever demanded either by the minister who goes, or the charge to which he is appointed. By Methodist common-law this public reading of appointments takes the place of anything like a contract or contractual relationship which other denominations necessarily use in their pastor and congregation relationship.

ARAYA, SAMUEL (1917-), Chilean pastor and theological professor, was born in SANTIAGO. He was educated at the Liceo of CHILE, where he earned his secondary school diploma in sciences in 1936. He then studied at the Facultad Evangelica de Teologia (Union Theological Seminary) in BUENOS AIRES, ARGENTINA; and, as a CRUSADE SCHOLAR, earned the Th.M. degree at Union Theological Seminary, New York, in 1960.

He joined the CHILE ANNUAL CONFERENCE in 1941 and served as pastor of churches in Chile and in New York City. In 1963 he was appointed director of the Methodist Biblical Seminary in Chile, which in 1965 was incorporated into the Evangelical Theological Community, an interdenominational seminary in Santiago, with Araya as one of its professors.

He has served on a number of boards of The Methodist Church in Chile and presently (1967) is executive secretary of the General Board of the annual conference as well as chairman of its Committee on Ecumenical Relationships. He holds membership in the Latin American Association of Theological Institutions.

ARCH, JOSEPH (1826-1919), British Methodist, was born in Barford, Warwickshire. He was a pioneer in the movement to organize agricultural workers in a trade union, and in 1872 he founded and became president of the National Agricultural Labourers' Union. He was a PRIMITIVE METHODIST LOCAL PREACHER, and often seemed to combine his two major interests of preaching in village chapels and organizing his fellow laborers to improve their conditions. He became convinced that the most effective way of doing this was through politics rather than through the unions. He entered Parliament as a Liberal M.P. for Norfolk, North-West, in 1885. He was defeated at the time of the Irish Home Rule Bill in 1886, but returned to the House in 1892, and sat until 1902.

ARCHBELL, JAMES (1798-1866), pioneer Wesleyan Methodist missionary in SOUTH AFRICA, was born in England in 1798. He married Elizabeth Haigh in Leeds in 1818 and joined BARNABAS SHAW at Leliefontein (Lily Fountain) in the same year. After two unsuccessful attempts to establish stations in Bushmanland and Great Namaqualand, he travelled as far north as Walvis Bay and volunteered for service in that area if a colleague could be found. Instead he was sent to the Bechuana Mission in 1825, and with T. L. Hodgson endeavored to revive the work among the Barolong which had been abandoned by SAMUEL BROADBENT. Tribal warfare forced them to withdraw from the Transvaal and settle at Platberg, near present-day Warrenton. The population at this station soon became too great for the resources of soil and water. In May 1833, Archbell and JOHN EDWARDS, accompanied by a group of tribesmen, trekked southeast in search of a more favorable situation. Later that year they peaceably conducted a migration of 12,000 men, women, and children to the Thaba 'Nchu area where they obtained a grant of land from the Basuto Chief, Moshoeshe, and other local chiefs. The natives were located in tribal groups on various stations, Archbell himself settling among the Barolong at Thaba 'Nchu. In 1836-37 this station became the headquarters of the Afrikaner Voortrekkers who were abandoning the Cape Colony and seeking independence. Archbell exercised a useful pastoral and preaching ministry among them and was asked by some to become their minister. Nothing came of this invitation, although Archbell himself wished to accept it. His linguistic studies issued in the publication of the first Tswana Grammar and New Testament Translations at Grahamstown in 1838.

After a period in England, Archbell became the Methodist pioneer in NATAL. He visited Port Natal (Durban) in 1841 and returned with his family when the British forces took control of the port in April 1842. In December 1847, he resigned from the ministry after a clash with the mission authorities.

Archbell subsequently became a leading figure in Natal society. He farmed, served on the Natal Land Commission, ran a newspaper, founded a bank and the Natal Agricultural Society, became a member of the first Natal Legislative Council and was repeatedly mayor of Pietermaritzburg. He died in Pietermaritzburg in March, 1866, and was buried in the Wesleyan Cemetery.

ARCHER, ALBERT ERNEST (1878-1949). Canadian physician, surgeon, and hospital administrator, was born in Campbellford, Ontario, CANADA, the son of a Canadian Methodist minister. He attended high school in Hamilton and St. Catharines, Ontario. After teaching school for a time, he attended the University of Toronto, graduating in medicine in 1902. After further training, in 1903 he began to practice in the Northwest Territories at Star, forty miles northeast of Edmonton. Here he continued a work among newly immigrated Galician farmers, begun under Methodist mission auspices in 1901 by H. R. Smith. In 1904, Archer married Jessie Walker Valens of Lucknow, Ontario, a graduate in nursing of the Hamilton General Hospital. At first, patients were treated in the Archer home, which was removed in 1906 to the village of Lamont, on the building of the Alberta Northern Railway to that point.

In 1911, a committee to organize a hospital was formed under the chairmanship of Archer. With the assistance of the Board of Home Missions of the Methodist Church of Canada, a fifteen-bed hospital was built and equipped in 1912, and Archer became the first superintendent. The hospital has continued to grow over the years, with the organization of a school of nursing, an unusual feature in a rural hospital. A tribute to its standing and efficiency was the recognition of the Lamont Public Hospital as standard by the American College of Surgeons in 1923, the first nonurban hospital to be so recognized in Canada at the time.

As a public-spirited citizen, Archer served on the Lamont School Board, the village council, and one term as mayor. In medical associations he worked as president of the Alberta Medical Association, on the executive of the Canadian Medical Association and as its president in 1942, as president of the Alberta Hospital Association, and from 1945 to 1948 as economic adviser to the Canadian Medical Association. He was a pioneer in Canada in the field of public health, and served as a member of a committee of seven advising the federal government on health problems.

He was a fellow of the American College of Surgeons, of the Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons (Canada). He received honorary doctorates from the Universities of Alberta and Manitoba. He was decorated with the O.B.E. and subsequently with the C.B.E. After he died in 1949, the Lamont Public Hospital was named the Archer Memorial Hospital to honor this rural doctor who was in advance of his time.

RAYMOND L. ARCHER

ARCHER, RAYMOND LEROY (1887-1970), American missionary to MALAYA and bishop for six years, was born Oct. 31, 1887, in Tyler County, W. Va. He held the A.B., A.M., and Ph.D. degrees from the University of Pittsburgh, DREW, and Hartford, respectively. He married Edna Priscilla Caye, Wilmerding, Pa., on April 27, 1916. Admitted on trial in the PITTSBURGH CONFERENCE in 1909, he served three charges, and in 1911 transferred to the Malaya Conference where for the next 31 years he ministered as a missionary in JAVA, SUMATRA, and Malaya. At different times he served as pastor, educator, treasurer-district superintendent, mission superintendent, honorary vice-consul in Medan, Sumatra, and chaplain to British troops. Returning to the United States in 1942, he was for eight years attached to the BOARD OF MISSIONS, first as assistant treasurer and then as an associate secretary.

Archer was a delegate to the 1936 and 1944 General Conferences and to the Uniting Conference in 1939. He was elected bishop in 1950, the first westerner so honored by the Southeast Asia Central Conference. He continued in office six years, supervising the work in BURMA, Malaya, SARAWAK (Borneo), and Sumatra. During his administration there was growth of native leadership in the conference, and the local churches gave greater support to their pastors and to the conference home missionary program. In 1955 entire villages were under regular instruction in Christianity. In 1935 Archer published Mohammedan Mysticism in Sumatra. In 1950 he said, "Christianity has achieved more success among the Moslems in INDONESIA than anywhere in the world."

After the expiration of his term as bishop, Archer served two years, 1957-59, as professor of missions at Drew. He then moved to PITTSBURGH where he died, July 3, 1970.

ARCHITECTURE. The Octagon Form in Methodism. As is well known, JOHN WESLEY favored the octagonal form for his preaching houses or chapels. "Eight-sided chapels have no corners for the devil to hide in," whimsical observers were quoted as saying. A more rational explanation is that two centuries before "functional" became the shibboleth in a certain popular architectural school, Wesley saw advantages both esthetic and practical in what he called "octagon chapels"—advantages recognized latterly by "churches-in-the-round."

Eight-sided baptistries had been erected by early Christians, and the mausoleum of Constantine followed that pattern as did many chapter houses of medieval monasteries. Sir Christopher Wren envisioned its superior possibilities for congregational worship, and after the London fire of 1666 incorporated it in his unused Great Model Plan of 1673 for rebuilding St. Paul's Cathedral. English Presbyterians built an octagon-shaped house of worship in 1756 at Colegate, and the Anglicans used this architectural form in a Gothic church erected at Hartwell, Bucks, in 1753.

Wesley's enthusiasm for octagon chapels dates from Nov. 23, 1757. Of Norwich he wrote in his Journal, "I was shown Dr. Taylor's new meetinghouse, perhaps the most elegant one in Europe. It is eight-square, built of the finest brick, with sixteen sash-windows below, as many above, and eight skylights in the dome, which, indeed, are purely ornamental. The inside is finished in the highest taste."

His eye was attracted by the esthetic, but his alert mind reached for the concept later to be phrased by Louis Sullivan: "Form follows function." To Nonconformists, both in England and America, places for worship were "meeting-houses," but to logos-centered Wesley, his chapels always were "preaching-houses." Spreading the Word by preaching was the essence of Methodism, and he saw how the octagonal pattern gave the speaker a central position with acoustical advantages that came to full flower in the rapport of "singing Methodists." Lighting and ventilation were facilitated by windows; heating was economical. Moreover, semi-circular seating gave worshippers a visual and physical awareness of "togetherness," augmenting the friendly concern for others so characteristic of early Wesleyan societies.

There were economic advantages in constructing eight walls identical except for doors and windows and inexpensive construction stood high in Wesley's scale of values. "Let all our chapels," he wrote, "be built plain and decent, but not more expensive than is absolutely unavoidable: otherwise the necessity of raising money will make rich men necessary to us. But if so, we must be dependent upon them, yea, and governed by them. And then farewell to the Methodist discipline, if not doctrine, too."

Thus to John Wesley the octagonal form for preaching-houses was functional and helped Methodism achieve its purpose. His conviction shows in his answer to Question No. 74 in THE LARGE MINUTES, "Is any thing (further) advisable with regard to building?"

"1. Build all preaching-houses, where the ground will permit, in the octagon form. It is best for the voice, and on many accounts more commodious than any other.

"2. Why should not any octagon house be built after the model of Yarm? . . . Can we find any better model?"

"3. Let the roof rise only one third of its breadth: this is the true proportion.

"4. Have doors and windows enough, and let all the windows be sashes, opening downward . . ."

The Methodist chapel at Yarm, Northumberland, which he noted with favor, was built in 1764. It was one of 14 that Wesley was associated with from 1761 to 1776, and today is the oldest existing Methodist building of octagonal form. Wesley first preached in it on April 24, 1764 and described it as "by far the most elegant Methodist preaching-house in England." Visitors today see it with a gallery which was added in 1815, and a few other changes including a porch and staircase extension added in 1873. It seats 320, though before the gallery was added it could accommodate a scant 200.

Two other Wesley octagon chapels are still in Methodist use: Heptonstall, Yorkshire (1764) and Arbroath, Scotland (1772). The former is built high on a hillside and, says George W. Dolbey in The Architectural Expression of Methodism, "still preserves in its interior much of its original Georgian simplicity." The Arbroath chapel is "the least spoiled by alterations and accretions," though several of the old square-headed Georgian windows have been replaced by stained glass.

The spread of octagon chapels in England was slowed by the paradox of Methodism's growth, for this shape had its own practical limitation. It was difficult to add to a chapel with eight sides. Light is cast on this problem by Wesleyan history at Bradford: "The doors of the Octagon Chapel were for ten or twelve weeks scarcely ever closed by day or night, one party of worshippers frequently waiting without till those within had fulfilled the appointed hour of service."

Although other architectural forms superseded the octagonal in British Methodism, it was not forgotten. The "Pepper Box Chapel," officially known as Wesley Church at Higher Tranmere, Birkenhead, erected in 1862, was squared on the first floor but was a true octagon on the second. Dolbey notes that "at least an echo" of octagon chapels can be detected internally in several large Methodist central halls built toward the close of the 19th century.

The octagon tradition seems never to have rooted itself in early American Methodism. One reason undoubtedly was that Bishop THOMAS COKE, doing a hasty job of condensing The Large Minutes after the 1784 CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE at LOVELY LANE CHAPEL in Baltimore, omitted the answer to Question No. 74, quoted above, from A Form of Discipline which was of course for American consumption. Pertinent also was the octagon form's inability to cope with the rapid growth so characteristic of dynamic American Methodism. But a limiting factor even more typical of America was improvisation, the settler's ingenuity for using whatever was at hand to suit his purpose. Thus, stones and logs and sod became frontier churches or, like as not, the circuit rider adapted a barn, a house, or any available building to his use. The multisided Fort Pitt Blockhouse, for example, served Pittsburgh Methodists in 1764, and in the 20th century the unused octagonal tower of the skyscraping CHICAGO TEMPLE (First Methodist Church) was transformed into the Chapel-in-the-Sky, favored for Easter Services—and altarminded couples.

Some historians of American ecclesiastical architecture may detect influence of Wesley's octagon chapel upon the over maligned Akron Plan with its central pulpit. The relationship is clearer factually, if not historically, with churches designed under the aegis of 20th-century functionalism. Steel trusses and fabricated beams, the science of acoustics and ventilation, and realignment of liturgy to have more effective communication have influenced certain planners, such as Gabriel Loire of Chartres, toward the form once espoused by Sir Christopher Wren. And John Wesley.

Peter Hammond, English author of Liturgy and Architecture (1960), reports "the octagon once again is being adopted as a suitable architectural expression of the liturgy and life of the twentieth-century Christian Church, especially in Europe." He cites a new Methodist church at Sale, Cheshire, as "one interesting reversion to Wesley's favorite shape," adding that "some of the merits of the octagon are as relevant in the twentieth century as they were in the eighteenth."

In America the trend is indigenous. As early as 1914 at CEDAR RAPIDS, IOWA, Methodists commissioned Louis Sullivan, long before he was hailed as the "father of functionalism," to design a new church for Saint Paul's. Though the ecclesiastical vogue of that era was "Gothic in Pantalets," he created a "contemporary" building with pews arched about a central pulpit in a semi-circular sanctuary. Bishop W. A. QUAYLE characterized it as "a poem and a workshop," while Bishop EDGAR BLAKE prophesied that it would "set the ideal for years to come."

Noteworthy examples of American Methodist churches following the swing toward the octagonal or in-the-round form, usually with central pulpit, include: St. Luke's, OKLAHOMA CITY; Hollywood Riviera, near LOS ANGELES; Bloomfield, CONNECTICUT; Good Shepherd, PARK RIDGE, ILLINOIS; St. Stephen, Mesquite, TEXAS.

American Methodist architecture presently appears to be on the march—seeking fulfillment of purpose in form and structural materials. And as purpose is clarified, the trend turns from "Byzantine Bastard" and "Gothic Tunnel" of yesteryear to "contemporary" forms with facilities for preaching and audience participation. This is a trail trod by John Wesley.

Further Development in Britain. The spontaneous origin, rapid growth, and ecclesiastical development of British Methodism find distinctive expression in the plan, form, and style of its buildings. THE FOUNDERY, LONDON (1739), the New Room, BRISTOL (1739), and the Newcastle Orphan House (1743) were religious community centers of a movement within the Church of England. The minor stream of eighteenth-century chapels which developed from improvised preaching places was much influenced by Wesley himself, and reflected the rectangular auditory plan typical of eighteenth-century Anglicanism. A number of "broader-than-long" chapels owed their inspiration to the Dissenting meetinghouse, and possibly to MORAVIAN influence. Of Wesley's fourteen octagons, only three remain: Yarm (1764), Heptonstall (1764), both in Yorkshire; and Arbroath, Scotland (1772). The oldest Methodist chapel in continuous use for worship is Newbiggin-in-Teesdale (1760). These not-unpleasant buildings were simple and were constructed of local materials.

Wesley's Chapel, CITY ROAD, London (1778) epitomizes the ecclesiastical development of Methodism. It became the norm for large chapels for half a century, and the ex-architect minister, William Jenkins, made it his model. Only four chapels of this type today retain the once-popular arrangement of the Communion space in a recess behind the central pulpit.

Large, early nineteenth-century chapels were erected in many towns like Sheffield, NEWCASTLE-UPON-TYNE, Redruth, Stockport, Birkenhead, Truro, and Derby. These were all spacious, rectangular, well-fenestrated buildings, each seating over a thousand people, and were usually of local stone, though brick was sometimes effectively used.

Mainly through FREDERICK JAMES JOBSON, another minister who had been an architect, the Gothic Revival affected Methodism from the 1840's, at first superficially and then in plan and structure. From 1850 to 1870 sixty percent of new churches were medieval in emphasis, though the detail was usually inferior owing to financial stringency. Renaissance Norman and Romanesque churches were also erected in this period, some of them of creditable design.

Methodism shared in the general architectural confusion of the last quarter of the nineteenth century and the early twentieth century. French, Lombardic, Italianate, and Art Nouveau strains mingled with Renaissance and Medieval. Internally, pews were modernized and simple pulpits were replaced by grandiose pine or mahogany rostra. Near the end of the century, several large, well-massed and articulated Gothic churches were built. The FORWARD MOVEMENT brought the urban central missions, mostly in a modified Renaissance idiom. The modernized Gothic of the early twentieth century heralded a simpler style based on materials and function. Many churches transferred the pulpit to one side and placed the Communion table at the "east" end of the chancel.

As Methodism tardily emulated Anglican medievalism in the nineteenth century, so in the twentieth it is slowly following universal modern trends in ecclesiastical design. However, recent developments indicate an increasing vitality of architectural expression and a greater willingness to experiment structurally, aesthetically, and internally.

Development in the United States. Methodist church architecture in the United States has followed the general patterns of Protestant church building since the eighteenth century. It is indicative that the oldest Methodist church building in the U.S.A., ST. GEORGE'S, PHILADELPHIA (1769), was constructed originally for another denomination. The chief distinctive character of Methodist church buildings has been the communion rail reflecting the Anglican heritage.

The earliest Methodist meetinghouses were simple structures, ornamentation being considered less important than the accommodation of many worshippers. Balconies frequently increased the capacity of the structure. Representative buildings were the original LOVELY LANE CHAPEL, BALTIMORE, (1774), BARRATT'S CHAPEL, Kent County, DELAWARE (1780), and the original JOHN STREET CHURCH, NEW YORK CITY (1768).

In the period following the Revolution, Methodism began its rapid expansion westward. Frequently log cabins were erected such as REHOBOTH CHURCH, Union, WEST VIRGINIA (1785), said to be the first Methodist church built west of the Alleghenies. Circuit riders preached wherever they found an audience, in the out-of-doors as well as in private homes. Temporary pulpits and rough shelters were erected for camp meetings. In more settled regions, churches were erected following the prevailing Federal style. First Church, LYNN, MASSACHUSETTS (1791) followed this style which was favored by both Congregationalists and Episcopalians in the northeast. Less pretentious frame buildings appeared as frontier regions became more settled. MCKENDREE CHAPEL, Cape Girardeau County, MISSOURI (1806), is a fine example.

As the nineteenth-century battle of styles progressed, Methodism followed popular taste though often with a slight time lapse. The Federal style gave way to the Greek revival, an idiom followed by many Methodist churches in the eastern half of the country such as First Church, Edgartown, Mass. (1842). The period shortly before the Civil War saw the popularity of Gothic revival architecture, a fashion imported from England, while the period after the war saw a fascination with the Romanesque developed by H. H. Richardson, as in Harvard-Epworth Church, Cambridge. This was a period when great efforts at church extension were made and hundreds of churches were erected each year. A distinct Methodist contribution of the time was the Akron plan, developed by Lewis Miller in First Church, Akron, Ohio. Superbly adapted to the church life of the times, it was characterized by a large hall for Sunday school opening exercises with small classrooms on a horseshoe balcony. The hall opened by sliding doors into the "auditorium" where pulpit, choir, and organ pipes were in the corner of a room with curved pews and a sloping floor.

The twentieth century brought more sophistication. A fondness for renaissance buildings gave way to the second Gothic revival, popularized by such men as Ralph Adams Cram in Trinity Church, DURHAM, N. C. Increasingly Georgian revival buildings competed for attention as in

First Church, Chapel Hill, N. C. The stylistic revivals were championed within Methodism by Elbert M. Conover.

After World War II contemporary architecture gradually took the lead within Methodism, anticipated by Frank Lloyd Wright's Chapel at FLORIDA SOUTHERN COLLEGE, Lakeland. Recent years have seen a shift from the divided chancel arrangement to various experiments. Based upon new theological currents and biblical studies, central type arrangements have become more and more common as in Englewood Church, Chicago (1963).

ARCHIVES, UNITED METHODIST. The 1964 GENERAL CONFERENCE of The Methodist Church adopted a resolution calling on the COUNCIL OF BISHOPS to appoint a committee to formulate an archival policy for the church and to report to the 1968 General Conference. An Archives Committee was composed of: ALBEA GOBOLD, chairman; Elizabeth Hughey, secretary; HENRY M. BULLOCK, Eleanore Cammack, and Homer L. Calkin. JOHN H. NESS, JR., archivist of the EVANGELICAL UNITED BRETHREN CHURCH, was included as an advisory member.

In 1965 the officers of the Association of Methodist Historical Societies of The Methodist Church and the officers of The Historical Society of The Evangelical United Brethren Church were formed a committee by the Joint Commission on Church Union to prepare a draft on the Commission on Archives and History for the Discipline of the proposed UNITED METHODIST CHURCH. The committee adopted the archival statement prepared by the Archives Committee for The Methodist Church. Thus an archival policy for The United Methodist Church was incorporated in the Plan of Union and adopted in principle with the rest of the Plan at the joint meeting of the General Conferences in Chicago in Nov., 1966.

As written the legislation on archives requires the General Commission on Archives and History to establish a central archives for The United Methodist Church and such regional archives as in its judgment may be needed. Archives, as distinguished from libraries, house not primarily books but documentary materials such as records, minutes, journals, diaries, reports, pamphlets, letters, papers, manuscripts, maps, photographs, audio-visuals, recordings, and any other items regardless of physical form or characteristic which pertain to the activities and the history of The United Methodist Church. The bishops, General Conference officers, general boards, commissions, committees, and agencies of the church are directed to deposit official minutes or journals in the archives and to transfer correspondence, records, papers, and other archival materials from their offices to the archives when they no longer have operational usefulness. Obviously the purpose of archives is to preserve the documents which will serve in later years as the sources for writing the history of the church.

At the time of church union in 1968 there were few archival items in the possession of the Association of Methodist Historical Societies. Many libraries within The Methodist Church had small archival holdings of that denomination. The bulk of material had either been destroyed through the general church agencies or former officers.

In view of church union and following a program of promotion, Evangelical United Brethren archival records were being transferred to the central depository of that denomination. With the organization of the Commission on Archives and History these archives were incorporated into the holdings of that agency.

An archival committee was formed by the new Commission to contact the uniting agencies and urge the transfer of inactive records. By mid-1969 this transfer was being duly effected in several instances.

A careful study was conducted during the 1968-72 quadrennium to consider a central location for the United Methodist Archives. The present locations, LAKE JUNALUSKA, N. C. for Methodists, and DAYTON, OHIO for Evangelical United Brethren, were continued by the Commission on Archives and History.

ARCHIVES AND HISTORICAL RECORDS. The organized Methodist churches of the world have each shown care in preserving their own historical records and archives. The way in which this has been done, and the official archival repositories for the large organized Methodisms, are sometimes noted in the history of the respective churches in this Encyclopedia, as in the UNITED CHURCH OF CANADA and THE UNITED METHODIST CHURCH in America. The following list will indicate the name and address of the Archives of the various branches of Methodism.

Cora Carlock Chapel, and a children's building, altogether worth nearly a million dollars. The church now (1968) has a membership of 3,314. It maintains a strong missionary program, and its care of the sick and shut-in members is outstanding.

Youth are a primary concern. There is a strong program of teaching, worship, counseling, and recreation. This church is widely known for its music and worshipful services. These are broadcast each Sunday.

Among the pastors have been G. B. Winton, R. E. L. Morgan, Ashley Chappell, and Harry S. DeVore.

AREA, EPISCOPAL. An episcopal area in THE UNITED METHODIST CHURCH, U.S.A. is comprised of the annual conference or conferences assigned to a bishop for residential and presidential supervision. In Methodist nomenclature an area would roughly correspond to the word "diocese," as this was and is in the Episcopal churches, though the usual Methodist "area" is far larger than any diocese might possibly be.

The "area system" came about as the pristine itinerant general superintendency of the early bishops came to be modified by the great growth of the church. It was found impossible, even in the time of MCKENDREE and ROBERTS, for the bishops to continue to travel together, and there naturally grew up the custom of assigning different conferences to different bishops for visitation and presidency. By a transition easy to follow, it came about in time that the same man was assigned again and again to the same conference or conferences, and he determined his residence in relationship to his conference assignment or area. Bishops, like successful pastors, which they were, did not like to "move" too often.

The area system came to be more firmly established in the M. E. CHURCH than in the M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH. In the Southern Church the bishops assigned each other about among individual conferences with quite frequent changes as the need might be felt for a bishop's particular type of superintendency. In the M. E. Church less of general episcopal itinerating was done, and the bishops usually remained for longer times in charge of each particular area.

It should be noted that "areas" grew up about, and were named for, cities, as they often are today in United Methodism. This is in contrast to the usage of the Protestant Episcopal Church which names its dioceses after a region.

The GENERAL CONFERENCE has provided that a bishop may not remain in one area longer than twelve years, although there has never been a formal test of the constitutional power of the General Conference to station a bishop. The area system lends itself to administration in a very apt way, and as the bishop is the chief executive of the conferences he supervises, he may put into effect the program of the church in his own area with due regard to all particular necessities and special emphases. The administrative pattern called for by the area system in the M. E. Church, and to which its bishops and people were accustomed, made it more difficult for the JURISDICTIONAL system to be put into effect in the conferences of the former M. E. Church after union in 1939 than was the case in the conferences of the former M. E. Church, South. This difference was something commented upon, following Union, by those who carefully studied Methodist polity. It in part explains the failure of the Jurisdictional system to establish itself as strongly in the ARGENTINA is the largest Spanish-speaking country of South America and the second largest on the continent. The country's 1,072,700 square miles stretch 2,300 miles from a semitropical north to (and beyond) the frigid waters of the Straits of Magellan, and from the Andes to the Atlantic. Argentina's population of 22,775,000 (1966) makes it the third largest Spanish-speaking country of the world.

The temperate region supports diversified agriculture and vast herds of livestock. Argentina has a growing industrial sector and is attempting to meet its own needs in such fields as automobile manufacture, textiles, and machine tools.

Argentina has the continent's highest living standard, with a per capita income of $799 in 1961. It also claims Latin America's highest literacy rate, with 86.7 percent of the adult population able to read and write (1962). There is a growing middle class of small business men, professionals, and the better-paid employees. In rural areas there is a tradition of large landholdings—some extremely large.

While the constitution of Argentina "supports Roman Catholic worship," it guarantees religious liberty. Protestants (known as Evangelicals) represent all of the denominational spectrum and are widely dispersed. Estimates as to their numbers range from 431,000 (1960) up to as high as 1,000,000, and their proportion in the population from 2.1 percent up to the range of 3 to 5 percent.

Spanish sovereignty was established with the arrival of Pedro de Mendoza in 1536. The area became a part of Spain's new world empire as the Viceroyalty of BUENOS AIRES. (Not applied until later was the name Argentina, deriving from the Spaniards' belief that the "River of Silver" was an easier way to the silver mines in the interior of South America.)

The revolt against Spain came early, with a governing junta established on May 25, 1810. Formal independence was declared on July 9, 1816. Finally there emerged a strong federation based on a constitution (1853) similar to that of the United States. Since 1930 the army has been a major political influence. In 1966 a military group took control of the government.

Argentina has in its population mixtures of Spanish, Italian, German, British, French, Polish, and Indian. The present Indian population is one of the lowest percentages found in any country of Latin America. Extensive British investments during the nineteenth century, particularly in railways, utilities, mining, and shipping, resulted in a substantial English-speaking business community.

The first Protestant preaching in Buenos Aires was heard in 1820 from James Thomson, a Scottish Baptist minister who had come to Argentina in 1818 to introduce a Lancasterian system of public schools (and who also represented the BRITISH AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY). In 1825 a treaty permitted British subjects to have their own churches and services in English. In 1832 some Methodist (his name lost to history) wrote from Buenos Aires to the Missionary Society of the M. E. CHURCH in NEW YORK, stating that he had succeeded in forming a small class and asking that a missionary be sent. The society responded by dispatching FOUNTAIN E. PITTS, who sailed from BALTIMORE in June of 1835 and visited BRAZIL, URUGUAY, and Argentina. Pitts confirmed the need and recommended that a missionary be sent.

The first, JOHN DEMPSTER, set out in 1836. He made contact with the English, Scots, and North Americans and asked the mission board to send a teacher to found an English-language school. Dempster was received by Juan Manuel de Rosas, dictator of the country, who was cordial, but enjoined him to "confine his labors to the foreign population."

A school was started, but there were difficulties over its operation, and Dempster returned to the United States after five years. But he had laid the foundation for the church. He was succeeded in 1842 by WILLIAM H. NORRIS who had worked previously in Uruguay.

The work came to be known as the South America Mission, and Buenos Aires was the headquarters for activity that came to extend into the interior of Argentina, Uruguay, and, for a time, PARAGUAY. Succeeding Norris as superintendents were DALLAS D. LORE, 1847-54; Goldsmith D. CARRON, 1854-57, and WILLIAM GOODFELLOW, 1857-69. During some of these years the mission was, as described by Barclay, "little more than a chaplaincy to the American and British colony of Buenos Aires." Under Goodfellow, expansion began, and by 1864 there were four ministers holding services (one of them in French) and congregations meeting in Buenos Aires, ROSARIO, and Esperanza. The church in Argentina reported 128 members, and there was a day school with 106 pupils.

There was no preaching in the Spanish language by Methodists (or any other Protestants) until May 25, 1867, when a young English immigrant, JOHN FRANCIS THOMSON, preached in Spanish in Buenos Aires.

Work in Spanish was enlarged under the superintendency of HENRY G. JACKSON (1869-78). In 1870 there arrived in Argentina THOMAS B. WOOD who opened Spanish-speaking work in Rosario. He later became superintendent, serving from 1878-87. He was succeeded by CHARLES W. DREES (1887-93). Expansion continued, and by 1891 Drees enumerated twelve Spanish mission centers in Buenos Aires alone, with work also at Rosario, Carcaraña, San Carlos, Entre Rios Province, and in central Argentina. Preaching was in Spanish, English, French, and German. The WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY of the M. E. Church joined the work in 1874, when two young women arrived in Rosario to found the school that later became Colegio Americano. Women's work in later years expanded into social welfare. Until the last years of the 1880's the Methodist Church was the only missionary agency in the River Plate region. Then other denominations began to enter.

In 1893 the era of the pioneers ended as the South America Mission was replaced by the South America Annual Conference, authorized by the 1892 M. E. GENERAL CONFERENCE, in recognition of the growing strength of the church and the need for more local self-government. Bishop JOHN P. NEWMAN organized the South America Conference on July 1, 1893, with thirty-eight members. Eighteen were North American missionaries; the others were Argentine, Spanish, French, Italian, and from other backgrounds. The new conference had six districts, of which Argentina was one (with Brazil, CHILE, Paraguay, PERU, and Uruguay). There were 886 full members and 676 probationers in the Methodist churches of Argentina at this time, and 2,198 Sunday school pupils.

The next thirty years were years of consolidation and growth, with increased numbers of Argentine clergy gradually taking leadership.

In 1924 the LATIN AMERICA CENTRAL CONFERENCE was formed, electing in 1932 as its first bishop, JUAN E. GATTINONI, pastor of Central Church, Buenos Aires, the first Latin American to become a Methodist bishop. Argentina and Uruguay became separate conferences in 1956.

During the 1950's Methodists began missions in a number of the villages and larger towns of Patagonia. In 1964, at the request of Bishop SANTE UBERTO BARBIERI and the ARGENTINA ANNUAL CONFERENCE, the Latin America Central Conference set the region apart as the PATAGONIA PROVISIONAL ANNUAL CONFERENCE. It became one of the areas of fastest growth for Methodism anywhere in the world, showing a membership gain of fifty-four percent in its first two years as a conference (partly owing to incorporation of a number of Welsh Methodist congregations). The new conference includes the old city of Bahia Blanca and congregations in the towns scattered through the inhabited valleys far to the south. In 1966 work was opened at Rio Gallegos, near the Straits of Magellan.

In 1965 the Argentine Republic contained 82 organized Methodist churches and 130 additional preaching places. There were 7,338 church members and 2,983 preparatory members. They were ministered to by 68 ordained clergy, 36 supply pastors, and 28 missionaries.

Of the schools, Colegio Americano in Rosario and Colegio Ward in Buenos Aires are the best known, but many local churches operate day schools. The church operates a school and social service program in La Boca, the old harbor area of Buenos Aires. At the same time, it is experimenting with new approaches to city culture at the Urban Center, developed largely by laymen. Methodists are major participants, along with Waldensians, Presbyterians, and Disciples of Christ, in the Facultad Evangel-ica do Teologia, the seminary in Buenos Aires serving all Latin America. The Methodist Publishing House (Methopress) is also continent-wide in influence as a center for editing and publishing Christian books and magazines. The church maintains its own home mission program, taking particular interest in the Toba Indians of Northern Argentina. The Argentine church has sent missionaries into BOLIVIA, for many years having supported a doctor as medical missionary in the Altiplano. Churches of the country have been one of the sources of support for the work in ECUADOR under the Latin American Evangelical Board of Missions.

Just as Argentina has been the center for much of the political thought of South America, so Protestant churchmen of Argentina have contributed substantially to theological thought and the strategy of evangelism and missions for the continent. Argentine Methodists have taken leading (and cooperative) roles in this area. Their leadership finds expression through the theological seminary, the mission board, and such groups as the Church and Society Board and the Provisional Commission for Evangelical Unity in Latin America. Of recent years there has been discussion of a proposed merger of Methodists, Waldensians, and Disciples of Christ in Argentina, Uruguay, and Paraguay.

Argentina Annual Conference (now an autonomous church) covers northern ARGENTINA through Mendoza, La Pampa, and most of Buenos Aires Province. This region was formerly in the South American Conference, organized in 1893. In 1944 the name was changed to River Plate Conference, which then included Argentina and URUGUAY; but in Feb., 1954, the Uruguay Provisional Annual Conference was organized to include the churches in that country. Headquarters of the Conference have always been in BUENOS AIRES.

Methopress, a publishing, printing, and editorial enterprise of The Methodist Church in Argentina, is often referred to as "The Methodist Publishing House."

The beginnings of the Methodist Press in Argentina must be sought about 1881 when Frederick Fletcher founded a school for boys. Soon it became a school of arts and crafts, as a newly converted typographer offered to teach these.

The typographer, Senor Remigio Vasquez, soon transferred to others his enthusiasm for the opportunity to "reach out and give light to the souls who are living in the darkness of idolatry and sin."

On March 11, 1883, El Estandarte (The Standard) was issued as the first Methodist publication in the country. At the same time the school shop was transformed into a press, called Imprenta Evangelica.

In 1888 the M. E. Church made the institution official, and in 1889 it got its name: Imprenta Metodista (Methodist Press). In 1902 a grant was given by the Board of Missions in NEW YORK to buy new machines, enlarging the press's capacity.

A turning point came between 1912 and 1915, when Daniel Hall, administrator, started to publish books, and the print shop became a publishing house. Now the work definitely became an editorial ministry, and Alberto Lestard, another administrator, enlarged the production about twenty-five times. Large numbers of books, magazines, booklets, hymnbooks, Bibles, and other publications were produced. At this time a bookstore, La Aurora, was created to promote and sell Protestant books.

In 1953 EDUARDO GATTINONI entered as manager of the Methodist Press, and is in charge of the whole operation. In 1955 a new building was secured and more equipment bought. It was at this time that the press was opened to secular production in order to help finance the editorial plan.

After a short interruption and some adjustments, La Aurora and Methopress editorial administration were made one—the present system.

In 1964 a Department of Publications was organized, when the need was felt to give more professional assistance to magazines and books. Since then, layout, art work, and editing, as well as the planning of new projects, are done in this department.

Thus, in eighty-four years, from typography classes at an arts-and-crafts school to a publishing house with forty persons working in it, the project has come to produce books for all Latin America. The Methodist Press represents the continuous effort to "reach out into the darkness" of the secularized world with the light of the printed word.

Toba Indian Mission is a project in northern Argentina sponsored by The Methodist Church of Argentina. The mission to Toba Indians is in the Province of Chaco and serves some 22,000 Indians scattered throughout a vast territory. The work is in cooperation with the Menonite and Disciples of Christ Churches.

An Argentine doctor, Enrique Cicchetti, has established himself in Castelli, a frontier town at the edge of the jungle where the Indians live. From there he reaches several smaller places. Indians come to him for treatment and are treated also in a local hospital where he practices. The Toba Indians are afflicted by many diseases. It is estimated that ninety percent are affected by tuberculosis.

The Methodist Church of SWITZERLAND has joined the mission by sending a nurse, Elisabeth Stauffer, who helps the doctor and gives maternity care.

A teacher, Mrs. Virginia B. de Cicchetti, a former missionary to BOLIVIA, is supported by the Methodist Women's Federation of Argentina. She teaches the Toba children to read in their own language. For a time Ruth Clark was sent as a member of the team by the Board of Missions from New York. The influence of the mission is felt not only among the Indians but throughout the community.

CARLOS T. GATTINONI

ARGENTINE EVANGELICAL METHODIST CHURCH (Iglesia Evangelica Metodista Argentina). At the 1968 General Conference (the Uniting Conference of The United Methodist Church), the two conferences of Argentina asked for and received permission to become an autonomous Methodist Church. These two conferences were the Argentine Conference, in the populous central and northern part of the country including Buenos Aires; and the Patagonia Provisional Conference, encompassing southern Argentina to the Straits of Magellan. Pursuant to this authorization, after plans had been worked out within the framework of the Latin American Methodist Conference embracing the autonomous Methodist Churches of the entire continent, representatives of these two conferences met in Rosario, Argentina, on Oct. 4-7, 1969, and at an historic constituting assembly, organized the Argentine Evangelical Methodist Church.

Besides declaring autonomy and approving a constitution, the new Church elected as its first bishop a distinguished minister, CARLOS T. GATTINONI, 62, pastor of the Central Methodist Church in Buenos Aires. Bishop Gattinoni's father, Juan E. Gattinoni, now 91, had also been a bishop some years previously. Bishop Carlos Gattinoni was elected by the necessary two-thirds majority on the first ballot and was mandated to serve a four-year episcopal term. He succeeded retiring Bishop Sante Uberto Barbieri. Though no longer tied organically to The United Methodist Church through the General Conference, the Argentine Church, as is the case with other autonomous Methodist bodies, has an affiliated autonomous relationship with The United Methodist Church.

"The Church has a Regional Appointment Committee which consists of the Bishop, the seven regional superintendents, and five laymen," explains Bishop JOHN WESLEY LORD who represented the COUNCIL OF BISHOPS, U.M.C., at the organization. "In all but one district, this will be the committee that will assign pastors to local churches. In any event, the bishop is no longer the chief appointing officer, but simply a member of the committee. In the Buenos Aires district, the local church appointments will be made by a committee consisting of the district superintendent, five laymen, and three ministers without benefit of bishop. Under this structure the laymen are given more responsibility and the bishop less. This spirit prevailed in the conference as a new emergent and with no punitive overtones."

The Argentine Evangelical Methodist Church has a membership of 10,918 (full and preparatory) in 197 congregations. There are 69 ministers and the enrollment in 111 church schools is 4,773.

ARIAS, MORTIMER (1924-), bishop and editor of books for the church in BOLIVIA, was born in URUGUAY. He studied at the Facultad Evangelica de Teologia (Union Theological Seminary) in BUENOS AIRES, earning the B.D. and M.T. degrees. He married Esther Legui-zamon, a deaconess and nurse, and they have two children. He transferred to the BOLIVIA ANNUAL CONFERENCE in 1962. He was superintendent of Central District; pastor of El Salvador Church in COCHARAMBA; and editor of Ichthus Editorial (Ichthus Press), a literature program for The Methodist Church in Bolivia, PERU, and CHILE.

At the organization of the Autonomous Methodist Church of Bolivia in Dec., 1969 Mortimer Arias was elected its first bishop. He presides over the newly organized church which embraces the membership formerly belonging to the Bolivia Annual Conference of The United Methodist Church.

NATALIE BARBER

ARIZONA, the sixth largest state, was admitted to the Union in 1912. It contains 113,575 square miles, and in 1965 had a population of more than 1,500,000.

The M. E. CHURCH sent Horace S. Bishop and David Tuthill to preach as early as 1859. Other early preachers were Charles P. Cooke and JOHN L. DYER, known as "Father Dyer, the snowshoe itinerant." While serving as presiding elder of the Santa Fe District, Colorado Conference, he set out to preach to the Americans at Fort Wingate, N. M. Sometime after March 7, 1870, while on that journey, Dyer preached at Fort Defiance, just over the border in Arizona.

In the fall of 1870, Charles P. Cooke, a local preacher from CHICAGO, came to Arizona to preach to the Indians and delivered a sermon at the Fort Bowie Military Reservation in southern Arizona. This was the beginning of permanent work by the M. E. CHURCH in the territory; the M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH also started its work in 1870. Cooke served as a missionary to the Pima Indians on their reservation on the Gila River, south of PHOENIX. He later joined the Presbyterian Church. The Cooke Indian School, an interdenominational institution, is named for him.

Alexander Gilmore, a member of the NEW JERSEY CONFERENCE, served as U. S. Army chaplain at Fort Whipple near Prescott. In Feb., 1871, he organized a Sunday school at Prescott. Though it did not survive, that Sunday school was the earliest organized work of the M. E. Church in Arizona.

In 1872, Bishop MATTHEW SIMPSON sent Glezen A. Reeder of the North Ohio Conference as a missionary to Arizona. At the time the population of the territory was estimated at 30,000, some 20,000 of them Apache Indians. It was said that there was one saloon for every 15 people. Reeder wrote of the situation, "First, the Apaches are in open hostility—they are on the warpath; second, the influence of the saloon affects all; third, Romanism is well established and none too cordial to the incoming of other denominations; and fourth, vice is universally prevalent."

The GENERAL CONFERENCE (ME) established the Arizona Mission in 1879. The General Minutes for that year show that George H. Adams was superintendent and soon preachers were appointed by Bishop Simpson to Camp Verde, Florence and Picket Post, Globe, Phoenix, Prescott, Tombstone, and TUCSON. Apparently the first meeting of the Arizona Mission was held on July 7-10, 1881 in the Presbyterian Church, Tucson, with Bishop THOMAS BOWMAN in charge. Among those appointed in both 1880 and 1881 was George F. Bovard. Bovard was sent to Camp Verde the first year and to Phoenix the next. In the early years the Bovard family was influential in the University of Southern California which at its inception and for many years afterward was a Methodist school.

The Arizona Mission grew slowly. The report for 1883 showed six churches with a total of 143 members. There were 1,002 members and 16 churches in 1900. Twenty years later there were 34 charges and 4,436 members. In 1920, the Arizona Mission was absorbed by the Southern California Conference. This improved the organizational structure and the economic status of the work, but Arizona Methodism was still handicapped by the fact that it was up to 650 miles from the seat of the annual conference. Arizona was largely a "port of entry" for young preachers who, desiring to come west, accepted small appointments in Arizona as stepping stones to larger places in the Southern California Conference. This situation obtained until after union in 1939.

The M. E. Church, South, like its sister denomination, began work in Arizona in 1870. In that year the General Conference established the Los Angeles Conference which included southern California, Arizona, and some other territory. The new conference had two districts, Los ANGELES and San Bernardino, and Arizona was a part of the latter. Alexander Groves, who had a part in starting Southern Methodism in southern California, was appointed to "Arizona" in 1870. The next year he succeeded in gathering a class in Phoenix. This was the first Methodist congregation, and indeed the first Protestant congregation, established in Arizona. It was the beginning of Central Methodist Church, Phoenix. Groves served a total of ten years in Arizona, and according to the General Minutes was appointed presiding elder of the Arizona District in 1875. Also, Franklin McKean and other preachers served appointments in Arizona during this period.

In 1876, Lewis J. Hedgpeth was appointed presiding elder of the Arizona District and pastor of the church at Phoenix. Referred to as a "stalwart son of the Southern Church," Hedgpeth for 25 years "gave his tireless energies to preaching in Arizona," a record unequalled by any other Methodist preacher in the region for many years. Riding horseback, it took Hedgpeth five weeks to go from the conference in Los Angeles to his appointment in Phoenix, and it required longer still for his young family to make the journey. A severe drouth occurred in the Salt River Valley in which Phoenix is located during 1878, leaving the young minister and his family in want. A Catholic saloonkeeper and a Jewish merchant in the spirit of frontier fellowship took up an offering for the Methodist preacher.

The growth of Southern Methodism in Arizona was slow. By 1907 the denomination had only 507 members in the entire territory. In that year, however, the Arizona Church Extension Society was formed, and with nearly 100 members who pledged to give a minimum of $5 to each new church that was built, the society stimulated expansion. By 1918, eight new churches had been erected, and the total membership rose to 1,694. In the same year Bishop H. M. DUBOSE transferred J. E. Harrison from the West Texas Conference and appointed him presiding elder in Arizona. Largely because of Harrison's leadership, the General Conference of 1922 lifted the Southern Methodist work in Arizona to the status of an annual conference.

The conference began with 21 pastoral charges and 2,834 members. Church extension was zealously promoted, and by 1929 there were 32 appointments with 4,876 members. There were losses during the economic depression of the 1930's, some churches closing and others suffering a decline in membership and finances. The Southern Methodist Hospital and Sanatorium at Tucson, acquired in 1926, rendered notable service, but due to financial difficulties it was lost to the church just before unification in 1939. In this period, however, the conference developed a strong youth organization and an excellent camping program. Lack of numerical strength and geographical isolation handicapped the conference, but even so it came to Methodist union in 1939 with 5,309 members and 29 pastoral charges.

The merger in 1939 helped Arizona Methodism. The state became a relatively strong district in the Southern California Conference (S. CALIF.-ARIZ. beginning in 1940). However, with conference headquarters in Los Angeles, there was still a sense of psychological as well as geographical isolation. But after World War II the situation greatly improved. It may be said that ultimately the marked advance of Methodism in Arizona after the middle of the twentieth century was due more to the widespread use of air conditioning than to any other one factor. Arizona has a good winter climate, but it is hot in summer. The pioneer preacher, Lewis J. Hedgpeth, said facetiously that he had to change his theology when he began preaching in Arizona. If he dwelt on the terrors of hell in summer, his people would say, "Let us try anything once," while sermons on the joys of heaven in winter would elicit the observation, "But look what we have here!" Air conditioning gave control over summer temperatures. This coupled with the dry climate of the region prompted electronic industries to locate in the state. Also, it encouraged many retired people to move to Arizona. Still further, more people began to spend winter vacations in the area.

Between 1955 and 1961, 12 new churches were built in Arizona, the total membership rose from 19,000 to 30,000, and contributions to world service and other benevolences greatly increased. In 1961, the Arizona District was divided to form the Phoenix and Tucson Districts. In 1967, the two districts reported 96 pastoral charges, 48,022 members, and churches and parsonages valued at nearly $25,000,000.

ARIZONA CONFERENCE. (See ARIZONA.)

ARKANSAS, carved from the Louisiana Purchase, is in the west south central United States. It became a territory in 1819 and was admitted to the Union in 1836. An agricultural state, it also produces large amounts of oil and gas. It has great acreages of forests and picturesque mountains, and is noted for its thermal springs and for its many streams and lakes which are important for recreation.

As early as 1765, traders from St. Louis followed an Indian trail in a southwesterly direction into what is now Arkansas. White settlements grew up along this and other Indian trails, particularly where they crossed streams.

Methodist interest in Arkansas began in 1814. In that year the TENNESSEE CONFERENCE created the "Mississippi District" comprised of the territory now included in Missouri and Arkansas. Samuel H. Thompson was appointed presiding elder; no preacher was appointed to Arkansas that year, but two local preachers were at work by 1814-15 in Arkansas—WILLIAM STEVENSON and Eli Lindsay. William Stevenson was born in SOUTH CAROLINA in 1768, and became a local preacher in Smith County, Tenn. in 1800. In 1809 he moved with his family to Bellevue Valley, Mo., and did considerable preaching in southeast Missouri during the next few years assisting the presiding elders, JESSE WALKER and Samuel Thompson. In the fall of 1814, Stevenson's brother James who lived in Clark County, Ark., visited him. James was impressed with the influence of religion in Missouri and lamented its absence in Arkansas. Moved by his brother's account of the spiritual destitution in Arkansas, William Stevenson decided to accompany him there at once for a visit. It was a 400-mile trip mostly through wilderness; Stevenson preached at numerous settlements and homes. He preached one Sunday at the home of a man named Cumming on the Forte Caddo River, a branch of the Ouachita. He was instrumental in the conversion of Friend McMahon, formerly a Baptist in Kentucky, who became a local preacher and accompanied him in later years on preaching tours. He traveled as far west as Mound Prairie in Hempstead County near the Texas line. At Mound Prairie the people begged for a regular preacher. Stevenson promised that if he could not get a preacher appointed to the area, he would return himself the next fall and stay as long as he could.

On that first trip to Arkansas in the fall of 1814, Stevenson stayed six to eight weeks, and he says in his autobiography that he established "a few little societies." Stevenson returned to his home in Missouri in midwinter, and in the spring and summer of 1815 attended many camp and quarterly meetings with Samuel Thompson, the presiding elder. Stevenson talked with Thompson about Arkansas and the Red River country and the need for preachers in that region. The presiding elder urged Stevenson to join the annual conference, and promised to appoint him to Arkansas if he would. Stevenson left Missouri for Arkansas in the late summer or early fall of 1815, taking with him Joseph Reed, a local preacher who later became a conference member. Thompson, the presiding elder, saw to it that Stevenson was admitted in absentia to the Tennessee Conference in the fall of 1815.

Stevenson says that he and Reed traveled to the south side of the Current River in northeast Arkansas to the little below the Missouri line. There he began the formation of a circuit that extended southwestward to Pecan Point, Tex., 400 miles from his home in Missouri. He says, "We got up small societies on the rivers and large creeks where the people had found good land." Stevenson's tour into Arkansas and Texas lasted six months. He spent the remainder of the conference year on the Bellevue Circuit in Missouri.

At about the same time that Stevenson was preaching and organizing societies in Arkansas, several others were evidently starting to preach there also. One of the first of these was Eli Lindsay, who lived on Strawberry River in northeast Arkansas, and formed Spring River Circuit to which he was appointed in the fall of 1815. He was assisted by Jonathan Wayland; one society they formed was Flat Creek Church. They reported 88 white and four Negro members at the end of the year. Lindsay was the first preacher appointed to serve in the state and Spring River was the first circuit organized.

Henry Stephenson was also preaching in northeast Arkansas near Spring River before 1816. He was later for several years a conference member, and helped to establish Methodism in Texas. In 1816, the MISSOURI CONFERENCE was established by dividing the Tennessee Conference. At the outset the new conference included Missouri, Arkansas, ILLINOIS, and part of INDIANA. Stevenson attended the first session of the Missouri Conference which was held in Illinois in the fall of 1816. JOHN SCRIPPS who was secretary of the conference, later wrote in his memoirs that through S. H. Thompson, the presiding elder, William Stevenson, "the father of Methodism in Arkansas," was recognized at the conference session.

At the 1816 conference, Stevenson was appointed to the "Hot Springs Circuit," the one he had formed in southwest Arkansas in 1815, and Philip Davis was sent to the Spring River Circuit, the one Eli Lindsay had organized in northeast Arkansas. Thus Methodism was organized and at work in both north and south Arkansas by the fall of 1816.

On being appointed to Hot Springs Circuit in 1816, Stevenson sold his farm in Missouri and bought another at Mound Prairie, Hempstead County, Ark. Moreover, many of his Methodist neighbors and friends in Bellevue Valley did likewise, and on arriving in Arkansas they helped to organize Methodist societies. They built a church at Mound Prairie in 1817 and called it Mount Moriah. It was of hewn pine logs and was some 28 by 30 feet. Mount Moriah was the first Methodist church building erected in Arkansas. Due to some difficulty about the deed, the people abandoned the building after one year and put up another about a mile away and called it Henry's Chapel, the name it bore for 50 years. THE LITTLE ROCK CONFERENCE Historical Society has erected a granite marker on the spot.

In 1818, the Arkansas work was formed into a district, at first called Black River and later Arkansas. Stevenson served as presiding elder several years, with headquarters at Mound Prairie. By 1832 the Arkansas work had grown sufficiently to justify two districts. The area below the Arkansas River was called the Little Rock District. In 1833, the Missouri Conference met at Salem, Washington County, in northwest Arkansas.

The 1836 General Conference established the Arkansas Conference which initially included the Alexandria District in LOUISIANA and the South Indian Mission District in Indian Territory. The first session of the Arkansas Conference was held in Batesville. At the time there were 2,465 members in the conference, 423 of them colored.

The Arkansas Conference adhered South following the division of 1844. At the conference session in November, 1844, one preacher transferred to the PITTSBURGH CONFERENCE and another to the IOWA CONFERENCE, presumably because they wished to remain in the M. E. Church. In 1845, the conference reported 9,454 members, a decrease of nearly 400, as compared with 1844. The next year, however, there was a slight increase, and by 1854 there were over 16,000 white and some 2,800 colored members. In that year the conference was divided to form the Ouachita Conference in the south half of the state. It became the Little Rock Conference in 1866. In 1870, the Arkansas Conference was again divided to form the White River Conference in the northeastern part of the state, but the two merged in 1914 to form the NORTH ARKANSAS CONFERENCE. There have been no conference boundary changes in the state since that date.

When organized in 1836, the Arkansas Conference was served by the Western Christian Advocate published in Cincinnati, Ohio. In 1851, the Memphis and Arkansas Christian Advocate appeared and continued with one or two changes in name until the Civil War. After the war there was the Arkansas Christian Advocate which for a time was called the Western Methodist. In 1882 came the Arkansas Methodist which has carried on to the present time.

Until shortly after the Civil War, education in Arkansas was left almost exclusively to private effort. The minutes of the Missouri Conference for 1833 list appointments to six Indian mission schools and show that two others were to be supplied. When organized in 1836, the Arkansas Conference inherited these schools and in 1844 passed them over to the Indian Mission Conference which was established that year.

Both before and after the Civil War, the conferences in Arkansas sponsored academies or high schools, not by providing money but by stimulating, encouraging, and furnishing leadership. Trustees were largely local, and the schools were dependent on tuition for income. For the most part the principals were Christian men. The institutions were permitted to advertise that they were under the patronage of the Methodist annual conference. Two of the more prominent Methodist academies in Arkansas before the Civil War were Washington Male and Female Seminary, established at Washington in 1846; and the Soulesbury Institute at Batesville which was started in 1850. They served well until forced out of existence by the war.

Following the Civil War, the annual conferences and even district conferences sponsored academies. Fifteen or more such schools were established in Arkansas. Two of the strongest and best known were the Fort Smith District High School at Booneville, and the Clary Academy at Fordyce. Academies under church auspices flourished because of the absence of public high schools. When the latter came, the former soon disappeared.

There were no church or state colleges in Arkansas until the founding of the University of Arkansas in 1871. In the next 20 years the denominations founded at least eight colleges. Beginning in 1868, the Methodist conferences individually made some unsuccessful attempts to establish colleges. They soon concluded that cooperative effort in higher education was essential, and they agreed to support one Methodist college for men and one for women. In 1884, the conferences bought for about $10,000 the Central Collegiate Institute at Altus, a private school founded in 1876. In 1889, they established Galloway College for women at Searcy. In 1890, the Collegiate Institute was moved to Conway and its name was changed to HENDRIX COLLEGE.

Notwithstanding the agreement of the conferences to limit their support to two colleges, they soon found themselves trying to maintain five. Two of the schools quickly closed. Three—Hendrix at Conway, Galloway at Searcy, and Henderson-Brown at Arkadelphia—continued until 1926 when serious moves toward consolidation were initiated. By 1934 Galloway and Henderson-Brown had closed, and Arkansas Methodism's support for higher education was centered in Hendrix College at Conway, a coeducational school which has become noted for academic excellence.

In 1890, the conferences established the Arkansas Methodist Home for children at LITTLE ROCK. The Methodist Hospital began in Memphis in 1910. From the outset the White River Conference joined in its support.

In 1923 the M. E. Church, South created the Western Methodist Assembly at Mount Sequoyah, Fayetteville. Through the years it served as the center for summer conferences and gatherings of church agencies and groups. In 1939, MOUNT SEQUOYAH became the property of the South Central Jurisdiction of The Methodist Church.

M. E. Church After 1844. In 1848, the M. E. Church organized a Missouri Conference with an Arkansas District. At the time the church had four appointments in Arkansas—Batesville, Bentonville, Van Buren, and Washington. ANTHONY BEWLEY, who in 1845 opposed the Missouri Conference adhering South and who thereafter worked for the reorganization of the M. E. Church in Missouri, was appointed to Washington, Ark., at the conference session. Apparently some anti-slavery sentiment and some loyalty to the M. E. Church prevailed in Washington until the Civil War. Opposition to slavery had been promoted there by Jesse Hale, an "ultra abolitionist" who served as presiding elder of the Arkansas District of the Missouri Conference from 1826 to 1830 with headquarters in Washington. Hale enforced the rule in the Discipline that no slave owner could hold an official position in the church. Hale's anti-slavery stance prompted William Stevenson and some laymen in south Arkansas who (though not advocates of slavery) did not like what they called the "Hale storm" to move to Louisiana where the disciplinary rule concerning slavery was not as vigorously enforced. Washington continued as an appointment of the M. E. Church in Arkansas until the Civil War. However, loyalty to the northern church did not survive the conflict; after the war Washington did not appear in the appointments of the M. E. Church in Arkansas.

The Arkansas District became the Arkansas Conference in 1853. Its pre-war strength peaked at about 2,350 members in 1855. The membership fell to about half that figure by 1861, and the Arkansas work reverted to a district in the Missouri Conference (ME), an arrangement which continued until 1873 when the Arkansas Conference was again reconstituted.

In 1879, the Negro preachers and churches in the Arkansas Conference (ME)—about 1,440 church members, one-fourth of the total—were set apart as the Little Rock Conference of the M. E. Church. That conference grew to a membership of about 6,000 by 1929 when it merged with the Lincoln Conference to form the SOUTHWEST CONFERENCE. The Southwest Conference continued until 1939 when it became a part of the Central Jurisdiction of The Methodist Church.

By 1910 the Arkansas Conference had achieved its maximum numerical strength, some 6,000 members. In 1921, the number had declined to about 5,000, and in that year the Arkansas work became a district in the St. Louis Conference which in turn was absorbed by the Missouri Conference in 1931.

In 1939, there were 24 pastoral charges in the Arkansas District of the Missouri Conference, only six of which were filled; the others were left to be supplied. There were 4,409 church members in the district.

When the Little Rock and North Arkansas Conferences of The Methodist Church were organized in the fall of 1939 each included about seven ministers from the former M.E. Church.

Methodist Protestant Church. Throughout its history the METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH had some congregations and one or more annual conferences in Arkansas. On Dec. 11, 1830, about eight members, including two local preachers and one exhorter, of the M. E. Church at Cane Hill in western Arkansas, elected a chairman and secretary, and resolved to withdraw and associate under the Conventional Articles adopted by the Reformers at Baltimore in 1828. At the time they had not yet heard that the M. P. Church had just been organized the month before in Baltimore. The local preachers, Jacob Sexton and J. Curiton, conducted services regularly for the newly organized group at Cane Hill and attendance increased. In the summer of 1831, they held a camp meeting at which there were 55 conversions. In September of that year, Sexton appealed in writing to the Tennessee Conference of the M. P. Church saying that his congregation of 35 wished to be attached to it, and at the same time he asked that a mission be established in Arkansas. The conference granted both petitions.

The Arkansas Mission became the Arkansas Conference (MP) in 1838. For the next 12 years, the new conference included the state of Missouri. As time passed the Methodist Protestants were said to have "thousands" of members in Arkansas, but during and immediately after the Civil War the work was "totally disorganized, except a few churches in the extreme south part of the state." Those churches then linked up with the LOUISIANA CONFERENCE, and for some years there was an Arkansas and Louisiana Conference.

In the 1880's the M. P. Church began to prosper again in the state, and there were four conferences—Arkansas, North Arkansas, Red River Mission, and Western Arkansas. In 1884 the Fort Smith Mission was formed, comprised of northwest Arkansas and a part of Indian Territory. From 1900 to 1908 there was a Northeast Arkansas Conference which included that part of the state and southeast Missouri. In 1915 the Oklahoma Conference and the Fort Smith Mission were merged to form the Fort Smith-Oklahoma Conference which continued until 1939.

In 1892, the Arkansas Mission, composed of Negro ministers and churches, was organized. It was absorbed by the Southwest Conference at the time of Union in 1939.

The Arkansas Conference was reconstituted in 1884 and it continued until 1939. In 1932, the conference journal reported 38 preachers including one supernumerary and 12 probationers, 4,074 church members, and 57 churches and 14 parsonages valued at $156,600. The congregation at Magnolia with 212 members was the largest in the conference.

When organized in 1939, the Little Rock Conference of THE METHODIST CHURCH included 30 preachers in full connection (one was retired) from the Arkansas Conference of the former M. P. Church. About half of the 30 were transferred to the North Arkansas Conference for appointments. That conference began with a total of about 20 former M. P. ministers.

In 1939 Arkansas and Oklahoma formed an episcopal area of the South Central Jurisdiction with the bishop's residence in OKLAHOMA CITY. In 1944 Arkansas and Louisiana became an area with the episcopal residence in Little Rock. Since 1960 the Little Rock and North Arkansas Conferences have constituted an area. The two conferences cooperate in area-wide activities and interests, such as the support of the Methodist Children's Home and the Arkansas Methodist, Hendrix College at Conway, financial assistance to ministerial students at Hendrix, the Methodist Hospital at Memphis, and Wesley Foundations at the state institutions of higher learning. Each conference has its own youth camps. The WOMEN'S SOCIETY OF CHRISTIAN SERVICE is effectively organized in both conferences.

In 1968, the Little Rock and North Arkansas Conferences had 408 pastoral charges, 183,522 church members, and churches and parsonages valued at more than $68,000,000.

ARLINGTON, TEXAS, U.S.A. First Church, had its beginnings in 1878 as the newest preaching point on a five point circuit, including Thomas Chapel, Wyatt's Chapel, Poindexter, and Mountain Creek. All the others have since disappeared.

Central TEXAS was still pioneer and Indian country. The first railroad had just pushed westward, two years before, from Dallas to Forth Worth, a distance of thirty miles. Since Arlington, a small agricultural community, was halfway between, it showed promise of growth.

For the first seven years the Methodist services were held in the office of the Shultz Lumber Yard. Then in 1885 a lot was secured and a small frame building erected in the heart of the community. The soft stone marker, which is now enshrined in the present building, bore the words: "Centenary Methodist Church 1885." This name was adopted in 1884, and was to commemorate the "Centenary" of the "CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE" of 1784 in BALTIMORE. Growth for Arlington and the church was slow. In 1899, after twenty-one years, there were only 193 members. The first brick structure was erected in 1907. The cornerstone, bearing the name "Centenary Methodist Church," is also enshrined in the present structure. When this building was destroyed by fire in 1918, work started almost immediately to rebuild, using the same foundation. Art glass windows went into this edifice. When this building was also destroyed by fire, in 1954, one of the large three paneled windows was spared, and is now over the main entrance to the present sanctuary. It bears likenesses of Jesus as the Good Shepherd, In the Garden, and Knocking at the Door.

The present church structure was constructed in Semi-Gothic design in four stages, beginning in 1950. It was completed in 1965, with a present evaluation of a million and a half dollars. Its membership of more than 2,800 continues to grow.

During the past fourteen years First Church has helped to found, finance, and furnish members for five additional Methodist churches in the now rapidly growing city of Arlington, as well as numerous churches beyond. It also has a strong missionary outreach.

ARLINGTON, VIRGINIA, U.S.A. Arlington Church held its first services in a one-room building located on what is now the northeast corner of Columbia Pike and Glebe Road as the Civil War loomed all around. Known as Hunter's Chapel, it was engulfed by war when the Union Army, preparing for a battle, burned the structure to the ground.

In 1870 a one-room schoolhouse was built on Columbia Pike on South Wayne Street which served as a community church. Only five of the worshippers were Methodists, but they decided in 1893 to erect a Methodist church on a lot donated by Sanford Bradbury, one of the five, on Columbia Pike opposite South Edgewood Street. Mrs. Sarah Bailey, another of the five, solicited contributions, mortgaged her farm for $3,000, and the members secured a loan from the mission board of the church in the amount of $400 which made it possible to pay for a building. At the service of dedication in 1893 a Washington man present read a poem entitled "The Faithful Five," which he had written in honor of the charter members.

Years later the United States Government paid $3,000 as damages for the destruction of Hunter's Chapel. This paid off Mrs. Bailey's mortgage.

In 1918-21 Arlington Church secured its first full-time minister. In the 1930's the great movement of people from Washington into the suburbs began and the church grew as the community grew.

In 1939 the congregation purchased a lot at the corner of Glebe Road and South 8th Street, a building fund was started, and plans were drawn for a new church. World War II intervened, building plans were laid aside, and the church did its best to serve the increasing numbers who then flocked into Arlington. It was the first church in the metropolitan area to hold two identical worship services each Sunday morning. Ground for the present structure was broken in June, 1945, cornerstone was laid in April, 1946, and the building was open for use in April, 1947.

This church had approximately 400 members in 1939; about 640 in 1943; approximately 1,100 in 1947; and some 2,800 in 1958. In 1969 there are 3,349 members, making it the largest church in the VIRGINIA CONFERENCE and one of the larger ones in all of Methodism.

ROLAND P. RIDDICK

Clarendon Church has for some years led the churches of northern Virginia in its emphasis upon a variety of study programs and financial support to both world and national missions, benevolences, which include homes for children and the aged, and the cause of church extension in a fast growing area.

The church began with the organization of a Sunday school in a private home, in the Clarendon area of Arlington early in 1901. There were seven adults and fourteen children composing this first group, meeting in the home of Mr. and Mrs. William H. Overall. A lot was purchased at the corner of Jackson and N. Irving Streets on which a frame church building was erected, and services began with the appointment of a pastor in 1906. At this time, Arlington County was in the bounds of the Alexandria District, BALTIMORE CONFERENCE, M. E. Church, South. W. H. Ballengee, pastor of Calvary Methodist Church, WASHINGTON, D. C., was a sponsor of the new church and advisor to the student minister, J. J. Rives, who served the church for four years while a student at George Washington University. Dr. Rives, who became a leading minister of his conference, has been retired for some years and is now living in nearby Falls Church, Va.

The second site of Clarendon Church was at the corner of Tenth and N. Irving Streets where a brick educational structure was erected and served for both church and Sunday school purposes until it was outgrown and new property was purchased at N. Irving and Sixth Streets. Here the present church is situated with a sanctuary and educational building erected in 1941. A large addition was made to the church school in 1951.

At present Clarendon Church owns and uses a former residence for several young adult classes.

A staff of three ministers, a director of Christian education, three secretaries, and a number of fine volunteer workers are seeking to minister adequately to a membership which is now spread out over a wide area. Clarendon Church is now in the Arlington District of the VIRGINIA CONFERENCE and within a five-minute drive of Constitution Avenue in the nation's capital. The senior minister, William P. Watkins, has served the church since June, 1964.

Mount Olivet Church, "the Oldest Church in Arlington County," was started in 1854, and today its congregation still worships on the same corner. The church was still new when Union troops occupied the building after the first battle of Bull Run. After using it as a hospital, commissary, and a guard post, federal forces dismantled the building and used the lumber for shelter and camp fires during the winter of 1861-62. (In 1904, after years of litigation, a claim of $3,400 for such damages was allowed against the government.)

Although their church building had been destroyed, Mount Olivet's congregation carried on and by 1870 the first building had been replaced by a second sanctuary, much smaller than the first. For nearly half a century thereafter the church ministered to a small but devoted congregation in the predominantly rural community five miles from downtown WASHINGTON, D. C.

As the country began to emerge from the great depression in the 1930's, a rapid population growth occurred, many persons arriving to staff the numerous New Deal agencies, and many of these settling in Arlington County. From 230 members in 1930, membership has continued to increase by leaps and bounds, until today it numbers over 2,700, with more than a thousand persons at worship on Sundays. During the past twenty-five years, the church has completed three major building programs to meet the expanding need, and today her buildings and grounds are valued at over a million dollars. During the past ten years, more than 2,300 members have been received, making it one of the fastest growing churches in the Metropolitan Washington area.

Operating with the minister is a minister of evangelism, a director of Christian education, a director of youth work, and a church business administrator, supported by an adequate clerical and technical staff, and with a budget of over $213,000. Mount Olivet is contributing to the support of missionaries in three foreign countries and at the same time is unique in her service to the immediate community. In addition to the full family of Boy Scout and Girl Scout organizations, her facilities are presently being used by two weekday schools: one for "disturbed" teen-agers, and one for pre-school children from under-privileged homes.

ARLINGTON HEIGHTS, ILLINOIS, U.S.A. First Church. The earliest church history in the Arlington Heights area began in 1835 when the first Methodist circuit rider ministered to the earliest settlers in Elk Grove, three miles south of present-day Arlington Heights. The first families arriving there early in 1834 by-passed the swampy settlement of CHICAGO and pushed west to find good farm land and established their home in the shelter of the woods. Soon there were a dozen families and these eagerly awaited the arrival once in four weeks of William Royal. He preached in the log school house, married couples, and held memorial services for those who had died during his absence. Many of his listeners had walked no less than ten miles to hear him.

The settlement grew and a church building was erected in 1840 of dressed lumber shipped from MICHIGAN to Chicago and hauled out to the grove by ox-team. This tiny church is believed to be the first house of worship in Cook County outside of Chicago.

Here the congregation worshipped for eighteen years. The building itself was moved twice because the hilarity at nearby taverns disturbed divine services.

After a series of successful revival meetings in 1858 the Wheeling and Elk Grove congregations merged and moved to the village of Dunton (now Arlington Heights), where the new railroad was attracting settlers in large numbers. The new congregation met for worship in W. C. Wing's general store until a one-story frame church costing $2,000 was erected at St. James and Dunton Streets.

Students from GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE at EVANSTON filled the pulpit when the membership could not support a resident pastor.

During the ministry of Alan Billman in the twenties the plant was enlarged just before the financial crash of 1929. The heavy building debt required a struggle to pay and it was not until 1950 that the mortgage was burned. By that time population figures for the town had zoomed and the church building was inadequate. Plans were inaugurated in 1954 for a building, the Dunton property sold to another church but was used jointly until the new building was ready in Sept., 1956. The first unit built was for education, erected on an 18-acre site a mile east of town. By 1960 a new sanctuary was built, during the pastorate of Hughes Morris.

AMOS THORNBERG came to the church in 1965, but met an untimely accidental death during a storm on June 10, 1967. Dr. Charles Jarvis came in Sept., 1967 to minister to a membership of more than 3,000, supported in the work by three assistant pastors.

ARMINIAN MAGAZINE, described as "Consisting of Extracts and Original Treatises on Universal Redemption," was first published by JOHN WESLEY in 1778. It was designed to be a doctrinal weapon against any teaching which ran contrary to the fundamental Wesleyan belief that "God willeth all men to be saved and to come to a knowledge of the truth" and also against the Calvinistic Gospel Magazine. Wesley's aim was to publish "some of the most remarkable tracts on the universal love of God, and on His willingness to save all men from all sin, which have been wrote in this and the last century." The early numbers contained biographies of eminent Christians, poetry, sermons, and accounts of the experiences of Methodists. There was also a sprinkling of travellers' tales and, in due course, missionary news and book reviews; but it was in no sense a news journal. Many letters to and from John Wesley appeared. As it stoutly defended Arminian theology against the claims of CALVINISM, so it defended Wesleyan polity against the attacks of more radical Methodists.

In 1798 the title was changed to The Methodist Magazine and again in 1822 (under the influence of JABEZ BUNTING) to The Wesleyan Methodist Magazine. A slight modification was made in 1914 when it was named The Magazine of the Wesleyan Methodist Church, but in 1927 it reverted to its former title, The Methodist Magazine. From 1804 to 1822 an Irish edition was published and from 1811 to 1870 there was also an abridged edition known as "The Sixpenny Edition." Religious fiction first appeared in 1877 and commercial advertisements on the cover a few years later. Until 1893 the magazine contained no illustrations except each month there was a portrait of a Methodist minister. These portraits were, in the main, finely engraved. In 1894, however, it assumed a new look and included illustrated articles on nature, travel, and other cultural topics.

Even though it was reduced to a slender bi-monthly issue during the war years, it never ceased publication until it finally succumbed to economic pressures in 1969. Since 1947 it has served as the magazine of the Women's Fellowship of the Methodist Church. It has always been under the general direction of the Connexional Editor.

An unofficial monthly continuation of the Methodist Magazine is in progress (1970), sponsored by a keen group unwilling to see it die.

ARMINIAN METHODISTS arose in 1831 or 1832 in the Derby Circuit; hence they were also described as "DERBY Faith Folk." Four local preachers had been expelled from the Methodist society, and some six hundred members withdrew. They determined to call a minister of their own, one HENRY BREEDEN, a schoolmaster recently removed from Redditch, and a successful revival preacher. It is somewhat doubtful whether, as is sometimes asserted, the real reason for the secession was doctrinal, namely the holding of Sandemanian views of saving faith—that justifying faith is simple assent to the bare death of Christ. They adopted Wesley's Rules, his Sermons and Notes on the New Testament, and the PLAN of PACIFICATION as the standard of their doctrine and discipline. It is really difficult to see where this sect differed from the Wesleyans, unless in its enthusiastic revivalism and its employment of women preachers. A circuit was created with three preaching places in Derby and twenty-seven in the country. Among those who seceded was ELIZABETH EVANS—better known as Dinah Morris in George Eliot's Adam Bede—and for a time she served as a preacher. The first Annual Assembly was held in Derby in June, 1833; and Henry Breeden was chosen president, an office which he retained for the next two years.

In 1837 the sect joined forces with the WESLEYAN METHODIST ASSOCIATION and eventually became part of the UNITED METHODIST FREE CHURCHES. In addition to their center at Derby, they had societies at Leicester, NOTTINGHAM, and Redditch, and to the union they brought some twelve hundred members and seventy local preachers. Certainly as late as 1959 they had survived in GERMANY as the Bund freikirchlicher Christen, more popularly known as the Derbisten.

JOHN T. WILKINSON

ARMINIANISM. (See ARMINIUS, JACOBUS.)

ARMINIUS, JACOBUS (1560-1609), was born Oct. 10, 1560, the youngest child of Hermand Jacobzoon, a cutler of Oudewater in the south of Holland. Although orphaned at an early age by the death of his father, Jacobus' intellectual promise was noted by a succession of patrons who provided for his schooling in Utrecht, Marburg, Leyden, and GENEVA. Recognition of Arminius by the Merchant Guild of Amsterdam as a potential leader in the Reformed Church led to their sending him to the Academy at Geneva when he was twenty-one years of age. In Geneva he came under the influence of Theodore Beza. Here he lectured on the logical principles of Pierre de la Ramée. Under attack for his views on logic, Arminius removed to BASEL, where the university faculty offered to confer upon him the Doctor of Divinity degree. This honor he declined, feeling himself too young and undistinguished to accept. After a further period in Geneva and a trip to ITALY, he returned to Holland where he served for sixteen years (1587-1603) as pastor of the Reformed Church in Amsterdam. In the plague of 1602, during which Arminius' pastoral service was distinguished by fearlessness and devotion, two professors of theology at the University of Leyden succumbed. To one of these professorships, vacated by the death of Franciscus Junius, Arminius was appointed.

The appointment was made in spite of strong opposition by another professor of theology, Franciscus Gomarus, a proponent of the most rigorous supralapsarian Calvinist view of predestination (the doctrine that the decree of Particular Election was ordained by God before the Fall). Until his death on Oct. 19, 1609, Arminius continued in the chair of theology which today bears his name. His teaching career was under constant attack from the adherents of Calvinist orthodoxy. In defense of his theological position, he presented his "Declaration of Sentiments" before the States of Holland on Oct. 8, 1608. His death came in the midst of preparation for a second such appearance, occasioned by the continuance of political and theological harassment. His enemies declared his illness and death to be a just punishment for his heretical views.

Arminius' opposition to an absolute decree of divine predestination, and his defense of a universal atonement were strongly and ably argued. But the political strength of the high Calvinist party was such that "if the Arminians were dialectically victors, they were politically vanquished. The men who organized authority in Holland proved stronger than those who pleaded and suffered for freedom."

A group of Arminius' followers prepared and presented to the States of Holland in 1610 a "Remonstrance" which summarized the challenge of the Arminian theology to the prevailing CALVINISM at five points: unconditional predestination, limited atonement, man's inability to exercise faith, irresistible grace, and the perseverance of the saints. The Synod of Dort (Dordrecht) in 1618-19 condemned the Remonstrants, banished their leaders, and put to death one of the chief partisans. The Remonstrant Brotherhood (Remonstrantse Broederschap), begun informally in 1610, continues today as a free church, propounding a doctrine of free grace and working for the freedom of man in a free Christian society. The Remonstrant Brotherhood sponsored in 1960 an Arminius Symposium as a part of a national celebration of the four-hundredth anniversary of Arminius' birth. The sessions of the Symposium were held at Amsterdam, Leyden and Utrecht.

His Theology. Arminius' theological position emerged as a result of his being requested by the Reformed Church to write a defense of the supralapsarian view of predestination. His studies led him to reject the current views of Coornhaert as being neither scriptural nor rational. Arminius held that the doctrine of absolute decrees of predestination would make God the author of sin, would restrict God's GRACE, would leave multitudes of men without hope in that SALVATION was neither intended nor provided for them in Christ, and would provide a false security for those elected to salvation.

In Arminius' theological exposition, God is portrayed as having created with complete foreknowledge, and as subsequently preserving, governing and directing all things through His providence. "God is the most excellent object of knowledge, lucid and clear to the mind, upholding himself to reason and the mental powers. He manifests himself to the external senses, the inward fancy or imagination, and to the mind of understanding." Moral virtues in man's experience are analogous to the divine attributes of justice, righteousness, truth, fidelity, patience, gentleness, and readiness to forgive. God wrought universal atonement which is intended for all mankind through the mediatorship of Christ. Man must will to accept the proffered grace as a beggar reaches up to receive alms extended to him. Conditionalism is a characteristic emphasis in Arminius' theology. When man receives saving grace through faith, he experiences conversion, re-birth and renewal.

SANCTIFICATION was regarded by Arminius as open to any man through the continuingly cleansing and empowering presence of the spirit of God. "[Sanctification] is a gracious act of God by which he purifies man who is a sinner, and yet a believer, from the darkness of ignorance, from indwelling sin and its lusts or desires, and imbues him with the spirit of knowledge, righteousness and holiness, that, being separated from the life of the world and made conformable to God, man may live the life of God, to the praise of righteousness and of the glorious grace of God, and to his own salvation."

The freedom and responsibility of man in acceptance and obedience are clearly emphasized. Salvation, Arminius wrote, "requires to be received, understood, believed, fulfilled in deed and reality." One implication of human freedom is man's ability, through neglect or disobedience, to fall from grace, to 'backslide.' In the state of grace man can be sustained and protected by the Holy Spirit. However, through his own negligence he may lose that state. Upon man's reopening his heart to God, grace will be given anew and the life of the spirit restored.

Arminius' theology maintained a mid-position between Calvinism and Socinianism, i.e., the Unitarian thought of the period, in the responsible relation of man to God. He emphasized the biblical source, the rational understanding, and the experiential authentication of the gospel of grace. His understanding of salvation has motivated strong evangelical and missionary concern in the development of the church from the seventeenth century onwards. Arminius' plea for freedom and toleration commands his thought for consideration in the contemporary quest for unity and universality in the ecumenical spirit.

His Influence on Methodist Theology. The Arminian view of grace and responsibility received a central and determinative emphasis in the theology of JOHN WESLEY. Grace, for Arminius, was viewed as a special act of God in relation to man wherein the Divine provides the commencement (inciting grace), the continuation (assisting grace), and the consummation (sanctifying grace), of salvation. This grace goes before, accompanies and follows; it excites, assists, operates that we will, and cooperates lest we will in vain.

The Arminianism of Wesley was a recovery of this insistence upon grace as the power of God from the beginning to the end of man's salvation. Intermediary Arminianism in the Church of England, from Cudworth, through Tillotson and Pearson, to Copleston and Whatley, had lost the fine balance between Calvinism and PELAGIANISM, and had moved into rationalism and latitudinarianism. The High Church party was frequently designated "Arminian" by their Puritan opponents, with the imputation that they were unsound on grace, and so not fully Protestant. It is significant that Wesley took up the title "Arminian" as one of honor. In Wesley's thought, the emphasis upon grace resulted in a strongly evangelical statement of the gospel and became a major power in the eighteenth century revival. Frederick Platt was of the opinion that "It was the Arminian system of thought which lay at the theological sources of the great Methodist revival in the United Kingdom and America during the eighteenth century."

To the insistence upon grace as the total ground of man's salvation the Methodist theological position added a characteristic Arminian emphasis upon the universality of the ATONEMENT, conditionalism with its stress upon man's responsibility, the necessity of the conversion experience, and the continuance of the Holy Spirit's work unto entire sanctification. The Methodist statement of CHRISTIAN PERFECTION added the ethical demands to the working out of the experience of the Spirit.

John Wesley, JOHN FLETCHER, RICHARD WATSON, and WILLIAM BURTON POPE were the early Methodist theologians in whom the Arminian position is clearly discernible. Wesley instituted in 1778 a periodical entitled THE ARMINIAN MAGAZINE: Consisting of Extracts and Original Treatises on Universal Redemption. The work was introduced with "a sketch of the Life and Death of Arminius." The title of the magazine was changed in 1798 to The Methodist Magazine, but the first generation had effectively acknowledged the theological debt to Arminius. George Croft Cell, in The Rediscovery of John Wesley, described Wesley's position as, "evangelical Arminianism, . . . which he consciously derived from and confidently referred to Arminius himself."

In the nineteenth century NATHAN BANGS published a Life of Arminius. As Book Editor for American Methodism he kept the consciousness of Arminian sources for Methodist theology clearly before the mind of the Methodist readers. WILRUR F. TILLET, THOMAS O. SUMMERS, HUBBARD H. KAVANAUGH, MINER RAYMOND, DANIEL D. WIEDON, JOHN MILEY, WILLIAM FAIRFIELD WARREN, RANDOLPH S. FOSTER, and OLIN A. CURTIS continued the theological exposition and adaptation of Arminianism in American Methodist theology through the century both South and North. [Alfred Pask wrote a dissertation on "The Influence of Arminius on the Theology of John Wesley" in 1938, a copy of which is in the library of New College, Edinburgh.]

In twentieth century Methodism the emphasis in theology has continued to be upon FREE WILL and man's responsibility, the ethical expressions of Christian discipleship, and man's need for growth in grace and obedience. The concern for the growth of a free church in a free society, openness to consideration of newly emerging theological formulations and participation in the ecumenical movement have characterized Methodist doctrinal writing and teaching. The name of Arminius has, however, been heard with increasing infrequency. Even through three decades of revival of interest in Wesleyan studies, the roots of Wesley's theology in Arminius have not been as widely acknowledged as the early historical developments in Methodist theology indicate to be necessary for their understanding.

ARMOR, MARY HARRIS (1863-1950), world temperance leader, a strong orator and platform personality, twice president of the Georgia Women's Christian Temperance Union, was born at Penfield, Ga., March 9, 1863. She was the daughter of William Lindsay and Sarah Johnson Harris, sturdy Presbyterians, but she joined the M. E. Church, South when she was married to Walter F. Armor in 1883. She later rendered valuable service as a member of the executive committee of the Board of Temperance and Social Service of the M. E. Church, South.

All of her mature life she was vitally associated with educational, civic, and religious activities. She was a delegate to the Democratic National Conventions in 1924 and 1928. In 1918 WESLEYAN COLLEGE, MACON, GA., conferred upon her the LL.D. degree, that college's first honorary degree.

It was the temperance movement to which she felt called of God to give herself. She served as president of the Georgia W.C.T.U. for two terms, 1905-09 and 1924-26. In pursuing this call she became one of America's notable orators, lecturing in forty-six states and in a number of foreign countries. She addressed world W.C.T.U. conventions in BOSTON, GLASGOW, BROOKLYN, LONDON, TORONTO, and Lausanne. She represented the U.S.A. at the International Anti-Alcohol Congress in Milan, ITALY, in 1913, and was often referred to as the "Joan of Arc of the temperance movement."

With a powerful and magnetic voice, she captivated hosts who heard her, and her life, motivated by a great faith in God and a desire to devote all her talents to this service, was a beneficent influence in ever-widening circles.

She died on Nov. 6, 1950, in Eastman, Ga., and is buried there.

ARMOUR, ANDREW (17?-1828), British lay missionary pioneer, was born near Glasgow, Scotland, and enlisted in the British army, joining a foot regiment, and saw service in IRELAND, GIBRALTAR, and Madras. In 1792 he began the first Methodist society in Gibraltar. among the soldiers, and gained the governor's approval to preach. In Madras in 1798 he gathered Europeans and Indians together for Bible study, and the group continued to meet until the arrival of Methodist missionaries at Royapettah. In Gibraltar he had learned French, Spanish, and Portuguese, and he added Tamil in Madras. Released from the army, he was sent to act as interpreter at the Supreme Court in Colombo, CEYLON; and in 1812 he was licensed to preach in Portuguese and Sinhalese, being by that time headmaster of a government high school. He welcomed the first Methodist missionaries to Ceylon in 1814 (see W. M. Harvard), accompanied them on their first journeys, and interpreted for them. In 1816-17 his name appeared as "Assistant Missionary," but he reverted to his lay status and was ordained in the Church of England in Ceylon in 1821. He was a brilliant linguist, a good preacher, a pioneer of Christian work wherever he was stationed, a staunch supporter of Methodist and other missionary effort, and was deeply mourned when he died in Ceylon in 1828.

ARMS, GOODSIL FILLEY (1854-1932), one of the founders of Methodist work in CHILE and for forty years a missionary in that country, was born Jan. 22, 1854, in Sutton, Can. A graduate of WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, he became an elder in the VERMONT CONFERENCE. In 1888 he was sent to South America by the Transit and Building Fund Society, a group gathering support for the WILLIAM TAYLOR missions on the East Coast of South America. Arms and his wife, Ida Taggard Arms, were sent to CONCEPCION to reorganize the foundering schools for boys and girls which had been started ten years earlier. Though Arms devoted much time to evangelistic work, both he and Mrs. Arms were for twenty-eight years associated with the schools, which became Colegio Americano (for boys) and Concepcion College (for girls). He was also a pastor and spent two terms as presiding elder. He was president of Union Theological Seminary, SANTIAGO, 1923-27.

ARMSTRONG, JAMES EDWARD (1830-1908), American minister and historian of the Old BALTIMORE CONFERENCE, was born in Alexandria, Va., Oct. 15, 1830. His family moved to BALTIMORE when he was a child. As a youth he gave himself to God, soon expressing a desire to become a Methodist preacher. In 1853 the Baltimore Conference, without the usual recommendation, and in his absence, admitted young Armstrong on trial and gave him an appointment.

He was ordained deacon by Bishop LEVI SCOTT in 1855. His diary contains this entry: "May its solemn vows be ever fresh in my memory." He was ordained elder by Bishop BEVERLY WAUGH in 1857. He served fourteen pastorates and six terms as presiding elder.

He married Margaret Hickman of Woodstock, Va.

As a pastor he sought the poor and lowly and ministered to them with genuine courtesy.

Armstrong received the D.D. degree from RANDOLPH-MACON COLLEGE, of which he was a trustee from 1895 until his death. He was twice a member of the GENERAL CONFERENCE (MES), in 1894 and 1898. He wrote History of the Old Baltimore Conference at the request of that conference.

JAMES E. ARMSTRONG

When the Baltimore Conference met in Roanoke, Va., in March, 1908, Armstrong acted as one of the secretaries for the fiftieth time; for twenty years he was chief secretary. At the conference love feast he gave this testimony: "I have no worth or merit in myself. All to Christ I owe. If I am saved I will be a sinner saved by grace."

He was not able to attend the last day of the conference, but for several days he kept busy preparing conference records for publication. He died on April 7, 1908.

ARNOLD, JOHN M. (1824-1884), American minister, was born in the Catskill Mountains, N. Y., on Oct. 15, 1824. His father, a poor Baptist minister with eleven children, died when John was one year old. In 1839 John moved to the frontier in MICHIGAN. Sickly in childhood, he fashioned a strong body by will and determination.

He entered the MICHIGAN CONFERENCE on trial in 1849, and completed the course of studies in one year, receiving perfect marks. He served frontier appointments and then became presiding elder of the Owosso District, 1856-59. While pastor at the Woodward Avenue Church, DETROIT, then the largest church in Michigan, mission giving and attendance increased notably.

Through his years as a pastor Arnold kept on hand a supply of books from the Book Concern, which he continually sold. Later he opened a Methodist book store in Detroit which did a large business. In 1864 this became an official depository, specializing in Sunday school literature.

After serving as correspondent for the New York Christian Advocate, he promoted at the conference in 1863 the idea of a state Methodist paper. In December, 1873, he was one of the founders of the MICHIGAN CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE, which began publication in January, 1874. Arnold put $1,100 into this stock company, was vice-president, business manager, associate editor, and then editor. He gained increasing influence in his editorials and saw the subscriptions rise to 10,000.

In 1877 John Arnold was one of the leaders who re-established the Detroit Methodist Alliance, providing for mutual cooperation and help among the city's churches. In 1879-80 the Alliance made a mighty and successful effort to raise the debts on all the Detroit Methodist churches.

In 1875 Arnold was one of the leaders who determined the site and established the Bay View Camp Ground. He promoted it vigorously in the Advocate. In 1884 it was said that he held "four of the most arduous offices of the Detroit Conference" and was serving on six committees. He was a leader in the Centenary celebration and campaign to raise $500,000 in Michigan. His untimely death in Detroit on Dec. 5, 1884, seemed to sound the death knell to this drive.

ARNOLD, WILLIAM ERASTUS (1862-1938), American writer, historian and Conference leader of Kentucky, was born on Jan. 9, 1862, in Bourbon Co., Ky. He was left an orphan in his early infancy and was brought up by his mother's brother, Frank M. Henkle. He attended KENTUCKY WESLEYAN COLLEGE at Winchester, Ky., and after receiving the A.B. Degree there entered the Methodist ministry on March 23, 1883. He joined the KENTUCKY CONFERENCE (MES) on Sept. 10, 1884, and out of that conference retired in Sept., 1934, after fifty years in active service.

He married Elizabeth Strother on Jan. 4, 1887, and to them were born five children. A man of untiring energy and one who became an interpreter of church law, he early obtained a position of leadership among his brethren. For four years he was editor of the Conference paper, The Central Methodist. He served as pastor of Richmond, Highlands, Danville, Stanford (twice), Flemingsburg, and Somerset. Made a presiding elder, he served the Maysville District, the Danville, the Covington, and the Lexington. Kentucky Wesleyan gave him the degree of D.D. J. R. Savage, his biographer and friend, said of him, "He will possibly be best known to posterity through his two able volumes of the History of Kentucky Methodism. He was at work on his third and last volume of the series . . . when he was taken ill and died on March 9, 1938 before he could finish the work."

ARRAH, India, is a city of some 60,000 in the Shahabad District of Bihar. It is the district headquarters for the government and also a Methodist Church headquarters.

The first Methodist missionaries, the Rev. and Mrs. Arthur Lee Gray, came to Arrah in 1903, representing an independent organization centered in CINCINNATI, OHIO, U.S.A. Gray was then a member of the PENINSULA ANNUAL CONFERENCE. After several years of disappointing work, they asked the M. E. CHURCH to accept responsibility for the area and this request was granted. Arrah was incorporated in the BENGAL Conference. Help was obtained from recent converts in the Ballia District of the United Provinces immediately across the Ganges River, and within a few months several groups of Dhusiya Chamars confessed Christian faith and were baptized.

The movement grew into a church of about 10,000 members, preparatory members, and baptized children in the Shahabad District of Bihar.

An adjustment of conference boundaries in 1913 shifted the Tirhoot Division and the Shahabad District of Bihar and the Ballia District of the United Provinces from the Bengal Conference to the North India Conference. The 1920 General Conference passed an enabling act authorizing the North India and the Northwest India Conferences to divide their territories so that an additional annual conference might be organized. Arrah District was in the territory set apart for the new conference, which at its organizing session chose for itself the name LUCKNOW Conference.

Sawtelle School in Arrah was started in rented property in 1918, with a personal gift of 500 rupees from a woman missionary, and was financed for several years by designated gifts from friends in India and America. It was adopted by the WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY, M. E. Church, in 1921. In 1923 the residential estate of a former indigo planter, most conveniently located, was purchased after six years of effort, and building plans were laid. In appreciation of gifts from the Sawtelle family of Cincinnati, Ohio, the name "Sawtelle" was given to the school. It is now a coeducational high school with separate dormitories for boys and girls. The first principal was Edna Abbott. She later served very effectively as a village evangelist, identifying herself so sacrificially with the depressed leather workers that the Brahman principal of a government high school, living next door, was helped to accept Christ and to become an active Christian.

Maren Tirsgaard of DENMARK and the United States served as principal for thirty years, and made Sawtelle one of the most successful and popular mission schools in the state. It has powerfully undergirded the church in Arrah-Buxar-Ballia area of India.

ARTERS, JOHN M. (1877-1943), American minister and secretary of the M. E. GENERAL CONFERENCE, was born at Deals Island, Md., Aug. 13, 1877. He was received on trial in the WILMINGTON CONFERENCE in 1900. In 1899 he received the B.A. degree from DICKINSON COLLEGE, and in 1929 was awarded the D.D. degree by that institution. He served in the pastorate for nine years. His boundless energy, crusading spirit, ability as a public speaker and keen debater attracted attention state-wide, resulting in a call to be superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League of Delaware.

In 1911 Arters transferred to the MAINE CONFERENCE where he served as pastor of Congress Street Church in PORTLAND, 1911-13, and Rumford, 1914-16. In 1917, shortly after his appointment to Waterville, he entered work with the Y.M.C.A. in the first World War. For a time he served as associate secretary of the General Board of Temperance, Prohibition, and Public Morals of his church. Returning to Maine he became presiding elder of the Portland District, 1919-24; pastor of Clark Memorial Church, Portland, 1925-28; at Grace Church, Bangor, 1929-32; and presiding elder of the Bangor District, 1932-38. Because of failing health he took 1939 as a sabbatical year and retired the following year.

Arters was married to Anna Louise Morris of Dillsburg, Del. in 1901.

Arters exerted leadership of a high degree in all of the many boards and commissions on which he served. He was for seventeen years treasurer of the Preachers' Aid Society. He represented the Maine Conference at six successive General Conferences. For many years before the coming of amplifiers, his strong voice boomed forth as he served as secretary of the General Conference. His services in this office continued until 1939, when he was unable to be a part of the Uniting Conference.

He died at his home in Cape Elizabeth, Me., on Feb. 18, 1943, and was buried in Pine Grove Cemetery, Falmouth.

ARTHUR, WILLIAM (1819-1901), British minister and author, was born at Kells, County Antrim, IRELAND, Feb. 3, 1819. Accepted for the WESLEYAN METHODIST ministry in 1837, he went to Gutti, Mysore, INDIA in 1839, but had to return because of ill health in 1841. His eyesight was never fully restored, and later a throat affliction intermittently reduced his voice to a whisper. He was secretary of the WESLEYAN METHODIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY, 1851-68; first principal of BELFAST METHODIST COLLEGE, 1868-71; again at the Mission House, 1871-88, when he superannuated. He afterward lived mostly in the south of FRANCE until his death at Cannes, March 9, 1901. He was president of the Wesleyan Conference of 1866, and played a leading part in the first two ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCES in 1881 and 1891.

Arthur visited America in 1855-56 and again in 1880, when he was a fraternal delegate to the General Conferences of the M. E. Church. Bishop MATTHEW SIMPSON reflects American esteem for him:

In the Chair of the [British Wesleyan] Conference in 1866, he showed rare administrative ability. A calm and dispassionate speaker, a rich uncton often attending his utterances and a disposition like the beloved disciple, he occupies a high position among his brethren, while his pen richly dispenses widespread influence wherever his works are read. (Cyclopaedia, in loc.)

Arthur's book, The Tongue of Fire, (1856) had tremendous influence on America as well as over the English-speaking world. For many years and up to the time of Methodist Union, this book was one required in the course of study for young ministers in the M. E. Church, SOUTH. The theme of the book is that all Christianity waits upon and depends upon the power of the Holy Spirit, that God does his work "not by extraordinary people, but by giving ordinary people extraordinary power." It is still being reprinted in both England and the U.S.A.

His other publications include A Mission to Mysore (1847); The Successful Merchant (1852), which had wide circulation in its time; The People's Day, an appeal to Lord Stanley against his advocacy of a French Sunday (1855); The Modern Jove (1873), a review of the speeches of Pio Nono; The Life of Gideon Ouseley (1876); The Pope, the Kings and the People (1877); and Religion Without God and God Without Religion (1885-87), attacks on Frederick Harrison and Herbert Spencer. He wrote the Fernley Lecture of 1883, On the Difference Between Physical and Moral Law.

ARTICLES OF RELIGION. In American Methodism. The Articles of Religion, as abridged by JOHN WESLEY and sent over with the SUNDAY SERVICE, have always been accepted as standards of doctrine by the American Methodist Churches. The original METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, organized in 1784, adopted these Articles, and other Methodist Churches stemming from it in time likewise carried them. They have been published in every Book of Discipline of American Methodism since 1790, and the Book of Discipline itself was until 1968 always entitled the Doctrines and Discipline of The Methodist Church. The "doctrine" in this publication was and is largely, if not almost entirely, the Articles of Religion, though certain other material here and there in the Book of Discipline, as the GENERAL RULES and certainly the RITUAL, add to and embody the teachings of the Articles, while early inclusion of some Wesley tracts represented more strongly Wesleyan emphases.

Wesley sent over to the American Methodists twenty-four Articles of the Thirty-Nine. He did not feel it proper to send an Article corresponding to Article 38 of the Prayer Book which affirmed "the King's supremacy" and dealt also with "the civil majestates." In view of the just-ended American Revolution, Wesley's action in striking out this whole Article is easily understood. However, at the organizing CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE, the American Methodists felt that there ought to be some sort of corresponding Article relating to their Church and government. Thus with the twenty-four which Wesley sent, the American Methodists drew up what has been from that day to this, Article 23 of the Methodist Episcopal Churches. We show this distinctly American Article in its proper place in the Articles below. It has been slightly changed from the original 1784—or 1785—text, to meet the change in the American government that came in 1789.

At the 1808 GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church, when the representative General Conference was created, the Articles of Religion were specifically put beyond the reach of any action by such General Conference or succeeding conferences. This was done by the first RESTRICTIVE RULE which stated—and today states: "They (General Conference) shall not revoke, alter, or change our Articles of Religion, or establish any new standards or rules of doctrine contrary to our present existing and established standards of doctrine." This forever placed the Articles of Religion beyond the reach of the statutory action of a General Conference, save that conference's own initiative in recommending a constitutional change which it might do by two-thirds vote; needed also would be subsequent approval by three-fourths of the members of all the Annual Conferences present and voting. To date, there has been no serious proposal to amend the Articles of Religion in any respect, though there has been added to them in the newly organized (1968) United Methodist Church, the Confession of Faith of the former Evangelical United Brethren Church.

(See STANDARDS OF DOCTRINE, CONFESSION OF FAITH, SUNDAY SERVICE, and the GENERAL CONFERENCE for further study here.)

Below we print in the left hand column the text of the Prayer Book of the Church of England as it was in 1784. In the right hand column, in a word for word parallel, will be found Wesley's abridgment. Blank spaces indicate an omission on Wesley's part—and this of course entailed a positive stroke of his pen in striking out material in the Prayer Book. New material written in by Wesley is indicated by italics. No attempt is made here to interpret Wesley's omissions or give possible reasons why he made the changes he did. His position on many matters of doctrine will be discussed or explained in the various doctrinal articles which we carry elsewhere in this work. His omissions and the abridged text which he evidently approved—since he transmitted this to the American Methodists—may be variously interpreted by different persons.

(Wesley's abridgment)

I. Of Faith in the Holy Trinity.

THERE is but one living and true God, everlasting, without body, parts or passions; of infinite power, wisdom, and goodness, the Maker and Preserver of all things, both visible and invisible. And in unity of this Godhead there be three Persons, of one substance, power, and eternity; the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost.

II. Of the Word, or Son of God, which was made very Man.

THE Son, which is the Word of the Father, begotten from everlasting of the Father, the very and eternal God, and of one substance with the Father, took Man's nature in the womb of the blessed Virgin, of her substance, so that two whole and perfect Natures, that is to say, the Godhead and Manhood, were joined together in one Person, never to be divided, whereof is one Christ, very God, and very man; who truly suffered, was crucified, dead, and buried, to reconcile his Father to us, and to be a sacrifice, not only for original guilt, but also for all actual sins of men.

III. Of the going down of Christ into Hell.

As Christ died for us and was buried, so also is it to be believed that he went down into hell.

IV. Of the Resurrection of Christ.

CHRIST did truly rise again from death, and took again his body, with flesh, bones, and all things appertaining to the perfection of man's nature, where with he ascended into heaven, and there sitteth, until he return to judge all men at the last day.

V. Of the Holy Ghost.

THE Holy Ghost, proceeding from the Father and the Son, is of one substance, majesty, and glory with the Father and the Son, very and eternal God.

VI. Of the Sufficiency of the Holy Scriptures for salvation.

I. Of Faith in the Holy Trinity

There is but one living and true God, everlasting, without body or parts, of infinite power, wisdom, and goodness; the maker and preserver of all things, visible and invisible. And in unity of this Godhead there are three persons, of one substance, power, and eternity—the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost.

II. Of the Word, or Son of God, who was made very man

The Son, who was the Word of the Father, the very and eternal God, of one substance with the Father, took man's nature in the womb of the blessed Virgin; so that two whole and perfect natures, that is to say, the Godhead and Manhood, were joined together in one person, never to be divided; whereof is one Christ, very God and very Man, who truly suffered, was crucified, dead, and buried, to reconcile his Father to us, and to be a sacrifice, not only for original guilt, but also for the actual sins of men.

III. Of the Resurrection of Christ

Christ did truly rise again from the dead, and took again his body, with all things appertaining to the perfection of man's nature, where with he ascended into heaven, and there sitteth until he return to judge all men at the last day.

IV. Of the Holy Ghost

The Holy Ghost, proceeding from the Father and the Son, is of one substance, majesty, and glory, with the Father and the Son, very and eternal God.

V. Of the Sufficiency of the Holy Scriptures for salvation

HOLY Scripture containeth all things necessary to salvation: so that whatsoever is not read therein, nor may be proved thereby, is not to be required of any man, that it should be believed as an article of the Faith, or be thought requisite or necessary to salvation. In the name of the Holy Scripture we do understand those Canonical Books of the Old and New Testament, of whose authority was never any doubt in the Church.

Of the Names and Number of the Canonical Books.

GENESIS, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Deuteronomy, Joshua, Judges, Ruth, The First Book of Samuel, The Second Book of Samuel, The First Book of Kings, The Second Book of Kings, The First Book of Chronicles, The Second Book of Chronicles, The First Book of Esdras, The Second Book of Esdras, The Book of Esther, The Book of Job, The Psalms, The Proverbs, Ecclesiastes or the Preacher, Cantica, or Songs of Solomon, Four Prophets the Greater, Twelve Prophets the Less.

And the other books (as Hierome saith) the Church doth read for example of life, and instruction of manners; but yet doth it not apply them to establish any doctrine; such are these following:

The Third Book of Esdras, The Fourth Book of Esdras, The Book of Tobias, The Book Judith, The Rest of The Book of Esther, The Book of Wisdom, Jesus the Son of Sirach, Baruch the Prophet, the Song of the Three Children, The Story of Susanna, Of Bel and the Dragon, The Prayer of Manasses, The First Book of Maccabees, The Second Book of Maccabees.

All the Books of the New Testament as they are commonly received, we do receive and account them Canonical.

VII. Of the Old Testament.

THE Old Testament is not contrary to the New; for both in the Old and New Testament, everlasting life is offered to mankind by Christ, who is the only Mediator between God and man, being both God and man. Wherefore they are not to be heard, which feign that the old fathers did look only for transitory promises. Although the Law given from God by Moses, as touching Ceremonies and Rites, do not bind Christian men nor the civil precepts thereof ought of necessity to be received in any commonwealth; yet notwithstanding, no Christian man whatsoever is free from the obedience of the Commandments which are called Moral.

VIII. Of the Three Creeds.

THE three Creeds—Nicene Creed, Athanasius Creed, and that which is com-

The Holy Scriptures contain all things necessary to salvation; so that whatsoever is not read therein, nor may be proved thereby, is not to be required of any man that it should be believed as an article of faith, or be thought requisite or necessary to salvation. In the name of the Holy Scriptures we do understand those canonical books of the Old and New Testament of whose authority was never any doubt in the Church.

The names of the canonical books are:

Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Deuteronomy, Joshua, Judges, Ruth, The First Book of Samuel, The Second Book of Samuel, The First Book of Kings, The Second Book of Kings, The First Book of Chronicles, The Second Book of Chronicles, The Book of Ezra, The Book of Nehemiah, The Book of Esther, The Book of Job, The Psalms, The Proverbs, Ecclesiastes or the Preacher, Cantica or Song of Solomon, Four Prophets the Greater, Twelve Prophets the Less.

All The books of the New Testament, as they are commonly received, we do receive and account canonical.

VI. Of the Old Testament

The Old Testament is not contrary to the New; for both in the Old and New Testament everlasting life is offered to mankind by Christ, who is the only Mediator between God and man, being both God and man. Wherefore they are not to be heard who feign that the old fathers did look only for transitory promises. Although the law given from God by Moses as touching ceremonies and rites doth not bind Christians, nor ought the civil precepts thereof of necessity be received in any commonwealth: yet notwithstanding, no Christian whatsoever is free from the obedience of the commandments which are called moral.

monly called the Apostles' Creed—ought thoroughly to be received and believed: for they may be proved by most certain warrants of Holy Scripture.

IX. Of Original or Birth-Sin.

ORIGINAL sin standeth not in the following of Adam, (as the Pelagians do vainly talk,) but it is the fault and corruption of the nature of every man, that naturally is engendered of the offspring of Adam, whereby man is very far gone from original righteousness, and is of his own nature inclined to evil, so that the flesh lusteth always contrary to the Spirit; and therefore in every person born into this world, it deserveth God's wrath and damnation. And this infection of nature doth remain, yea, in them that are regenerated, whereby the lust of the flesh, called in Greek phronema sarkos, which some do expound the wisdom, some sensuality, some the affection, some the desire of the flesh, is not subject to the law of God. And although there is no condemnation for them that believe and are baptized, yet the Apostle doth confess, that concupiscence and lust hath of itself the nature of sin.

X. Of Free-Will.

THE condition of man after the fall of Adam is such, that he cannot turn and prepare himself, by his own natural strength and good works, to faith and calling upon God, wherefore we have no power to do good works, pleasant and acceptable to God, without the grace of God by Christ preventing us, that we may have a good will, and working with us when we have that good will.

XI. Of the Justification of Man.

We are accounted righteous before God, only for the merit of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ by Faith, and not for our own works or deservings: wherefore that we are justified by faith only is a most wholesome doctrine, and very full of comfort; as more largely is expressed in the Homily of Justification.

XII. Of Good Works.

ALBEIT that Good Works, which are the fruits of Faith, and follow after Justification, cannot put away our sins, and endure the severity of God's judgment; yet are they pleasing and acceptable to God in Christ, and do spring out necessarily of a true and lively Faith; insomuch that by them a lively faith may be as evidently known, as a tree discerned by the fruit.

XIII. Of Works before Justification.

WORKS done before the grace of Christ, and the inspiration of his Spirit, are

VII. Of Original or Birth Sin

Original sin standeth not in the following of Adam (as the Pelagians do vainly talk), but it is the corruption of the nature of every man, that naturally is engendered of the offspring of Adam, whereby man is very far gone from original righteousness, and of his own nature inclined to evil, and that continually.

VIII. Of Free Will

The condition of man after the fall of Adam is such that he cannot turn and prepare himself, by his own natural strength and works, to faith, and calling upon God; wherefore we have no power to do good works, pleasant and acceptable to God, without the grace of God by Christ preventing us, that we may have a good will, and working with us, when we have that good will.

IX. Of the Justification of Man

We are accounted righteous before God only for the merit of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, by faith, and not for our own works or deservings. Wherefore, that we are justified by faith only is a most wholesome doctrine, and very full of comfort.

X. Of Good Works

Although good works, which are the fruits of faith, and follow after justification, cannot put away our sins, and endure the severity of God's judgments; yet are they pleasing and acceptable to God in Christ, and spring out of a true and lively faith, insomuch that by them a lively faith may be as evidently known as a tree is discerned by its fruit.

not pleasant to God; forasmuch as they spring not of faith in Jesus Christ, neither do they make men meet to receive grace, or (as the School-authors say), deserve grace of congruity; yea, rather, for that they are not done as God hath willed and commanded them to be done, we doubt not but they have the nature of sin.

XIV. Of Works of Supererogation.

VOLUNTARY Works, besides, over and above God's commandments, which they call Works of Supererogation, cannot be taught without arrogance and impiety: for by them men do declare, that they do not only render unto God as much as they are bound to do, but that they do more for his sake, than of bounden duty is required: whereas Christ saith plainly, When ye have done all that are commanded you, say, We are unprofitable servants.

XV. Of Christ alone without sin.

CHRIST in the truth of our nature was made like unto us in all things, sin only except, from which he was clearly void, both in his flesh and in his spirit. He came to be the Lamb without spot, who, by sacrifice of himself once made, should take away the sins of the world; and sin, as St. John saith, was not in him. But all the rest, although baptized, and born again in Christ, yet offend in many things; and if we say we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us.

XVI. Of Sin after Baptism.

NOT every deadly sin willingly committed after Baptism, is sin against the Holy Ghost, and unpardonable. Wherefore the grant of repentance is not to be denied to such as fall into sin after Baptism. After we have received the Holy Ghost, we may depart from grace given, and fall into sin; and by the grace of God we may rise again, and amend our lives: and therefore they are to be condemned, which say, they can no more sin as long as they live here, or deny the place of forgiveness to such as truly repent.

XVII. Of Predestination and Election.

PREDESTINATION to life is the everlasting purpose of God, whereby (before the foundations of the world were laid) he hath constantly decreed by his counsel, secret to us, to deliver from curse and damnation those whom he hath chosen in Christ out of mankind, and to bring them by Christ to everlasting salvation, as vessels made to honour. Wherefore they which be endued with so excellent a benefit of God, be called according to God's purpose by his Spirit working in due season: they through grace obey the calling: they be

XI. Of Works of Supererogation

Voluntary works—besides, over and above God's commandments—which are called works of supererogation, cannot be taught without arrogance and impiety. For by them men do declare that they do not only render unto God as much as they are bound to do, but that they do more for his sake than of bounden duty is required; whereas Christ saith plainly: When ye have done all that is commanded of you, say, We are unprofitable servants.

XII. Of Sin after Justification

Not every sin willingly committed after justification, is the sin against the Holy Spirit, and unpardonable. Wherefore, the grant of repentance is not to be denied to such as fall into sin after justification. After we have received the Holy Spirit, we may depart from grace given, and fall into sin, and, by the grace of God, rise again and amend our lives. And therefore they are to be condemned who say they can no more sin as long as they live here; or deny the place of forgiveness to such as truly repent.

justified freely: they be made sons of God by adoption: they be made the image of his only begotten Son Jesus Christ: they walk religiously in good works, and, at length, by God's mercy, they attain to everlasting felicity.

As the godly consideration of predestination and our election in Christ is full of sweet, pleasant, and unspeakable comfort to godly persons, and such as feel in themselves the working of the Spirit of Christ, mortifying the works of the flesh and their earthly members, and drawing up their mind to high and heavenly things; as well because it doth greatly establish and confirm their faith of eternal salvation, to be enjoyed through Christ, as because it doth fervently kindle their love towards God: so for curious and carnal persons, lacking the Spirit of Christ, to have continually before their eyes the sentence of God's predestination, is a most dangerous downfall, whereby the devil dost thrust them either into desperation, or into wretchedness of most unclean living, no less perilous than desperation.

Furthermore, we must receive God's promises in such wise as they be generally set forth to us in Holy Scripture: and in our doings that will of God is to be followed which we have expressly declared unto us in the word of God.

XVIII. Of Obtaining Eternal Salvation Only by the Name of Christ.

THEY also are to be had accursed that presume to say that every man shall be saved by the law or sect which he professeth, so that he be diligent to frame his life according to that law, and the light of nature. For Holy Scripture doth set out unto us only the name of Jesus Christ, whereby men must be saved.

XIV. Of the Church.

THE visible church of Christ is a congregation of faithful men, in the which the pure word of God is preached, and the sacraments be duly ministered according to Christ's ordinance, in all those things that of necessity are requisite to the same. As the Church of Jerusalem, Alexandria, and Antioch, have erred; so also the Church of Rome hath erred; not only in their living and manner of Ceremonies, but also in matters of Faith.

XX. Of the Authority of the Church.

THE Church hath power to decree rites or ceremonies, and authority in controversies of faith; and yet it is not lawful for the Church to ordain any thing that is contrary to God's word written; neither may it expound one place of Scripture, that it be repugnant to another. Wherefore, although the Church be a witness and a keeper of holy writ, yet as it ought not to decree any thing against the same, so, besides the same ought it not to enforce any thing to be believed for necessity of salvation.

XXI. Of the Authority of General Councils.

GENERAL Councils may not be gathered together without the commandment and will of princes. And when they be gathered together (forasmuch as they be an assembly of men, whereof all be not governed with the Spirit and word of God), they may err, and sometimes have erred, even in things pertaining unto God. Wherefore things ordained by them as necessary to salvation have neither strength nor authority, unless it may be declared that they be taken out of Holy Scripture.

XXII. Of Purgatory.

THE Romish Doctrine concerning Purgatory, Pardons, Worshipping and Adoration, as well of Images as of Reliques, and also invocation of Saints is a fond thing, vainly invented, and grounded upon no warranty of Scripture, but rather repugnant to the Word of God.

XXIII. Of Ministering in the Congregation.

IT is not lawful for any man to take upon him the office of public preaching, or ministering the sacraments in the congregation, before he be lawfully called and sent to execute the same. And those we ought to judge lawfully called and sent which be chosen and called to this work by men who have public authority given unto them in the congregation, to call and send ministers into the Lord's vineyard.

XXIV. Of speaking in the Congregation in such a tongue as the people understandeth.

IT is a thing plainly repugnant to the word of God, and the custom of the primitive church, to have public prayer in the church, or to minister the sacraments, in a tongue not understood of the people.

XXV. Of the Sacraments.

SACRAMENTS ordained of Christ, be not only badges or tokens of Christian men's profession; but rather they be certain sure witnesses, and effectual signs of grace and God's good will towards us, by the which he doth work invisibly in us, and doth not only quicken, but also strengthen and confirm our faith in him.

There are two Sacraments ordained of Christ our Lord in the Gospel, that is to say, Baptism, and the Supper of the Lord.

Those five commonly called Sacraments, that is to say, Confirmation,

XIV. Of Purgatory

The Romish doctrine concerning purgatory, pardons, worshiping, and adoration, as well of images as of relics, and also invocation of saints, is a fond thing, vainly invented, and grounded upon no warrant of Scripture, but repugnant to the Word of God.

XV. Of speaking in the Congregation in such a Tongue as the People Understand

It is a thing plainly repugnant to the Word of God, and the custom of the primitive Church, to have public prayer in the church, or to administer the Sacraments, in a tongue not understood by the people.

XVI. Of the Sacraments

Sacraments ordained of Christ are not only badges or tokens of Christian men's profession, but rather they are certain signs of grace, and God's good will toward us, by which he doth work invisibly in us, and doth not only quicken, but also strengthen and confirm, our faith in him.

There are two Sacraments ordained of Christ our Lord in the Gospel; that is to say, Baptism and the Supper of the Lord.

Those five commonly called sacraments, that is to say, confirmation,

Penance, Orders, Matrimony, and Extreme Unction, are not to be accounted for Sacraments of the Gospel, being such as have grown, partly of the corrupt following of the Apostles, partly are states of life allowed in the Scriptures: but yet have not like nature of Sacraments with Baptism and the Lord's Supper, for that they have not any visible sign or ceremony ordained of God.

The Sacraments were not ordained of Christ to be gazed upon, or to be carried about; but that we should duly use them. And in such only as worthily receive the same, they have a wholesome effect or operation; but they that receive them unworthily, purchase to themselves damnation, as Saint Paul saith.

XXXVI. Of the Unworthiness of Ministers, which hinders not the effect of the Sacrament.

ALTHOUGH in the visible Church the evil be ever mingled with the good, and sometimes the evil have chief authority in the ministration of the word and sacraments: yet forasmuch as they do not the same in their own name, but in Christ's, and do minister by his commission and authority, we may use their ministry, both in hearing the word of God and in the receiving of the sacraments. Neither is the effect of Christ's ordinance taken away by their wickedness, nor the grace of God's gifts diminished from such as by faith and rightly do receive the sacraments ministered unto them, which be effectual because of Christ's institution and promise, although they be ministered by evil men.

Nevertheless, it appertaineth to the discipline of the Church that inquiry be made of evil ministers, and that they be accused by those that have knowledge of their offenses: and finally, being found guilty, by just judgment be deposed.

XXXVII. Of Baptism.

BAPTISM is not only a sign of profession, and mark of difference, whereby Christian men are discerned from others that be not christened; but it is also a sign of regeneration, or new birth, whereby as by an instrument, they that receive Baptism rightly, are grafted into the Church; the promises of forgiveness of sin, and of our adoption to be the sons of God by the Holy Ghost, are visibly signed and sealed; faith is confirmed, and grace increased by virtue of prayer unto God. The Baptism of young children is in any wise to be retained in the Church, as most agreeable with the institution of Christ.

penance, orders, matrimony, and extreme unction, are not to be counted for Sacraments of the Gospel; being such as have grown out of the corrupt following of the apostles, and partly are states of life allowed in the Scriptures, but yet have not the like nature of Baptism and the Lord's Supper, because they have not any visible sign or ceremony ordained of God.

The Sacraments were not ordained of Christ to be gazed upon, or to be carried about; but that we should duly use them. And in such only as worthily receive the same, they have a wholesome effect or operation; but they that receive them unworthily, purchase to themselves condemnation, as St. Paul saith. 1 Cor. 11:29.

XVII. Of Baptism

Baptism is not only a sign of profession and mark of difference whereby Christians are distinguished from others that are not baptized; but it is also a sign of regeneration or the new birth.

The baptism of young children is to be retained in the church.

XXVIII. Of the Lord's Supper.

THE Supper of the Lord is not only a sign of the love that Christians ought to have among themselves one to another; but rather is a Sacrament of our redemption by Christ's death: insomuch that to such as rightly, worthily, and with faith receive the same, the bread which we break is a partaking of the body of Christ, and likewise the cup of blessing is a partaking of the blood of Christ.

Transubstantiation, (or the change of the substance of bread and wine,) in the Supper of the Lord, cannot be proved by Holy Writ; but is repugnant to the plain words of Scripture, overthroweth the nature of a sacrament, and hath given occasion to many superstitions.

The body of Christ is given, taken, and eaten in the Supper, only after an heavenly and spiritual manner. And the mean whereby the body of Christ is received and eaten in the Supper is faith.

The Sacrament of the Lord's Supper was not by Christ's ordinance reserved, carried about, lifted up, or worshipped.

XXIX. Of the Wicked, which eat not the body of Christ in the use of the Lord's Supper.

THE wicked, and such as be void of a lively faith, although they do carnally and visibly press with their teeth (as St. Augustine saith) the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ; yet in no wise are they partakers of Christ, but rather to their condemnation do eat and drink the sign or sacrament of so great a thing.

XXX. Of both kinds.

THE cup of the Lord is not to be denied to the lay people: for both the parts of the Lord's Sacrament, by Christ's ordinance and commandment, ought to be ministered to all Christian men alike.

XXXI. Of the one Oblation of Christ finished upon the cross.

THE offering of Christ once made, is that perfect redemption, propitiation, and satisfaction for all the sins of the whole world, both original and actual: and there is no other satisfaction for sin but that alone. Wherefore the sacrifices of masses, in the which it was commonly said, that the priest did offer Christ for the quick and the dead, to have remission of pain or guilt, were blasphemous fables and dangerous deceits.

XXXII. Of the Marriage of Priests.

BISHOPS, priests, and deacons, are not commanded by God's law either to vow the estate of single life, or to abstain from marriage: therefore it is lawful for

XVIII. Of the Lord's Supper

THE Supper of the Lord is not only a sign of the love that Christians ought to have among themselves one to another, but rather is a sacrament of our redemption by Christ's death: insomuch that, to such as rightly, worthily, and with faith receive the same, the bread which we break is a partaking of the body of Christ; and likewise the cup of blessing is a partaking of the blood of Christ.

Transubstantiation, or the change of the substance of bread and wine in the Supper of our Lord, cannot be proved by Holy Writ, but is repugnant to the plain words of Scripture, overthroweth the nature of a sacrament, and hath given occasion to many superstitions.

The body of Christ is given, taken, and eaten in the Supper, only after a heavenly and spiritual manner. And the means whereby the body of Christ is received and eaten in the Supper is faith.

The Sacrament of the Lord's Supper was not by Christ's ordinance reserved, carried about, lifted up, or worshipped.

XIX. Of Both Kinds

THE cup of the Lord is not to be denied to the lay people; for both the parts of the Lord's Supper, by Christ's ordinance and commandment, ought to be administered to all Christians alike.

XX. Of the one Oblation of Christ, finished upon the Cross

THE offering of Christ, once made, is that perfect redemption, propitiation, and satisfaction for all the sins of the whole world, both original and actual; and there is none other satisfaction for sin but that alone. Wherefore the sacrifice of masses, in the which it is commonly said that the priest doth offer Christ for the quick and the dead, to have remission of pain or guilt, is a blasphemous fable and dangerous deceit.

XXI. Of the Marriage of Ministers

The ministers of Christ are not commanded by God's law either to vow the estate of single life, or to abstain from marriage: therefore it is lawful for them, as for all other Christian men, to marry at their own discretion, as they shall judge the same to serve better to godliness.

XXXIII. Of excommunicate Persons, how they are to be avoided.

THAT person which, by open denunciation of the Church, is rightly cut off from unity of the Church and excommunicated, ought to be taken of the whole multitude of the faithful as an heathen and publican, until he be openly reconciled by penance, and received into the Church by a judge that hath authority thereunto.

XXXIV. Of the Traditions of the Church.

IT is not necessary that traditions and ceremonies be in all places one, or utterly like; for at all times they have been diverse, and may be changed according to the diversity of countries, times, and men's manners, so that nothing be ordained against God's word. Whosoever, through his private judgment, willingly and purposely doth openly break the traditions and ceremonies of the Church, which be not repugnant to the word of God, and be ordained and approved of common authority, ought to be rebuked openly, (that other may fear to do the like,) as he that offendeth against the common order of the Church, and hurteth the authority of the magistrate, and woundeth the consciences of the weak brethren.

Every particular and national church hath authority to ordain, change, and abolish ceremonies or rites of the Church, ordained only by man's authority, so that all things be done to edifying.

XXXV. Of Homilies.

THE second Book of Homilies, the several titles whereof we have joined under this article, doth contain a goodly and wholesome doctrine, and necessary for these times, as doth the former Book of Homilies, which were set forth in the time of Edward the Sixth, and therefore we judge them to be read in Churches by the ministers diligently and distinctly, that they may be understood of the people.

Of the Names of the Homilies:

1. Of the Right Use of the Church.
2. Against Peril of Idolatry.
3. Of Repairing and Keeping Clean of Churches.
4. Of Good Works: First of Fasting.
5. Against Gluttony and Drunkenness.
6. Against Excess of Apparel.
7. Of Prayer.
8. Of the Place and Time of Prayer.
9. That Common Prayers and Sacraments Ought to be Ministered in a Known Tongue.
10. Of the reverend Estimation of God's Word.
11. Of Almsdoing.
12. Of the Nativity of Christ.

them, as for all other Christians, to marry at their own discretion, as they shall judge the same to serve best to godliness.

XXII. Of the Rites and Ceremonies of Churches

IT is not necessary that rites and ceremonies should in all places be the same, or exactly alike; for they have been always different, and may be changed according to the diversity of countries, times, and men's manners, so that nothing be ordained against God's Word. Whosoever, through his private judgment, willingly and purposely doth openly break the rites and ceremonies of the church to which he belongeth, which are not repugnant to the Word of God, and are ordained and approved by common authority, ought to be rebuked openly (that others may fear to do the like), as one that offendeth against the common order of the church, and woundeth the consciences of weak brethren.

Every particular church may ordain, change, or abolish rites and ceremonies, so that all things may be done to edification.

13. Of the Passion of Christ. 14. Of the Resurrection of Christ. 15. Of the Worthy Receiving of the Sacrament of the Body and Blood of Christ. 16. Of the Gifts of the Holy Ghost. 17. For the Rogation-days. 18. Of the State of Matrimony. 19. Of Repentance. 20. Against Idleness. 21. Against Rebellion.

XXXVI. Of Consecration of Bishops and Ministers.

THE Book of Consecration of Archbishops and Bishops, and ordering of Priests and Deacons, lately set forth in the time of Edward the Sixth, and confirmed at the same time by authority of Parliament, doth contain all things necessary to such consecration and ordering; neither hath it any thing that of itself is superstitious and ungodly. And, therefore, whosoever are consecrated or ordered according to the rites of that book, since the second year of the fore-named King Edward, unto this time or hereafter, shall be consecrated or ordered according to the same rites, we decree all such to be rightly, orderly, and lawfully consecrated and ordered.

XXXVII. Of the Civil Magistrates.

THE King's Majesty hath the chief power in this realm of England, and other his dominions, unto whom the chief government of all estates in this realm, whether they be ecclesiastical or civil, in all causes doth appertain; and is not, nor ought to be, subject to any foreign jurisdiction.

Whereas we attribute to the King's Majesty the chief government, by which titles we understand the minds of some slanderous folks to be offended; we give not our princes the ministering either of God's word, or of the sacraments; the which thing the Injunctions also lately set forth by Elizabeth our Queen do most plainly testify: but that only prerogative, which we see to have been given always to all godly princes in holy Scriptures by God himself; that is, that they should rule all states and degrees committed to their charge by God, whether they be ecclesiastical or temporal, and restrain with the civil sword the stubborn and evil-doers.

The Bishop of Rome hath no jurisdiction in this realm of England.

The Laws of the realm may punish Christian men with death, for heinous and grievous offences.

It is lawful for Christian men, at the commandment of the magistrate, to wear weapons, and serve in the wars.

XXXVIII. Of Christian men's Goods, which are not common.

THE riches and goods of Christians are not common, as touching the right, title,

XXIII. Of the Rulers of the United States of America

The President, the Congress, the general assemblies, the governors, and the councils of state as the delegates of the people, are the rulers of the United States of America, according to the division of power made to them by the Constitution of the United States and by the constitution of their respective states. And the said states are a sovereign and independent nation, and ought not to be subject to any foreign jurisdiction.

XXIV. Of Christian Men's Goods

The riches and goods of Christians are not common, as touching the right, title, and possession of the same, as certain Anabaptists do falsely boast. Notwithstanding, every man ought, of such things as he possesseth liberally to give alms to the poor, according to his ability.

XXXIX. Of a Christian Man's Oath.

AS we confess that vain and rash swearing is forbidden Christian men by our Lord Jesus Christ, and James his apostle: so we judge that Christian religion doth not prohibit but that a man may swear when the magistrate requireth, in a cause of faith and charity, so it be done according to the prophet's teaching, in justice, judgment, and truth.

In British Methodism. It should be noted that Wesley never established any Articles of Religion for British Methodism, and this is a mark that he never deliberately set up in Britain a Church polity and discipline separate from the Church of England, as he did for the new American nation. Separation came by a gradual process of unpremeditated drift. The British Conference of 1806 indeed resolved that doctrinal standards be drawn up (Minutes, Q. 32), and the American Articles were adopted, apart from the necessary alteration in XXIII. Though these were printed in the former WESLEYAN METHODIST Book of Offices, they never seem to have established themselves in use to any perceptible extent, and examination of candidates for the Local Preachers' Plan and the Ministry was always on the basis of the well-loved and venerable Standard Sermons and Notes. The Articles were dropped silently at the union of the churches in 1932, and British Methodism now has no Articles of Religion, though she has been at least as successful as other branches in avoiding doctrinal dispute, and in maintaining orthodoxy.

The Thirty-Nine Articles are for subscription by clergymen of the Church of England on institution into the incumbency of a parish, and in former days on admission to the Universities. They are therefore a distinct element in the doctrinal standards of the Church of John Wesley's upbringing. Wesley never had a parish of his own in England, but he would subscribe to these Articles on becoming a member of his Oxford Colleges, and we cannot doubt that he would do so with complete conscientiousness. Wesley constantly and truly insisted that he had not departed from the doctrine of the Church of England. His characteristic phrase is: "I simply described the plain, old religion of the Church of England, which is now almost everywhere spoken against, under the new name of Methodism" (Journal, Oct. 15, 1739). Indeed, his more intelligent opponents were fully aware of this, and when he cites his authorities for this doctrine he customarily includes these Articles.

That Wesley accepted some of these doctrinal positions may come as a surprise to some of his modern followers. And that this should be the situation is, when rightly understood, eloquent for the character of the Church of England, and of Wesley, her characteristic son. At the time when Europe divided between Roman Catholicism and down-the-line Protestantism, the English Reformation seriously attempted a middle way of moderation and comprehension. The Thirty-Nine Articles are and possession of the same, as some do falsely boast. Notwithstanding, every man ought, of such things as he possesseth liberally to give alms to the poor, according to his ability.

XXV. Of a Christian Man's Oath

As we confess that vain and rash swearing is forbidden Christian men by our Lord Jesus Christ and James his apostle; so we judge that the Christian religion doth not prohibit, but that a man may swear when the magistrate requireth, in a cause of faith and charity, so it be done according to the prophet's teaching, in justice, judgment, and truth.

to be viewed as a part, though only one part, of this middle way. Many of them were drawn up with a good deal of subtlety, and are designedly capable of interpretation in slightly different ways on some points which were at that time the subject of controversy. This was done for the purpose of holding together men of different views. In subscribing to these Articles Wesley would exercise this accepted liberty of interpretation, and we may sometimes see from his own writings how he exercised it.

In viewing Wesley's revision of these historic Articles, it is important to keep one thing in mind: That Wesley omitted some things does not mean that he repudiated them. For instance, he struck out Article III, affirming belief in the descent into hell, but he kept in the creed which he sent to American Methodism the clause affirming belief in the descent into hell (the American Methodists took this clause out of the Apostles' Creed almost immediately). We are upon safe ground by stating that experience had no doubt taught Wesley that some clauses in the Thirty-Nine Articles were not expedient to be made mandatory in the conditions of the new nation. No one has ever claimed that the Articles are a self-sufficient guide to Christian faith and practice, or that all the Articles are equally important, much less that they represent Wesleyan emphases. Wesley has not recorded his reasons for making his revision in the way he did, and so we are left to surmise. Perhaps his long experience in the leadership and controversies of Methodism had taught him that some of these venerable Articles were capable of difficulty or misunderstanding in the then present conditions, and might possibly be more so in America. It is an incontrovertible fact, however, that out of the thirty-nine, he took only twenty-four which he sent to America.

ARVADA, COLORADO, U.S.A. Arvada Church. "The first religious service ever held in the vicinity of Arvada was in the year 1866, when the Rev. D. W. Scott, Methodist pastor at Golden, preached here," according to Stone's history of Colorado, Vol. I, p. 665. The founding date of the Arvada Church remains obscure in the annals of history. The cornerstone of the present sanctuary, located at 6750 Carr St., reads as follows: "Arvada United Methodist Church founded ca 1870," denoting the obscurity of the founding dates. In 1870, Arvada appears in the conference journal as the "Blackhawk-Arvada" charge, with an enrollment of 30 members. The first church building was erected at a cost of $1,500. This venture incurred a debt of $300. In 1880 a parsonage was secured, valued at $800.

During its century of history the Arvada Church has been relocated twice, with the congregation taking the present location in 1963.

Arvada Church played the role of a small community church until the post war population boom began to transform Arvada from a small town into a thriving suburban community. In 1951 the population was about 2,300. The astronomical growth is reflected in the recent census of approximately 41,000. Church membership has increased from thirty as recorded in the first conference journal to about 2,000.

EARL K. HANNA

of Emanuel Church. He was graduated from the Theological School at Uppsala in 1906 and was received into the Sveriges Årskonferens (Swedish Conference) in full connection in 1909. He served as pastor at Växjö, 1906-09, at Östersund, 1909-15, and at St. Peter Church, STOCKHOLM, 1918-24. He was district superintendent of the Northern District, 1915-18, and of the Western, 1924-31. He was manager and director of the Methodist Book Concern and Methodist headquarters, Stockholm, 1931-46.

Arvidson was elected eight times as a GENERAL CONFERENCE delegate, and in 1942 was appointed to act as superintendent in charge of all Scandinavia because wartime conditions prevented a bishop from coming from the United States. In 1946, the Northern European Central Conference, meeting in Gothenburg, elected him bishop. He served seven years until he retired in 1953.

He was chairman of the Swedish Methodist Youth Organization (Epworth League), 1920-36; chairman of the Conference Board of Education, 1934-46; chairman of the Swedish Free Church Council, 1943-52; chairman of the Evangelical Alliance, Swedish Branch (after Prince Oscar Bernadotte), 1947-53; and a member of the Swedish Bible Society, 1947-57.

Bishop Arvidson was an eminent preacher and pastor, well known and highly esteemed, especially among students, for his sermons and Bible studies, his wide reading, and as a master of language. He wrote several books and translated most of the writings of E. STANLEY JONES and LESLIE WEATHERHEAD. Even after his retirement he was active as a preacher, lecturer and Bible study leader. He helped bridge the gap between Lutherans and Methodists in Scandinavia.

MANSFIELD HURTIG

ASBURY, DANIEL (1762-1825), early American preacher, was born in Fairfax Co., Va., on Feb. 18, 1762. Though not related to FRANCIS ASBURY, he served under the Bishop for many years and was a close friend.

Daniel Asbury went to KENTUCKY when he was about sixteen years old and was captured there by the Indians and carried to the Far West and then into CANADA. During the Revolutionary War he was taken prisoner by the British and jailed in DETROIT. He finally escaped and found his way back to VIRGINIA after spending five years in captivity.

He was converted and in 1786 was received into the conference and sent to Amelia Circuit in Virginia. Many important appointments followed, including districts in GEORGIA and NORTH CAROLINA. In the year following his admission he was sent to North Carolina, where he spent most of his later life. In 1789 he was sent to form the Lincoln Circuit, which covered three counties and parts of two others.

In 1794 he held the first camp meeting in the region, and WILLIAM MCKENDREE, Nicholas Watters, and other famous men were among the preachers. It was so successful that another camp meeting was held the next year at Bethel in Lincoln County, N. C. The Rock Springs Camp Ground, near Denver, N. C., is the descendant of the first camp meeting at Rehoboth.

THEODOR ARVIDSON

ARVIDSON, AUGUST THEODOR (1883-1964), bishop of the Central Conference of Northern Europe, was born in Järpås, SWEDEN, Oct. 13, 1883. His parents were Lutherans, but as a young man he came into contact with Methodism in GOTHENBURG and became a member

In 1824 Daniel Asbury asked for and was granted the superannuate relation. He settled near the present Terrell in Catawba Co., N. C., where he met and married Nancy Morris. Here, in 1791, he organized Rehoboth Church, the first west of the Catawba. It was housed in a log building with a shed on one side for Negroes, and the congregation flourishes to this day.

In the Rehoboth churchyard, where he was buried, is a marker with this inscription:

Rev. Daniel Asbury, the pioneer preacher of Methodism in Western N. C. was born Feb. 18, 1762, died May 5, 1825. He organized here the first circuit in 1789 and the same year organized the first Methodist Church in the State, west of the Catawba River. The first church building was erected in 1791. The first camp meeting was held here in 1794.

LOUISE L. QUEEN

ASBURY, FRANCIS (1745-1816), first general superintendent or bishop of American Methodism and its greatest figure, was born in the parish of Handsworth, near Birmingham, Eng., on Aug. 20/21, 1745. His parents, Joseph and Elizabeth Asbury, had only one other child, a daughter who died in infancy; and since he himself was never married, the immediate family left no descendants, though Herbert Asbury claimed collateral descent.

Early Years. Young Asbury received little formal education, but he could read the Bible in his seventh year. He became an apprentice blacksmith at the Old Forge, which was owned by a Methodist named Foxall. He became intimate with the son, Henry, who later became a rich iron merchant in America and built the Foundry Methodist Church in Washington, D.C., the name of which was reminiscent of the forge in England. Asbury dedicated the premises in 1810.

Asbury was converted soon after he entered the apprenticeship, became a local preacher, joined the conference, and served five circuits. On August 17, 1771, at the conference in Bristol he responded to JOHN WESLEY'S call for volunteers to go to America, and with RICHARD WRIGHT he sailed almost immediately, landing at Philadelphia on October 27.

Following Wesley's example, he began writing his Journal on shipboard. But whereas Wesley said he came to the New World to learn the true sense of the gospel by preaching it to the Indians, Asbury came avowedly as an evangelist. "I am going to live to God," he wrote, "and bring others so to do."

Beginnings in America. After ten days in Philadelphia, Asbury proceeded to New York, where he found RICHARD BOARDMAN, who had arrived in 1769. Boardman believed in a "settled ministry," but Asbury desired "a circulation of preachers" and was distressed because both were present at the same time. "My brethren seem unwilling to leave the cities," he wrote, "but I think I will show them the way." This was a notable decision; it initiated the era of the circuit rider and established itinerancy firmly in American Methodism. The preachers followed the advancing frontier and the fluctuating population, and their movement spread everywhere. Soon the conference adopted a time limit of six months, with three months for the preachers in Philadelphia and New York.

Asbury proceeded to "show them the way" by mounting a horse and riding through the ensuing years more than a quarter of a million miles, surpassing the traveling record of John Wesley. Until his death forty-five years later he never had a home of any kind. During the Revolution he retired to the home of Judge THOMAS WHITE near Dover, Delaware, for about twenty months, but he continued to preach throughout the state.

The war stimulated the desire of the American Methodists for the ordinances at the hands of their own preachers, none of whom were ordained. This desire was opposed by both Asbury and Wesley. In 1779 the VIRGINIA preachers held a conference at Broken Back Church in Fluvanna County where they ordained each other and decided to administer the ordinances. Asbury rushed to their next conference at Manakintown in Powhatan County and persuaded them to defer their action for a year.

These developments finally forced Wesley to take action. As a result of reading Lord King's book on The Primitive Church he had become convinced that bishops and presbyters were of the same order and that he, as a presbyter of the Church of England, was also an "episcopos" and had the right to ordain. Accordingly he set aside by the imposition of his hands and prayer Dr. THOMAS COKE and sent him to America to consecrate similarly Francis Asbury, with the title "general superintendent"—changed by Asbury in 1788 to "bishop," an act which brought opposition in the New World and the denunciation of Wesley, but which, in view of Wesley's own words, the GENERAL CONFERENCE allowed to stand.

Organization of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Asbury refused to accept the appointment of an Englishman so soon after the Revolution and said he would await election by the preachers. At the famous CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE, which assembled at Baltimore on Dec. 24, 1784, and continued until Jan. 3, the Methodist Episcopal Church in America was organized as the world's first independent Methodist denomination. Asbury was unanimously elected and consecrated, the status of Dr. Coke was recognized, COKESBURY COLLEGE in Maryland was established, and all the machinery of the church was set in motion.

Immediately Asbury rode southward to Charleston, S. C. On the return trip he met Coke near Louisburg, N. C., at the home of Major GREEN HILL, a local preacher and Revolutionary officer. There they held an annual conference—the first of the new church, although conferences had been held annually since 1773.

Thereafter Asbury each year rode the rounds from New England to Charleston, usually going one way along the Atlantic coast and the other west of the mountains. More than sixty times he crossed the Appalachian range. In the main he spent the nights in the cabins of the settlers, often crowded in one room with the family, children, and dogs. Once Bishop WHATCOAT slept on the bed while Asbury and a strange lady slept on the floor. Once he slept with sixteen adults and several children in seven beds in one vermin-infested room, and on his first visit to NASHVILLE, TENNESSEE, he slept in the jail. None of these discomforts deterred the man who said, "Live or die, I must ride."

But his accommodations were not always so primitive. GOVERNOR TIFFIN of Ohio and VAN CORTLANDT of New York entertained him. Among his favorite stopping places were the houses of the prominent and wealthy HENRY DORSEY GOUGH of Maryland, James Rembert of South Carolina, Judge Thomas White of Delaware, Colonel Thomas Dorsey of Maryland, PHILIP BARRATT of Delaware, and many others. He was once invited to spend the night with George Washington but could not do so because he "must hurry on."

His Last Days. Asbury attended his last conference in October, 1815, at Bethlehem Meeting House, a log chapel near LEBANON, TENNESSEE, in which the Woman's Missionary Society of the M. E. Church, South, was later organized. Because of failing eyesight he turned over to Bishop McKENDREE the stationing of the preachers—the first time he had ever done so. The two bishops separated expecting to meet at the VIRGINIA CONFERENCE at Raleigh, N. C.

Asbury then crossed the mountains into North and South Carolina. The last entry in his Journal was made on Dec. 7, 1815, at Granby, S. C. This was at the head of navigation of the Congaree River opposite Columbia. Nothing remains of the community except a marker on a stone in a field, but it was once important enough to be visited by George Washington. The year following Asbury's visit the Granby courthouse was sold and moved across the river to Columbia, where it became a Presbyterian church; the father of Woodrow Wilson was pastor there when the future President was fourteen years old.

From this area the bishop and his traveling companion, JOHN WESLEY BOND, turned northward to Virginia, determined to reach the General Conference at Baltimore. At Richmond the bishop could neither walk nor stand, but he insisted on preaching. He was carried in arms into the church and preached his last sermon sitting on a table and supported by pillows. The travelers pushed on at a snail's pace toward Baltimore, but near Spottsylvania in Virginia he collapsed and was carried into the log cabin home of George Arnold, an old friend. Two days he lingered, and once he tried to preach. On Sunday afternoon, March 31, 1816, he passed away, trying in his last delirium to take up a missionary collection.

There was a funeral attended by a large company from the neighborhood, and he was buried at Arnold's. On the first day of the General Conference John Wesley Bond and a committee were sent to remove the body to Baltimore. "A vast procession," said to have been the largest ever seen in Baltimore up to that time, led by Bishop McKendree, followed the body from Light Street Church to Eutaw Street Church, where McKendree preached the funeral sermon. The body was buried in the church, a noble epitaph being placed over the tomb, and there it rested for forty years. Subsequently, in 1854, it was removed to Mount Olivet Cemetery, in Baltimore, where it rests with the remains of ROBERT STRAWBRIDGE, JESSE LEE, Reuben Ellis, Wilson Lee, John Haggerty, Bishops GEORGE, EMORY and WAUGH, and other leaders of early Methodism.

His Abiding Contribution. Francis Asbury was a foremost creator of the American heritage. Cities, streets, colleges, churches, and individuals bear his name. His blue eyes look out from stained-glass windows on both sides of the Atlantic. In England his boyhood home is a municipally designated shrine. When his feet touched the American shore they never touched another, and because of his devotion and spiritual contribution a celebrated British artist painted as his coat of arms the American shield upheld by angels.

He became the best-known man in America. He traveled more, knew more people, and had a better knowledge of the trails, towns, and villages, than any other person. In his last letter he told a correspondent in England to address him simply in "America."

Asbury founded at Thomas Crenshaw's in Hanover County, Va., the first SUNDAY SCHOOL in America, just as HANNAH BALL, a Methodist, started in England a Sunday school fourteen years before Robert Raikes started what some historians have called the first in the world. The Christmas Conference instructed the preachers, all unlearned men, to preach annually on education, and to those who insisted that they had no gift for this the reply was, "Gift or no gift, you are to do it." In North Carolina in 1780 he raised the first money ever given for Methodist education in America, and in Virginia he promoted the EBENEZER ACADEMY, which was established in 1784, three years before Cokesbury College opened its doors. "How many institutions of learning, some of them rejoicing in the name of Wesleyan," said President Calvin Coolidge, "all trace their existence to the service and sacrifice of this lone circuit rider." In 1789 in North Carolina he founded the Arminian Magazine; it did not long survive, but it reappeared in 1818, and with some lapses and under different names it survives to this day. In 1789 he started the METHODIST PUBLISHING HOUSE, which is now the greatest of its kind in the world.

Asbury sits in bronze on his horse in the nation's capital. In unveiling the great monument President Coolidge declared: "His outposts marched with the pioneers, his missionaries visited the hovels of the poor, that all might be brought to a knowledge of the truth. Who shall say where his influence, written on the immortal souls of men, shall end? He is entitled to rank as one of the builders of our nation."

ASBURY, NEW JERSEY, U.S.A., located in Warren County near the Hunterdon County line, was the first town in the U.S.A. to be named in honor of Bishop FRANCIS ASBURY. The home of Col. WILLIAM McCULLOUGH in Hall's Mills was Asbury's abode on numerous occasions, the scene of his preaching, and the center of itinerant Methodist activity affecting much of New Jersey's northwestern territory. Under McCullough's leadership, a Methodist meeting house was erected in 1796, with Asbury participating in the ceremony of cornerstone laying. The chapel was named for Asbury, and at McCullough's suggestion the village was renamed "Asbury" at the same time. The action was the culmination of more than a decade of Methodist preaching in and around Hall's Mills. McCullough had settled there in 1784, after his Revolutionary War service, and found that the early preaching of JOSEPH EVERETT in the vicinity in 1782 had planted Methodist seed which bore fruit in the formation of a society in 1786. McCullough's mansion on the banks of the Musconetcong River was a preaching place and a home where itinerants were welcomed. It is still standing. EZEKIEL COOPER mentions stopping there in 1787 and meeting the class. Asbury and RICHARD WHATCOAT stopped with McCullough on June 29, 1789.

In 1803, on a visit to the area and to McCullough's, Francis Asbury refers in his Journal to "Asbury Town."

The town became the head of an extensive circuit embracing parts of three counties in northern New Jersey. It has been successively in the PHILADELPHIA, NEW JERSEY, and NEWARK CONFERENCES, and is now in the NORTHERN NEW JERSEY CONFERENCE.

The original Asbury meeting house was replaced by a larger, steepled church in 1842. This was destroyed by fire in 1913, when the present brick edifice was erected.

ASBURY COLLEGE, Baltimore, Md., was begun in 1816 as a stock company under SAMUEL K. JENNINGS, physician, local preacher, and the biographer-designate of FRANCIS ASBURY. BALTIMORE City Station assumed the debt of $8,500 and took control of the school in 1817. However, financial woes were unabated and an appeal for subscriptions was made by the 1818 BALTIMORE CONFERENCE. Inability to finance a building and the embarrassment of other debts led the male members of the church to divest themselves of the college in 1819, and by the following year its doors were closed permanently. MARTIN RUTER, educator and later pioneer of TEXAS Methodism, was awarded an Asbury M.A. in 1818.

ASBURY COLLEGE, Wilmore, Ky., was founded in 1890 by John Wesley Hughes, a member of the KENTUCKY CONFERENCE, M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH. Ownership was vested with the founder until 1905 when he transferred the property to a self-perpetuating board of trustees. The board is bound in perpetuity to operate a college according to the doctrinal standards set up by John Wesley and his immediate followers.

The college is known internationally and ranks at the top among liberal arts colleges in the U.S.A. in the number of its graduates who have entered the ministry and other fields of Christian service. The majority of the students it enrolls are members of Methodist churches.

HENRY CLAY MORRISON, distinguished evangelist of the M. E. Church, South, served the college as president for twenty-five years. All of the men who have served as president since 1890 have been Methodist ministers.

ASBURY COTTAGE (England). This tiny cottage of four rooms, which was the boyhood home of FRANCIS ASBURY, is situated in the country borough of West Bromwich which adjoins the city of BIRMINGHAM. It is the property of the Borough Council, and has been registered as a historic building. It was reopened in November 1959 after restoration and furnishing, through the cooperation of the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL with the Borough Council, and is open for visitors. Methodist services were conducted in the kitchen for many years in the eighteenth century.

ASBURY MANUAL LABOR SCHOOL was authorized by the INDIAN MISSION CONFERENCE on Nov. 4, 1847 at Doaksville, Indian Territory. Bishop WILLIAM CAPERS presided and appointed Thomas B. Ruble to establish and superintend the work.

A three-story brick building was erected on an 80-acre tract northeast of the present city of EUFAULA, OKLA. Asbury represented for scores of Indian children the only opportunity for any schooling throughout a large area. It planted Methodism solidly in the hearts of the Indian people. Several sessions of the Indian Mission Conference were held within its walls.

During the Civil War the smaller buildings of Asbury were burned and the large building received extensive damage. Thomas Bertholf, superintendent during the entire course of the war, was given the task of rebuilding the school. After his death in 1867, John Harrell took up the work until 1868, when he was relieved by Thomas Ruble. Fire destroyed the main building in 1869. John Harrell returned as superintendent and rebuilt and restarted the school. After another disastrous fire in 1887, the school was not rebuilt. Later Eufaula Boarding School was established to carry on the work so nobly begun.

An imposing memorial has been erected at the outskirts of Eufaula in memory of the school and its leaders. The stones of the memorial are stones rescued from the ruins of the original school and stand today to recall the heroism of those who saw Asbury through its remarkable history.

ASBURY THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY is a graduate school of theology, located in Wilmore, Jessamine Co., Ky. It was founded in 1923, on the campus of Asbury College, by HENRY CLAY MORRISON, then president of ASBURY COLLEGE, and his faculty colleagues, as a graduate theological seminary committed to the historic Wesleyan interpretation of evangelical Christianity. The founder, Henry Clay Morrison, became the first president of the Seminary, serving until his death on March 24, 1942.

From 1923 to 1931 the Seminary was an integral part of Asbury College. In 1931 Articles of Incorporation were drawn up and the Seminary became a separate institution. In 1939 the Seminary moved to its own campus (across the street from the College) and the curriculum of each school became independent of the other. In 1941 Asbury Theological Seminary became an independent administrative unit, and has operated as such since that date.

It is an accredited member of the American Association of Theological Schools in the United States and Canada. The Articles of Incorporation of the Seminary declare its objective to be: "To prepare and send forth a well-trained, sanctified, Spirit-filled, evangelistic ministry."

The Seminary offers courses leading to the three degrees of Master of Divinity, Master of Religious Education, and Master of Theology. The present faculty numbers thirty. The current annual enrollment is 409. Alumni with earned degrees total 1,875. These serve in all fifty states of the U.S.A., the District of Columbia, and in forty-three other countries. Among the alumni, 1,263 serve as local pastors, 207 as missionaries, 155 as teachers, 46 as chaplains, 31 as full-time evangelists. Even though approximately eighty percent of the graduates are in Methodist bodies, more than forty different denominations are served by the alumni.

Asbury Theological Seminary has had three presidents: Henry Clay Morrison (1923-42); JULIAN C. MCPHEETERS (1942-62); FRANK BATEMAN STANGER (1962-); and the following deans: Frank Paul Morris (1923-24); Fred H. Larabee (1924-46); William D. Turkington (1946-63); J. Harold Greenlee (1963-64); Maurice E. Culver (1964-67); and Robert A. Traina (1967-).

The Seminary is engaged in an extensive program of academic and physical expansion.

ASBURY TRAIL. FRANCIS ASBURY crossed the Appalachian Mountains about sixty times, using different routes. In 1810 he took "the new route" and followed the old aboriginal Cataloochee Trail, along which the Cherokee Indians crossed the mountains. In 1799 the trail was mentioned in literature and called a "turnpike." By that time the Indians had abandoned their settlements along the trail, although the area remained within their hunting grounds and was protected by law. The old trail runs from Cove Creek, N. C., to the area around Cosby, Tenn. In general it parallels present Highway 284 and coincides with that road at several points. It is still possible to identify parts of the trail where it leaves the highway.

In 1955 the Boy Scouts of America and the Western North Carolina Historical Society, with the help of the American ASSOCIATION OF METHODIST HISTORICAL SOCIETIES, sponsored the Asbury Trail Award for Explorer Scouts and their fathers. The Award consists of a medal and a certificate, and the requirements are: hiking the old Cataloochee Trail, reading one of the recommended biographies of Asbury, and submitting an essay of not less than 1,000 words on Asbury and his contribution to America. The official hike covers approximately 23 miles. The Award is non-denominational.

ASHBY, DORIS MAY (?-1955), New Zealand laywoman, was a granddaughter of J. W. Worboys, an honored Methodist minister. She was associated in young womanhood with the Thorndon Methodist Church, WELLINGTON, and served on the national executive committee of the Young Women's Bible Class Union.

Following her marriage to E. W. Ashby, she was associated successively with Invercargill Central Church and Wesley Church, DUNEDIN. While in Dunedin she served a term as national secretary of the Methodist Women's Missionary Union. She died in Dunedin on April 18, 1955.

ASHBY, JOSEPH (1859-1919), British Methodist, was born at Tysoe, Warwickshire, in June 1859. He was a shepherd boy at ten, a convert to Wesleyan Methodism at sixteen; he became a successful farmer, a justice of the peace, and a leader of agricultural workers in their struggle for self-betterment. His daughter's biography of him is an important source for the influence of Methodism on the Victorian countryside.

ASHCRAFT, EDWIN PERRY (1879-1961), American missionary of the FREE METHODIST CHURCH IN CHINA, 1916-47. He was born in Proctor, Texas, Sept. 28, 1879. He received the A.B. and M.A. degrees at the University of Southern California, Los Angeles. He married Harriet Coyner in 1904.

Ashcraft joined the Southern California Conference of the Free Methodist Church, and was a professor in the Free Methodist Seminary at Los Angeles, 1909-16. Appointed missionary to China in 1916, he was made the superintendent there in 1920. Preeminently a man of prayer, he was a Christlike missionary, a wise and tactful administrator. He served the China mission until 1947. He made a special trip to China following the second World War to assist the conference leaders in reestablishing the mission. After retirement he rejoined the faculty of Los Angeles Pacific College, 1952-55.

He died in Altadena, Calif. on Oct. 2, 1961, one of the best-loved persons in Free Methodism.

ASHEVILLE, NORTH CAROLINA, U.S.A., is a city of over 60,000 in western NORTH CAROLINA, and from early days a place hospitable to Methodism. The first settlers in Asheville and Buncombe County were Methodists, Baptists, and Presbyterians. For some time the only preaching they had was by traveling ministers. When FRANCIS ASBURY crossed the mountains from TENNESSEE in 1800 and followed the French Broad River through Hot Springs (then known as Warm Springs) to Killians in Beaverdam, and to Buncombe Courthouse, he found

ASBURY TRAIL AWARD

Methodists waiting for him. He wrote in his Journal: "TOBIAS GIBSON had given notice to some of my being at Buncombe County Courthouse and the Society at Killions." After that and from 1801 through 1813, with the exception only of 1804 and 1811, Asbury made annual visitations to Asheville. Asbury Memorial Church is the successor to the society which met at Killians in that early date.

F. A. Sondley in his History of Buncombe County states that the first church building in Asheville was the old log church used by Baptists which stood at the Melke place. It was built about 1829 and stood until 1842. "Apparently," wrote Sondley, "the next church after that at Melke place built in Asheville was an inferior frame structure of the Methodists."

Asheville has located near it some important denominational summer assembly grounds. LAKE JUNALUSKA, an assembly of Southeastern Jurisdiction United Methodists, is located twenty-five miles west of Asheville. This assembly, together with the Presbyterian assembly at Montreat, the Baptist assembly at Ridgecrest, the Episcopal assembly at Kanuga, the Lutheran assembly at Lutheridge, the Christian assembly at Christmont, the Associated Reformed Presbyterian assembly, Bonclarken, at Flat Rock, and the Blue Ridge Y.M.C.A. assembly, bring to Asheville during the year many of the religious leaders of the world.

Asheville was host to the GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH, in 1910, and after unification the first conference of the Southeastern Jurisdiction was held in the Asheville Civic Auditorium in 1940.

Within the city limits of Asheville there are now fourteen Methodist churches with a membership of 7,660 and property valued at $3,500,000.

Allen High School, a secondary school for Negro girls located at Asheville, was founded in October, 1887, by the WOMAN'S HOME MISSIONARY SOCIETY of the M. E. Church. In 1941 it came under the supervision of the Women's Division of Christian Service of the Board of Missions, The Methodist Church. The school was named for Mrs. Marriage Allen of London, England, who gave money for the construction of a dormitory building. The land was given by Dr. and Mrs. L. M. Pease of New York City.

In the beginning only elementary work was provided. Later one year of high school work was added and gradually the curriculum was extended until Allen became a four-year accredited high school in 1924. Since January, 1940 it has been a member of the Southern Association of Colleges and Secondary Schools.

The original buildings were replaced in 1952 by a dormitory known as the Muriel Day Residence Hall, and a school building, including an auditorium with a seating capacity of 288, was completed in May, 1956 Enrollment averages about 150 students, two-thirds of whom are dormitory students.

The Brooks-Howell Home for retired deaconesses and missionaries was started in Asheville in 1957, the location having been chosen because of its climate, churches, medical facilities, and cultural opportunities. The home was named for Mrs. Frank G. Brooks, then president of the Woman's Division of Christian Service, and MABEL K. HOWELL, a resident of Asheville who had taught for many years at SCARRITT COLLEGE and had been an inspiration to many young women going into full-time Christian service. The home in 1970 has a capacity for ninety residents, with adequate infirmary, library, crafts, and recreational facilities. The residents are making significant contributions to the various churches and to the religious life of the community.

Central Methodist Church. In 1837 there were three congregations in the town: Presbyterians, Baptists and Methodists, but all worshipped in the old wooden Methodist church. On July 20, 1830, two years after the structure was erected, James A. Alexander gave title to the land on which this building was located, including the building erected "for a female academy and Methodist Episcopal Church and Sunday school . . . as a gift for the use of the M. E. Church, and when the same is not in the occupancy of the said church, ministers of any other regular orthodox denomination of Christians who shall come duly authorized by their respective Churches, and whose moral and religious character and habits are unexceptionable, may be authorized to occupy as transient visitors."

In 1848 this church had a membership of 65 whites and 59 colored people. About 1857 the old building was superseded by a brick building which in turn was replaced in 1903 by a stone edifice which is known as Central Church, and one which has traditionally been considered one of the commanding churches of North Carolina Methodism and the WESTERN NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE. The 1970 membership was 2,440, and the total value of the church's property was $1,650,000.

General Minutes, ME, MES, TMC. EMBREE H. BLACKARD

ASHGROVE and CAMBRIDGE, NEW YORK, U.S.A.

PHILIP EMBURY left NEW YORK CITY about 1770, along with other relatives and friends, to take up residence in upper New York State. They settled in the Camden Valley, some forty miles above what is now the city of Troy. J. E. Bowen states that Embury moved for several reasons. "First, to attend to land interests held in common with two brothers and five other individuals, each holding patent titles to one thousand acres of land. Second, to build a permanent home for himself and family away from the wild excitements and growing immorality of the city. Third, possibly to escape the shock of Revolutionary conflict, already impending. Fourth and lastly, but not least, to institute a colony and organize a Methodist Society, the beginning of a church enterprise for all time."

Whatever the reasons, it is certain that Embury organized a Methodist society at Ashgrove in 1770 or 1771. He was given encouragement and support by Thomas Ashton, a Methodist layman who had emigrated from Ireland and who had preceded Embury to the Camden Valley. Ashton was the first member of the new society and for many years thereafter was the leading layman. He organized many classes in the surrounding countryside in later years.

Embury's life in his new surroundings was brief. Three years after his arrival, in August of 1773, he fell ill and died. Abraham Bininger, an aged Moravian missionary who was part of Embury's emigrant colony, cared for him in his last illness and preached his funeral sermon.

For a number of years Embury's remains were buried in an unmarked grave. About sixty years after his death, his remains were taken from the unmarked grave and reinterred in the burial ground next to the Ashgrove church. Above his grave a marble tablet was erected bearing the following inscription:

PHILIP EMBURY

The earliest American Minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church here found his last earthly resting place.

Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints. Born in Ireland, an emigrant to New York, Embury was the first to gather a little class in that city, and to set in motion a train of measures which resulted in the founding of the John Street Church, the cradle of American Methodism, and the introduction of a system which has beautified the earth with salvation and increased the joys of heaven.

Thirty years later, during the CENTENNIAL OF AMERICAN METHODISM in 1866, Embury's remains were again moved, this time to Woodland Cemetery in the nearby village of Cambridge. There his remains rest today upon a hill. His grave is marked by the marble tablet referred to above and by a tall memorial shaft erected in 1873 at a cost of $2,000. The shaft was given by the local preachers of the M. E. Church.

Although the society was organized in 1770 or 1771, it was not until 1788 that the first church building was erected in Ashgrove. Quite probably the lack of pastoral oversight by an ordained minister and the uncertain conditions existing prior to, during, and after the Revolutionary War account for the delay in the building of a church edifice. By the early 1830's the society decided to build a larger place of worship. The first building was given to the Methodist society at Sandgate, Vt. They took it down, moved it, and erected it again in Sandgate. It was used for a number of years as a church and, after the society there disbanded, the building was sold to the town and is today used as the Town Hall.

A second church building was erected at Ashgrove in 1833. It was set on fire and destroyed on Nov. 6, 1835, by one Jonathan Curtis, a member of the congregation. A somewhat singular character, he had come to the conclusion that the building was an object of pride to many of the Methodists who worshipped there. Feeling they were in danger of becoming idolators, and so losing their souls, he decided to destroy the building.

In 1836 the quarterly conference set in motion plans for the building of a new church. Since the population center had shifted to what is now the village of Cambridge, it was voted to build the new church there. The building was started in 1836 and finished in 1837. A replica of the original building at Ashgrove can be seen in the Cambridge Church today.

Not everyone was satisfied with the move to Cambridge, and to mollify those who felt there should still be a church at Ashgrove, a chapel was built at the old site in 1839. This was used until 1858, when it was sold and moved to West Hebron, N. Y., to be used as a church.

Nothing remains at Ashgrove of a once flourishing church but the graveyard in which are the remains of Methodist stalwarts like Thomas Ashton and John Baker, and the foundation stones of one of the early church buildings. The site was designated as a Methodist Landmark by the TROY CONFERENCE at its 1966 session.

However, at Cambridge the Methodist society established by Philip Embury in 1770 or 1771 continues to witness and to serve the cause of Christ. This society was recognized at the Bicentennial Conference observance in 1966 as the oldest continuing congregation in the Troy Conference.

C. WESLEY CHRISTMAN, JR.

ASHLAND, KENTUCKY, U.S.A., First Church has a history which is really that of two strong churches, the former First M. E. Church, South and the former First M. E. Church.

When Ashland was laid out in town lots in 1854, the Kentucky Iron, Coal and Manufacturing Co. offered free sites to churches capable of erecting suitable buildings. Among the six congregations taking advantage of this offer were the First M. E. Church, whose lot was at 15th St. and Carter Ave., and the M. E. Church, South, whose lot was at 13th St. and Winchester Ave. These two churches flourished. Antedating them is authentic documentation outlining the beginnings of organized Methodism in the area.

In 1919 the First M. E. congregation built the present red sandstone church at 18th St. and Carter Ave., and in 1927 the First M. E. South erected the activities building which is now occupied by the Ashland Community College of the University of Kentucky. The completed plan, which would have included a cathedral-like sanctuary, was never finished.

National depression years forced these faithful congregations into dire circumstances, but dedication to high Christian purpose prevailed within the two congregations. A plan of successful unification, developed in 1937, was a forerunner of the final unification of these two branches of The Methodist Church in 1939.

At the time of merger Guy Coffman was the pastor of the First M. E. Church, South, and Carl E. Vogel was pastor of First M. E. On Sunday, Jan. 30, 1938, at the first service of the merged churches, Coffman preached the sermon on the text, "They were all with one accord in one place" (Acts 2:1). On alternate Sundays each of these ministers preached—one in the morning, the other in the evening.

Out of First Church have come at least six ministers serving in the KENTUCKY CONFERENCE: Eugene P. Barbour, Jr., W. B. Gamett, Jr., William R. Jennings, William L. Stratton, George Van Home, Jr., Robert W. Van Home, and Robert Rise who is in the LOUISVILLE CONFERENCE. A strong missionary program, including for more than thirty-five years the support of Dr. and Mrs. Alexander J. Reid in the CONGO, and presently Mrs. and Mrs. William J. Funk in SARAWAK, has been maintained.

A church expansion program adopted in 1954 was accelerated and reached fruition with a $360,000 addition to the church on May 19, 1968, under the leadership of Edward L. Tullis.

In 1970 the church membership was 2,072, and the value of all property exceeded $1,600,000.

MRS. THOMAS BURCHETT

ASSISTANT. A term used in early English Methodism to designate a preacher superintending a circuit under the supervision of JOHN WESLEY. In later years the term came to be applied in American Methodism in the usual sense in which it is used regarding anyone who assists—as a minister appointed to assist the regularly appointed pastor in any particular charge or appointment.

Bishop MATTHEW SIMPSON explains that in Wesley's LARGE MINUTES, which formed the early Discipline of the Methodists, the question is asked, "Who is the assistant?" The answer is given, "That preacher in each circuit who is appointed from time to time to take charge of the societies and the other preachers therein." Another question was, "What is the office of an assistant?" The answer was, "To see that the other preachers in his circuit behave well and consistently; to visit the classes quarterly, regulate the bands, and deliver tickets, and take in and put out of the society or the bands; to keep the watchnights and love-feasts," etc. In the early history of the Methodist societies in the U.S.A. this term remained in use. It was afterwards substituted by the phrase, "preacher in charge," whose duties are of a similar character.

In the United States the preacher to whom Wesley assigned the general superintendence of the societies prior to the organization of the church was called the general assistant. Prior to 1769 the societies were managed by the local preachers, by whom they had been formed. In that year RICHARD BOARDMAN and JOSEPH PILMORE were sent by Wesley, at the request of these societies, to act as pastors, and Wesley constituted Richard Boardman his general assistant. In 1771 FRANCIS ASBURY came to America, and in the following year Wesley made him his general assistant; but in less than a year he was superseded by THOMAS RANKIN, who had been sent out by Wesley, and who was Asbury's senior.

The preachers from England, after the commencement of the Revolutionary War, returned to that country, and in 1779 the ministers requested Asbury to act as the general assistant. This position he held by the request of the conference until 1784, when at the organization of the M. E. CHURCH he was elected general superintendent or bishop. The term then dropped out of use. JESSE LEE says, "The general assistant was the preacher who had the charge of all the circuits and of all the preachers, and appointed all the preachers, and their several circuits, and changed them. His being called a general assistant signified that he was to assist Wesley in carrying on the work of God in a general way."

In the development of the Methodist Church in the United States and the growth of large churches, more than one minister has often been needed. Thus in time the office of assistant minister or assistant pastor came to be, and the name of such appointee was placed in the conference minutes as "assistant." At times and in many churches today, the assistant came to be known also as the "associate minister." This was for the sake of euphony and to add a bit more of dignity to the office. If the assistant minister is a member of the conference, he is appointed as "assistant" or "associate" by the bishop and his name is so listed in the conference appointments. If the helping minister is not an annual conference member, his name does not appear in the regular list of conference appointments, the local church alone being considered his employer. Regulations now in the Book of Discipline, especially in the provisions dealing with pension legislation, provide how the years of service for each assistant or associate are to be counted toward a final pension return.

An amendment to the Constitution of The Methodist Church adopted in the 1960-64 quadrennium provided that where a local church had more than one conference member appointed to it, that church should be allowed lay delegates in the annual conference equal to the number of associate or assistant ministers which the church might have. This amendment of the 1964 Discipline is now continued in the Constitution of The United Methodist Church. Every church in the annual conference must have at least one lay delegate, and this provision recognizes the right of a large church to have more representation than does a small one. ASSOCIATED GOSPEL CHURCHES, U.S.A., are a group of approximately twenty-five congregations of the former M. P. CHURCH that declined to participate in the 1939 Methodist merger. They were originally known as the American Bible Fellowship. They had about 3,000 members in 1953 and were located in MICHIGAN, in and around DETROIT. They are listed in the Yearbook of American Churches through 1965. No statistics are given and the notation, "information declined," follows the entry.

ASSURANCE, CHRISTIAN, is a firm persuasion or conviction of our being in a state of SALVATION. The early Methodists strongly insisted upon this conviction as essential to a Christian experience, and maintained that it must be the privilege of every true believer. In his later writings, JOHN WESLEY admitted that, perhaps, his early expressions were too strong, and that he believed one might be a Christian without having so positive a conviction as would exclude all doubt and fear; and yet at the same time, he vigorously maintained that a deep assured certainty was the privilege and duty of every believer.

In no other point did the early Methodists differ so widely from those around them as in insisting upon this experience. It was this which gave life and power to their ministrations. They had personally experienced this gracious state, and were living in its constant enjoyment, and they testified frequently and forcibly of the peace and joy which accompanied it. At that period of time, the doctrine of assurance was not generally preached in other pulpits, and many ministers, as well as private Christians, denied the possibility of its attainment; yet it was by no means a new doctrine. Wesley remarks, "I apprehend that the whole Christian church in the first centuries enjoyed it, for though we have few points of doctrine explicitly taught in the small remains of the anti-Nicene fathers, yet I think none that carefully read Clemens, Romanus, Ignatius, Polycarp, Origen, or any other of them, can doubt whether either the writer himself possessed it, or all whom he mentions as real Christians; and I readily conceive, both from the 'Harmonia Confessionum,' and whatever else I have occasionally read, that all Reformed churches in Europe did once believe 'every true Christian has the divine evidence of his being in favor with God.' I know likewise that Luther, Melancthon, and many others, if not all, of the Reformers, frequently and strongly asserted, that every believer is conscious of his own acceptance with God, and that by a supernatural evidence."

Thomas Aquinas taught that God sometimes gave to Christians direct knowledge on this subject, but that such cases were but few, and that Christians generally had not a satisfactory assurance. In the Reformation, Luther strongly asserted the privilege of this personal knowledge, and it is taught in the Augsburg Confession as involved in saving faith.

The Westminster Confession, in its eighteenth article, says, "Although hypocrites and other unregenerate men may vainly deceive themselves with false hopes, and carnal presumptions of being in the favor of God, and state of salvation (which hope of theirs shall perish), yet such as truly believe in the Lord Jesus, and love him in sincerity, endeavoring to walk in all good conscience before him, may in this life be certainly assured that they are in a state of GRACE, and may rejoice in the hope of the glory of God, which hope shall never make them ashamed. This certainly is not a bare conjectural and probable persuasion, grounded upon a fallible hope, but an infallible assurance of faith, founded upon the divine truth of the promises of salvation, the inward evidence of those graces upon which these promises are made, the testimony of the spirit of adoption witnessing with our spirit that we are the children of God, which spirit is the earnest of our inheritance, whereby we are sealed to the day of redemption. This infallible assurance doth not so belong to the essence of faith, but that a true believer may wait long, in conflict with many difficulties, before he can be a partaker of it; yet being enabled by the spirit to know the things that are freely given him of God, he may without extraordinary revelation, in the right use of ordinary means, attain thereunto; and therefore it is the duty of every one to give all diligence to make his calling and election sure, that thereby his heart may be enlarged in peace and joy in the Holy Ghost, in love and thankfulness to God, and in strength and cheerfulness in the duties of obedience, the proper fruits of this assurance, so far as it from inclining men to looseness. True believers may have the assurance of their salvation in divers ways shaken, diminished, and interrupted, as by negligence in preserving it, by falling into some special sin which woundeth the conscience and grieveth the spirit, by some sudden and vehement temptation, by God's withdrawing the light of his countenance and suffering even such as fear him to walk in darkness and have no light; yet are they never utterly destitute of that fear of God and life of faith, that love of Christ and the brethren, that sincerity of heart, and conscience of duty, out of which by the operation of the spirit this assurance may in due time be revived, and by which in the meantime they are supported from utter despair."

Sir William Hamilton, in his "Discussions on Philosophy," says, "Personal assurance, the feeling of certainty that God is propitious to me, that my sins are forgiven, fiducia, plerophoria fidei, was long universally held in the Protestant communities to be the criterion or condition of a true or saving faith. Luther declares that he who hath not assurance wipes faith out; and Melancthon makes assurance the discriminating line of Christianity from heathenism. It was maintained by Calvin, nay, even by ARMINIUS, and is part and parcel of all the confessions of all the churches of the Reformation down to the Westminster Assembly."

Some Calvinistic writers who taught the doctrine of assurance, maintained that it is an assurance, not only of personal salvation, but of final salvation also: their theory very naturally followed from the doctrine of predestination. But Wesley, and the Methodist writers generally, advocate the doctrine of assurance as confined to a personal salvation, and as connected with the WITNESS OF THE SPIRIT. This assurance arises, first, from an observation upon our conduct as compared with the word of God. St. John declares, "Hereby we know that we do know him, if we keep his commandments." "Whosoever keepeth his word, in him is, verily, the love of God perfected: hereby know we that we are in him." "If ye know that he is righteous, ye know that every one that doeth righteousness is born of him."

Secondly, it proceeds more directly from an examination of our thoughts, tempers, and impulses. The believer feels in his own consciousness that he loves God, that he loves his brethren, and that he loves the exercises of holy worship. The Apostle says, "We know that we have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren." And, "Hereby we know that we are of the truth, and shall assure our hearts before him." Because we "love one another, not in word, neither in tongue, but in deed and in truth." So, also, we are conscious whether we are moved by impulses of pride, envy, and selfishness: or whether we have abiding faith and love. All these evidences we have from the testimony of our own spirits.

Thirdly, in addition to those marks, God gives by his Spirit a clear, inward conviction, whereby we feel that we are the sons of God. (See WITNESS OF THE SPIRIT.) The assurance which arises from the examination of our conduct and of our inward emotions is the result of careful reflection; and it depends for its steadfastness upon a conscious conviction that our walk and spirit are in perfect harmony with the word of God. The assurance that comes from the witness of the Spirit brings with it calmness and peace; not the result of reasoning, but a state of joyous consciousness that we are walking in the light, and that a gracious, divine influence rests sweetly upon us. It is accompanied by emotions of gratitude, and by simple, filial trust, which relies upon God as a gracious, forgiving, and indulgent father. It is strengthened and confirmed by the self-examination and reasoning to which we have referred. It exalts the scriptural characteristics, and the believer realizes that the Spirit of God bears witness with his spirit, that he is born of Him. MACK B. STOKES

ATHEARN, WALTER SCOTT (1872-1934), though not a Methodist (he belonged to the Disciples of Christ), founded the School of Religious Education and Social Service at BOSTON UNIVERSITY and later was president of OKLAHOMA CITY UNIVERSITY, a Methodist institution. He was born at Marengo, Iowa, July 25, 1872, the son of Elisha and Susan E. (Longstreth) Athearn. He was educated at Drake University, the State University of Iowa, and the University of Chicago. On June 15, 1894, he married Florence Royalty.

After five years as a public school principal, 1894-99, Athearn held several academic positions, and then taught religious education at Drake, 1909-16. He became professor of religious education at Boston University in 1916, and in 1918 was made dean of that institution's newly-formed School of Religious Education and Social Service.

Resigning at Boston in 1929, he traveled abroad, and in 1931 assumed the presidency of Butler University, Indianapolis. In the next three years, he reorganized Butler's college of education, established a graduate college of religion, and expanded the evening and extension courses. He was dismissed from Butler in 1934, following an administrative controversy with the trustees. That same year he accepted the presidency of Oklahoma City University, but died in St. Louis, November 13, 1934.

Atheam wrote numerous books and articles. The volume entitled An Adventure In Religious Education (1930), gives an account of his work among the Methodists at Boston University.

ERNEST R. CASE

ATHENS, GEORGIA, U.S.A., with a population of 41,059, county seat of Clarke County, located on the Oconee River, some sixty-six miles east of ATLANTA, was settled in 1801. The oldest state chartered university in America, the University of Georgia, was established in 1785, but its opening was deferred due to lack of funds. HOPE HULL, close friend of FRANCIS ASBURY and often called "father of Georgia Methodism," was instrumental in arousing public enthusiasm for the institution, which opened its doors in Athens in 1801. Hull served as a very active trustee.

In 1803 Hull and his brother-in-law, General David Meriwether, moved from Washington, Ga., in Wilkes County, to Athens, and opened Methodist work. A log cabin, "23 by 24 feet," was built in 1804 for worship. That same year the large Apalachee Circuit was organized. Asbury noted in his Journal, Mon., Dec 15, 1806, "Reaching Athens on Tuesday, we had an evening lecture at Hope Hull's."

Hull raised funds for a chapel at the college in 1807-08. Sunday, Dec. 11, 1814, Asbury "preached in the college chapel; the people were very attentive in that open penance house." Asbury went on to speak of the college, "the state of things is strangely changed since Doctor Brown [John Brown, Presbyterian minister, president 1811-16] has had the presidency: he is a man of piety and order, . . ."

First Church. "Hull's Meeting House" was built "in the environs of Athens" in 1810 and used until Hull's death in 1818. For a time thereafter Methodism in Athens almost perished. In 1825 First Church was established and a frame structure "forty feet square with a gallery on three sides" was erected. The gallery was to accommodate the Negro membership. LOVICK PIERCE was appointed pastor in 1826 and reported the membership: 107 white, 70 colored. A revival for college and community was conducted in 1827 by Thomas Stanley, STEPHEN OLIN, Thomas Stamford, and Pierce.

First Church was incorporated in 1828 by an act of the GEORGIA Legislature, granting it a charter and naming a self-perpetuating board of trustees. A noted revival in 1846 saw 163 white and ninety colored members received. Following the revival "the colored membership had become so large" it requested its own church building and pastor. John M. Bonnell, a white preacher, was assigned in this capacity.

In 1852 the present structure, known as the "Brick Church," was erected. It was enlarged and remodeled many times in succeeding years. The old wooden building was moved and given to the Negro membership. About 1858, in a revival under J. N. Turner, a young slave, LUCIUS HOLSEY, was converted and received into First Church. He later became one of the first bishops of the C.M.E. CHURCH.

Other Churches. Additional Methodist churches appeared in Athens. The founding dates are often uncertain. Princeton Church was begun as a mission Sunday school, sponsored by the Watkinsville Church in 1835. Meetings were held in a warehouse of the Princeton Manufacturing Company. Oconee Street Church was organized July 2, 1871, with sixteen members, located on Oconee Street near Broad. Richard Boggs provided land and Ferdinand Phinizy financed the establishing of Boggs Chapel, dedicated by Bishop GEORGE F. PIERCE, June 30, 1876. Beginning as a Sunday school in 1889, Tuckston Church was established in 1895. Young Harris Memorial Church, named for a prominent Athenian, Young L. C. Harris (benefactor of Young Harris College), was organized Jan. 3, 1909, with a membership of 112.

Largely through the efforts of First Church, Methodism's ministry to the academic community assumed added impetus with the establishment of the WESLEY FOUNDATION in 1927, with C. B. Harbour as director. No new Methodist churches were built in Athens until Oct. 7, 1956, when sixty-seven people joined the newly formed St. James Church. Chapelwood Church was established June 18, 1961.

In 1970 the above mentioned churches in Athens have a total membership of 5,158, and property valued at $3,064,167.

ATHENS COLLEGE, Athens, Ala., was founded in 1822, three years after the admission of ALABAMA as a state. It is the state's oldest chartered institution of higher learning. At its beginning, the citizens of Athens purchased five acres of land, erected a building, and established the Athens Female Academy. Twenty years later, the people of Athens raised an endowment and expanded the academy into a four-year college.

In January, 1843, the legislature of the state granted a charter incorporating the college as the Athens Female Institute of the TENNESSEE ANNUAL CONFERENCE. When the NORTH ALABAMA CONFERENCE was organized in 1870, the property was transferred to it and has remained so affiliated.

The institution became coeducational in 1931 and subsequently the name was changed to Athens College. It grants the B.A., B.S., and B.S. in Education degrees. The governing board has twenty-one members, nine ministers and twelve laymen, elected by the North Alabama Conference.

WILLIAM ATHERTON

ATHERTON, WILLIAM (1775-1850), British minister, father of the first Methodist attorney-general, was born at Lamberhead Green, Lancashire. He became a Wesleyan itinerant in 1797 and president of the Conference in 1846. An early advocate of Methodist day schools, he served on the committee of 1836 which helped to establish a connectional system of elementary education. He was considered one of the leaders of the Conference of those opposed to the dominance of JABEZ BUNTING. He was the author of The Life of Darcy, Lady Maxwell (1838). He died on Sept. 26, 1850.

ATKINS, ARTHUR GEORGE (1888-), prepared for missionary service at Hartley College, LONDON, Eng. After being ordained and commissioned for service in INDIA, he went to Motihari in Bihar late in 1915. He was an appointee of the international and interdenominational Regions Beyond Mission. He acquired a scholarly mastery of Hindi. He was secretary of the Bihar and Orissa Missionary Council, 1920-22.

In 1921 he married Lois Rockey, eldest daughter of the Methodist missionary, NOBLE LEE ROCKEY, and sister of CLEMENT DANIEL ROCKEY, later bishop. She had been a missionary of the WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY of the M. E. CHURCH for eight years.

In 1922 Atkins became secretary of the India Sunday School Union, organized in 1874, with T. J. SCOTT, pioneer M. E. missionary as its first president. In 1927 he and Mrs. Atkins were appointed as missionaries of the M. E. Board of Missions and began a distinguished new career. Atkins' appointments included Ballia, United Provinces, 1927; Jabalpur and Narsinghpur, Central Provinces, 1928-34; Bareilly Theological Seminary, 1934-38 and 1945-48; the Naini Tal English Church pastorale, 1935-36 and 1942-48. He was superintendent of the Al-mora District, 1940-44; of the Bareilly District, 1944-45; of the Garhwal District, 1949-53; and of Lee Memorial Mission, Calcutta, 1955-56.

In all of these appointments Mrs. Atkins carried heavy responsibility. She was awarded the Beaver Medal by the Girl Guides Association and the Kaiser-i-Hind Medal by King George VI for social service.

Atkins received the B.D. degree as an external student of Serampore College in India, and the M.A. degree from DREW UNIVERSITY for study in residence. Despite his heavy administrative duties he edited Sunday school notes for eighteen years, edited the Hindi edition of a young people's magazine for three years, a children's page of the Indian Witness for several years, and the Hindi edition of The Upper Room for six years. He wrote numerous articles for English and Hindi periodicals. He prepared courses of study for candidates for baptism and for church membership and wrote booklets on ethics, The Making of a Christian Home, and The Leading of Worship Services.

He also translated into English the Ramayan of Tulsī Das, Rama-Charita-Manasa. It was published by the Hindustan Times, New Delhi, and has been accepted by Indian scholars and national leaders as a contribution to scholarship and to international understanding.

JAMES ATKINS

ATKINS, JAMES (1850-1923), American bishop, was born at Knoxville, Tenn., on April 18, 1850. He was educated at EMORY AND HENRY COLLEGE, and received a D.D. degree from Trinity College. He was ordained to the ministry of the M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH, in 1872, and served until 1879 in the HOLSTON CONFERENCE. He was president of the Asheville Female College, 1879-89, and then became the president of Emory and Henry College, where he served until 1893. He returned then to the Asheville Female College and served three years.

In 1896, Atkins became the editor of SUNDAY-SCHOOL literature, with headquarters at NASHVILLE, Tenn. During this period he wrote a book entitled The Kingdom in the Cradle, in which he advocated gradual development, by an educational process, in the Christian life. This volume, along with Bushnell's Christian Nurture, had a profound influence on Christian education and evangelism in an age when a sudden conversion experience was highly valued. He started the system of teacher training, which reached the peak of its effectiveness under the administration of his son-in-law, JOHN W. SHACKFORD.

Atkins was elected a bishop in 1906. He was chairman of the Centenary Commission, which raised around $50 million for home and foreign missions in 1918-19. Immediately thereafter Southern Methodist Missions were organized in BELGIUM, POLAND and CZECHOSLOVAKIA, and for four years Bishop Atkins presided in these fields.

During the whole of his episcopal career, he made his home at Waynesville, N. C. He was one of the founders of the Southern Methodist Assembly, and was largely responsible for locating it at LAKE JUNALUSKA, N. C. He was the first chairman of the board of trustees of the assembly, and, in 1913, he built one of the 13 original homes on the assembly grounds. Later he built a second home on the assembly grounds, and after his death his widow presented it to the Assembly as a home for the superintendent.

Bishop Atkins died on Dec. 5, 1923, three days after reading the appointments at the LITTLE ROCK CONFERENCE, and was buried at Waynesville, N. C.

ATLANTA, GEORGIA, U.S.A., is the key city of southeastern United States. In 1969 Greater Atlanta, a five-county area, had a population of 1,250,000. Atlanta serves as the hub of the southeastern region in religion, education, government, sports, commerce, industry, and transportation. She has many church administrative offices and some 700 local congregations representing forty creeds and denominations with an aggregate membership of more than 382,000. Many of these churches have large congregations; at least forty have a membership of more than 1,000 each. The two strongest communions in the city are the Methodists and the Southern Baptists.

Methodism first came to Atlanta when it was a village called Marthasville, about 1840. In 1847 Samuel Mitchell gave lots to several churches in town, and the Methodists later exchanged their lot for one on Peachtree Street. At this time Atlanta was on the Decatur Circuit, and services were held in a little schoolhouse which stood on their lot. During the summer of 1847, Bishop JAMES O. ANDREW, George W. Lane, Alexander Means, and the circuit pastors held a five-day meeting in a warehouse. In June a union SUNDAY SCHOOL was organized. Later the shell of a house, with a floor and puncheons for seats, was erected. Here the first service was conducted that was held in any regular preaching place in town. The church prospered. In 1849 the house was provided with pews and services were held regularly. During the same year a notable revival took place and the membership of the church increased to several hundred. In 1850 what is now First Methodist Church became a station.

Atlanta serves as the episcopal headquarters for the GEORGIA, NORTH GEORGIA, and SOUTH GEORGIA CONFERENCES of THE UNITED METHODIST CHURCH, the Sixth District of the A.M.E. CHURCH, and of the C.M.E. CHURCH. The four Methodist bishops presiding over these areas have their residences in Atlanta. Two offices of the Southeastern Jurisdiction and the Jurisdictional Council of The United Methodist Church are also in Atlanta, housed in the new Methodist Center which was completed in 1966. For many years these offices were housed in the Wesley Memorial Methodist Church, which was built in 1904 and razed in 1964. It was a Methodist landmark and public auditorium for sixty years.

Greater Atlanta has nineteen degree-granting colleges and institutions of higher learning. Among these is a complex of five colleges and universities and one seminary that together comprise the largest center of higher education for Negroes in the world. Total enrollment of all nineteen colleges and universities is more than 30,000 each year.

Several of these nineteen institutions are Methodist, namely: CLARK COLLEGE, a Negro college belonging to The United Methodist Church; MORRIS BROWN COLLEGE, belonging to the A.M.E. Church; EMORY UNIVERSITY, belonging to the Southeastern Jurisdiction of The United Methodist Church; Candler School of Theology, a part of Emory University, which educates more ministers than any other Methodist seminary in the world; GAMMON THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, belonging to The United Methodist Church at large, and since 1959 a member of the Interdenominational Theological Center. Two other Methodist schools of theology also cooperate in the Center, namely: Phillips School of Theology, belonging to the C.M.E. Church, and Turner Theological Seminary, belonging to the A.M.E. Church. The Morehouse School of Religion is the fourth school comprising the Center and is affiliated with Morehouse College, a Baptist institution primarily for Negroes. The Center was established in 1959 with Dr. HARRY V. RICHARDSON serving as the first president. It is a cooperative venture in theological education and educates nearly one-half of the Negro ministers in the United States who receive theological degrees.

Greater Atlanta has the Methodist Children's Home, which belongs to the North Georgia Conference, and Wesley Woods, a modern home for the aged. Within Atlanta's confines are also The Protestant Radio and Television Center, an interdenominational agency in which the Southeastern Jurisdiction of The United Methodist Church has a vital stake, and Emory University Hospital, which serves as the training station for the university's School of Nursing.

Some well-known churches in Atlanta include Allen Temple, Bethel A.M.E., First Church, Glenn Memorial, Grace, Martha Brown, and Trinity. The FREE METHODIST, WESLEYAN, and A.M.E. ZION churches also have a few congregations in the city.

J. EDWARD LANTZ

Allen Temple A.M.E. Church sponsors a $7,000,000 housing project in Atlanta. The church celebrated its one hundredth anniversary in 1966.

Bethel A.M.E. Church. Negro Methodists held separate services in Atlanta for at least a decade before the organization of Bethel Church. They worshipped in a church building which had been placed on lots donated by benevolent whites. The first minister of this "African" church was a white man named Payne. Later Negro lay preachers served. By 1859 the church was known as "the African M. E. Church." During the Civil War years Bethel was presided over by Joseph Woods. Following the war, A.M.E. missionaries invited the congregation to unite with their denomination, with union taking place at the 1866 conference. In 1867 WESLEY J. GAINES relocated Bethel near the corner of Butler and Old Wheat Sts. A large new structure was erected in 1868. In 1890 the present structure was begun, but was not completed until 1899. It is a strong and influential church today, and has presented the musical morality pageant, "Heaven Bound," annually since 1930.

GRANT S. SHOCKLEY

Emory University Hospital is a (335 beds, 18 bassinets) general hospital for private patients. A well-known and familiar institution to Atlantans and many people in the southeast, it is a continuation of Wesley Memorial Hospital, first built in 1905 as a joint project of the NORTH and SOUTH GEORGIA CONFERENCES of the M. E. Church. South. Eighteen years later, in December, 1922, a new hospital on the campus of Emory University in the Druid Hills section of Atlanta opened its doors. A fleet of ambulances loaned by Atlanta morticians delivered twenty-five patients from the older hospital in downtown Atlanta to the new one on the campus.

Wesley Memorial ceased its separate legal existence in 1925, and in that same year the name of the hospital was changed to Emory University Hospital.

The year before the Lucy Elizabeth Memorial Maternity Pavilion, erected by the children of the late Mrs. ASA G. CANDLER, SR., in memory of her mother, was opened. The nationally-known Robert Winship Clinic for the study of neoplastic diseases was opened in June, 1937, and the Conkey Pate Whitehead Memorial Surgical Pavilion, erected by Mrs. Lettie Pate Evans in memory of her son, was completed in 1946.

In the fall of 1958 a renovation program got underway. It was completed nearly six years later at a cost of $4,500,000.

The first in-patient unit for psychiatric patients in a general hospital in Atlanta was opened in January, 1960, and in 1961 Emory University Hospital became one of the first hospitals in the nation to establish extensive clinical research facilities with the aid of grants from the United States Public Health Service. The Clinical Research Center has made possible controlled study of many patients suffering from complex diseases.

Emory University Hospital developed the first post-anesthetic recovery room in Atlanta. It opened about 1950. The hospital's intensive care unit, a ten-bed facility which was opened in September, 1963, was one of the first in Atlanta. For the year ending Aug. 31, 1968, the hospital admitted 10,571 adult patients. The present administrator is Burwell W. Humphrey.

First Church is the central Methodist church in Atlanta. It was begun by a group of Methodists in 1848 who bought a piece of property at a cost of $150, on the eastern side of Peachtree Street, running from what is known as the Candler Building to Luckie Street. The first church was a frame building called Wesley Chapel. Its tower contained the only church bell in Atlanta that was not melted down during the Civil War, and it is still used in the present church. The little church was first on a circuit, but by 1850 it had regular preaching services each Sunday. Entrances were separate for the men and women, and Negro slaves sat in a balcony at the rear. By 1858 it had 419 white and 192 colored members, and it raised $700, which was given to the Negroes to build their own church. In 1870 a new building, the finest in town, was erected where the Candler Building now stands, and its name was changed to First M. E. Church, South. Due to losses during the War, and the Reconstruction period, great sacrifices were made in order to build this structure. Among its members were a number of important political figures and also HENRY W. GRADY, the spokesman of the new South, whose name a Sunday school class still bears.

In 1903 the present church was built at Peachtree and Porter Place. It is made of Stone Mountain heart granite with Gothic lines and stained glass windows.

Following union in 1939, the name was changed to First Methodist Church. Since Atlanta had expanded, it was a suburban type church in a downtown location. There was thought of moving, but it was decided to make it a great downtown church. An education building was erected and paid for in 1953; and an additional story was added in 1962. Numerous adjoining parcels of land have been purchased for parking areas.

The first WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY of the M. E. Church, South was organized at First Church. Six foreign missionaries are now supported by the church. The ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE met in the United States for the second time in 1931 at First Church, Atlanta.

Four of the church's pastors have been elected bishop: H. M. DuBOSE, H. C. MORRISON, J. E. DICKEY, and C. J. HARRELL. Two college presidents have come from its membership: I. S. Hopkins of the Georgia Institute of Technology, and C. E. Dowman of Emory at Oxford. PIERCE HARRIS was pastor of the church from 1940 to 1967, and over 6,000 persons joined the church during his ministry. Its Sunday night services are known far and wide. Membership in 1970 was 2,467.

ALLEN POST

Glenn Memorial is the University Church located at the main entrance to the campus of EMORY UNIVERSITY. The sanctuary of Glenn Memorial, seating 1490 people, is the largest in Georgia Methodism and a striking example of Georgian architecture in the United States. Its architectural style is distinctively in the Christopher Wren tradition. The exterior body of the church follows closely that of the St. Michael's Episcopal Church in Charleston, S. C., built in 1760 and considered the finest of its kind in America. The colonnaded portico at the base of the Glenn tower is fashioned after King's Chapel near the Boston Commons, the first Protestant Episcopal Church edifice erected in America. Perhaps the outstanding feature of Glenn Memorial is its tower and steeple which rise to a height of 170 feet. Both tower and steeple are modeled after All Saints, BRISTOL, England.

The Church was actually organized as the Emory Methodist Church on Jan. 11, 1920, by Bishop WARREN A. CANDLER in the Theology Building on the Emory Campus. There services of worship were held until 1931 when the sanctuary was constructed. It was named in memory of W. F. Glenn (1839-1919), a leading Georgia Methodist minister. His daughter, Mrs. Howard Candler, whose husband was for ten years Chairman of the Board of Trustees of Emory, contributed most of the funds for the new sanctuary.

The educational building, erected in 1939, is separated from the sanctuary by a large amphitheater, scene of college graduations, concerts, and plays. In the educational building is located the Glenn Chapel, an almost exact small replica of one of Christopher Wren's most beautiful churches, St. Stephen's, Walbrook, near London, built in 1672-79.

At its fortieth anniversary celebration in 1959 an extensive remodeling and building program was launched. In addition to remodeling the sanctuary and educational building, a large youth building was constructed which can minister to 250 young people. The program was completed in 1965 at a cost of $700,000.

Glenn Memorial occupies a strategic place in Methodism in the Southeastern United States as it has an unusual congregation made up of a large number of college students, professors, and community residents and leaders. In its congregation are also several ministers and theologians. To its pulpit frequently come outstanding preachers and theologians of all denominations. One of its ministers, WILLIAM T. WATKINS (1928-30) later became a bishop of The Methodist Church.

The 2,100 member church has sponsored many varied ministries, particularly in church extension, missions, drama, and education. In the 1950's and 60's six new churches were sponsored by Glenn in the greater Atlanta area. In 1956 the Church constructed on the campus of the Methodist Children's Home in Decatur, Georgia, an $80,000 cottage for girls who were orphans or from broken families. It was the first church in Methodism to do this. In 1951 Glenn began the first week-day church kindergarten in Georgia Methodism. It has long maintained drama groups and presented productions in numerous other churches as well as its own. Since 1951 it has supported a full-time missionary in CALCUTTA, INDIA.

Ministers who have served the Church are: Thomas Lipscomb (1920); H. C. Howard (1920-23); WAIGHTS C. HENRY (1923-24); Joseph A. Smith (1924-25); Robert Z. Tyler (1925-28); William T. Watkins (1928-30); Wallace Rogers (1930-33); Nat G. Long (1933-42); Joseph A. Smith (1942-44); Edward G. Mackay (1944-50); W. Candler Budd (1950-59); Eugene T. Drinkard (1959-69).

Grace Church, located at 458 Ponce de Leon Avenue, N.E., was organized Nov. 18, 1871. The church has occupied three locations other than the present one. It came to its present site after being destroyed in the great Atlanta fire in 1917. The church has had phenomenal growth since 1947, when Charles L. Allen became pastor, with its membership increasing from 1,800 to 4,105 in 1970. This growth has taken place even though Grace is an inner city, downtown church, serving metropolitan Atlanta. Members come from eight counties regularly. During the past six years, seven men have gone out from Grace to the active ministry. One distinctive feature is the Sunday evening service. Its members claim that it has probably the largest Sunday night service in American Methodism. Grace is currently spending $1,374,000 on expansion of facilities, and is engaged in a great program in missions, education, and evangelism. The Sunday morning service is televised.

Martha Brown Memorial Church celebrated its 50th anniversary on April 7, 1968 at its present location. Its history dates back to the spring of 1892, when a group of spiritual-minded citizens of East Atlanta holding a union SUNDAY SCHOOL decided to organize a church to be known as East Atlanta Methodist Church.

In 1894 a lot was donated on Metropolitan Avenue, but actually the building of the church was begun in 1896 and the services were finally started in 1898, with an enrollment of 56 members.

J. F. Brown donated the present corner lot at Moreland and Metropolitan Avenues in 1914. It was during the building of the present sanctuary (1916-18) that it was suggested that the name, Martha Brown Memorial, should be given the new church in memory of Mr. Brown's deceased wife.

Additional land was purchased and the educational building was erected in 1928. A new parsonage was built on land purchased and a lot donated across Metropolitan on Moreland during 1946-47.

More land was acquired and additional educational facilities were built in 1951. In 1959 the present parsonage was purchased on Greenleaf Road and the old parsonage became the Youth Center.

Recent pastoral leadership includes Buren Hancock, Gordon C. Thompson, Dumas Shelnutt, J. Walker Childsey, and J. W. Veatch, retired, Associate.

In recent years this church has furnished to the Methodist ministry Wilton Moulder, William Floyd, Harry Alderman—all members of the NORTH GEORGIA CONFERENCE.

The membership is approximately 1,400.

Morris Brown College is a four-year accredited liberal arts college with a theological department. It was founded in 1881 by the North Georgia and Georgia Annual Conferences of the A.M.E. CHURCH. Its charter was granted in 1885 and later that same year it received its first students. The first class was graduated in 1890. Liberal arts courses were instituted in 1894 and Turner Theological Seminary was opened the same year. Since 1959 the Seminary has been affiliated with the Interdenominational Theological Center, a cooperative ecumenical venture in theological education among several Negro schools in the Atlanta area.

In 1906 Morris Brown was rechartered as a university. This was later changed to its original and present college designation. In 1932 the institution was reorganized and relocated near Atlanta University.

GRANT S. SHOCKLEY

Peachtree Road Church is one of the largest Methodist churches in southeastern U.S.A. It was founded April 28, 1925, in the home of Dr. and Mrs. M. T. Salter at 3221 Peachtree Road, N.E., with nineteen charter members. By giving notes for $15,000 to certain individuals, a lot was purchased in May at 3122 Peachtree Road, N.E., and on Sunday, June 7, 1925, the first public worship was held in a temporary wooden chapel.

In 1941 the lot on which the church now stands was purchased at a cost of $18,000. The temporary buildings were moved from the original lot. In 1942 a recreation building with a kitchen and dining-room facilities, known as the Great Hall, was erected. This building was used for all services of public worship until 1949 when the beautiful white colonial-type buildings were erected at a cost of $485,000. In 1958 the members were again inspired to build and plan ahead. A building committee directed the construction of a chapel, a children's building, and an activities building where thousands of people come each month for Christian recreation which includes a variety of activities, a real ministry to the community as well as the church.

Peachtree Road Church is known for its wide ranging program. In addition to the chancel choir, there are seven youth and children's choirs. There is a Sunday school enrollment of about 2,500, with an average attendance of 1,250. The Sunday evening program is varied, with an active program for children, youth and young adults, and study groups for adults. The mid-week church night supper meeting is one of the most meaningful services in the church. Missionary giving amounts to over $100,000 a year.

The church has grown in membership to a present total of 4,500, with a budget nearing $600,000. The church property is valued at $2,000,000. Since 1925 there have been twelve pastors, each having made a strong and vital contribution to the spiritual and physical growth of the church.

Phillips School of Theology, of the C.M.E. CHURCH, was established as a separate institution at LANE COLLEGE, Jackson, Tenn., in 1944. The board of trustees of Lane College created the school by a special resolution authorizing the new school to be located on or near the campus of Lane College.

In 1946, the General Conference of the C.M.E. Church enacted legislation which made the Phillips School of Theology a connexional school. The General Conference of 1950 adopted a special resolution in which Phillips School of Theology was named as one of the schools of the C.M.E. Church, to share equally with the other schools in the distribution of educational funds.

Phillips School of Theology moved to Atlanta, Ga. in 1959 to form the Interdenominational Theological Center—a cooperative venture in theological education. Phillips School of Theology became one of the four participating schools in the Center. It is housed in a modern building on the campus of the Interdenominational Theological Center.

St. Mark Church was organized in 1872 as a mission of First Church in a little community of North Atlanta then known as Tight Squeeze. In 1878 the mission became self-sustaining and moved to Merritts Avenue, with Bishop WARREN A. CANDLER, then a junior preacher, as its first pastor. It was known as Sixth Methodist Church. A few years later the name was changed to Merritts Avenue Church.

In 1901, with a membership of 391, Merritts Avenue Church erected a new sanctuary at the corner of Peachtree and Fifth Streets, to be known as St. Mark Church. The first service of worship was conducted March 22, 1903.

The following ministers have been appointed to this church: Alonzo Monk, Charles O. Jones, S. R. Belk, A. M. Hughlett, W. R. Hendrix, Walter Anthony, S. E. Wasson, J. B. Mitchell, W. L. DUREN, S. H. C. Burgin, J. W. Johnson, Lester Rumble, Joseph Owen, John L. Horton, John B. Tate, DOW KIRKPATRICK, Harry Lee Smith, Bevel Jones, William A. Tyson, and Melton McNeill.

Despite the change from a residential church to a great cosmopolitan congregation in the heart of the city, its membership has held its own. It reports 1,784 members.

Through the years twelve beautiful stained glass windows have been added to the sanctuary. These windows, executed during a half century period by German glass workers, demonstrate excellence in art and craftsmanship and are highly valued in church architecture. In 1948 the Frances Winship Walters Chapel was erected and a new educational building was dedicated in 1956.

St. Mark continues to serve the metropolitan area with its vital inner city program. The highlight of its mission is a ministry to the night people. Cab drivers, night club entertainers, bartenders, and night police comprise the night parishioners. St. Mark ministers today to a changed and changing city, proclaiming the gospel to people where they are.

Trinity Church lifts a red brick tower amid a complex of marble buildings of state, county, and city governments on one side, and the concrete and bridges that make up the intricate highway interchange on the other. Organized in 1854 it now occupies its third location in a massive brick gothic structure.

Green B. Haygood and others from Wesley Chapel (now First Church) organized an outpost Sunday school in 1853. Trinity Church was organized in September, 1854. The first building was the only one other than the Shrine of the Immaculate Conception which was not burned by General Sherman when Atlanta was taken late in the Civil War. When the pastor, ATTICUS HAYGOOD, returned in 1864 he found the building filled with furniture. A new sanctuary was erected on a different site in 1872. The present sanctuary and educational building were completed in 1912.

Many renowned Methodist leaders have come from Trinity: Atticus G. Haygood, pastor, bishop, and president of Emory College; LAURA HAYGOOD, missionary in CHINA; Eva Foreman; Julia Gaither; Anna Muse; YOUNG J. ALLEN; David L. Anderson, president of Fochow University, and Vivian P. Patterson.

Missionary concern comes to be for foreign fields. Between 1871 and 1895 eight new churches were organized: St. Paul, Mary Branan, Asbury, Grace, Park Street, Lakewood Heights, St. John's, and Nellie Dodd. J. W. Lee organized a boys' club in 1906 which later became the first Boy Scout troop in Atlanta. Miss Mollie Stephens organized an "industrial home" in 1884 which later became Wesley House, before the National Board of Missions was organizing such settlement houses.

As the city of Atlanta has changed, so has the program of Trinity's work. Now an inner city church, its service is not only to those who drive many miles to attend, but also to the residents in low rent housing nearby and to the nearly 20,000 government office workers within two blocks of the church.

WESLEY WOODS, ATLANTA, GEORGIA

Wesley Woods Retirement Community, sponsored by the NORTH GEORGIA CONFERENCE OF THE UNITED METHODIST CHURCH, offers a variety of facilities and services for persons sixty-two years of age or older. It is located on an eighteen acre campus at 1825 Clifton Road, N.E., Atlanta, Georgia, on the northern edge of the EMORY UNIVERSITY campus.

One of its buildings, "The Towers," represents a new architectural approach in housing for the elderly. It consists of two cylinder towers, one ten stories and one thirteen stories. It contains 202 rooms and apartments, a central dining room, a beauty shop, and recreation areas. Every residential room in the building has an outside exposure and long corridors are virtually eliminated. The building was completed and occupied in February, 1965, and within a year was almost completely filled.

The medical services of the Community are offered in a 160-bed Health Center which is available not only to residents of Wesley Woods, but to persons from any geographical area. Admission to this facility is made by the patient's own personal physician.

Financial arrangements at Wesley Woods are flexible. There is a monthly charge in the Towers depending upon the type of accommodation and services requested. The rates set include rent, all utilities, maid service, laundry allowance, and all meals and a limited amount of health care. Accommodations include a room with a private bath, efficiency apartments and one bedroom apartments. There is no entrance fee required, and residents can terminate their rental agreement on thirty days' notice. Daily rates at the Health Center may also be arranged for semi-private rooms with three persons, or private rooms with private bath. The total value of the Wesley Woods facilities is approximately $5,500,000.

ATLAY, JOHN (1736-??), was JOHN WESLEY's book steward from 1773 to 1788. He was born at Sheriff-Hutton in the County of York in December, 1736. Little is known of his early life; he seems to have become an itinerant about 1763; he was stationed at Haworth in 1765, when certain knowledge of him begins. He was stationed in London from 1773, and in the Minutes for 1776 the list of stations begins with the statement: "JOSEPH BRADFORD travels with Mr. Wesley. John Atlay keeps his accounts. THOMAS OLIVERS corrects the press."

Atlay was offended when John Wesley did not include his name in the DEED OF DECLARATION in 1784, and was already talking of leaving the BOOK ROOM in 1785; in 1785 he was doing business on the side as a coal merchant. In the meantime he involved himself in the dispute at DEWSBURY, where he supported the trustees in their demand that they be allowed to appoint their own preachers. At the Conference of 1788 he admitted that he had promised the trustees that he would if necessary become their minister, and so when the Conference de-ced to abandon the Dewsbury Chapel, he left the Book Room and settled there in September 1788.

It is noteworthy that in a letter to Wesley, dated Sept. 20, 1788, Atlay stated that the stock of the Book Room was worth £13,751/18/5d, according to the prices given in the catalog, but that when Wesley had the stock valued by two booksellers, they suggested a figure of £4,827/10/3½d. Atlay tried to set up a circuit of his own, meeting with some success in Shields and Newcastle. It seems likely, however, that he had quarreled with the Dewsbury trustees by 1791, when he was certainly in London. JOHN PAWSON alleged that he had adopted the views of Nicholas Manners (an itinerant between 1759 and 1784), who taught that as a result of the work of Christ all men are born in the same state as Adam's before the Fall. The exact date of Atlay's death is unknown.

CHARLES ATMORE

ATMORE, CHARLES (1759-1826). British preacher, was born at Heacham, Norfolk, in 1759. He became a Methodist in 1779, and was accepted by JOHN WESLEY as an itinerant preacher in 1781. In 1787 he was responsible for opening the new preaching house at Glasgow, and in 1790 Wesley commended him for starting SUNDAY SCHOOLS at Newcastle, "one of the best institutions which have been seen in Europe for centuries." Atmore was elected president of the WESLEYAN METHODIST Conference in 1811, retired from the ministry in 1825, and died on June 30, 1826. His published writings include: The Methodist Memorial (Bristol, 1801), which gave "an impartial sketch of the Lives and Characters of the Preachers who have departed this Life since the commencement of the work of God, among the people called Methodists"; an Appendix to the Methodist Memorial, Containing a Concise History of the Introduction of Methodism on the Continent of America and Short Memoirs of the Preachers (Manchester, 1802); and an edition of Oliver Heywood's Family Altar (Liverpool, 1807).

JOHN NEWTON

ATONEMENT. Atonement in Christian theology designates centrally the at-one-ment or reconciliation of sinful men to God through divine action in the life, passion, and resurrection of Jesus Christ. It is the re-establishment of the God-man relation which has been fractured by sin, and, in consequence, the restoration of personal wholeness and right human relations.

I. The New Testament presents no systematic atonement theory, but declares that in Christ God acted to reconcile the world to himself, and to call into being a new community charged with a reconciling ministry among men. The saving event is interpreted in a variety of metaphors drawn from the law court, the slave market, the sheepfold, the home, temple worship, and men's experience of death and life, defeat and victory. Jesus apparently conceived his messianic role in terms of the suffering servant passages of Isaiah. Uppermost in Paul is the notion, cast in legal terms, that God, unlike a judge who decrees the punishment demanded by strict justice, acquits the guilty. In forgiving love God in Christ identifies Himself with and endures vicariously the consequences of men's sin, accepting the repentant sinner. In Hebrews Christ as our High Priest brings to a climax the Jewish sacrificial system by offering his own life. The Johannine view, mystical and ethical, portrays Jesus' self-sacrifice as proceeding from and revealing the love of God, who seeks the loving response of men and their eternal fellowship with himself.

II. Post-biblical Christian thought has produced three main types of atonement theory. 1. Greek patristic thought (Irenaeus, Origen, Athanasius, Gregory of Nyssa) (c. 120-400) portrays Christ as imparting to men enlightenment, incorruption, and victorious deliverance from sin and death. His life and sacrificial death provided knowledge of God and his will and gave men an example. As the incarnate Logos who united God's immortal nature with man's mortal, he purged humanity from corruption and mortality, and made possible the elevation of man to renewed union with God. His death on the cross—pictured as a supreme act of obedience, a recapitulation in reverse of Adam's fall, and a ransom paid to Satan for man's release—was crowned by his resurrection, which demonstrated his supremacy over death and sin, which destroyed their power. This many-sided view has been influential in Methodist thought, but never dominant.

The Greek conception suffers from a substantialistic understanding of divinity and humanity, and of their union, as well as at times from a crude notion of the deception of Satan and a false ascription to him of a claim to the human race which even God must respect. However, it expresses enduring truths: that the life, teachings, and resurrection of Christ no less than his death have saving value; that Christ imparts healing as well as rescue, sanctification as well as forgiveness; and that in him God decisively conquered evil and freed men from its power. As CHARLES WESLEY sings: "He breaks the power of canceled sin, He sets the prisoner free."

2. Medieval Latin and orthodox Protestant thought brought forth various theories which, though differing widely, agree in viewing the atonement as an objective transaction centering in satisfaction, or in penal substitution. According to Anselm (c. 1033-1109), Christ satisfied the honor of God which man's sin had offended. Reparation had to be made by man, the sinner, yet also by God himself, since finite man could not make amends for an offense against the Infinite. Hence the need for the God-man, whose vicarious death, completing a perfect life, provided superabundant satisfaction. This view reflects the penitential praxis of the medieval Roman Church. Thomas Aquinas (c. 1225-1274), adopted this view in essence, though he regarded the passion of Christ as the "fittest" mode of salvation rather than as necessary, utilized Abelard's (c. 1079-1142) emphasis on the love kindled in man by Christ's sacrifice, and related the atonement to the ever-renewed mediation of GRACE in the SACRAMENTS. In Calvin's (1509-1564) penal view, sin is a violation of the law of the divine Judge. By his death Christ in love took on himself the punishment required of men by divine justice, thus appeasing God's wrath, procuring his favor, and making his benevolence possible when Christ's work is accepted in faith. The Augsburg Confession (1530) also interprets Christ's suffering and death as a sacrifice offered for sin to "propitiate God's wrath" (Art. III, Ger. ed.) or to "reconcile the Father to us" (Latin ed.).

This theme is reiterated in both the Anglican and the American Methodist ARTICLES OF RELIGION. Rooted in this tradition, the thought of JOHN and Charles WESLEY describes Christ's work primarily as a vicarious, substitutionary act which satisfies divine justice by offering a ransom and sacrifice for the sins of the whole world. However, for the Wesleys the atonement ultimately springs from and proclaims God's boundless love. Moreover, its benefits are universally available, rather than limited to a special class of the predestined. In RICHARD WATSON, the most influential Methodist theologian of the early nineteenth century, the satisfaction theory was uppermost. (Theological Institutes, London, 1832. Part II. xix-xxii.) JOHN MILEY espoused essentially the governmental theory of Hugo Grotius (1583-1645), regarding the death of Christ chiefly as a penal example which demonstrates the stern righteousness of God and the disastrous consequences of sin; here the punishment borne by Christ is necessary to safeguard the sacredness of the divine law and the human interests it aims to conserve in the divine economy. A similar line was taken by J. SCOTT LIDGETT, The Spiritual Principle of the Atonement, London, 1897, a most respected scholar representing British Methodist thought. EDWIN LEWIS maintained in his later years a basically penal substitutionary view.

Many Methodist theologians have felt that these conceptions largely fail to recognize the redemptive significance of the entire life of Jesus and his resurrection. It has been argued that they reflect abstract, legalistic, mechanical ideas of guilt, punishment, and merit, which are not literally transferable. For the most part, they tend to regard justice or honor rather than love as determinative in God, to separate the mercy of the Son too sharply from the righteousness of the Father, and to imply a change wrought by Jesus' death in God's effective attitude toward men. They also fail to emphasize sufficiently the importance of the sinner's repentant, trustful, obedient response. Nevertheless, this group of Methodist theologians dramatize the depth of human wickedness, accent clearly the holiness of God, who cannot tolerate rebellion in those created for fellowship with himself, and sense the extreme costliness of the divine mercy.

3. The moral or personal theory classically formulated by Abelard finds the barrier to redemption not in God but in man, and locates the central meaning of Christ's death in its supreme disclosure of God's self-sacrificing love which moves men to repentance, love, and obedience. Jesus' life and teachings provide men with their perfect example, while contemplation of his cross arouses in them the desire to serve the loving God there disclosed. Elements of this view appear frequently in the thought of the Wesleys, as when Charles exclaims: "O Love divine, what hast Thou done! Th' immortal God hath died for me!" It is dominant in Schleiermacher, Ritschl, Bushnell, and liberal evangelical theology in general. In the twentieth century it has found vigorous expression in the thought of Methodists like HARRIS F. RALL and ALBERT C. KNUDSON.

This conception may tend to overlook the objective triumph of God over evil dramatized in the resurrection, lacks an awesome awareness of the holy righteousness of God and the enormity of human sin, and often overestimates the willingness of men to respond to the divine love. However, it clearly recognizes the saving meaning of both the life and the death of Christ, the centrality of the love of God proclaimed by the gospel, and the sinner's need of inner transformation if salvation is to be realized.

III. Today there is wide recognition among Methodist theologians, as among others, that none of the historic views is sufficient in itself. All express true insights which can be conserved if they are synthesized and reformulated. Adequate understanding of the New Testament witness and the experience of the historic Christian community require recognition of both objective and subjective factors, divine deed and human response. Reconciliation is wrought through the action of God, who in Jesus Christ reveals his righteous love, condemns sin, and offers to men his forgiving and renewing grace. To this redemptive activity men must respond in repentance, trust, and love, thankfully and obediently embracing the new life of sonship with God. This two-fold movement takes mainly four forms.

1. In Jesus Christ God manifests to men a completely God-centered life of self-forgetful love, offering them the new relation with him that enables them to live in this spirit. To the degree that they respond positively and as followers of Christ devote themselves to God and neighbor, they are saved from self-centeredness, "made one with the goodness of God himself" (11 Cor. 5:21; New English Bible), and given the true freedom which is found in the service of God alone.

2. God discloses to men in Christ his victorious power over evil. He who in his temptations had triumphed over sin put both sin and death to rout in his cross and resurrection. Thus God has demonstrated objectively his supremacy over all that hinders fullness of life, and opened the door to freedom and joy in the Holy Spirit. Witnessing the triumphant power of God, the victims of injustice, vice and hate, the weary and heavy laden are delivered from fear and find courage to go on in faith, knowing that light is lord over darkness, love over hate, life over death, and that nothing can separate them from the love of God in Christ Jesus their Lord. Yielding their lives to him in love and trust, they share his victory.

3. In the cross of Christ God reveals in sharp contrast to his own holiness the heinous wickedness of human sin. A prerequisite of our forgiveness is a consciousness of our need of it. Through the cross God jars us out of our self-righteousness and complacency, making us aware of the depth of our spiritual need and of our often cruel treatment of others. Human evil, he declares here, is so great that highly religious men are capable of leaguering themselves with the most cynical and unscrupulous to murder the Son of God himself. God's perfect righteousness cannot condone such iniquity. Hence man, standing under self-indictment and the divine judgment, is helpless and lost apart from the amazing grace of God. The result of the death of Christ is thus not the mechanical discharge of a debt or the legalistic payment of a penalty, but a change in the heart of the sinner; he is awakened to a realization of his own sinfulness, and remorsefully seeks the forgiveness of the God and the neighbors his sin has wronged. This penitent spirit, elicited by the action of God in Christ, opens the way to restoration.

4. In the life and death of Christ God manifests to men in matchless fashion his sacrificial, forgiving love. The God revealed in the cross is One who bears in his own heart the sins of those he loves. Precisely because he loves us, he endures unspeakable anguish through the disobedience of his own who receive him not, and compassionately gives his all to win them back to himself. Such love has power to break man's sinful will and to evoke his shame and repentance. Receptively contemplated, it calls forth man's answering love and the grateful commitment of his life. This perspective may be especially noted in recent publications by Methodist scholars and evangelists. (Among such are L. Harold DeWolf, A Hard Rain and a Cross, Nashville, 1966; Alan Walker, The Many Sided Cross, Nashville, 1962; and Don S. Browning, Atonement and Psychotherapy, Philadelphia, 1966.)

Thus utilizing the truths of the historic theories, we may say that men are redeemed through Jesus Christ in at least four interrelated and converging ways. On each of them may occur the divine-human encounter through which men are made new creatures in Christ. Atonement comes through revelation-and-response. God acts in Christ to reveal to men (1) the pattern of a perfect life, (2) his victorious power over evil, (3) the wickedness of sin in contrast to the divine holiness, and (4) his suffering, forgiving love. As men respond to God's redemptive activity, they experience (1) joyous endeavor to follow Christ, (2) victory over evil through trust in divine power, (3) conviction of sin, repentance, and obedience, and (4) self-giving love and devotion to God.

[The leading British Methodist thought on the Atonement in the modern period is that of the New Testament scholar VINCENT TAYLOR: see bibliography. He has restated the New Testament doctrine of the life and death of Christ as a representative sacrifice. God's Son as man offered the sacrifice of sinless obedience, which opens the way for man to come to God. Those who by faith make themselves one with Christ can share in the benefit of what He then did. Ed.]

As seen by Christian faith, however, the atonement is far more than a particular event or series of events in human history. Truly understood, on the divine side it is an eternal reality. A cross in the innermost nature of God preceded and follows the cross erected between two thieves on Golgotha. That is to say, there is within the nature of God a principle of redemptive spiritual self-sacrifice analogous to that seen in the sufferings of the incarnate Son in the days of his flesh. The redemptive activity of God in Christ is best viewed, as D. M. Baillie has suggested, as "the point in human history where we find the actual outcropping of the divine Atonement," which calls us individually back to God. (God Was in Christ, Charles Scribner's Son, 1948, p. 201.) The historical atonement occurred because at the heart of the universe, "eternal in the heavens," is One whose deepest nature is invincible, holy, sacrificial love. Jesus Christ saves because he is Mediator of that Love to sinful, finite men.

AUBREY, THOMAS (1808-1867), Welsh minister, was born on May 13, 1808, at Cefn-Coed-y-Cymer, South Wales. He entered the Wesleyan Ministry in 1826, and was soon recognized as one of the foremost preachers of his generation. It has been said of him that his eloquence in public debate was overpowering; and as a defender of the Methodist constitution he had no equal in Wales. He was chairman of the North Wales District from 1854-65, and was mainly responsible for the formation of the District Home Mission Fund and the District Chapel Fund, which, unlike the corresponding connectional funds, are administered by the district itself. His critics regarded him as an autocrat, which was probably not entirely unfair, but his policies were progressive and enterprising. A breakdown in health, probably caused by overwork, compelled him to become a supernumerary in 1865; he died in Rhyl, Nov. 16, 1867.

AUBURN, ALABAMA, U.S.A. From 1836 until 1937 Methodism in Auburn was virtually synonymous with the Auburn Methodist Church. On Jan. 13, 1937, a WESLEY FOUNDATION was organized to serve the students of Alabama Polytechnic Institute. Franklin Shackelford Moseley was its first director. However, there had been student ministers working with Methodist students and teaching religious education courses in the college since 1916. From 1916 to the present time student pastors and Foundation directors have been Albert E. Barnett, Arlie B. Davidson, Franklin S. Moseley, Griffin Lloyd, Everett Barnes, Mary Kirkman Holsambach, Norwood Jones, Walter H. Bozeman, Joe Neal Blair, Ashland Shaw, and G. Maxwell Hale, Jr. In recent years the Wesley Foundation has served as a Christian social conscience in the community and state.

Methodism expanded further in Auburn in 1958 when Grace Church was organized with the help of Auburn Church. This congregation now numbers 478 members (1970). Pastors who have served the church are Sterling Whitley, Garland Emmons, Jake B. Brown, O. C. Brown III, and J. Thomas Carr.

Auburn Church, founded in 1835 or 1836, was one of the first buildings erected in Auburn, Ala. It was built for a church school on land provided by the town's founder, John J. Harper. The roll of Methodist ministers begins in 1836, and lists Morgan Turrentine, 1836-37, as the first. Records indicate that a large Methodist society was organized as early as 1837. Family names of the first Auburn settlers include Harper, Scott, Williams, Hill, Eady, Nunn, Clowers, Perry, Yancy, Clark, Shorter, and Owsley. Many of these original residents were undoubtedly in the Methodist society.

At the instigation of the quarterly conference of the Auburn Church, in session on Nov. 26, 1855, the ALABAMA CONFERENCE of the M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH founded the East Alabama Male College in Auburn. This school formally opened in 1858, but closed during the Civil War. When it reopened, finances were so depleted that the conference transferred the institution to the State of Alabama in 1872, when it was reorganized and named the Agricultural and Mechanical College of Alabama. In 1899 it became Alabama Polytechnic Institute, and because it was universally called "Auburn," the name became Auburn University in 1959.

The Auburn Church early showed an interest in missions as well as in education. In 1861 Mrs. E. C. Dowdell, a member of this church, wrote Bishop JAMES O. ANDREW urging him to take the lead in organizing a women's missionary society. As a result of her concern and the concern of others in the years immediately following, women's work was begun in the M. E. Church, South in 1878. In 1879 Mrs. Dowdell was elected president of the Alabama Foreign Missionary Society, which had also been organized in 1878. She held this position for thirty years until her death. In 1912 there were four missionary societies in the Auburn Church: Foreign, Home, Young People's, and Juvenile. The Foreign and Home societies merged that year to become the Woman's Missionary Society. The Young People's society became the EPWORTH LEAGUE, and the Juvenile society was absorbed in the Junior Sunday School Department. In 1940, following unification of the major branches of American Methodism, women's work was organized locally as the WOMAN'S SOCIETY OF CHRISTIAN SERVICE in accordance with the action of the General Conference. Today the church provides full support for a missionary couple in JAPAN, in addition to its regular World Service giving.

In 1850 the original log church-school building was replaced by a handsome frame structure during the pastorate of S. F. Pilley. In 1899, when J. B. K. Spain was pastor, this building was remodeled and expanded, and it continued in use until 1955 when a new and larger structure of Georgian design was completed during the ministry of Joel D. McDavid.

Forty-seven ministers have served the church during its existence. Four of these served repeat pastorates after an interval of service elsewhere. Membership in 1970 was 1,562.

AUCKLAND, NEW ZEALAND. Central Mission. The Central Mission in Auckland, New Zealand, follows on the work of both PRIMITIVE and WESLEYAN METHODIST churches. The first Primitive Methodist church in Auckland was opened on Sunday, March 16, 1851, on a site in Alexandra Street (later renamed Airedale Street) granted by the government through the good offices of Governor George Grey. ROBERT WARD was the first minister.

On the Wesleyan side, the story goes back to 1884, when two zealous laymen of the Pitt Street Church persuaded the quarterly meeting to start a mission in a needy part of the city. This was known as the Helping Hand Mission. In 1895 the mission became a separate circuit.

From the time of Methodist Union in 1913, the former Primitive Methodist work at Airedale Street was worked within the Auckland Central Circuit under the direction of the superintendent. In 1927, the former Wesleyan work, by that time carried on at two centers, France Street and East Street, was amalgamated with Airedale Street. The unified work, which became known as Methodist Central Mission, Auckland, has since been carried on from the Airedale Street site. Superintendent A. Everil Orr was appointed there in 1933.

In 1964, a nine-story office building was opened fronting on Civic Square, with a new church, seating 320, and the mission offices and other facilities alongside. In cooperation with sister churches, the mission developed a counseling center and a Samaritan Life-Line telephone counseling service.

Over the years, a number of important institutions were developed under the auspices of the mission.

Campbells Bay Health Camp was purchased on Oct. 19, 1934. The first building was erected in one day, July 23, 1935. Later buildings were opened in December, 1937. For a time the camp was used by the New Zealand Federation of Health Camps, and was the first of its kind in the Auckland District. Since 1954, the buildings have been used extensively for camps and retreats by Methodist and other church groups and for summer holiday accommodation of church families.

Wesley Geriatric Hospital, Mt. Eden. A large residence was purchased from the late S. A. Bull and opened as a convalescent hospital on Sept. 30, 1950. From 1957 onward, additional land was acquired; and in 1964, a modern forty-bed hospital (later extended to forty-six) was opened on the site. A well-equipped occupational therapy unit was started in 1966.

Astley House, Mt. Albert, housing sixty-two elderly women, was originally owned by the late William Astley and was officially opened by him on May 2, 1942. Later additions were partly subsidized by the state.

Tyler House, Mt. Albert (adjacent to Astley House), was purchased in 1954. With the Thomas Ashby Memorial Hospital wing, added in November, 1959, it now houses twenty-four elderly men.

Leigh Haven Cottages, Mt. Albert (adjoining Astley and Tyler House), was opened in June, 1960, to provide residences for single and married people. Here a total of thirty-two people are housed.

Winstone Lodge, Remuera. Opened in 1956, as a hostel for young women, this lodge provides accommodation for thirty business girls and university students.

Dunholme Theological College, Remuera, Auckland, was the fifth institution for the training of theological students in New Zealand. The fourth—following PUKE-

KAWA—was located in Ponsonby, where a house was rented for the year 1911 only. Students moved into residence in 1912, and Dunholme was in use from 1912 to 1928. The first principal was C. H. GARLAND and the second C. H. LAWS. During that period, seventy-eight men were trained, one of them a Maori, Matarae Tauroa.

PITT STREET CHURCH, AUCKLAND, NEW ZEALAND

Pitt Street Church is the "mother church" in the country's largest city. It was opened in 1866 and was described as "the noblest and most ecclesiastical building in the city." The opening services covered two Sundays, and of the six services, three were taken by a Presbyterian, a Baptist, and a Congregational minister respectively.

The first Methodist Church in Auckland had been built in 1843, in High Street. It was a weatherboard building forty by twenty-five feet, with a vestry twelve by eight feet. Before this church was erected, Methodist services had been held in a saw pit, in private homes and later in the courthouse.

In 1845, an addition of sixteen feet was made to the length of the High Street Church. Three years later a new brick church was built, which in turn had to be lengthened by sixteen feet a little later, and a gallery was built around three sides. It was then the largest church in Auckland, and today forms part of the magistrate's court.

With the growth of the city it became necessary to build a still larger central church. About an acre of land was purchased a mile farther out, at the corner of Pitt Street and Karangahape Road, and the present brick church was built. Because the ground fell away sharply toward the back of the section, massive walls of scoria were first built which now enclose the Sunday school hall beneath the church. Labor and materials were costly. Following the Maori Wars there was a trade recession in the colony, and as a result the trustees had to borrow more than £5,000 of a total cost of £11,000. Interest rates were high, and the debt was not cleared until 1882.

The church was opened in 1866. Congregations and the Sunday school were large. A gallery was built at the back of the church and in 1877, a wooden structure was erected as a Sunday school hall. The following year an organ was imported, and the galleries were completed at a cost of £800.

A substantial addition was made at the back of the church in 1887. On the lower floor a lecture hall and eight classrooms were built, while on the church level, a church parlor and four classrooms were added, these additions greatly improving the proportions and the appearance of the building.

In 1935, the separate Sunday school building was removed to a nearby suburb, where it forms the Christian Education block of Wesley Church, Mission Bay. In its place the Wesley Bi-Centenary Hall of three stories was built at a cost of £17,000.

With the approach of the Pitt Street Church Centenary, the trustees, early in the 1960s, planned and carried through a complete renovation of the church interior, and the addition of a commodious porch. The side galleries were removed, revealing the full beauty of the stained-glass windows; and the organ, one of the finest in New Zealand, was entirely rebuilt.

Prince Albert College is described elsewhere under its earlier name of Wesley College and Seminary. Here reference is made only to the affairs of the trustees who, in the name of the church, took the property over in 1858, paying the owners, who were ministers and missionaries, the sum of £3,720.

In 1868, Wesley College and Seminary closed. The property was leased by the trustees to other educationists, until in 1895 it was again opened by the trustees under the name of Prince Albert College. But on Dec. 28, 1906, the board of governors told the trustees that they were no longer financially able to continue the work of the college; so it was closed again.

The Methodist Conference of 1907 gave the trustees leave either "to sell or lease for a lengthened term." The trustees then offered the property for sale, but the highest offer was only £12,500. As the mortgage and overdraft amounted to £8,743, there would have been just under £4,000 in hand, and the property would have gone from the connexion forever. Therefore, the Conference of 1908 agreed to the leasing of the property for fifty years to a firm of land agents at £696 per annum, subject to valuation for all buildings and improvements being paid at the end of the term, less the sum of £5,000, the value of the buildings on Jan. 1, 1908. This firm of land agents, acting under the terms of their lease, erected on the Queen Street frontage a total of seventeen shops, and the rental from these and the original school buildings became the principal source of income when the trustees took direct control again in 1948.

Not until 1940 was the debt of £8,743 finally cleared, because in the meantime the trustees had most generously assisted both Trinity College and Wesley College with grants.

In 1937, the lessees offered to sell to the trustees their interest in the property for £33,000. The trustees declined, as they considered the price asked too high. But in 1948, the trustees purchased the lease for £24,000, and this meant a mortgage liability to the Bank of New Zealand of £20,000. However, substantial rents of nearly £4,000 a year (later rising to £6,500) gave the trustees confidence to proceed.

It was at this point that J. W. Shackelford resigned as secretary of the trust, and Conference paid him a well-deserved tribute for his consistent safeguarding of the interests of the church throughout his long term of nearly forty years.

Since the trustees entered into possession of the property in 1946, they have been able to pay off the mortgage to the bank, and to show in their balance sheet (for the year ending June 30, 1966) assets valued at £170,000.

Ambitious plans for the development of the site have already begun with the construction of a block of office buildings on the Turner Street frontage of the property (opened in 1965). Later developments will include a motel and a conference center.

TRINITY THEOLOGICAL COLLEGE, AUCKLAND, NEW ZEALAND

Trinity Theological College is an institution of the Methodist Church of New Zealand. In the early days of the colony, ministerial recruits were placed on probation directly in circuits. In 1875, a modest beginning was made at Wesley College, Three Kings. In 1911, a property was leased in Dunholme, suburb of Remuera, and under C. H. GARLAND and C. H. LAWS, a separate ministerial training was built up.

In 1929, the institution was transferred to new buildings on a commanding site near the University of Auckland, and named Trinity College. It accommodates sixty men, just over half of whom are divinity students, and the rest, boarders attending the University of Auckland.

The college curriculum has always been designed to preserve a high standard of biblical scholarship. Trinity has had four principals: LAWS (1929-30), HARRY RANSON (1931-41), Eric W. HAMES (1941-62), and David O. Williams (1963-).

There are three other professors and some visiting lecturers. The college is responsible for a school for Christian workers, which gives an elementary one-year course of training for laymen. The library contains early mission records and some valuable Wesleyana.

ERIC W. HAMES

Wesley College, Paerata, twenty-seven miles south of Auckland, established in 1922, inherits the traditions of the Wesleyan Native Institution and of Wesley College, Three Kings, and seeks to offer a sound Christian education to Maoris, Europeans, and Pacific islanders, thus providing an interesting experiment in multiracial communal life. Situated amid beautiful, rolling farmlands, it has a traditional emphasis on agriculture, but it also offers the usual academic courses. In 1966 there was accommodation for 210 boys, but the board has plans for extension by steps to a maximum of 300.

Possessing useful endowments, the school is able to maintain good standards at a moderate fee. It has been served by only three principals: R. C. Clark, E. M. Marshall, and C. A. Neate. The chairman of the board is J. Stuart Caughey, a leading Auckland businessman.

Wesley College, Three Kings, Auckland, was opened in 1876. After the Maori Wars, and in view of European settlement, an attempt was made to combine training of potential Maori leaders with theological education for Europeans. The property of the Wesleyan Native Institution was resumed, and the name Wesley College was taken. For twenty years, the dual arrangement continued. In 1895, the theological department was detached, and Wesley College continued as a training school for Maori boys, under the guidance of J. H. SIMMONDS. Many of these young men qualified and were ordained to the ministry among their own people. In 1922, the school was moved to new buildings on a farm of 680 acres at Paerata, twenty-seven miles south of Auckland. The Three Kings property was sold to the government for development as a housing estate.

ERIC W. HAMES

Wesley College and Seminary (later Prince Albert College), Auckland, was opened on an eight-acre site, as a coeducational school for the children of Wesleyan missionaries on Jan. 1, 1850, with a roll of forty drawn from mission stations in FIJI, TONGA, AUSTRALIA, and NEW ZEALAND. The college was owned by the missionaries themselves, £20 shares having been bought by them in proportion to the number of children in each family. At the request of the missionaries, Joseph H. Fletcher was appointed the first headmaster.

In 1858, the owners sold their interest in the property to trustees, who thereafter conducted the college as a connexional school. About four acres of the land was sold in 1865 to pay off mortgage debts; and three years later, economic hardship forced the college to close, and the buildings were leased for use as a private school.

The buildings were again utilized for a Methodist school with the opening of Prince Albert College for boys in 1895. There was an enrollment of thirty-six. A department for girls was added a year later. The work of the college prospered for some years under the principalship of Thomas Jackson, and it became Auckland's leading secondary school. During the period 1895 to 1906, accommodation was provided at the college for a total of thirty-eight theological students undergoing training for the ministry.

In 1906, moved by fears for the future of private schools with the introduction of free state secondary education, the trustees closed the college and two years later leased the property for fifty years. During the greater part of that period, the buildings were used as a private hotel operated by the Salvation Army.

With the old building still leased as a boardinghouse to a private operator, the property is being developed as a commercial building site, which (as the official entry in the 1966 Minute Book has it) "will endow a school in perpetuity." However, it may be some years before such a school can be reestablished.

Wesleyan Native Institution, Auckland, came into being because the success of the Wesleyan Mission to the Maori people led to a demand for a school suitable for training teacher-pastors to reside in the scattered Maori villages. On October 7, 1844, the governor made a grant of six acres of land on what was then the outskirts of the town of Auckland, and here a modest beginning was made under THOMAS BUDDLE. In 1849, the institution moved to a farm property a few miles out at Three Kings, where the students could live off the land, and ALEXANDER REID came from England to take charge. For several years the institution flourished, catering to young men in training for the native ministry and to younger pupils; but the disputes of the next two decades led to a change of temper among the Maoris. The institution declined and was forced to close in 1869. It was reopened in 1876 under the name of Wesley College, Three Kings. The original grant of land now in the city of Auckland is held as an educational endowment, part being occupied by Trinity College.

Wesleydale Children's Home, Mount Roskill, Auckland, carries on the work of several earlier homes. In 1913, a well-known Methodist layman, A. C. CAUCHEY, and his sister, Mrs. W. H. Smith, gave a house of twenty rooms at Mount Albert, Auckland, to serve as an orphanage for needy children, irrespective of creed. The building was enlarged, renovated and modernized for use as a church orphanage, as intended by the donors.

It was opened on Nov. 13, 1913, with Joseph Blight and his wife as manager and matron. Later, a second home was bought nearby from Mr. and Mrs. Percy Winstone, and still later a third home in Buckland Road, Epsom. This last was used as a home for girls.

The need for a new building became urgent, and a site of eleven acres was purchased on the slopes of Mount Roskill. It was decided that one home should be built there for both girls and boys, and the foundation stone was laid on May 2, 1954. The completed building was officially opened, and named "Wesleydale" on Oct. 29, 1955. In 1961, there were fifty-one children in residence.

In 1966, with only nineteen enrolled, the work was reorganized, part of the buildings being developed as a family home and the remainder as a reception center from which children would move to foster homes or dispersed family homes.

AUGUSTA, GEORGIA, U.S.A., population 70,626, the first city into which Methodism was introduced in GEORGIA, was established as Fort Augusta by General JAMES OGLETHORPE in 1735. Located on the Savannah River, it owes its growth to industry and agriculture. In 1789 the former St. Paul's Episcopal Church was rebuilt as a place of worship for all denominations. FRANCIS ASBURY preached there in 1796.

Augusta was then the gay capital of Georgia, and the plain preachers who gathered huge crowds in the rural areas had no success with the pleasure loving people of the city. In 1798 STITH MEAD came to Augusta to visit relatives and preached such a fiery sermon in St. Paul's that he was forbidden to preach there again. "Augusta," he wrote, "had then about 4,000 people, not one of whom knew his right hand from the left in religious matters." However, Rachel Doughty invited him to preach in her house, and the first Methodist society was organized.

The Methodist meetinghouse, later called St. John, was built in 1801, and John Carvin was appointed to one of the few one-station charges in America. When Asbury saw the bell in the tower he was horrified: "It is the first I have seen on any of our meeting houses, and I hope it will be the last." He first observed, "It is cracked and I hope it will break." (Journal, Nov. 16, 1806.) Bishops COKE and Asbury came to Augusta when the SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE met there in 1804.

Augusta became the largest inland cotton port in the world, and because of its industry, it was known as the "Connecticut of the South." In 1856 another church was needed to serve the eastern part of the city, and St. James was established by some members of St. John. Five men who served St. John were elected to the episcopacy: J. O. ANDREW, G. F. PIERCE, J. S. KEY, W. A. CANDLER, and H. M. DUBOSE.

In 1857 Asbury Church was begun in the factory area of the city, and in 1875 St. Luke was begun in the mill section. A congregation was organized in the Woodlawn area in 1889, and in 1890 Mann was founded. As the boundaries of Augusta expanded, so did Methodism. In 1925 Mize was begun, and Trinity-on-the-Hill was started in 1926.

Some of the oldest churches in Methodism surround the city. Liberty was begun in 1785, Pierce in 1800, and Philadelphia in 1821. As a result of the coming of Fort Gordon in the second World War, and the Savannah River Plant in 1950, the city mushroomed in size. Several churches were already near the military areas, such as Lewis, founded in 1901, Grovetown begun in 1883, and Marvin started in 1891, but even though these churches grew as well as the downtown churches, new congregations were organized to care for the influx. Accordingly, Burns and Riverview were begun in 1948, St. Mark in 1949, and Martinez in 1956. Aldersgate was established in 1962 and Cokesbury in 1963. It should be said also that North Augusta, just across the river and belonging to the South Carolina Conference, has a very strong church serving that large community.

Other branches of Methodism are also represented in the city. There is a WESLEYAN CHURCH, and a SOUTHERN METHODIST CHURCH was begun in 1965. Among the Negro Methodists the C.M.E. CHURCH is the strongest. Trinity was established in 1840. Williams was begun in 1873, Miles in 1888, Rock of Ages in 1890, and Hudson Grove in 1945. PAINE COLLEGE was established in 1884 by the M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH and the C.M.E. Church. Paine has been instrumental in training Negro preachers, social workers, and teachers. An A.M.E. ZION church and a large A.M.E. church are also located in Augusta.

Trinity Church was organized in 1840, thirty years before the C.M.E. Church. The General Conferences of 1873, 1886, and 1910 met at Trinity. Bishops JOSEPH A. BEEBE, ISAAC LANE, LUCIUS H. HOLSEY, M. F. JAMISON, and GEORGE W. STEWART were elected at General Conferences held at Trinity.

More than half of the members of St. John M. E. Church, South were colored when Trinity was organized. The members purchased the freedom of the first colored pastor, James Harris of Athens, Ga., to fill the pulpit. He began his ministry in 1850 and was followed by Ned West, a native of Augusta. Three former pastors have been made bishops and three have been general officers.

Trinity Church has a heritage and reputation based upon a background of more than a hundred years of unbroken service from its present location.

AUGUSTA COLLEGE was located at Augusta, Ky., and was the first Methodist college organized after COKESBURY had been destroyed. A county academy had been in operation for several years, when, learning that the OHIO and KENTUCKY CONFERENCES desired to found an institution of learning, the citizens of Augusta tendered it for the purpose of organizing a college. One of the reasons which made for its acceptance was the fact that Augusta was on the Ohio River and thus accessible by boat in that day when roads were almost nonexistent and the railroad had not yet appeared.

In 1822 John P. Finley was appointed as principal, in which office he remained until 1825. In 1823 Jonathan Stamper was appointed missionary to collect funds for Augusta College. In 1825 JOHN P. DURBIN was appointed professor of languages and Joseph S. Tomlinson professor of mathematics, in which chairs they remained until the spring of 1832. In 1828 MARTIN RUTER, who had been book agent in CINCINNATI, was elected president. In 1831 H. B. BASCOM and Burr H. McKown were added as professors. In 1832 Ruter resigned the presidency and took charge of a church in PITTSBURGH, and Durbin was elected editor of the Christian Advocate in New York. Tomlinson was then elected president and J. H. Fielding professor of mathematics. Tomlinson remained president until 1844, when a proposition was made to place the Transylvania University at Lexington under the care of the Kentucky Conference, and to accomplish that purpose Augusta College was abandoned. The enterprise at Lexington was unsuccessful, and in a few years an attempt was made to resuscitate Augusta College. Owing to the division which had taken place in the church, and the difficulties in the border states, and the Ohio Conference having transferred its patronage to the OHIO UNIVERSITY at DELAWARE, but little was accomplished and the institution was for the second time abandoned.

During the period of its existence this college was of great service in the West. In its halls were educated many young men who became prominent both in the ministry and in the various professions of life. The impulse which it gave to the cause of education led, directly or indirectly, to the establishment of other institutions which are still enjoying prosperity.

AULT, JAMES MASE (1918-), American seminary dean, was born at Sayre, Pa., Aug. 24, 1918. Following work in tool engineering and service in World War II as a first lieutenant, he won magna cum laude the A.B. at Colgate in 1949, and the B.D. at Union Theological Seminary in 1952. He earned the S.T.M. degree at Union in 1964, and studied at St. Andrews University, Scotland in 1966. He was ordained deacon in 1950 and elder in 1952. His pastorates include Carlton Hill, Rutherford, N. J., 1951-53; Leonia, N. J., 1953-58; and First Church, Pittsfield, Mass., 1958-61. He became dean of students and associate professor of practical theology at Union Seminary in 1961 and director of field education and full professor in 1964. He was made dean and professor of pastoral theology at DREW UNIVERSITY, July 1, 1968. Ault published a Methodist study book, Responsible Adults for Tomorrow's World, in 1962. He is a member of the NORTHERN NEW JERSEY CONFERENCE and serves on the commission on church and economic life of the NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. He married Dorothy Mae Barnhart, Dec. 22, 1943, and they have three children.

AULT, WILLIAM (17?-1815), was a British Methodist pioneer missionary to Asia. Nothing is known of his early life, but he deserves remembrance as one of those who accompanied THOMAS COKE on the first mission to Asia. Ault's wife died at sea on the five-month voyage. He was appointed to Batticaloa on arrival in 1814, preached to soldiers and civilians, and began language study but was stricken with fever and died, the first Methodist missionary to do so in Asia, on April 1, 1815.

AUSTIN, MINNESOTA, U.S.A. First Church has been for several generations one of the strongest churches in the Methodist connection in the state. The first Methodist class in Austin was organized in 1854 by several early settlers, and the first quarterly conference was held in October of 1856. In 1861 the first building was erected, following a ministry by a circuit-riding pastor who came from Iowa. This building has been succeeded by four others. The present sanctuary, which seats one thousand, was erected after a city-wide revival in 1906. An extensive education wing was added in 1956.

In 1952 the church assumed the full support of a missionary family sent out by the Methodist Mission Board to the PHILIPPINES, and has carried that support since. The mission and benevolence giving of the church has been unusually generous.

The church is notable for having within its membership a cross-section of the life both of the city and countryside—business and professional people, rank and file of labor unions, a large group of farm families, and an unusual group of professional women being in its membership. Austin First was one of the first churches of the state to accept on its staff a fully ordained woman minister. Its youth work has been particularly strong. In 1960 the church sponsored a "daughter-church" in a new section of the city of Austin, providing two hundred and fifty of the charter members of the new body, and giving extensive financial support for a dozen years. This new church is called Fellowship Methodist Church. The tradition of lay preaching has been strong in the church for many years. Such pulpit leadership has strengthened the church, and has been extended to many other churches in the vicinity. In the mid-1960's the church became a leader in the ecumenical movement, and played a vital role in bringing about a new climate among the various churches of the city. Present membership is approximately 2,000.

AUSTIN, TEXAS, U.S.A., the capital of that state and a city of both historic and national import, has a population of 275,000. It was founded by Stephen F. Austin in 1821. Between 1836 and 1839 the seat of government shifted several times. The TEXAS Congress at length authorized a commission to select a location for the capital. By a vote of three to two the commission recommended "Waterloo," on the banks of the Colorado River; Congress accepted the report but ordered the town to be called "Austin."

A generation later a DETROIT architect drew plans for the capital, and a CHICAGO firm accepted 3,000,000 acres of land as price of construction. In recent years this land has produced oil wells and rich minerals.

The capitol building is second in size to the national capitol at WASHINGTON, D. C. Half a mile north of the capitol is the campus of the University of Texas, set aside for this purpose by Congress in 1839. The Declaration of Independence, March 2, 1836, recalled that MEXICO had failed to establish any system of public education, and reaffirmed the conviction "that unless a people are educated . . . it is idle to expect the continuance of civil liberty, or the capacity for self-government." The University opened in 1883 with thirteen professors and 218 students. Today it is the largest state university in the South, with an enrollment of 32,000 students in the main branch located at Austin.

Methodism has been noted in Austin for its ministry to the University of Texas students. Succession of strong campus pastors and work of the students as well as an organization of an EPWORTH LEAGUE in 1891 eventually made possible in 1914 the Daniel Fund. This financed the family of J. W. DANIEL for mission work in BRAZIL and inspired the students of Southern Methodist University to start their EARL MORELAND Fund. Moreland was also a missionary in Brazil. There is at present a new WESLEY FOUNDATION building across the street from the University Church. This Foundation, with a full staff of trained workers under the leadership of Robert Breihan, ministers to one of the two largest concentrations of Methodist students in the entire nation, with about 5,000 of the 32,000-student body of the University being either Methodist or of Methodist preference. C. W. Hall, "dean" of Methodist Student Work in Texas, served as director for 1933-1956.

In the Bible Chair part of the Foundation, courses are offered in Bible and Religion for which degree credit is given by the University. Guilds of Lay Theologians are sponsored, and regular classes on Sunday are conducted.

All the avenues over which students can be reached for the Christian faith are explored.

Many leaders in church and state have come from the Methodist students on the University of Texas campus, including MOTOZA AKAZAWA of JAPAN, who attended the University in 1908. He went to VANDERBILT for his theological training and was later elected the first bishop of the Methodist Church in Japan.

The population of Austin in 1840 was 856; by 1970 it had grown to 275,000.

In January, 1840, a census of Austin showed "seventeen Methodists, twelve Presbyterians, eleven Episcopalians, ten Baptists and ten Roman Catholics; two organized churches—one Methodist and one Presbyterian." Methodism was introduced by John Haynie "at the residence of David Thomas The next minister to pioneer in the 'capital in the wilderness' was the Rev. HOMER THRALL . . . under whose supervision a Methodist church was reared." In 1970 there were about 17,000 Methodists in Austin, divided as follows: 14,660 members in fourteen congregations in the South Central Jurisdiction, UNITED METHODIST CHURCH; 500 members in the two Latin American congregations; 1,650 members in the five A.M.E. congregations; and one small C.M.E. church. Three of these congregations have a history of more than one hundred years each.

On Aug. 17, 1835, William B. Travis, the Texas hero, wrote the New York Christian Advocate: "I wish you would do me and the good cause the favor to publish such remarks as will call the attention of the reverend Bishops . . . and the Board of Missions, to the subject of spreading the Gospel in Texas. . . . Texas is composed of the shrewdest and most intelligent population of any new country on earth; therefore a preacher to do good must be respectable and talented. In sending your heralds in the four corners of the Earth, remember Texas." Six months later, Travis, a Texas immortal, lay dead in the Alamo!

The next year a letter was sent from Austin to Bishop JAMES O. ANDREW, presiding at NATCHEZ, Miss., asking that he send them a missionary. The Bishop read the letter to the conference and inquired if anyone was willing to volunteer. ROBERT ALEXANDER accepted the challenge, and thus began forty-four years of service in Texas. At the same time MARTIN RUTER and LITTLETON FOWLER joined Alexander as the first official missionaries to Texas.

Edmund Heinsohn writes, "When a student in the University of Texas . . . in 1905, [I] saw Negroes who were attempting to walk across the campus of the University rocked off by white students. This same campus . . . has . . . become integrated during the last few years, and has also witnessed the reception of Negro students into the membership of white churches around the campus. The reception of Negro students into the University Church did not cause the loss of a single member."

Schools in Austin are: University of Texas; Austin Presbyterian Seminary; Episcopal Theological Seminary; Concordia College (Lutheran); St. Edwards University (Catholic); and HUSTON-TILLOTSON COLLEGE (for Negroes).

First Church. As narrated above, Methodism came to Central Texas through the ministry of John Haynie in 1840, and he was assigned to the Austin Circuit which included the areas now in Travis and Bastrop Counties. After holding his first service at the residence of David Thomas, the little group moved later to a log house built by the men of the community and located south of what is now known as Woolridge Park, just west of the city library. Indian raids and uprising in the Republic of Texas made it impossible for the church to continue during the two years from 1843 to 1845. However, the congregation reorganized again in 1846 and began to hold preaching services in the House of Congress of the Republic of Texas with HOMER S. TURALL as pastor. After that, the First Church was moved in 1854 to a little red brick church on East Mulberry (10th Street) when Dr. Phillips became pastor. In 1883, Central M. E. Church, South, was constructed on the corner of East Tenth Street under the leadership of E. A. Goodwyn. Later the name was changed to Tenth Street Church, and later still to the First Methodist Church, which name it has held since that date.

The church moved to its present location on the Corner of Twelfth and Lavaca and Colorado Streets in 1922, where the first unit of the present sanctuary was constructed. The congregation completed the present church building in 1928 under the leadership of E. R. Barcus and W. F. Bryan. The education building located just north of the main building was constructed in 1953. Ministering in the shadow of the Capitol of the state, the services of First Church reach hundreds of students of the University of Texas, visitors to the capital city, and officials of the State.

Listed among former pastors are KENNETH POPE, presently Bishop of the Dallas-Fort Worth Area of The United Methodist Church. He served as pastor at First Church, 1940-49.

The community is rapidly growing and First Church at present has a membership of 2,155.

University Church was constituted a church in the M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH in the latter part of 1887. An early minister in his report to the quarterly conference stated that the membership consisted of "thirteen souls, good spirited and willing." The church in time came to have more than 3,000 communicants. New suburban churches have been built, and the membership is now in excess of 2,500. The church began holding services in an abandoned chapel and now has physical properties valued at over $1,200,000.

The genesis of University Church was the desire of Austin Methodism to minister to the University of Texas. At the present time 148 faculty and staff members and their families are on the membership roll. But enrolled too are many from the state government and from the business and professional classes of Austin. At one time sixty-seven lawyers and an actual quorum of the Texas State Supreme Court of nine members were affiliated with University Church. The church is located north across the street from the main campus of the University and east across the street from the Wesley Foundation, and together they minister to a student body in excess of 32,000.

University Church has had both long and short pastorates. The writer of this article served for twenty-five years (1934-59), and his successor, James William Morgan, served for ten years. Across the years the church has had a great laity, and from this church great numbers have gone into the ministry, government, business, and the various professions. It presently has two full-time missionaries in BOLIVIA. When the membership of the local church was integrated in 1957, the official board by a unanimous and standing vote gave its approval. When there came a change in pastors, the chairman of the pastoral relations committee said: "There is one thing sure, this church does not want to back-track on any of the positions it has taken on the great social issues." The University Church pulpit is held to be one of the prophetic pulpits of American Methodism.

AUSTRALASIAN METHODIST HISTORICAL SOCIETY. This Society was organized in a meeting called for that purpose on Oct. 27, 1932. The sponsors of the Society were F. R. Swynny, C. J. MacAulay, and S. C. Roberts and the meeting was called for by H. C. Foreman, president then of the Conference.

The objects of the Society are: 1) Australasian Methodist historical research, and 2) to promote the study of Methodist history, biography and literature. In this the Society has been successful and is recognized by the General Conference. From its inception it has published the Journal and Proceedings. Many have given the Society distinguished service, and included among its officers have been F. R. Swynny, F. H. McGowan, R. H. Doust, V. S. Little, Miss Emily Pickering, L. Deall, H. Rabone, C. AUSTRALIA. The eastern seaboard of Australia was discovered by Captain Cook in 1770. The first colony, New South Wales, was established at SYDNEY in 1788; the next, the island of Tasmania, at Hobart in 1804. Population spread from New South Wales along the east coast and, later, to the south and west.

The area is 7,686,843 sq. km. A large part of the continent, mainly in the north, center and west, is infertile and still very sparsely settled.

On account of distances and poor communications, Victoria separated from New South Wales in 1851, followed by Queensland, Tasmania, Western Australia and South Australia were colonized independently. In 1901 these six separate colonies were reunited by federation and became States of the Commonwealth of Australia. The federal capital is Canberra.

The population in 1969 was 12,099,100. Forty percent of the people live in two cities, Sydney and MELBOURNE, capitals of New South Wales and Victoria respectively. Approximately ninety percent is of British origin. The original inhabitants, known as Aborigines, one of the world's oldest races, number 120,000, including part-Aborigines.

Australia has developed a nationalist attitude and realizes its geographical position in the Asian and Pacific region.

The British Wesleyan Conference in 1814 appointed a minister, SAMUEL LEIGH, to labor in the new colony of New South Wales. Leigh landed in Sydney in 1815. At that time New Zealand and the Pacific Islands were included in the area in which British Methodism was establishing operations.

In 1854 the Missions in the Australian region were constituted by the British Wesleyan Conference as "a distinct connexion, to be denominated the Australasian Wesleyan-Methodist Connexion."

The first Australasian Conference was held in Sydney in 1855. In 1873 this conference determined on the division of annual conferences in the colonies, together with a General Conference for the whole connexion which met every three years. This was consequent upon the political division of the country into separate colonies.

The following annual conferences were set up: NEW SOUTH WALES and Queensland in 1874, with QUEENSLAND becoming a separate Conference in 1893; VICTORIA AND TASMANIA in 1874; SOUTH AUSTRALIA, including Western Australia in 1874, WESTERN AUSTRALIA being constituted a separate Conference in 1900; NEW ZEALAND in 1874. TONGA, FIJI and other Pacific Islands districts were attached to the New South Wales Conference. (Although Tasmania is a separate state, Victoria and Tasmania remain as one Conference.)

In 1902, as the result of the union of the Wesleyans with the smaller Methodist bodies, the Methodist Church of Australasia was formed, with its General Conference and Annual Conferences as before. The first General Conference after Methodist union met in Melbourne in 1904.

The Methodist Church of New Zealand was established by separation from the Methodist Church of Australasia, in 1913, by the declaration of the General Conference of which it had been a part. The name "Australasia" was retained by the parent body for legal reasons and also because the Pacific Islands Mission Districts attached to it are included in the geographical term "Australasia." All these Mission Districts continued under the control of the Church in Australia, with the exception of the Solomon Islands transferred to the Methodist Church of New Zealand in 1922.

The President-General of the Methodist Church of Australasia is elected by the General Conference meeting by rotation of the capital cities of the States every three years; the administrative office is situated at the Methodist Church Centre, 130 Little Collins Street, Melbourne, Victoria, 3000.

Methodism in Australia follows the Anglican and Roman Catholic Churches as the third largest religious denomination in Australia, closely followed by the Presbyterian Church.

*Statistics for Papua, New Guinea (New Britain, etc.) and Solomon Islands are omitted because these districts are now part of the United Church of Papua, New Guinea and the Solomon Islands.

The 1966 Census in Australia numbered 1,124,310 Methodists, or 9.8 percent of the population.

Inland Mission. Following on several visits to Queensland and Western Australia by A. T. HOLDEN, Victorian Home Mission Secretary, who had been invited to confer with the Home Mission Committees in those states regarding their tremendous problems, the Victorian Committee gave substantial money grants over a period of years.

The inadequacy of this method soon became apparent. The entire Northern Territory and almost half the areas of QUEENSLAND, SOUTH AUSTRALIA, and WESTERN AUSTRALIA called for attention.

As a result of conversations between Holden and A. J. BARCLAY of Western Australia, the proposal to establish the Inland Mission was moved and seconded by these ministers in the General Conference held at Brisbane in 1926, and was carried with much enthusiasm. The Federal Methodist Inland Mission was to reach out to the most distant frontiers and this great project was to be shared by the Home Mission Departments of the five annual conferences. In the following year the work commenced.

All the territory west of the 137th degree of longitude was excised from the Queensland Conference, and all the territory north of the 28th parallel of latitude from the West Australian Conference. To these was added the whole of the Northern Territory, approximately six times as big as Victoria, making a total area for the new Mission of 1,500,000 square miles—half the size of Europe.

The Mission is controlled by a board representative of all state conferences, the cost of the Mission being borne proportionately by them.

Victoria was central to the states involved and as it had no "outback" country comparable to NEW SOUTH WALES, Queensland, South Australia and Western Australia, its Home Mission Department was requested to make the general superintendent, A. T. Holden, available to become the honorary director of the Federal Methodist Inland Mission and its executive to carry the administrative responsibilities of the Board between annual meetings. Thus MELBOURNE became the administrative center of the Mission and the venue of the annual meetings of the Board. The general superintendents of Victoria Home Missions, A. T. Holden, T. C. RENTOUL and A. W. PEDERICK, have carried the responsibilities of leadership as its directors, with the exception of one period of five years after the second World War when H. Griffiths was director residing on the field. Victoria has borne a very

Two Victorian home missionaries, W. J. Ormandy and Athol D. McGregor, were among the first five agents to be appointed. They were followed later by others. The Mission has succeeded beyond expectation and has carried the Gospel, both in word and deed, to places where previously there had not been any religious agencies.

Movements for Church Union. Many Methodists in 1902 hoped that the consummation of Methodist Union would be the prelude to further Protestant unity. Actually, the Presbyterians were the first to make practical proposals to this effect at that very time. Methodists and Congregationalists agreed to confer with the Presbyterians; after some hesitation, Anglicans and others declined to negotiate.

During the early years of this century negotiations among three denominations continued, only delayed by the first World War. A Basis of Union was framed and the title, "The United Church of Australia," was proposed. In 1920 the question of union was submitted to a vote of the membership, the result being approximately ninety percent Methodists and eighty-five percent Congregationalists, but only sixty percent Presbyterians, in favor. The strength of the Presbyterian opposition lay in VICTORIA. This opposition was so firm, with the possibility of legal action, that the Presbyterian General Assembly of Australia in 1924 decided to suspend all negotiations, adding significantly that there was no barrier in principle to union and it was only because of the size of the opposition that the Presbyterians felt that no further action should be taken by their Church.

At the time when these three denominations united in CANADA, Australia failed to take the same step and wandered in the wilderness of ecclesiastical disunity for forty years.

Later, there were suggestions of a dual union between the Methodist and Congregational Churches. Partly because of the right of individual Congregational churches not to enter into union, and also because of the disparity in the size of the two denominations, this effort did not receive great support. Another suggestion was a federal union, allowing each denomination to have control over membership and property, but uniting in other fields such as home missions, overseas missions, Christian education and evangelism. This half-union was not strongly supported. Through these years Victoria was the focal point in promoting plans for unity.

In 1954 the Methodist General Conference decided not to proceed with the effort to unite with the Congregationalists only, but to renew an approach to the Presbyterians for the resumption of negotiations for an organic union of the three churches. The Presbyterian General Assembly of Australia, after a large majority of the membership of their denomination had voted to resume negotiations, sanctioned the formation of a Joint Commission on Church Union, with seven representatives from each of the three denominations.

After some years of discussions, a Basis of Union was submitted to the three churches and, in general, accepted, but with the deletion of the proposal of the Basis for episcopacy to be instituted through a concordat with the CHURCH OF SOUTH INDIA. The Methodist General Conference in 1966 declared that it did not object to episcopacy but resolved not to urge it if one of the other churches opposed. The Presbyterian General Assembly of Australia in 1967 deleted the proposal for episcopacy. Both denominations deleted the proposal for a concordat restricted to the Church of South India.

A new Basis of Union, without episcopacy, is being drawn up and will be submitted to the three churches in 1969-70. There is a general expectation that the new Basis will be accepted, that a Constitution also will be adopted, that legal requirements will be submitted to Parliaments and fully met, and that the united church may come into being, say, about 1973. The name proposed is, "The Uniting Church in Australia."

As even the title for the church indicates, there is a general desire that the uniting of the three denominations will be the first step towards further union. Observers from the Anglican Church and the Churches of Christ have been present at the meetings of the Joint Commission for several years past.

Leading Victorians in the negotiations for union have been C. CALVERT BARBER, H. G. Secomb and A. HAROLD WOOD.

Meantime, practical steps towards union have been taken. Among these are the following: Local unions have taken place in many country Presbyterian parishes and Methodist circuits. Some of the outer-suburban areas, with new housing estates, also have come into the scheme which is supported by the Joint Advisory Council for Cooperation. A deed has been provided for joint ownership of property. In recent years the Congregationalists have come into this partnership. Throughout Victoria, at the end of 1966, there were at least 89 joint congregations.

As the work of cooperation in most places is in areas requiring Home Mission enterprise, the responsibility of administering these joint undertakings has been accepted by the Home Mission Departments of the member denominations.

In TASMANIA there are also joint Congregational-Methodist causes. In one new township in Victoria, Anglicans and Churches of Christ are cooperating in a united charge with Presbyterians and Methodists.

The training of the theological students in Victoria has been combined as far as Presbyterians and Methodists are concerned, with the cooperation of the faculties of the Theological Halls at Ormond and Queen's Colleges respectively.

An Australian hymnbook is being prepared with a committee of Presbyterians and Methodists, and with the likelihood of the cooperation of other denominations who are already using observers. There is every prospect of a modern hymnbook being ready when the Uniting Church in Australia comes into being.

The ecumenical movement is gaining strength in Australia. The Australian Council of Churches (as part of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES) is receiving growing support. Methodism, with its history of progress, holds itself ready to serve the wider interests of the Kingdom of God in Australia.

Overseas Missions. In 1875 the Australian Methodist Church began missionary work in New Britain and the adjacent islands. This work commenced before any part of the territory had been occupied by European nations.

The mission in New Britain and New Ireland was the pioneer missionary effort of the Australian Church, the first after it became independent of British Methodism in 1855. Later, while GERMANY governed these islands, German Methodist missionaries joined the staff. After the first World War these islands were a League of Nations mandate under Australian administration. In the second World War this entire region was occupied by the Japanese. After peace came in 1945 there followed the arduous task of rebuilding and rehabilitation. In 1968 the Methodist mission in this area became part of the UNITED CHURCH OF PAPUA, NEW GUINEA AND THE SOLOMON ISLANDS.

GEORGE BROWN'S name is revered by the indigenous people as the founder of the mission. He had been a missionary in SAMOA for fourteen years and was evangelistic and adventurous to a degree. Before 1875 no missionary society had entered into New Britain and New Ireland, where the people were notoriously savage and truculent and the climate inimical to Europeans. The transformation in the lives of the people is a tribute to the devotion of Brown and those who followed him.

The rigors of the climate and prevalent diseases militated against long terms of service in most cases, but W. H. Cox, with thirty years' service, and J. H. Margetts, with twenty-two years, were successively leaders of the mission and were conspicuous exceptions. Nor can any praise be too high for the South Sea Islands teachers (Fijians, Samoans and Tongans) who carried the heavy burdens of the mission and developed a loyal church, soon to be tested by war.

In the second World War the Japanese captured the seat of administration, Rabaul, and then the rest of the area. All mission property was destroyed. Worship continued only in secret. The indigenous people suffered almost incredible cruelty at the hands of the Japanese. Ten Australians, the entire male mission staff, lost their lives (see NEW GUINEA, MISSIONARY MARTYRS). When the Allies recaptured the territory it was necessary to rebuild churches, schools, and mission residences.

It is in this area that Methodist missions have recently embarked upon progressive policies, such as the central theological college at Rsrongo and the youth training center at Malmaluan.

In 1855 complete responsibility for the support and administration of Methodist missions in the South Pacific Islands was taken over by the Methodist Church in Australia from the METHODIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY of Great Britain. At that time the only areas involved were NEW ZEALAND, with its Maori work, the Friendly Islands (TONGA), and FIJI. In the course of time the Australian Church became responsible for work in Samoa, New Guinea, PAPUA, among the Indian immigrants on Fiji, the SOLOMON ISLANDS, among Australian Aborigines in North and West Australia, INDIA, and the New Guinea Highlands. Fraternal workers and their financial support are also provided to churches in INDONESIA, SARAWAK, and India.

In 1926 the Tongan Church became an independent conference within the Methodist Church of Australasia. In 1964 the Samoan and Fijian churches also established independent conferences within the General Conference of Australasia, the Fijian Conference including both Indian and Fijian districts.

Two hundred and fifty missionaries with their wives and families are appointed to work with the churches in these areas, serving in more than twenty different occupations and in some cases serving under indigenous leadership. The Board of Missions of the Australian Church is a member of the Division of Mission of the Australian Council of Churches and also of the EAST ASIA CHRISTIAN CONFERENCE.

AUSTRALIAN EDITORIAL COMMITTEE

AUSTRIA, a federal republic in the southeastern part of central Europe, was formed in 1918 after the collapse of the Hapsburg monarchy, out of the German-speaking provinces of the Alps and the Danube Valley. Austria is bordered on the west by SWITZERLAND and Liechtenstein; on the north by GERMANY; on the east by CZECHOSLOVAKIA and HUNGARY; and on the south by YUGOSLAVIA and ITALY. In 1955 Austria was elected to membership in the United Nations.

In 1968 the population was 7,349,000, with one quarter of it in Vienna, the capital city. Other large cities are Graz, Linz, Salzburg, Innsbruck, and Klagenfurt. Almost ninety-four percent of the population belong to the Roman Catholic church. There are nearly 500,000 Protestants, or six percent of the population, and about ninety-five percent of them are Lutherans. Nearly all the population speaks German.

In 1867 the Roman Catholic Austrian government granted full religious liberty to all officially recognized churches. Any other religious society could meet only for "family devotions." The Wesleyan Methodist Church in Germany saw there an opportunity and sent a minister, Christian Dieterle, to Vienna. He and his successors faced many difficulties. The whole work could only be done in private quarters. And even these small meetings were often dissolved by the police forces. These difficulties remained until 1920.

The conditions became a little better when a lady of the imperial court, the Baroness Amalie von Langenau, joined the church. First, she invited the minister to hold his services in her private house. In 1891 she bought a house in the city and donated it to the church. A meeting room was installed, but a sign had to be placed on the door, "For invited guests only." The outbreak of the first World War made the continuance of the work nearly impossible.

After the war the new government decreed full religious liberty. Because of the falling apart of the Austrian monarchy, the Methodist mission, which had extended to Hungary and Serbia, had to be divided into three parts: Austria, Hungary, and Yugoslavia. In Austria only three churches remained, two in Vienna and one in Graz. But the first years after the war gave new hope. Helped by American and Swedish Methodists, great aid was given to the population. New churches were opened in Krems, St. Pölten, and Linz/Danube. In Türitz an estate was bought which became a vacation center. For more than thirty years Heinrich Bargmann was the efficient leader and superintendent.

After 1925 the work became more difficult again, the Roman Catholic party taking over power. Those who wanted to leave the Roman Catholic church had to undergo a psychiatric examination. The Methodist Church was happy to keep its acquired position. In 1938 Nazi Germany occupied Austria. The Provisional Annual Conference had to merge with the South Germany Annual Conference. By action of the government, the conference center, Auhof, at Türitz was sold.

In 1945 the work had to be started again from the bottom. The country was divided into four occupation zones. First only scarce contacts from one church to the other were possible. Austria was full of refugees from the east. The aid given to them led to the opening of new churches. Out of the youth movement came candidates for the ministry. Never in its history had Austrian Methodism had so many pastors coming from its own ranks.

In 1951 the Methodist Church in Austria got official recognition by the state. After the Hungarian revolt the church did all she could for the incoming refugees. In 1966 the statistical report of the Provisional Annual Conference of the Methodist Church in Austria showed ten active ministers, 894 members, ten circuits, three homes for vacation and conferences, a kindergarten, a home for girls and one for women students, and three houses for elderly people. It seems that the efforts of a hundred years of labor bear fruit. A new generation of pastors is at work. The Methodist voice is heard in ecumenical talks. The relations with the governmental offices are good. The church looks forward to working in the strength given to her by her Lord.

Austria Provisional Annual Conference. Methodist work in Austria, although begun by the WESLEYAN METHODIST CHURCH in England and working via its German work, was all transferred in the summer of 1897 to the Board of Missions of the M. E. CHURCH, U.S.A. For administrative purposes the mission in Austria was attached by that church to the North Germany Annual Conference. After years of hindrances and prohibitions on the part of the Austro-Hungarian government, after that government fell in 1918 and the Republic was established, the M. E. Church mission was granted full recognition as a church, thus putting it on a par with the Roman Catholic, Lutheran, and Reformed bodies. In 1956 the GENERAL CONFERENCE OF THE METHODIST CHURCH passed an enabling act, empowering the Austrian Mission to organize as a Provisional Annual Conference and this was done on Nov. 1, 1956. This status has continued. The conference is part of the GENEVA Area and the Central and Southern Europe Central Conference.

Last reports indicate that there are four Methodist churches in Vienna, two in Linz, one each in Graz, St. Pölten, Ried, and Salzburg.

AVERELL, ADAM (1754-1847), leader of the PRIMITIVE WESLEYAN METHODISTS IN IRELAND, was born and brought up in Co. Tyrone, went to Trinity College, DUBLIN, and after a career as a private tutor was ordained a deacon in the Established (Anglican) Church in 1777. When in Athlone in 1787 he was asked to preach against Methodism, but on examining its position he found he approved. He developed fellowship meetings on the lines of class meetings without any official connection with Methodism, and resigned his curacy in 1791 to leave himself more free for an independent itinerant ministry.

His first actual experience of a Methodist CLASS MEET-

ING was on June 17, 1792, by the invitation of Thomas Shillington, Sr., of Portadown (see SHILLINGTON, THOMAS AVERELL) and more and more in his evangelistic preaching he became associated with the Methodists, until in 1796 he was admitted to full connexion.

Though his original ordination had been only as a deacon, his clerical status gave him leadership in Irish Methodism, and many came to depend on him for the administration of the SACRAMENTS. He was the chief representative of Ireland at the British Conference for most of the period 1798-1814.

He opposed the proposal of the 1816 Irish Conference to allow limited permission for the Methodist preachers to administer the Sacraments themselves, but at first accepted the decision so to do. Then he was approached by the dissentients to become their leader; he renounced all connection with the official Conference, opened a separate place of worship in Dublin in Dec., 1817, and was elected president of the first Primitive Wesleyan Methodist Conference in July, 1818.

He was annually re-elected President for the remainder of his life, and continued his fervent evangelistic preaching throughout the land, until ill-health overtook him. From 1841 onwards he could not even attend the Primitive Wesleyan Conference, and a vice-president had to take his place. His last public acts were to assist in a small way at the opening of a new preaching house in Donegal Place, BELFAST, in 1841, and one in Portadown in 1842. Today a memorial tablet from that former Belfast preaching house is to be found in the present Thomas Street Methodist Church in Portadown.

FREDERICK JEFFERY

AVERY, CHARLES (1784-1858), American layman, and one of the first wealthy benefactors of Methodism. Born in West Chester Co., N. Y., on Dec. 10, 1784, he became a druggist, carrying on his business in NEW YORK, PHILADELPHIA, and PITTSBURGH. In 1812 he married Martha Bryan of Pittsburgh, and after 1814 he made his home in that city. Charles Avery proved a devoted churchman. Converted in his youth, he was a Methodist LOCAL PREACHER most of his life. An active participant in the reform movement of the 1820's he was one of the leaders in the formation of the M. P. CHURCH. An astute businessman, Avery amassed a fortune of more than one and one-half million dollars, chiefly in cotton manufacture and copper mining. He devoted his wealth to religious purposes, aiding churches, retired ministers, colleges, and missions. He was especially concerned for the welfare of the Negro people. He established Avery College for Negroes in Allegheny City, Pa. in 1849, and his will divided over four hundred thousand dollars, half of it for missionary work in Africa and the other half for "the education and elevation of the Colored people of the United States and CANADA." His portrait is in the library of the Historical Society of Western Pennsylvania in Pittsburgh, and his imposing monument is in the Allegheny cemetery in the same city.

SIXTO AVILA

AVILA, SIXTO (1884-1951), the second bishop of the autonomous Methodist Church of Mexico, was born in Charcas, San Luis Potosí. He studied at the Benjamin N. Velasco School in Querétaro, and graduated from the Instituto Metodista Mexicano in Puebla, where he took his ministerial training. He entered the conference in 1914, and was appointed to be pastor in Oaxaca in 1916. He was assistant pastor in Puebla, 1918-20, pastor in Pachuca, 1921-24, executive secretary of EPWORTH LEAGUES and SUNDAY SCHOOLS, 1925-34, presiding elder for the northern district, 1935-38. He was elected bishop (the church had term episcopacy) for the period of 1938-42. He then became district superintendent, Mexico District, 1943-46; pastor at Balderas Church, 1947; district superintendent again, 1948-51, and then ceased to travel due to illness. His death came in 1951.

Sixto Avila was an enthusiastic pastor and loving teacher. He was very meticulous and careful in selecting and classifying materials. He gave much attention to the training of Sunday school teachers and youth leaders. He focused the Epworth Leagues on missionary interest.

During his four years of episcopal service he traveled much, visiting all his churches, both urban and rural, in spite of the difficulty of transportation. He endeavored to make the congregations conscious of the autonomy of the church, and the value of a Mexican bishop.

GUSTAVO A. VELASCO

AXLEY, JAMES (1776-1838), American pioneer preacher, was one of the most colorful and controversial figures ever to serve in the M. E. CHURCH. His early history is not clear. Some sources name NORTH CAROLINA as his birthplace; others give it as Cumberland County, VIRGINIA. He was admitted to the HOLSTON CONFERENCE on trial in 1800 and began regular service as a circuit rider in 1804. One of his closest friends in those early days was PETER CARTWRIGHT.

Most of Axley's years were spent in the Holston Conference, but he also served as presiding elder of the Wabash District in INDIANA (1812-13) and of the Green River District in KENTUCKY (1816-17), as well as in LOUISIANA and North Carolina. He built Louisiana's first church, Axley's Chapel, almost single-handedly, spending money on lumber which his friends gave him for clothes.

His power as a preacher was unquestioned. His sermons were delivered with such quaintness of expression, dramatic manner, and unusual means of submitting his thoughts that his hearers usually remembered what he had said. His severity of manner; inflexible views; his furious tirades against slavery, hypocrisy, liquor, and smoking; and a total indifference to what people thought of him, contributed to his reputation for being eccentric.

He was a rugged individualist, presenting an odd appearance in the pulpit—his six-foot muscular frame clothed in ill-fitting homespun material. He frequently would take off his coat, revealing a long vest or waistcoat with deep pockets and made to button close to the chin. A broad-brimmed, low-crowned hat and coarse, stout shoes were always associated with Axley.

For all his peculiarity of personality, James Axley was acknowledged to be a preacher of spellbinding power and of deep conviction, as well as a man of noble character and devotion to Christ. His knowledge of the Bible provided him with a constant source of sermons based on specific texts. When he located in 1823, Axley ended his long and tireless service to Methodism. Until his death in 1838, he operated a farm near Madisonville, Tenn.

H. D. WATTS

AYLIFF, JOHN (1797-1862), South African Wesleyan Methodist minister, pioneer missionary, Xhosa linguist, writer and founder of HEALDTOWN MISSIONARY INSTITUTION, was born in LONDON, England, on Nov. 7, 1797, and became a Wesleyan LOCAL PREACHER. Emigrating to SOUTH AFRICA as one of the 1820 Settlers, he married Jane Dold in Port Elizabeth, and worked at Beaufort Vale and Somerset East before entering the service of the Wesleyan mission in Grahamstown in 1825. Accepted as an assistant-missionary by the Wesleyan Conference in 1827, he worked first with WILLIAM SHAW in Grahams-town, then at Salem and Somerset East. He was then given his first missionary appointment at Butterworth with Hints's Gcaleka tribe in 1830. Here he came to know the Fingo people who were then in a state of servitude to Hints, and identified himself with their interests. He went with them on their emancipation trek when Governor Sir Benjamin D'Urban received them as British subjects, and located them on the border of the Cape Colony during the frontier war of 1834-35. He always remained a faithful advocate of the Fingo cause.

After terms of Butterworth (1835-36) and Wesleyville (1836-37), he was sent in 1839 to take charge of a new station at Haslope Hills on the northern base of the Winterberg range. This mission was intended as an experiment in social rehabilitation of emancipated slaves and displaced Tswana, Tembu and Fingo people.

In 1845 he moved to pastoral care of white Methodists at Bathurst, and then to Fort Beaufort in 1848, where he resumed his close association with the Fingo people. In 1853 he established a mission among them on the Birklands site, from which grew one of Governor Sir George Grey's industrial institutions in 1855. Thus Ayliff became the founder and builder of Healdtown. Failing health, which was not restored by a visit to England in 1860, caused his retirement to Fauresmith, Orange Free State, where he died in the home of his son on May 17, 1862.

During three successive wars, Ayliff and his family were in exposed and perilous situations. He was closely identified with the white settler community by kinship and sympathy; yet he never lost his original sense of missionary vocation, and bequeathed to his family a fine tradition of public service. Every one of his five sons took a prominent part in public life either in the Cape Colony or in Natal.

His writings include A Vocabulary of the Kaffir Language (1843); translations of Judges, the Johannine Epistles, James and Jude for J. W. APLEYARD'S Xhosa Bible; and Memorials of the British Settlers (Grahamstown, 1845). Ayliff's manuscript narrative of Fingo history formed the basis of J. Whiteside's History of the Abambo (1912). In another manuscript, the Journal of Harry Hastings, he vividly recounted many experiences during the early days of the 1820 Settlers.

AYRES, DAVID (1793-1881), American layman and pioneer of Texas Methodism, was born Aug. 10, 1793, near Morristown, N. J., but the family soon moved to NEW YORK CITY where young Ayres became a member of JOHN STREET CHURCH. In 1832 he made a trip to Texas and moved his family there in 1834. He was active in distributing Bibles for the AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY, both in Spanish and English, started SUNDAY SCHOOLS wherever he lived, conducted worship services and PRAYER MEETINGS, and became the most prominent layman in Texas Methodism during the mid-nineteenth century. He was a close friend of William B. Travis (hero of the Alamo), and his daughter, Eliza, married ROBERT ALEXANDER, one of the three official missionaries sent to Texas in 1837 by the M. E. CHURCH. On his return to Texas from the east in 1837 he served as the traveling companion of MARTIN RUTER, on his way by boat down the Mississippi River to become superintendent of the Texas Mission.

Ayres took "Sunday school books" with him from New York to Texas in 1834 and started a Sunday school in his home at Washington-on-the-Brazos—at least by 1836, and perhaps earlier. An example of his strong support for the church was his contribution of $12,000 toward building St. James Church in GALVESTON. He purchased a printing plant for the Texas Christian Advocate in 1855, and also opened a book depository. He served at one time as a United States Marshall. He was an important contact between Methodist leaders in New York and the struggling church of the Texas Republic and later of the state of Texas. Ayres seems to be the correct spelling of the name, though members of the family sometimes spelled it Ayers.

AYRES, ROBERT (1761-1845), early American preacher, was born near Carlisle, Pa. He was first a schoolteacher and was admitted on trial as a Methodist preacher in 1785, and in the next four years he rode four Methodist circuits. In 1789 he entered the ministry of the Episcopal Church and served churches of that denomination near Brownsville, Pa. for several years. Ayres' importance derives from the fact that he kept an almost daily journal for the four years that he served as a Methodist preacher. His first year was on the Dorchester Circuit in MARYLAND and DELAWARE; his second year was on the original REDSTONE CIRCUIT in western PENNSYLVANIA and western VIRGINIA; his third year was spent on the Bath Circuit, just east of the mountains in Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia; and his last year was on the Berkeley Circuit, adjoining Bath. The journal provides an incontrovertible documentary record of the preaching places and personalities on these early circuits. The original manuscript is the property of the Historical Society of Western Pennsylvania in Pittsburgh, Pa.

AYRES, SAMUEL GARDINER (1865-1942), American librarian, historian, and bibliographic authority, was born on April 25, 1865, in Peru, N. Y. He was the son of David Clough Ayres, clergyman, and Katherine Cochran Moore Ayres. He was educated at TROY CONFERENCE ACADEMY, DREW THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY (B.D., 1893), GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE (D.D., 1931). He married Olive C. Reynolds of Keesville, N. J., April 25, 1889, and they had one daughter. While a student at Drew Seminary, he acted as assistant librarian.

Ayres continued as assistant librarian at Drew from 1888 to 1891, and as librarian from 1891 to 1911. During his tenure the library collection grew from 32,000 volumes to over 117,000. It was acclaimed the largest theological collection in the country and included the DAVID CREAMER collection of hymnology. He also conducted a voluntary course in hymnology at Drew from 1894 to 1899. From 1912 to 1931, he served as librarian at Garrett Biblical Institute, retiring in 1931 with the title Librarian Emeritus and being awarded the D.D. honorary degree in recognition of the contributions he had made to that institution.

Ayres was himself a prolific writer. He also edited eight books, wrote several pamphlets and nearly 900 articles in six encyclopedias. After his retirement in 1931 and until his death in 1942, he served as historian for the Troy Conference, of which he had been a member since 1899. He was a member of the American Library Association and of other learned organizations, including the American Church History Society.

His most important writings include: Jesus Christ, Our Lord: An English Bibliography of Christology, 1889-1900, 1907; Methodist Heroes of Other Days, 1916; editor and indexer of the Expositor's Bible, 1905; co-author, History

After his retirement in 1931, he returned to live within the bounds of Troy Conference, and devoted his time to study of the history of the church in that area, leaving behind a typescript collection of obituaries and local church histories.

BABB HOUSE. The William Babb house in Wilson Co., Tenn., U.S.A., near LEBANON, is historically significant as a haven used by Bishop FRANCIS ASBURY during one of the many illnesses of the last tortured year of his life.

Given to the TENNESSEE CONFERENCE Historical Society in June 1968, and scheduled for restoration as a shrine of early Methodism, the Babb house originally stood adjacent to Bethlehem Meeting House where in October, 1815, Bishop Asbury held his last annual conference. It was here that, although he ordained the deacons and preached several times, he could not preside over the conference or make the appointments, and had to admit that the demands of the episcopacy were beyond his strength. Tradition has it that he took to his bed in an upstairs room of the Babb house while the conference was in session, and was cared for by Mrs. Babb. He could watch the activities of the conference from the bedroom window, since some of the sessions were held outdoors beneath three giant oak trees which still stand.

The old house, built of large, hand-hewn logs and resting on rectangular stones, was given to the Tennessee Conference by the descendants of the Babbs, Mr. and Mrs. Bill Waters and their two daughters. It was moved about two miles from the original site to the present Bethlehem Church yard, the church having been relocated earlier. The house is being restored by the Commission on Archives and History of the Tennessee Conference.

BABCOCK, SIDNEY HENRY (1877-1957), American church historian and leader of OKLAHOMA Methodism, was born Oct. 19, 1877, in Greenwood, Ark. Coming from a long line of Methodist ministers and educators, he decided early in life for the ministry and was educated in Batesville College, Batesville, Ark., VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY, and the University of Chicago. He joined the White River Conference in 1899, and in 1905 transferred to the MISSOURI CONFERENCE. After a three-year pastorate in St. Joseph, Mo., he was transferred to the OKLAHOMA CONFERENCE (MES). In Oklahoma he served important pastorates at Muskogee, Shawnee and Lawton, and was also presiding elder four times. He was a chaplain in the first World War, stationed at General Pershing's headquarters, and was later vice-president of OKLAHOMA CITY UNIVERSITY.

Babcock was a man of strong intellect, wide scholarship and a warm evangelistic heart. He was a member of the GENERAL CONFERENCE of his church seven times, and a member of the UNITING CONFERENCE in 1939. He was one of the founding trustees of SOUTHERN METHODIST UNIVERSITY, and served for many years as a member and also as chairman of the board of trustees of Oklahoma City University. He was a member of the General Board of EDUCATION of the M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH, and of the General BOARD OF PENSIONS of The Methodist Church.

In the field of church history Babcock was at his best, and in his History of Oklahoma Methodism he made an important contribution.

He died Oct. 24, 1957.

GEORGE W. BABER

BABER, GEORGE WILBUR (1898-1970), a bishop of the A. M. E. CHURCH, was the son of Canadian-born parents, William and Emma Effie (Griffin) Baber. He was born in CLEVELAND, OHIO, on Aug. 29, 1898. He was a graduate of Payne Theological Seminary, WILBERFORCE UNIVERSITY, and the Chicago Theological Seminary. He was ordained a deacon in 1922 and elder in 1924. He served as pastor at LaPorte, Ind., 1924-27; Michigan City, Ind., 1927-29; Benton Harbor, Mich., 1928-31; FLINT, MICH., 1931-34; Ebenezer Church, DETROIT, 1934-44. In the latter church the membership increased from 500 to over 6,000 during his pastorate. He enjoyed the reputation of being one of the few men who either built, rebuilt, or bought a new church at every charge he served.

Elected bishop in 1944, he was assigned to the Seventeenth Episcopal District of his church in SOUTH AFRICA. Thereafter, he served areas in the U.S.A. Eventually he moved into the superintendency of the First Area of his church, with the episcopal residence in PHILADELPHIA, and with the cities of BUFFALO, TRENTON, Atlantic City, and adjacent regions in his area.

Bishop Baber married twice. His first wife was Mrs. Alma Maria (Wims) Baber of Michigan, who died in 1955. He then married Mrs. Elvira Mayfield Derrick of LOUISIANA. To his first marriage five children were born.

Bishop Baber was a vigorous and friendly man, and had the reputation of being an evenly balanced leader. Bishop Wright said of him, "He is a 'middle of the roader,' a peace-maker, and an effective preacher. He often said to his preachers, 'Enjoy your ministry.'"

Bishop Baber died in Washington, D. C., on Dec. 26, 1970.

BADLEY, BRENTON HAMLINE (1849-1891), American missionary to INDIA, was born at Monmouth, Ind., on April 27, 1849. His father, Arthur Badley, served in the DES MOINES CONFERENCE. Brenton Badley was educated at SIMPSON COLLEGE and GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE. He married Mary A. Scott on Aug. 8, 1872. He joined the Des Moines Conference in September, 1872, and was transferred to the North India Conference. He and his wife reached India in December, 1872, and were appointed to LUCKNOW.

Badley began at once to study the Hindustani language, and within six months preached his first vernacular sermon in the Lucknow bazaar. The next year he was engaged in rural evangelism. After four years he returned to Lucknow, where he served the remainder of his life. His crowning work was the development of the Centennial Boys' School into the Reid Christian College, now called LUCKNOW CHRISTIAN COLLEGE.

He wrote several books and articles on India missions for American periodicals. He prepared the Indian Missionary Directory in 1876, and made three revisions of it. For five years he edited the Kaukab-i-Hind, and was secretary of the conference for fourteen years. In 1876 he helped found the India Sunday School Union, and was its first secretary. Bishop Thoburn characterized him as: "Blameless in life, gentle in spirit, immovable in purpose."

BADLEY, BRENTON THOBURN (1876-1949), American bishop, was born of missionary parents at Gonda, United Provinces, INDIA, on May 29, 1876. His father was BRENTON HAMLINE BADLEY.

Brenton Thoburn Badley studied at SIMPSON COLLEGE, and graduated from OHIO WESLEYAN and Columbia Universities in the United States, and received honorary degrees from Ohio Wesleyan and Simpson. He went as a Methodist missionary to India in 1900, and was a professor at LUCKNOW for ten years. He then became secretary of the EPWORTH LEAGUE for India and BURMA, and was associate secretary of the Board of Foreign Missions of the M. E. Church, 1917-19. In the latter year he became the executive secretary of the Missionary Centenary in India. In January, 1924, the Central Conference of Southern Asia elected him editor of the Indian Witness, its official weekly periodical, but before assuming that office he went to the GENERAL CONFERENCE in Springfield, Mass., where in May of that year he was elected bishop.

His first assignment was to Bombay Area, where he supervised the Bombay, Gujarat, Hyderabad, and South India Annual Conferences. Midway in his second quadrennium there came a world-wide economic depression.

BRENTON T. BADLEY

This made necessary severe reductions in staff and program, and caused extreme privation for pastors and other church employees in India, as in many other places.

In 1936, he was moved to DELHI and for four years supervised the Delhi, North India, and Indus River Conferences. In 1940 the Indus River Conference was put into the Bombay Area.

In his childhood Bishop Badley mastered three languages. As a missionary he diligently pursued studies in Urdu and Hindi. He was an eloquent and popular speaker in both of those languages. He preached often in interdenominational conventions in many parts of India. He contributed to periodicals in India and America, and wrote twelve books, among the best known of which are A History of the Lucknow Christian College, Visions and Victories, India Making and Forsaking Gods, biographies of Bishop J. R. Chitambar and Mahatma M. K. Gandhi, and a controversial booklet contrasting statements of Jesus with statements made by Mr. Gandhi.

He died at Mirzapore on Feb. 1, 1949.

He added to the land owned by the school, erected two new science blocks, and established the related high school. After furlough Badley became secretary of the Council of Christian Education and proceeded to upgrade Methodist educational institutions all over India. Later he became Delhi

District superintendent. He and Mrs. Badley returned to America upon retirement, and he died at Claremont, Calif. in 1965.

BAGLEY, DANIEL (1818-1905), American minister and western pioneer, was born in Crawford Co., Pa., Sept. 7, 1818. He was married to Susanna Rogers Whipple, in PENNSYLVANIA, Aug. 15, 1840. He immediately moved with his bride to ILLINOIS, where he entered the ministry of the M. P. CHURCH in 1842. For ten years he traveled circuits from near Springfield to the northern boundary of the state. He was an advocate of the anti-slavery cause all his life.

In 1852 Bagley was sent to OREGON by the Board of Missions of his church, where for eight years he established congregations for his denomination. He went to SEATTLE, Wash., in 1860, where he taught school for two years, served as interim pastor of the First M. E. Church in 1863, and in 1864 organized the First M. P. Church of which he remained pastor until 1885. During the remaining years of his life he promoted new churches in the area adjacent to Seattle.

In 1861 Bagley became chairman of the board appointed by the Territorial Legislature to establish the University of Washington. Largely through his efforts and the cooperation of A. A. Denny, a member of the Legislature, the institution became a reality in Seattle.

Bagley exercised a strong influence in the business growth of his adopted city. In 1870, with three associates including his son, he pioneered coal mining in King County, opening the Newcastle Mines, which contributed greatly to industrial expansion of the region.

He died April 26, 1905, in the home of his son, Clarence B. Bagley, and was buried in Mt. Pleasant Cemetery, on Queen Anne Hill, Seattle.

BAHAMAS, THE, constitute a British colony occupying the northwest sector of the Caribbean Sea. There are 3,000 limestone islands, cays and reefs in the archipelago which is forty miles south of FLORIDA. The land area is 4,404 square miles, the islands being scattered throughout 100,000 square miles of ocean. Less than half the islands are inhabited, the population being 170,000. The capital is Nassau, on New Providence Island.

Christopher Columbus on Oct. 12, 1492, made his first landfall on an island of this group which he called San Salvador. It is now known as Watling Island, the Columbus Monument standing at the traditionally accepted spot of his landing. The intricate waterways later made the area a base for pirates. The islands were included in the original Charter of the Carolinas, receiving the first European settlers in 1649. Local government was established in 1729. The Islands are a Mecca for tourists, attracting more than 200,000 annually.

The British Methodist Conference in 1799 appointed WILLIAM TURTON to the Bahamas, one who had previously served on TOBAGO as a lay preacher. He went by way of New York to reach Nassau from ANTIQUA. He arrived in October, 1800, finding a small society that had been organized about 1760-70 by NATHANIEL GILBERT, and later strengthened by JOHN BAXTER and WILLIAM HAMMETT from the U.S.A. By 1802, Turton had increased the membership to over 100. Property for a chapel was provided by one of the members, Anthony Wallace. The work spread to other islands, including Eleuthera where a former Irish preacher, John Rutledge, organized a society of British people. In 1806 the Bahamas District was established, with Turton as its first chairman. A hurricane in 1806 damaged Eleuthera, and the chapel at Nassau was destroyed in July 1813. In 1824 nearly all the chapels on Eleuthera were levelled.

First envisaged by HENRY BLEBY in the 1860's, Queen's College at Nassau finally opened in 1890 and played an important part in Bahamian Methodism. Henry Rivers still further advanced it as a training center. A Women's League was started in 1937, and in 1941 there appeared the first issue of a Methodist women's magazine which later developed into the Methodist Quarterly. In 1951 the first deaconess, Sister Mary Morton, was appointed to the district, and in 1952 the first colored minister. In 1954 the first colored Bahamian candidate for the ministry was accepted. In 1961 Queen's College, Nassau, moved to new buildings and became racially integrated. In 1968 the district became part of the METHODIST CHURCH IN THE CARIBBEAN AND THE AMERICAS. It then had forty places of worship, 3,449 members, and a constituency of 6,282.

BAHAMONDE, WENCESLAO (1915-), is a pastor, educator, and bishop in PERU. His service has included pastorate of First Church, LIMA, and superintendence of the Coastal District. He helped to develop social service work in Pedregal and other squatters' slum areas. He was a member of the "Mission to America" team in 1961.

He was educated at schools in Peru and the University of Buenos Aires, ARGENTINA. He studied at Facultad Evangelica de Teologia in BUENOS AIRES, and in 1938 returned to Peru to serve as a pastor. His postgraduate studies were in the United States at DREW UNIVERSITY and Hartford Seminary Foundation. The Union Theological Seminary of TOKYO, JAPAN, gave him an honorary doctorate in 1958. In addition to serving as a pastor, he has taught religion at several Methodist secondary schools of Peru, and in 1949 he was director of Colegio Andino in Huancayo. He also served as executive secretary of the Peru Conference Board of Education.

Under a Laubach Foundation scholarship he spent a year (1964-65) at SYRACUSE UNIVERSITY in NEW YORK, studying journalism, methods of literacy teaching, and techniques of writing for new literates. Upon his return he was appointed to the Commission on Publications and Literature of the Peru Annual Conference and pastor of La Florida Church in Lima.

When the autonomous Methodist Church of Peru was organized on January 19, 1970, in Lima, Bahamonde was elected its first bishop. He is the first Peruvian to be elected to the Methodist episcopacy. His wife was Geneviva Rios of Lima, and they have three grown sons. He will, of course, continue to reside in Lima, which will be the headquarters of the Peruvian Methodist Church.

BAILEY, MURIEL (1886-), was born in Calcutta, India, Sept. 22, 1886. Her parents were of British and Indian origin. She proudly called herself an Anglo-Indian. In her childhood she attended a Wesleyan Methodist school at Mangalore in South India.

In 1902 she responded to the call for volunteers to work in famine relief camps in Gujarat. Her work was so effective and her spirit so Christian that she was invited to become a colleague of the missionaries in promoting village evangelism. In 1923 she was appointed as a local missionary of the WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY. On furloughs she studied in the Mathura Training School, in the London Bible College, and BOSTON UNIVERSITY. Except for three years in evangelistic work among Moslems in HYDERABAD, she spent the whole of her service through fifty-one years in Gujarat. After official retirement in 1953 she continued six years longer in emergency appointments, until arthritis compelled her to leave Gujarat for the more congenial climate of BANGALORE.

BAILEY, THOMAS L. (1888-1946), Methodist layman and governor of Mississippi, was born at Maben, Miss. Jan. 6, 1888, the son of Anderson B. and Rosa (Powell) Bailey. He won the A.B. degree at MILLSAPS COLLEGE in 1909 and the LL.B. in 1912. He married Nellah Massey, Aug. 23, 1917, and they had a son and a daughter. Admitted to the bar in 1913, he practiced law in Meridian. He served in the Mississippi Legislature, 1916-40, and was speaker, 1924-36. Elected governor in 1943, Bailey was inaugurated Jan. 18, 1944. His administration was characterized by harmony and cooperation. He initiated moves which retired the entire bonded indebtedness of the state. Also, he was given credit for legislation pertaining to teacher retirement, old age pensions, and re-organization of the penitentiary and penal system in the state.

For twenty-four years prior to his election as governor, Bailey taught the Men's Bible Class in his home city of Meridian. He was a delegate to the 1944 GENERAL CONFERENCE where as a member of the committee on the state of the church, he emphasized the need of better support for the rural churches. Impressed, ERNEST FREMONT TITTLE, the committee chairman, asked Bailey to speak to the committee report when it came before the General Conference for adoption, and Bailey delivered a memorable address on the importance and the needs of the rural churches of Methodism.

Bailey had a keen understanding of men and their motives, and he was a master in the field of politics. His untimely death, Nov. 2, 1946, when in the prime of life and while still governor of his state, was felt as a great loss by both the commonwealth and the church.

BAKER, HUBERT W. (1874-19?), American missionary to CUBA, was born in Key West, Fla., where he became a licensed preacher. In childhood he learned Spanish from his schoolmates and this knowledge was to serve him well in later years. His wife was Marian M. Baker.

He was the traveling companion of Bishop W. A. CANDLER, CHARLES FULWOOD, and W. R. LAMBUTH in their pioneering travels in Cuba, and he acted as their interpreter. He was one of the first to receive an official appointment in 1898 to the church at MATANZAS, where he preached his first service in the street. He was also the Secretary of Missions (MES) in Cuba.

Hubert Baker was the youngest of the missionaries, being only twenty-four years of age. Yet for a generation he was at the forefront of the pioneering and evangelistic efforts. For many years a large number of the young ministers and many of the lay members attributed their conversion to his leadership. He held almost every ecclesiastical office in Cuba, his last being that of district superintendent.

The choice of locations for churches and parsonages throughout the island was due to his good judgment. His last appointment was in CAMAGUEY, from which he retired in 1915. His last years were spent in Caracas, Venezuela, where he passed to his reward.

OSMON C. BAKER

BAKER, OSMON CLEANDER (1812-1871), American educator and bishop, was born on July 30, 1812, at Marlow, N. H. He attended WILBRAHAM ACADEMY in MASSACHUSETTS, where he was converted, joined the church, and was licensed to preach. In 1830 he entered WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, but after three years of study he was forced by ill health to give up his studies.

In 1834 he became a teacher in the seminary at Newbury, Vt., and four years later he was made principal. In 1839 a movement was started to organize a Methodist theological institute at Newbury. Osmon Baker and his associates opened theological classes two years later and when, in 1843, a portion of the theological building was dedicated and the classes were transferred, he became the first theological professor of American Methodism, although Hebrew had been taught previously at Wesleyan University.

He resigned the professorship in 1844 to become a pastor in the NEW HAMPSHIRE CONFERENCE and served Rochester, MANCHESTER, and the Dover District. When the Methodist General Biblical Institute was established at CONCORD, N. H., in 1846, he became professor of Homiletics and Methodist Discipline. He was elected to the episcopacy at the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1852.

Bishop Baker was well versed in Methodist law. In 1855 he published his Guidebook in the Administration of the Discipline of the Methodist Episcopal Church, which was revised in 1867, in 1877, and in 1881.

In 1866 he suffered a paralytic stroke but was able to travel to the COLORADO CONFERENCE. He attended a few other conferences and meetings until a fatal stroke occurred and he died Dec. 20, 1871. He was buried in Blossom Hill Cemetery at Concord, N. H.

BAKER UNIVERSITY, Baldwin City, Kan., was founded in 1858, four years after the opening of the KANSAS Territory. It was named for Bishop OSMON C. BAKER, first bishop of the Kansas-Nebraska area. The town bears the name of John Baldwin, one of the founders of BALDWIN-WALLACE COLLEGE, Berea, Ohio, and of CENTENARY COLLEGE in Shreveport, Louisiana. Abraham Lincoln is reported to have contributed $100 to help start Baker College.

Many of Baker's distinguished graduates have made contributions to the life of the church, to education, and to other professions. Bishop WILLIAM A. QUAYLE was graduated in 1885 and was elected president in 1890. His collection of Bibles is preserved in fitting surroundings. Included in the list of distinguished graduates who served Methodism was Bishop SCHUYLER E. GARTH.

In 1930 Missouri Wesleyan College, Cameron, Mo., was merged with Baker University. Degrees granted are B.A., B.S., B.M.E. (Bachelor of Music Education). The governing board has thirty-two members, elected by the Kansas Annual Conference.

Returning to India, he worked for short periods with the Y.M.C.A. in Travancore State, and in a rural extension project of the American Board of Missions in Western India before undertaking work with the Methodist Church in a coeducational school at Puntamba. He was admitted to the Bombay Annual Conference and won a scholarship for study in America. He was graduated with a bachelor's degree from ALBION COLLEGE and an M.A. from the University of Pittsburgh.

BALDWIN, JOSEPHINE L. (1859-1931), American SUNDAY SCHOOL leader, was born of missionary parents in Foochow, CHINA. Her father, STEPHEN L. BALDWIN of the NEWARK CONFERENCE, later served as recording secretary of the Missionary Society of the M. E. CHURCH. Josephine returned to the U.S.A. before she was three and did not go back to China. Her mother had died on the voyage from China, and the Newark Conference officially adopted her as a daughter of the conference. She graduated from the Centenary Collegiate Institute (now CENTENARY COLLEGE FOR WOMEN), Hackettstown, N. J., in 1879 as valedictorian. She taught school for several years, and in 1886 became secretary to the editor of the New York Christian Advocate. She was in charge of elementary Sunday school work in Newark for twenty-four years, giving particular attention to Sunday school music, the Newark Sunday School Union, and the International Sunday School Union. She pioneered in developing graded Sunday school lessons. By her contributions to Sunday school publications and as a member of the faculty of the New Jersey School of Primary Methods at Asbury Park, she became widely known as a promoter of graded lesson materials. She died in September, 1931.

BALDWIN, STEPHEN LIVINGSTONE (1835-1902), pioneer missionary and administrator, was born in Somerville, N. J. With his wife he went to Foochow in 1858, but her health failed three years afterwards and they started back to America. She died at sea, but despite his loss, he was back in Foochow the following year and served there until 1882, when he resigned because of ill health. In 1873 he was superintendent of the mission, succeeding R. S. MACLAY, who had been transferred to Japan. In 1869 he founded The Chinese Recorder, and was editor of it as long as he remained in CHINA.

He was firmly convinced that Methodist polity was appropriate for the mission situation, so he translated relevant sections of the Discipline as early as 1869. He also shared in the translation of the whole Bible into the Foochow dialect.

From 1882 on he was pastor of several churches in the New York area, and in 1889 became recording secretary of missions, a position auxiliary to that of the three corresponding secretaries, McCabe, Peck and Leonard. He showed himself to be one of the leading missionary statesmen of his time.

Ecumenically minded, Baldwin helped prepare for the Ecumenical Missionary Conference in New York in 1900, and published its proceedings in the volume Foreign Missions of the Protestant Churches.

He died of typhoid fever on July 28, 1902.

BALDWIN BROTHERS, donors of $1,500,000 for the founding of Brothers College, a part of DREW UNIVERSITY, in 1928. Two brothers, Arthur J. Baldwin (1868-1939) and Leonard D. Baldwin (1869-1933) were born on a farm near Cortland, N. Y. Both were graduates of Cornell University in 1892. In 1894 they began the practice of law in North Tonawanda, near BUFFALO. In 1897 they moved to NEW YORK CITY where the firm of Griggs, Baldwin, and Baldwin was formed in 1902. The firm came to represent many clients of prominence.

The Baldwin brothers enjoyed a remarkable fraternal harmony throughout their lives. They worked their way through college together, began the practice of law together, lived as two families in a single large house where the domestic arrangements alternated responsibility week by week, experienced financial success together, worshiped in the Calvary Methodist Church in EAST ORANGE, N. J. together, and together made the gift that founded a college in Madison, N. J., bearing the name "Brothers College," to commemorate their happy, harmonious relationship.

Both were active in church and community affairs, Leonard Baldwin serving for twenty-five years as president of the Y.M.C.A. of the Oranges. Their friendship with EZRA SQUIER TIPPLE, later president of Drew, dated from the time of their coming to New York. The name of the college, Brothers College, has recently been changed to The College of Drew University. A son of Arthur J. Baldwin, Donald, is the donor of the Baldwin Gymnasium, and currently president of the board of trustees of Drew University.

BALDWIN-WALLACE College, BEREA, Ohio, was founded in 1845 as Baldwin Institute and chartered as Baldwin University in 1855. The German department became a separate institution in 1864; it was known as German Wallace College. These two merged in 1913 to become Baldwin-Wallace College.

John Baldwin gave fifty acres of land (which included grindstone quarries) and erected the first building. Always an idealist, he started Berea as a village where all, like the early Christians, held everything in common. Although this plan failed, he was able through the manufacture of grindstones to get out of debt and start the college. Berea became one of Ohio's earliest educational centers.

German Wallace College had for its first president WILLIAM NAST, founder of German Methodism. For a number of years, Nast Theological School was one of Methodism's important schools of theology. Later Baldwin-Wallace developed a distinguished college of music. Under Albert Riemenschneider as director, it became one of the great centers for the study and interpretation of Bach's compositions. In 1963, the Cleveland-Marshall Law School was affiliated with Baldwin-Wallace College, restoring a pact that had been in existence between 1897 and 1926. Degrees granted are the B.A., B.S., B.S. in Education, B.M. (Bachelor of Music), and B.M.E. (Bachelor of Music Education). The governing board has forty-three members, fourteen elected by the NORTH-EAST OHIO CONFERENCE and five by the OHIO CONFERENCE.

BALL, HANNAH (1733-1792), British Methodist pioneer in SUNDAY SCHOOL work, was born on March 13, 1733, was converted through JOHN WESLEY, and became a leading member of the Methodist society in High Wycombe, Buckinghamshire. Here she started a Sunday school, one of the first in Methodism, in 1769. She met the children on Sundays and Mondays, desiring, as she said in her journal, "to spend the remaining part of my life in a closer walking with God, and in labours of love to my fellow creatures, . . . instructing a few of the rising generation in the principles of religion, and in every possible way I am capable, ministering to them that shall be heirs of salvation." She became one of John Wesley's favorite correspondents.

She died on Aug. 16, 1792.

BALL, WILLIAM FRANKLIN (1906-), bishop of the A. M. E. Church, was born in Mount Pleasant, S. C., on Aug. 3, 1906. He was educated at EDWARD WATERS COLLEGE and WILBERFORCE UNIVERSITY, receiving the A.B. degree from the former and the B.D. degree from the theological school of the latter institution. He was later honored with the D.D. degree by Edward Waters College and the LL.D. degree by Wilberforce.

He was ordained deacon in 1926 and elder in 1928, serving as pastor in FLORIDA, TENNESSEE, and KENTUCKY, and presiding elder in Florida. In 1956 he was elected to the episcopacy from the pastorate of the Bethel Church in Miami, Fla. He resides in Miami and supervises the work of the Eighth Episcopal District, covering the states of MISSISSIPPI and LOUISIANA.

BALLARD, FRANK (1851-1931), British WESLEYAN METHODIST, was born in Chelsea, LONDON, in Feb., 1851, and entered the Wesleyan ministry in 1873. A double-prizeman in Hebrew and New Testament in the University of London, he later specialized in languages, science, and philosophy. A Christian apologist, he was author of some thirty books, including The Miracles of Unbelief (1900), which was translated into several languages. In 1907 he was appointed Christian Evidence Missioner against rationalism and agnosticism, and toured widely lecturing and debating. The same year saw the publication of his D.D. thesis, The True God; and in 1916 he was FERNLEY LECTURER on Christian Reality in Modern Light. He died on Dec. 21, 1931.

BALLIA is a city and civil district in Uttar Pradesh, INDIA, and a district in the LUCKNOW Annual Conference. An independent Canadian Mission, after some years of work in Ballia, asked Bishop EDWARD ROBINSON to take over the work. In 1905 the Bishop sent as his first appointees to Ballia the Rev. and Mrs. J. Ilahi Baksh. Baksh was a convert from Islam and an able preacher. Mrs. Baksh was from the Jewish community of Western India, and was a graduate in medicine. They worked in and around the town of Rasra. The people were Dhusiya Chamars, a large community in Ballia and adjacent districts in the United Provinces and Bihar.

Ilahi Baksh took a group of these converts across the Ganges River and, working with them, won many of their relatives to Christianity in Dumraon. A revival resulted in the Shahabad District of Bihar, and a stable Christian community emerged. A Dhusiya Chamar who came under the influence of the church in Shahabad District, though he stopped short of baptism, was so stimulated that he entered political life and became a member of the Union Cabinet of the Republic under Prime Minister Nehru.

BALLINGARRY, Roscrea, County Tipperary, Ireland, Gurteen Agricultural College. The establishment of this Agricultural College at Ballingarry, Roscrea, County Tipperary, in the Republic of IRELAND, in 1947, followed an investigation into the drift of population from rural areas. This work was undertaken by the Council on Social Welfare of the Methodist Church in Ireland at the close of World War II. A Methodist layman, William H. Hadden, a businessman of Carlow, took a prominent part in the negotiations which secured the site for the College. A leader in the work of first establishing the institution was the Rev. J. Wesley McKinney, whom the Conference appointed as first Principal. Fully recognized by the Government of the Republic of Ireland, Gurteen is the only Protestant-controlled agricultural college in the country. There are now about fifty-four students in residence (43 men and 11 women).

Principals have been J. Wesley McKinney, 1947-59;

BALLOCH, ENRIQUE CARLOS (1885-), bishop in South America, was born in MONTEVIDEO, of Scottish parents. He grew up on a farm at the geographical center of URUGUAY, and was called to the ministry of the gospel at an early age. As a youth he was so bashful that the first time he stood up to preach he sat down without saying a word, and another had to preach. This timid youth, however, became one of the outstanding preachers in all Latin America. For more than forty years he stood out as a leading thinker on the social implications of the Gospel.

Elected bishop by the Latin America Central Conference when he was not much of a believer in the office (since he had refused time and again to be a candidate, or to accept election), he finally in 1941, accepted after a night of prayer. His episcopal assignment was to the Pacific Area of the Central Conference with residence in SANTIAGO, CHILE. Forthwith, he went on to do a difficult but important work up and down the Pacific Coast of South and Central America. He retired in 1952, broken in health. However, in time he recovered his health and as a retired bishop continues to serve in many ways.

BALTIC STATES. After the Russian Revolution in 1917-18, the three Baltic States, Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania, got their freedom. It cost them great hardships—renewed in a still more dreadful way during the second World War, when wave after wave of foreign armies occupied and devastated these lands. Thousands of people were killed, others deported to the interior of RUSSIA; thousands tried to escape, fleeing from their homesteads, seeking refuge in FINLAND, SWEDEN, GERMANY, and America.

During the decade from 1907 to 1917 Methodism had settled in all three countries under the auspices of the Finland and St. Petersburg Mission Conference and after 1911, the Russia Mission. With the political separation a separate Baltic Mission was established which in 1924 became the Baltic and Slavic Mission Conference, still listed in the Northern Europe Central Conference. During and after the second World War, Methodist bishops have had no opportunity to exercise any official supervision in these lands.

The Baltic States have an old history. Many of the towns and cities date back to the thirteenth century, and they have also had a high culture, not the least apparent during the years of national liberty and independence. In 1920 Estonia embraced 60,000 square kilometers (17,413 square miles) with 1,750,000 inhabitants; Latvia 65,000 square kilometers (24,695 square miles) with 2,500,000 inhabitants; and Lithuania, 95,000 square kilometers (26,173 square miles) with 4,650,000 inhabitants. Latest figures (1965) for the three republics, incorporated in USSR—the Soviet Union—are respectively Estonia, 1,250,000 inhabitants; Latvia, 2,200,000; and Lithuania, 2,800,000. The dominant church was the Lutheran in Estonia and Latvia, the Roman Catholic in Lithuania.

The first Methodist churches were founded in Lithuania near the German border, in 1904 and 1905, George R. Durdis worked in Kaunas (Kovno), Virballis, Wirballen, and later also in Riga, the old important city and capital of Latvia. Most of the churches in Estonia were founded in 1910-13—Tallinn (Reval), Tartu (Dorpat) and Kuresaare (Arensburg) on Saaremaa (Oesel) Island in 1910. The last became a stronghold for Methodism in Estonia, as did Riga in Latvia with five churches, including a headquarters.

The birth date of Latvian Methodism is April 17, 1921. A Moravian minister then joined the Methodist Church with his little congregation of 120 members in Liepaja (Libau). After the return of GEORGE A. SIMONS to the United States, the leader as superintendent was Hans Soete, followed in 1931 by Fricis Timbers. In 1934 the Methodist Church was recognized by the Latvian government, and in 1938 the Constitution of the Methodist Church in Latvia was approved, and the first National Church Board was elected. At the time of the All-European Methodist Conference in COPENHAGEN in August, 1939, Methodism in Latvia had sixteen preachers, twenty-seven local preachers, thirty congregations, and a total membership of three thousand. Then came the war. The rest is silence.

Methodists were forced to unite with the Lutherans, as they were with the Baptists in the Soviet Republic.

In July, 1939, Bishop RAYMOND J. WADE held the annual conference in Tallinn, and this proved to be the last before the great overthrowing in the following years. The appointment list divided the conference into three districts: Estonia with Martin Prikask as superintendent and fifteen charges; Latvia, Fricis Timbers, superintendent, nineteen charges; and Lithuania, Sergei Mosienko, superintendent with seven charges.

Martin Prikask was sent to prison and was probably drowned during his transportation in a ship disaster in 1942. But the work of Methodism in Estonia is still carried on with great courage despite all difficulties and dangers.

In July, 1962, Bishop Wade invited Baltic and Slavic refugee pastors of the Methodist Church living in the United States to a reunion in Bay View, Mich. Thirteen pastors were present with their families. Several could not come because of sickness, funerals, distance, etc.

Estonian Methodism is recognized by the Soviet government as a self-supporting national church (World Outlook, Jan., 1966). During the last years Bishop ODD HAGEN of STOCKHOLM was permitted to visit Estonia twice, in 1961 and in Sept., 1965. He was accompanied by Sergei Dubrovin of HELSINKI, Finland, who speaks fluently several languages, including Russian.

The Methodist community there during the last years has more than doubled its constituency, from about two thousand to over four thousand. In Tallinn, the capital, one congregation has grown from two hundred members in 1940 to a total of eleven hundred.

Latest reports from Estonia indicate that the Methodist Church of Estonia received 133 new members in 1965, including 59 in the Estonian capital of Tallinn, according to reports reaching Arne-Jacob Kristoffersen of Sweden, Methodist news correspondent for Scandinavia. The reports also tell of offerings totaling 23,300 rubles, which is described as a "good offering by the Methodists of Estonia."

Methodists are not permitted to have church schools or youth work, but all Methodist ministers are permitted to preach. There is a shortage of Bibles and hymnals and a shortage of men, but Bishop Hagen had presented to him six young men who had decided for the ministry.

Private letters tell of crowds of people eagerly listening to the Word of God, and of new members coming in. There is also a better understanding and closer cooperation between religious people of different denominations.

The present superintendent is Aleksander Kuum, and work is carried on in at least seven places.

BALTIMORE, MARYLAND, U.S.A. (population 939,024), was founded in 1729, and gained importance as a port during the Revolutionary War, 1776-83. Methodism was first preached there in 1771 by JOHN KING, and on June 22, 1772 JOSEPH PILMORE formed two societies. That in town built LOVELY LANE Meeting House in 1774, while Strawberry Alley Meeting House was completed at Fells Point in 1776. FRANCIS ASBURY was the preacher under whom was converted a wealthy Baltimorean, HENRY DORSEY GOUGH, who with William Moore, and most other Maryland preachers, refused in 1778 to take the oath of fidelity and was indicted. Despite wartime difficulties, membership grew to one thousand on Baltimore Circuit by 1781. Soon after housing the CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE in 1784, Lovely Lane Meeting House was outgrown and replaced by Light Street Church in 1786. Other early forerunners of more than 125 congregations organized by the year 1920 included Green Street (Exeter), 1792; Sharp Street, 1792; Wilk Street, 1801 and Eutaw Street, 1808. Asbury made the city somewhat his headquarters and outfitting station, although in 1810 he complained, "If we want plenty of good eating and new suits of clothes, let us come to Baltimore, but we want souls." (Journal II, 632.) In this desire some of the GENERAL CONFERENCES, as that of 1800, gratified him with great revivals. Despite the MUTUAL RIGHTS controversy and resultant split forming the M. P. CHURCH in 1830, by 1840 one-tenth the population were Methodist church members and many thousands, in addition, attended Sunday schools which had been begun in 1816. Soon thereafter Catholic and Lutheran immigration and the Civil War were to weaken the hold of Methodism.

Methodist fervor also established schools—second COKESBURY COLLEGE, 1796; Male Free School and Colvin Institute, 1801; ASBURY COLLEGE, 1816; Baltimore Female College, 1851; Woman's College (now GOUCHER), 1885; besides in 1867 assisting the FREEDMEN'S AID SOCIETY in opening Centenary Biblical Institute (later called MORGAN COLLEGE). Numbers of its local preachers cured bodies as well as souls and assisted in establishing the world's first dental school and Washington Medical College. Among the most eminent physician-preachers were two father-son teams, GEORGE ROBERTS and GEORGE C. M. ROBERTS, THOMAS E. BOND, Sr. and Jr., and SAMUEL K. JENNINGS. Subsequently, LUTHER B. WILSON, a young Methodist physician, was called to the ministry and in 1904 elected to the episcopacy.

ISAAC P. COOK, a bookseller, who was a local preacher for fifty-one years, was a founder and first president of the National Local Preachers Association of the M. E. Church. Also founded in Baltimore were the Asbury Historical Society, 1840, and the American Methodist Historical Society, 1856. Under the lead of George C. M. Roberts, the latter Society gathered valuable materials now housed in Lovely Lane Museum.

Passage of the "New Chapter" on slaveholding by the 1860 General Conference excited much opposition in Baltimore Methodism, although few of the white members were slaveholders and several thousand respected members were free Negroes. At a mass meeting held in December, 1860, the General Conference was solicited to hold a special session and repeal the New Chapter, and secession was delayed to await an answer. Following the outbreak of the Civil War in April, 1861, most Baltimore churches remained in the conference, but during the hostilities Frederick Avenue and Chatsworth became independent, and several southern sympathizing congregations were organized. In 1866 these were officially received into the M. E. Church, South together with a portion of the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church, thus leading to the formation of a separate Baltimore Conference of the M. E. Church, South.

Baltimore never regained its former commercial position after the war, nor Methodism its pre-eminence. However, such churches as First, Grace, Mt. Vernon Place and Sharp Street; Trinity and Central M. E. South; and St. John's M. P. (after it gave up independence in 1905) were influential in both conference and denomination. Churches of these branches of Methodism tripled their membership 1870-1930. In the latter year it totaled 44,000 in almost 125 congregations. By 1954 it reached a peak of 54,285 in 94 congregations. Baltimore then ranked third among U. S. A. cities in Methodist church membership, topped only by New York and Chicago.

While no important board of the M. E. Church, South was located in Baltimore, the city housed an M. P. Publishing House and their Board of Missions. Baltimore is unique in having been the site of the General Conferences of all three churches—twenty-two out of 103 held through 1970. Among the most important were the founding Christmas Conference in 1784; that of 1808 when the RESTRICTIVE RULES and delegated conference were adopted; also the founding M. P. Conferences of 1828 and 1830, their Uniting Conference of 1877; and the 1908 M. E. Conference where the SOCIAL CREED—the first of any American church—was adopted. Special celebrations held in Baltimore included the 1884 CENTENNIAL, 1934 SESQUICENTENNIAL, and 1966 BICENTENNIAL OF AMERICAN METHODISM.

Notable to both Methodists and E. U. B.'s is old OTTERBEIN CHURCH, the oldest occupied church in the city, built by PHILIP WILLIAM OTTERBEIN in 1785. There in 1813 Bishop Asbury preached the funeral of his friend, Otterbein, who with MARTIN BOEHM had founded the UNITED BRETHREN.

Underway at present is an extensive Inner Harbor redevelopment which will make this last mentioned church a focal point. Other Methodist landmarks include Mt. Olivet Cemetery, 2930 Frederick Avenue, begun in 1849 by Lovely Lane Church, with graves of Bishops Asbury, EMORY, WAUGH and GEORGE, also of the pioneers ROBERT STRAWBRIDGE and JESSE LEE. In 2066 a Bicentennial TIME CAPSULE in the Bishops' Lot is to be disinterred.

Bethel A.M.E. Church. About 1780 racial discrimination by the members of several white M. E. churches in Baltimore caused the Negro membership of these churches to withdraw. In 1782 an independent PRAYER MEETING began, culminating in a Colored Methodist Society. In 1801 Daniel Coker, Negro protégé of ROBERT STRAWBRIDGE, became the leader of the group and by 1812 he had organized a society. This "African Methodist Bethel Society of the City of Baltimore," after becoming an independent body, voted to affiliate with the A.M.E. Church which it later helped to form in 1816. In 1842 Bethel built a $16,000 stone edifice which was finally dedicated in 1848. Bethel has remained one of the leading appointments in the denomination through the years. Fourteen of its pastors have been elected to the episcopacy: EDWARD WATERS, DANIEL A. PAYNE, ALEXANDER W. WAYMAN, JABEZ P. CAMPBELL, JAMES A. SHORTER, JOHN M. BROWN, BENJAMIN T. TANNER, JAMES A. HANDY, CORNELIUS T. SHAFFER, LEVI J. COPPIN, JOHN HURST, WILLIAM S. BROOKS, ABRAHAM L. GAINES, and HARRISON J. BRYANT.

Board of Child Care, is a child caring agency offering group care services to children from broken homes in Baltimore County. It operates a foster care program, and provides counseling to unwed parents and a complete adoption service. An agency of the BALTIMORE ANNUAL CONFERENCE OF THE UNITED METHODIST CHURCH, the Board also serves the PENINSULA ANNUAL CONFERENCE.

It originated in 1953 with the administrative merger of three children's institutions. THOMAS KELSO began the Kelso Home for Girls in 1873, in Baltimore City. A Methodist, he early obtained contributions from local Methodist churches and eventually the Conference adopted this home.

George Swartzell began the Swartzell Methodist Home for Children in WASHINGTON, D. C., in 1912. He received help from the WOMAN'S HOME MISSIONARY SOCIETY of the M. E. Church. Later the WOMAN'S SOCIETY OF CHRISTIAN SERVICE of The Methodist Church assumed this responsibility but discontinued operations in 1960, made a contribution to the building fund, and released the eligible children to the Board of Child Care.

The Strawbridge Home for Boys began in 1923 with the gift of a farm by Mr. George W. and Mrs. Ella E. Albaugh to the M. E. Church. The Kelso Home, the Swartzell Home for Children, and the Strawbridge Home for Boys united administratively in 1953.

The eight modern buildings of the Board of Child Care are located in Baltimore County northwest of Baltimore City. Each of five children's cottages houses twelve children, with an apartment for a houseparent couple. A multi-purpose building provides indoor recreation for the children and a meeting place for church groups.

The Board of Child Care is recognized as an outstanding child caring agency in its concept of program and its modern facilities.

Grace Church is an old church of Baltimore now housed in a commodious edifice of Georgian architecture on the northern end of the city's famed Charles Street. The original Grace Church was organized in the western section of the city in 1868, and soon became one of its leading congregations. Among the outstanding preachers who have served Grace have been Richard Harcourt, Don Colt, GEORGE R. GROSE (later elected bishop) and M. H. Lichtler. In 1928, because of population mobility, Grace Church merged with the Roland Park congregation (organized in 1896) and moved to share the latter's building. In 1946 the North Baltimore Church, which before church union in 1939 had been M. P. (organized in 1893), merged also with Grace.

The present building on Charles Street was dedicated in December, 1951, during the pastorate of Dr. William A. Keese (1941-). In 1961 additional space was added to provide more educational facilities. The complete plant, including the large and stately parsonage, is valued at one and one-quarter million dollars. An unusual choir system, under a full-time director, with six choirs involves about 180 people.

A distinctive feature of Grace Church is what is called its Outreach Program. When the debt was liquidated in 1964, the OFFICIAL BOARD voted to maintain its budget at the same level and to use the funds no longer required for debt reduction for other helpful work. This program presently augments the salary of a professor at the WESLEY THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, has given generously toward the new dormitory at that institution, assists annually at two inner city projects to the extent of over $12,000, and to date has contributed $10,000 to establish a new congregation in one of the suburbs. Grace supports two missionaries in RHODESIA and helps another in JAPAN. The present membership is 2,200.

Hiss Church had its beginning sometime during the year of 1839, growing out of a religious service that was held in the home of William Hiss, a physician who lived in this area. The first house of worship erected by the Hiss congregation was begun in 1842 and completed in March, 1843. It was a little stone building known as "Hysses Chapel." It is still standing and is used for religious services and special meetings. It is believed that David Steele, known as the "weeping prophet," presided at the dedicatory service. Hiss was one of eighteen churches at this time on what was called the Great Falls Circuit, extending from Baltimore City to the PENNSYLVANIA line.

The church continued to make progress over the years and in 1893 a quarterly conference was held and the members of Hiss decided to build a new church. The cornerstone was laid Sept. 12, 1894, and the building was dedicated Feb. 10, 1895. The minister at that time was Joseph P. Wilson. Hiss Church continued to make rapid strides. In 1937 it was decided that a social hall should be erected and the cornerstone for this building was laid April 18, 1937 and dedicated on Oct. 30, 1937. The minister at this time was John R. Esaias.

In 1942 the church membership was reported at 640 and in 1949 it was decided that plans should be made for a new sanctuary. The cornerstone was laid on Sept. 20, 1953 and on Sept. 5, 1954 the members of Hiss moved into the new sanctuary. The consecration service was held on Sunday afternoon, Oct. 3, 1954 with Bishop C. BROMLEY OXNAM preaching and presiding. The minister at this time was Clarence L. Fossett.

The community of Parkville continued to make rapid growth and this, of course, was reflected in the life and membership of Hiss Methodist Church. In November, 1955 a third building committee was formed. This resulted in the erection of the educational building. The cornerstone was laid in March, 1960 and was open for use in September of 1960. At this time membership of the church was 2,145 and the minister was William Wesley Dodge. The 1970 membership is 1,869, and property is valued at $814,500.

Mt. Olivet Cemetery is the burial ground for more than 150 Methodist ministers and bishops, including Bishop FRANCIS ASBURY. In 1966 the Maryland Historical Society recognized the historical significance of the cemetery by erecting the following marker which reads:

Mt. Olivet Cemetery, the burial place of Methodist pioneers including Bishops Francis Asbury, Enoch George, John Emory and Beverly Waugh; Also Robert Strawbridge, first preacher in Maryland. And Jesse Lee, founder in New England. Site of 1966 Methodist Bicentennial Time Capsule to be opened in 2066.

The first cemetery for Methodists in Baltimore, called God's Acre, was established in 1791. As the Methodist Church grew rapidly, a larger burial ground became a necessity. Therefore, in 1845 the General Assembly of the State of MARYLAND authorized the trustees of the M. E. CHURCH, now known as Lovely Lane Methodist Church, to incorporate a tract of land for the purpose of sepulture under the name of Mt. Olivet Cemetery. The main entrance of the approximately fifty-acre cemetery is located at 2930 Frederick Avenue. The remains of those buried in the old burial ground at Lombard and Poca Streets were removed to the new Mt. Olivet.

In 1850 a resolution was presented to the BALTIMORE ANNUAL CONFERENCE to create a preachers' lot in the cemetery for interment of the bishops and other itinerant ministers of the M. E. Church. By 1852 such stalwart Methodists as ISAAC P. COOK, GEORGE C. M. ROBERTS, and Bishop BEVERLY WAUGH began procedures to have Bishops ASBURY and EMORY moved from the vault of Eutaw Street Church, and Bishop ENOCH GEORGE from Staunton, Va., to Mt. Olivet. With concurrence of the Lovely Lane Trustees, the Baltimore Annual Conference and the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1852, Bishops ASBURY, Emory, and George were reinterred and a dedication of the Bishops' Monument was held on June 16, 1854.

The Bishops' Monument is a monolith, made of Italian marble and measures 18 feet. High upon the shaft is an escutcheon with the inscription "Soli Deo Gloria" which is the closing inscription on the tablet in LONDON to the memory of JOHN WESLEY.

A hundred years of American Methodism are revealed through the epitaphs written on the monuments in the Bishops' Lot.

Bishop Asbury died in the home of George Arnold at 4 o'clock Sunday, March 31, 1816 at Spotsylvania, Va. He was first laid to rest in the Arnold's family cemetery. Subsequently the General Conference meeting in Baltimore in 1816 approved a petition to have Asbury's body moved to Baltimore. On May 10, 1816, Asbury was re-interred in the vault of Eutaw Street Church and remained there until his remains were removed to the Mt. Olivet Cemetery, June 16, 1854. On the north side of the base of the Bishops' Monument is an inscription to Bishop Asbury as follows:

Rev. FRANCIS ASBURY, born in England, Aug. 20, 1745; entered the ministry at the age of 17; came a missionary to America, 1774; ordained Bishop in Baltimore, Dec. 27, 1784; annually visited the conferences in the United States; with much zeal continued to preach the word for more than half a century, and ended his labors with his life, near Fredericksburg, Va., in the full triumph of faith, March 31, 1816.

An inscription to Enoch George reads:

Rev. ENOCH GEORGE, born in Lancaster County, Va., in 1747 or 1748, admitted into the itinerant connection 1790, and fulfilled his ministry to the end. At the General Conference held in Baltimore, May, 1816, was elected and ordained Bishop; died at Staunton, Va., August 23, 1828, in the peace and triumph of gospel faith, and with his latest breath giving 'Glory to God.' His remains were removed to this spot June 16, 1854. A man of deep piety, of great simplicity of manners; a very pathetic, powerful and successful preacher, greatly beloved in life, and extensively lamented in death. 'A faithful man and feared God above many.'

On the south side of the monument appear those to Bishops Emory and Waugh:

Rev. JOHN EMORY, D.D., born April 12, 1789, Eastern Shore of Maryland; thrown from his carriage on the morning of Dec. 16, 1835, and died on the evening of the same day. Aged 46 years, 8 months and 4 days. He was converted to God in the 17th year of his age, being at the time a student of law; entered the itinerant ministry, 1810; in 1820 went as a representative to The Wesleyan Methodist Conference in Great Britain; in 1824 was elected assistant editor of the Methodist Book Concern in New York; editor in 1828; elected and ordained Bishop in 1832. Distinguished alike for his great talents, his piety and usefulness. He was thus prematurely cut down in the mysterious dispensation of an all-wise Providence.

Rev. BEVERLY WAUGH, D.D., born in Fairfax County, Virginia, October 25, 1789; entered the ministry in the Baltimore Conference 1809; Book Agent 1828-1836; chosen and set apart Bishop 1836; Senior Superintendent 1852-1858; died February 9, 1858. He was true to every trust committed to him by the church; in her pulpits, earnest and effective; as her book agent, accurate and laborious; as her chief minister, dignified, wise, and without partiality.

Of the four bishops, Bishop Waugh is the only one who was not buried in another location before being interred in Mt. Olivet.

The Robert Strawbridge Monument was erected to commemorate the first local preacher in Maryland in the 1860's. He was first buried in Joseph Wheeler's orchard in Towson in 1781. The body of Jesse Lee, "the prophet of Methodism to New England," rests beneath a flat-topped vault covered with a marble slab.

Other prominent Methodists interred here are Reuben Ellis, one of the elders ordained at the Christmas Conference of 1784; WILSON LEE from Delaware who was one of the first Methodist pioneers who traveled to the west; Leonard Cassell, a close friend of Strawbridge who died with yellow fever after six years. There are Henry B. Furlong, John A. Collins and Lyttleton F. Morgan, for whom MORGAN STATE COLLEGE was named.

Among those buried in other sections of Mt. Olivet are: William Prettyman, who had two sons and a grandson in the ministry of the M. E. Church, South; Dabney Ball; Samuel Regester; Isaac W. Canter; and GEORGE C. M. ROBERTS, the founder of the Home for the Aged.

Of the 5,000 lots still available in 1968, one has been reserved by E. STANLEY JONES, one of Methodism's outstanding world missionaries. His body is to be interred in the Bishops' Lot.

On April 24, 1966, delegates of American Methodism to the Bicentennial meeting in Baltimore met in the cemetery, at which time a capsule was placed in the Bishops' Lot. The plaque reads:

Beneath this marker is buried A TIME CAPSULE, placed here during the Bicentennial Celebration of American Methodism. This capsule, containing items of historic significance, is to be raised in the year 2066. Methodism 'Forever Beginning' April 25, 1966.

MT. VERNON PLACE CHURCH, BALTIMORE

Mt. Vernon Place Church is a downtown congregation whose elegant Gothic edifice since 1872 has graced Baltimore's cultural center at the Washington Monument. A daughter of LOVELY LANE, its introduction of pew rents at the original Charles and Fayette Streets location in 1843, and of organ music in 1850 both aroused controversy. Pulpit greats who have served as pastors include THOMAS M. EDDY, who led in building the present serpentine stone structure on the spot where Francis Scott Key's mansion had stood; Thomas B. Sargent, 1848-49; LYNN HAROLD HOUGH, 1912-14; OSCAR T. OLSON, 1921-32; ALBERT E. DAY, 1932-37 and 1948-57; and HAROLD A. BOSLEY, 1937-48. Since 1925 a varied ministry, aided by the Asbury Foundation and lately ecumenical, has focused on young adults, the aged, students, and healing. Of interest are Asbury house, an adjoining mansion acquired in 1962, Bosley Chapel in 1947, the Asbury pulpit and the foyer-mounted cover of Bishop Asbury's burial vault at Eutaw Street.

The church had a membership of 646 in 1970, and property valued at $1,800,000.

Northwood-Appold Church is an outgrowth of four downtown Methodist churches—Monument Street, founded in 1833; Mt. Lebanon, founded in 1829; Columbia Avenue, founded in 1840; Appold, founded in 1871. The first services were held in the Northwood area of Baltimore in 1941 with three ministers serving for short periods of time—Charles W. Baer, William H. Best, and J. Franklin Bryan. They were followed by Robert H. Parker, who served for the next fourteen years. During this period growth was rapid. Dr. Parker was followed by Edward H. Porter, Clarence L. Fossett, and Owen E. Osborne.

Northwood-Appold is housed in two buildings and has two parsonages. The property is valued at more than a million dollars. It is rated as a progressive church and was one of the first congregations in the city to establish a day nursery school. Its "Festival of Religion and the Arts," held biennially, attracts wide attention; other activities serving people of all ages keep the doors open seven days each week. Northwood area has people of many races and Northwood-Appold reports members from all five races on its rolls. Membership in 1970 was reported as 2,091.

Old Otterbein Church (See OTTERBEIN CHURCH, "The Old Otterbein," Baltimore, Maryland.)

St. John's Church is the historic mother church of Methodist Protestantism, and was host to the notable anniversary sessions of the GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M. P. CHURCH. The church was organized Dec. 23, 1827, by twenty-two Reformers lately expelled from the M. E. CHURCH. Aided by John Clark (not to be confused with John Clark, the western missionary) they soon purchased St. John's Protestant Episcopal Church in Liberty Street. Here they were hosts to the 1828 and 1830 founding conventions of the M. P. Church and to the 1829 MARYLAND CONFERENCE organizing sessions.

In 1843, however, desiring to retain Augustus Webster beyond his pastoral limit, they withdrew from the M. P. Church and were variously known as St. John's Independent Methodist, and as Clark Memorial until 1908 when they reentered the Maryland Conference. The Board of Beneficence endowed in 1864 with a $500,000 legacy from John Clark, aided various churches as a self-perpetuating corporation. Relocated to 27th and St. Paul Streets in 1900, the church was the host to the centennial M. P. General Conference in 1928. An extensive neighborhood ministry is now carried on.

Sharp Street Church originated in Baltimore City during the slave era in the closing days of the eighteenth century.

Maryland had about 19,500 free Negroes in 1800 and the majority of them lived in Baltimore City. Negroes were included in the Methodist Church almost from the beginning and worshiped along with white members. But inevitably, free Negroes desired their own churches and Maryland granted such privilege. Sharp Street was among those churches in MARYLAND for which the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE licensed Negro local preachers and pastors of Negro churches. During the slavery period, the church generated hope in both the slave and the free Negro.

Sharp Street Church was established in 1802 on Sharp Street between Lombard and Pratt Streets and the deed to the property was recorded on May 5, 1802. This humble church served the colored community, both free and slave. It was a meeting place to discuss and plan strategy, raise money to purchase the freedom of slaves, to serve as a school where deprived and exploited people could learn to read and write, to plan the Liberian Colonization, to discuss the effectiveness of slavery abolitionist movement and to hear their advocates speak.

In addition to the routine functions of the church, there was an intense urge for learning to read the Bible and to write. Schools for free colored people were forbidden in nearly all slave states. However, such schools were never abolished in Maryland.

A school was sponsored by the Sharp Street Church in 1853. The students became the nucleus for the first colored public school in Baltimore following the abolition of slavery.

In 1848 Sharp Street along with Asbury Station sent a memorial to the General Conference of the M. E. Church requesting the formation of an annual conference for Negroes. This was referred to the Committee on Memorials. In 1856 this request was renewed but it was not until Oct. 27, 1864 that the WASHINGTON CONFERENCE was organized in Sharp Street Church with Bishop ISAIAH SCOTT presiding.

Other interests in the City of Baltimore included the organizing of a school for the training of Negro ministers which ultimately became the Centenary Biblical Institute. This school still later became MORGAN COLLEGE, under the direction of the Washington Conference. This church also purchased a plot of ground in 1872 for a burial ground which later was known as Mt. Auburn Cemetery. In 1876 Sharp Street established a mission church on the edge of the cemetery. This is now one of our thriving suburban churches.

In 1870 the church established a home for aged men and women, which is now operated under the name of N. M. CARROLL Home and is directed by the Board of HEALTH AND WELFARE MINISTRIES (UMC).

In 1898, following the large migration of Negroes from south Baltimore to northwest Baltimore, the church, under the leadership of D. W. Hayes, purchased a lot on the corner of Dolphin and Etting Streets and built a magnificent edifice of granite lined on the inside with brick. The sanctuary is arranged in amphitheatre style.

In 1921 a Community House was built, containing a chapel, dormitories, and recreational facilities. Since that time a seven-day weekly program serves the inner city community.

N. B. CARRINGTON

BALTIMORE CONFERENCE (ME), formed territorially in 1796, was one of the original conferences. Beginning in 1776, annual conferences were held in or near Baltimore every year except 1779.

From 1796 to 1804 the Baltimore Conference included the portions of PENNSYLVANIA, MARYLAND, and VIRGINIA west of the Susquehanna River and Chesapeake Bay as far south as the Rappahannock River, as well as most of present WEST VIRGINIA. In 1808 the upper Susquehanna region became a part of the PHILADELPHIA CONFERENCE. Western Pennsylvania went to the OHIO and PITTSBURGH CONFERENCES after 1824. The circuits between the Potomac and Rappahannock Rivers were lost to the VIRGINIA CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church, South after 1846.

The Baltimore Conference was divided in 1857 to form the East Baltimore Conference which included northern Maryland and some Pennsylvania territory. In 1864 the Negro ministers and churches of the Baltimore Conference went into the newly created WASHINGTON CONFERENCE. In 1868 the GENERAL CONFERENCE abolished the East Baltimore Conference, designating its Pennsylvania territory as the CENTRAL PENNSYLVANIA CONFERENCE, and returning northern Maryland to the Baltimore Conference.

The boundaries of the Baltimore Conference of THE METHODIST CHURCH in 1939 included the District of Columbia, Maryland west of Chesapeake Bay (except Garrett County), three counties in West Virginia, and, until 1960, a few churches in Pennsylvania.

Since Baltimore was the seat of the founding CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE and of every General Conference from 1792 through 1824, except 1812, and since the membership of the Baltimore Conference was relatively large, it was preponderantly influential in American Methodism for several decades. One effective argument for the adoption of the delegated General Conference in 1808 was that the practice of seating as delegates all preachers in attendance who had traveled four years, gave Baltimore, as one of the big centrally located conferences, a disproportionately large representation and influence in the quadrennial General Conference.

Prior to the organization of the East Baltimore Conference in 1857, the Baltimore Conference had 363 traveling and 371 local preachers, 781 churches, and 73,000 members, making it the largest of the forty-six conferences in the M. E. Church at the time. However, the Civil War and its aftermath caused tremendous losses in the conference. In 1869, after it had received northern Maryland back from the East Baltimore Conference, the Baltimore Conference (ME) still had only 185 traveling preachers, 335 churches, and 25,382 members. Thirty-five years later there were 243 traveling preachers, 411 churches, and 50,502 members. It was not until 1926 that the conference again equaled or surpassed the 73,000 membership figure of 1857. Unification in 1939 lifted the membership to 139,348.

In 1965 when the Washington Conference was merged with the appropriate conferences of the Northeastern Jurisdiction, a little more than two-thirds of its membership came into the Baltimore Conference, bringing the latter's strength to 639 ministers, 719 churches, and 241,000 members.

During its history the Baltimore Conference has produced many leaders in the church. STEPHEN C. ROSZEL, NELSON REED, JOSHUA WELLS, DANIEL HITT, and EZEKIEL COOPER stood out in the early years. ROBERT R. ROBERTS, ENOCH GEORGE, BEVERLY WAUGH, JOHN EMORY, WILLIAM TAYLOR, FRANK M. BRISTOL, LUTHER B. WILSON, J. P. NEWMAN, and THOMAS BOWMAN were elected bishops. W. VERNON MIDDLETON, later bishop, grew up in Howard Park Church, Baltimore, and E. STANLEY JONES, who in 1928 was elected to but declined the episcopacy, was also reared and converted in the city. F. R. BAYLEY was the first president of the JUDICIAL COUNCIL in The Methodist Church.

The conference has had outstanding laymen, such as HENRY FOXALL, iron founder who in 1815 gave money to establish Foundry Church, WASHINGTON, D. C.; SAMUEL K. JENNINGS who served as head of ASBURY COLLEGE and was a founder of the world's first dental school in Baltimore; ROBERT G. ARMSTRONG, Isaac Toy and ISAAC P. COOK, publishers and booksellers; GEORGE C. M. ROBERTS who established the Home for the Aged; THOMAS E. BOND, editor of the New York Christian Advocate; D. STEWART PATTERSON, general secretary of the Commission on Camp Activities; and HURST R. ANDERSON who came from INDIANA to serve as president of AMERICAN UNIVERSITY.

The two issues which most seriously affected the Baltimore Conference during its history were "Reform" and slavery. After the death of Bishop ASBURY in 1816, there arose a delayed reaction against episcopal authority, and the discontent centered in Baltimore. A group of Reformers were expelled from the Baltimore Conference in 1827. ALEXANDER McCAINE, a located Baltimore Conference preacher, went on the attack with his History and Mystery of Methodist Episcopacy. JOHN EMORY replied with A Defense of Our Fathers. Three conventions of the Reformers were held in Baltimore—1827, 1828, and 1830—and they culminated in the formation of the METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH.

From the beginning the "great evil of slavery" was a major concern of the Baltimore Conference. Slavery was on the agenda of every General Conference down to 1860, and few if any sessions of the Baltimore Conference passed without some discussion of the subject. In 1800 the General Conference favored the gradual abolition of slavery. Later it supported African colonization, and still later it opposed modern abolitionism.

Though slavery was legal and was practiced in much of its territory, the Baltimore Conference adhered North following the division of the church in 1844. As a border conference, Baltimore sought to follow a course advocated by STEPHEN C. ROSZEL, namely, that traveling preachers and local preachers who desired ordination must free their slaves if they owned any, and that church members be required to fix years of servitude for slaves. That many slaves were freed in Maryland is attested by the fact that in 1860 the number of free Negroes in the state almost equaled the number of slaves. True to its position, the Baltimore Conference suspended one of its preachers, F. A. Harding, for holding slaves. Harding appealed his case to the General Conference of 1844 and lost. The General Conference then in effect suspended Bishop JAMES O. ANDREW because he too owned slaves, and as a result the M. E. Church divided into northern and southern branches.

The Baltimore Conference delegates to the 1860 General Conference unanimously opposed the so-called "new chapter" on slavery which was adopted. They claimed that the resolution, in calling on preachers and laymen to seek the extirpation of slavery by all lawful and Christian means, would in effect exclude slaveholders from membership in the M. E. Church. The General Conference legislation evoked prolonged protest in the Baltimore Conference. At the March, 1861 session of the conference, Bishop LEVI SCOTT was deposed from the chair, and the conference voted eighty-seven to one to disown the General Conference. The eruption of the Civil War four months later forced the preachers to choose between civil and ecclesiastical loyalties. This resulted in two rival Baltimore Conferences from 1861 to 1865, one favoring the North and the other the South. During the war N. J. B. Morgan, presiding elder in Washington, D. C., held together the conference which supported the Union. The southern sympathizing conference became the Baltimore Conference of the M. E. Church, South in 1866.

During its history the Baltimore Conference was also concerned about other matters. Prior to 1815 the principal interests were preaching and higher education. In the 1820's the conference promoted home missions and the distribution of Bibles and tracts, while opposing free masonry and lotteries. In the 1830's, it opposed alcohol, tobacco, and theological schools. In the 1840's it sought to raise money for women's colleges and superannuated preachers, while opposing memorized sermons and pew rents. After the Civil War the aims of the FREEDMEN'S AID SOCIETY and the need for church extension posed challenges, as did the CENTENNIAL OF AMERICAN METHODISM (1866). At that time the Baltimore and East Baltimore Conferences raised some $182,000 for a number of special causes, about one-half of the total going to DICKINSON COLLEGE and the Metropolitan Methodist Church in Washington, D. C. Earlier opposition to the theological seminaries notwithstanding, a few graduates of DREW SEMINARY were received into the Baltimore Conference during the last third of the nineteenth century.

COKESBURY, the first Methodist college in the world, was within the bounds of what came to be the Baltimore Conference; the school functioned at Abingdon, Md., from 1787 to 1795 when it was destroyed by fire. The Baltimore and Philadelphia Conferences jointly acquired Dickinson College, Carlisle, Pa., in 1835. Beginning in 1848, the Baltimore Conference gave support to one or more academies for women, and in 1888 it established the Woman's College of Baltimore. JOHN F. GOUCHER, a conference member, rendered outstanding service as president from 1890 to 1908, and in 1910 the school was renamed for him. Unfortunately the conference lost Goucher College in 1922. Bishop JOHN F. HURST began raising money for a Methodist university in the national capital in 1890, and 24 years later AMERICAN UNIVERSITY opened for students; it has since become a first-rate institution. The former M. P. Church had two educational institutions within the bounds of the Baltimore Conference—WESTERN MARYLAND COLLEGE and WESTMINSTER THEOLOG-ICAL SEMINARY. At unification in 1939, Western Maryland became a college of the Baltimore Conference, and Westminster was recognized as one of the theological schools of The Methodist Church. Westminster's name was changed to WESLEY, and in 1958 it was moved to new quarters adjacent to American University in Washington.

The Baltimore Conference Historical Society is one of the strongest, most active and efficient in the connection. The society maintains a part-time curator at its Lovely Lane Museum in Baltimore. The museum contains one of the largest and most important collections of Methodistica and Wesleyana in the denomination.

In 1968, the Baltimore Conference had 636 ministers, 487 pastoral charges, 242,257 members, and churches, parsonages, and other property valued at $137,289,913

BALTIMORE CONFERENCE (MES) was organized at Alexandria, Va., Feb. 7, 1866 with Bishop JOHN EARLY presiding. For the preceding five years it had been an independent conference.

In March, 1861 the then Baltimore Conference (ME) disowned the 1860 General Conference for its enactment of the "new chapter" on slavery, which was interpreted in slave territory as requiring the expulsion of slaveholding members of the church. At the tumultuous conference session held at Staunton, Va., March 13-25, 1861, the presiding officer, Bishop LEVI SCOTT, refused so to interpret the new rule, and in a general uprising he was voted from the chair and independence was proclaimed by a vote of eighty-seven to one, some forty-one preachers not voting. Thirty of the nonvoting preachers then ineffectually protested the action as a resort to revolution "before the constitutional means have been tried."

The next month the Civil War broke out and orderly church work was interrupted. Battle lines soon divided the Baltimore Conference territory and communication between VIRGINIA and MARYLAND became practically impossible. Preachers found themselves where they did not want to be; several were in intolerable situations. One such was JOHN S. MARTIN, conference secretary since 1853, who was stationed in Baltimore. He went to Virginia, taking the conference records with him. On the other hand, a group of five Southern sympathizing pastors remained in Baltimore throughout the war and formed several churches despite the suspicions and occasional harassment by Federal forces occupying the city.

In 1862 the breach of the conference made by the Civil War became an ecclesiastical division, and rival sessions of the Baltimore Conference (ME) were held, one in Light Street Church, Baltimore, and the other at Harrisonburg, Va. a few days later. The group at Light Street voted thirty-eight to twenty-four to repudiate the separation enacted at the 1861 conference session, and at the same time formally recorded the withdrawal of the brethren who sided with the Confederacy. The group meeting at Harrisonburg in 1862 went on to become the Baltimore Conference (MES) in 1866, and they had the records of the "Old Baltimore Conference" by John S. Martin's possession of them. They kept the records until unification in 1939, when they were returned to the Baltimore Conference of The Methodist Church.

When Bishop EARLY received the conference into the

M. E. Church, South, it reported 11,189 white and 627 colored members. Due to aggressive missionary work and much southern sympathy in MARYLAND, the conference membership doubled in five years. While the population of the area, apart from Baltimore and Washington, grew slowly, the membership of the conference continued to climb and by unification in 1939 it was nearly 100,000. From 1871 to 1939 the conference territory included northern VIRGINIA, Virginia west of the Blue Ridge down to the New River, most of Maryland, most of DELAWARE, eleven counties in WEST VIRGINIA, and a fringe of PENNSYLVANIA.

Property litigation and recrimination marred the early years, but after the CAPE MAY agreement in 1876, relations with the Baltimore Conference (ME) were mostly amiable. However, some of the southern brethren continued to feel that their church's course of noninvolvement in political and social matters was superior.

The conference produced able leaders in the church such as JOHN A. KERN, professor at RANDOLPH-MACON and later at VANDERBILT; ALPHEUS W. WILSON, missionary secretary and later bishop; COLLINS DENNY, educator and bishop; P. H. WHISNER, church extension secretary; FORREST J. PRETTYMAN, chaplain of the U. S. Senate; H. H. SHERMAN, secretary of the board of education; C. D. BULLA, a church editor for sixteen years; and NOLAN B. HARMON, book editor and later bishop. B. W. Bond served twenty years as presiding elder, while JAMES E. ARMSTRONG, JOHN S. MARTIN, and P. H. WHISNER served nineteen years in the office. T. J. Magruder and Daniel C. Roper, who was in the cabinet of President Franklin D. Roosevelt, were prominent laymen.

Missionaries who went to the foreign field from the conference included J. T. Myers, J. C. C. Newton, and B. W., H. M., and G. L. Waters to JAPAN; GATHER WARFIELD to POLAND; G. D. NAYLOR to CUBA; C. C. Bush to AFRICA; and WILLIAM THOMAS to BELGIUM.

Beginning in 1868 the conference shared in the support of Randolph-Macon College, electing four men as trustees. Later scholarships were provided for ministerial students at the college. Wesleyan Female Institute at Staunton, Va. was patronized during its existence (1865-95). In the 1890's small amounts of money were appropriated for SCARRITT COLLEGE in Kansas City, PAINE COLLEGE at AUGUSTA, Ga., and LANE Institute in JACKSON, Tenn.

The conference published The Baltimore Episcopal Methodist from 1865 to 1883, when the name was changed to The Episcopal Methodist, 1883-1894. In 1894 it became the Baltimore Christian Advocate and continued until 1901, when the paper was merged with the Richmond Christian Advocate to become the Baltimore and Richmond Christian Advocate (published in Baltimore and Richmond). The conference also published the Baltimore Southern Methodist from 1904 to 1939, when at unification it, with the Baltimore and Richmond Christian Advocate, became the Virginia Methodist Advocate.

Conference concern for the aged led to the establishment of the Asbury Home at Gaithersburg, Md. in 1926. Under the leadership of Herman M. Wilson as superintendent (1928-62) it became one of the foremost Christian homes for the aged in the nation. Plans for an orphanage at Gaithersburg and a secondary school in the mountains near Roanoke, Va. resulted only in the creation of the Francis Asbury Education Fund of some $50,000, the income from which was used for scholarships.

The Baltimore Conference had a good record in contributions to church causes. It gave nearly $800,000 to the CENTENARY FUND for Missions, heading the list of the larger conferences of the denomination. The campaigns for Christian education and pension endowment in the 1920's yielded some $277,000 and $190,000 respectively. The grand total given for the three causes was more than $1,262,000. In 1931 the Baltimore Conference with 3.1 percent of the membership gave 10.6 percent of the total amount contributed to missions by the M. E. Church, South.

The idea of Methodist unification was approved by the conference in 1917, but in 1925 the roll call vote went 141 to 138 against the proposed plan of union amid charges of presiding elder pressure and with Bishop W. A. CANDLER, bitterly opposed to union, in the chair. However, in 1937 the conference voted 218 to 99 for Methodist union, knowing that in the process its own territory, preachers and churches would be divided among the VIRGINIA, BALTIMORE, WEST VIRGINIA and PENINSULA CONFERENCES of the united church.

At its final session in 1939 the "Old" Baltimore Conference reported 168 ministers, seven districts, 211 pastoral charges, 98,640 members, and 640 churches, 206 parsonages, and other property valued at $9,601,840.

BALTZELL, ISAIAH (1832-1893), American E.U.B. preacher and songwriter, was born Nov. 26, 1832, in Thurmont, Md. and died Jan. 16, 1893, in Annville, Pa. He once described his education as "Common English education, received in Common School, but principally at New Windsor Academy in Carrol Co., M'd." On Feb. 17, 1859, he was married to Cecelia C. James.

"The month was August" was all he could recall about the date in 1847 when he was converted and joined the Church of the UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST. In 1854 he was licensed to preach by the VIRGINIA CONFERENCE of his church. Two years later this same conference ordained him. He ranked as one of the best preachers in the three conferences he served: Virginia, 1854-61; Pennsylvania, 1862-67; and East Pennsylvania, 1868 until his death. He served as presiding elder in the East Pennsylvania Conference, 1874-80 and 1883-89. He was a delegate to the General Conferences of 1877, 1881, and 1889.

His main impact upon the church in his day came from his writing of songs and hymns for the church and Sunday school. A contemporary wrote of him, "Bro. Baltzell wrote music for the best reason in the world—because he could not help it." Such songs as "The Evergreen Shore," "Shall We Meet?" "No Room in Heaven," "Sailing O'er the Sea," and "Some Mother's Child" came from his pen in constant stream. He served as joint editor with E. S. LORENZ for nine volumes of songs, two of which are Notes of Triumph and Heavenly Carols for the Sunday School. Many of his compositions were published in the song books of other denominations.

He assisted in founding and editing The Itinerant, a liberal, independent periodical supporting the revision of the United Brethren Constitution.

BANCROFT, ELWOOD DOW (1871-1963), American lay leader, was born in Columbus, Ohio, in 1871. He was General Secretary of Columbus Railway Young Men's Christian Association for 27 years, and also Y.M.C.A. secretary with American forces in France in the first World War. For several years before Church union, he was connected with the Commission on Men's Work of the Board of Education of the M. E. Church. He then became Associate Secretary of the General Board of Lay Activities of The Methodist Church at the time of church union until his semi-retirement in 1946 and full retirement in 1948.

He was genial and optimistic, a layman who could inspire other laymen by his forth-right, and popular addresses. His wide acquaintance and leadership in the field of lay activities put him in constant demand as a speaker before huge conference and local church gatherings. He lived in his home town of Urbana, Ohio, after retirement until his death in 1963.

BAND ROOM METHODISTS. Within the early Methodist societies were "bands," each with not fewer than five or more than ten members, meeting weekly and constituting an inner fellowship. To the members of these bands JOHN WESLEY felt he could speak intimately on spiritual things. Members received quarterly TICKETS, distinctly marked with the letter "B," and many Methodist chapels had a separate band room. In MANCHESTER the members of such a meeting declined to have their affairs brought under the authority of the LEADERS' MEETING and the circuit preachers, and so at the beginning of 1806 they withdrew and began a new connection under the name of Band Room Methodists. In 1808 they numbered sixteen congregations, all in Lancashire and Cheshire, with some twenty-eight preachers. Eventually the best of the movement probably gradually coalesced with congregations of the PRIMITIVE METHODISTS.

T. P. Bunting, Jabez Bunting, i, 1859. JOHN T. WILKINSON

BANDS in early Methodism were groups smaller than classes and the rules for Bands were prepared by JOHN WESLEY in 1738 and were inserted in the Discipline of 1791 of the M. E. CHURCH as follows: "Two, three, or four true believers who have full confidence in each other, form a Band. Only it is to be observed that in one of these Bands all must be men, or all women, and all married, or all single." This last word "single" was changed in The Discipline of 1812 to "unmarried."

The rules for the Band Societies called for a searching examination of each by the other. They were personal and almost inquisitorial in the nature of the examination each must undergo by the others concerning particular temptations, and whether or not "known sins" were committed since the last meeting.

The Classes—CLASS MEETINGS—rather than Bands, seem to have been more useful in American Methodism, and finally in 1856 the section on Band Societies was omitted from the Discipline of the M. E. Church. The M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH, omitted these references two years earlier, or in 1854. For devotional worship in the Bands and Classes, see under WORSHIP.

BANE, ADAM CLARKE (1860-1940), American clergyman and theologian, was born June 21, 1860, in Gilroy, Calif.

Bane attended Pacific Methodist College, Santa Rosa, Calif., and the UNIVERSITY OF THE PACIFIC, San Jose, Calif., where he graduated in 1881.

Prior to making his decision to enter the ministry, Bane was news editor of the Daily Herald, San Jose; Santa Clara County Treasurer; and prepared for the practice of law, even passing the state bar examinations.

In 1886, however, he joined the Pacific Conference of the M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH, serving churches in STOCKTON and SACRAMENTO. In 1899 he joined the California Conference of the M. E. CHURCH, serving SAN FRANCISCO churches until 1909.

For eleven years, 1909-1920, Bane was Anti-Saloon League Superintendent, and was instrumental in persuading William Jennings Bryan to support the work of the League.

Through Bane's efforts, the University of the Pacific was relocated in Stockton. It was he who obtained the land for the college from one of his former parishioners at Stockton's Grace Church, where he had started his ministry. He later served as vice-president of the college.

Bane served as Superintendent of the OAKLAND District, 1924-29; as Anti-Saloon League Education Superintendent; and as pastor at Colfax, Calif. until 1940.

Two great projects were of major interest to Bane: the training of the church's youth, and the unification of all churches within Methodism. He directed many memorable youth institutes.

Bane died in Berkeley, Calif., July 25, 1940, having lived to see the Unification of American Methodism the previous year. He was buried in Park View Cemetery, Stockton, Calif.

BANGALORE, long known throughout INDIA as "pen-sioners' paradise," has become an industrial metropolis, a center of motor and airplane manufacturing. An equable climate, due to its situation on the plateau of Mysore, three thousand feet above sea level, has given it a reputation as a health resort. It is in the South India Annual Conference.

Methodism in Bangalore was born in a seven-weeks series of meetings conducted by WILLIAM TAYLOR. Reports tell of 140 converts, and an even 100 accepted the invitation to be charter members of a Methodist church. Four fellowship bands were organized, to meet in different parts of the sprawling city. For several decades, Bangalore's population was twenty percent Christian, larger than any other city of India.

WILLIAM F. OLDHAM, later bishop, early in his ministry served the Bangalore church and organized a small co-educational school. Mrs. Oldham was the first teacher and the principal. Out of that school have grown two illustrious institutions, the Baldwin Boys' and Girls' high schools. The first student admitted to the boarding department, Charles B. Hill, became a distinguished Methodist minister. Other students of these schools have served with integrity, devotion, and effectiveness as ministers, educators, government officials, and in many other capacities in India, Britain, the British Commonwealth nations, and in the U.S.A. One is now prominent among consulting psychologists in America; another is the superintendent of Bombay District. The principals of both schools are former CRUSADE SCHOLARS from North India, Sarah Kashi Ram and Eugene Finch.

For twenty-four years (1904-28), Bangalore was designated as an official residence for a Methodist bishop.

The city is the home of a United Theological College and of the Christian Institute for the Study of Religion and Society. The Methodist Church in Southern Asia has received valuable help from both.

BANGS, HEMAN (1790-1869), American minister, eminent in the M. E. Church, during its formative years, was born in Fairfield, Conn., in April, 1790. He united with the NEW YORK CONFERENCE in 1815, and served in the work of the ministry for fifty-four consecutive years. Thirty-three of these were in the pastorate; three years he was agent of the WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY of Middletown, Conn.; and eighteen years he was presiding elder. Most of his life was spent in or about NEW YORK CITY and NEW HAVEN. He was among the first to advocate and to assist in the organization of the Missionary Society of the M. E. Church. He also was a strong protagonist of education in the church and temperance reform engaged much of his time and effort.

Bishop EDMUND JANES, who conducted the funeral of Heman Bangs said: "In every position he filled he was equal to the responsibilities imposed upon him. As a preacher he was peculiar to himself, he imitated no one; nobody could anticipate his sermons; they were original, always connected, short, and eminently practical. At times he would seem to bring the whole heavens down, overwhelming his audience with an emotion and power, altogether superhuman. As a pastor he excelled."

Heman Bangs died in New Haven, Conn., on Nov. 2, 1869, and his death is recorded as "Having been one of great peace and triumph."

BANGS, JOHN (1781-1849), son of Lemuel Bangs and Rebecca Keeler, was born in Stratford, Conn. As a boy of eleven he moved with his family to Stamford, Delaware Co., N. Y. He became apprenticed to a blacksmith and followed this trade until his children were well grown. He married twice: Mary Rickey, of Harpersfield, N. Y., Jan. 2, 1804, and, following her death, Mrs. Arethusa Palmer, of Maryland, Otsego Co., N. Y., Oct. 6, 1845.

Ordained a deacon in 1815 in Albany by Bishop ASBURY, Bangs did not seek admission to the NEW YORK CONFERENCE until 1819; in 1821, he was granted full membership and ordained elder. Assigned first to the Sharon (N. Y.) Circuit, then to the Jefferson Circuit, he continued throughout the following quarter of a century to serve circuits in the northwestern portion of the New York Conference.

John Bangs's contribution to Methodism is impressive. While he did not achieve the notice accorded his famous brothers, NATHAN and HEMAN, he made an imprint upon the upper end of the New York and lower end of the TROY CONFERENCES which considerably exceeded theirs.

At least seven presently existing churches can trace their origins to societies which John Bangs formed, and as many more claim him as their founder. He contributed three sons to the ministry: John D. Bangs, Nathan H. Bangs, and one other. For forty years he was an active promoter of CAMP MEETINGS. It was while dealing with a company of rowdies at such a meeting that he suffered a blow on the head which nearly cost him his life, necessitating a supernumerary relationship in the conference for most of his remaining years.

NATHAN BANGS

BANGS, NATHAN (1778-1862), distinguished American editor and author, was born in Stratford, Conn., on May 2, 1778, the son of Lemuel Bangs and Rebecca Keeler Bangs. He was almost entirely self-educated. In 1799 he went to CANADA where for three years he was a teacher and land surveyor. He became an itinerant Methodist minister and spent six years in the Canadian provinces. He was licensed to preach in 1801 and rode horseback through the Canadian woods in order to preach. He is regarded as the founder of Methodism in the Quebec Conference of the Methodist Church. On April 23, 1806, he married Mary Bolton of Edwardsburg, Upper Canada.

Upon his return to NEW YORK in 1820 he became the head of the Methodist BOOK CONCERN in NEW YORK CITY and put it on a paying basis. He was the editor of The Methodist Magazine which in 1832 became The Methodist Quarterly Review. In 1828 he also became the editor of The New York Christian Advocate. He is credited with starting the system of maintaining official church journals. He was one of the founders of the Methodist MISSIONARY SOCIETY and in 1836 he was appointed to serve as its secretary, a position he held for many years. In 1841 he became the acting president of WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY at Middletown, Conn. In the following year he resumed his pastoral work in New York. Upon his retirement in 1852 he devoted much of his time to literary endeavors. His most important work was The History of the Methodist Episcopal Church From Its Origin In 1776 To The General Conference Of 1840, which was published in four volumes in New York from 1839-1842. His numerous published editorials, sermons, addresses and other works include: Predestination Examined (1817); Methodist Episcopacy (1820); Letters To A Young Preacher (1835); Essay On Emancipation (1840); Letters On Sanctification (1851).

Abel Stevens of New York published The Life and Times of Nathan Bangs, D. D., in 1863. Three of Bangs' brothers were also Methodist ministers. Nathan Bangs died on May 3, 1862.

BANKHEAD, JOHN HOLLIS, JR. (1872-1946), American legislator and U. S. Senator, was born July 8, 1872 in Lamar Co., Ala., son of John Hollis and Tallulah Brockman Bankhead.

He received the A.B. degree from the University of Alabama and LL.B. degree from Georgetown University in 1893. He began law practice in Jasper, Ala., Aug. 1, 1893. He married Musa Harkins Dec. 26, 1894.

Bankhead was selected to the Alabama Legislature in 1903. There he was author of the state election law. From 1931 to 1946 he served his state and nation as U. S. Senator.

As a Methodist layman and delegate to the NORTH ALABAMA ANNUAL CONFERENCE, he prepared the memorial to the GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH for a better pension plan for retired ministers and their wives. He was member of the first Hospital Board of the North Alabama Conference and was a forceful teacher of Methodist adult church school classes. For many years he was a trustee of the University of Alabama.

BANKS, JOHN SHAW (1835-1917), British Methodist, was born at Sheffield, Yorkshire, Oct. 8, 1835. He entered the Wesleyan Methodist ministry in 1854 and served as a missionary in Mysore, 1856-65. After his return to England, he was appointed theological tutor at Headingley College, Leeds, in 1880. He translated a number of German theological works; he also published A Manual of Christian Doctrine (1887; 8th ed., 1903) used in the ministerial course of study in America as well as Britain, and The Tendencies of Modern Theology (1897). He was president of the WESLEYAN METHODIST Conference in 1902. Like most Wesleyan tutors of his period, he was strongly conservative theologically. He died in Leeds, March 17, 1917.

JOHN KENT

BANKS, LOUIS ALBERT (1855-1933), American clergyman and author, was born Nov. 12, 1855 in Corvallis, Ore.

He was educated at Philomath College, Oregon, and BOSTON UNIVERSITY. His outstanding work on behalf of temperance was recognized by MOUNT UNION COLLEGE, Alliance, Ohio, which awarded him a D.D. degree in 1891; and Philomath College, which presented him with a LL.D. degree in 1918.

In 1879 Banks entered the ministry of the M. E. Church, and continued his pastoral work for twenty-two years, when he became an evangelist. He spoke in union evangelistic campaigns and lectured for the Anti-Saloon League, spending much of his later life in temperance work. In a brief entry into politics, Banks was the Prohibition candidate for governor of Massachusetts in 1893.

He was widely famed for his writings which were devotional in spirit and helpful in content. One of the most prolific authors of his time, he often published as many as three books a year. The People's Christ, published in 1891, was the first of about 50 widely read and influential books. His main themes were popular biblical studies, such as Seven Times Around Jericho (1897) and The Great Sinners of the Bible (1899); inspirational stories, such as Hero Tales from Sacred Story (1897) and Hidden Wells of Comfort (1901); instruction for ministers, such as Thirty-one Revival Sermons (1904) and Sermons for Reviving (1928); and temperance, the best known of which was Ammunition for the Final Drive on Booze (1917).

Banks died in Roseburg, Ore., June 17, 1933.

BANNISTER, EDWARD (1814-1871), American college president and clergyman, was an 1838 graduate of WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY (Conn.), and also studied medicine but did not practice. He joined the GENESEE CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church in 1838 and mingled teaching with preaching throughout his career.

Soon after gold was found in CALIFORNIA in 1848, the Mission Board envisioned an institution of learning there under Methodist auspices, and sent Edward Bannister west to found it. Impressed by the prospects for a permanent population south of the the SAN FRANCISCO Bay area, he established in 1850 the independent San Jose Academy, a classical school at SAN JOSE, and became its principal. Two years later at nearby Santa Clara he opened the preparatory department of the UNIVERSITY OF THE PACIFIC, of which he is regarded as a founder along with WILLIAM TAYLOR and ISAAC OWEN. In 1855 he opened the Oak Grove Institute at Alameda, across the Bay from San Francisco, but returned to pastoral work in 1856 and continued in it until 1860. Then as Civil War dissensions spread to California, he was called to take the presidency of the struggling University of the Pacific. It was an especially trying time. Among the school's supporters were Southern Methodists who soon were in an invidious position as California swung to the support of the North and President Lincoln. In June, 1861, President Bannister reported to his trustees, "I have nothing to recommend in respect to buildings, faculty, etc., because we have no funds for improvements." Faculty salaries were already six months in arrears. Bannister was successful in bringing the school through the trying period and in 1867 his trustees, having twice declined to accept his resignation, reluctantly voted to release him so that he might return to the ministry. After four years as presiding elder of the San Francisco District, he was stationed at Marysville.

Born at Phelps, N. Y., Dec. 14, 1814, Edward Bannister died at Marysville on Sept. 27, 1871.

BAPTISM. Holy Baptism in Wesley. This is a subject perplexing in minor detail, but straightforward in general principle, and characteristically after the manner of JOHN WESLEY in method. All the statements in Wesley on Holy Baptism, and his actions from which opinions may perhaps be drawn by implication, have been ably brought together by J. H. Parris in John Wesley's Doctrine of the Sacraments, pp. 35-61. From this we see that it is not possible to bring all the evidence into a logical consistency, with the consequence that different scholars have placed differing constructions upon it, (pp. 45-6), the chief point at issue being the extent to which Wesley may be supposed to have moved in conviction away from his original standpoint in the Church of England.

The perplexity is illustrated from the circumstance that the leading piece of evidence that the mature Wesley was unhappy over the Book of Common Prayer doctrine of baptismal regeneration of the infant is that he omitted the most pointed reference to baptismal regeneration in the Office for Baptism in the Sunday Service which in 1784 he sent over for the use of the newly-formed Methodist Episcopal Church in America. This historic Methodist prayer-book is set out in parallel with its chief sources, and with forms of service which have been derived from it in later American Methodism, in a clear and concise manner very useful for the careful student by Bishop N. B. Harmon in his Rites and Ritual of Episcopal Methodism. Here we see that before the actual rite the minister is to pray for the infant "that he coming to thy holy Baptism may receive remission of his sins by spiritual regeneration" (p. 170). After the sacramental act there is an interesting token that whatever prompted Wesley to his emendations of the Office it was not, as some have claimed, a desire to carry into effect the frustrated ecclesiastical programme of the old English Puritans, for after the baptismal act the minister is to make the sign of the cross upon the infant's forehead, a ritual particularly offensive to the stiffer Puritans (p. 182). However, the Church of England at this point continues: "Then shall the Priest say, 'Seeing now, dearly beloved brethren, that this Child is regenerate and grafted into the body of Christ's Church—,'" while Wesley made this read: "Then shall the Minister say, Seeing now, dearly beloved brethren, that this Child is grafted into the body of Christ's Church—" (p. 184). Wesley can thus pray that the infant may be born again in Baptism, but apparently avoids the clear implication of the Anglican Office that the sacrament is a sacramental operative symbol, by which act the infant is in a true sense regenerated there and then. We are left to surmise what Wesley actually thought.

The irony is that in the two passages where Wesley expressly states that it is possible to receive the sacrament, and yet not be regenerate, are in connection with the Baptism of an adult. In this case he declares that defective faith partially or wholly vitiates the benefit of the sacrament (though it certainly does not follow from this that Wesley would have had such an unbeliever "baptized again" had he later been truly converted to Christ) (Sermon XXXIX iv 1, Journal Jan. 25, 1739). On the other hand, Wesley's most considered and explicit statements on Baptism refer to Infant Baptism, and specifically defend the traditional catholic and Anglican doctrine of baptismal regeneration. These are in his authoritative doctrinal Standard Sermons, XIV 1, and XXXIX iv 2, and in his Treatise on Baptism of 1756, (Works X, pp. 188-201). As if to point the fact that he had not moved from his Anglican root the latter is an abridgment of his father's Short Discourse on Baptism.

This apparent confusion will not surprise the student of Wesley who has read him on other matters. The fact is that, though his was a powerful intellect and a constructive intellect, Wesley was not a systematic theologian. This is not to say that he was a mere pragmatist, interested only in what teaching would make the Society function as a going concern.

Wesley's determinative principle with regard to Baptism is that of ecclesiastical loyalty coupled with evangelistic fervour and pastoral faithfulness. He loves the Church of his upbringing and allegiance, and its liturgy likewise, which he believes to be in accord with Scripture, and which has been imposed by due authority, and which he has dutifully and personally accepted. This is binding upon his intellect and his conscience. Though the average modern "liberal" Protestant may not find it easy to understand how a man of complete intellectual integrity can adopt such an attitude, it nevertheless remains that Wesley's leading question is not the individualist's "What is my opinion?" but the disciplined catholic Churchman's "What do we teach?" The prayer-book teaches baptismal regeneration, and this he will uphold. Nevertheless, the practical evangelist is also aware that many will try to find a cave of refuge from the searching challenge for conversion and holiness in the weak and evasive plea that one was made "a good Churchman" and a Christian by Holy Baptism, and therefore one does not need to be evangelically "converted." And this Wesley will not allow.

The clue to his attitude comes out explicitly in what he has to say in his Standard Sermons. "But perhaps the sinner himself, to whom in real charity we say, 'You must be born again,' has been taught to say, 'I defy your new doctrine: I need not to be born again; I was born again when I was baptized.' What! Would you have me deny my baptism?" (XXXIX iv 4.) "I ask not, whether you were born of water and the Spirit; but are you now the temple of the Holy Ghost which dwelleth in you?" (XIV iv 1.) "Lean no more on the staff of that broken reed, that you were born again in baptism. Who denies that ye were then made children of God, and heirs of the kingdom of heaven? But, notwithstanding this, ye are now children of the devil. Therefore ye must be born again. And let not Satan put it into your heart to cavil at a word, when the thing is clear." (XXXIX iv 5.) The systematist, who may make it his business "to cavil at a word," may not be able to understand how an infant can be born again in Baptism, grow up into what Wesley cuttingly describes as "a baptized whoremonger," and then a second time be "born again" (though not baptized again!). But in real life "the thing is clear." Wesley's teaching answers exactly to his remembered experience. His own Baptism as an infant, and nurture in a Christian congregation and home, was for him by no means an amiable social ceremony. It was an instrumental means of GRACE. Yet this did not preclude either the need or the possibility of "the heart strangely warmed" (Journal, May 24th., 1738, (1)). And this doctrine likewise answers exactly to the situation of Methodism as a disciplined Society for the pursuit of personal evangelism and holiness, set within the body of a communal Church which practises Infant Baptism, and the Christianity of sacramental nurture associated with it. The catholic mission of the Church is not denied, but the evangelistic mission of the Society is affirmed.

"Baptismal regeneration" has become among Methodists a word often charged with emotion, upon the assumption that it involves the vain and unspiritual hope of salvation by priestly magic, which is the negation of true spiritual religion. Needless to say, this is a complete misrepresentation of the doctrine of the prayer-book and Articles of the Church of England, and of Wesley's doctrine, though one is not concerned to deny that the doctrine has at times been misunderstood in this way. Wesley's catholic and essentially Anglican position may be traced out in his Treatise on Baptism (Works X pp. 188-201). It is God's plan for man that the Christian life of grace be lived within the disciplined fellowship of the visible Church. Therefore He has promised to give His saving grace to man by means of sacramental rites which presuppose actual and visible incorporation into the body of the Church. So to be joined to the Church in Baptism is a covenant that man is placed in the promised sphere of operation of the Holy Spirit (Treatise, II 2), joined to Christ (II 3), and made the regenerate child of God (II 4). There is indeed a clear distinction to be drawn between the outward ecclesiastical rite, which is the occasion of actual, formal, and permanent union with the Church, and the inward work of spiritual regeneration which God has promised to attach to this rite (III 2 and more explicitly, Sermon XXXIX iv 1). It is not the ecclesiastical act of union with the visible Church which saves, but the attached act of divine grace. Nevertheless, God has promised to do what only He can do through the channel of what the Church does. Thus the sacrament is in the proper sense of the word a means of grace.

It is at this point that confusion arises around the question-begging traditional formula ex opere operato—"from out of the work actually performed." In the sense that by Baptism the child is granted the formal status of incorporation into the Church, with the divine promise of the saving work of the Spirit of grace, something is actually done in the rite. As the change of status is permanent the Baptism cannot be repeated. Wesley plainly teaches that he who has "sinned away his baptism" has not reverted to the formal status of a non-Christian. He stands under the more severe judgment reserved for an apostate Christian, the circumstance of his Baptism bringing added condemnation (Sermon XXXIX iv 4). And if he repent he is certainly not to be "re-baptized," for this would deny the opus operatum. Yet the sacrament of Baptism is not an opus operatum in the sense that it may be supposed to convey a divine blessing of such character that it automatically and permanently inheres in the baptized person, no matter what sort of life he later lives (cf. Roman Catechism and Reply, Q. 54, Works X p. 113). So "Baptism doth now save us if we live answerable thereto," (Treatise II 5). So in the "baptized whoremonger" the status remains, but the blessing is withdrawn. The standing and general benefit of Baptism is that God has promised to remit the guilt of original sin to those infants who are baptized, and give to them the indwelling Spirit (II 1). This is what is meant by "baptismal regeneration," and is the doctrine of the Articles and prayer-book of the Church of England, and Wesley's doctrine. (We need not go into the enquiry as to the sense in which "baptismal regeneration" may be upheld even if the admittedly difficult conception of original guilt be called in question.)

However, Wesley is fully aware of the standing catholic principle that while the Church is bound by God's ordinance, the sovereign Lord is not. God has covenanted to give grace to those who reverently use the means of grace, but He has not promised to deny grace to those who do not use them (IV 2). Thus, though incorporation in the Church is God's general, stated, and reliably-covenanted method of granting the new birth and adoption ("these privileges, by the mercy of God, are ordinarily annexed to baptism," Sermon XIV 1), the God of universal justice and mercy can, if He see fit, forgive and save some of those who have neglected to carry out the terms of the covenant. It is the standing business of the Christian teacher, therefore, plainly to declare God's stated terms of salvation, but not to enter into impious speculation as to whether particular individuals are or are not in a state of salvation. Only God knows this. The mature and evangelical Wesley, liberated by his experience from timid ecclesiasticism, is prepared to press this catholic principle boldly. In particular, we have the salient case of the upright and Christ-loving but unbaptized Quaker. Wesley declares that it is perilous to call in question his eternal salvation (Letters, Standard Ed., III 36). Nevertheless, Wesley counts it very necessary to seek to persuade the Quaker to accept the ordinance of God, and be formally incorporated into the Church by Baptism (eg. Journal, April 6th, 1748).

If "baptismal regeneration" is a phrase capable of misunderstanding, and is the subject of ecclesiastical prejudice, the formula can be dropped in the American baptismal office, if this will make it easier to launch in the troubled conditions of America an office containing the substance of Anglican baptismal doctrine. But it does not follow, we judge, that Wesley had necessarily changed his convictions. It may only be his prudential discipline which he had changed. The mature Wesley is less concerned with the shadow than the bone.

Holy Baptism in Developing Methodism. We are familiar with the circumstance that the current of events swept away much of the churchly, sacramental, and liturgical heritage which Wesley sought to pass on to his followers. It is interesting that though social circumstances were so different in Britain and in America the effect was much the same, though the change took place if anything more rapidly and more completely in America. Ecclesiastical separation inevitably produced ecclesiastical rivalry, and this in turn naturally generated a growing divergence of custom and ethos, and finally of thought. The common idea that the antithesis was between sacramental salvation and "conversion" is a partial and misleading explanation. The presence in America of Baptists, and other denominations insisting on Believer's Baptism, shows that a union of punctilious observance of the sacrament and revivalist evangelism is quite possible. The real divergence is between the Christianity of nurture in the Christian community, and the Christianity of individual "decision."

In Britain Methodism found herself in the decades following Wesley's death, in the position of a growing, confident, and well-organized minority group, yet largely excluded from social and political privilege. A main concern, as she faced the outside world, was that of vindicating her right to exist, and the dignity of her institutions and ministry, in face of a state-established Church which by-and-large still regarded the existence of denominations outside the national Church as an unfortunate anomaly. The effect of this was to make it natural for Methodists to de-emphasize customs emphasised by the Church of England, to avoid ways of thought or worship which seemed "churchy," and to fear "clericalism." Particularly among the laity of the more proletarian Methodist groups there was a great reluctance to admit the spiritual necessity of anything in the religious life for which an ordained and separated minister was by tradition requisite. One very natural focus for all these feelings was the phrase "baptismal regeneration," and the ritual actions prescribed by the Book of Common Prayer. In particular, the early Anglo-Catholic movement was the object of great opprobrium among Methodists, as it was viewed as a disloyal group engaged in disingenuously subverting the Protestant character of the national Church. That the "Puseyites" produced a strong new emphasis upon the doctrine of baptismal regeneration was sufficient to make it natural for most Methodists to examine the baptismal Office they had inherited from Wesley, to make quite sure it taught no such thing! Thus in the various Victorian revisions of the office the sign of the cross disappeared, references to the new birth were reduced, even to the point in 1882 of eliminating the citation of John iii 5, the questions to the Godparents were eliminated, and their place taken by a prayer for the parents, and the short prayers before the rite placed afterwards, to avoid the implication that the intercessions were to be answered there and then in the Baptism (see Standard Sermons, ed. by Sugden, I. pp. 280-82).

In the final baptismal Office of the WESLEYAN METHODIST CHURCH (the most ecclesiastical of the British Methodist denominations), the Book of Common Prayer intercession, "Give thy Holy Spirit to this infant, that he may be born again, and be made an heir of everlasting salvation" still preceded the sacramental action. This could be read in the sense that the infant was in some way born again in Baptism, but the general impression of the whole service is that this sense was not intended, and such an idea was rare among Methodists. The process was completed in the new Book of Offices authorized following the Methodist Union of 1932. This service, the present British baptismal office, is a dignified and very fitting order of service, which has brought spiritual blessing to multitudes who have used it. However, it can be criticised theologically in that the whole practical weight of the emphasis is upon the promise of the parents, and of the congregation present, to bring up the child as a Christian. This is of course a most important and helpful practical element, but it is not left too apparent what is done for the child in the Baptism. However, prayer is still made that Christ will in Baptism receive the child, and the declaration made after the Baptism that the child is now incorporated into the Church. Theologically this implies the catholic position, but in a veiled manner. It has to be accepted that the great majority of Methodist parents, and doubtless many ministers, would most naturally express themselves by declaring that Infant Baptism is essentially an occasion for giving thanks to God for the gift of a child, for solemn resolve to bring up the child as a Christian, and for prayer of dedication on behalf of the parents and their home. The idea that Baptism effects incorporation into the Church is also present, particularly to the more instructed minds. The idea that incorporation into the Church brings incorporation into Christ, and into the sphere of God's saving activity, is less familiar to the average Methodist.

The social and ecclesiastical position of American Methodism has been very different from that in Britain. In the practical absence of a Church of England the well-organized and influential Methodist Episcopal Church did not feel under pressure to defend its position against the priestly pretensions of sacramentarianism, except in so far as anything savouring of the undemocratic and therefore un-American Church of Rome was an object of suspicion. A factor characteristic of the American scene, however, was frequent institutional competition with, and consequent theological controversy with, Baptists, and other denominations which insist on Believer's Baptism, and on Immersion. This produced a vast but chiefly ephemeral literature arguing the validity of Infant Baptism, and of sprinkling. Here is a controversy almost unknown in Britain, where in bygone years the small Baptist Church appeared more in the guise of an ally against the predominant Church of England rather than as a rival. This confrontation with Baptists has in some places produced Methodists with an inclination towards immersion, but it is arguable that in other quarters rivalry may have stimulated the instinct to decry the significance of Baptism. Certainly, however, a more potent influence was that the confidence of a new pioneering nation did not encourage men to look with affection upon Church traditions reminding them of continuity with the past of mediaeval Europe, while rough-and-ready and free-and-easy frontier conditions did not provide the facilities or precise ritual, or breed men careful in carrying out the rubrics imposed by ecclesiastical authority.

We are not therefore surprised to find that in 1786 the prayer in Wesley's baptismal office, "Give thy Holy Spirit to this Infant, that he may be born again—" disappears, as does the signing with the sign of the cross, and the accompanying prayer (Harmon, pp. 177, 183). In 1792 are likewise omitted Wesley's reduced declaration "this Child is grafted into the body of Christ's Church—," as well as the final prayer "receive this Infant for thine own Child by adoption, to incorporate him into thy holy Church" (Harmon, p. 185). An interesting feature in later revisions is that an Address to "the Parents or other Sponsors" appeared in 1864 in the office of the Methodist Episcopal Church (the Book of Common Prayer Exhortation to the Godfathers and Godmothers having been removed by Wesley himself), and a similar one to "the parents, or others presenting the child" in 1866, in the office of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South (Harmon, pp. 173, 177, cf. p. 187). A mark of this usage is carried through into the present baptismal office of the American Methodist Church, where the rubric states, "Then the minister shall address the parents or sponsors—etc." The British service, by interesting contrast, assumes the presence of parents or guardians only, and leaves the Godfathers and Godmothers with nothing to say, though by custom they are almost invariably present. There is also a theological difference possibly to be discerned between the British declaration at Baptism, "We receive this child into the congregation of Christ's flock" and its American parallel: "—this child, whom we this day recognize as a member of the family of God." The latter would appear to be one stage further removed from the theology that Holy Baptism actually incorporates into the Church.

It will be seen that since the time of Wesley there has in general been in Methodism a decline of theological conviction that in Baptism God performs an act for and in the child. It is not that this conception has been officially denied, for many responsible statements could be cited affirming it in general terms. However, fear of "ceremonial religion," and suspicion of any phrase which could be read as implying "baptismal regeneration" has shifted the practical emphasis of the authorized baptismal office in the other direction. It is significant that despite this the rite itself has maintained its hold firmly upon the affections of the general body of the Methodist people.

Modern British Thought and Statements Regarding Holy Baptism. It may first be stated that one of the most important modern books on Baptism has been written by a Methodist, W. H. Flemington, The New Testament Doctrine of Baptism. As the title indicates, this work is not directly concerned with later doctrine or ritual. Nevertheless, it has a powerful implication, for an expert examination in detail of the New Testament evidence is employed to show that Holy Baptism, a sacrament of dying and rising with Christ, and of incorporation into Christ and His Church, is a central part of original Christianity, and an element plainly going back to the purpose of our Lord. A similar witness comes from the section on Baptism in C. Ryder Smith's The Sacramental Society. Thus Methodist theology has been in no doubt about the spiritual dignity of this sacrament, or the rightness of Infant Baptism, when administered with proper discipline.

As Methodism has found herself confronting other parts of the Church in the ecumenical movement, and in particular, in the long discussions of Church unity with the Church of England, Methodists have been compelled to evaluate anew their own heritage. There has therefore been a turn away from the old habit of defining what is to be accounted erroneous or superstitious in the customs of others, to the positive attempt to discover what is of worth to ourselves. The effect of this has been to produce a number of statements enhancing the dignity of Baptism, satisfying to the mind of careful thinkers, honestly accepted as our position by the Conference, and yet tending somewhat to go beyond the sentiments which come naturally to the expression of "grass-roots" Methodists. The official Statement on Holy Baptism approved by the British Methodist Conference in 1952 is concerned, as is to be expected from a British statement, primarily with what our people do in Christian devotion and pastoral care, rather than with theological theories. In this the Statement follows Wesley, as we have seen above, and indeed, the prayer-book itself, and general Anglican tradition. The Preamble states that the purpose is not to impose one particular interpretation of Baptism upon our people, but to secure that the sacrament is valued and observed, and that it is administered with loving pastoral care, and with due discipline to guard against slovenliness and abuse. On

(1) The Obligation of Baptism for the Methodist People reference is first made to the fundamental statement in the doctrinal clauses of the Deed of Union of 1932, where it is stated that "The Methodist Church recognizes two sacraments namely Baptism and the Lord's Supper as of Divine Appointment and of perpetual obligation of which it is the privilege and duty of Members of the Methodist Church to avail themselves" (Constitutional Practice and Discipline of the Methodist Church, ed. Spencer and Finch, 3rd, ed., 1958 p. 265). Reference is also made to an earlier Conference Statement on Infant Baptism in 1936, and to the contents of the Book of Offices, where Baptism is declared to be reception into the universal Church. The practical problems, and evangelistic opportunity, presented by those many parents who have no living connection with the Church, yet who bring their children for Baptism, are then noted as a pressing concern.

(2) The New Testament Doctrine of Baptism and its vital connexion with justifying faith. This and the next section seek to show that care for the spiritual dignity of Baptism is an integral part of original New Testament Christianity, and authentic evangelical Christianity. The document cautiously falls a little short of declaring categorically that our Lord expressly ordained this sacrament, but inclines strongly to this view. In the New Testament Baptism signifies our dying to sin and rising again to the life of righteousness, is related to the new birth of the Holy Spirit, is a sign of incorporation into the Church, which is the Body of Christ, and is a seal of the New Covenant. The initiative of divine justifying grace is seen in Baptism, and the gift of faith is to be followed by Baptism.

(3) Infant Baptism and the Grace of God. It is allowed that the New Testament doctrine of Baptism is argued with Believer's Baptism primarily in view. Yet Christ received the children: they can belong to Him, and so are rightly incorporated into His Church. The Baptism of a helpless infant is a compelling token of the prevenient GRACE which comes before faith, and which awakens it. Yet this initial gift of grace in Infant Baptism needs to be personally appropriated by the growing disciple, through the influence of the Holy Spirit, and should end in evangelical conversion, either sudden or gradual.

(4) Practical Conclusions and Recommendations. Baptism is the obligation of everyone desiring to become a Church member. Care must be taken not to baptize twice. It is the joint responsibility of the parents and of the Church to see that the pledges of Christian nurture entered into at Infant Baptism are carried out, so that Baptism shall not sink to the level of a social custom. Therefore, particularly in view of the many parents who have no vital relationship with the Church, notice should be required of intended Baptisms, to give the minister or other pastor opportunity for pastoral visitation and careful instruction. Private Baptisms are to be avoided unless there is pressing reason, and every effort is to be made to secure the presence of both parents in Church, to make the promises. The Church must keep a baptismal roll, and visit the homes of infants who have been baptized. The authorized baptismal office should normally be used, with recital of our Lord's words in reception of the children, and of the promises to be made by the parents and congregation, and with care taken invariably to use the Tri-une formula with the water.

It is worthy of note that the 1963 Report, Conversations between the Church of England and the Methodist Church, contains a section on Holy Baptism (pp. 30-1). As this Report was accepted by Conference at least some measure of indirect approval was in consequence given to this baptismal statement. A joint Anglican-Methodist declaration of this sort is naturally under some pressure to establish the measure of harmony which exists between the standards of the Church of England and the Methodist Church, and therefore it inevitably carries a proportion of emphasis somewhat different from the Conference Statement of 1952, which was phrased to secure the maximum degree of consensus among Methodists of every school of thought. Apart from one clause the 1963 statement does not appear to differ in substance from the Conference Statement of 1952, save that it is phrased more scripturally and theologically, and less pastorally and practically. It declares that the sacrament of Baptism "goes back to Christ." Baptism is (a) a sacrament of cleansing and repentance. (c) Baptism means union with Christ. (d) Baptism means admission into the Church. (e) Baptism is the seal of the Spirit. (f) Baptism is a response to the gospel, and involves a confession of Christ as Saviour and Lord. This interpretation can be applied to infants on the ground of the solidarity of the Church in faith, and because the basis alike of Believer's and Infant Baptism is the objective work of grace performed on the Cross, and not merely the human confession.

Article (b) however raises more difficulty, and may be cited. "Baptism is a sacrament of regeneration, for it is a sacrament of the gospel which has brought a new birth to the universe and to the individual.—To be initiated into the Body of Christ is to share in the life of the new age." And in a later paragraph: "Baptism, then, is the sign and seal of the new life in Christ. The child baptised is regenerate. That term has given rise to considerable controversy. If regenerate means the mature experience of a Christian believer, clearly it cannot be applied to infants. If, however, it refers to the initiation of the Christian life or to the fact that every child in baptism is given the status of a child of God within the family of the redeemed, is it not a right and proper word to use?" It is clear from this that the Anglican members of the commission felt bound to insist, in loyalty to their tradition, that the formula "baptismal regeneration," as enshrined in the Book of Common Prayer, must be allowed as part of the basis of union. However, they are well prepared to give explanation and assurance that the formula does not in fact for them bear those unfortunate connotations which have been offensive to Methodists.

Certainly this mention of the doctrine of "baptismal regeneration" as a part of the scheme of union will strike a somewhat unwelcome note to the great majority of Methodists, chiefly because it comes down to us through two hundred years of history as a word charged with emotion. It is not easy to gauge the mind of modern British Methodism in this matter. We judge that among theologically instructed Methodists those who are nearer in mind to Anglican formularies, and to Wesley, will largely be prepared to accept this clause, on the strength of the explanation given that "baptismal regeneration" does not imply salvation by "magic", apart from a moral and spiritual change in the heart, but expresses the conception of the status of one initiated into the Body of Christ. However, many of these will not like the word on account of its common associations, and the way in which it can be misunderstood. They might acknowledge it in scholarly discussion, but not use it before the congregation.

Other Methodist scholars will have greater reserve. In token of this type of opinion we may consider the statement of the four dissentients, representing the more distinctly "nonconformist" school of Methodism, who signed the minority report. "Some disquiet may be felt over the doctrines of baptismal regeneration and eucharistic sacrifice as they are referred to in the report. It is true that these terms call for careful definition before they can be either approved or disapproved; but such definition should be given, and some interpretations of the terms should be excluded" (p. 61). In fact, informed and scholarly dissentients do not reject the phrase "baptismal regeneration" outright, but they do greatly fear that ex opere operato and sacramentarian notions which they do reject lurk under the surface in many Anglican minds, reasoned explanations notwithstanding. They wish to be fully assured that in a scheme of union these latter unevangelical ideas are excluded. And it is to be admitted that "grass-roots" Methodists, having less comprehension of the technical theological terms used, will find this clause even less welcome. However, it is only candid to record that divergences about Baptism are not in fact an important difficulty in Anglican-Methodist relations, compared to questions of ministerial order.

JOHN LAWSON

In American Methodism. Holy Baptism, according to the Articles of Religion (XVI of the Sacraments), is one of the two dominical sacraments instituted by Christ at the earliest beginnings of the Church. It is the grand initiatory rite by which membership in the whole of Christ's Church is established. It is not denominational in character or implication, but catholic and universal. Methodists offer baptism freely to all, understanding that the Church is for all. However, Methodist pastors are encouraged by the rubrics of The Order for the Administration of the Sacrament of Baptism to instruct youth and adults prior to their baptism, and in some mission fields a preparatory period of probation is required before baptism is administered.

Baptism is defined by the Articles of Religion (XVII Of Baptism), as, among other things, a sign symbolizing a profession of faith. This is not the faith of the candidate alone, however, but the faith of the whole Church. In the baptism of infants particularly, the Church expresses the faith that what in sincerity it prays God to do, He has promised to do in gracious response. What God has promised and what the Church asks in faith is that unknown infants who are the products of human reproduction shall be accepted as children of God Himself, "subjects of the saving grace of the Holy Spirit," and "heirs of life eternal." This is a very great faith, for the young of the human genus are not physically of different substance from the young of any species. The spiritual transaction which makes human babies more than animals is a profound mystery, though an equally profound reality. In Holy Baptism the Church hallows human parenthood as a sharing with God in creation, and acknowledges gratefully the unique grace which God has bestowed upon the human race, even the most infant members of it.

Baptism is also defined by the Articles of Religion as a mark which distinguishes Christians. Though not some kind of physical insignature this is spiritually indelible and permanently affixed. Baptism is not to be repeated, but is a once-in-a-lifetime sacrament. It is intended to implant a self-consciousness in the awareness of each Christian that he is individually, eternally, and especially related to God as his Father and to Christ's family the Church. This is most clearly symbolized by that component of baptism which is commonly called "christening," or the giving of a Christian name. A baptized person is not simply a digit in population figures, a number to be counted in a census, a cog in a mechanized society. The God who takes notice of a sparrow's fall can and does know each single child of His by name. Each is precious in His sight. Baptism expresses this Christian faith in the imperishable worth of each personality. The redemption of the human race is God's ageless purpose, for which Christ died. This redemption is very personal, and each person is subject not only to physical birth but is promised in the gospels a renewal or regeneration of personality. Thus the Articles of Religion conclude that baptism symbolizes not only the blessedness of birth but the availability of a new birth for each of God's children.

Mode of Baptism. Methodists make use of all the traditional ways baptism is administered: sprinkling, pouring, or immersion. A candidate for Holy Baptism or his sponsors may choose the mode. By far the most common practice among Methodists, however, is sprinkling. Almost all Methodist churches are furnished with a stone or wooden baptismal font, or at least with a bowl, usually of silver. In administering Holy Baptism, a minister is directed to take a child into his arms; adults and youth usually kneel to receive baptism. The most frequent Methodist procedure is that a minister will dip his right hand into the font or bowl and lightly sprinkle water on the head of the person being baptized, though in some churches a small silver shell is provided for dipping the water. A square of linen, called a lavabo towel, is often placed near a font for the use of a minister in drying his hands. A ewer containing a supply of water should be placed near a font so that a baptism may take place at any time. The sentimental custom of dipping a flower into a font and using it to sprinkle water in baptism is frowned upon by most Methodist liturgical authorities.

Baptism among Methodists is administered by the Trinitarian formula. Using the Christian name of the candidate, the officiating minister says, ". . . I baptize you in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit." This is catholic practice and New Testament teaching.

No particular rubrics are provided for sponsors, though this term is used in Methodist rituals rather than the phrase "godparents." By ancient tradition godparents are usually three in number, two of the same sex as the child to be baptized, and one of the opposite sex. Since one of the original purposes for having sponsors was to enlarge the circle of adults who would be expected to assume a spiritual and even practical responsibility for a child it became a tradition in earlier times when plagues and misfortunes left children orphaned more often than is now the case, to select at least three sponsors who were not kin to each other or to the child being baptized. This was calculated to add three additional possible families to which an orphan might be received. Methodist rubrics advise but do not require that parents or sponsors presenting a child for baptism should be members of Christ's Holy Church. No denominational membership is specified, however.

Baptism among Methodists normally is expected to be administered in a church, in the presence of a congregation, and at a stated hour of public worship, but ministers are granted discretion in this respect. In extremis, as in a sickroom or on a battlefield, it has been catholic practice to recognize that any Christian may baptize another person but the normal procedure among American Methodists is to restrict the administration of Holy Baptism to ordained deacons or elders, or to any minister serving as pastor of a congregation. Ministers are directed to enroll the names of all baptized persons in parish records and to give a certificate to each person baptized. In many states this establishes a legal record recognized as proof of age by civil law.

Closely related to Holy Baptism is the rite of confirmation or reception into church membership. The distinction should be kept clearly in mind, however, that in baptism a person is made a member of the holy catholic Church, whereas in confirmation denominational and congregational membership is established. At the baptism of an infant the sponsors or parents are asked to promise that the child being baptized will be kept "under the ministry and guidance of the Church" until confirmed. Usually this means twelve or thirteen years of age, though this is not specified. At some such age, however, each baptized person is expected to "accept for himself the gift of salvation, and be confirmed as a full and responsible member of Christ's holy Church." Sometimes a probationary period separates the baptism and confirmation of adult converts, but more frequently in Methodist usage an adult is baptized and received into Methodist membership at the same time, though the two rituals are different. Commonly the ritual for reception into membership immediately follows the ritual for baptism when adults are received.

BAPTIZED CHILDREN in The United Methodist Church. The Discipline of the M. E. CHURCH in 1856, following an order of the GENERAL CONFERENCE, endeavored to define the close relation to the church which Baptized Children should have, and used these words: "We hold that all children, by virtue of the unconditional benefits of the atonement, are members of the kingdom of God; and, therefore, graciously entitled to baptism; but as infant baptism contemplates a course of religious instruction and discipline, it is expected of all parents or guardians who present their children for baptism, that they use all diligence in bringing them up in conformity to the word of God; and they should be solemnly admonished of this obligation, and earnestly exhorted to faithfulness therein. We regard all children who have been baptized as placed in visible covenant relation to God, and under the special care and supervision of the church. The preacher in charge shall preserve a full and accurate register of the names of all the baptized children within his pastoral care; the dates of their birth, baptism, their parentage, and places of residence. The preacher in charge shall organize the baptized children of the church at the age of ten years or younger into classes, and appoint suitable leaders (male or female), whose duty it shall be to meet them in class once a week, and instruct them in the nature, design, and obligations of baptism, and the truths of religion necessary to make them "wise unto salvation"; urge them to give regular attendance upon the means of grace, advise, exhort, and encourage them to an immediate consecration of their hearts and lives to God, and inquire into the state of their religious experience; provided, that children unbaptized are not to be excluded from these classes. Whenever baptized children shall have attained an age sufficient to understand the obligations of religion, and shall give evidence of piety, they may be admitted into full membership in our church, on the recommendation of a leader with whom they have met at least six months in class, by publicly assenting before the church to the baptismal covenant, and also to the usual questions on doctrines and disciplines.

"Whenever a baptized child shall, by orphanage or otherwise, become deprived of Christian guardianship, the preacher in charge shall ascertain and report to the leaders' and stewards' meeting the facts in the case, and such provisions shall be made for the Christian training of the child as the circumstances of the case admit and require."

As JOHN WESLEY did not send to American Methodism any form for the reception of members, nor any resemblance of anything like the Confirmation office as it was in the Church of England, Methodist preachers of an older generation felt that baptism itself, being the gateway of the church, admitted children to all its beneficial privileges, with the possible exception of the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper which for psychological, if not spiritual reasons, is held to be the privilege of members who have been formally received and confirmed in the Church.

It was however clear that such children were to be nurtured and guided in Christian living and in due time, following the provisions of the Discipline of the M. E. Church which have above been cited—and similar provisions in the Disciplines of other Methodist Church bodies—further directions were always given in many official ways for the bringing together of baptized children for training in church membership, and forming classes of these.

Ministers likewise have always been ordered by the Discipline to keep a roll of the baptized and this roll, sometimes called the "Roll of Preparatory Members," has proved to be a great reservoir out of which church members are drawn when children came to the age of accountability.

The baptismal office itself, as Methodism has had and now has it, lays an obligation upon parents whose children are being baptized to "see that they be taught the precepts and principles" of our holy religion. Ministers when taken into full connection in a Methodist annual conference must promise that they "will diligently instruct the children in every place." In the early Methodist Disciplines, ministers were directed to pay particular attention to the young children in every household which they visited. The rite of baptism is yet considered to be the entrance into the Christian Church whether it be of infants or of adults. However, the Methodist Churches, as other Christian Churches everywhere, recognize that each person baptized in infancy should of his or her own account take vows on their own behalf when they come to the age of accountability and so be "received and confirmed" in the church.

BARBEE, JAMES D. (1832-1904), American preacher and Publishing House Agent, was born in Laurence Co., Ala., March 16, 1832, of Huguenot ancestors. He died in Nashville, Tenn., Dec. 5, 1904.

Early hunger for knowledge spurred him to hard farm labor to earn money in order to buy books. Two years after finishing his local school, he became principal. He referred to this school as "Bark Log College, my Alma Mata." Few men had a greater hunger for knowledge, dedication, energy and conviction. He was licensed to preach in 1852 and ordained an elder in the TENNESSEE CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church, South in 1856.

Barbee was a gifted preacher and dynamic leader. He held the larger pastorates in Tennessee before being elected Publishing Agent of the Publishing House of the M. E. Church, South in 1889. In recognition of his limited business experience, he requested that a layman of business ability be named his Associate Agent. This was done.

Barbee's was the first successful financial administration of the Southern Methodist Publishing House. A large portion of bonded indebtedness was retired; the assets were almost trebled and payments from the profits to the preachers' retirement fund were first begun.

However, Barbee's settlement of the claims for the military use and damage to the Publishing House by the Union Army of occupation, during the Civil War, created a notable controversy. (See PUBLISHING HOUSE CONTROVERSY.)

The General Conference of 1902 exonerated Barbee. However, he declined to be considered for re-election. His salary was continued for six months, until the next session of the Tennessee Conference, when he was appointed presiding elder of the Nashville District. The loyalty and affection of the Publishing House employees and many friends was expressed by a large purse of gold coins and many tears, on the occasion of his official farewell as agent.

J. RICHARD SPANN

BARBER, GEORGE CALVERT (1893-1967), Australian minister and church leader, a son of the parsonage, entered the ministry after the first World War (in which he served and from which he later suffered considerably). He became an outstanding name in the history of Australian Methodism and in the Australian ecumenical movement. His qualities were recognized far beyond the bounds of his own country.

He was a theologian, preacher and pastor, a clear thinker, a keen debater and a great fighter. His wide ranging vision embraced not only Methodism, but the whole ecumenical movement. A man of tremendous ability and versatility, he had a deep concern for people, a complete dedication to Christ and a profound understanding of contemporary issues.

His range of experience and responsibilities was unusually varied. He had country and city appointments, he was a district chairman, hospital chaplain, a prison chaplain, a chaplain to the armed forces, President of Wesley College Council and President of the Australian Council of Churches; Registrar of the Melbourne College of Divinity; a delegate to the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and to the WORLD METHODIST CONFERENCE; and President of Conference, Secretary-General and President-General. Few men in Australia have carried such a wide diversity of responsibilities and he fulfilled them with outstanding ability.

He was both a good theologian and an excellent administrator. Not long before he died he remarked to his wife, "I really wanted to be a theologian but they made me an administrator." He knew in whom he believed, but he also knew what he believed and he expressed himself with unusual clarity and penetrating zeal. He was a powerful preacher, and his challenging voice both in the pulpit and on the Conference platform will not be forgotten.

During the closing years of his life physical suffering deprived the whole Church of the full fruitage of his mind and spirit.

BARBIERI, SANTE UBERTO (1902-), South American bishop, was born in Due Ville, Vicenza, Italy, to Catholic parents, on Aug. 2, 1902. At the age of eight his parents brought him with them to BRAZIL. There, in the state of PORTO ALEGRE, after going through primary school, he had to work to help his widowed mother. As an assistant to an itinerant jewelry salesman, he traveled horseback through the Brazilian jungles visiting the frontier towns. At twenty-one he was established in Paso Fundo, Brazil, both working and studying to enter the law school. It was then that he was converted to the evangelical faith and joined the Methodist Church.

This experience proved a turning point in his life. He decided to become a minister. In 1924 he married Odette de Oliveira, a young Brazilian school teacher who had been partly instrumental in putting him in contact with the Methodist Church. He then entered the Methodist Seminary in Porto Alegre and after graduation was sent to study in SOUTHERN METHODIST UNIVERSITY, Dallas, Texas, and EMORY UNIVERSITY, Atlanta, Ga., both in the U.S.A. From there he went back to Brazil, entered the Methodist ministry, and began a teaching career at his alma mater in Porto Alegre, of which he became president.

At the invitation of B. FOSTER STOCKWELL, he moved with his family in 1939 to BUENOS AIRES, ARGENTINA, to join the faculty of the Union Seminary there (Facultad Evangelica de Teologia) and be a pastor in the Eastern South America Annual Conference. He served several small churches around Buenos Aires until in 1942 he was appointed pastor of the Buenos Aires Central Church.

In 1947 he went full time into theological education and was made director of the Seminary. In January 1949, however, the Latin America Central Conference elected him a bishop, thus putting an end to what he had considered his life career. He was assigned to the River Plate episcopal area (Argentina, URUGUAY and BOLIVIA). The year 1949 was also the beginning of his ecumenical career. This year he was elected chairman of the First Latin American Evangelical Conference, held in Buenos Aires, and soon began participating in several commissions of the newly organized WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. He attended the Evanston Assembly in 1954 and was elected one of its presidents, serving until 1961. Since then he has been a member of the Central and Executive Committees of the same. He has served as vice president of the World Council on Christian Education and Sunday School Association.

Besides preaching and teaching, Bishop Barbieri has done much writing. In Brazil he was made a member of the Literary Academy of the State of Rio Grande do Sul. He writes prose and poetry, textbooks and novels, in Spanish, Italian, Portuguese, and English.

As an administrator Bishop Barbieri is credited with giving strong leadership in the World Council of Churches during the critical years of that organization, 1954-61. Also as a bishop he helped to open up mission frontiers in PATAGONIA and in Bolivia, which was then called a "land of decision." He retired officially in 1968, but was continued on in charge of the work in Argentina until the Methodist Church there organized in the summer of 1969.

Of the four children of Bishop and Mrs. Barbieri, the youngest, Flavio, is a Methodist pastor in Bolivia.

Since retirement Bishop Barbieri continues to reside in Buenos Aires.

BARCLAY, ARTHUR JOHNSTONE (1868-1953), Australian minister and administrator, was received into the ministry of the Methodist Church in 1893 by the SOUTH AUSTRALIAN CONFERENCE, of which Western Australia was then a district. He served in several Australian circuits where he showed himself to be a devoted pastor with some talent for preaching. It was as an administrator, however, that he made his most significant contribution to the developing church. In 1907 he was released from circuit work for twelve months to raise funds for, and to assist in the establishment of the Methodist Ladies' College, Claremont, and he remained as its Secretary for twenty-one years. In 1913 he was appointed General Superintendent of Home Missions and Connexional Secretary for the WESTERN AUSTRALIA CONFERENCE. He held the former office for twenty-three years and the latter until his retirement.

He was elected President of the Western Australia Conference in 1911 and again in 1929, the only minister of the Conference to have won this double distinction. In 1928 he visited England and secured financial assistance for the establishment of a Theological Institution for Western Australia. It was largely through his advocacy that the Methodist Federal Inland Mission was created at the General Conference of 1926. This placed the burden of bringing the Church to the lonely people of the vast Australian outback on the shoulders of the whole Church. In 1935 he was elected President General of the Methodist Church of Australasia, and he retired from the ministry at the end of his three-year term of office. He died in Perth in 1953.

BARCLAY, WADE CRAWFORD (1874-1965), American minister, educator, and historian, was born Aug. 8, 1874 in West Liberty, Iowa. He was a direct descendant of

WADE C. BARCLAY

Janes Barkley, who had settled in Walkill Valley, N. Y. in 1729.

Reared in a vital Christian home, Wade Barclay began to preach in his late teens in nearby rural churches. He was ordained when he was twenty years old.

In 1899 he graduated from the University of Iowa, and completed work for his B.D. degree at University of Chicago in 1906. In recognition for his work as an educational leader and historian, SIMPSON COLLEGE, Indianola, Iowa, bestowed its D.D. degree upon him.

Barclay's major interest was the field of religious education. He is credited with developing the first system of religious education geared to the various age levels of children. He also prepared training materials for teachers of religious education. This was accomplished while he was editorial director of the Board of Sunday Schools of the M. E. Church, a post he accepted in 1909. He served from 1914 to 1926 as associate editor of teacher and adult publications for the Methodist Book Concern, editing the Sunday School Journal and Adult Class Monthly. In this area he was a leader of the liberals, along with such men as HARRY F. WARD, Bishop FRANCIS J. MCCONNELL, and RALPH DIFFENDORFER.

From 1927 to 1944, Barclay was executive secretary of the Joint Commission on Religious Education in Foreign Fields. His personal knowledge of the work in the field and his constant correspondence laid the groundwork for his major work, the History of Methodist Missions, which was designed to "present a comprehensive, detailed, and accurate history of American Methodism in its character as a Christian missionary movement."

Volume I appeared in 1949, followed promptly by Volumes II and III, before he relinquished the task of preparing the last three volumes. Barclay was a man endowed with tireless energy, an ever-alert mind, literary charm and grace, and his part in this monumental work was completed near the close of his more than fifty years of active service to the Methodist Church. Barclay was the author of twenty other books, but his three volumes are considered the definitive history of American Methodist missions available today.

Methodism's outstanding mission historian of his time, Barclay died Jan. 15, 1965 at his home in Haworth, N. J.

BARDSLEY, SAMUEL (?-1818), British Methodist, one of JOHN WESLEY'S itinerant preachers from 1768 to 1818. For some time he was the senior preacher of the connection. He was a man of fine Christian character and lovable disposition. His sermons were couched in simple, easily understood language, and were blessed to great numbers of people. John Wesley held him in very high and affectionate regard, and frequently corresponded with him. He was one of the small group of preachers on whom Wesley relied during his latest years for advice and support. He was also one of the hundred preachers named in Wesley's DEED OF DECLARATION, who formed the legal Conference after Wesley's death. He died very suddenly after attending the Leeds Conference on Aug. 19, 1818.

BARDWELL, HARRY BROWN (1879-1956), American missionary to CUBA. Born at Talbotton, Ga., March 21, 1879, he was converted in March 1892 and at that time joined the church. His education was in the public school system of Talbotton and at EMORY COLLEGE, which latter granted him the Ph.B. degree in 1899. It was while studying at Emory College that he decided to abandon his previous plans of becoming a physician, as was his father, and to devote his life to the preaching of the Gospel. In August, 1899, he was licensed to preach. For three years he served as pastor of Centenary Church, Macon, Ga. In 1903 he and his wife (the former Addie Abney of Leesburg, Fla.) offered themselves as missionaries to Cuba. Their first pastoral church was in Guantánamo, where he served for five years. His prestige was such that, at a time when the Roman Catholic Church and Protestant leaders were in bitter conflict, the local Roman Catholic priest entrusted Bardwell with the distribution of his personal inheritance. In 1908 Bardwell was transferred to Havana, and one year later was appointed director of Candler College. His work there was the most remarkable aspect of his ministry. For forty years (1909-1949), he gave this school such leadership that it became one of the outstanding educational institutions in Cuba. At the same time he was pastor of the local church, "Leland Memorial." In 1934 he became blind, one of the greatest trials of his life, but it was taken by him as an opportunity to witness to the depths of Christian overcoming. At the time of his retirement in 1949 his former students and other friends made it possible for him to remain in Cuba for the remainder of his days. He passed away on Nov. 4, 1956.

BARE, CHARLES LYSANDER (1849-1924), was born in Bethlehem, Ind., on July 7, 1849, the oldest in a family of several children. His father was a soldier in the Civil War, and died in a Confederate prison of battle wounds. The boy had the responsibility of taking the place of father to the younger children, and assisting his mother.

He was educated at SIMPSON COLLEGE and DREW SEMINARY. He married Susan Winchell in 1879, and the two sailed for INDIA, arriving there Jan. 1, 1880. His first appointment was to the Boys' Orphanage in Shahjahanpur, including evangelistic work in the district. This position he held for nine years. In 1890 he succeeded E. W. PARKER in charge of the Rohilkhand District. The burden was too heavy and his health broke, so he returned to America on furlough. After four years he was able to return to the land and people he loved.

For two years he served as professor in the BAREILLY Theological Seminary, then as principal of LUCKNOW CHRISTIAN COLLEGE, where he continued until 1914. Although he filled important places on the mission field and was successful, it was in the college that he made the greatest impression. Through Bare's efforts many deficiencies were remedied, and he lived to see the college established on a firm basis, and enjoying the confidence both of the government and of the people.

After another period of two years as district superintendent and a year as principal of Bareilly Theological Seminary, he had furlough and was retired by the Board of Missions, but returned to India and continued to teach in the seminary until his death in January, 1924, at Bareilly.

BAREILLY, India, has long been a headquarters of both civil and military administration in its region. It is situated on the Ramganga River, 812 miles from Calcutta and 1,031 from Bombay. Furniture making and carpeting, rosin, bobbin, and match factories are the chief industries. It is the strong center of the North India Annual Conference.

Methodist work was begun in Bareilly by WILLIAM BUTLER in 1856 when he found it impossible to begin missionary work in LUCKNOW. Among the pioneer missionaries who shared in the work in this area were JAMES L. HUMPHREY, JAMES M. THOBURN, JAMES W. WAUGH, C. W. JUDD, JAMES H. MESSMORE, E. W. PARKER, HENRY MANSELL, T. J. SCOTT, Robert Hoskins, and CLARA SWAIN. In 1861 the first Methodist press was established in Bareilly, but this was later moved to Lucknow.

At present there are three self-supporting Methodist churches in the city with Bareilly Central having a membership of 3,031. The entire Bareilly district of the conference has 16,803 Methodists served by twenty-one ordained men and twenty-one other workers.

Among institutions in Bareilly are Bishop Mondol Inter College, a junior college for boys; a Methodist Girls' High School and Hostel, which is a primary, middle and high school for girls, though coeducational in the primary classes.

There is also the Clara Swain Hospital and School of Nursing, which was the first hospital in all Asia for women and children. This was begun in 1870 by Clara Swain, for whom it is named and who left a remarkable impress on that region. It was made a general hospital in 1940 and more than 3,000 patients are treated yearly.

The Warno Baby Fold in Bareilly is an inter-conference orphanage for children under six years of age. Except for occasional small gifts through Advance Specials, the institution is fully supported by The United Methodist Church in India.

CLARA SWAIN HOSPITAL, BAREILLY

North India Theological College in Bareilly is a union project which is carried on in cooperation with the British and Australian Methodists, the English Baptists, the United Church of North India, and the Church of England. Its most recent formal announcement declares that it is sponsored by (1) The Methodist Church in Southern Asia of American United Methodist Church connection, (2) The United Church of Northern India—(i) The North India Synod of the United Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. connection, (ii) The Punjab Synod of the United Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. connection, (iii) Malwa Church Council of United Church of Canada connection, and (iv) Vindhya Satpura Church Council of Canadian Presbyterian Church connection—and (3) The Church of India, Pakistan, Burma, and Ceylon. It began in 1872 as a Methodist institution, the first of its kind opened by any agency in India. It offers a three-year course in the Hindi medium to graduates of middle school and a diploma to high school and junior graduates for the L.Th. degree. The latest report indicates an enrollment of thirty-eight.

BARILOCHE, Argentina or San Carlos de Bariloche, as it should properly be called, is a rather small resort area situated in Rio Negro Province of Southern Argentina in a region of mountains and lakes sometimes termed the Switzerland of South America. The city is a popular resort for a great many tourists from over all South America and distant lands. Methodists for some years had a congregation in Bariloche, but their place of worship was a small, simple room, unpainted and barn-like in its appearance, not at all comfortable with what Methodist visitors who came to Bariloche expected to find. Fortunately, however, a devoted and sacrificial congregation found means to construct in 1964 a new Methodist church of modern design, with adequate facilities situated on a commanding site above the town and overlooking waters of the lake. This was done in part with strong assistance from the WESTERN NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE of THE METHODIST CHURCH. William C. Stokes, a layman of that conference, with his wife made a special trip to Bariloche at the request of his bishop, surveyed the need, and helped to arouse the conference itself to support the building project.

KARL SIEGFRIED TROMMER, who has for some years been pastor at this church, oversaw and directed the building of the new edifice. It was formally opened early in 1965 with Bishop SANTE UBERTO BARBIERI, in charge of the area, and Bishop NOLAN B. HARMON with a delegation from the Western North Carolina Conference, including Mr. and Mrs. Stokes, being present for the opening ceremonies.

Trommer preaches in German, Spanish, and English to three different audiences each Sunday in the new church. A feature of the new edifice is a tower with three church bells, one bearing an English inscription, one a Spanish, and the other a German.

Bariloche is headquarters of the PATAGONIA PROVISIONAL ANNUAL CONFERENCE.

BARKER, JOHN and WILSON, HARKUA, were the first and second persons baptized by JAMES MILLS THOBURN during his remarkable missionary career in INDIA. Both were born in the Himalayan Mountain region known as Kumaun. Barker, the first convert, a student in a mission school, was baptized Nov. 3, 1861, and Wilson, an orphan boy, was baptized soon afterwards. Two years later, after Thoburn's wife had died and he went to America to put his baby in the care of relatives, he took Wilson with him.

These un-Indian names were given to the converts because the missionaries of the day thought it necessary that there be no suggestion of non-Christian beliefs in names. Those chosen frequently honored friends in America who were interested in the missions. Both of these young men became catechists and eventually were admitted to annual conference membership and ordained, Wilson in 1887 and Barker in 1890.

While serving as catechists they were both admitted to a class of medical training taught by James L. Humphrey for ten women and six men. Their examining committee declared they had acquired "a practical knowledge of medicine and surgery quite equal to the generality of locally trained native doctors." Both men throughout their ministry sought to combine service to the sick with the preaching of the Gospel. "Dr." Wilson conducted a clinic in Bhot on the border of NEPAL, close to Tibet, and occasionally went on tours in both of those lands in which missionaries were not allowed to reside. It is reported that a number of people of both countries to whom he had ministered in his clinic and on tours became believers in Christ and that he baptized a score or more of them. He was the first evangelist resident in Bhot.

BARKER, JOSEPH (1806-1875), erratic British Methodist, was born in Bramley, Leeds, May 11, 1806. He joined the METHODIST NEW CONNEXION in his youth and became a minister in 1829. He quickly gained popularity as a preacher, but constantly slighted authority. At the 1841 conference he was expelled for denying the validity of BAPTISM and the LORD'S SUPPER, and for seeking to establish a book room in competition with the denominational BOOK ROOM. His popularity caused a loss to the connection in the next year of 29 societies and 4,348 members. He became a Unitarian, and entered Radical politics in 1846. He was tried for sedition and acquitted in 1848. He went to America in 1851, where he became an atheist. He returned to England in 1860, was reconverted in 1863, and worked with the PRIMITIVE METHODISTS until his return to America shortly before his death on Sept. 15, 1875. His incomplete autobiography edited by his nephew is of great interest.

OLIVER A. BECKERLEGE

BARNABY, HORACE T. (1823-1917), American bishop of the UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST (OLD CONSTITUTION), was born in Allegheny Co., N. Y., April 26, 1823. His parents died when he was young and he drifted about among relatives. His formal education was slight, but he made good use of his intellectual faculties, serving as school teacher for fourteen years, studying law and serving in a justice court.

At the age of nineteen, in Hillsdale Co., Mich., he was converted in a M. P. CHURCH, joined the church, and was licensed to preach. Moving to Gratiot Co., Mich., he became acquainted with the Church of the United Brethren in Christ and after affiliating, he filled appointments in schoolhouses and private homes. When weather permitted he held grove meetings. In this pioneer work he traveled long distances on foot, forded streams, followed Indian trails and often carried a gun for protection from bears and wolves. Later he moved to Gaines Township, Kent Co., Mich. where he purchased a timbered tract, cleared away the forest and built his home. He resided there the remainder of his life.

He was married four times: Lydia Ann Williams; Jane Franklin; Susan Franklin; and Sophia J. Abbey. He was the father of six sons and four daughters.

He served missions, circuits and pastorates for a total of fifteen years, and was presiding elder at intervals for another fifteen years. He was a member of every GENERAL CONFERENCE from 1869 to and including 1905. He was elected bishop in 1889, when he was 66 years of age, serving sixteen years in that capacity.

He was assistant to Bishop MILTON WRIGHT in the legal litigation to control church property. It was through the leadership and wisdom of Bishop Barnaby that the courts awarded the church property in the state of MICHIGAN to the Church of the United Brethren in Christ (Old Constitution). He selected the attorney and instructed him respecting the fine points of the case, so that a favorable decision was rendered in spite of the decisions in other states. His leadership in the period of reconstruction following the division of 1889 was noteworthy.

He loved children and made friends readily. As a preacher, his sermons were biblical, informational, inspirational, and theological. The illustrations he used were numerous, drawn from the common scenes of life out of his broad background. Frequently he was involved in debates on biblical and theological themes, but always seems to have come out ahead.

He died at the Barnaby homestead at Gaines, Mich., March 1, 1917, when he was nearly 94 years old. The funeral was in the Gaines Church near his home, and burial was in the cemetery near the church.

BARNES, ISAAC A. (1857-1944), American preacher and conference historian, was born in Marion County, W. Va., Aug. 28, 1857, the son of Isaac N. and Margaret (Holland) Barnes. He was educated at Fairmont State College, West Virginia University (B.A.), WESTMINSTER THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, and KANSAS CITY UNIVERSITY. The latter school awarded him the D.D. degree. He married Margaret A. Linn, June 16, 1880, and they had three sons and two daughters. He joined the WEST VIRGINIA CONFERENCE (MP) about 1880 and over the next twenty-two years served eight charges, including Morgantown, Newburg, and Grafton. A leader in the conference, he served as secretary five years and president one year. In 1902 he transferred to the Pittsburgh Conference (MP) and was stationed at Second Church, PITTSBURGH. About 1917 he retired, moved back to West Virginia, and entered public school work, first as a teacher, then as a member of the board of education, and later as superintendent of schools. In 1928 his name reappeared in the minutes of the West Virginia Conference (MP), and after unification in 1939, he was a retired member of the West Virginia Conference, The Methodist Church. Barnes was the author of several books of sermons, and in 1926 he published The Methodist Protestant Church in West Virginia. During the last several years of his life he was a weekly contributor to church publications and to his home town newspaper in Fairmont. He died Sept. 26, 1944, and was buried in Bentons Ferry, W. Va.

He was one of the first Y.M.C.A. missionaries who journeyed to CHINA in the early part of the century, and served as general secretary of that organization there for a number of years. In 1941 he became the executive secretary of the Y.M.C.A. International Committee with headquarters in New York, retiring from this post in 1953. He is survived by three sons, each of whom has taken a prominent part in commercial and political dealings with East Asian matters; and by one daughter, Mrs. Fred S. Chultheis. Dr. Barnett made his home in White Plains, N. Y., during his long and effective tenure of the general secretaryship of the International Y.M.C.A.

BARRATT, PHILLIP (1730-1784), American landowner and colonial leader, was the youngest son of Phillip Barratt, planter of BOHEMIA MANOR, Cecil Co., Md. Barratt's birth is recorded by Richard Sewell of the Church of England, rector of St. Stephens Parish Church, Cecil Co., Md., as Oct. 12, 1730. His father died in Aug., 1733, and later his mother married Joseph Price, a farmer of Kent Co., Del. She and her two sons, Phillip and Roger, subsequently resided on the tract of land upon which BARRATT'S CHAPEL was erected. It was in this manner that Phillip Barratt became a Delawarean.

In 1775, Phillip Barratt married Marian Sipple, daughter of Waitman Sipple. Barratt was commissioned High Sheriff of Kent Co., Oct. 6, 1775 and served until Sept., 1779, when he was elected a member of the State Assembly, representing Kent Co., where he served until 1782. His land holdings consisted of some 800 acres. He also owned two sloops, the "Friendship" of twenty tons and the "Dolphin" of fifteen tons. In 1780, Phillip Barratt, in cooperation with his father-in-law, Waitman Sipple, took the lead in erecting Barratt's Chapel. Barratt contributed the land upon which the Chapel stands.

WILLIAM O. HACKETT

BARRATT'S CHAPEL, "The Cradle of Methodism" in America, is located ten miles south of Dover, the capital city of DELAWARE, on state route 113. The brick church exterior remains the same as when constructed in 1780, and sits back among the trees a little distance from the road. Minor changes have been made in the interior.

A society of Methodists, who were instrumental in building the chapel, was organized in 1778 under the influence of FREEBORN GARRETTSON. In May of 1780 PHILLIP BARRATT, a member of this first society, contributed a plot of ground to the society with the understanding that they would build a preaching house thereon. A two-story brick church was started immediately. Suspicion attached to the patriotism of the Methodists during the Revolution caused considerable opposition to the erection of the church within the neighborhood. When the church was under construction, a gentleman of the region predicted it was much too big for the Methodists: "It is unnecessary to build such a house, for by the time the war is over, a corn-crib will hold them all."

That same Fall the church building was ready for occupancy and was dedicated as Barratt's Chapel. It was the first church built in Kent County by the Methodists, and one of the first erected in Delaware. For two generations it remained in an unfinished condition—with dirt floors and no heat; yet, with all its limitations, at its completion it was recognized as the Cathedral of Methodism because it was the best "meeting house" in America belonging to the Methodists.

On Nov. 14, 1784 a quarterly meeting was held at Barratt's Chapel. THOMAS COKE and RICHARD WHATCOAT, who had just arrived from England, proceeded to conduct services, Asbury arriving after the service began. Among the preachers present were Samuel McGAW, a clergyman of the Church of England; FRANCIS ASBURY, Caleb B. Pedicord, Joseph Hartley, Freeborn Garrettson, JAMES CROMWELL, JOHN DICKINS. Coke, assisted by Whatcoat, administered the sacrament of the LORD'S SUPPER to five or six hundred communicants, the first such observance conducted by authorized Methodist ministers in North America. On this same date, Coke and Asbury together made plans for the now historic CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE. Freeborn Garrettson was sent "like an arrow" to call the conference together for a meeting at LOVELY LANE Meeting House in Baltimore, Md., on Dec. 24, 1784.

EZEKIEL COOPER says of the November meeting, "While Coke was preaching, Asbury came into the congregation. A solemn pause and deep silence took place at the close of the sermon as an interval for introduction and salutation. Asbury and Coke, with hearts full of brotherly love, approached, embraced, and saluted each other. The other preachers at the same time were melted into sympathy and tears. The congregation caught the glowing emotion, and the whole assembly, as if struck with a shock of heavenly electricity, burst into a flood of tears. Every heart appeared overflowing with love and fellowship, and an ecstasy of joy and gladness ensued. I can never forget the affecting scene."

Long after, in 1815, Bishop Asbury for the last time, in great feebleness, preached in that chapel. Judge Andrew Barratt, the son of Phillip, was present and invited the bishop to dine, remarking, "Oh, I know that my father and mother thought more of him than any man upon earth, and well does it become their son to respect him."

Today, Barratt's Chapel is owned and maintained by the PENINSULA CONFERENCE Historical Society. In 1964 a museum and curator's residence was constructed. A full-time curator is assigned to this work.

JOSEPH P. BARTÁK

BARTÁK, JOSEPH PAUL (1887-1964), superintendent of CZECHOSLOVAKIA, was born in Sedlon, Bohemia, on Dec. 25, 1887. During his youth he came to the U.S.A. and studied theology in Georgetown, Tex., and also in VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY. Later he received the honorary Th.D. from SOUTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY, Georgetown, Texas. From 1914-21 he was pastor of a Czech congregation in CHICAGO.

After the first World War he returned to Czechoslovakia as a missionary, evangelist, and cofounder of the Methodist Church in Czechoslovakia. After a few interruptions from 1941 to 1946, when he was forced by the Germans to leave the country, he worked again in Czechoslovakia up to 1950 as a leader of the church. Bishop Harmon writes: "When Bishop PAUL N. GARBER, in charge of the Geneva Area, appointed Barták to go back and take up again the work in Czechoslovakia—at that time under heavy anti-Christian threat because of the post-war troubles, and because he had suffered imprisonment for his faith—and when we who were with him expressed our concern, he straightened up and said simply: 'Well, they can never take sixty-two years of my life from me.' He went to his station utterly unafraid." He also served the church in a Czech congregation in Vienna. He retired in due time and died in 1964 at his daughter's home in Georgia. He is the author of John Huss at Constance (Nashville: Cokesbury Press, 1935).

BARTON, JOHN WYNNE (1892-1936), American layman, publisher and educator, was born at Overton, Texas, on Oct. 25, 1892, and earned degrees at Trinity College, Texas, and Columbia University. He was awarded the honorary LL.D. by Trinity College in 1927.

He was professor of history and economics at Trinity in 1914-15 and was in the same department and acting dean of SOUTHERN METHODIST UNIVERSITY at Dallas from 1915 to 1917. He was for six months the assistant director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance during World War I. He was in the wholesale mercantile business in Dallas in 1919, and organized and was the first dean of the Dallas School of Commerce.

In 1922 he became a Publishing Agent of the M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH, at Nashville, Tenn. He resigned in 1926 and became vice president of Ward Belmont School for Girls, becoming president after 1933.

Barton was a private and then captain in the U. S. Army in 1917-18 and spent one year in France with the American Expeditionary Force. After returning and moving to Nashville, he was trustee of SCARRITT COLLEGE, MEHARRY MEDICAL COLLEGE, and Vanderbilt University Hospital, president of the Community Chest, and the American Association of Junior Colleges. He was a lay delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1922 when thirty years old; later at the 1930 Conference he served on its Committee on Episcopacy. That Committee, having before it Bishop JAMES CANNON, JR., under accusation for having dealt improperly in the stock market, was beset by reporters endeavoring to get news bearing on the nationally watched "Cannon Case." John Barton was made the Committee's guard at the door, and those present will always remember his big figure seated firmly in the doorway and making all reporters stay out of earshot. He died in the prime of life at Nashville on Sept. 2, 1936.

BARTON, LOUIS S. (1869-1953), American minister, was born June 30, 1869 near Falcon, Ark. His father having died in 1872, the family made several moves before young Barton reached manhood. In the fall of 1888 he went to Celeste, Texas to attend school and the following summer he and his mother moved to Kingston, Texas where he taught school at rural Prosperity. In 1891 he attended the University of Texas to study law. Passing the bar examination he went to NEW MEXICO to practice law but soon returned to Texas. Attending a camp meeting at Harrel's Camp-ground he was so profoundly moved that he determined to give up the law and become a Methodist preacher.

He was received on trial in 1893 at the NORTH TEXAS ANNUAL CONFERENCE and served several small charges. On Dec. 28, 1893 he married Miss Maude Spaulding of Kingston, Texas. In 1898 he moved to Nashville, Tenn. to attend VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY. In 1899 he returned to his Conference in Texas and served successfully four appointments. He was Conference Evangelist, then PRESIDING ELDER of the Decatur District, 1907-12, then Commissioner of Education for the North Texas Conference.

In 1914 he came to Boston Avenue Church in TULSA where he served eight years. His wife died July 4, 1918. In November, 1919, he was appointed Chaplain in the U.S. Army and served a year in France before returning to Tulsa in September, 1920, in the East Oklahoma Conference. In 1929 the D.D. degree was conferred upon him by SOUTHERN METHODIST UNIVERSITY. In 1930 he was appointed to St. Paul's Church in Muskogee. While here he was a delegate to the Universal Conference on Life and Work at Oxford and the important Conference on Faith and Order in Edinburgh. BASCOM, HENRY BIDLEMAN (1796-1850), American educator, author, and bishop, was born May 27, 1796 in Hancock, N. Y.

Converted when he was fifteen years old, he was licensed to preach by the OHIO CONFERENCE in 1813. His early ministry was spent in the Ohio, TENNESSEE, and KENTUCKY CONFERENCES.

In 1823 he was elected chaplain of the U. S. Congress, by nomination of Henry Clay. During his chaplaincy in 1823-1826, he preached in MARYLAND, VIRGINIA, and PENNSYLVANIA, and became regarded as Methodism's outstanding pulpit orator.

In 1827, after serving pastorates in Pittsburgh and Uniontown, Pa., he was chosen president of Madison College, Uniontown. He served until he became agent for the American Colonization Society in 1829.

Returning to the educational field in 1832, he was named professor of moral science at AUGUSTA COLLEGE in Kentucky. Ten years later he became president of Transylvania University, Lexington. In the last year of his presidency he was elected editor of the newly formed Southern Methodist Quarterly Review. Election was by the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1846, at which conference the M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH was formally organized.

HENRY B. BASCOM

Henry Bascom took an active part in the struggle between Northern and Southern delegates in the General Conference of 1844, presenting the South's arguments in his well-known forensic and colorful manner.

His writings revealed his ability as an ecclesiastical statesman. His leadership during the trying period of division was recognized with his election in 1850 as a bishop of the church. He lived to preside over only one annual conference, held in St. Louis, Mo., in 1850.

While serving as editor of the Southern Methodist Quarterly, he published two works: Methodism and Slavery, and Sermons in two volumes. A four-volume set of his Works was published posthumously in 1855.

He died Sept. 8, 1850, having left an indelible mark on Methodism as a teacher, administrator, and orator.

BASEL (or Basle), Switzerland, the second largest city of the country, with a population of 212,800, of whom 58.8 percent are Protestant and 36.7 percent Roman Catholic, is situated close to the French and German frontiers. Erasmus of Rotterdam (1466-1536) lived in Basel for several years and lies buried in the cathedral. Under Erasmus the University of Basel, the oldest in Switzerland, became one of the great European centers of humanism.

The first Methodist services here were held by LOUIS NIFFERT in 1860, in the house of an Englishman, Dr. Marriott. Soon a congregation was organized and a church built at the Wall-Strasse. The first Quarterly Meeting, held in 1862, reported 140 members and two Sunday schools, with twenty teachers and 180 children. In spite of many difficulties, and even some persecution, the work expanded. A new church was erected in 1963 at the General Guisan-Strasse. In 1964 a new church building was completed at Kleinbasel, a section of the city, in connection with an important home for about eighty old people, the Wesley House. The Allschwilerplatz Church includes another home for about sixteen elderly persons. By 1966 there were five churches reported, having a total membership of more than a thousand members. Many sessions of the Switzerland Annual Conference have been held in this beautiful city, which was also the birthplace of Bishop FRANZ SCHIAFER.

BASHFORD, JAMES WHITFORD (1849-1919), American bishop and foreign missionary administrator, was born at Fayette, Wis., on May 29, 1849. He was graduated from the University of Wisconsin with the B.A. and M.A. degrees. He received the Ph.D. from BOSTON UNIVERSITY. His honorary doctorates came from NORTHWESTERN, WESLEYAN, and Wisconsin Universities.

He was ordained to the ministry of the M. E. CHURCH in 1878 and served pastorates at Harrison Square in BOSTON, Jamaica Plain and Auburndale in MASSACHUSETTS; PORTLAND, Me.; and BUFFALO, N. Y. In 1904 he became president of OHIO WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY and was elected bishop in the same year. He held conferences in the United States until 1906 and after that date he was identified with CHINA and became an outstanding bishop in that vast mission field.

He directed the China Centennial Thank-offering in 1907 and 1908 and raised $600,000 for missionary work in China. He assisted in organizing famine relief measures there. He was a delegate to the WORLD MISSIONARY CONFERENCE at Edinburgh in 1918. He was the author of Outline of the Science of Religion, The Awakening of China, China and Methodism, God's Missionary Plan for the World, China, an Interpretation, and Oregon Missions. He died at Pasadena, Calif., on March 18, 1919 and was buried in Delaware, Ohio.

BASS, WILLIAM CAPERS (1831-1894), American college president, was born in Augusta, Ga., Jan. 13, 1831, the son of Henry and Amelia (Love) Bass. He was educated in Cokesbury School in South Carolina and EMORY COLLEGE in Georgia. He abandoned plans to become a lawyer in order to enter the ministry, but to pay school debts he became a teacher, in which profession he remained until his death. He married Octavia Nickelson of Greensboro, Ga. in July, 1854.

In 1859 he left his professorship of natural science at the Female College in Madison, Ga. to become professor in that field at WESLEYAN in Macon, Ga. In 1874 he became Wesleyan's president, which position he held until his resignation in 1894.

Bass was not officially connected with the church until he was admitted on trial in the SOUTH GEORGIA CONFERENCE of the M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH in 1867, but he had preached with regularity since 1852 on a license to preach granted him by the quarterly conference of the Greensboro Circuit in Greene Co., Ga. During his tenure at Wesleyan he preached once a month at each of three rural churches near his home.

A biographer writes of him that he was "universally recognized not only as one of the best educators in the South, but as an eloquent preacher and a finished gentleman."

He died in Macon, Ga., Nov. 15, 1894.

ANCEL H. BASSETT

BASSETT, ANCEL H. (1809-1886), American minister, editor, book agent and historian, was one of the founders of the Western Book Concern of the M. P. CHURCH. For over forty years he was a member of every general conference except one and of the M. P. historic Union Convention held in Baltimore in 1877.

Ansel Bassett was born in Massachusetts, on July 1, 1809, the son of Elihu and Abigail Bassett. When he was one year old his parents moved to CINCINNATI, Ohio. In 1821 he joined the M. E. CHURCH and joined the forces within this church that were advocating more lay representation in the church government. In 1828 he withdrew from the M. E. Church to join the newly-organized M. P. Church and in 1830 he joined the OHIO ANNUAL CONFERENCE of that church. He then served as assistant preacher on the Muskingum Circuit with William Reeves (see HANNAH PEARCE REEVES). He was for seven successive years secretary of the Ohio Conference, and in the 1840's he served for five years as president. He took charge of The Western Recorder, a M. P. publication at Zanesville, Ohio, in 1845, and for ten years he conducted this paper as an individual enterprise under the patronage of the various western conferences. In 1854 the Recorder became the official organ of the entire north and west and Bassett was unanimously elected both editor and book agent. He was publishing agent from 1860-64 and again from 1871-72, when he retired.

In 1842 Bassett prepared an account of the growth of the M. P. Church in the west for The Methodist Protestant, the official denominational publication. Because of his strong opposition to slavery, he favored the split of the denomination which occurred at the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1858 at Lynchburg, Va. He then served as a delegate from the Ohio Conference to the convention of delegates from the northern and western conferences which met in Springfield, Ohio, in 1858, and delivered the address at the laying of the cornerstone of the Book Concern Building in Springfield in 1860. He helped compile a Hymn Book which was published in 1860 by authority of the northern and western conferences of the M. P. Church. At the request of the General Conference of 1875 he wrote A Concise History of the Methodist Protestant Church, a valuable contribution to ecclesiastical history. This work was published in 1877 and revised editions appeared in 1882 and 1887. He was appointed by the General Conference of 1880 to serve on a committee to prepare The Tribute of Praise, a new hymnal.

On Aug. 27, 1837, he married Priscilla White, daughter of Robert White. Ansel Bassett died on Aug. 30, 1886, in Springfield, Ohio, and was buried in Fern Cliff Cemetery in Springfield.

RALPH HARDEE RIVES

BASSETT, RICHARD (1754-1815), American layman, prominent governmental and judicial figure, and long-time friend of Bishop FRANCIS ASBURY, was born in Cecil Co., Md., April 2, 1745. He was one of the most able leaders of the Revolutionary era, and did much to further the work of the early Methodist Church.

He first met Bishop Asbury in 1778. There was some coolness at first, but the two men later came to be close friends. The conversion of Mrs. Bassett influenced Bassett also to unite with the Methodist Church. Wesley Chapel, first Methodist church in Dover, Del., built in 1784, was made possible by Bassett's generous pledge to underwrite half the cost.

The Bassett home, BOHEMIA MANOR, was always open to itinerant Methodist preachers. Bishop WHATCOAT died there in 1806. Many early circuit riders preached at the log chapel Bassett built on his estate.

Beginning with his service as a Captain with the Dover Light Horse during the Revolution, Bassett devoted a lifetime to service in state and national government. He served DELAWARE as governor, legislator, and judge. He helped draft the Delaware constitution. On the national level, Bassett was a U. S. Senator from 1789 to 1793; an elector in 1797; and a delegate to the 1787 Constitutional Convention. As Senator, Bassett cast the first vote favoring making Washington the nation's capital.

From 1801 until his death Sept. 15, 1815, Bassett was judge of the Third District U. S. Circuit Court.

Who Was Who in America, 1607-1898. ELMER T. CLARK

BAST, ANTON (1867-1937), Danish minister, social worker, and bishop, was born at Lokken, Denmark, on Sept. 8, 1867. His parents were the cobbler, Nicolai Thommesen Bast, and his wife, Dorthea Marie Kjeldsen. Originally Anton Bast was a fisherman, but very soon the church became aware of his talents for leadership. He was one of two young men who became students at the newly erected theological school at COPENHAGEN in 1888. In 1890 he was sent to Vejle, where he rebuilt and enlarged the church. He was ordained deacon in 1892, and elder in 1894, by Bishop J. P. NEWMAN.

After six rich years at Vejle, Anton Bast was appointed to Odense where except for a single year (1904-05) at Randers, he remained until 1906. The Methodist work grew greatly during those years. Another church was built so that there were two large churches when, in 1906, Anton Bast took over the Jerusalem Church in Copenhagen.

In Copenhagen he founded, in 1910, the Central Mission, a social-philanthropic project to which several institutions, especially for children, were later attached. He was known across Denmark as "the minister of the poor." His worship services and meetings were crowded.

At the GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M. E. CHURCH in 1920 Bast was elected bishop—the first Scandinavian to be so elected. The General Conference allowed him to continue as leader of the Central Mission in Copenhagen. His name was exposed to criticism within Jerusalem Church when a small group charged him with being dishonest in money matters. The police brought an action against him, and on March 19, 1926, he was convicted on the widely questioned proof of one of the counts of indictment. A jury pronounced him guilty.

Previously he had been released from his services as a bishop, and his work taken over by Bishops EDGAR BLAKE and JOHN E. NUELSEN, who divided the episcopal supervision between them.

A trial committee was appointed at the General Conference in 1928 to look into the Bast Case, as it came to be called, and of this Bishop FRANCIS J. MCCONNELL was presiding officer. Fred D. Stone represented the Church and Dorr F. Diefendorf represented the defendant. Anton Bast was permanently suspended from the episcopacy, but not deposed from the ministry, and the General Conference ordered the payment of $800 to him to cover his expenses to and from the Conference, and also $75 per month until he should receive an appointment in his own annual conference or enter other employment. At the Danish Annual Conference the same year, he withdrew from the conference and from the Methodist Church.

In 1892, Anton Bast married Marie Dorthea Micheelsen from Vejle. She died on May 15, 1920. On March 1, 1932, he married Signe Jensen from Copenhagen. He died in Copenhagen on April 23, 1937, and was buried in the Vestre Kirkegaard Cemetery there.

BASTAR, India, is a large district in the Southeastern part of Madhya Pradesh. During British rule it was a state governed by a Rajah under treaty arrangement with the British government. The Rajahs are said to be descended from a Kshatriya prince who, in the fourteenth century, fled from Warangul in the area of Hyderabad to escape from Moslem conquerors and established himself among the aboriginal tribesmen of the territory. In 1892 Charles B. Ward, a missionary of the M. E. CHURCH, received permission to open the first Christian mission in the state. Ward had been a pioneer Methodist missionary in the Telugu-speaking area of Hyderabad State, in Secunderabad and Yellandu, and earlier had organized an English-speaking congregation at Bellary farther south.

At Yellandu, while helping to support an orphanage by supervising construction jobs for the Nizam's state railways, he came into contact with aboriginal laborers from Bastar State and learned of their extreme poverty, illiteracy, superstition, and idolatry. He became eager to visit Bastar and learn more about them and their country. Selecting several colleagues to accompany him he went to Bastar, walking over 700 miles on the round trip. He visited the capital, Jagdalpur, and met a number of state officials. The state was then under the court of wards, the Rajah had died and the heir apparent was only eight years old. Before leaving the state, he met A. H. L. Fraser, who was supervising the court of wards administration of Bastar, and told of his desire to open a mission in the state.

With Fraser's help, Ward obtained a free grant of 1,300 acres of land adjoining the capital for the work of the mission. He proposed to establish a church, homes for a superintendent and several ministers, schools for boys and girls, homes for teachers, farms for growing food, and such other institutions or efforts as he thought would be helpful to the people.

On May 14, 1893, Dr. and Mrs. W. H. Batstone, Canadians, arrived in Jagdalpur as the first resident missionaries in the state. Ward had personally led in constructing a humble temporary home for them. It was 300 miles from the nearest other Methodist missionary home. It burned two years later.

There are two main aboriginal tribes in Bastar State. They have been given various names, but are now commonly designated as Muria and Maria Gonds. The Murias live in the mountainous regions of the state, the Marias in the plains. Both groups call themselves Kois or Koiwars.

Various American missionaries and Indians have served as superintendents or educators in Bastar State, residing in Jagdalpur and extending their service to all parts of the state. The Christian community numbered 6,103 in 1964. The Jagdalpur schools for boys and girls have been combined in one co-educational school. The enrollment in 1964 was 301 boys and 290 girls.

An Anglo-Indian veteran, C. K. Gilder, was the first district superintendent. He lived in Raipur. The next superintendent was Charles Ward, resident at Yellandu. Raipur was separated. Another Anglo-Indian, William Plumley, served helpfully, first as a lay missionary, and later as an official of the state government.

Among missionaries from abroad who have rendered especially effective service were three unmarried women, Ethel Ruggles, ardent evangelist; Helen Fehr, noted educator now serving in PAKISTAN; and S. Stumpf, the first representative of the WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY, who in December, 1905, after three years of pleading, was appointed to Jagdalpur. She died in Jagdalpur thirteen months later. Among the men, there was William Taylor Ward, then unmarried, son of C. B. Ward, founder of Methodism in the area. Other men who were ably assisted by their wives were: Frank R. Felt, Frank D. Campbell, J. W. and Ray Lanham, father and son, and O. M. Auner.

Of Indian men and women there were Gandu Chandayya, an orphan brought in by C. B. Ward from Yelland; J. C. Bhan Singh, a graduate of the Leonard Theological College; Miss L. Bose, an educator of Bengali background; Bin Bhajit, one of the aboriginal inhabitants; and Maria Gond, who had been a leader in animistic religious rites and found reality and transforming grace in Christ.

Another missionary was Mrs. Benjamin Chew, who remained in India after the death of her husband and served as companion to the Rani Sahiba and tutor to her children. She helped the church in every possible way.

BASTION, NICHOLAS S., American minister and a founder of Iowa Methodism, joined the ILLINOIS ANNUAL CONFERENCE of the M. E. CHURCH on trial in 1832 and served the Lebanon and Sangamon Circuit. Admitted to full connection in 1834, he was appointed to the first regular pastoral charge in Iowa at Dubuque. Here he labored against opposition, and dealt realistically with tough, drunken frontiersmen. He organized not only a Sunday school, but also opened a day school in a log cabin. In 1835 he gave up pastoral work and moved his school to Catfish Gap where he had great influence upon the Indians, who called him "Big Father." Readmitted to the Conference in 1838, he started a new mission in Burlington. A "begging tour" of the east to finance the work was a failure, but he helped plan the construction of "Old Zion" Church, Burlington. In 1838 he became principal of the Preparatory Department of MCKENDREE COLLEGE, founded in 1828. From 1839-48, he filled various appointments in Illinois, particularly as presiding elder of the Danville District (1844-48). Transferred to the LIBERIA Missionary Conference in Africa in 1849, he acted as presiding officer of its 1850 annual conference. In 1851 he returned to Illinois.

However, Waring, an historian of Iowa Methodism, states that Bastion became dissatisfied with his baptism, and as a further account has it: "Dissatisfied with the Methodists, he joined the Baptist group. He served the congregation in Dubuque, Iowa and was at the First Baptist Church, Davenport 1856-58 when he was appointed Financial Agent of the Iowa Baptist State Conference. He then disappeared from the ecclesiastical scene." "Fair talents, but eccentric and given to change" was the contemporary summary of his personality.

BASTROP MILITARY INSTITUTE, founded in 1857 at Bastrop, Texas, was incorporated on Jan. 19, 1858, by the TEXAS CONFERENCE of the M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH. Earlier, in 1851, Bastrop Academy had opened its first session under the jurisdiction of the Methodist Church also. In 1857 the Academy was divided, the female department being designated as Bastrop Female Academy, and the male department as the Bastrop Military Institute. R. T. P. Allen, educator from KENTUCKY, was chosen by the board of trustees which had been appointed by the Texas Conference. The school had two divisions, preparatory and collegiate, the latter being a course of four years. Sam Houston, Jr. was one of the many distinguished students who attended the Institute. His studies were, however, interrupted by the outbreak of the War between the States, and he entered the Confederate Army in 1861, as did Superintendent Allen, who became a Colonel of the 17th Texas Infantry.

Texas pioneers considered the Bastrop Military Institute an educational oasis in the desert, where students came from Texas colonies to the south, east, and west, and also from many other states. Closed during the Civil War, it was reopened in September 1867, under the superintendency of Major J. G. James.

In September 1868, the name was changed to the Texas Military Institute and it was moved to Austin, Tex., on June 10, 1870, where it became nonsectarian, although religious in nature, and the private property of J. W. Whipple. It operated successfully until 1879 when John Garland James, the president, and faculty were all employed by the Agricultural and Mechanical College of Texas.

BATCHELOR, LITTLEBERRY WATTS, M.D. (1823-1885), American physician, planter, local minister and lay leader in the M. P. CHURCH was born Jan. 13, 1823, and lived at Brinkleyville and later Enfield, Halifax Co., N. C. He was the son of James Watts Batchelor and Mary Lane Batchelor and he attended the Bingham School, Hillsboro, N. C., and afterwards studied medicine in PHILADELPHIA. He located in his native county where he was actively identified with the Democratic Party, served for many years as a justice of the peace and as a member of the old County Court. He was for many years an active member of the Bethesda M. P. Church at Brinkleyville, and many of the students enrolled at ELBA FEMALE SEMINARY, operated by WILLIAM HENRY WILLS and JESSE H. PACE, roomed and boarded at Batchelor's home.

Batchelor served as treasurer of the North Carolina Conference Superannuated Fund Society which was organized in 1848, and for a while was agent of MADISON COLLEGE and served as a trustee of Logan Female Seminary, later JAMESTOWN FEMALE COLLEGE. He was appointed to serve on the Conference Committee on Publishing Interests in 1862. He was a delegate to the (M.P.) GENERAL CONFERENCES of 1862, 1866, 1874, and 1880 and the Uniting Conference of the M. P. Church which was held in Baltimore in May, 1877. He represented Halifax in the North Carolina Secession Convention which assembled in Raleigh on May 20, 1861. A handwritten tribute to Batchelor by W. C. Whitaker, found among the minutes of the old Roanoke Circuit of the North Carolina Conference, reads, in part: "He was true to every trust committed to his care . . . all who knew him called him good. . . . Financially he suffered much from his liberality . . . As a member of Zion he was true to our doctrine and discipline both as a private and an official member." He was cited as "an incorruptible, pure, and upright Christian citizen."

He died Jan. 4, 1885.

BATDORF, GRANT D. (1874-1954). American E.U.B. bishop, son of William and Amelia (Sattazahn) Batdorf, was born April 30, 1874, at Lickdale, Pa., and died Sept. 21, 1954, at Dayton, Ohio. Following public school, he attended Schuylkill Seminary; Millersville State Teacher's College (B.E., 1893); Bonebrake (now UNITED) THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY (B.D., 1898); ILLINOIS WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY (Ph.B., 1902; Ph.D., 1910). He received an honorary D.D. from OTTERBEIN COLLEGE (1921) and an honorary LL.D. from LEBANON VALLEY COLLEGE (1936).

On April 25, 1894, having been converted as a youth, he joined Union Salem Church, United Brethren in Christ, north of Fredericksburg, Pa. Licensed to preach in 1896, he was received into the East Pennsylvania Conference in 1897 and ordained Oct. 5, 1898. He served several East Pennsylvania pastorates before going to First Church, DAYTON, OHIO, in 1920. Nine years later he was elected bishop and was thrice re-elected to four year terms. The church's age limit for bishops made him ineligible for re-election in 1945. Prior to becoming a bishop, he had been a member of the GENERAL CONFERENCES of 1917, 1921, 1925.

His election as bishop in 1929 kept him from becoming president of Bonebrake Theological Seminary where he lectured in homiletics and was business manager while pastor of First Church.

His interests went beyond his denomination. He took active roles in the FEDERAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and after 1941 in the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. He served long terms as president of the Pennsylvania Council of Churches, the Anti-Saloon League of Pennsylvania, and the Temperance League of America.

The author of two books, The Pastor, the Pivotal Man and Jesus' Money Gospel, he co-authored a Progressive Teacher-Training Text and wrote numerous articles and sermons for Protestant journals.

BATES, LAWRENCE WEBSTER (1819-1901), distinguished M. P. clergyman, administrator and editor, held all the prominent appointments in the MARYLAND ANNUAL CONFERENCE of his denomination, served as president of the Annual Conference in 1860-1861, president of the GENERAL CONFERENCE in 1874 and of the General Convention of 1877, which last consummated the union of the Methodist (a M. P. body) and the M. P. CHURCHES. He also served as the first president of the Christian Endeavor of the M. P. Church.

He was born in Burlington Co., N. J., on Nov. 10, 1819, converted in June, 1830, licensed to preach on Jan. 18, 1840, and joined the Maryland Conference (MP) in April of that year. Two years later he was ordained as deacon and in 1844 as elder. Bates was the editor of the METHODIST PROTESTANT in 1862-63 and 1872-73. He wrote a popular tract entitled Old Moses, which was published by the Tract Society. In 1868 he received the D.D. degree from Pennsylvania College, Gettysburg. Bates was elected as an alternate delegate to the General Conference of 1854 and was an official representative at the General Conferences of 1862, 1864, 1866, 1870, and 1874. He was a member of the General Conventions of 1867 and 1877. He was chosen to serve as president of the General Conference of 1874 and was elected by that body to serve as one of the commissioners on church union and chairman of the commission of the M. P. and Methodist Churches. On May 17, 1877, he was chosen to serve as the president of the General Convention which met in Baltimore to reunite the M. P. and Methodist Churches. In an address given at this historic convention, Bates prophetically declared: "As it was our mission to take the initiative in establishing the doctrine of lay representation among Methodists, so today in reuniting our several members, we take the initiative in the glorious work of unification among such Churches of the land. They have followed us in that, may they also imitate us in this." Bates' greatest contribution to Methodism was the active role he played in uniting these two wings of Methodist Protestantism.

He died Jan. 17, 1901 and was buried at Nassawange Church, Worcester Co., Md.

BATES, LEWIS BENTON (1829-1909), American preacher and evangelist, was born at North Easton, Mass., on Nov. 26, 1829, the son of Lewis and Elizabeth (Webster) Bates. He was a descendant of martyr John Rogers, first white man to land at Hingham, Mass. His father, whose pastorate at one time covered all of Cape Cod, was an influential Methodist, ordained by ASBURY, and responsible for the conversion of fisher-boy ISAAC RICH, a founder of BOSTON UNIVERSITY.

Bates, a young shoemaker, began preaching at the age of seventeen; he joined the NEW ENGLAND CONFERENCE in 1851. During his lifetime he preached in all the New England states and in eighteen other states. For twenty-four years he was pastor of the Seaman's Bethel in East Boston. He was a popular evangelistic speaker. President ULYSSES S. GRANT stated that an address by Lewis Bates at MARTHA'S VINEYARD CAMPGROUND changed his life. Bates was one-time president of Asbury Grove Camp Meeting Association. He preached at South Hamilton, Mass. for forty consecutive years. In temperance reform he gave service. In addition, he was for five years chaplain of the Third Regiment of the Massachusetts Militia, and for one year chaplain of Bristol County Jail.

On June 12, 1851 he married Louisa D. Field. One of their five children, John Lewis Bates, became governor of Massachusetts (1904-1905) and president of the trustees of Boston University.

BATH, HENRY (1839-1916), Australian preacher of great power and superintendent of many circuits, was born near Truro in Cornwall on Sept. 25, 1839. His parents were Tristram and Susanna Bath, who came to Australia with Henry and two other children shortly afterwards. We know nothing of the boyhood of Henry Bath, except that he was converted at the age of fourteen, and became a carpenter until he was accepted as a candidate for the ministry by the SOUTH AUSTRALIAN CONFERENCE in 1859. There is no information concerning his school days, and there was no training given to him as a candidate for the ministry. Yet, his knowledge of the English language and his appreciation of English literature indicate that he learned to read widely. At the age of seventeen he was placed on trial as a LOCAL PREACHER in the ADELAIDE South Circuit. He served as a minister of the Wesleyan Conference of South Australia in Port Adelaide, Yankalilla, Strathalbyn, Mintaro and Kapunda, these last two appointments being in the region of the Burra mines, where there had been a great revival.

Apart from his first year at Port Adelaide he was always the superintendent of a circuit. In 1870 he was transferred to the VICTORIAN CONFERENCE and was appointed to Castlemaine. His subsequent circuits were Richmond, Sandhurst, Ballarat (Lydiard St.), Geelong (Yarra Street), Wesley Church (Melbourne), South Melbourne (Cecil Street), Williamstown, Hawthron, Auburn, Launceston, Clifton Hill, Bendigo (Forrest Street). In 1903 he returned to Richmond for a second term and in 1907 went to Lydiard Street, Ballarat, for his final appointment. He was president of the Conference in 1884, and in 1888 was absent for six months on a visit to England.

The importance of Henry Bath and his influence is everywhere related to his effectiveness as a preacher. He was a most dramatic preacher. The philosophy of life which underlay his preaching was that which sees the power of God and love of God working through all the manifold variety of the universe. He was a great reader and an energetic thinker. He knew the Bible, and Christ for him was central.

Highly endowed with natural gifts, he disciplined his mind and toiled as though he had no gift at all. To secure breadth as well as depth he made frequent excursions into the realms of science, history and art. Early in his ministry he put himself through a stiff course of theology and philosophy. He had a noble presence, a commanding voice, a look which drew attention, and a singularly rich imagination. He was deeply concerned about the problems of human destiny, with the nature of the Church, and with the centrality of Jesus Christ.

The personality of Henry Bath was overpowering. He had a great influence upon the life and preaching experience of A. E. ALBISTON who has been referred to as "The Prince of Preachers."

He died in 1916 at Auburn and is buried in the Melbourne General Cemetery.

BATHURST, New South Wales, Australia. The first service by a Methodist missionary west of the Blue Mountains was conducted by WALTER LAWRY when he journeyed from Parramatta to Bathurst in October, 1820, to pay the first of two visits to this western settlement. Twelve years later, in October, 1832, JOSEPH ORTON, SAMUEL LEIGI's successor as General Superintendent of Missions in Australia, visited Bathurst and set up the nucleus of a Methodist organization in the district. A class meeting was formed at "Springfield" with William Tom as leader. Frederick Lewis was appointed to Bathurst as the first minister in 1836, and a chapel was built the following year. The first Methodist place of worship in the Western District was a temporary structure on a site at "Springfield" (later known as Byng) where open air services had been conducted at "Bethal Rock" by William Tom prior to the coming of Joseph Orton in 1832. A stone church replaced it in 1843. A church was built at ORANGE in 1849 and it became the head of a new circuit when it was separated from Bathurst in 1860. Two new circuits had already been created: Bowenfels (or Hartley) in 1852, and Turon in 1858. In 1855 Mudgee Circuit was formed from portion of the Bowenfels Circuit, other centers of which became part of Oberon Circuit (or Fish River). Bathurst and Orange are now centres of two important connexional districts of the NEW SOUTH WALES CONFERENCE.

BATON ROUGE, LOUISIANA, U.S.A. Methodism was brought to Baton Rouge in 1805 by Elisha D. Bowman. In 1810 the town became a preaching point on the Ope-lousas Circuit, Mississippi District, WESTERN CONFERENCE. Made a station in 1834 with CHARLES K. MARSHALL as pastor, it reported ninety-five white and six colored members the next year. In 1836 a church building was erected at Laurel and Church Streets. In 1860 when the church had 133 white and 133 black members, a second story and a spire were added to the building. When Federal troops occupied Baton Rouge in 1862, the Methodist church was closed to worship and the ground floor was used as a stable. The pastor, W. A. Croden, was arrested for praying for the Southern cause, taken to NEW ORLEANS as a prisoner of war, and was never heard of again. No more Southern Methodist preachers were appointed to Baton Rouge until 1866, when W. E. M. Linnfield came and led in renovating the church building and reviving the congregation. In that year the church reported only 76 white and no black members. The latter group withdrew to form what became Wesley M. E. Church, which in its first year reported 294 members, 241 probationers, and six local preachers. The MISSISSIPPI MISSION CONFERENCE (MEC), organized at New Orleans in December, 1865, appointed a preacher to Baton Rouge. The LOUISIANA CONFERENCE (MEC) which superseded the Mission Conference, had in Baton Rouge in 1939 four Negro churches with a total of 1,093 members.

FIRST CHURCH, BATON ROUGE

Prior to 1895 the M. E. Church, South had only one church in Baton Rouge. In that year it reported 353 members. Keener Memorial Church, organized in 1895, merged with First Church in 1935. First Church began rapid growth during World War I and had 2,792 members by 1939. Istrouma Church, the only other Southern congregation in the city, reported 543 members in 1939.

Baton Rouge's population increased during and after World War II, and by 1950 The Methodist Church had six white and four black congregations in the city with a total of 8,157 members. By 1969 there were 12 white and five black churches with aggregate memberships of 12,462 and 1,534, respectively. First Church (4,002), Broadmoor (2,418), and University (1,572) were the largest white congregations. Wesley, the largest Negro church, had about 500 members. The property value of the 17 churches in 1969 was $5,880,000, and they raised for all purposes during the year about $947,000.

Broadmoor Church was organized in 1955 with fifty-five members, J. P. Woodland pastor. The congregation grew rapidly—675 members in 1960; 1,583 in 1965; and 2,097 in 1967. Located in the largest suburban area of Baton Rouge, the church maintains a varied program of services and activities. The sanctuary, completed in 1967, is noted for its forty-five foot high chancel window of sculptured glass which was made in Chartres, France and depicts the crucifixion and resurrection. In 1970 Broadmoor Church reported 2,728 members, property valued at $1,057,140, and $117,173 raised for all purposes during the year.

First Church traces its history back to 1805. The congregation took the name of First Church in 1895 when a second Southern Methodist church was organized in the city. The church's first building was erected in 1836 at Laurel and Church Streets. In 1926, First Church relocated at the corner of North and East Boulevards. In 1950 a three-story youth building was completed, and in 1963 an adult center was added. In 1970 First Church reported 4,017 members, a plant valued at $1,537,418, an endowment of $2,250,000, and a total of $346,432 raised for all purposes during the year.

BATSTO, NEW JERSEY, U.S.A. Pleasant Mills Church, located between Batsto and Pleasant Mills, is one of the very old original Methodist buildings in the SOUTHERN NEW JERSEY CONFERENCE.

The history of the site of the building can be traced as far back as 1707 when Scottish exiles living at Pleasant Mills erected a chapel of hewn logs, clay, and dried grass in a sunrise-to-sunset-span of one day. This was replaced in 1760 by a log cabin erected under the leadership of a Captain Elijah Clark, a Presbyterian and an officer in the English Army in the French and Indian War. It was widely known as "Clark's Little Log Cabin Meeting House," and many prominent Presbyterians preached here including John Brainerd and his brother, David, and Philip V. Fithian.

The chief industry of the area was centered in the Iron Furnace conducted by the Richards family, who were prominent Methodists; and in 1799 Elizabeth Richards married THOMAS HASKINS, a leading Methodist of PHILADELPHIA and a close friend of FRANCIS ASBURY. By 1808 Methodists evidently dominated the area, for in that year Clark's Cabin was replaced by the present structure and in the following year it was dedicated by Francis Asbury.

From 1820 to 1830 Charles Pitman, presiding elder of West New Jersey, held quarterly conferences at Batsto-Pleasant Mills Church and often preached from an open wagon in the Grove to congregations numbering two to three thousand persons. Three lay ministers, buried in the graveyard of the church, served the church for a total of 150 years: Simon Lucas, Benjamin B. Doughty and Charles F. Green. Through the years, and even today, complications caused by the stipulations of early wills have created some difficulties concerning the supervision of the church.

In 1964 the structure was restored to its original state as nearly as this could be determined. Services are regularly conducted for the small congregation which about three times a year is greatly augmented when historical services are held. The church is somewhat hemmed in by a state forest on two sides, and a lake that borders the other two sides of the property.

BATTELLE, GORDON (1814-1862), American educator, preacher, and statesman, was born at Newport, Ohio, Nov. 14, 1814. A graduate of ALLEGHENY COLLEGE in 1840, he later received the D.D. degree from Ohio University. He taught in Methodist academies in Parkersburg and Clarksburg, W. Va. from 1840 to 1851, and then entered the pastorate. In the next ten years he served churches at Charleston and Wheeling and was presiding elder of the Clarksburg District four years and of the Wheeling District two years. He led the PITTSBURGH CONFERENCE delegation to the 1856 and 1860 GENERAL CONFERENCES. When VIRGINIA seceded, Battelle used all his powers to hold the western counties of the state loyal to the Union. Eight of the sixty-one members of the first West Virginia constitutional convention were Methodist preachers and three more were exhorters. It was claimed that the Methodists under Battelle's leadership literally "made West Virginia." In the convention Battelle served as chairman of the committee on education, and in that capacity he was responsible for inaugurating the first free school system in West Virginia. While serving as a chaplain in the Union forces, Battelle contracted typhoid fever and died Aug. 7, 1862. The Battelle Memorial Institute, Columbus, Ohio, and the Battelle Memorial building at AMERICAN UNIVERSITY, are named for him.

BATTY, THOMAS (1790-1856), British Methodist, was born at Mapleton, East Yorkshire, on Aug. 31, 1790. He became known as "The Apostle of Weardale." Serving on a man-of-war, he was in the Walcheren Expedition of 1809, and at the siege of Flushing had a narrow escape. His conversion took place through reading a Bible given to him by an agent of the BRITISH AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY. He became a Wesleyan LOCAL PREACHER, but having attended a camp meeting near Driffeld, Yorkshire, he was called to choose between ceasing to attend such meetings and being deprived of his Wesleyan membership. In 1821 he became a PRIMITIVE METHODIST itinerant preacher on a branch of the Hull Circuit, and in 1822 entered Weardale in North Yorkshire. A great revival spread over these northern dales, through Allendale, Nenthead, and the Vale of Eden, in consequence of his labors. He died on April 2, 1856, at Kates Hill, Dudley.

BATTY, WILLIAM, British evangelical, was an "Inghamite," one of the leading personalities in the group of Moravian societies formed by John Wesley's friend BENJAMIN INGHAM. There were three Batty brothers, Lawrence, William, and Christopher, sons of Giles Batty of Settle, Yorkshire. All studied at Catherine Hall, Cambridge. William Batty's manuscript, "Church History," is in the Methodist Archives, London. It consists of 141 large foolscap pages and gives a valuable account of the work of Ingham and his followers. A record of their conferences from 1755 to 1761 and 1779 is also given.

BAUER, RICHARD HELK (1913-), American minister and son of Samuel B. and Alice (Helck) Bauer, was born May 19, 1913 in Cincinnati, Ohio. He received a Commercial Engineering degree from the University of Cincinnati (1936); B.D., GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE (1947); D.D., OHIO NORTHERN UNIVERSITY (1962). He married Eleanor G. Nye, July 3, 1941.

Mr. Bauer spent 1932-44 as a purchasing agent for Proctor and Camble in CINCINNATI. He was received on trial by the OHIO CONFERENCE, ordained DEACON in 1946, and ELDER in 1948. Before becoming a DISTRICT SUPERINTENDENT in 1956, he served pastorates in OHIO and INDIANA. He was elected executive secretary, Interboard Committee on Christian Vocations of The Methodist Church, 1960. He has continued in this position in The United Methodist Church, although the agency name was changed to Interboard Committee on Enlistment for Church Occupations.

As a member of the General Assembly, NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES since 1963, he has been chairman of the Vocation, Guidance, and Enlistment Committee, Department of Ministry. He has held membership in the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL; American Personnel and Guidance Association; and trustee of the Methodist Home for the Aged, Cincinnati.

BAUERNFEIND, SUSAN (1870-1945), American E.U.B. missionary to JAPAN, was born in a log house in Holden, Minn., Nov. 25, 1870. She was the first missionary to be sponsored by the Woman's Missionary Society of the EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION. She landed in Tokyo, Japan on Oct. 10, 1900, and at once perceived the great need of missionary work among women who, according to native custom, could not be reached by men. It was also obvious that native women needed special training for leadership in the church. Accordingly in 1902 the Mission Board approved the establishment of a Bible Women's Training School which was organized by Miss Bauernfeind in 1904 with six students. The school grew rapidly. In 1922 a new brick building of three stories was erected. In 1925 there were 343 students in the Bible School and its affiliates, the night and music schools. Temporarily a Kindergarten Teacher's Training School was associated with the Bible School.

For many years Miss Bauernfeind published a monthly "Bulletin" promoting the Bible School. This was largely distributed in America. She also organized the Japan branch of the Woman's Missionary Society.

Miss Bauernfeind came to Tokyo when mission work was at low ebb, but her faith and persistent effort gave new impetus to the work. She impressed her hearers by her great vitality and unusual versatility: teaching, speaking, writing and counseling with other missionaries. She was a capable linguist, a successful evangelistic missionary, an effective social service worker and an efficient administrator and organizer. From 1913 she was the senior missionary on the staff and gave effective leadership to other missionaries coming to Japan. She also graciously relinquished leadership to native workers as they became prepared.

Miss Bauernfeind was highly honored for her distinctive missionary service of forty-three years. She was given an honorary doctorate, and received a citation from the Emperor of Japan. She died at Naperville, Ill., Oct. 27, 1945, and was buried in Kenyon, Minn. at the foot of a pine tree, the Japanese symbol of everlasting life.

BAUGHMAN, JOHN (1802-1868), American minister, was born in Harford Co., Md., and was admitted to the OHIO CONFERENCE on trial in 1823. He preached for two years in southern Ohio, and in 1825 became a circuit rider on the DETROIT and Monroe circuits in MICHIGAN. He was a pioneer preacher in Ohio (12 years) and Michigan (32 years), bringing the gospel for the first time to many parts of his circuits. A local historian describes his "thundering voice" which so "echoed through the forests of Washtenaw that he was termed 'John the Methodist crying in the wilderness.'"

In 1838 he transferred to the MICHIGAN CONFERENCE, and was in the DETROIT CONFERENCE at its inception in 1856. He was stationed in Detroit from 1845 to 1847. His work in the Detroit Conference carried him from CINCINNATI, OHIO to the wild and remote area of the copper mines in Michigan's upper peninsula. Later in his career he served many prominent Michigan churches. He was presiding elder of the Detroit District, 1852-54, and agent for the AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY for four years and agent for the Conference Tract Society for one year.

In 1844 he was a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE where he supported the anti-slavery sentiments of his Conference.

Baughman was married to Sarah Harvey Kent in May, 1826 at Monroe, Mich. He was superannuated in 1867 and died at his home in Detroit, March 1, 1868.

BAUGHMAN, LYLE LYNDEN (1889-1960), American E.U.B. minister and bishop, was born at Cuba, Ill., April 5, 1889. He received his first license to preach on Dec. 25, 1916, and was admitted to membership in his annual conference on Sept. 27, 1917. He was ordained a minister in the Church of the UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST on Sept. 16, 1923. He was married to Fern Edna Brock, a public school teacher, on June 7, 1922.

He spent twenty-nine years in the pastoral ministry on three charges in the Illinois Conference: Shields-Locust, Saybrook, and First Church, Bloomington. In 1945 he was elected superintendent of the Illinois Conference, and in 1950 the General Conference elected him to the office of executive secretary of the General COUNCIL OF ADMINISTRATION, which he filled for four years.

The GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1954 elected him bishop, and he was assigned to the Southwestern Episcopal area which embraces the states of IOWA, NEBRASKA, KANSAS, TEXAS, OKLAHOMA, and MISSOURI, with residence in KANSAS CITY, Mo. Bishop Baughman was awarded a D.D.

degree by INDIANA CENTRAL COLLEGE, Indianapolis, Ind., in 1938, and in 1957 he received the LL.D. degree from WESTMAR COLLEGE, LeMars, Iowa. He was the author of "Church Centered Finance System" in 1936, which plan operated in hundreds of churches in twelve denominations.

After presiding over the 105th session of the KANSAS CONFERENCE and while on his way to the Oklahoma Conference, he died at Wellington, Kan., May 15, 1960.

BAUMAN, ERNEST J. (1908-), Argentine educator, was born in Mercedes, ARGENTINA. He was the son of Methodist missionaries, the ERNEST N. BAUMANS. In 1926 he was graduated from Colegio Ward, Methodist secondary school in BUENOS AIRES, and the following year he started work there as an office assistant. He then studied at the University of Buenos Aires, from which he was graduated as a dentist in 1936. In 1935 he had married Fiorina Borghetti.

Bauman returned to Colegio Ward, occupying various positions until 1945, when he was appointed executive secretary. In the academic year 1950-51, he and Mrs. Bauman were CRUSADE SCHOLARS, studying education at SCARRITT COLLEGE and Peabody College in NASHVILLE, Tenn., U.S.A. He then returned to his work at Colegio Ward and in 1955 was appointed president. He holds an honorary degree, doctor of pedagogy, from the University of the Pacific.

Along with his work in education, he holds significant positions in the Argentina Annual Conference of The Methodist Church and in Masonry and the Rotary Club. Two daughters are teachers at Ward.

BAUMAN, ERNEST NICHOLAS (1880-1940), American missionary to ARGENTINA, was born in Henrietta, Ohio, to German-speaking Swiss parents. He was the youngest of a family of seven, of whom four entered the ministry of the M. E. CHURCH.

Soon after his graduation from seminary he married Louise Kessler of the same community. They embarked on an overseas career in 1907, going to Argentina. There he served until his death.

Bauman was minister of the churches of La Boca, Mercedes, Rojas, and Junin. The BUENOS AIRES Methodist Seminary had him as its director soon after his reaching the country. But it was in Junin, a big town in the Province of Buenos Aires, where he spent most of his active life. The city of Junin has honored his memory by giving the name of "Pastor Bauman" to a street and a square.

His eldest son, ERNEST J. BAUMAN, is principal of Colegio Ward in Buenos Aires.

ADAM F. SOSA

BAVIN, FRANCIS (1853-1933), British minister, entered the UNITED METHODIST FREE CHURCH ministry in 1873. He had a distinguished career on the mission field, especially as general superintendent of the United Methodist Free Church missions in JAMAICA and Central America from 1898 to 1907. The formation of the United Methodist Church in England in 1907 led to certain difficulties in Jamaica, and the United Methodist Conference of 1912 permitted many of the Jamaican churches to become identified with the American M. E. CHURCH. Bavin remained in Jamaica for six years after 1907 as a supernumerary, trying to make the Jamaican churches self-supporting. He served on the Legislative Council; and after the withdrawal of the control of the United Methodist Church from Jamaica, he was chiefly responsible for the Enabling Act passed by the Legislative Council which permitted some of the former United Methodist Free Churches in Jamaica to come voluntarily under the jurisdiction of the Jamaican Synod of the WESLEYAN METHODIST CHURCH and so maintain their links with Britain. He returned to England in 1913, and died on April 26, 1933.

BAXTER, BRUCE RICHARD (1892-1947), American bishop, was born at Rock Run, Ohio on Aug. 18, 1892. He was graduated from Oberlin College and BOSTON UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY. He received honorary doctorates from six colleges and universities, one of these the Los Angeles College of Osteopathic Physicians and Surgeons.

In 1917 Baxter joined the NORTH-EAST OHIO ANNUAL CONFERENCE. He was a field secretary for the Missionary Centenary financial campaign in 1918 and for the similar Interchurch World Movement the following year. From 1920 to 1924 he was professor of English Bible at MOUNT UNION COLLEGE and in 1924 he went to the University of Southern California, first as chaplain and professor of homiletics, then as assistant to the president, and later as dean of the School of Religion. In 1934 he became president of WILLAMETTE UNIVERSITY at Salem, Ore.

He was elected bishop in 1940 and assigned to PORTLAND, Ore., where he died on June 20, 1947.

Bishop Baxter traveled extensively in Europe, Asia, Africa, and the South Seas. He was a delegate to the ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE at LONDON in 1921, and a member of the Methodist Boards of EDUCATION, MISSIONS and Church Extension, EVANGELISM, and HOSPITALS and HOMES, as well as the Commission on Chaplains, National Council of Christians and Jews, FEDERAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, and other connectional and national organizations. He was a man of cordial and genial charm, extremely popular as a speaker before men's assemblies, and of great value to the church.

BAXTER, JOHN (17[?]-1805), was a British missionary lay pioneer. A government shipwright at Chatham, England, he went to English Harbour, Antigua, on John Wesley's advice in 1778. Arriving on April 2, he began to preach to Negro slaves two days later. These were the remnants of the Negro flock gathered by NATHANIEL GILBERT and kept together by Mary Alley and Sophia Campbell. Three years later the society numbered six hundred members, and they built their own chapel at St. John's. THOMAS COKE knew of his work and preached the Christmas sermon in his church, after being driven ashore on a voyage to America in 1786. Baxter agreed to give up his work as a shipwright and become a full-time Methodist preacher, and was appointed to St. Vincent in 1787. In 1788 he and his wife undertook a mission to the aboriginal Carib Indians on Grand Sable and built a schoolhouse, before returning first to Kingston and then to Antigua. He acted as Coke's "agent" in the West Indies until his death. To the end he remained the beloved "Daddy Baxter" of the slave Methodists. He died in Antigua, November 7, 1805.

BAXTER, MATTHEW (1812-1893), British preacher, was born in Alston, Cumberland, Jan. 1, 1812, and was a local preacher in the PRIMITIVE METHODIST CHURCH. Under the influence of JOHN FLETCHER he was, at the age of seventeen, received as a candidate for the ministry, and became minister of a church in Scarborough. The congregation joined the WESLEYAN METHODIST ASSOCIATION, and became in time a part of the UNITED METHODIST FREE CHURCHES. For nearly ten years Baxter was a missionary of that denomination in JAMAICA. On his return he became successively editor and book steward in 1854, president of the Assembly in 1856, and connexional secretary in 1860. With JAMES EVERETT he edited the United Methodist Free Church hymn book in 1860, and was the author of other works including the valuable Methodism: Memorials of the United Methodist Free Churches.

In 1868 he was sent to NEW ZEALAND and was for six years in charge of the CHRISTCHURCH Circuit. He led his denomination in a vigorous policy of church extension, but in 1874, for reasons of health, he had to relinquish the full duties of the ministry. For nineteen years he lived as a supernumerary in the foothills of the Southern Alps, in Oxford, New Zealand. He died there May 1, 1893.

BAY ST. LOUIS, MISSISSIPPI, U.S.A., is one of the oldest towns on the Gulf Coast, the bay of St. Louis being given that name by Bienville, the French explorer and colonizer, while he was cruising along the coast and before he had founded NEW ORLEANS. It was at first a fishing village due to its good harbor, but more recently has become also a resort town and the summer residence of certain New Orleans families and others. The Roman Catholic Church has always been strong at "The Bay" from the early French and Spanish days.

Main Street Methodist Church was organized in 1852 in the town of Sheildsboro, now Bay St. Louis, by E. D. Pitts, who was a school teacher and local preacher. For a number of years it was on the Cainsville Circuit and then on the Biloxi Circuit. Worship services were held in a small building at the corner of Main and Second Streets on property given by John V. Toulme for a church. In 1892 the parsonage was built behind the church and W. C. Forsythe was the first pastor to occupy it. In 1895 the present church building was erected during the pastorate of N. B. Harmon, the father of Bishop HARMON. It was completed and all debts paid under the pastorate of J. P. Drake, and was dedicated in 1897 by Bishop CHARLES B. CALLOWAY.

In 1936, during the pastorate of J. B. Gray, an annex of six classrooms was erected adjoining the church. In 1949 an adjacent building was purchased and is being used for educational activities. A French provincial parsonage was completed in 1964 at the corner of Second Street and Timberlane. The Mississippi Methodist Advocate carried pictures showing Bishop EDWARD J. PENDERGRASS formally opening and consecrating the new parsonage. The Spanish moss hanging from the trees in the yard over the listening congregation provided a typical Gulf Coast setting.

The present congregation of approximately 450 carries on its century-old tradition of loyalty. Unfortunately the great hurricane of 1969 did great damage to the church and almost destroyed the business section of the Bay, but emergency funds from the general church and nation have been expended to good effect.

LAMAR MARTIN

BAYLEY, FRANCIS R. (1877-1960), American minister and first chairman of the JUDICIAL COUNCIL of THE METHODIST CHURCH, was born in Millville, N. J., Oct. 25, 1877, and was educated at DICKINSON COLLEGE where he began to prepare for a law career. He entered the BALTIMORE M. E. CONFERENCE in 1902 and was appointed to important pastorates at Govans, Hagerstown, Walbrook, and Alpheus W. Wilson Memorial, besides twelve years as presiding elder of the Baltimore East District. He served in every GENERAL CONFERENCE from 1920 to 1948, in the last three as a member and president of the newly organized Judicial Council. Widely known for his knowledge of church law, his judicial decisions were said "always to favor the General Conference over against the episcopacy."

BEAIRD, PAT (1899-1963), American layman and executive of the METHODIST PUBLISHING HOUSE, was born in Tyler, Texas, May 7, 1899, and educated at SOUTHERN METHODIST UNIVERSITY. Employed by the Publishing House of the M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH in 1922, he was in 1924 placed in charge of the book publishing department, which the year before had been given the name COKESBURY PRESS so that its products might be sold to other denominations. Over the next sixteen years he built the press to a recognized position among religious publishers.

Following Unification the publishing houses of the three denominations were merged in 1940, and Beard became director of the book publishing division, Abingdon-Cokesbury Press. Surveying the combined catalog, he chose for special promotion several older publications of particular value, such as The Abingdon Bible Commentary (1929), and succeeded in multiplying their circulation manyfold. At the same time he won wide sale for new books secured in cooperation with the book editor, NOLAN B. HARMON (later a bishop)—including well over a million copies of the wartime devotional compilation Strength for Service to God and Country (1942). Within a few years the press, from 1954 called ABINGDON PRESS, became the largest publisher of religious books in the world.

In 1941, in what turned out to be an important after-dinner conversation, Pat Beaird asked the honored guest, George A. Buttrick, an author and Presbyterian pastor of New York, what book he thought most needed to be written. Buttrick instantly answered that he saw great need of a comprehensive commentary on the Bible, as none had been written for many years, and that he wished that Biblical scholars and preachers might cooperate in such a work to show how a scholarly understanding of the Scriptures should be applied to preaching and teaching. He ended, however, by saying that no publisher could afford the long-term investment such a work would require. As the second World War drew to an end, Buttrick was surprised to have Beaird and Harmon call on him with a plan for producing the suggested commentary and an invitation to head its editorial board. The result was THE INTERPRETER'S BIBLE (12 vols., 1951-57). Its success was so immediate and exceeded estimates so much that Beaird was able to initiate work on a successor, which came to be The Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible (4 vols., 1962), before his elevation to become executive vice-president of the Methodist Publishing House in 1956.

Beaird was active in cooperation with other denominational publishers, taking a lead in such organizations as the Department of Publication and Distribution of the National Council of Churches and the Cooperative Publication Association. He was a founder and first president (1951-52) of the Protestant Church-Owned Publishers Association. He died at Nashville, Tenn., March 17, 1963.

GORDON B. DUNCAN

BEARD, THOMAS, British Methodist, was among the first of JOHN WESLEY's lay preachers. Because of his preaching he was impressed as a soldier in Yorkshire. John Wesley records meeting him and JOHN NELSON, who was also impressed, in Durham on June 11, 1744. Beard was sent to SCOTLAND and on Sept. 17, 1744, wrote from Berwick a letter to GEORGE WHITEFIELD, in which he speaks of having preached in his "red coat" at Cowdingham. Soon afterward he contracted a fever and was placed in the hospital at Newcastle; after bloodletting his arm festered and was amputated, and a few days later he died. CHARLES WESLEY wrote "Soldier of Christ, Adieu" in his memory.

HAROLD I. BEARDEN

BEARDEN, HAROLD I. (1910-), an American bishop of the A. M. E. CHURCH, was born in Atlanta, Ga., March 6, 1910. He was educated at MORRIS BROWN COLLEGE, where he received the A.B. degree, and at Turner Theological Seminary, which granted him the B.D. degree. Later he received the D.D. and LL.D. degrees from six institutions, including MONROVIA College and WILBERFORCE UNIVERSITY.

Following his ordination as deacon and elder, he was the pastor of churches in GEORGIA for a number of years. He was elected to the episcopacy on May 17, 1964, at the General Conference of his church held in CINCINNATI, Ohio. His assignments have largely been in Africa, and he is the only bishop of the A. M. E. Church to live in ZAMBIA in its rural area with the Zambians. His assignment in 1964-68 was in Central Africa with the annual conferences there—North Zambia, South Zambia, RHODESIA, and Central Africa (Malawi). In 1968 he was assigned to Central Africa and reassigned on Sept. 30, 1968, to West Africa and the annual conferences there in LIBERIA, SIERRA LEONE, GHANA, and NIGERIA.

His wife was Minerva Lois Mathis, whom he married on June 22, 1931; they have six children. He presently resides in Atlanta, Ga.

BEAUCHAMP, WILLIAM (1772-1824), American preacher and editor, was born in Kent Co., Del., April 26, 1772. Largely self-educated, he joined the itinerancy in 1794, served circuits in PENNSYLVANIA for three years, and then appointments of one year each in New York, Boston, Provincetown, and Nantucket. At the latter place he organized a society of seventy-five persons and built a meeting house. For reasons of health, he located in 1801. He then married and moved to Wood Co., W. Va. In 1815 he moved to Chillicothe, Ohio, where for two years he edited the Western Christian Monitor which preceded the Methodist Magazine and the Christian Advocates. Going to Mt. Carmel, Ill., in 1817, he formed a settlement in which he acted as pastor, teacher, lawyer, and engineer. Through the years of his location he was known as an able preacher and a man of exalted character. Re-entering the itinerant ranks in 1822, he was appointed to what became known as First Church, St. Louis, Mo. In 1823 he was made presiding elder of the Indiana District which then embraced most of that state. A delegate to the 1824 GENERAL CONFERENCE, on the first two ballots he came within three votes of being elected bishop. Failure of election was due, it was alleged, to Beauchamp's long period of years out of the itinerancy. He died Oct. 7, 1824 at Paoli, Ind.

BEAUCHAMP, WILLIAM BENJAMIN (1869-1931), American bishop and missionary executive, was born at Farnham, Va., March 16, 1869. He was educated at RANDOLPH-MACON COLLEGE and VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY, receiving from the latter the M.A. and B.D. degrees. He held honorary doctorates from Randolph-Macon and FLORIDA SOUTHERN COLLEGE.

Beauchamp entered the VIRGINIA CONFERENCE of the M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH in 1893. He was pastor at Broad Street and St. James Churches in RICHMOND and NEWPORT NEWS, respectively; Fourth Avenue Church in LOUISVILLE, Ky.; and Monumental Church in PORTSMOUTH, Va. In 1917 he became general secretary of the Laymen's Missionary Movement of his church with headquarters at Nashville, Tenn. He served as director-general of the CENTENARY MISSIONARY FUND in 1918-19 and helped obtain pledges of $50,000,000 for Southern Methodist missions. In 1919 he became the secretary for Europe of the Board of MISSIONS.

Due to the reputation he had made in the Centenary Movement, Beauchamp was elected a bishop in 1922, although he was not a member of the GENERAL CONFERENCE that elected him. He was assigned to an area including the conferences in BELGIUM, POLAND and CZECHOSLOVAKIA. There he served 1922-26, and after that in GEORGIA and MEXICO. While living in Atlanta he was a lecturer on missions at EMORY UNIVERSITY. For the quadrennium during which he died, he was assigned to the Richmond Area.

He was a member of the WORLD MISSIONARY CONFERENCE at Edinburgh in 1906; president of the Board of Missions of the M. E. BEAUMONT, JOHN (1762-1822), British Methodist, has the distinction of being the first Methodist minister who was a musician. He joined the ranks of the Methodists much against the wishes of his father, a staunch defender of the Established Church, who was afraid that his association with Methodism might interfere with his musical activities. As a boy Beaumont had distinguished himself as a vocalist and later became a proficient performer on the bass viol. He published some hymn tunes in 1801, one of which, "St. Ignatius," has remained in use until the present day. When at Newark, he installed an organ in the local chapel, a notable achievement, as JOHN WESLEY very rarely gave permission for the installation of organs in Methodist places of worship. He also wrote an autobiography, but this has not been traced.

FRANCIS B. WESTBROOK

BEAUMONT, JOSEPH (1794-1855), British Methodist, a distinguished preacher and speaker, was born at Castle Donington, Leicestershire, March 19, 1794. He was educated at KINGSWOOD SCHOOL and entered the Methodist ministry in 1813. By private study he obtained a degree in medicine from Edinburgh University in 1836. A man of independent mind, he was one of the leaders of the opposition in Conference to the dominance of JABEZ BUNTING. He had some sympathy with the views of the WESLEYAN REFORMERS, and was censured at the Conference of 1850 for alleged leniency toward them, but he remained loyal to the WESLEYAN METHODIST CHURCH. He died in HULL on January 21, 1855.

BEAUMONT, TEXAS, U.S.A., is located in Jefferson County on the Gulf of Mexico. It is famous for TEXAS' first big oil producer at Spindletop. The area has a large petrochemical industry, it is a major port with a channel to the Gulf and the intercoastal canals, and it is a leading rice growing and cattle ranching area. The county was organized in 1837 as an original county from Mexican municipality and was named for President Thomas Jefferson.

The story of First Church, which follows, is in essence the history of the development of Methodism in Beaumont. There are presently eleven United Methodist churches in the city of Beaumont, with a total combined membership of 10,000 members. The Negro Methodists are represented in Beaumont by the congregations of St. James and McCabe Churches. These are aggressive congregations and are an asset to the city. Beaumont is a growing city and Methodism in all of its congregations is growing with it.

First Church began as a preaching point on the Alligator Circuit—so called because the salaries were supplemented by shooting and skinning alligators and trading the dried skins for supplies. The first church services on this circuit were held in homes, schools, in brush arbors and in tents, and all denominations met together when there was a minister in the area.

John F. Pipkin, a local preacher, moved to Wiess Bluff about 1852, and later was a resident of Orange County. He married couples, baptized babies, and held worship services in the old courthouse building until the Methodists and Baptists jointly built a church on land donated by Miss Loua Calder.

The first Methodist pastor of record to the Beaumont Mission was Richard A. Wooten in 1858. He was followed by F. C. Dowdy. Beaumont statistics then showed sixteen white members and fourteen colored members.

In 1877, while Lacey Boone was pastor, the first church building was constructed of "rough lumber, shotgun style, one by twelve inch boards set upright with battens nailed over the cracks." It was at first whitewashed and then painted white. According to Mr. Perlstein, who later bought the building, there were two front doors, one for the women and one for the men.

The second church, built in 1894, when Leon Sonfield was pastor, was located on the corner of Main and Forsythe. The Baptists had then been bought out by the Methodists and they had built their own church on Pearl Street.

Following the Spindletop oil boom, the First Church Methodists again decided to relocate and build. The present location on the corner of Pearl Street and Broadway was then purchased. The cornerstone for the present structure was laid under the auspices of the Masons during the pastorate of V. A. Godbey. The original plans called for a dome, but the price seemed prohibitive, so it was decided to omit the dome from the structure. But Bishop HENRY CLAY MORRISON, who was nothing if not sure of himself, came and urged the congregation to raise the necessary $10,000 in a protracted meeting which he agreed to hold. The dome in the new structure was thus made possible through his efforts (1906-07).

In 1923, while J. W. Mills was pastor, a four-story classroom addition was built. In 1948 a children's building was erected as a centennial gift to the children of the church, during the pastorate of Homer T. Fort.

Before Beaumont had an auditorium, the First Church was host to such events as high school graduations, music week programs, et cetera. Since 1922 the women of the church have supported a foreign missionary each year and since 1953 the congregation has supported a full-time missionary family in Africa.

In 1966 the church, under the leadership of pastor John Wesley Hardt, began the construction of a complete new church plant. The new building was completed and occupied in June, 1968, and was consecrated on June 16 of that year. Bishop PAUL E. MARTIN, unable to be present on the day of consecration, preached the following Sunday, and the entire month of June was given to meetings of celebration and renewal for this historic downtown church.

BECK, CHARLES H. (1868-1948), American M. P. leader, was born in Harrisonville, Ohio, Nov. 14, 1868, and died at his home in West View, Pa., March 28, 1948. On Oct. 6, 1891, he married Martha V. Beck.

For fifty-two years he served in the active ministry of the M. P. CHURCH, having united in 1891 with the Muskingum Conference of the church. Later he served as its president for three years. In 1920 the Ohio and Muskingum Conferences united, continuing as the OHIO CONFERENCE, in which he retained his membership until 1928, when he transferred to the PITTSBURGH CONFERENCE, retiring in 1943.

At one time he served as president of the West Lafayette College, West Lafayette, Ohio. He was secretary-treasurer of the M. P. Board of Home Missions, 1910-1925, this being the most conspicuous and dedicated appointment of his ministerial career. He was a delegate to the ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE in London in 1921. ADRIAN COLLEGE, in recognition of his service to the church, conferred on him the honorary D.D. degree. From 1908 to 1920 he was the secretary of the GENERAL CONFERENCE.

Beck was a quiet, kindly, sympathetic man, deeply earnest in all of his efforts, completely sincere in his relations with other people and unwaveringly faithful in the work to which he was called.

BECK, FRANK S. (1888-1969) and BESSIE (DUNN), founders of the medical work of The Methodist Church in BOLIVIA. Frank Beck was born in Canton, S. D. He went to Bolivia as a commercial teacher in the COCHABAMBA American Institute in 1912, and a year later married Bessie Dunn. The couple later worked at Colegio Ward in BUENOS AIRES, Argentina, for three years. Then he became director of both American Institutes, first in Cochabamba, then in LA PAZ.

When Beck was thirty-five years old he resolved to attack disease and filth among the country's Aymara Indians. For five years he studied medicine at NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY, Evanston, Ill., while his wife worked on her M.A. and Ph.D. degrees at the University of Chicago, teaching Spanish to help support their three children. They later adopted two Bolivian girls.

Returning to Bolivia in 1930, Beck began to visit Altiplano villages on a motorcycle, with NESTOR PEÑARANDA riding behind him. Indians would walk for miles carrying their sick to intercept him or wait at a village he would visit. At the same time he encountered opposition because of superstition and ignorance. One day in ANCORAIMES Beck was vaccinating against smallpox when the mayor jailed him and Nestor Peñaranda overnight "for disturbing the peace of these tranquil villagers."

Beck volunteered his services with the Bolivian forces during the Chaco War (1931-34), and was decorated with the Condor of the Andes, the highest recognition the government gives to a foreigner.

The Becks founded the American Clinic in La Paz, and the first nursing school in Bolivia. He supervised construction of a three-story building for the clinic (Pfeiffer Memorial Hospital) and a nursing-school building. In 1956 he started a clinic, now named for him, in Ancoraimes.

The Becks retired from Bolivia twice because of his health, but returned each time for further service. Beck delivered about 5,000 babies during his years in Bolivia. He was described by many who knew him as an "Unsung Schweitzer." He died Dec. 17, 1969 at his home in Alta Loma, Calif. He was active until the end, and at a clinic in his home he had seen forty patients on the day he died.

BECKER, HENRY J. (1846-1934), American U.B. minister, author, editor, and lecturer, was born June 19, 1846, at Massillon, Ohio. He worked early in the coal mines, received a primary education, and studied at Heidelberg College (Ohio). Following service in the Civil War, he was converted to Christ and began to study theology. In 1869 he was licensed to preach in the Church of the United Brethren in Christ, Western Reserve Conference. He received his license in 1872, ordination as elder in 1874, and honorary D.D. degree in 1891.

Becker was married Aug. 18, 1870, to Elizabeth Houk. In 1875 the Beckers went to CALIFORNIA under appointment of his church's Board of Missions. There he served ten years as pastor of circuits and stations (twice at Sacramento), evangelist, conference secretary, presiding elder, and pioneer editor and publisher of The Pacific Telescope and later The Philomath Crucible in OREGON. He also wrote several pamphlets and a short history of early United Brethren in California.

At the division of the church in 1889, Becker was elected by the Church of the UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST, OLD CONSTITUTION, as bishop of the Pacific Area, which he served four years. He then resigned and became foreign secretary of the Home, Frontier, and Foreign Missionary Society for many years. During this time he made his home in DAYTON, OHIO. Here their daughter, Miss Alta J. Becker, became a well-known writer and editor of Sunday school lessons for children and materials for teachers through The OTTERREIN PRESS.

Becker died at his Dayton, Ohio home Dec. 1, 1934, and was buried in the Woodland Cemetery of that city.

BECKER, JORGE LUIZ (1873-1942), Brazilian preacher, was born in Juiz de Fora, State of Minas Gerais, BRAZIL, on Jan. 18, 1873, the third of fourteen children. His parents were immigrants from GERMANY, his father a Lutheran, his mother a Roman Catholic. They were among the first converts to the Gospel when the Methodist Church established work in JUIZ DE FORA in 1885, and Jorge became one of the first fourteen students enrolled when Granbery College (now Instituto) opened its doors in 1890. Deciding early to be a preacher, he applied to the Brazil Annual Conference and was licensed to preach and admitted on trial at the age of twenty. Three years later, 1896, he was ordained elder by Bishop GALLOWAY.

His first appointment in 1893 was with Antonio de Araujo at Uba, Minas Gerais. There, a few months after beginning his ministry, Becker endured his "baptism of persecution." While he and Araujo were preaching, a severe and damaging hailstorm hit the town. A fanatical superstitious mob that had been led to believe that the ministers' presence was responsible for this "punishment," attacked and dragged them through the streets, beating them mercilessly all the while. With Araujo down and presumably dead, the mob returned to Becker and stabbed him twice. Their injuries fortunately did not prove of a permanent nature.

Jorge Becker served as pastor of many important churches; and with the help of his wife, Eugenia Smith—a remarkable woman, descended from Confederate Americans who had settled in Brazil in the mid-1860's—he conducted parochial schools at various stations he served. He also taught at the Bible school connected with Granbery, and later in the United Seminary in Rio de Janeiro.

Becker retired in 1935 and died seven years later, on Sept. 18, 1942, in the city of his birth, Juiz de Fora. He was survived by his widow and several children.

BECKER (SAMUEL) HOUSE, located near Kleinfeltersville, Lebanon Co., Pa., was the scene of the first regular annual conference of the EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION, Nov. 13-15, 1807. A substantial stone farmhouse like many others that dotted the Pennsylvania countryside inhabited by the German settlers, the Becker House had been the center of activity for local followers of JACOB ALBRIGHT for several years.

Samuel Becker, the host to the conference, was the grandson of Peter Becker, an Anabaptist who had fled Europe and taken up residence in the Mühlbach area of Lebanon County. Here he had served as the official baptizer for the Anabaptists, administering the sacrament to a number of persons including Conrad Beissel, founder of a religious community at Ephrata, Pa., which is now a historical landmark known as the Cloister.

The Becker House is located within a few miles of the cemetery where Jacob Albright was buried following his death at the home of George Becker in 1808 and where the ALBRIGHT MEMORIAL CHAPEL was erected in 1850.

BECKETT, WILLIAM WESLEY (1854-1927), an American bishop of the A.M.E. CHURCH, was born in Edisto Island, S. C., the son of Thomas and Martha Beckett. He received his education at CLARK COLLEGE (A.B.) and GAMMON THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY (B.D.). He was awarded the honorary D.D. degree from ALLEN UNIVERSITY.

Beckett was converted in 1870, licensed to preach in 1878, admitted to the South Carolina Conference (AME) in 1884, ordained deacon in 1886 and elder probably in 1887 or 1888. He was married to Mary Glenn in 1876, and they had eight children.

He served as a pastor and presiding elder in SOUTH

CAROLINA, a member of the State Legislature, and was president of Allen University in South Carolina, 1912-16. He was elected to the episcopacy in 1916 and assigned successively to SOUTH AFRICA (1916-20); the Eighth Episcopal District, MISSISSIPPI (1920-24); and the Seventh Episcopal District, South Carolina (1924-27). Bishop Beckett died in 1927.

During the first World War he braved the submarine-infested waters of the Atlantic to go to his post in Africa.

BECKLY TRUST provides for the annual delivery of a lecture during the Conference of the British Methodist Church. It was in 1925, at the annual conference of the WESLEYAN METHODIST CHURCH, that the late J. H. Beckly, a prominent layman in the Plymouth District, approved the setting up of a lectureship "to set forth the social implications of Christianity and to further the development of a Christian Sociology and the expression of the Christian attitude to social, economic and international subjects." A wide range of subjects has been covered, including Science, Technology and the Christian, by C. A. COULSON; The New Pattern of Education, by Ronald Gould, the general secretary of the National Union of Teachers; and The Emancipation of Youth, by Douglas Hubery. In addition to the annual lecture, the trust has pioneered the publication of six series of Beckly Pamphlets dealing with vital factors in modern society and written by authoritative writers in their own particular field. The present secretary of the trust is MALDVYN EDWARDS.

BEDFORD, JOSEPH WILLIAM (1850-1947), American preacher and editor, was born at Whips Cove, Pa., Dec. 5, 1850. Admitted to the WEST VIRGINIA CONFERENCE (ME) in 1875, he became known as "Walking Joe" because he traveled on foot during most of his active ministry. Except for six years (1887-93) in the CENTRAL PENNSYLVANIA CONFERENCE, he was a lifelong member of the West Virginia Conference, serving a number of the hardest mountain circuits. He had a successful term (1895-1901) as presiding elder of the Huntington District. In 1900 Taylor University honored him with the D.D. degree, and in 1904 the Prohibition Party nominated him for governor. He published the Mountain State Patriot, a prohibition paper, for 15 years. During his ministry he built many churches among the hills. He died February 15, 1947.

Beebe joined the M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH and was ordained a DEACON in 1865 and an ELDER in 1866. After the formation of the C.M.E. Church, he became a member of that denomination and was appointed a presiding elder. He was a delegate to the second General Conference of his church in 1873, and it was at that meeting that he was elected to the office of bishop. During the thirty years of his episcopacy, he served as Senior Bishop for thirteen years.

BEECHAM, JOHN (1787-1856), British Methodist, was born in Lincolnshire, at Barnoldby-le-Beck. He became a WESLEYAN METHODIST itinerant preacher in 1815. From 1831 to 1855 he served as a general secretary of the Wesleyan Methodist Missionary Society. He played a large part in drawing up constitutions for affiliated conferences in FRANCE, CANADA, and Australasia; he visited Canada in 1855.

He was elected president of the Wesleyan Methodist Conference in 1850. He published An Essay upon the Constitution of Wesleyan Methodism (1829) at the time of the Leeds Organ Controversy (see PROTESTANT METHODISTS), in which he vigorously defended the traditional polity of Wesleyan Methodism. He wrote other works on missionary history and strategy. He died on April 22, 1856.

BEET, JOSEPH AGAR (1840-1924), British WESLEYAN METHODIST New Testament scholar and theologian, was born at SHEFFIELD on Sept. 27, 1840, and entered the Wesleyan ministry in 1864. As tutor in theology at RICHMOND COLLEGE, Surrey (1885-1905), he achieved an international reputation with a series of commentaries on the Pauline epistles, and gave the FERNLEY LECTURE for 1889 on The Credentials of the Gospel. In The Last Things (1897) he denied that the Bible teaches the permanent existence of the soul and carried this view further in The Immortality of the Soul (1901). He retired in 1905 to regain freedom of speech after the Conference of 1902 had reappointed him to Richmond only on condition that he be silent on this disputed question. His Manual of Theology appeared in 1906. He died on May 25, 1924.

BELCHER, SAMUEL ADAMS (1876-1956), American preacher and missionary to BRAZIL, was born in Cairo, Ga., Oct. 10, 1876. He was a member of the SOUTH GEORGIA CONFERENCE, having been admitted on trial in 1906. On Sept. 12, 1906, he married Goldie Sasser, and they went to Brazil in 1907. He was transferred into the Brazil Annual Conference, ordained deacon by Bishop E. E. Hoss, and elder by Bishop W. R. LAMBUTH in 1908. For thirty years Belcher served the Methodist Church of Brazil as pastor and presiding elder. He wrote two books in Portuguese, Em Nossos Lares (In Our Homes), dedicated to his parishioners, and a second book dedicated to his fellow ministers. He built the churches of Campinas, Franca, and Ipiranga (city of SAO PAULO). Through his preaching and example he led at least one young man—the author of these lines—to dedicate his life to the Christian ministry.

Ill health forced Belcher's return to the U.S.A. in 1923, but he was able to return to Brazil in 1927 and to work there actively until 1935. Again in ill health, he returned to his own country, retiring in 1938. Belcher was known for his kindness and sacrificial devotion to the work.

He died in Arlington, Va., March 28, 1956, and was buried in Cairo, Ga. Mrs. Belcher had preceded him in death. They were survived by two daughters, Paula and Marian, and by a son, Samuel. Another son, Robert, had been killed in the second World War.

BELGAUM, Mysore State, India, is in the South India Annual Conference. In 1904 the London Missionary Society invited the Methodist Church to take over all its work and properties in Belgaum City and district. The associated church of about 200 members, with six catechists, three colporteurs and Bible women, supported the invitation. The work included a boys' high school and seven grade schools. Beside the school properties, two bungalows and a dozen small houses were given without compensation. The Methodist Church accepted the invitation and sent the Rev. and Mrs. D. O. ERNSBERGER as its first appointees.

Earlier converts had come from the higher Hindu castes. The Methodists decided to pay attention to the less privileged castes and they responded. In 1907, 410 were baptized. In three years the Christian community numbered 3,650. These new converts desperately needed the friendship of privileged people who believed in them and especially in their religious and cultural possibilities. The annual conference provided a hostel for boys from the homes of these new converts. They were soon well integrated in the school, and it became the largest boys' school in Indian Methodism.

A girls' boarding school was opened in 1907. It took over the property of the boys' school, which then obtained a more adequate site and launched a development program which has added strong departments of agricultural, vocational, commercial, and physical education.

In appreciation of the generosity of the London Missionary Society, and of the excellence of the school turned over to them, the Methodists renamed it the Beynon-Smith High School in honor of two former missionary principals.

E. C. Reddy, the first Indian principal, was appointed in 1933 and remained in charge until 1956. He then became secretary of the All-India Council of Christian Education, as a missionary principal of the same school, Earle L. King, had done earlier.

The church built in 1828 remained in use until 1944, when it was replaced by a more commodious structure better adapted to a modern program of religious education, worship, and service.

BELGIUM, a nation of western Central Europe, is bordered on the north by the North Sea and Holland, on the east by Holland and Germany, on the south and west by Luxembourg and France. It contains 11,779 square miles and is densely populated by 9,630,000 (1968) inhabitants.

There are two national languages: in the north Dutch (Flemish), fifty-five percent; in the south French (Walloon), forty-five percent. The linguistic border line runs east and west through BRUSSELS, the capital. Other main cities are Antwerp, Liege, Ghent, Malines, Courtrai, Tournai, Namur, and Hasselt.

After centuries of Spanish, German, or French rule, Belgium, through revolution in 1830, became an autonomous parliamentary monarchy with a very liberal constitution (1831) drawn up under English influence. The first king was Leopold I (1831-65), who was succeeded by Leopold II (1865-1909), Albert I (1909-34), Leopold III (1934-51), Baudouin (since 1951). In both world wars Belgium suffered German invasion and occupation (August 1914 to October 1918 and May 1940 to September 1944). The striking developments of European communities since the second World War have made Brussels one of the world's key centers for business.

Belgium is predominantly Catholic. In government, as elsewhere, the Roman Church remains a leading power, though it has to take into consideration a strong growing socialistic secularization today stimulated by intense industrialization.

Protestantism. The sixteenth-century Reformation was at first very successful across the entire Lowlands. Nevertheless, in the south (now Belgium) it could not survive the Inquisition during two long centuries of Spanish rule. Evangelical congregations reappeared only with the nineteenth century. Support was received from SWITZERLAND, HOLLAND, FRANCE, and Great Britain. In 1914 Belgian Protestantism included some forty local churches, generally small and mostly French-speaking. Their number increased to about 250 in 1965, with the most rapid growth between the two world wars. They represent several organizations, if not denominations. Many congregations have remained independent. The total Protestant membership can be evaluated at more or less one percent of the population. No exact statistics are available.

Methodism. The Belgium Mission of the M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH was organized in Brussels in August 1922, Bishop WILLIAM B. BEAUCHAMP being in charge. It was the result of wide material and spiritual moves carried out by the Southern Methodist Centenary Movement (U.S.A.) at the close of the first World War. Permanent Belgian Protestant institutions were created: an orphanage, school, and hospital. Main leaders were David Sloan, WILLIAM G. THONGER, and GEORGE W. WILMOT.

In 1923 the Methodist Mission was set up as a legal Belgian A.S.B.L. (state-protected, nonlucrative corporation). Development of work led to the organization of the Belgium Annual Conference (MES) by Bishop U. V. W. DARLINGTON in Brussels, June 28, 1930. There were eighteen preachers, seven missionaries, seventeen charges, 1,756 members, four institutions, and a publishing and Bible colportage department. The superintendent was William G. Thonger.

After 1931, and for several years to follow, the newly organized conference struggled for existence in the grip of the world economic depression. Missionaries were recalled, financial support withdrawn, preachers and workers released, property sold, and institutions closed. However, collapse did not come. Though considerably weakened, the Belgium Methodist Conference survived. After 1934 confidence was gradually regained, helped greatly by the arrival of Bishop ARTHUR J. MOORE. Under his leadership some lost ground was steadily recovered. Unification in 1939 found Belgian Methodism once again in a state of promising vitality, as shown by the strong delegation sent to Copenhagen, August, 1939, for the European Methodist Uniting Conference.

A few days after the close of this great gathering, however, the second World War broke upon Europe. Belgium once again was invaded (May 19, 1940). Ruthless Nazi occupation followed. Belgian Methodism suffered serious material and moral devastation. Leading preachers and laymen went into exile, labor or death camps; property was destroyed (twenty-five percent) or damaged (forty-five percent). After Liberation (September 1944) much appreciated physical and spiritual assistance was received from U. S. and British Methodist CHAPLAINS and soldiers serving in Belgium. The arrival of Bishop PAUL N. GARBER (June 1945) inaugurated a successful eight-year reconstruction program. Property was restored or rebuilt; preachers, members, and churches increased. New institutions were organized; mainly The Methodist Center at AMOUGIES (1948) and the Protestant Theological Training School (Faculte de Theologie Protestante) in Brussels (1950). In June 1946 the Belgium Conference was able to resume its regular annual sessions. Bishop Garber presided until 1951. He was followed in 1952 by Bishop Arthur J. Moore, who organized the Central and Southern Europe Central Conference (the Geneva Area). At its first session in Brussels, Oct. 14-17, 1954, FERDINAND SIGG of ZURICH became the first elected bishop of the Geneva Area. Following his sudden death in 1965, Bishop Sigg was succeeded by FRANZ SCHAEFER of BASEL, elected bishop by the Central Conference in Lausanne in 1966.

At the time of organization of the Central Conference, the Belgian Conference reported twenty-one traveling preachers, eight local preachers, seventeen charges with twenty-five churches, 3,410 members, and four institutions. The main centers of work were and are Brussels, Uccle, Vilvorde, Antwerp, Hasselt, Liege, Herstal, Ecausines, Ghlin, Amougies, Comines, and Ypres. Statistics, however, do not truly represent the value of Methodist action and influence in the life of Belgian Protestantism. These have been quite out of proportion with the comparatively small numerical Methodist membership. This is very clearly demonstrated by the Methodist leadership given in many of the general Protestant activities, such as Belgian Federation of Protestant Churches, Belgian Bible Society, Protestant Radio and T.V., Protestant Pavilion at the Brussels World Fair (1958), children's summer vacation centers, Brussels Protestant Theological School, et cetera.

Since 1963 six Methodist churches have come into position of receiving subsidies from the Belgian State. About that same time conversations began between the Evangelical Protestant Church and the Methodist Church looking toward their future national unity in Belgium. A Liaison Committee was created by the annual conference at Vilvorde in 1964. Finally, in 1969 there came about a complete unification of the two church bodies who formed The Protestant Church of Belgium on Dec. 14, 1969. This supplanted to a degree the organizational work of the Belgium Annual Conference, which covered Belgium and included Dunkirk, France.

At the organizational meeting and formation of the Evangelical Protestant Church of Belgium, the Methodist Church brought in sixteen ministers and fourteen congregations, and the Evangelical Protestant Church of Belgium brought in fifty ministers and fifty congregations. Although the Protestant Church in Belgium represents a small minority of the people, the united church places Protestants in a much stronger position. The two churches had a common theological faculty in Brussels for some years, and this was under the able leadership of ANDRE PIETERS. Dr. Pieters was elected the first president of the new church, which includes approximately 17,000 members and seventy congregations, including two English-speaking congregations. The Protestant Church of Belgium will be affiliated with the United Methodist Church in the U.S.A., having the status of a united autonomous church.

BELIN, JAMES LYNCH (1788-1859), American minister, was born in All Saints' Parish, S. C., in 1788, son of James and Mary Lynch Belin. He came from a wealthy Huguenot family, most of whom were Episcopalians. What led him to embrace Methodism is not known, but quite likely he was converted by one of the traveling preachers of his day.

His education, presumably, was at Harvard College where other members of the family were educated. He was admitted on trial into the SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE in December, 1811.

Belin led the way in preaching to the Negroes. This he did in 1819 by instructing those on the Springfield and Brook Green plantations of Robert Withers and Major Ward. In 1836 he and T. Huggins formed Waccamaw Neck Mission in which he labored devotedly for a number of years, freely contributing his means while living and ultimately bequeathing to it almost the whole of his rather extensive property. For example, he personally paid $2,500 to the builder of a church structure on the Waccamaw Neck Mission.

The will of this dedicated Christian leader provided, in a society based on slavery, "that no change be made in the treatment of my servants from what they have been accustomed to receive as members of my household . . . What property I have, they assisted in procuring, and it is but just and right, that they be well fed, clothed, and made comfortable." He further ordered in the event it became necessary to remove any of the "servants" from the premises, "that their removal be effected without the separation of husband and wife."

His estate was left "in trust for the Missionary Society of the South Carolina Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. . .," and it is still used to advance the cause of Christian missions. Through the years it has been one of the substantial contributors to this cause.

James Lynch Belin had four sisters. He married first, Elizabeth Laval, who died in 1821. On May 24, 1831, he was married to Charlotte Withers of Goose Creek. She died in 1893 at the age of ninety-four and is buried in Elmwood Cemetery, Georgetown, S. C.

Belin died May 19, 1859, following injuries sustained in a fall from his buggy. His burial place was at Cedar Hill in what was then the family burial ground. It is today the cemetery of the Belin Memorial Church and the community of Murrells Inlet, S. C.

BELL, GEORGE (?-1807), British Methodism's classic enthusiast, was born at Boringham, Durham. He served for a time as a corporal in the Life Guard. He was converted in 1758 and became associated with THOMAS MAXFIELD and JOHN WESLEY at the FOUNDRY, gaining a reputation for holiness and extempore prayers. Bell would deny the Sacrament to the unjustified. He preached perfection free from rule, canon, and guidance. His convictions ran from stillness to philosophical humanism via "entire satisfaction." His leadership in London societies (West Street and Foundry) he ruined by screaming and gesticulation. Wesley believed that Bell possessed authentic healing power, but repudiated his "resurrections," and his widely believed prophecy of the world's end on Feb. 28, 1763. When Wesley expelled Bell in December 1762, Maxfield withdrew, taking away one-fifth of London's Methodists.

Bell died in 1807 in Paddington.

WILLIAM M. BELL

BELL, WILLIAM MELVIN (1860-1933), American U.B. minister, general church officer, and bishop, was born in Whitley County, Ind., Nov. 12, 1860. His great-grandfather, Zephaniah Bell, was a pioneer Methodist circuit rider in Ohio. Converted at the age of fifteen, young Bell became a school teacher at seventeen, and was licensed to preach by the St. Joseph Conference of the UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST in 1879. He was ordained in 1882. He received his education in Roanoke Seminary and Columbia City Normal School. The University of Southern California honored him with the LL.D. degree. The spectacular success of William Bell as a pastor and organizer soon resulted in his becoming the head of the Indiana State Sunday School Association, a full-time position. The United Brethren GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1893 chose him to become executive secretary of the Home, Frontier, and Foreign Missionary Society. After twelve fruitful years in this office he was chosen a bishop in 1905, serving the Pacific Coast Area for twelve years, and the Eastern Area for a similar period. Ill health hastened his retirement in 1929. He died Oct. 6, 1933, at his home in La Puente, Calif.

Bishop Bell wrote many books and articles for periodicals. As an orator he frequently appeared on the Chautauqua circuit. William Jennings Bryan once acclaimed him as having no peer on the public platform.

BELL, WILLIAM W. (1894-), and his wife, Rosetta, served in the M. E. CHURCH in BURMA from 1921 to 1932, and then in INDIA until Methodist union merged that body with the M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH and the M. P. CHURCH. They then continued in India as missionaries of the united church.

In Burma Bell worked with Indians. In India he was agent of the Madras Publishing House and the Lucknow Publishing House; manager of the B. H. Smith Company, Calcutta; in prisoner-of-war work under the Y.M.C.A.; and treasurer for Southern Asia in the World Division of the Board of Missions. He retired in February, 1963. His last eight or nine years were given to the publishing interests of the church.

While treasurer of India accounts for the Board of Missions, he was a top executive of the Inter-Mission business office and a member of the executive board and the interim committee of the Methodist Church in Southern Asia.

While working in prisoner-of-war camps in India, he directed literacy classes for 85,000 men and was highly commended by officers of the camps. On furlough in 1953, he obtained the degree of Master of Business Administration from the Wharton School, Philadelphia. His services as treasurer and as agent of the publishing house in Lucknow reflected his thorough training, and they were dramatically successful. In the Lucknow Publishing House he arrested a downward trend in the volume of printing done and in the financial condition of the institution, paid off accumulated debts, purchased and installed new and up-to-date equipment, and substantially increased the working capital of the institution.

BELL, WILLIAM YANCY (1887-1962), a bishop of the C.M.E. CHURCH, was born on Feb. 23, 1887, in Memphis, Tenn. He received the A.B. degree from LANE COLLEGE, the M.A. degree from NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY, the B.D. degree from GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE, and the Ph.D. degree from Yale. He was ordained deacon in 1912 and elder in 1915. Pastorates he served were in ILLINOIS, NEW YORK, and TENNESSEE. Bishop Bell was a professor at Lane College in 1916-17; at GAMMON THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, where he was head of the New Testament department from 1928 to 1932; at MORRIS BROWN COLLEGE in 1932-33; and at Howard University, 1935-39.

At the General Conference in 1938 he was elected to the office of bishop and presided over the state of GEORGIA. During his episcopacy, he revitalized colored Methodism in Georgia. He rejuvenated the Holsey Academy and made it a secondary school for the education of ministers.

Bishop Bell died on April 10, 1962.

BELLAMY, WILLIAM (1756-1846), pioneer American minister of Edgecombe County, N. C., and leader in the founding of the M. P. CHURCH in eastern Carolina, was admitted into the VIRGINIA CONFERENCE of the M. E. CHURCH in 1791 and appointed to the Bladen Circuit. He had served as a lieutenant of Horse Guards during the Revolutionary War. As president pro-tem of the Roanoke District Conference of local ministers, he sent an "Address to the Bishops and Virginia Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church" on Dec. 7, 1821, that opposed the action of the 1820 GENERAL CONFERENCE for governing LOCAL PREACHERS without their consent.

In November, 1824, Bellamy joined the Roanoke Union Society as a protest against the authority assumed by the leaders of the M. E. Church, and the next April he was named to an editorial committee authorized "to publish such pieces for this society as . . . will tend to promote a reformation in the Methodist Episcopal Church, or promulgate the wishes and views of this society for that purpose." In August 1828, Bellamy was written by Superintendent William Compton to withdraw from the Roanoke Union Society and cease to patronize THE MUTUAL RIGHTS or prepare for trial.

When Bellamy and six other local ministers failed to appear before Compton two weeks later they were suspended as ministers. On Oct. 25, 1828, Bellamy was brought to trial and "found guilty—expelled (from) the church—the seal of official silence set upon his lips."

Bellamy was present on Dec. 19-20, 1828, at the organizational meeting of the NORTH CAROLINA ANNUAL CONFERENCE of the M. P. Church at WHITAKER'S CHAPEL near Enfield, N. C. He collected material to write a history of reform in the "Old Roanoke District," but his death occurred before the work was completed. He attended the General Conference of the M. P. Church in Cincinnati in May, 1846.

His missionary labors had covered a ministry of over fifty years and took him into most of the southern states. He was noted for his eloquence. His nephew, William Exum Bellamy (c. 1791-1853) was also active in the establishment of the North Carolina Annual Conference of the M. P. Church. JOHN PARIS completed the history of reform which William Bellamy began, and it was published in 1849.

Bellamy "lived to a ripe old age, and died (October 4, 1846) honored and respected by all who knew him."

BELLHOUSE, HAROLD EDWARD (1869-1948), New Zealand minister, was born in Leeds, Yorkshire, England, of godly parents, with whom he came to AUCKLAND, NEW ZEALAND, when twelve years of age. He early felt the call to preach; became a candidate when twenty-one and in 1894, after training in Wesley Three Kings College, began a distinguished ministry. He stood in the front rank of Methodist preachers. In 1919 he was president of the Conference: for eleven years he edited the New Zealand Methodist Times. He was known as a good bookman, and drew his material as preacher and editor from his wide reading in English literature and books on social and political movements of the times. He died in Auckland on Oct. 4, 1948.

BEMERSLEY, England, home of HUGH and JAMES BOURNE, and the scene of the first PRIMITIVE METHODIST Book Room (1820). Letters were carried from Bemersley Farm two miles to post, and incoming mail was left at a public house in Norton. Hugh Bourne evidently had a great admiration for JOHN WESLEY and a desire to copy his methods. But Bemersley Farm became much more than a denominational Book Room; it was a vital spiritual center, offering hospitality to the preachers who came for discussions and love feasts. James Bourne acquired a printing press, bookbinders' tools, and materials, establishing these in a farm building near the house. Transport was mainly by canal. There was a disastrous fire in 1833, causing £1,900 damage—equally to James Bourne's assets and those of the church. The church's loss was recompensed by a penny levy throughout the movement, Bourne generously forgoing any compensation. The Book Room remained at Bemersley until 1842, when JOHN FLESHER was the leading spirit in moving the work to London.

BENEDUM, MICHAEL LATE (1869-1959), American oil magnate and Methodist philanthropist, was born at BRIDGEPORT, W. Va., July 16, 1869. His formal education was meager, but in time he received several honorary degrees. As a youth he worked in the oil fields, began buying leases, and later formed his own company. He became West Virginia's most successful businessman, amassing a fortune estimated at one hundred million dollars. A devout churchman, Benedum gave more than $1,500,000 in 1953 to build the Methodist church in Bridgeport. He married Sarah Lantz in 1896. Their only child, Claude, died of influenza while serving in World War I. As a memorial to him they formed in 1944 the Claude Worthington Benedum Foundation, the income from which goes to religious, educational, and civic projects in WEST VIRGINIA, PENNSYLVANIA, and OHIO. During its first twenty years the foundation gave some $12,000,000 to about 150 projects, nearly $1,000,000 of it going to WEST VIRGINIA WESLEYAN COLLEGE, $730,000 to the civic center at Bridgeport, and smaller amounts to seventeen other educational institutions in West Virginia. Benedum declared, "I do not think of myself as owning anything. I must be a good steward."

He died in Pittsburgh, Pa., July 30, 1959.

BENEDYKTOWICZ, WITOLD KAZIMIERZ (1921-), Polish minister, was born in Cracow, POLAND, June 25, 1921. He joined THE METHODIST CHURCH in 1941, and the following year entered the Methodist Theological School in Warsaw. In 1943 he was licensed to preach and was admitted into full connection by the POLAND (Provisional) Annual Conference, November 1945. Bishop PAUL NEFF GARRER ordained him a deacon in February 1946 and an elder in June 1947.

He has served pastorates in Cracow (1943-45, 1946-48), in Poznan and Olsztyn (1945), and Wesley Church, Warsaw (1948-69). From 1945 to 1951 he was secretary of the Poland Annual Conference; from 1956, a vice-president. He taught church history (1947-51) at the Methodist Theological School in Warsaw. In 1969 he became general superintendent of the Methodist Church in Poland and principal of the English Language School in Warsaw.

In 1950 Benedyktowicz completed his undergraduate work at the University of Warsaw with a degree in theology. Four years later he earned the Th.D. degree from the same university. In 1965 he obtained the degree of Doctor at the Christian Theological Academy in Warsaw after publishing a dissertation on the Christian doctrine of peace.

He has written numerous articles for the church and public press. He has served as editor of the Polish Methodist monthly, Pielgrzym Polski and the Polish Ecumenical Review. He has also been national secretary of the Ecumenical Sunday School Committee, chairman of the Press Committee of the Polish Ecumenical Council, and vice-chairman of the National Committee of the Prague Christian Peace Conference.

In 1943 he married Irena Manska and has two sons, Olgierd and Zbigniew.

BENGAL, India. British Methodist work in Bengal began in 1830, when the Wesleyan ministers Peter Percival and Thomas Hodson began a mission in CALCUTTA. This work was discontinued after three years, and it was not until 1859 that Daniel Pearson became chaplain to the four hundred Wesleyan soldiers in Bengal, and a catechist was sent to Bankura in 1871. During the 1880s work among Indians developed, under the leadership of Bengali-speaking missionaries. In 1879, Calcutta received the status of a separate district, later known as the Bengal District. The first Bengali minister, Prem Chand Nath, began work in 1885. Elementary education developed rapidly, while secondary education centered on Bankura High School, now Bankura Christian Collegiate School, and Wesleyan College, now Bankura Christian College, which was founded in 1903. At Bankura too, by the beginning of the first world war, the Methodist Church was responsible for two hostels (for Hindus and Christians respectively), and a technical school, which offered training in carpentry and weaving. In the early 1900s, Methodism developed fairly rapidly among the Santal people, but without reaching the proportions of a mass movement. In 1968, the Bengal District had eighty-six places of worship, 2,093 full members, and a community of 4,922. It had eight primary schools with 1,094 pupils, seven secondary schools with 2,993 students, and one teachers' training college with forty students. There is a 73-bed Methodist hospital at Sarenga and a Leprosy Home at Bankura.

BENGAL CONFERENCE covers all of West Bengal, Pakaur, Birbhum, Dhanbad, and Gomoh in eastern Bihar, India. Methodist work was begun in Bengal itself in 1873 when WILLIAM TAYLOR opened his work in CALCUTTA.

Calcutta is the great city of the Bengal Conference and two Methodist districts are represented there—the Bengali and the English-Hindustani Districts. Another large city of this conference is Asansol, with a population of 103,405. It is 132 miles west of Calcutta and a great industrial area.

In 1888 the Bengal Conference was separated from the SOUTH INDIA CONFERENCE to which it had formerly belonged. At last reporting there were forty-three preachers and fifty-seven supply pastors in the conference, serving 8,985 Methodists.

The Congregational Council for World Mission and the British Methodist Missionary Society, as well as the United Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, are at work in West Bengal. In 1968 British-related Methodism in the Bengal District had eighty-six places of worship, seventeen Indian and nine expatriate ministers, 2,516 full members and members on trial, and a total community of 4,922. It was responsible for a hospital at Sarenga, and for a total of twenty educational institutions, with 2,993 students.

BENDEL, JOHANN ALBRECHT (1687-1752), German Pietist and biblical scholar, was born at Winnenden, Württemberg, June 24, 1687, educated at Tübingen University, and held various offices in the Lutheran Church. He died at Stuttgart, Nov. 2, 1752. Bengel worked on the textual criticism of the New Testament, but it is his Gnomon (1742), a critical and exegetical commentary on the New Testament, which is regarded as of lasting value. JOHN WESLEY'S Explanatory Notes upon the New Testament (1755) were drawn largely from this work. Wesley did not wholly share Bengel's weakness for apocryphal speculation, although he reproduced Bengel's chronology of "Revelation," including the date of the Millennium as A.D. 1836.

BENNETT, JOHN (1714-1759), British Methodist, became one of JOHN WESLEY'S itinerant preachers in 1747. He traveled mainly in Derbyshire, Cheshire, and Lancashire. On Oct. 3, 1749, he married GRACE MURRAY. Thereafter he entertained Calvinistic views. He formally separated from Wesley on Dec. 26, 1752, accusing him of preaching papist doctrine and of being himself a "pope." A number of people left Methodism with Bennet. He became the pastor of an independent congregation at Warburton, in Cheshire, and died May 24, 1759.

BENNETT'S MINUTES. JOHN BENNETT was one of JOHN WESLEY'S preachers for a time. In common with a few others, including Wesley himself, he made copies of the conference proceedings from the first Conference in 1744 to that of 1748, excluding 1746. His copies largely agree with Wesley's. For the Conference of 1748 Bennet's manuscript alone survives. His Minutes give the fullest account of the proceedings of these early conferences. They were published by the Wesley Historical Society in 1896.

BENNETT, BELLE HARRIS (1852-1922), American missionary administrator and stateswoman, was born on Dec. 3, 1852 near Richmond, Ky. She became active in the cause of missions as a young woman, and gradually was given more and more responsibility. In 1887 she proposed establishing a training school for missionaries, and was authorized by the Woman's Board of Foreign Missions (M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH) to serve as agent to raise funds for such a school. SCARRITT COLLEGE for Christian Workers was the result, located first in Kansas City, Mo. in 1892 and later moved to Nashville, Tenn. A Belle Bennett Bible Chair was endowed at Scarritt in her honor. She served as superintendent of mountain work, and helped to raise funds to establish and endow the SUE BENNETT COLLEGE in the Appalachians at London, Ky., in 1896, named in memory of her sister who had been concerned (before her death in 1892) about such work, as secretary of the Women's Department of the Board of Church Extension.

Belle H. Bennett was elected president of the Woman's Parsonage and Home Mission Society in 1896. She traveled extensively, and was involved in the beginnings of work with Negroes, students, and immigrants including Mexicans and Cubans; in settlement houses; and for unmarried mothers. She helped establish the DEACONESSE Board in her church, and a dormitory at PAINE COLLEGE was named for her, as was Bennett College in RIO DE JANEIRO, and the Clinical Building at Woman's Christian Medical College in Shanghai. She was elected president of the Woman's Missionary Council of the denomination when it was organized in 1910, and served in this capacity for twelve years during which time the membership tripled and annual giving approached the million dollar mark. Mission work was greatly extended—in AFRICA, JAPAN, and at home. She served as the only woman on the Joint Commission on the Centenary of Methodist Missions for the two episcopal Methodisms, 1919-24. For all her service she never accepted any salary, and made many gifts when budgets were low. KENTUCKY WESLEYAN COLLEGE conferred on her the LL.D. degree in 1916. She was a representative of her denomination at the ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE in London, 1901; at the WORLD MISSIONARY CONFERENCE at Edinburgh, 1910; and was one of three women from the United States serving on the planning committee for the INTERNATIONAL MISSIONARY COUNCIL. In 1910 the GENERAL CONFERENCE invited Miss Bennett to speak at its session regarding laity rights for women; hers was the first woman's voice ever heard at a session of the denomination's highest body. When laity rights were finally established, she was elected a lay delegate from her conference on the first ballot but was prevented by her final illness from attending the General Conference of 1922. She died on July 20, 1922. Among the all-time great leaders in the M. E. Church, South, she must be accorded a place.

BENNETT, LESLIE ERNEST (1878-1957), Australian minister and educator, was a son of the parsonage and was born at New Town, Hobart, Tasmania. He graduated with first class honours in philosophy from Melbourne University.

From 1903 to 1916 he was stationed in Victoria and Tasmania. He was then appointed Master of King's College, BRISBANE University; this position included responsibility for theological education. In 1924 he accepted the Mastership of Wesley College, within the University of Sydney. This position he held with distinction for nineteen years.

Well known in every Australian State for his scholarship, he was extraordinarily gifted as a speaker. A whimsical manner and a disarming wit reflected his contagious humaneness. In 1933 he was appointed President of the NEW SOUTH WALES CONFERENCE.

He was the author of one book, The Realm of God.

BENNETT, SARAH EDITH (1910-), American educator and missionary to BRAZIL, was born on June 26, 1910, in Natchez, Miss. She graduated from Whitworth College in 1930; received a B.S. in elementary education from Peabody College in NASHVILLE in 1935. During furloughs, she earned a Master's degree in Christian Education from SCARRITT COLLEGE in 1946. She took post-graduate work at GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE and Princeton Seminary. She went to Brazil as a missionary in 1940, and taught first in Ribeiras Preto where she started the first courses in Christian education for girls.

She was then appointed to start the Instituto Metodista, a training school for DEACONESSES and Christian workers. From 1942 to 1959, she was principal, and in 1966 was director of courses and professor of Christian education. Since 1951 she has been a member of the General Board of Education of the Methodist Church in Brazil, and of the Conference Board of Christian Education and Social Action. She was a delegate to the General Conference of this church in 1955, when for the first time two young graduates of the Instituto Metodista were consecrated as deaconesses of the Methodist Church in Brazil. She has been a member of all Sunday school curriculum conferences since 1947 and has done some curriculum writing over the years. In 1968, she came to the United States for an extended furlough, during which she studied at Scarritt College and VANDERBILT, and then served under the Woman's Division of the Board of Missions at Blairstown, N. J.

BENNETT COLLEGE, Greensboro, N. C., was founded in 1873 by the FREEDMEN'S AID SOCIETY as a coeducational college of liberal arts of the M. E. Church. It was named for Lyman Bennett of Troy, N. Y., who donated $10,000 toward its establishment. In 1926, under the leadership of DAVID D. JONES, it was reorganized as a woman's college. A new educational plant was made possible by generous grants from Mr. and Mrs. HENRY PREIFFER, the General Education Board, the WOMAN'S SOCIETY OF CHRISTIAN SERVICE, and the Division of Higher Education, Board of Education.

Bennett was one of the first colleges historically serving Negro youth to meet the established standards of the Southern Association of Schools and Colleges. In 1964 it qualified for a grant from the Ford Foundation for its current operational budget. It grants the B.A. and B.S.

degrees. The governing board has twenty-seven members, nine elected by the Board of Education of The Methodist Church, nine by the Woman's Division of Christian Service of the Board of Missions, and nine at large by the board.

BENSON, FRANK THOMAS (1862-1929), American minister and editor, was born in Queen Anne's County, Md., on Aug. 2, 1862. His father was B. F. Benson, of the MARYLAND CONFERENCE of the M. P. CHURCH; his mother, a member of the prominent Thomas family in Maryland. His entire life reflected the wholesome religious training of his home, his convictions, and his devotion to the M. P. Church—its history, doctrine and polity.

He was graduated from WESTERN MARYLAND COLLEGE in 1884, and from the WESTMINSTER THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY in 1886. His gifts and graces were quite apparent when he united with the Maryland Annual Conference in 1886 and was ordained two years later. He married the daughter of J. T. Murray, also a member of the same conference. The eldest son, F. Murray Benson, became a member of the Board of Publication of THE METHODIST CHURCH at unification and later its president.

During Frank Benson's pastoral career he served a number of prominent churches with distinction. His preaching was thoughtful, biblical, evangelical.

The 1916 General Conference elected him as editor of The Methodist Protestant, published in Baltimore. In this capacity he found an opportunity for the best expression of his high intellectual gifts. His editorials furnished his readers with religious history, old and new, doctrines, dead and living, church programs, wise and unwise, modern foes and friends of the Gospel, so that no one should be led away from the "faith of the fathers."

He died suddenly April 5, 1929 in Baltimore at the age of sixty-seven.

Almost the last stroke of his pen was, "Your bark will never reach the Heavenly Haven if the Pilot who knows the seas is not at the helm."

BENSON, HENRY CLARKE (1816-1897), American minister, who became a charter member of the California Conference, was an able educator and leader of Western Methodism. He was born April 10, 1816, near Xenia, Ohio; educated at Indiana Asbury University, where he received an A.B. in 1842; A.M. in 1843, and D.D. in 1864. He later became a Doctor of Medicine at WILLAMETTE UNIVERSITY in 1874.

He was received on trial in the INDIANA CONFERENCE in 1842; and in his career served in educational work for four years, in administration ten, in editorial sixteen, and in the pastorate twenty. Feeling the call to the California mission field at the mid-century, he reached SAN FRANCISCO on March 14, 1852, where he joined and helped organize the California Conference, in which he served four districts as presiding elder. During one quadrennium he was editor of the Pacific Christian Advocate and for twelve years was editor of the California Christian Advocate. He was a trustee of the UNIVERSITY OF THE PACIFIC for twenty years, and served for several years as its president. He was elected and served as a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church in 1864, 1868, 1876, and 1884.

He married Matilda M. Williamson in 1842, and to them were born eleven children. "Few men, if indeed any, had a larger influence upon the Church for more than half a century," commented C. V. ANTHONY.

Benson died at Santa Clara, Calif., on Jan. 14, 1897.

JOSEPH BENSON

BENSON, JOSEPH (1748-1821), British Methodist, was born at Melmerby, Cumberland, and was appointed classical tutor at KINGSWOOD SCHOOL by JOHN WESLEY in 1766. In 1770 he left to take up the post of headmaster of the COUNTESS OF HUNTINGDON'S college at TREVECKA but was discharged in nine months for refusing to disavow Wesley's Arminian theology. After first considering Anglican orders, he became a WESLEYAN METHODIST itinerant in 1771, and proved a forceful and diligent scholar. He was a staunch conservative in both politics and churchmanship. He helped to draw up the PLAN OF PACIFICATION in 1795, was president of the Wesleyan Conference in 1798 and again in 1810, was editor of the METHODIST MAGAZINE from 1804 to 1821, and was secretary of the Conference in 1805 and 1809. His writings include a biography of JOHN FLETCHER (1804) and a five-volume commentary on the Bible (1815-18). He died Feb. 16, 1821.

BENTON HARBOR, MICHIGAN, U.S.A. Methodist Peace Temple is one of the distinctive churches of MICHIGAN Methodism. In September, 1867, the church was first organized under the leadership of J. I. Buell. Over the 100-year span its history has been one of Christian advance on the foundations of calamity. In 1870 a handsome brick building was constructed and dedicated, only to be destroyed by lightning five years later.

Feeling responsibility for a large debt on the destroyed church, and swindled out of their insurance money, they sold the old brick to meet their obligations and began the task of rebuilding. In 1880 they succeeded in constructing a new church that became a landmark in the community and have since expanded three times its facilities.

In January, 1919, flames devoured the beloved edifice. At midnight, during the fire, vast throngs gathered, and the homeless congregation spontaneously began to sing the great hymns of the church. A new church was begun and it became a memorial and prophecy of peace, and so became the Methodist Peace Temple. While desperately trying to secure $100,000 for construction, the great "Centenary Call" of the M. E. CHURCH came to Benton Harbor asking for $24,000. This was subscribed in thirty minutes prior to the church's own campaign for $100,000.

The Methodist Peace Temple today stands as a tribute to Christian faith in a community that respects and admires her works and quietly and effectively continues her ministry. The buildings of the church are valued at three-quarters of a million, and there are 1,700 members. Peace Temple faces the challenge of an inner-city church with her time-tested hopeful faith.

BEREA, OHIO, U.S.A. The Methodist Children's Home was founded by the German Methodists of the central United States in 1864. The first child was admitted on March 1 of that year. The purpose was to receive orphans and other children who needed a home as a result of the aftermath of the War Between the States. The first building was erected in 1866 and was expanded in 1891. In 1924 another section was added and the name was changed to "The German Methodist Orphan's Home."

In 1933 the CENTRAL GERMAN CONFERENCE merged with the NORTH-EAST OHIO CONFERENCE. The Home assumed its present name at that time. Since the Home began as a German project, all its early records are written in German.

During most of its history custodial care for children has been provided. In 1960 the Home began to treat the special needs of children. It now operates as a residential treatment center for emotionally disturbed children. The staff includes the superintendent, a consulting psychiatrist, two consulting psychologists, four social workers, a chaplain, a nurse, a dietician, recreation director and house-parents, plus a business staff.

Certain teachers in the home are employed by the Berea Board of Education in their Special Education Department. There are presently thirty-four children under treatment, and ten children under care in foster homes. (See also BALDWIN-WALLACE COLLEGE.)

BERGER, DANIEL (1832-1920), American U.B. pastor, editor and author, was born near Reading, Pa., Feb. 14, 1832. He was educated at Ohio Methodist Episcopal High School, Springfield, Ohio, and Ohio University, and was a schoolteacher for several years.

Having joined the Church of the UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST in 1844, he was licensed to preach in 1854 and was ordained in 1858 by the MIAMI CONFERENCE, in which he served pastorates from 1858 to 1864, the final year at First Church, DAYTON, Ohio. The next thirty-one years of his life were dedicated to editorial work. He served as editor of the U.B. Sunday school literature from 1869 to 1893 and, upon the death of his successor in 1895, again until 1897. For twelve of those years he was a member of the International Sunday School Lesson Committee. His History of the Church of the United Brethren in Christ (1897) was used in courses of study until superseded in 1924 by a later account.

He died Sept. 12, 1920 at his home in Dayton, Ohio.

BERGIN, JOHN WILLIAM (1872-1947), American preacher and college president, was born near Houston, Texas, April 25, 1872 and died in June, 1947, having served in the ministry fifty consecutive years. Admitted on trial in the TEXAS CONFERENCE in 1897, he transferred to MONTANA, but after four years returned to his homeland, being stationed at Houston, Marlin, Brenham, Longview, and Marshall. In 1915 he moved to the CENTRAL TEXAS CONFERENCE and in that body was pastor at Temple, Fort Worth, and Corsicana. "In the Fort Worth congregation he introduced the use of radio, being the first minister in the state to use the radio as a means of speaking to the unseen audience." As PRESIDING ELDER he was stationed at Waco, Waxahachie, and Georgetown.

In 1935 Bergin became president of SOUTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY, an "institution at the time struggling under heavy debt." Within seven years the bills were all paid, and there had been erected, free of debt, a library and a gymnasium. In recognition of his academic studies, he received three degrees: Ph.B., D.D. and LL.D. Five times his annual conference sent him as a delegate to the General Conference.

BERINGTON, JOSEPH (1743-1827), British Roman Catholic apologist, was born at Winsley, Herefordshire, Jan. 16, 1743. He was educated at St. Omer and Douai in FRANCE, became a priest, and on his return to England soon became prominent as one of those who sought greater freedom for English Roman Catholics. He was very liberal in his views, associating with Protestants, including Joseph Priestley, and he never enjoyed the confidence of the English Catholic clergy. When JOHN WESLEY, on Jan. 12, 1780, wrote a public letter (Letters, vi, 370) in which he strongly objected to any further relief for English Roman Catholics, Berington wrote to him what Wesley himself called "a friendly letter." Wesley replied to Berington, and his letter has survived, together with a second letter which he wrote after Berington had answered his first. Unfortunately, both of Berington's letters have disappeared. Wesley's replies to him were not published in the standard edition, but may be found in Proceedings of the Wesley Historical Society, xxvi, 38. Berington did not achieve his purpose, which was undoubtedly to persuade Wesley to moderate his anti-Catholic tone. He died in Bucklaw, Berkshire, Dec. 1, 1827.

BERKELEY, CALIFORNIA, U.S.A. The M. E. CHURCH began work in Berkeley in 1878, and the M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH held some services there as early as 1881. A congregation of twenty-three members, which became First M. E. Church, dedicated its first building in 1883. In 1908 the denomination had four churches in Berkeley with a total of 822 members. In 1939 the total membership was 1,861, some 1,431 of which were in Trinity Church, which started as an outgrowth of First Church in 1883.

Berkeley appeared as an appointment in the minutes of the Pacific Conference of the M. E. Church, South for the first time in 1905. The church then had sixty-three members. At unification in 1939 it had 541 members and was known as Epworth Church. In 1952 Northbrae Church, with 654 members, a M. E. congregation prior to 1939, merged with Epworth, and the consolidated body continued as Epworth Church.

A Japanese-language church was established in Berkeley. In 1964 when the PACIFIC JAPANESE PROVISIONAL CONFERENCE was absorbed by the English-speaking conferences, the Japanese congregation in Berkeley consisted of 250 members. It is now called United Church.

In 1969 Berkeley had three United Methodist churches with a total of 1,738 members and property valued at $1,872,000. They raised for all purposes during the year about $95,000.

BERLIN is officially still the capital of GERMANY. It has been divided East and West by the Wall since 1961. Population of the Western sectors in 1969 was 2,141,000, and of the Eastern sector, 1,080,000.

LOUIS NIPPERT started Methodist work in Berlin in 1858. The first building was erected on Cross Hill, Junker Street, in 1867, with considerable assistance from the U.S. ambassador. It is now called the Church of the Resurrection. Toward the end of the 1870's the work began to expand both in numbers and area. The organization of the Evangelische Gemeinschaft (E.U.B.) was begun by J. Knapp in 1888. Its first sanctuary, North Berlin's Church of the Redeemer, was dedicated in 1904. The building of the second, Christ Church, was accomplished in 1906.

After the erection of the Wall, the West Berlin districts of both the Methodist Church and the Gemeinschaft continued to be under the jurisdiction of the earlier East German area authorities. At the time of union in 1963, separation from the Eastern jurisdiction took place. The two churches of the Western sectors proceeded to the joint formation of the Annual Conference of West Berlin, comprising eighteen congregations with a total of 4,500 members and associates. In West Berlin the Evangelical Methodist Church owns eleven churches, five parish halls, three old peoples' homes, two youth centers, the Sophien Hospital affiliated with the Hamburg Bethany foundation, and the Bethesda Hospital affiliated with the Wuppertal Elberfeld Deaconesses Institution. Leadership and jurisdiction is in the hands of West Berlin's district superintendent.

EVANGELISCHE METHODISTE CHURCH
TILSITERSTRASSE, EAST BERLIN

In East Berlin the church owns five sanctuaries, with five congregations numbering 1,100 members and associates. Recognition of Berlin's Evangelical Methodist Church with regard to ecumenical status, press and radio publicity, is of considerable and ever rising significance.

BERMONDSEY SETTLEMENT, England. (See LIDGETT, JOHN SCOTT.)

BERMUDA ISLANDS, a British crown colony with responsible internal self-government, is a group of over 360 coral islands only 20 of which are inhabited, in the Atlantic Ocean, 580 miles east of the NORTH CAROLINA coast of the United States. It is an atoll, the larger units being St. David's, St. George's, Somerset, Paget, Warwick and Bermuda. The land area is about 20 square miles, and resident population in 1968 was estimated to be about 51,000. Hamilton on Bermuda Island is the capital.

Early in the 15th century, Juan de Bermudez was wrecked on these islands while sailing from Spain to CUBA with a cargo of hogs. Ultimately the British established a settlement which became a half-way house for ships sailing between Britain and the Caribbean or the Southern Colonies of America. Many thousands of tourists visit Bermuda each year. The United States, in cooperation with Great Britain, maintains a naval station on long term lease.

GEORGE WHITEFIELD spent a month in the Bermudas in 1748, but he organized no classes or societies. In 1798 Captain Mackie, a Methodist, Commander of HMS Thetis, urged THOMAS COKE in England to send a preacher to the islands. At the same time, Enoch Matson, Presbyterian minister at Warwick, Bermuda, appealed to Coke. Matson had served in American Methodism from 1782 to 1788, having been ordained elder by Coke at the CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE in BALTIMORE when the M. E. CHURCH was organized in December 1784. He had withdrawn in 1788 because of frail health, and then went to Bermuda. Coke sent John Stephenson of the Irish Conference, who reached Bermuda in May 1799. He established societies at St. George's and Hamilton. Others followed, including Joshua Marsden, James Dunbar and William Watson. By 1814 Bermuda was recognized as "a two preachers' station."

About 1830 a revival tripled the church's membership within four years. In 1851 Methodist work on the island, which until then had been associated with the Bahamas District, was transferred to the Nova Scotia District. It thus became successively part of the autonomous CANADA CONFERENCE, formed in 1855; the larger Methodist Church in Canada (1884) and the UNITED CHURCH OF CANADA (1925).

BERRIDGE, JOHN (1716-1793), British evangelical clergyman, was born at Kingston, Nottinghamshire, March 1, 1716, the son of a farmer. Educated at Clare Hall, Cambridge, in 1755 he accepted the living of Everton, in Bedfordshire, which he retained to the end of his life. On June 2, 1758, he first met JOHN WESLEY; a strong friendship sprang up between them, and his religious sentiments gradually changed. His preaching became intensely evangelical, and he engaged in preaching tours in parts of the Midlands. Wesley frequently preached in his church. Later in his life his association with the COUNTESS OF HUNTINGDON and GEORGE WHITEFIELD led him to entertain Calvinistic views, and he bitterly attacked his former friend, Wesley, on theological grounds. In 1760 he published A Collection of Divine Songs, including hymns by the Wesleys which he had altered to give Calvinistic significance. This the Wesleys naturally resented. He published another such book in 1785. He died on Jan. 22, 1793, at Everton.

BERRY, JOSEPH FLINTOFT (1856-1931), American bishop, was born in Aylmer, Ont., Can., on May 13, 1856, the son of Francis and Ann (Lawson) Berry. His father was a minister in the PRIMITIVE METHODIST CHURCH. He was one of twelve children; one of his brothers also entered the ministry. Berry's education was received in Canada ending at Milton Academy. He began preaching at the age of seventeen, a "boy preacher" who in 1874 was received on trial by the DETROIT CONFERENCE, M. E. Church, and assigned to the Memphis-Wales charge. Then followed appointments to Ft. Gratiot and Mt. Clemens, a year at Tucson, Ariz., and Mt. Clemens for three years.

Joseph Berry was associate editor of the Michigan Christian Advocate, 1886-90, and proved that he had a genuine journalistic instinct. He was named editor of the newly founded Epworth Herald, and filled this position with distinction for fourteen years (1890-1904). He extended the circulation beyond that of any publication in Methodism and built up the EPWORTH LEAGUES across the church.

Berry was a member of the GENERAL CONFERENCES of 1892, 1896, 1900, and 1904. He was elected bishop in 1904 and served for twenty-four years. His first assignment was BUFFALO, N. Y., where he remained eight years. He was then transferred to PHILADELPHIA. The 1920 General Conference established the area plan and he was returned to Philadelphia with a specific territory as his special field.

Bishop Berry was uncompromising against the liquor business. With his fellow ministers he was genial, friendly, and approachable.

A gifted writer, he wrote many articles, chiefly along his special interests and convictions. Two books are of note, The Epworth League and Four Wonderful Years. In 1898 Lawrence College honored him with the D.D. degree, and in 1904 Cornell College with the LL.D. degree, as did SYRACUSE UNIVERSITY in 1905.

In 1876, Bishop Berry married Olive Johnson. After retirement in 1928, the Berrys made their home at Winter Park, Fla., where he died on Feb. 11, 1931. He was buried in the family plot in Mt. Clemens, Mich.

BERRY, LUCIEN W. (1815-1858), American minister and college president, was born at Alburg, Vt. Educated at Miami University, Oxford, Ohio, he was admitted to the INDIANA ANNUAL CONFERENCE of the M. E. CHURCH in 1838. He served a series of small churches until 1842 when he was assigned to the Western Charge, INDIANAPOLIS. Here he successfully vied for preaching honors with Henry Ward Beecher who was at the Second Presbyterian Church. From 1844-48 he was PRESIDING ELDER in succession of the Indianapolis, Brookville and Comersville Districts. In 1848 he became president of Indiana

Asbury University (now DEPAUW), following MATTHEW SIMPSON. His effective administration included the establishment of a Law Department. Contemporary accounts stress his remarkable pulpit oratory, particularly in revival preaching to the students. In 1854 he returned to pastoral work at New Albany and in May, 1855 was elected president of IOWA WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, Mount Pleasant, which had just been chartered. He established a sound curriculum, doubled the faculty strength, introduced a Department of Biblical Studies under CHARLES ELLIOTT, and struggled with the completion of and payment for a new university building (Old Main). The first B.A. degree was granted in 1856 on the occasion of Berry's formal inauguration. He resigned on Nov. 25, 1857 to become president of the proposed Jefferson City University, Missouri (1859-61), a project of the Bentonite and free soil parties. However he died of erysipelas in Cincinnati on July 23, 1858. His published sermons are marked by clarity, learning and forceful expression which bear out the obituary tribute that he was "a powerful divine, a good scholar, an orator of power and a holy man."

BERRY, THEODORE M. (See JUDICIAL COUNCIL.)

BERRY, WILBUR F. (1851-1945), American minister, educator, and moral reformer, was born in Camden, Me., on Nov. 24, 1851. He was educated at the East Maine Conference Seminary at Bucksport, the Maine Conference Seminary at Kents Hill, and WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, Middletown, Conn., which institution later conferred upon him the honorary D.D. degree.

Berry was admitted into the MAINE CONFERENCE of the M. E. CHURCH on trial in 1879 and into full membership two years later. He served as pastor of a number of churches, after which followed a period of service to Maine institutions—three years as Secretary of the Christian Civic League, six years as President of the Maine Wesleyan Seminary and Women's College (as it was then known), at Kents Hill, and finally, 1909-18 as superintendent of the Christian Civic League of Maine. Berry took the supernumerary relation in 1919 for two years and retired the following year, 1921.

For several years he was Secretary of the Maine Conference and served on important committees. In retirement he found time to serve the small community in which he lived, Vassalboro, as town treasurer, tax collector, and member of the school board.

Berry was married to Sarah Lavonia French of Vassalboro, Me., who predeceased him on May 27, 1932. He died at Vassalboro, March 4, 1945, and was buried in Pine Grove Cemetery, Waterville.

ALFRED G. HEMPSTEAD

BERRYMAN, JEROME CAUSIN (1810-1906), pioneer American preacher, missionary to the INDIANS, educator, and leader of the M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH at the time of division of the Church in 1844, was born Feb. 22, 1810, in Nelson Co., Ky., the son of Gerard Blackstone and Ailzey Quisenbury Berryman, of Virginia, and of Church of England background.

Berryman's formal schooling covered only seven and one-half months in a primitive log school house. A student and reader of natural inclination, he was prepared for intensive self-education. He wrote ". . . for the first five years of my itinerant life much of my time was devoted to literary studies." In 1828, Berryman was licensed to preach and was recommended by the St. Francois-Saline Circuit to the Missouri Annual Conference. This circuit was his first pastoral appointment. After one year in western ARKANSAS, he was appointed to Palmyra, Mo., to which he took his bride, Sarah Culbertson Cessna, of Kentucky. The next year he spent six months in St. Charles and six months in Centenary Church, St. Louis.

Berryman was sent to establish a mission among the Kickapoo Indians in 1833. His first work was building a schoolhouse. He developed a primitive type of audio-visual instruction, and took Indian children into his home in order to teach them word meanings and the English language. Here he labored until 1840 when he was appointed superintendent of the entire mission and principal of the notable Indian Manual Labor School at Shawnee Mission. Here his wife and two of his children died. He returned to Missouri (1846) and was appointed PRESIDING ELDER of the Cape Girardeau District. He established Arcadia High School, located in the district, and could then supervise the development of the school in an educationally impoverished area.

Changes in Berryman's circumstances, among them his marriage to Mrs. Margaret M. Wells, brought about his acceptance of a partnership with William T. Lucky in Howard Female College, Fayette, Mo. But after one year, he sold his partnership and asked the conference for location in order to settle his family on a farm in Bellevue Valley (1859). It was his intention to resume the itineracy within a year or two, but the outbreak of the Civil War and the occupation of Missouri by Union troops prevented his doing so. He resumed the itineracy in 1866, and served Caledonia, Potosi, Arcadia, and two terms as presiding elder, until 1886 when he superannuated after 58 years of service.

Berryman advocated division of the Church in 1844, but after the heat of the Civil War had cooled, he deplored a divided Methodism and advocated reunion. He died May 3, 1906, the last survivor of the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1844, and was buried in the Caledonia Cemetery.

BEST, LOUISE (1892-1966), American missionary to BRAZIL, was born on Nov. 10, 1892, in Mars Bluff, S. C., the daughter of a Methodist preacher. She graduated from Lander College in 1919; then entered Scarritt Bible and Training School in Kansas City. During her first furloughs, she earned a Master's degree at SCARRITT COLLEGE. Miss Best was consecrated in April, 1921, and in July of that year she sailed for Brazil.

In 1922 she was appointed to Colegio Centenario in Santa Maria, state of Rio Grande do Sul, to assist Eunice Andrew, its dedicated founder and principal. When Miss Andrew retired in 1939, Miss Best was named principal (Reitōra) and served in that capacity until December, 1957.

Before leaving in 1957, Miss Best was showered with honors by a grateful city. At a ceremony attended by the mayor, all city councilmen, and prominent civic and military leaders of the city and state, she was given a gold medal and a "diploma" with the title "Citizen of Santa Maria," the first time this honor had been conferred on anyone. She retired to Spartanburg, S. C., and continued to be active in church work until her sudden death from a heart attack on July 25, 1966.

BETHEA, NEIL GRAHAM (1872-1957), American evangelist and minister, was born on Oct. 11, 1872, in Little River, near Fayetteville, N. C. He was the son of William Cameron Bethea and Mary Jane Morris Bethea. He attended Catawba College and in 1897 joined the NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE of the M. P. CHURCH. He was ordained as ELDER in 1902. He served as Conference Evangelist for a number of years, traveling across the state holding ten-day revivals "wherever people would gather to listen."

Bethea's first pastorate was in Ellenboro, after which he went to Bessemer City, where "Bethea's Chapel" was later built and named in his honor. He also served pastorates at numerous other towns in the state. He served as Conference Missionary Secretary in 1915-16. In 1926 he made an extensive tour of Palestine. HIGH POINT COLLEGE bestowed the honorary D.D. degree on him in 1934.

Bethea was a member of seven General Conferences of the M. P. Church and was an alternate delegate at the UNITING CONFERENCE in 1939. His ministry covered 53 years, during which he preached 20,000 sermons and recorded some 8,061 conversions. He retired in 1949 and died in Greensboro, N. C. on Feb. 24, 1957.

RALPH HARDEE RIVES

BETHEL ACADEMY was established in 1790 in the bend of the Kentucky River about three miles from what is now Wilmore, Ky., and it flourished as a Methodist school until 1803.

In 1780 the Virginia Legislature set aside 8,000 acres of land in KENTUCKY for the establishment of schools. In time the few Methodists in the region took steps to secure a part of that land for a school. In 1789, when Bishops ASBURY and COKE were conducting a conference at McKnight's on the Yadkin River in NORTH CAROLINA, there were letters and messengers from the west asking for help in starting a college in Kentucky. The conference debated the request and agreed that Bishop Asbury would visit Kentucky the next year and that if those interested in a school could secure 5,000 acres from the state or from individuals, a college could be completed in a decade.

Asbury sent FRANCIS POYTHRESS from North Carolina to be PRESIDING ELDER in Kentucky in 1789; he himself arrived in 1790, and on May 14 began a conference in the home of Richard Masterson at Lexington. Asbury then wrote in his journal, "We fixed up a plan for a school, and called it Bethel; and obtained, in land and money, a subscription upward of 300 pounds toward its establishment. . . . We rode to [Captain John] Lewis' on the bend of the Kentucky River. . . . Brother Lewis offered me 100 acres of land for Bethel on a good spot for building material." There were trees for lumber, limestone for a foundation, and clay for brick. Some believed a village would arise there to become the county seat. A committee composed of Asbury, Poythress, Willis Green, Richard Masterson, and one Colonel Hyde was appointed to inaugurate construction of a building. As presiding elder, Poythress superintended the work of construction. Asbury returned to Kentucky in 1792 at which time he "wrote an address on behalf of Bethel School" and found it necessary to "change the plan" of the building so as "to make it more comfortable" in winter.

Bethel Academy opened in 1794, and it was incorporated in 1802. It received a grant of 6,000 acres from the state, but there was so much government land on the market that the school realized nothing from its tract and the land finally reverted to the state. At the request of Asbury, John Metcalf, a Methodist preacher who came to Kentucky in 1790, became the first principal at Bethel and served until 1803. In 1799, VALENTINE COOK, the most distinguished graduate of COKESBURY COLLEGE in Maryland, took charge of the academic department at Bethel. An able preacher and a competent teacher, Cook attracted students and the school achieved its highest enrollment during his time with it. He left in less than two years because, according to one report, some difficulties arose.

In 1800, Asbury complained in his journal about the problems facing Bethel Academy. He noted that the school was "distant from public places," that without a principal "of sterling qualifications," without "trustees and others who should obligate themselves to see" that the principal was paid, and without a "fund and an income of three hundred dollars per year" the school could not carry on and would "be useless." Admitting that he and Poythress chose the wrong location, he nevertheless was rueful about being "blamed by men of slender sense for consequences impossible to foresee" at the time. Bethel is not mentioned in Asbury's journal after 1800. In his own mind he may have written it off as a failure at that time.

Bethel ceased to be a Methodist institution when Metcalf left in 1803, though Nathaniel Harris operated a neighborhood school there for two more years. In time the land reverted to the heirs of John Lewis, and sometime between 1805 and 1810 some of the building materials were removed and used in another school in Nicholasville, the county seat. Metcalf went to Nicholasville when he left Bethel and started another Bethel Academy which continued as such most of the nineteenth century. While not strictly a denominational school, the new Bethel was often under the superintendence of a Methodist teacher.

The original Bethel Academy was one of the first, if not the first district school projected west of the Alleghenies by the Methodists. Also, it was a center of church administration as well as of instruction; at least six conferences were held there between 1794 and 1804. That Bethel Academy was launched two years before Kentucky became a state was a tribute to the vision and heroism of the few Methodists in the region at the time.

BETHEL SHIP "JOHN WESLEY"

BETHEL SHIP (1845-1879), was a ship docked in the harbor of NEW YORK CITY and used as a mission to Swedish immigrants and sailors, and in fact to all Scandinavians, whose ships called at the port. The ship was an important influence in the lives of many of the more than 200,000 Swedish immigrants who spread out from New York all across America. In 1924 it was reported that from the work on Bethel Ship there had grown four annual conferences and two mission conferences, embracing 217 churches, 128 preachers, and 20,000 members. Through the work of converts who re-migrated to their homelands, Bethel Ship was also responsible for the establishment of Methodism throughout Scandinavia.

It was Peter Bergner, himself an immigrant from SWEDEN, who first saw the importance of Swedish mission work on the New York waterfront. He persuaded the Asbury Society to purchase the Henry Leeds, a condemned German brig which was tied up at Pier 11 in the North River at the foot of Carlisle Street. She was rechristened the John Wesley and repaired enough to make her usable. There the "First North River Bethel Ship Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church" was organized in 1845. OLAF GUSTAV HEDSTROM became the society's first pastor. He was assigned to Bethel Ship in 1845 and preached his first sermon there on May 25. He remained as the pastor until his death, May 5, 1877.

The passage of time brought many changes. The original Bethel Ship became unsafe for use, and a second Bethel Ship was dedicated on May 12, 1857.

The Swedish people who settled in BROOKLYN found that a floating church anchored across the river could not adequately meet their spiritual needs. In 1868 the First North River Bethel Ship Society purchased land on Pacific Street, near Fifth Avenue in Brooklyn, although services in Swedish continued on Bethel Ship until 1876.

Perhaps the most famous of Bethel Ship's converts was Jenny Lind, the "Swedish Nightingale," who attended services there in 1851. Pastor Hedstrom became her trusted confidant, and Miss Lind supported his work generously. But the most enduring influence of Bethel Ship came from her converts who entered the ministry and took Methodism back to the Old World from which they had come. In 1853, OLE PETER PETERSON became the first Methodist missionary to NORWAY. One year later

Peter Larssen was the first to go to Sweden. In 1858 CHRISTIAN WILLERUP went as missionary to DENMARK.

By 1876 the pattern of immigration had shifted from Swedish to Norwegian. In that year the second Bethel Ship was taken over by a Norwegian-Danish mission and moved to a pier in Brooklyn. In 1879 this congregation, too, went ashore, and Bethel Ship was sold for $800.

ROBERT ROY WRIGHT

BETHESDA is the name given to the "orphan house" at SAVANNAH, Ga., founded by GEORGE WHITEFIELD and patterned after an orphanage built in Germany by August H. Francke. The Council in GEORGIA was impressed by the request of twenty-four-year-old Whitefield, who had come as a member of the Methodist group at OXFORD and successor in Savannah to JOHN WESLEY, recently returned to England. The Council specified that Whitefield should keep it advised of plans and give it an accounting on funds, then granted 450 acres "in trust for the Orphan House, subject to a Quit Rent of 3 pounds per annum." Actual construction began in the spring of 1740; the main building was two stories high and 60 by 40 feet, with separate structures for a work-house and an infirmary. Some thirty orphans soon came under the institution's care. This was marked by lessons and work in fields no less than by rigid Calvinistic discipline. New arrivals were greeted with a special hymn:

What tho' our Parents dear are dead,
 Yet our great God provides,
 Our Bodies here are cloth'd and fed;
 Our Souls have Christian guides.

Whitefield found it "impracticable" to keep up the Orphan House by child labor, and this reinforced his long-held belief that without slaves Georgia "never can nor will be a flourishing province." He joined in the successful campaign to permit slavery, and at the time of his death owned Negroes whom he willed to his patroness, Selina, COUNTESS OF HUNTINGDON, along with school buildings, lands, furniture, and books.

Whitefield's persuasive oratory raised considerable sums for Bethesda and for the college he, in vain, hoped it would become. Benjamin Franklin's Autobiography records how, having resolved in advance not to give money for a charity in far-off Georgia, he found his opposition wilting under Whitefield's eloquence and when the plate was passed, emptied his pockets. Franklin noted, "The multitudes of all sects and denominations that attended his sermons were enormous," and was astonished by "the extraordinary influence of his oratory." Bethesda thus became a symbol of an awakening conscience and a consciousness of a moral unity among American colonists from Georgia to MASSACHUSETTS.

Lady Huntingdon died in 1791, and Bethesda was claimed by the State of Georgia. By 1793 it was in ruins and FRANCIS ASBURY rode twelve miles out of his way to see them; he recorded in his Journal for January 29: "I felt very awful," he noted. "The wings are yet standing, though much injured, and the school house still more. It is reported that Mr. Whitefield observed, whilst eating his last dinner in the house, 'This house was built for God; and cursed be the man that puts it to any other use.' The land for the support of the school is of little value, except two rice plantations . . ."

In 1805 fire again gutted the place, and it never was rebuilt. In 1809 Georgia sold the property and distributed the proceeds among Savannah's benevolent institutions. Whitefield's great dream seemingly had disappeared without a trace, but in 1854 the Union Society of Savannah, which since 1805 had cared for orphans, purchased the original Bethesda tract. An orphanage was built on the site, and has since been in continuous operation.

LELAND D. CASE

BETHESDA, MARYLAND, U.S.A. Bethesda Church is a suburban church in the heavily populated Montgomery Co. abutting WASHINGTON, D. C. The National Institutes of Health and National Naval Medical Center are located in Bethesda.

The Church started in 1914 as a Sunday school on a front porch. GAITHER P. WARFIELD, himself a native of Montgomery Co. and for many years director of the METHODIST COMMITTEE FOR OVERSEAS RELIEF, was the first young minister to preach when the members met on Sunday evenings in a tent. In 1916 the small group literally built a one-room church and joined the M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH. Again in 1922 the people built a larger church and then a parsonage in 1936.

After going through a period with the ministry of many young single ministers, the church started to grow in proportion to the growth of Bethesda under the leadership of Francis Cockrell.

When the Methodist Churches united in 1939, the new DISTRICT SUPERINTENDENT, G. Ellis Williams, with financial help from the M. E. Methodist Union in the Washington area made it possible for the church to make plans to move from the Woodmont Triangle. This area became commercial as part of the Bethesda master plan.

A new church was built in 1949 in the area of population growth. Hartwell Chandler was the minister who led in the construction of the new church.

The church in 1969 had a membership of about 1,800. Assisting the minister is a staff that includes a business manager, a minister of visitation, a director of religious education, and a minister of music. The church supports Dr. and Mrs. James Stringham, psychiatrists serving as missionaries, at the Nur Manzil Psychiatric Center in LUCKNOW, INDIA. Bethesda Church is widely known for its library and music by its seven choirs.

The church supports interdenominational projects; also a chaplain and aid to residents in an apartment complex, a family counselling center and a week-day religious education program.

MARY McLEOD BETHUNE

BETHUNE, MARY McLEOD (1875-1955), educator and racial leader, was born July 10, 1875 in a log cabin at Maysville, S. C., one of the 17 children of Samuel and Patsy (McIntosh) McLeod. Her parents were ex-slaves and devout Methodists. She married Albert Bethune in 1899 (died 1919). They had one son, Albert. Though a white girl tried to dissuade Mary from reading, she persevered and was graduated from Scotia Seminary, Concord, N. C., in 1893 and Moody Bible Institute in 1895. She taught in southern mission schools for several years, and then in 1904 founded the Daytona Normal and Industrial Institute for Girls. Starting with $1.50, she raised $5 by selling ice cream and sweet potato pies in order to make a small down payment on a lot for the school. Throughout her career much of her time was spent in asking for money in small and large amounts for her school which in 1923 merged with Cookman College to become BETHUNE-COOKMAN COLLEGE with her as president. Her motto for the college was, "Enter to learn; depart to serve." She was president until retirement in 1942. Today Bethune-Cookman is an accredited Methodist college with nearly 1,000 students and an endowment of $1,372,000.

Mary Bethune received wide recognition and was accorded many honors for service to her race. Among her many honorary degrees was Doctor of Humanities conferred by three institutions, one of them being Rollins College, probably the first white southern college ever to give an honorary degree to a Negro. She was honored with the Spingarn Medal, the Thomas Jefferson Award, the Haitian Medal of Honor and Merit, and the Francis A. Drexel Award, the latter bestowed at the hands of a Roman Catholic archbishop. She was a delegate to four

GENERAL CONFERENCES. Equally at home in Negro cabins or the White House in Washington, Mary Bethune, while serving with the National Youth Administration, 1936-43, evoked a chuckle from President Franklin D. Roosevelt when she, in requesting his cooperation, said, "Mr. President, you've got to do better than that for me!" She died at Daytona Beach, Fla., May 18, 1955. Ida Tarbell selected Mary McLeod Bethune as one of the fifty women who have contributed most to the enrichment of American life.

BETHUNE-COOKMAN COLLEGE, Daytona Beach, Fla., was chartered as Bethune-Cookman Collegiate Institute in 1923. It resulted from a merger of Cookman Institute, founded in 1872 by D. S. Darnell of Jacksonville, Fla., and Daytona Normal and Industrial School for Girls, founded by MARY McLEOD BETHUNE in 1904. The name was changed in 1931, and in 1941 it became a four-year college of liberal arts.

Mary McLeod Bethune, builder of the college, was one of the distinguished Negroes of the twentieth century. During President Franklin D. Roosevelt's administration, she served on his advisory board and was one of the administrators of the National Youth Administration. Eleanor Roosevelt was a member of Bethune-Cookman's board of trustees. Degrees granted are the B.A. and B.S. The governing board has thirty-seven members elected by the board. Ownership of the college and its holdings is vested with the General Board of Education of The United Methodist Church.

JOHN O. GROSS

BETT, HENRY (1876-1953), British Methodist scholar, was born at Maidenwell, Lincolnshire, March 23, 1876. He entered the Wesleyan ministry in 1899. He was tutor in church history at Handsworth College, BIRMINGHAM from 1923 to 1943, being principal, 1940-43. His FERNLEY-HARTLEY LECTURE, The Spirit of Methodism (1937), caught its subject brilliantly. He was one of the few Methodist scholars who have shown sustained interest in the Middle Ages: he wrote Johannes Scotus Erigena (1925), Joachim of Flora (1931), and Nicholas of Cusa (1932). His monograph on The Hymns of Methodism (1913; 3rd ed., enl., 1945) is still used. He was president of the Methodist Conference in 1940, a difficult time, not the least for him as a lifelong pacifist. He died on April 1, 1953.

JOHN KENT

BETTS, ALBERT DEEMS (1882-1958), American historian of South Carolina Methodism and a public-spirited church leader of his conference and state, was born May 28, 1882, at Shiloh, Sumter Co., S. C. He was the son of William Archibald and Cornelia Evelyn (Wadsworth) Betts. He received his A.B. Degree from WOFFORD COLLEGE in 1905, his A.M. from Princeton in 1907 and the B.D. from DREW THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY in 1909. He married Katherine Elvira Budd of Eatontown, N. J., Sept. 14, 1908. He joined the SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE in 1909, and after supplying a number of pastoral appointments, was made President of PAINE COLLEGE at Augusta, Ga. in 1917, where he remained for four years. He then returned to his conference and continued to serve in various pastoral and administrative positions.

Betts became known as a strong protagonist of the temperance and prohibition movement, and for a time was a member of the Board of Managers of the Anti-Saloon League of America. He also was on the Board of Managers of the Lord's Day Alliance, making, in his later years, annual visits to New York to serve upon the controlling agency of that Board. His Conference elected him to the GENERAL CONFERENCES (MES) in 1930 and 1934.

Betts undertook the compilation of a history of South Carolina Methodism about 1937, while he was serving as pastor of the College Place Church in COLUMBIA. He states in the preface to his volume that Dr. J. MARVIN RAST, then editor of the Southern Christian Advocate, asked him to do some historical research for the centennial edition which was to be June 24, 1937. In going through about seventy-five years of the Advocate's files, and making notes upon these, the idea of a complete history of the South Carolina Conference took shape in his mind, and eventually came to fruition. The volume was published in Columbia, in 1952, and dedicated to his second wife, Mary Evelyn (DeMedici) Harvey, of Pinopolis, S. C., whom he married on May 16, 1949. Mrs. Betts was then the President of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of South Carolina, and she aided and abetted her husband in many of his public representative moves and indeed in all his work.

The Betts History is featured by lengthy quotations with notes and annals carefully compiled from all sorts of sources and is a complete work in its coverage of Methodist ministers and laymen, and of the many—and all important—events of South Carolina Methodism.

Betts, although a fierce protagonist of all moral moves and causes, was noted for his courteous and gentlemanly ways, and was always popular with his brethren. He retired Oct. 24, 1954 and died in Columbia Aug. 31, 1958.

BETTS, ALEXANDER DAVIS (1832-1918), was a distinguished and much-beloved member of the NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE of the M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH, and an outstanding chaplain in the Confederate Army during the War Between the States. General Robert E. Lee was so greatly impressed with the devotion, fidelity and purity of Alexander Betts that he spoke of him as "that model chaplain."

Betts was the son of William and Tempe Utley Betts and was born in Cumberland (now Hargett) Co., N. C., on Aug. 25, 1832. He studied in a classical school in Summerville, S. C., and at the University of North Carolina where he was graduated in 1855, followed by an M.A. degree later. On Oct. 15, 1853, he was converted and in November of that year he attended the North Carolina Conference. He received his license to preach while he was still a student at the University. He joined the North Carolina Conference in 1856 and served charges in twenty-two North Carolina counties. He became a chaplain for the 30th North Carolina Regiment of the Confederate States Army in 1861. Early in the present century his Civil War diary was published under the title Experiences of a Confederate Chaplain, 1861-1864. In 1895 he was given the honorary D.D. degree by his alma mater. He was a trustee of the University from 1879-1889. An Episcopal clergyman was once quoted as saying that he would give any three clergymen of his acquaintance for Betts "and throw in a Bishop extra." T. N. IVEY, editor of the Raleigh Christian Advocate, said: "No other man in North Carolina Methodism will leave to the generations a richer bequest than will be left by Dr. Betts." A son, W. A. Betts, was a member of the SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church, South, and a daughter, Sallie Potter Betts, was professor of English and "Associate Lady Principal" at LITTLETON FEMALE COLLEGE, a private Methodist college, from 1900-1919, and from 1919-1930 she was Dean of Women at LOUISBURG COLLEGE.

Betts was affectionately known as "Uncle Betts." He died in Greensboro on Dec. 15, 1918, and was buried there.

RALPH HARDEE RIVES

BETTS, DANIEL LANDER (1887-1965), American preacher and missionary to BRAZIL, was born in Williamston, S. C., on July 7, 1887, son of a Methodist preacher. After graduation from WOFFORD COLLEGE in 1910, he taught for two years in a high school in Bamberg, then for seven years headed the boarding department of Wofford College. He was ordained DEACON and ELDER before leaving for Brazil in September, 1919. On the ship journeying to Brazil, he met Frances Virginia Scott, also going as a missionary of the Woman's Missionary Council. They were married on Nov. 25, 1920. In December, Betts was appointed to Passo Fundo, where he served as pastor and principal (Reitor) of the Instituto Educacional (Methodist School), which had been started a year before by J. W. DANIEL. During a fruitful eight years, Betts expanded the work and supervised the construction of two new buildings.

In the following years Betts served as pastor, district superintendent, and teacher of religious courses in Instituto União, Uruguiana, and for one year served at the Instituto Central do Povo in RIO DE JANEIRO. After returning to the South Brazil Conference, he served as pastor in two churches, and in 1933 was appointed to open work in the states of Santa Catarina and Paraná. He stayed there until 1942, organizing several Methodist congregations. While in Curitiba in 1942, he presided over a committee that organized an evangelical hospital in that city. In 1953, when the Instituto PORTO ALEGRE found itself in serious financial straits, Betts was called to become principal (Reitor), and in three years stabilized the situation.

When retirement came in 1959, the Betts elected to stay in Porto Alegre, where he continued working actively as a pastor. Despite a stroke and severe after effects, he was able to construct one of the finest Methodist churches in that city (John Wesley Church), plus an educational building and a parsonage. After a long illness and a second stroke, Daniel Betts died on Oct. 5, 1965.

Few missionaries have been as loved and admired as Betts and his wife for their total devotion to the Christian task and their close identification with the Brazilian people. Bishop PINHEIRO, speaking at his funeral service, said: "That man integrated himself in the life of the Brazilians. He was one of ourselves, and nobody would dare accuse him of not being a Brazilian." And a state deputy, Aldo Fagundes, asking for an official record of his death in the legislature, said: "He didn't shine in finances or politics, but gave to his life the meaning of Eternity and guided men to God." Betts was survived by his widow and four children, three of whom have been missionaries in Brazil—JOHN NELSON, Joy, Anita Betts Way—and a fourth, William, an engineer in Pittsburgh.

BETTS, GEORGE HERBERT (1868-1934), American educator, was born at Clarksville, Iowa, April 1, 1868. He was educated at CORNELL COLLEGE, the University of Chicago, and Columbia University, receiving the Ph.D. from the latter. He taught psychology in Cornell and then entered the field of religious education, in which he became a pioneer and an acknowledged authority. He was a professor of that department in BOSTON UNIVERSITY in 1918, NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY in 1919, UNIVERSITY OF SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA in 1921, and again at Northwestern in 1922.

Betts was the author of twenty books in his field, several of which were used as text books in colleges, universities, and theological seminaries. The best known were: Social Principles of Education (1912), Class Room Method and Management (1917), How to Teach Religion (1919), The New Program of Religious Education (1921), The Curriculum of Religious Education (1921), Method in Teaching Religion (1925), The Beliefs of Seven Hundred Ministers (1925), and Character Outcome of Present-Day Religion (1931).

BETTS, JOHN NELSON (1922-), missionary in BRAZIL, son of the Rev. and Mrs. DANIEL BETTS, pioneer missionaries in that country, and a fourth generation Methodist preacher in the Betts family. He was born in Passo Fundo, state of Rio Grande do Sul, Brazil, on Dec. 4, 1922, and received his early education in the Methodist Instituto Educacional of that city. He graduated from the Methodist Seminary in SÃO PAULO and afterwards studied at SOUTHERN METHODIST UNIVERSITY in Dallas, Texas, from which he received the B.D. and M.R.E. degrees.

On December 27, 1947, he married Gladys Smith, daughter of Methodist missionaries in Brazil. They were commissioned by Bishop W. C. MARTIN and returned to Brazil. Through the years, J. N. Betts has served as pastor in the Second Ecclesiastical Region of Brazil, as teacher in the Theological Seminary in São Paulo, as Second Region director of Christian Education. Since 1964, he has served with success as Secretary of the BETZ, WILLIAM HOWARD (1869-1955), American minister and church leader, was born in a log cabin near Ladora, Iowa, April 25, 1869. He finished his high school work at Drake University, Des Moines, Iowa, from which he later received his degree after teaching school for several years. He was ordained in the M. P. CHURCH'S ministry in 1906.

Betz served various churches in south Iowa for about forty years. He was secretary to the Iowa-Missouri Conference for ten years and its president for seven years. His Conference honored him by electing him as a delegate to four GENERAL CONFERENCES of the M. P. Church. In addition to attending the General Conferences of 1916, 1928, 1932, and 1936, Betz was also present at the UNITING CONFERENCE of 1939.

After his retirement in 1940, Betz continued as supply pastor at Bethel Church near Sigourney, Iowa for five years.

Betz was often called the poet-philosopher of the Iowa-Missouri Conference. He wrote a short history of the last 100 years of the M. P. Church west of the Mississippi River, which in manuscript form provides a valuable source of information.

Betz died March 13, 1955 at the home of his sister, and is buried in the Ohio Cemetery near his birthplace of Ladora, Iowa.

BEWLEY, ANTHONY (1804-1860), American clergyman and martyr for his opposition to slavery, was born in Tennessee, May 22, 1804. He joined the TENNESSEE CONFERENCE in 1829, and later served the Missouri and Arkansas Conferences.

In 1843 he transferred to the MISSOURI CONFERENCE. When his fellow delegates to the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1844 sided with the Southern states, Bewley refused to support this decision. For several years after that he preached independently, and served as presiding elder of other preachers who felt as he did. In 1848, the M. E. Church re-organized its conference in Missouri, and he returned to the regular work. When Arkansas and North TEXAS were separated from the Missouri Conference, he served in those states.

He was assigned to Texas in 1858, but because of his violently anti-slavery views, he was forced to leave because of threats of violence against him. He returned to Texas in 1860. Through publication of a letter purported to have been written to Bewley and designed to excite mob action against him, Bewley was forced to leave Texas, fleeing to Missouri.

Rewards totalling $1,000 were offered for his capture. He was overtaken and brought back to Fort Worth, Texas, where a mob hanged him to a tree on Sept. 13, 1860. Bewley's murder terminated the activities of the M. E. Church in Texas until after the war.

BHURIBAI (?-c.1933) was an illiterate woman of the aboriginal Bhil tribe in Gujarat, INDIA. She held the tribal office of Mukhi, meaning "head woman." She was converted and became a fervent and articulate Christian. Her witness to Christ powerfully influenced the Bhil people for many miles around her home. Through her efforts hundreds were converted. She was acclaimed a saint by her neighbors and by the missionaries and other church representatives who became acquainted with her. Among those who were brought to Christian faith and purpose in part, at least, by her help were a blind man and a one-eyed man of the Bhils. They and a group of their neighbors accompanied her each year for many years to the annual conference, and their presence was a source of encouragement to all who attended the conference. An Anglo-Indian lady wrote of her: "She communed with God. It was a privilege to hear and see her. She would lift up her eyes to heaven, an appearance of rapture would spread across her face; and her words would become charged with power. Others would feel the presence of God. She would pray audibly, then become quiet and still, as though listening carefully and very quietly say 'Yes, Lord Jesus. Thank you.'"

BIBB, BENIAH S. (1796-1884), distinguished American layman, was often a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCES of the M. P. CHURCH and took an active role in the religious life of his state. He was born in Elbert County, Ga., on Sept. 30, 1796, received a liberal education in his native state and began the practice of law. He later moved to Montgomery, Ala., where he served as judge of the Probate Court from February, 1825, until 1844. He was converted in October, 1822, and two years later joined the M. P. Church. He served as a delegate to almost every session of the Church's Alabama Conference from 1830 until his death.

He served as a delegate to the General Conferences of 1842, 1856 and 1874 and the famous Union Convention of 1877. In June, 1855, he was chosen president of a convention of commissioners from the various annual conferences which supported the church periodical, The Methodist Protestant, and the denominational Book Concern in Baltimore. He was first elected to the Alabama legislature in 1827 and afterward served as a state representative for many terms. He also served as a state senator. From 1844-1865 he was judge of the city and criminal court of Montgomery. J. L. Mills, a pastor of Judge Bibb, once referred to him as "one of the most spiritual of Christians, most devoted of church members, wisest of counselors." Bibb married Sophia Gilmer, sister of Governor Gilmer of Alabama, in January, 1819.

Beniah S. Bibb died on Feb. 10, 1884.

BIBLE, AUTHORITY OF. The importance of the Bible for an understanding of Christianity is unquestioned, but its inspiration and its authority in relation to doctrine have been the subject of prolonged controversy. The ferment of thought about the Bible has continued from the earliest days until the present, because it has been recognized that anyone who attempts to give Christian teaching on matters of belief and conduct has to reckon always with what is said in the Bible.

The Canon. The word "Bible" is derived from the Greek biblia, meaning "books," and "Testament" is a translation of the Greek diatheke, meaning "covenant." The Old Testament is the collection of books centered around the old covenant, or agreement, between God and men which was based on the Jewish Law, while the New Testament is the collection of books which testify to the new covenant established by Jesus Christ. These collections of books are often described as the canon, a Greek word meaning "rule," and for this reason scriptural writings are called "canonical."

There has been disagreement about the actual contents of the Old Testament canon. Protestants have confined the Old Testament to the books contained in the Hebrew Bible, but the Roman Catholics have also included the books known as the Apocrypha, which are part of the Septuagint, the Greek version of the Old Testament, but are absent from the Hebrew canon. Although many early Christians made a distinction between the Old Testament and the Apocrypha, this distinction was largely forgotten in the medieval Church, and in 1546 the Roman Catholic Council of Trent officially decreed that the apocryphal writings should be regarded as part of the Old Testament canon. The leaders of the Protestant Reformation did not regard the Apocrypha as scriptural, and they varied in their treatment of it. The Church of England included portions of it in the lectionary and in the Book of Common Prayer, although refusing to regard it as authoritative in doctrinal matters. The majority of Protestants, however, including the Methodists, have paid little attention to the Apocrypha, and it is frequently not contained in the editions of the Bible which they use. It is interesting to note, however, that excerpts from the Apocrypha are included in the official burial service of British Methodism.

The Text and Its Influence on Translations. One of the most important problems about the Bible is that of establishing an accurate text. Before the invention of printing, copies of the Bible had to be made by scribes who laboriously transcribed the text from other copies. Because of the mistakes which were made in this process, the different manuscripts of the Bible showed numerous minor disagreements. Textual scholars attempt to reconstruct the original text of the Bible by comparing the different manuscripts, and especially the earliest ones.

For many years the Western Church relied on the Vulgate, Jerome's translation of the Bible into Latin, and this translation continues to be authoritative for the Roman Catholic Church. At the time of the Reformation, the Protestant Churches produced translations of the Bible into the language spoken by the people of the different countries of Europe. The most famous English translation was completed in 1611 and is known in Britain as the Authorized Version and in America often as the King James Version. It was based, not on Jerome's Vulgate, but on a study of the Hebrew and Aramaic texts of the Old Testament and the Greek texts of the New Testament which were compared with the translations of the Bible into other ancient languages. This translation continues to be the most popular in the English-speaking world, but in recent years fresh translations have been produced, partly because of changes which have taken place in the English language and partly because of the inadequacies of the text on which the translation was based. JOHN WESLEY himself prepared a translation of the New Testament, which in many respects anticipated the Revised Version published in 1881.

Although there is agreement about the accurate text of most of the Bible, discussion is likely to continue about a large number of disputed readings, the majority of which are of minor importance. It is therefore becoming ever more widely recognized that no particular translation of the Bible can be regarded as final and definitive.

Scripture, Tradition, Reason, and Personal Experience. The question of the relationship between scripture and tradition has been discussed ever since the Christians began to recognize certain writings as scriptural. Because of the difficulties of interpreting the scriptures, great importance was attached to the Church's tradition, both written and unwritten. In particular the Church gave special priority to the creeds, which were regarded as summaries of essential Christian doctrine. Many writers put tradition on the same level as the scriptures, and this viewpoint was officially confirmed by the Council of Trent which declared that tradition and scripture should be received with equal veneration.

The Council of Trent represented the Roman reaction to the teaching of the Reformers, who had rejected the tradition as being on the same level as scripture. The leaders of the Reformation put the scriptures in central position. Calvin regarded them as the Word of God which proclaimed Christ, but he also gave full recognition to the inner testimony of the Holy Spirit which enables men to recognize the authority of God speaking through the scriptures. Luther, though in many ways his attitude to authority was similar to Calvin's, was more critical than Calvin in his estimate of the Bible. He judged the merits of the books by the way in which he believed them to proclaim Christ, and he regarded James, Hebrews, and Revelation with disfavor. The Articles of the Church of England affirm that the scriptures contained all teaching that is necessary for salvation, and they assert that the Church is "a witness and a keeper of Holy Writ," but they do not affirm the complete inerrancy of the Bible.

Some Protestant theologians of the late sixteenth and the seventeenth centuries developed a doctrine of the verbal inerrancy of the scriptures, which was more rigorous than the teaching of the reformers themselves, and they also attached great importance to the use of reason in the interpretation of the scriptures. While reason was used by the theologians of Protestant orthodoxy in support of their conservative position, reason was also accepted as a source of authority by more liberal thinkers who challenged the traditional understanding of Christian doctrine, and often exalted reason at the expense of scripture. This tendency was clearly manifested in the English Deists, against whom the Wesleys reacted strongly.

From time to time during the history of Christianity, there have arisen influential mystics, some of whom have laid their chief emphasis on the authority of the individual's experience rather than on the testimony of the Bible. The stress on individual experience has also been made by groups who were vastly different from the monastic type of contemplatives, but who claimed a vivid personal experience of the Spirit or of the indwelling Christ. This type of movement arose in various sections of Protestantism during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries and has continued ever since. Some of these movements were wide and irrational; others were much more restrained. One of the best known and most respected of these groups is the Society of Friends, with its emphasis on the inner light. A specially influential group was the Pietists who arose in Germany in the seventeenth century. These combined an emphasis on personal religious experience with a high regard for the Bible, the practice of disciplined personal conduct, and a stress on the corporate life of the Church. Pietism proved to be one of the formative influences on the Wesleys.

The Wesleys. Religion was basically scriptural for the Wesleys, and both of them taught, in agreement with the Anglican articles, that no doctrine should be required which was not contained in the Bible. John Wesley, in his dictionary, defined a Methodist as "one who lives according to the method laid down in the Bible." The Early Methodists in Oxford won a reputation for assiduous study of the scriptures and were given the nickname "Bible moths." John Wesley called himself "a man of one book" (Sermons, I., p. 32), and Charles Wesley wrote,

"O may the oracles divine Subject of all my converse be!"

Although neither of the brothers strictly adhered to the sense of these statements, they both based their teaching firmly on the scriptures. Charles' hymns abound in allusions to the Bible. John's sermons are thoroughly scriptural, and it is a selection of these sermons together with his Notes on the New Testament which form the official DOCTRINAL STANDARDS of Methodism.

While John Wesley believed the Bible to be uniquely inspired by the Holy Spirit, he was not a rigid literalist. When he prepared a version of the Prayer Book for American Methodists (the SUNDAY SERVICE), he rejected many of the psalms from the liturgy because he regarded them as "highly improper for the mouths of a Christian congregation" (Works, XIV, p. 304). In his interpretation of the scriptures he took the literal sense where it was possible, but if there was confusion between two passages he followed that which was clearest in meaning (Letters, III, p. 129). He claimed that passages should be understood in their context and that their meaning should be confirmed by reason, experience and the Christian tradition. In this respect he followed the traditional Anglican pattern, except that he gave added emphasis to experience. The Bible, he argued, must be approached in prayer and it cannot correctly be interpreted unless the reader is guided by the Spirit (Works, XIV, p. 328). And though reason is needed to understand the scriptures, it cannot produce faith, and its efficacy is strictly limited (Works, VI, p. 354).

Wesley regarded "searching the scriptures" as a "means of grace" (Sermons, I, p. 242) and he described them as "the Christian rule of right and wrong" (Sermons, I, p. 225), arguing that actions which were not forbidden or enjoined by scripture were of an indifferent nature. He claimed that the inspiration of scriptures could be proved by the evidence of the miracles, the genuineness of its prophecies, the goodness of the doctrines, and "the moral character of the penmen" (Works, XI, p. 484).

In spite of his high estimate of reason, Wesley reacted against the rationalism of the Deists, and showed clearly the influence of Pietism. He described his message as "the true, the Scriptural, experimental religion" (Sermons, I, p. 32), since he believed that the Scriptures could not adequately be interpreted without a living personal experience, and that experience could not be relied upon unless it was grounded in a study of the scriptures.

Nineteenth and Twentieth Century Methodism. Methodists have attached great value to personal experience, but they have also stressed the importance of the Bible as a standard of belief and conduct. For example, RICARDO WATSON, the nineteenth century British theologian, argued that revelation was the communication of divine propositions to the mind of man, and that it was confined to the Bible, which was dictated by the Holy Spirit and contained no error. Various traditional arguments were adduced by Watson in support of the inspiration of the Bible. Like Wesley he pointed out the evidence of miracle and prophecy and the excellence of the scriptures themselves. He also mentioned their beneficent tendency to mankind, their consistency with the state of the world and with the historical records of the time. Like Wesley he stressed the importance of reason in deciding the meaning of the scriptures, but warned that reason must always be humble and subordinate to faith. Similar arguments were put forward by W. BURT POPE in Britain, and JOHN MILEY in America. It was admitted that there could be revelation outside the scriptures, but the supreme and perfect revelation was believed to be given in them. Pope admitted that not every single word of the scriptures was directly dictated by God but he argued that the whole was inspired by the Spirit and that there were no serious errors in it. Miley went as far as to say, however, that the scriptures were inspired only "with respect to their higher truths."

Men like Pope and Miley were conservative in outlook, but they were sufficiently flexible in thought to create an atmosphere in which more liberal ideas than theirs would be tolerated, and by the end of the nineteenth century theological liberalism and modern methods of biblical criticism was making its impact on Methodism. Even in the eighteenth century scholars had begun to subject the scriptures to the same kind of critical scrutiny which they gave to other writings, and this process had already been further developed in the nineteenth century. The authorship of the canonical books was widely discussed, and the traditional views were being seriously questioned. The historical accuracy of the Bible was also being disputed. The theory of evolution cast grave doubts upon the accuracy of the early chapters of Genesis and the historical records of the rest of the Old Testament were also subject to searching criticism. In the New Testament the historical reliability of John's gospel was doubted, and scholars engaged in the quest for the historical Jesus, an enterprise which assumed that none of the gospels was completely reliable and that the real facts had to be uncovered by historical criticism. The same treatment was given also to the history of the early Church in the study of the Acts of the Apostles and of the rest of the New Testament writings.

These developments were slow to influence Methodist theologians and scholars, and when they began to make their impact on Methodism, they did not engender as much controversy there as in some other denominations. The great divisions in nineteenth century British Methodism were caused by questions of discipline and organization and by the clash of personalities, but not by the problem of the inspiration and authority of the scriptures. The same was largely true of America, and where doctrine was a cause of division it was the doctrine of perfection rather than that of biblical inspiration which was the point at issue.

In Britain there was little serious disturbance within Methodism about the new methods of interpretation, although controversy was noticeably bitter in the discussion of the views of GEORGE JACKSON. In America, however, the controversy was lengthier and more publicized. The Old Testament scholar, H. C. MITCHELL, who was a professor at BOSTON UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY, was subject to various heresy charges between the years 1895 and 1905. Finally in 1905 the bishops refused to confirm his re-appointment. In 1908 the General Conference of the M. E. Church overruled the bishops' action and by that time Mitchell had obtained a professorship outside Methodism. A heresy charge was also brought against another Boston professor, BORDEN P. BOWNE, in 1904. He was accused of heretical views with respect to most of the main doctrines of the faith, but he was acquitted.

In 1910 the Fundamentalist movement arose in America, asserting that the five "fundamentals" of Christian teaching were the infallibility of the scriptures, the virgin birth, the physical resurrection of Jesus, the substitutionary atonement, and the second advent. The growth of this movement had its effect on Methodism, and in 1916 a prolonged controversy began over the course of study officially prescribed for lay preachers. The "Course of Study" had been revised to include many books of liberal outlook, and an effort was made by conservative leaders to substitute books of a more traditional viewpoint. The chief spokesman of the conservative wing was HAROLD PAUL SLOAN, and the views of this group were published in a journal called The Essentialist, indicating that the writers were preserving the essentials of the Christian faith. The "essentialist" movement failed to exclude the liberal views from the course of study and the controversy virtually ended in 1928. By that time Methodism on both sides of the Atlantic had made it plain that its members were allowed liberty of interpretation in doctrinal matters, and the Church refused to insist on any particular view of the Bible's authority.

The new approach was well summarized in England by George Jackson when he said that in reference to the authorship and historical accuracy of the books of the Bible, the only authority is the authority of the facts. And in moral and spiritual matters, the Bible's authority lies in the nature of the truth which it conveys and the response which it evokes. The British scholar, ARTHUR S. PEAKE, claimed that the Bible's authority depends on the collective witness of the writers which is not only self-authenticating but also verified in the experience of the believing Christian. Above all, supreme importance is attached by Peake to the teaching of Jesus himself, of which he believes critical scholarship can discern at least the broad outline.

In America similar views were expressed. Theologians like RALL, KNUDSON and DEWOLF saw the Bible as the chief source of Christian theology because it testified to Christ, but they did not equate the Bible with its message. They claimed that the real authority was in the gospel message which the reader could trace there. And they attached importance also to the authority of tradition, reason, and experience.

During the inter-war period and the Second World War the influence of Continental neo-orthodoxy, as represented by Barth and Brunner, became strong in Britain and America. There was a great emphasis on biblical theology. While British Methodist theologians could not for the most part be classified as Barthians, they agreed with the neo-orthodox emphasis on the centrality of the Bible for Christian thought, and a theology which sought its interpretative categories from the Bible was preferred to a philosophical theology. It could truly be said that the British Methodist Church's contribution to theology was chiefly made through its biblical scholars. And the curriculum of theological education throughout this period was preponderantly biblical. The biblical scholars were not fundamentalist. They accepted the new critical methods but they tended not so much to speak of the Bible as the Word of God as to contend that the Word of God spoke to men uniquely and determinately through the Bible. They differed from the liberals who preceded them by their deliberate attempt to free themselves from philosophical presuppositions.

In American Methodism, while the biblical emphasis was made, there was a greater variety of opinion than in Britain, and the philosophical approach to theology was mingled more readily with the biblical than it was in Britain. The curriculum of the theological seminaries, though it had a substantial biblical section, was not as preponderantly biblical as it was in Britain.

The demythologizing movement which arose during the second World War in Germany under the influence of Rudolf Bultmann has had a strictly limited influence in British Methodism but has been more influential in America. The "new hermeneutic," which has more recently stemmed from Bultmann's disciples, has also influenced some American Methodists. Although both of these movements are very radical in their treatment of the Bible and their interpretation of its essential message, they are undoubtedly Bible-centered, laying great emphasis on the preaching of the word and the response which it evokes.

The official doctrinal standards, the liturgy, and the traditional hymns of Methodism are thoroughly biblical, and from the beginning it was a Bible-centered movement. Although Methodist scholars have participated in biblical theology and biblical scholarship, none of them has initiated a new movement in biblical interpretation. Their function has been to support or to modify the views of others. The comparative ease with which Methodism accepted a variety of viewpoints may be accounted for mainly by four factors. First, John Wesley himself treated the Bible with remarkable flexibility considering his time and his situation. Secondly, Methodists have always laid great emphasis on personal religious experience, and therefore they have not been as bound to the infallibility of the written word as have some Protestants. Thirdly, although the leading theologians of nineteenth century Methodism were conservative, they were not insensitive to new ideas. And, fourthly, the Methodist advocates of the higher criticism in the early twentieth century were cautious and moderate in their views. Although they rejected the infallibility of the scriptures, they believed that the Bible was a unique book because it uniquely pointed to Christ.

The Methodist churches have exercised a large amount of tolerance with regard to the question of the Bible's authority and inspiration. Methodism includes members whose attitude to the scriptures is conservative and even fundamentalist. It also includes members with extremely liberal points of view. While there is no specially "Methodist" doctrine of the Bible's authority, the main stream of Methodist thought accepts the view that the Bible is inspired not because it was dictated to the writers directly by God, but because the writers wrote under the guidance of the Spirit, and because the Bible's message has the ability to awaken a response of faith.

The Bible is regarded as a standard of doctrine in the sense that no doctrines are required except those contained there. It is not assumed, however, that a doctrine is automatically required because it is found there. Nor do Methodists assume that all biblical rules of conduct apply in the modern situation. The Bible is not regarded as a code of laws or as a doctrinal handbook. It is seen as a testimony to the unique event of the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus Christ. The Old Testament describes the preparation for that event and gives the background of thought against which it can be understood. The New Testament testifies to the event itself, the earliest reactions to it and the earliest proclamation of it, and to the life of the first Christian believers. But the Bible is not merely understood as a testimony to past events. It tells of the new life which the event has made available, and when it is given an imaginative and practical interpretation, it can convey to men a living message which is relevant to their present situation.

Methodism has also laid great emphasis on the importance of the testimony to the living Christ by individual believers and by the Church as a corporate body. The biblical witness cannot be properly understood or made relevant without this contemporary testimony; and this contemporary testimony cannot be relied upon unless it is in harmony with the biblical witness and grounded upon it.

In the light of these observations, it is probably more accurate to speak, not of the Bible's authority, but of God's authority. In this sense of the word, the Bible is a collection of books which has unique value because it testifies to God's activity among men and above all to his activity in Christ, and because in the present as well as in the past, God works through it as it evokes a response in men. Any authority it possesses is ultimately the authority of God himself, to whose activity and purpose it bears witness.

BIBLE CHRISTIANS, British Methodist denomination (1815-1907). North Devon in 1815 was isolated, backward, spiritually benighted. Methodism had never flourished; Nonconformity was weak; there were few evangelical Anglican clergymen. After the great Cornish revival of 1814, WILLIAM O'BRYAN, hearing of twenty parishes where there was no evangelical preaching, crossed into Devon. He avoided the few places where the gospel was preached until he was persuaded to visit Shebbear, where the curate, Daniel Evans, had awakened many to their need of conversion. On Oct. 9, 1815, O'Bryan preached at Lake Farm, the home of John Thorne, and formed a society of 22 members. By Christmas, 1816, 980 members, including 66 preachers, had joined him and were nicknamed the "Bible Christians" from their practice of constantly consulting the Scriptures for guidance.

In 1817 the first chapel, Ebenezer, was built by John Thorne at Lake. Opposition became fierce, and conversion often cost a "Bryanite" laborer his home and work, but by 1820 the movement was spreading eastward, and JAMES THORNE, one of John's sons, and three others started a mission in Kent. Many women figured among the early itinerants, including Mary Mason in the Brendon Hills of West Somerset, Mary Toms in the Isle of Wight, MARY ANN VERREY in the Scilly Isles, and Mary O'Bryan, William's daughter, in the Channel Islands.

By 1827 there were 8,000 members, but many were growing restive, for O'Bryan, as president since the first conference in 1819, claimed an absolute right of veto. The preachers offered mild but firm resistance; and in 1829, disapproving of the decisions of the conference, O'Bryan adjourned it and left. Nearly all the preachers supported the conference, and their leader for the next forty years came to be James Thorne. Shebbear, already the spiritual home, became the organizational headquarters. James Thorne's younger brother, Samuel, set up a printing press and published an excellent connectional magazine, which James edited. A boarding school for the sons of the itinerant preachers was founded and, many years later, a school for girls at Edgehill, Bideford.

The troubles of 1829 injured but did not destroy the connection. By 1840 it had gained its greatest territorial extent; and while overseas missions were worked, in Canada (1845), Australia (1850), New Zealand (1878), and southwest China (1885), the home ground was plowed more thoroughly. In 1907 the Bible Christians joined with the UNITED METHODIST FREE CHURCHES and the METHODIST NEW CONNEXION to form the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH.

The Bible Christians contributed 220 ministers, 1,500 local preachers, 34,640 members, 628 chapels, 7,440 Sunday school teachers, and 48,100 scholars, and a fund of devotion to Christ which is not yet exhausted. Although the Bible Christians were not originally a Methodist body, they were thoroughly Methodist in spiritual experience and theology. Preaching, and at their best living the doctrines of conviction of sin, conversion, and sanctification, they were continually renewing their experience of grace in revivals, Bible study, class meetings, and prayer. They were deeply devoted to their own little church, but were no bigots, and gladly preached and worshiped wherever scriptural religion was practised. The feelings of family and equality were strong, and in the church's polity care was taken to safeguard equal representation in the central courts for ministry and laity. They were in the forefront of the battle for social and political reform, total abstinence, and nonsectarian education. Politically, they were Radical or Liberal almost to a man. More fully than any other body except the Friends, to whom their founders probably owed much of their simplicity of speech and grave courtesy of deportment, they honored the particular and comforting ministry of women. Their faith was simple. Probably some ministers erred by obtaining conversions by fear, by vividly depicting the tortures of hell; but they were alive to the unceasing threat of sin, and thousands of their converts proved by their lives the redeeming love of Christ.

BIBLE CLASS MOVEMENT in New Zealand existed for many years as an autonomous youth movement, said to be without exact parallel in other lands.

At the beginning of this century, there were young women's and young men's groups meeting in many local churches every Sunday. In these classes teen-agers who had been in the Sunday schools met for Bible study and to help each other in their Christian discipleship.

In 1904, the first district organization of these local classes was formed—the North Canterbury Young Women's Union, followed within a few months by the North Canterbury Young Men's Union. In 1906, district organizations led to the formation of national unions. These unions were self-governing youth movements, with national annual conventions and officers.

The Church Conference saw the importance of this development and in 1905 set aside a minister to organize this work. He was Charles Porter. Others who have given distinguished service in that position include A. B. Chapell, C. H. Olds, and E. P. Blamires. Lay traveling secretaries have been employed by the unions to foster the work.

Easter camps, Leadership training schools, guiding Sunday classes, and missionary activity have been prominent features of the programs of the Bible Class Movement.

In 1939 these autonomous Bible Class Movements were coordinated in the CHRISTIAN YOUTH MOVEMENT, METHODIST, administered first by the Youth Department of the Methodist Church of New Zealand and more recently by the Department of Christian Education, which has superseded the Youth Department.

BIBLE MISSIONARY CHURCH in the U.S.A. was formed by a number of holiness people who were dissatisfied with what they considered to be the present day laxness of the holiness churches, especially the CHURCH OF THE NAZARENE. The church was formed under the leadership of Glen Griffith, J. E. Cook, Spencer Johnson and H. B. Huffman, toward the close of a five-week camp meeting near Nampa, Idaho, in September and October, 1955. The first General Conference was held at Denver, Colo., in 1956.

Their doctrine is Wesleyan, with an extreme emphasis on holiness. Entire sanctification, as freedom from original sin and a state of entire devotion to God, is stressed. The belief in the future life, heaven and hell, and the pre-millennial return of Jesus is also central. A noticeable departure from Wesleyan heritage is in the understanding of the church as "composed of all spiritually regenerated persons whose names are written in heaven." The traditional GENERAL RULES of Methodism have also been expanded with the addition of much detail on points of behavior.

The church operates a school, the Bible Missionary Institute, located, along with its headquarters and the Book Store, in Rock Island, Ill. The Book Store publishes the Missionary Revivalist, a monthly organ, and the church school literature.

Mission work is carried on in British Guiana, New Guinea, Japan, India, Barbados, Okinawa and Mexico; a home mission project is on the Navaho Reservation at Farmington, N. M. A children's home is operated in Beulah Heights, Ky.

There are twelve districts in the United States covering work in thirty-eight states including Alaska.

BIBLE PROTESTANT CHURCH is the continuing Eastern Conference of the M. P. CHURCH, which, as a body, refused to join in Methodist unification in 1939. They withdrew and organized at Scullville, N. J. in 1940, adopting the name Bible Protestant Church.

The Church, which is extremely conservative, believes in the verbal inspiration of the Bible, the premillennial return of Jesus, the existence of Satan as a person, bodily resurrection of the dead, and eternal conscious punishment of the lost. It has a very strong emphasis on the doctrine of separation from apostasy and unbelief.

The polity is similar to that of the former M. P. Church with the exception that the GENERAL CONFERENCE is no longer in existence. There is one annual conference in which authority is vested. Local congregations are autonomous but freely accept the Bible Protestant standards.

A church periodical, Bible Protestant Messenger, was established in 1940. Conference grounds have been located at Port Jervis, N. Y. Bible Protestant Mission, Inc. has work going in Japan, the Philippine Islands, Mexico, and at Seabrook Farm, Bridgeton, N. J. The church is a member of the ultra-fundamental American Council of Christian Churches and the International Council of Christian Churches.

The denomination has thirty-seven local congregations with a little over 2,500 members.

BICENTENNIAL MEDALLION

BICENTENNIAL OF AMERICAN METHODISM—1966.

Some 2,300 Methodists from across the United States and Methodist representatives from overseas gathered at BALTIMORE, Md., April 21-24, 1966, to celebrate the 200th Anniversary of Methodist beginnings in America. With multitudes from Baltimore and surrounding areas, the attendance at various sessions at the Lyric Theater and the Civic Center ranged from 2,600 to 9,000. The theme, "Forever Beginning," stemmed from the 1960 GENERAL CONFERENCE action, stressing past history and Methodist involvement in modern secular society through ecumenical participation.

The General Bicentennial Committee, headed by Bishop PAUL N. GARBER, assisted by Bishop JOHN WESLEY LORD, CHARLES C. PARLIN, Bishop T. OTTO NALL, ALBEA GODBOLD, and eighteen others, formed the planning group. Additional assistance was given by twenty-six Council Secretaries and twenty-four other consultants, including the five Presidents of the Jurisdictional Methodist Historical Associations. Eleven standing committees carried out the celebration: Program, Local Arrangements in Baltimore, Publicity, Observance in Annual Conferences, Historical Filmstrip, Historical Booklet, Guidebook, Scholarships, Contests, "Saddlebags East," and Displays.

The "Saddlebags East" part of the Bicentennial was the riding to Baltimore, from various parts of the United States, of ministers on horseback, dressed in the garb of the earliest circuit riders and traveling as circuit riders did. Twelve such riders made their way to Baltimore slowly during the month or six weeks before the celebration and their progress through various cities and localities, preaching and speaking, was much featured by the newspapers of the cities and towns through which they passed. It was necessary to provide police escorts for these men, especially upon the great mechanized highways of the land, but they all managed to reach Baltimore in safety. President Johnson in his address to the Conference noted the presence on the platform of these circuit riders and said that they had been "calling by the White House for the last two weeks or so." This feature enlisted much favorable publicity over the nation.

Bishop GERALD H. KENNEDY of LOS ANGELES gave the keynote address on opening night. Fraternal messages were brought by W. Walker Lee (British Methodist Conference), Robert A. Nelson (Irish Methodist Conference), and Bishop PAUL N. ELLIS (FREE METHODIST CHURCH).

The Symposium on Friday afternoon, "Vital Issues Facing the Church," saw important persons on the rostrum, including Mayor Theodore R. McKeldin, Baltimore; Martin Luther King, Atlanta; Seymour Melman, Columbia University; and Roger Ortmyer, PERKINS SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY. Nineteen historical papers presented by outstanding scholars on Friday and Saturday mornings made a significant contribution. The papers were classed in three categories— theology, biography, and history—and have been published under the title, Forever Beginning, 1766-1966.

The President of the United States, Lyndon B. Johnson, gave the address on Friday night to a packed Lyric Theater audience.

At the Civic Center on Saturday afternoon, the Ecumenical Movement was emphasized, with Bishop ODD HAGEN of STOCKHOLM presiding. The panel participants included Bishop REUBEN H. MUELLER, E.U.B. CHURCH; Bishop RICHARD C. RAINES; EUGENE L. SMITH, WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES; and MRS. PORTER BROWN, Methodist Board of MISSIONS. On Saturday evening "Ecumenical Night" was observed with addresses by Lawrence Cardinal Shehan of Baltimore and CHARLES C. PARLIN of New York.

Sunday morning saw LOVE FEAST services at three historic Baltimore churches with Methodist preachers filling a large number of pulpits in Baltimore and vicinity.

A cylindrical TIME CAPSULE containing sealed tape recordings of messages to and for Methodists of 2066 A.D.—when the capsule is to be opened—was lowered with historic ceremony on Sunday afternoon in the Bishop's Lot at Mount Olivet Cemetery.

The concluding program on Sunday night was "Youth Recognition Night" chaired by youth and introducing descendants of BARBARA HECK, ROBERT STRAWBRIDGE, and PHILLIP CATCH. The historic drama, "Warm Hearts and Saddlebags," by E. Jerry Walker of Duluth, Minn., was the climax to an outstanding historic celebration.

The Bicentennial Celebration was planned to challenge the life of the nation and the world of 1966 to seek a renewal of the Holy Spirit in the affairs of men, and thus Methodism "Forever Beginning" will continue to serve her historic purpose.

BICKLEY, GEORGE HARVEY (1868-1924), American bishop, was born at Philadelphia, Pa., on Feb. 25, 1868. He was educated at the University of Pennsylvania, DREW THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, and Taylor University, from which he received the Ph.D. degree in 1901. DICKINSON COLLEGE conferred on him the D.D. degree in 1919.

He entered the ministry of the M. E. CHURCH in 1890 and held such appointments as Christ Church and Arch Street Church in PHILADELPHIA, and served as DISTRICT SUPERINTENDENT. In 1916 he became secretary of the Philadelphia City Mission Society and in 1917 was again district superintendent. He was elected bishop in 1920 and assigned to SINGAPORE. He died on Dec. 24, 1924, and was buried in St. James Cemetery, Philadelphia.

BIDAR, India is a strong center of Methodism in the Kanarese language area of the Deccan. For more than three centuries it was the capital of the Bahmani kings, sometimes called Sultans. During much of that time it boasted of its college, which was founded the year that Columbus discovered America. The ruins of its stately buildings testify to a vast expenditure of labor, and tradition lists it among the foremost educational institutions of INDIA until the fanatical Anrangzeb used it as an arsenal and its central building was shattered in an explosion.

The first M. E. minister to visit Bidar was SIMON PETER JACOBS who went there in 1885. He was accompanied by several converts who were being trained in a peripatetic Bible School. They were stoned and driven away. In 1888 another missionary, J. H. Garden, came with an Indian local preacher who, before his conversion, had been a Sanyasi. They remained several days and encountered no hostility. They spent a number of hours with another Sanyasi, who seemed to hear the gospel gladly. Years later that man was happily converted. His son became a minister and his daughter a teacher in the girls' school. An elderly man who had learned of Christ through a British engineer was converted and used of God to interest relatives and others. His village was Miriampur, a few miles from the city. A local preacher was appointed there as pastor. He opened a primary school. From 1892 through 1895 J. H. Garden visited Bidar once a month from Vikarabad. In 1894 a local preacher, David Marian, moved into Bidar, and the next year he was admitted to the annual conference on trial and appointed to Bidar.

In 1896 the first missionaries were assigned to live in the city. They were the Rev. and Mrs. Albert E. Cook. They remained there for seven years. Cook obtained from the Moslem government of HYDERABAD a document stating clearly that Indian Christians were entitled to equal rights with Moslems and Hindus before the law. A prominent missionary of another society called the document the Magna Charta of Christian Rights in the Nizam's dominions.

It made possible the buying of land and the construction of schools, a hospital, and churches in Bidar. The schools are now high schools. They have made possible the high school education of several hundred young Christian men and women who are rendering service in the Church and in public life. Scores have also graduated from college. The hospital has become a powerful force for good and a deterrent to Communism. Hundreds of Christian families have risen from oppression and dire poverty to influence and economic sufficiency.

An unusual feature of church life in Bidar is a prayer cave in the side of the high tableland on which the city is built. It was originally used by a Hindu ascetic who lived alone in his small cave. He was converted, as were many relatives and neighbors in the village of Mirzapur, below the cave. He and others gradually enlarged the cave. For years it has been extensively used. Every day scores of Christians from the village below and the city above go to the cave for prayer and meditation.

BIGLER, REGINA M. (?-1937), American U.B. missionary doctor in CHINA, had a well-established practice in Mitchell, S. D., when she was invited by the Women's Missionary Association of the UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST to go to South China where they had opened a Mission in the city of Canton. She arrived in Canton, China on Dec. 13, 1892, and immediately began to study the language. She died in Canton on Dec. 15, 1937, forty-five years after her first arrival in that city.

In the beginning, winning the confidence of the people was difficult. The Black Plague broke out—as many as one thousand dying in a day—and it was rumored that the missionary had given medicine which started the plague. Dr. Bigler was mobbed and stoned. Her love for the people and her compassion finally won out and in a few years she was in demand day and night. Before the close of her first decade in China her patients numbered 20,000 a year. She added a maternity hospital to her dispensary so that by the close of her years of active service she was ministering to an average of 30,000 a year. A doctor friend estimated that she had tended more than 550,000 patients in China. In addition to a large medical practice, in 1911 she had the oversight of two girls' day schools and the women's school, which she visited once a week. She also conducted a prayer meeting for women, a Saturday Bible study class, and taught a Sunday school class.

Dr. Bigler lived an extremely frugal life in order to take into her home unwanted Chinese children, especially girls. She mothered and educated them—they became nurses, teachers, pastors, homemakers, and one became a doctor.

She was loved by all classes of Chinese and to them was known as "the beloved physician of South China." Her name became one of magical power. On Dec. 15, 1937, she died in the Matilda Hospital, HONG KONG, where she had been placed for treatment of a gangrenous infection.

BILLINGS, BLISS WASHINGTON (1881-1969), missionary educator in KOREA, and the PHILIPPINE ISLANDS, was born in Greenfield, Ohio, Jan. 7, 1881. He received the Ph.B. and M.A. degrees from DEPAUW UNIVERSITY, and was awarded the D.D. degree in 1923. After five years of high school teaching he went to Korea in 1908.

His major assignment was to Union Christian College in Pyenyang. In 1915 he was transferred to the newly organized Chosen Christian College in Seoul. In 1932 he became president of the Methodist Union Theological Seminary in the capital.

In 1941 he was assigned to MANILA, only to be interned at Los Banos. In 1946 he was returned to Korea as Church World Service representative. Due to health reasons he was reassigned to Manila in 1947. He retired in 1951, but in 1952 was recalled to Korea for a year of evangelistic work.

Billings was a member of the Korea and later the NORTHWEST INDIANA Annual Conferences. His missionary career was especially noted for the wide contacts made with Korean young men through his English Bible classes. He retired in Hawaii in 1953, and died on March 8, 1969, at Corvallis, Ore.

BILLINGS, MONTANA, U.S.A. First Church is the downtown church in Billings. The membership is 2,300. Organized by the remarkable early Methodist leader in Montana, W. W. VAN ORSDEL, in 1883 when Billings was little more than a railroad head frequented by Calamity Jane, it sits on land once rejected by other churches because it was considered a muddy hole too far from the center of town. Today it is in the very center of Billings in the beautiful Yellowstone River Valley. Artifacts verify that Indians have lived in this sheltered valley during winters for at least 10,000 years. Sensitive to its heritage, the church has not been too careful to hold to old traditional patterns. It continues doing the unusual, in community service, pre-school children's care, young single adults, youth, family affairs, and acts as a haven to non-profit service groups.

Buildings were erected in 1885, 1900 and 1915. An educational wing was built in 1950. Then in 1963 all the old buildings were removed and a total new facility was erected at a cost of a million dollars. The ancient architectural concept of the flying buttress was used with modern materials to create a unique sanctuary seating 800 persons at worship. Because of its location this is frequently the host-church to annual conference and ecumenical efforts in education and evangelism.

The church has a history of long pastorates. Forrest Werts served sixteen years (1928-44), Andrew C. Caton served fifteen years (1944-59), and Vern L. Klingman began serving in 1959.

BILOXI, MISSISSIPPI, U.S.A., is the oldest continuously inhabited town in the Mississippi Valley. In 1699 Pere LeMoyné d'Iberville, who had been commissioned to settle the Colony of Louisiana which La Salle had discovered, planted the French flag at the site of the present City of Biloxi. The settlement was named for the Biloxi Indians, a friendly tribe encountered by d'Iberville when he disembarked. Biloxi served as the capital of the Colony of LOUISIANA until NEW ORLEANS became so in 1722. Biloxi was the site of the first landing of the "Casquette Girls," orphans sent by France to be wives of settlers in the new colony. Each girl was given a casquette (small box) with a trousseau. The first group of eighty girls arrived in Biloxi on Jan. 5, 1721. Eight flags have flown over Biloxi in its 270-year history.

The first serious effort at Methodist activity in Biloxi occurred in 1842. In that year a revival was conducted by Joseph Nicholson and C. Y. McNabb, which resulted in seven conversions. For the next fifty years the Biloxi Church was a small and struggling mission appointment. During those years it came under the pastoral leadership of George T. Vickers, J. W. McNeill, T. S. West, M.D., Benjamin Jones, George F. Thompson and others.

The church that is now First Church in Biloxi has been housed in four different buildings. The first was a frame structure at the corner of Division and Lameuse Streets. The second building, located at Main and Washington Streets, was a small two-story brick building purchased in 1891 from the Masonic Order. In 1904, under the leadership of H. W. Van Hook, the old building was torn down and a new one erected. The church was then named Main Street Church. In 1950, when T. A. Caruth was pastor, a new building was erected on Hopkins Blvd., and the name was changed to First Church. During the period of construction the congregation met for worship at the Tabernacle on the SEASHORE CAMP GROUND. There has always been a very close connection between Methodism in Biloxi and the Seashore Camp Ground, which for many years has served as a gathering place for Methodists from a large part of the South. First Church now has a congregation of about 1,000 members.

Other Methodist churches have been established as the City of Biloxi has grown. North Biloxi Methodist Church was established in 1921, Epworth in 1924, East End in 1939, Leggett Memorial in 1954, and Beauvoir in 1957 (named for the historic home of Jefferson Davis on the beach west of Biloxi). St. Paul Church, a former Central Jurisdiction Church, was established in 1907.

BINGHAM, JOSEPH REID (1861-1933), American layman, was born in Carrollton, Miss., Jan. 26, 1861. He united with the M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH early in life and from that time until his death, never let an opportunity pass without making an effort to advance and establish lofty standards of right. He was superintendent of his church school for twenty-five years, a delegate to many annual and general conferences, as well as to the ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE in TORONTO, Can. He was on the board of trustees of Grenada College, MILLSAPS COLLEGE and VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY at the same time.

Reid Bingham was a man of vivid personality, endowed with many rare qualities. His love for his church was truly a passion; intelligent rather than sentimental, he found fruitful expression in a loyalty and service extending over more than fifty years.

He did all he could do to encourage and develop a capable ministry for his church. He sought out those who professed a call to preach and admonished them to make full preparation before entering their sacred trust. Where lack of funds plagued a young ministerial candidate, he generously made it possible to meet the deficiency on terms neither difficult nor embarrassing. He was so generous with his means that he could be called a sacrificial giver.

He loved the literature of the church and was especially moved by the great hymns of the church. It was his custom to spend an hour each morning with his Bible, his Discipline and his hymnbook.

He died at Indianola, Miss., Aug. 1, 1933.

BINKLEY, JACOB MONROE (1833-1916), American presiding elder and pastor, was born in Robertson County, Tenn., Feb. 26, 1833, and moved to Texas in 1853. He joined the EAST TEXAS CONFERENCE in 1857, going with the Trinity Conference (NORTH TEXAS after 1874) when it was carved from the East Texas body. Though as a conference member Binkley was technically an itinerant for nearly sixty years, he somehow managed to live in Sherman, Texas, throughout his ministry. He was pastor of the Methodist Church in Sherman four different times for a total of eight years, and he served as PRESIDING ELDER of the Sherman District five times for a total of nineteen years, in addition to ten years on other districts—something of a record even in Southern Methodism. He was a delegate to the 1866 GENERAL CONFERENCE and to four other General Conferences. He served as a trustee of SOUTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY at Georgetown and of North Texas Female College at Sherman. Binkley accumulated a modest fortune, and was generous with a number of Methodist causes. Though Binkley lived to be an octogenarian, he never superannuated; in 1900 he was appointed agent for the college in Sherman, and was reappointed each year until his death. He died Jan. 13, 1916.

BIRMINGHAM, ALABAMA, U.S.A. Organized Methodism began in what is now Birmingham in 1818, though the city itself was not founded until 1871. (See Walker Memorial Church). First Methodist Church was established in 1872. The next year it reported 122 members. Methodism grew with the city, and in 1969 the NORTH ALABAMA CONFERENCE had ninety churches and the CENTRAL ALABAMA CONFERENCE twelve in the Birmingham metropolitan area. The bishop of the Birmingham Area resides in the city, and BIRMINGHAM-SOUTHERN COLLEGE is located there, as well as MILES COLLEGE. The 1906 and 1938 GENERAL CONFERENCES of the M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH were held in Birmingham. In 1969 the 102 United Methodist churches in greater Birmingham reported approximately 67,000 members, property valued at $34,000,000, and some $4,800,000 raised for all purposes during the year.

Canterbury Church is located on a 25-acre tract in the Mountain Brook suburb. Organized in the vicinity as Irondale Church in 1867, it moved a little west of Mountain Brook Village in 1873 and changed its name to Union Hill Church. The Union Hill building was replaced in the 1890's, and another was erected in 1928 when the name was changed to Canterbury Church. In 1948 Mountain Brook Church, which had begun as Crestline Church in 1912 and was renamed in 1942, united with Canterbury to form Canterbury-Mountain Brook Church. The property of both churches was then sold and the united congregation of 900 members rebuilt on the present site, the first service at the new location being held Oct. 12, 1952. The name was officially changed to Canterbury Church in 1956. The congregation grew rapidly, and in 1969 the church reported 2,960 members, property valued at $1,800,000, and $303,395 raised for all purposes during the year.

East Lake Church, dates from 1887 when a small frame building was erected on the back of the lot now known as 8001 Second Avenue, South. A larger structure was built at the front of the lot in 1889. In 1900 the church had 40 members. In 1909 the congregation of 580 members moved into a brown stone sanctuary at 78th Street and First Avenue, South. An education building was erected in 1927. On October 10, 1948, when the membership exceeded 2,300, an impressive new church edifice was dedicated. Later a youth center and a new parsonage were purchased, a children's building was erected, a chapel was completed, and the education building was renovated and fireproofed. East Lake Church is known for service to the community, support of missions, emphasis on family life, ministry to young people, and a good music program. In 1969 the church reported 3,245 members, a plant valued at $1,582,000, and $234,227 raised for all purposes during the year.

First Church, the big downtown church of Birmingham Methodism, was organized in February, 1872, and its first building, costing $1,600, was erected in June of that year on land donated by the Elyton Land Company. The church had 122 members in 1873, the number growing to 458 by 1882, when a $20,000 brick sanctuary was erected. Nine years later the present edifice, with a seating capacity of 1,400, located at 19th Street and 6th Avenue North, was built. The Byzantine structure has 142 stained glass windows, and no two of its pews are exactly the same size or shape. Administration and education buildings were erected in 1950 and 1965, respectively. In addition to classrooms, the latter has dining facilities, a library, gymnasium, fireside room, and rooftop recreation area. Recently the church purchased a parking lot at a cost of $300,000.

A Woman's Missionary Society was organized in First Church in 1879, the first such local church organization formed after the 1878 GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH authorized the Woman's Missionary Council. Prominent preachers have served First Church, among them GEORGE R. STUART (1917-26), Bishop ARTHUR J. MOORE (1926-30), CLOVIS G. CHAPPELL (1933-36), Bishop W. ANGIE SMITH (1936-38), and Bishop PAUL HARDIN, JR. (1949-60). An outstanding layman, HARRY DENMAN, was business manager of First Church (1919-38) before beginning his long term as General Secretary of the BOARD of EVANGELISM at Nashville (1938-65). In 1969 First Church had a paid staff of some twenty people, 4,000 members, and a plant valued at $3,500,000. During that year it raised for all purposes about $400,000.

Highlands Church, located in the southeastern section of the city, was organized as Five Points Church, December 2, 1903. The next year it reported 254 members. The name was changed to Highlands in 1907. The present Byzantine edifice, containing a carillon of 13 bells, was designed by Stanford White. In recent years the interior of the sanctuary has been reconstructed in cathedral form, and the education facilities of the plant have been remodeled at a total cost of half a million dollars. In 1920 the church had almost 1,000 members, and the number was nearly 2,000 at unification in 1939. Three pastors of Highlands Church became bishops: JAMES H. MCCOY (1910), HOYT M. DOBBS (1922), and MARVIN A. FRANKLIN (1944). Three men served long pastorates at Highlands: W. R. Hendrix (11 years), M. A. Franklin (14 years), and Guy B. McCowan (18 years). In 1969

Superannuate Homes, a project of the NORTH ALABAMA CONFERENCE, was initiated in 1906 by John E. Morriss, a layman. Concerned because many preachers were retired with no place to live and nothing to live on, Morriss offered to pay an agent's salary ($600) for one year, if the bishop would appoint one who would try to find ways and means of providing for the retired preachers. The bishop concurred, and John W. Norton served as agent for forty years. Traveling over the conference, Norton collected more than $75,000 for housing for superannuated preachers. In 1952 the conference abandoned voluntary offerings and began assigning quotas of $25 to $2,000 to each charge, thus collecting over $100,000 per year for the retired men. Seventy percent of the money was applied to new houses and the repair of old ones, while 30 percent of the money was used to supplement the annuities of the claimants. During the years the conference also placed $700,000 on deposit with the General Board of Pensions. The conference now has some 120 superannuate houses or apartments valued at $1,250,000 with little or no indebtedness. The superannuates pay no rent for the housing, most of which is modern, but they do pay for their utilities. The conference maintains the houses. An allowance is made to retired men who live in their own homes. It is expected that the superannuate homes program will be completed soon, thus permitting the conference to increase the annuity rate which was $58 in 1968. Of $424,000 apportioned for pensions in 1968-69, $35,000 was allocated for "superannuate housing allowance."

Trinity Church. In 1901 F. T. J. Brandon was appointed to Trinity in the Birmingham District. The next year the church reported 45 members. It soon had 200, but thereafter growth was slow for many years. Membership did not pass the 500 mark until 1939. Rapid growth came after World War II—1,446 members in 1950, 2,449 in 1955, and 3,000 by 1960. In 1927 the congregation moved into a new building at Oxmoor Road and Seminole Street, its present location which is near the important University Medical Center. In 1950 a new sanctuary was completed, cruciform in design, with a seating capacity of 750. Two education buildings were erected, one in 1956 and the other in 1965. The three structures are of native pink sandstone. Trinity Church is known for its excellent library which is widely used by children, youth, and adults. In 1969 Trinity reported the largest membership of any Methodist church in Alabama, 4,061. Its plant is valued at $1,557,909, and it raised for all purposes during the year $336,575.

Vestavia Hills Church, located in a growing section of the city, was organized with 114 members in 1953. It has grown rapidly—over 800 members by 1958 and over 2,100 in 1968. The church has built an adequate plant and has developed a varied program of services and activities. These include Christian education, theological self-education, teacher-worker training, ministry to youth, music, drama, art, social action community projects, and ministry in the inner city. A corps of committed lay men and women is involved with the ministers and the employed staff in overall planning for the church and its ministry. The church plant, covering a city block, consists of a sanctuary, education facilities, gymnasium, chapel, prayer room, youth fireside room, dining hall, library, parlor, and an inner court or garden of meditation. In 1969 Vestavia Hills Church reported 2,318 members, property valued at $2,070,000, and $288,611 raised for all purposes.

Walker Memorial Church was the first Methodist church to exist in what is now Birmingham. About 1818 Ebenezer Hearn built a one-room log meetinghouse in a settlement known as Frog Level Racing Grounds near the intersection of the Huntsville, Montevallo and Tuscaloosa trails. The name of the community was soon changed to Elyton, and the log church was still standing when Birmingham was founded in 1871. In 1909 the log structure was moved on rollers to Tuscaloosa Avenue and Third Street, and the next year the church was renamed Walker Memorial in honor of Corilla Walker, a member.

The present sanctuary at Tuscaloosa and Third was built soon after World War I. It is noted for the eight heavy but graceful limestone columns on its front. Each column weighs 15,400 pounds and was installed at a cost of more than $1,000. These are said to be the largest monolithic columns in the world with the exception of certain pillars in a temple in Russia.

A historical marker placed on the church lawn by the Birmingham Historical Society reads: "The Mother Church of Birmingham Methodism. In 1818, before Alabama, Jefferson County, Elyton, or Birmingham existed, Elyton Methodist Church was established on Center Street. It was moved to 14 Second Avenue, and in 1909 to its present site. Renamed in 1910 for Corilla Porter Walker (1824-1908), a member, and dedicated May 14, 1944. Birmingham Historical Society—1948." In 1969 Walker Memorial Church reported 403 members, property valued at $485,000, and $34,635 raised for all purposes.

BIRMINGHAM, England. The Industrial Revolution profoundly affected the British Midlands in the eighteenth century. Birmingham grew from a village to the "Grand Toy Shop of Europe," producing a wide range of manufactured steel goods. Methodism in Birmingham and the Black Country grew in the prosperous soil of an expanding industrialism.

CHARLES WESLEY created the first Birmingham society of thirteen members on June 26, 1743. It soon faced trouble: Charles preached in the Bull Ring in February 1744 while the mob "rung the bells, and threw dirt and stones all the time." He was repeatedly struck before he reached safety. On May 5, 1745, JOHN WESLEY preached on Gesta Green. "The stones and dirt were flying from every side, almost without intermission, for near an hour." In October, 1751, the pulpit and seats of the first preaching house at the corner of Steelhouse Lane and Whittall Street were burned by "some young and thoughtless persons." Mob violence still lingered in 1764, when John Wesley preached in the second preaching house, an old playhouse between Moor Street and Park Street. He was also constantly troubled in the society by "fierce, unclean, brutish, blasphemous Antinomians," and "mystic foxes." It is not surprising that Wesley called Birmingham "a barren, dry, uncomfortable place," in his Journal, April 4, 1755.

Matters had greatly improved years later, however, by July, 1782, when he opened the new chapel in Cherry Street. Although this chapel held a thousand persons, many failed to get in for the evening service. The Birmingham Gazette reported that Wesley gave "an excellent discourse to a genteel and numerous congregation." He returned in 1786 and 1787 to administer the Lord's Supper to five hundred and eight hundred people respectively. He opened new chapels at Deritend (Bradford Street) in 1786, and Coleshill Street (Belmont Row) in 1789. He wrote in 1788 that the society had over eight hundred members, and was inferior to none except those at London and Bristol. On his last visit in March, 1790, he was impressed by his congregation's behavior, "so decent, so serious, so devout, from the beginning to the end."

The same pattern of early persecution and later toleration was repeated throughout the Black Country. Fierce persecutions against the Methodists of Wednesbury, Darlaston, Walsall, and West Bromwich raged in 1743. The local magistrates refused their protection as Methodists were physically assaulted and forced to worship in private houses. The climax of the persecution came on Oct. 20, 1743, when John Wesley came to Wednesbury. He was greeted by a mob who took him to the magistrate at Walsall, where a rival mob captured him. He was beaten with an oak club, struck on the mouth, grabbed by the hair, and paraded through the town. Yet his unflinching courage so impressed the mob's leader that he helped him to return to Wednesbury. Five days later Charles Wesley received "Honest Munchin," the mob leader, as a member on trial. When asked what he thought of John Wesley, Munchin replied, "Think of him? That he is a mon of God, and God was on his side, when so many of us could not kill one mon." (T. Jackson, Charles Wesley, I, 356).

Among other Methodists who came from this area, FRANCIS ASBURY was born at Great Bart in 1745. ALEXANDER MATHER, THOMAS TAYLOR, WILLIAM THOMPSON, SAMUEL BRADBURN, and JOSEPH BENSON all served as itinerant preachers in eighteenth-century Birmingham. The vicar and curate of St. Mary's Anglican Church were sympathetic toward Wesley, and the Birmingham Methodists sometimes found a refuge there.

Cherry Street Chapel was enlarged in 1823, when Henry Taft complained that Methodism "had not attained the extensive influence in Birmingham which it had acquired in some other towns" because of "want of chapel room." This was remedied as Islington (1825), Wesley (1828), and Bristol Road (1834) were built. The old Birmingham Circuit of 1781 was divided into the Cherry Street and Belmont Row circuits in 1835, and then in the following year the first of many Wesleyan conferences was held in the town.

The METHODIST NEW CONNEXION opened a room in Needles Alley in 1810 and a chapel in Oxford Street in 1811. Preachers from Birmingham missioned Dudley in 1818, which in its turn became a missionary center for the Black Country. A Birmingham circuit which included Wolverhampton was created in 1828. A secession at Stourbridge during the SAMUEL WARREN controversy in 1836 joined the New Connexion rather than the WESLEYAN METHODIST ASSOCIATION, and this became the center of another circuit.

PRIMITIVE METHODISM came to Birmingham in 1824; James Moss recorded in his journal having preached there on Sept. 5, when a society of "nearly forty" was already in existence. In a rapid expansion the Primitive Methodists overreached their strength, and it was not until 1844 that this society recovered. Under James Graham and his successor, Henry Leech, under whom the new John Street Chapel was opened and the membership increased to 220, the Primitive Methodists consolidated their work. Cooch Street Chapel was built in 1852, and by 1860 there were 750 members and five chapels.

Chapels belonging to the Wesleyan Methodist Association came into being in 1836 at Birmingham and Redditch, and UNITED METHODIST FREE CHURCHES circuits in 1857-60 at Wednesbury, Darlston, and Tamworth. In Birmingham one Association cause began in a house at Nechells, then moved to Cattell's Grove Chapel, and then to Rocky Lane Chapel in 1860. The BIBLE CHRISTIANS established three causes at King's Heath, Bordesley Green, and Farcroft Avenue in 1894. A Bible Christian minister, W. Udy Bassett, was imprisoned for his opposition to the Education Act of 1902.

During the years in which the famous Liberal Party politician and mayor of Birmingham, Joseph Chamberlain, was reconstructing the city, Methodism flourished. The Wesleyans opened Handsworth Theological College in 1881 and the Princess Alice School in 1882. The Cherry Street Chapel was demolished in 1886 when Corporation Street was built; and a Central Hall, a tribute to the FORWARD MOVEMENT, was erected in 1887. The Primitive Methodists built the Conference Hall in 1895, its most distinguished minister being Joseph Odell.

For twenty-five years LUKE WISEMAN exercised an outstanding ministry at the Wesleyan Central Hall; the building was replaced with another having twice the capacity in 1903. In 1931 the Wesleyan Conference Handbook described it as "a free adaptation of Perpendicular Gothic," and praised its beauty, "its preeminence both in stateliness of design and in general suitability for the work of the mission." It is a judgment unlikely to be endorsed by posterity. Under Wiseman and F. H. Benson, the Central Hall became a powerful social and evangelistic agency, the focal point of the life of the Wesleyan district. The famous Conference on Christian Politics, Economics, and Citizenship (COPEC) was held at the Central Hall under the presidency of William Temple in 1924.

The pressures of twentieth-century secularism, however, have affected Birmingham deeply. Inner-belt areas of the city are depopulated, and the congregations of the Central Hall and other chapels have declined. Huge new estates have sprung up round the city, and these have overtaxed Methodism's limited resources for the provision of new chapel buildings. There is also resistance to changing conditions. In the Methodist Conference Handbook for 1953 RUSSELL SHEARER wrote: "One outstanding instance is an area housing 10,000 people, where we have four centres, two of them merely temporary huts. Both workers and premises are stretched to capacity in magnificent evangelism." Yet the membership of the Wolverhampton and Shrewsbury district has actually gone up since Methodist Union: 23,285 members in 1933 compared with 25,742 in 1965.

BIRMINGHAM, MICHIGAN, U.S.A. First Church was organized in Willetts Tavern in 1821 with Salmon Steele as the first pastor. The first church building was erected in 1836. It was replaced in 1871 by a new and more commodious sanctuary valued at $20,000. Prior to 1900 the church membership did not exceed 200. In 1915 there were 308 members and 620 in 1939. In 1951 First Church, under the leadership of Arnold F. Runkel (pastor 1944-62), sold its property in downtown Birmingham and relocated at Maple Road and Pleasant Street. The membership of 898 in 1950 increased to 2,773 by 1960. In 1969 First Church reported 3,781 members, property valued at $2,273,421, and approximately $300,000 raised for all purposes during the year over and above the amount paid on debt and improvements.

BIRMINGHAM-SOUTHERN COLLEGE, Birmingham, Ala., is a result of a merger of Southern University, founded in Greensboro, Ala., in 1856 and Birmingham College, opened in 1898 in Birmingham. These two institutions were consolidated on May 30, 1918, under the present name. The college operates under the auspices of the ALABAMA-WEST FLORIDA and NORTH ALABAMA CONFERENCES. It received a challenge grant of $2,000,000 from the Ford Foundation in 1966. A Phi Beta Kappa chapter was installed in 1937. Degrees granted are the B.A., B.S., B.M. (Bachelor of Music), B.M.E. (Bachelor of Music Education), M.A., M.Ed. (Master of Education), and M.S. The governing board has thirty trustees, twelve each elected from North Alabama and Alabama-West Florida Conferences, six at large.

BIRNEY, LAURESS JOHN (1871-1937), American bishop, was born at Dennison, Ohio, on Sept. 11, 1871. He was graduated from Scio College in 1895, from the BOSTON UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY in 1899, and was awarded honorary degrees by Scio College and WESLEYAN, Yale, and CHATTANOOGA Universities.

He entered the ministry of the M. E. CHURCH in 1895 and was stationed at Plainfield, Ohio, and in Worcester, Hyde Park, Newton Center, and Malden Center in Massachusetts. He was dean of BOSTON UNIVERSITY from 1911 to 1920, and in the latter year was elected bishop. He was sent to CHINA where he served for several years until illness forced his return to America. He died at Pasadena, Calif., on May 10, 1937, and was buried in Forest Lawn Cemetery, Glendale.

BIRSTALL, Yorkshire, England, is situated between Huddersfield and Leeds, and is noted for its association with JOHN NELSON and a dispute over the trust deed of the chapel, which was opened in 1751 by JOHN WESLEY. There seems to have been no intention on the part of John Nelson to alienate the chapel from the Conference, but when the building was replaced by a larger chapel in 1782, John Wesley refused to sign the deed to which he had been made a party because of the overriding powers given to the trustees in relation to the preachers. The situation was considered by the Conference in 1782, and later Wesley wrote The Case of the Birstall House. It appears that the issue was amicably settled, for it was revealed during a law case in 1853 that, in spite of the deed, the trustees had always accepted the preachers appointed by the Conference after the death of Wesley.

BISBEE, ROYAL DANIEL (1886-1960), American missionary in INDIA from 1910 to his retirement in 1951, was born in Winthrop, Me., Aug. 22, 1886, and grew up in the state of Washington. He earned the A.B. and A.M. degrees from WILLAMETTE UNIVERSITY and the S.T.B. degree from BOSTON UNIVERSITY. He went to Baroda in Gujarat as a missionary of the M. E. Church in September, 1910. The next year he was married to Pearl Bertha Gosnell of Everett, Mass., who was a graduate of the New England Deaconess Training School. They served together in the Florence B. Nicholson School of Theology, of which he was for some time principal, and in the Godhra and Baroda Districts of Gujarat Conference and the Roorkee and Delhi Districts of the Delhi Conference, in all of which he was DISTRICT SUPERINTENDENT.

He received the D.D. degree from Willamette University, was twice elected as a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE, and often served on important committees, boards, and commissions and on regional Christian councils. He was successively financial secretary for the Bombay and Delhi Episcopal Areas for a total of fourteen years. He was the author of Adventures with Christ in Mystic India.

Mrs. Bisbee died on Aug. 13, 1959, and Bisbee on Jan. 4, 1960.

BISHOP, ABRAHAM J. (?-1793), British missionary to CANADA and the WEST INDIES. We know only that he was born in Jersey and was converted at an early age. A fluent preacher in French and English, he served at St. John's, New Brunswick, 1791-93, with great success as a pioneer missionary. In 1793 he was transferred to Grenada. The chapel he built at St. George quickly proved too small. His bilingual gifts and his grace of character would have done much to build up the church, but he died of fever at Grenada on June 16, 1793.

BISHOP, WILLIAM H. (1793-1873), an A.M.E. ZION bishop, was born in 1793 at Troy, N. Y. He was converted Jan. 9, 1830. He was licensed to preach at Troy in 1835. He joined the conference June 20, 1837, and was ordained deacon the following year. Two years later in 1840, he was ordained elder. He was elected a bishop or superintendent of his church in 1852. He requested the retired status in 1868 and died May 20, 1873.

DAVID H. BRADLEY

BISHOPS OF THE EVANGELICAL UNITED BRETHREN CHURCH, THE BOARD OF, consisted of the active bishops elected by the General Conference every four years. Retired bishops served as advisory members. The active bishops were elected from among the active itinerant ELDERS of the church who had been itinerant elders for at least ten years. Bishops were eligible for reelection up to seventy-two years of age. A bishop who had served three terms or more could, upon retirement, be given the title, bishop emeritus.

The board was organized with a president, vice-president and secretary. The senior bishop usually served as president. The General Church Treasurer was the treasurer of the Episcopal Fund, which was provided from the denominational Christian Service Fund to pay the housing, salaries and expenses of the bishops, and benefit allowances for retired bishops and bishops' widows.

The Board of Bishops met to review the work of all the areas and departments of the church and had the authority to make such recommendations to the various annual conferences, boards and institutions of the church as the board considered wise and necessary. The Board of Bishops by majority vote decided all questions of church law and discipline that were brought before it. Interpretation of the Church Discipline made by the Board of Bishops was binding upon the entire Evangelical United Brethren Church until the next General Conference, at which time it was studied and presented to the General Conference in the form of petitions to be incorporated in the law of the church through proper clarification of the section or sections involved.

The Board of Bishops had the authority and power to determine what constituted an emergency demanding immediate action within The Evangelical United Brethren Church during a quadrennium. When such an emergency was declared, the GENERAL COUNCIL OF ADMINISTRATION was empowered to act for the denomination in such emergency.

An episcopal message was presented to the General Conference by the Board of Bishops, setting forth the state of The Evangelical United Brethren Church, giving such a review of the work and achievements of the church, and offering such recommendations as it considered expedient and helpful to the church.

The Board of Bishops prepared the agenda and appointed the committees of the General Conference and members of the Board were assigned in turn to preside over the sessions. The bishops were voting members of the General Conference, the highest legislative, judicial and administrative body of the denomination.

The Board of Bishops had supervisory responsibility for the Sierra Leone (Africa) and European Conferences, and each year assigned members of the Board to visit the conferences and preside over the annual conference sessions.

The Discipline began the list of a bishop's duties with this statement: "to oversee the spiritual and temporal concerns of The Evangelical United Brethren Church in general, and to take care that everything is done according to the Word of God and the order and Discipline of The Evangelical United Brethren Church."

The episcopacy in The Evangelical United Brethren Church was one of general superintendency. Each bishop was assigned a geographical area of the church. A General Conference committee on the episcopacy made recommendations for assignments. The bishop was required to reside within the boundaries of his assigned area. The denomination provided for the bishop's residence.

A bishop was a bishop of the whole church, however, not only of the area to which he was assigned.

There was no separate ordination for a bishop in The Evangelical United Brethren Church. He was an ordained itinerant elder elected from among the other ordained itinerant elders by the General Conference to a special office and responsibility, with authority and power commensurate with the duties assigned to the office. He was installed in the office, but never ordained to it. He was elected to perform a service.

In the early days of the Church of the United Brethren in Christ, provisions were made for the ordination of bishops, but only two men were ever ordained as bishops—ANDREW ZELLER in 1817 and JOSEPH HOFFMAN in 1821. The ritual of such ordination was omitted from later editions of the Discipline. The early editions of the EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION Discipline had such provision for ordination of bishops, but there is no evidence that such an ordination ever took place.

In order that the bishops might be better informed about the work of the church, all were members of all General Boards, except the BOARD OF PUBLICATION. Two bishops served as voting members of this Board. The other bishops were advisory members. All bishops served as trustees on the two seminary trustee boards. Each bishop was also on the board of trustees of the church institutions within the boundaries of his area.

Other duties of the bishops included ordaining ministers, presiding at the sessions of the annual conferences, with the conference superintendents assigning fields of labor to the ministers. If necessary, in the interval of annual conference sessions, the bishop changed the assignments of conference superintendents and pastors. If a vacancy occurred in the office of a conference superintendent in the interval between annual conference sessions, he appointed a superintendent to serve until the next session of the annual conference, after consultation with the conference council of administration.

A bishop was to travel throughout the annual conferences of his area and such other parts of the church as the General Conference or the Board of Bishops directed. He was authorized to call a special session of any annual conference within his area, with a concurrence of a majority of the active members of that conference or with the conference council of administration.

A retired bishop might be called upon to serve in an emergency, and when assignment was made he had full authority as a bishop.

In the beginning, the bishops of the Evangelical and the United Brethren Churches carried on their superintendency largely as individuals, conferring with each other only as they met at conferences. In 1865, the General Conference of the Church of the United Brethren in Christ adopted a recommendation from the Committee on Superintendency that appeared to be the first step in establishing the bishops of the church as a board, making provisions for them to function as a unit of the church as well as individual leaders. This action provided that "The Bishops shall hold annual meetings, at which they shall determine the time of holding the annual conferences—decide questions of discipline—adopt measures to secure uniformity in their administration—when circumstances demand it, appoint fast and thanksgiving sessions—and to counsel upon the general interest of the church." Sometime later, a similar provision appeared in the Discipline of the Evangelicals, so that their bishops began to function also as a unit as well as individuals.

The early minutes of the Board of Bishops of the former churches, which are available, indicate that much time was given to deciding questions of discipline. Later records, however, showed that more attention was given to coordinating and unifying the work of the church. As early as 1904, Bishop J. S. MILLS proposed that "the heads of the several departments be affiliated with the bishops in a cabinet meeting for yearly conference," to better unify and coordinate the work of the denomination. This was probably the beginning of the definitely expressed concern that culminated in the organization of the Board of Administration in the United Brethren Church in 1917. This was carried into The Evangelical United Brethren Church in 1946 as the General Council of Administration, with responsibility for coordinating and unifying the work of the denomination as one of its duties.

The bishops of both the Evangelical and the United Brethren Churches were functioning as individual leaders and as a Board of Bishops before the union of the denominations in 1946.

Bishops were amenable to the General Conference, but did not make individual reports to it. The minutes of the Board of Bishops' meetings were examined by a committee of the General Conference, which then reported its findings and recommendations to the General Conference.

The Board of Bishops, composed of R. H. MUELLER, J. C. HOWARD, H. W. KAERNICK, W. MAYNARD SPARKS, PAUL M. HERRICK, PAUL W. MILHOUSE, PAUL A. WASHBURN, Bishop Emeriti GEORGE E. EPP and HAROLD R. HEININGER, joined the COUNCIL OF BISHOPS of the United Methodist Church at the time of the union in 1968.

The present Episcopacy: At the UNITING CONFERENCE of The Methodist Church and The Evangelical United Brethren Church, a constitutional provision was certified to as having been written in the constitution of The United Methodist Church as follows:

Division Three—Episcopal Supervision. Article 1.—There shall be a continuance of an episcopacy in The United Methodist Church of like plan, powers, privileges, and duties as now exist in The Methodist Church and in The Evangelical United Brethren Church in all those matters in which they agree and may be considered identical; and the differences between these historic episcopacies are deemed to be reconciled and harmonized by and in this Plan of Union and Constitution of The United Methodist Church and actions taken pursuant thereto so that a unified superintendency and episcopacy is hereby created and established of, in, and by those who now are and shall be bishops of The United Methodist Church.

This recognized the unity in most matters and procedures of these two episcopacies and thus formed them into one for The United Methodist Church. The Board of Bishops, E.U.B., became a part of the Council of Bishops, U.M.C., and there has been no noticeable difference in the procedures governing the new body over against the old Board of Bishops.

BLACK, ROY HERBERT (1914-1969), an American business executive, state legislator, and prominent southern layman, was born in Nettleton, Miss., on Nov. 8, 1914. He was educated at MILLSAPS COLLEGE and served as representative in the state legislature from 1964 to 1968. He also served as mayor of his home town of Nettleton. His wife was Adeline Basham, whom he married on May 29, 1939, and they had one daughter.

Roy Black became Lay Leader of the NORTH MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE, holding office there from 1956 to 1969, and was a delegate three times to the GENERAL CONFERENCE and of course to his own JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCE in which he exerted enormous influence. He was a member of the Board of the LAITY for twelve years. In 1967 he was runner-up in the race for lieutenant governor of the state of Mississippi. He died on September 11, 1969, following a lengthy illness. Services were conducted in his home church by Bishop PENDEGRASS, Bishop FINGER, and his pastor, Rev. Kenneth Sissell.

BLACK, SAMUEL (1813-1899), a pioneer American preacher, was born March 3, 1813 in Rupert, Greenbrier Co., Va. (now W. Va.), the son of Joseph and Abigail Black. In 1832 he was converted in services held in a farm home and from that day felt a call to preach which he did not answer for eight years.

He was licensed to preach in 1840 at a camp meeting held in Nicholas Co., and was recommended for admission to the OHIO CONFERENCE, of which that area was a part. When separation of Episcopal Methodism came he adhered to the M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH and for a while served in the KENTUCKY CONFERENCE which then extended over a large part of what later was WEST VIRGINIA. His assignments, however, were all in Western Virginia.

He had an important role in the organization of the WESTERN VIRGINIA CONFERENCE at Parkersburg in 1850. He prepared the resolutions, adopted at Malden (Va.), which were sent to the GENERAL CONFERENCE, resulting in the organization of a new annual conference in the M. E. Church, South.

He travelled for fifty years and in 1890 asked for a superannuate relation. In speaking to the conference he revealed that he had travelled 75,000 miles, mostly on horseback, and had received $6,181.28 in salary. Presents or gifts, he said, totaled $1,182.61 and marriage fees $400.36, a total of $7,764.25 or $155.28 per year.

In both dress and speech he was a plain man. None left a greater mark on the church in rural West Virginia than Sam Black. A community in Greenbrier County today bears his name—Sam Black Church. He died July 13, 1899.

WILLIAM BLACK

BLACK, WILLIAM (1760-1834), Canadian preacher, founder and organizer of the first Wesleyan societies in eastern British America, was born in Huddersfield, Yorkshire, England, in 1760—the second son in a large family. About 1775, the Black family emigrated to Cumberland County, NOVA SCOTIA, settling at Amherst, in the Yorkshire community. Less than a year after their arrival, the mother, who had a profound influence on William's religious life, and who had ensured that he had had some education in England, died. Her death brought not only sorrow but discord and hopelessness to the whole family—especially to William. The following years he spent trying to escape reality in pleasure, or to use his own word—"sin."

In 1779, he was converted at a prayer meeting held at Fort Lawrence. Immediately after his conversion Black successfully converted his brothers Richard, John, and Thomas, followed soon by his father and stepmother. Turning next to the community, he preached, prayed, exhorted, throughout his neighborhood. Although he knew little theology, he was a serious student of the Bible. He saturated his mind with WESLEY'S sermons and hymns, in the expectation of becoming a Methodist itinerant.

When Henry Alline, the great New-Light preacher, came to Cumberland County in 1781, there was a fervent response to his teaching. Although Black was swept along by the New-Light Movement, he could not comprehend or endure Alline's mythical theology, his criticism of John Wesley, or his undisciplined emotionalism. He resolved to resist Alline's influence and to strengthen the Methodist cause in Nova Scotia.

On Nov. 10, 1781, Black set out on his own as an itinerant preacher of Jesus Christ. In the wake of Alline's preaching, Black preached, formed classes, visited the people, and built up a favorable reputation. So great was the opportunity, and so numerous the calls for his service, that he wrote John Wesley asking for helpers. In reply, Wesley commended his work and urged him to look to the American societies for assistance.

In 1783, a substantial number of Loyalists landed at Shelburne, Nova Scotia, among whom were a number of Methodists from JOHN STREET CHURCH, New York. Immediately, William Black hastened to welcome them and help them initiate classes and services, but as the influx continued, it became imperative for him to receive assistance in his work. Hence he attended the famous CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE of 1784 at BALTIMORE and asked for helpers for Nova Scotia. He was fortunate in winning the attention and support of THOMAS COKE who, with FRANCIS ASBURY'S consent, sent two of his best young men—FREEBORN GARRETTSON and JAMES OLIVER CROMWELL. With these colleagues Black was able to travel more widely. In 1786 he moved his family to Halifax.

At the Conference in Philadelphia, May 19, 1789, William Black and his two devoted colleagues, John and James Mann, were ordained by Thomas Coke and Francis Asbury. At the same conference Black was appointed superintendent for Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Newfoundland, replacing James Wray, whose short term of office had been marked by unhappiness for him and discontent among the preachers. With Black's appointment another new era had come for Methodism in eastern British America.

In spite of the help given him, Black's energetic program required more itinerants. At the Conference in New York, in 1791, his appeal resulted in six additional preachers for Nova Scotia. That year he visited Newfoundland, initiating a great revival at Carbonear which spread around Conception Bay. More important in the long run was his reorganization of the work in Newfoundland, which had almost come to a standstill.

When William Black was attending the General Conference in Baltimore in October, 1792, he was asked by Coke to be the presiding elder of the St. Kitts district in the West Indies. Fortunately, he accepted this post for only one year because, on returning to Halifax in 1793, he was shocked at the way the societies had deteriorated. His absence had, however, proved the value and need of dynamic leadership in an immature and growing church.

In 1800 Black attended the Wesleyan Conference and was successful in obtaining help from that body. Upon his return he became in effect, chairman of the Nova Scotia district, an office he held with few intermissions until his retirement in 1812. During these years he became affectionately and appropriately known as "Bishop Black."

Beginning as a solitary and voluntary itinerant, he had over the years built up a noble band of Methodist preachers from America and England, with new converts already preparing to take their places. He had organized and extended the cause in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Newfoundland, Bermuda, and in the West Indies. In addition to his activity as superintendent and chairman, he read theology extensively and judiciously. He had the capacity to preach in a language understood by the listeners. Though his attitude toward the New-Light Movement was distant, he found close fellowship with the Church of England. On the other hand, his views about the relationship of church and state detrimentally affected Wesleyan Methodism in the Maritimes for some years. The work of the minister was on so high a plane, in his opinion, that it should not be entangled with affairs of state, especially with government.

William Black was a stout man of medium height, who dressed carefully in black clerical garb. His round, rosy face, thin white hair, his benevolent smile and sweet clear voice combined, reflected his integrity and kindness.

In 1812, at the age of fifty-two, William Black requested superannuation, but he continued to preach, to lead classes, and to function as a kind of senior statesman in Maritimes Methodism. He may have recognized that there was a need for a different type of direction and organization in the Nova Scotia district, if it were to meet the standards set by the missionary committee. Certainly, after his retirement a greater degree of order and regularity was achieved. It is a mark of William Black's greatness that he knew when to resign that others might build on the foundations he had laid.

He died on Sept. 7, 1834, at the age of seventy-four, a victim of the cholera epidemic that swept through Halifax. As one of his brethren said, "His ministry was neither declamatory nor rhetorical; but being convincing and persuasive, and generally attended with gracious influence from above, it was at once popular and useful." As a pastor and administrator, he was watchful and judicious in discipline, always avoiding the harsher way when necessary improvements could be effected by more gentle means.

BLACK HILLS COLLEGE at Hot Springs, S. D., was chartered in 1887, hardly eleven years after the catastrophic Custer Battle in Montana, three years before the last clash of U.S. arms and the Sioux at Wounded Knee on the nearby Pine Ridge Reservation. Though Black Hills College was active but a decade, 1890-1900, its memory is a marker for the obsession of Methodists with education.

Black Hills College never enrolled more than 100 students at any one time. With liberal arts courses strong in Greek and Latin, music and mathematics, backed by responsive residents drawn to the pioneer resort community of the Black Hills, the college made Hot Springs a cultural enclave in an area dominated by cattle ranching and mining. The faculty was young, dedicated, enthusiastic, and intensely loyal. But heroic efforts of President JOHN W. HANCHER, who later was to establish records for raising money for Methodist education, could not save the school, nor could those of his successor, Elmer E. Lyman. Its three-story building of native yellow sandstone closed its doors "temporarily" in 1900—but they never reopened as a college. The city used the building as a high school until it burned in 1924, as is recorded by a bronze plaque erected by the local Kiwanis Club. A stone gateway and memorial scholarships at DAKOTA WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, at Mitchell, S. D., recall Black Hills College's posthumous merger with it in 1947. Among the school's outstanding alumni were Brigadier General Lawrence H. Hedrick, U.S. Air Force Judge Advocate; John Hall, California pastor; and James G. Bradley, Idaho banker.

BLACK HILLS CONFERENCE. (See SOUTH DAKOTA and SOUTH DAKOTA CONFERENCE.)

BLACK HILLS MISSION. (See SOUTH DAKOTA.)

BLACK RIVER CONFERENCE was organized at Watertown, N. Y., Sept. 1, 1836 with Bishop BEVERLY WAUGH presiding. It was formed by dividing the ONEIDA CONFERENCE. Its territory was a part of northern NEW YORK. The conference began with four districts, 56 charges, 67 preachers, and 13,232 members.

In 1868 a part of the Black River Conference was merged with a part of the Oneida Conference to form the CENTRAL NEW YORK CONFERENCE. This reduced the membership of the Black River Conference from some 22,000 to 10,000.

In 1872 the Black River Conference was merged with most of the territory which had gone from it to the Central New York Conference four years before to form the NORTHERN NEW YORK CONFERENCE. Thus the Northern New York Conference is regarded as the successor of the Black River Conference.

At its last session in 1872 the Black River Conference reported four districts, 84 charges, 80 preachers, and 11,762 members.

BLACKBURN, ROBERT THOMAS (1872-1954), American minister, was born Jan. 13, 1872, in Parker Co., Texas. He entered the Southern Methodist ministry in 1895, and served several pastorates in Texas prior to 1897. After a brief leave because of ill health, he became pastor in Checotah, Okla. Later he became presiding elder in the Oklahoma Conference at Hugo and McAlester. In 1918 and 1919 he was in the INDIAN MISSION CONFERENCE, becoming superintendent of the Muskogee, Durant and Shawnee districts.

He was a graduate of Cranberry College and was noted as a Bible lecturer. He was granted an honorary D.D. degree by OKLAHOMA CITY UNIVERSITY. He was a trustee of SOUTHERN METHODIST UNIVERSITY for eighteen years and a delegate to the UNITING CONFERENCE in 1939, also a delegate to several jurisdictional and general conferences. Few men in Oklahoma Methodism influenced the lives of as many ministers and as many churches as did Blackburn. His life was characterized by an emphasis upon liberal and prophetic preaching, sound Biblical scholarship, and devoted personal commitment. He died in Durant, Okla., Nov. 4, 1954, and was buried there after a service participated in by a large representation of his conference brethren.

BLACKFOOT, IDAHO, U.S.A. The Jason Lee Memorial Church was named in memory of JASON LEE, "who preached the first Protestant sermon delivered west of the Rocky Mountains, at Fort Hall, July 27, 1834. His text—'Whether therefore ye eat or drink or whatsoever ye do, do all to the Glory of God.' (I. Cor. 10:31)." This is copied from the memorial stained glass window on the west side of the church.

The church was envisioned by THOMAS C. LILF, in charge of Methodist mission work in the Northwest territories, soon after the town's beginning in 1878. Major W. H. Danilson built the first church structure in 1885. The church is located on South University Street, where Mr. Liff also thought of a great university.

The town of Blackfoot came into being as a railroad center serving the mining camps of the "Lost River Country" of Central IDAHO. But as is true of all of Idaho, mining became secondary to agriculture and the railroad and population center developed at Pocatello.

The church now has about 400 members and the town has a population of 10,000. The church now finds its calling to witness for Christ to a community dominated by the Latter Day Saints (Utah Mormons).

BLACKMAN, LEARNER (1781-1815), American pioneer preacher—called by Bishop Simpson "one of the most eminent of them"—was born in NEW JERSEY about 1781. He entered the Methodist ministry in 1800, joining the PHILADELPHIA CONFERENCE when about nineteen years of age. When sent to his first church in DELAWARE the people thought they were to have a Negro as a preacher, because of the name "Black man." After spending two years in Delaware, he went further west and joined the WESTERN CONFERENCE, as the entire Methodist connection west of the Alleghenies, north and south, was then called.

In 1805 he was sent as a missionary to NATCHEZ, and in order to reach his field of labor, had to travel through a wilderness of nearly eight hundred miles, inhabited mostly by savages and beasts of prey. He was fourteen days and nights making this journey. His biographer states, "At night he would tie his horse to a tree, and taking his saddle-bags for a pillow and his blanket for a covering, and commending himself to God's gracious care, would lie down in the woods to seek the repose which nature demanded."

When he reached the place of his destination, he found that Methodism had scarcely gained a footing, though there were a few who had been converted by the labors of TOBIAS GIBSON, who was "struggling to stand the current of prevailing wickedness." This was in the lower Mississippi country, where Blackman with Gibson and a few others labored with great success. In 1806 a PRE-SIDING ELDERS' district was organized, and he was appointed its superintendent. He continued in that district during the year of 1807. New laborers arrived and the field extended. When Blackman first entered upon his work, there were but 74 white and 62 colored members; but after laboring for three years there were five circuits and a large increase in the membership. About 1808 he went back to TENNESSEE and was appointed successively to the Holston, Cumberland, and Nashville districts, and finally reappointed to the Cumberland district. He was elected to the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1808 and to that of 1816. However, before the Conference of 1816 could meet, while Learner Blackman was crossing the Ohio River on a flat boat, his horses plunged into the water, and in an effort to hold them he was dragged over and drowned. His biographer says, "By this fatal casualty the church was deprived of one of its most gifted, and in every way promising young ministers." He left a deep impression upon those places where he had labored.

BLACKSTOCK, JOHN (1831-1907), missionary to INDIA, was born in Ontario, Can., on Sept. 8, 1831. In early life he moved to the U.S.A. and was educated at DEPAUV UNIVERSITY and Theological School. He entered the ministry of the M. E. CHURCH and was ordained DEACON in 1873 and ELDER in 1875. He answered WILLIAM TAYLOR'S call for self-supporting ministers for congregations Taylor had started. Blackstock reached Bombay in December, 1875. Developing self-supporting English churches was difficult for the new ministers, but John Blackstock persevered in spite of the hardships. During his first term of service of ten years he served congregations as pastor in Bombay, Poona, Nagpur, Madras, and a second term at Poona before he went to America on furlough. While at Nagpur he married Lydia Duncan, who through the years was a helpful companion.

They were recalled in 1888 to take charge of the Lodhipur Orphanage in North India. It was a difficult place to fill, requiring patience and courageous faith; but the eighteen years of success tell how well the work was done. At the time of his death in 1907 at Naini Tal, the orphanage was never in a more flourishing condition. In addition to this work, John Blackstock was manager of the city high school in Shahjahanpur, chaplain of the non-conformist troops stationed there, and preacher-in-charge of one or more circuits beside that in which the orphanage was located. In all these places he took keen interest, and could not rest unless he saw progress and success resulting from his efforts.

His sermons were sound, clear, and spiritual. Perhaps his greatest joy was to see four daughters growing up to be Christian women, two of whom had already entered definitely into mission work.

BLACKSTOCK, WILLIAM E. (1878-1948), American minister, was born on a farm near Thornton, Ont., Can., Jan. 13, 1878, son of Wesley and Alice Blackstock, and was received on trial in the NORTHWEST IOWA CONFERENCE of the M. E. CHURCH in 1905. In 1912 he received the S.T.B. degree from GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE, which institution later honored him with the D.D. degree.

He was engaged in raising funds for the JOHN W. HANCHER organization throughout the middle-western United States from 1916-1918, when he became assistant to the treasurer of the Joint Centenary Committee where he served until 1920, when he was appointed pastor of Trinity Church, Topeka, Kan. Later he served churches in TEXAS and COLORADO, and in 1935 he was appointed superintendent of the UTAH Mission where he served until his death in 1948 at Salt Lake City, Utah. His body rests in Mt. Olivet Cemetery of that city.

William Blackstock was deeply devoted to the church, enthusiastic in his support of higher education in the intermountain West, serving as a trustee of Westminster College in Salt Lake City.

BLACKWELL, EBENEZER (?-1782), London businessman, was the intimate friend of JOHN WESLEY from 1739 until his death. He was born at Tewkesbury, Gloucestershire, and became a partner in Martin's Bank, Lombard Street, London. Wesley often stayed at his country residence at Lewisham, Kent, from which many of Wesley's sermons and other works are dated. He played an important part in the early history of London Methodism and often helped Wesley financially. He was one of the original trustees of CITY ROAD CHAPEL. Wesley treated him as a confidant in his personal affairs.

BLACKWELL, EDITH MARY (?-1956), was a Methodist laywoman of AUCKLAND, NEW ZEALAND. Her parents, Mr. and Mrs. George Winstone, Sr., were members of the historic Pitt Street Church, and she became a Bible class leader, choir member, and church official there. After her marriage to J. H. Blackwell, she resided in Kaiapoi, Canterbury, for some years.

Activated by a keen sense of Christian stewardship, she gave many generous gifts to the Methodist Church. With her brothers, she helped to found the Winstone Memorial Trust to insure that all ministers received the minimum stipend. The Edith Blackwell Trust was created in 1942 to support the work of home missions, and in 1951, the Edith Winstone Blackwell Foundation of £40,000 was established for educational and religious purposes. In addition she made gifts to many public charities. She was made a member of the Order of the British Empire in 1953.

BLACKWELL, ROBERT EMORY (1854-1938), American educator and prominent lay leader, was born Nov. 14, 1854, in Warrenton, Va. He was educated at RANDOLPH-MACON COLLEGE in Virginia, graduating in 1874. He took a degree in 1876 from the University of Leipzig in Germany. Four American colleges and universities bestowed LL.D. degrees upon him for his educational and religious work.

Blackwell's entire career in higher education was spent at his alma mater, Randolph-Macon College. He became a professor in 1876, and was chosen vice-president and acting president in 1900. He was formally named president of the college in 1902. Blackwell was co-author of a college French text and a teaching aid in French.

A familiar and popular figure on the campus of Randolph-Macon College, he was affectionately known as "Old Black" by the students. He was a dignified man who was said to "look every inch like a college president."

He gave distinguished service to the M. E. Church, South, participating in the work of the Joint Commission on Unification, the General Inter-racial Commission, and the Virginia Inter-racial Commission.

Blackwell was an able classicist, and this was reflected in his distinctively courteous manner.

Under his leadership, Randolph-Macon College attained general recognition for excellence in the caliber of its faculty and students.

Blackwell died in Ashland, Va., on July 17, 1938.

BLAINE, DAVID E. (1824-1900), American minister and western pioneer, was born at Vareck, Seneca Co., N. Y., March 5, 1824. He was converted at the age of nineteen and united with the M. E. CHURCH. He was educated at Hamilton College and Auburn Theological Seminary. He was married to Catharine V. Paine, Aug. 11, 1853, and was admitted to the GENESEE CONFERENCE the same month. Ordained DEACON under the Missionary Rule, he was transferred to the OREGON CONFERENCE and assigned to SEATTLE. He and Catharine Blaine began their ministry in Seattle in November, 1853. He organized First Church, the pioneer congregation in Seattle, Dec. 4, 1853, with four members, of which Catharine was one. The next month Catharine became the first school teacher in Seattle.

Subsequently Blaine served as pastor at PORTLAND, Oregon City and Corvallis in Oregon. He was principal of the Santiam Academy, Lebanon, Ore., and presiding elder of the Salem District. In 1866 he returned to NEW YORK and in 1871 became a member of the CENTRAL NEW YORK CONFERENCE. In 1883 he went back to Seattle and was transferred to the Puget Sound Conference in 1884. He died at Seattle, Nov. 26, 1900.

He was admitted on trial to the ministry of the M. E. CHURCH, NEW HAMPSHIRE CONFERENCE, in 1899, and served pastorates in Salem, Lebanon, and Manchester. In 1908 he became assistant secretary of the Board of Sunday Schools of the M. E. Church and in 1912 was elected corresponding secretary. He served in this capacity until he was elected bishop in 1920. He was assigned to the Paris area where he served for eight years and did a great evangelistic work in Europe. The succeeding years were spent at INDIANAPOLIS and DETROIT, and he retired in 1940. After his retirement he lived in Coral Gables, Fla. He died on May 26, 1943.

BLANCO, RAMON (1853-1901), Argentine minister and founder of social services in the Boca section of BUENOS AIRES, was born to a poor family in Finisterre, Galicia, Spain. He emigrated to the ARGENTINE Republic at the age of fifteen. Arriving during a time of financial crisis and political strife, he took work of any kind in order to make a living. He served for a time in the national army, earning the rank of sergeant, and then joined the Buenos Aires police as a street watchman. A fellow policeman who was a Methodist invited Blanco to hear JOHN F. THOMSON. He was converted and became a member of the church.

Moved by the condition of children who went through the streets without schooling, he began gathering as many as he could to teach them reading, writing, and Bible lessons after hours. For a time he held his school in a vegetable store in the market, seating children on bags of carrots and cabbages. An English gentleman heard about it and helped him rent a room for his after-hours classes. As the school grew, Blanco left his police work and leased a bigger house, where he had about two hundred pupils. This was the beginning of an arts-and-trades school. For his living he went to work with the AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY as a colporteur. Some friends and the Methodist BOARD OF MISSIONS helped him pay the rent at the new site.

Blanco joined the ministry of the Methodist Church in 1889, being ordained in 1893. He was sent to the church in Mendoza, where he started two schools for poor children, founded a Society for the Protection of Animals, and was able to put an end to a long railroad strike. There, too, a diphtheria epidemic took his three children from him within a few hours.

In 1897 he was appointed to the Boca Church in Buenos Aires. There he continued the same kind of work, starting small schools for destitute children and night schools for workers, many of whom were illiterate. At the same time he was pastor of the church and director of the mission school with almost 400 pupils.

On Jan. 6, 1901, while looking for materials needed for a celebration in one of his schools, he was fatally injured as his bicycle was struck by a horse cart. A large crowd accompanied his remains to the Buenos Aires Protestant Cemetery, and the whole Boca Section of the city mourned him.

BLAND, SALEM GOLDSWORTH (1859-1950), Canadian preacher, professor of church history, and journalist, sometimes described as the philosopher of the Social Gospel in Canada, was born in Lachute, Quebec, youngest of four sons of Henry Flesher Bland, a recently immigrated British Wesleyan lay preacher. Bland graduated from Morrill College, McGill University (1877), attended WESLEYAN THEOLOGICAL COLLEGE, MONTREAL, and was ordained in 1884. Until 1903 he served a number of circuits in the Ottawa and St. Lawrence valleys, soon gaining a reputation as a public speaker. After 1893, attendance at the newly founded and select Queen's Theological Alumni Conferences (Presbyterian) provided regular contact with distinguished academics, religious and public figures. Supported by unusually wide reading in modern biblical criticism, idealist philosophy, social Darwinism, and the literature of transcendentalists and social critics, he won a second education and his "third birth," as he put it. His liberal theology and ethical socialism aroused the bitter opposition that attended his election to General Conference in 1898, but his ability was further recognized in 1903 by a doctorate of divinity from Queen's and appointment as professor of church history at WESLEYAN COLLEGE, WINNIPEG, MANITOBA.

The West, then undergoing rapid expansion, gave Bland a ready outlet for his newly adopted progressivism. In addition to prominence in the older causes of Prohibition and political morality, he was frequently to be found on the executives of organizations promoting free trade, the single tax, public ownership, woman suffrage, direct legislation, and civic reform. Many students found him their most exciting professor and adopted his interests.

Under strong demand as a preacher, he was also prominently figured at grain-growers' conventions; and after 1913, he urged them to form the nucleus of a third party. These activities elicited the hostility of wealthy and conservative Methodists, which may have influenced his dismissal during a college financial crisis in 1917, creating a cause célèbre among Western progressives. Without station for two years, Bland moved closer to the agrarian and labor movements, contributing a regular column to the Grain Growers' Guide, campaigning for national non-partisan government, speaking on the Chautauqua circuit, and promoting farmer-labor political action. Church union and the opening of the ministry to women were but part of the general liberalizing of Methodist theological and social attitudes he sought. The 1918 resolution on "Church Leadership in the Nation" (then called the "Bland resolution") was widely recognized as the most radical statement of church social aims accepted by the governing body of any major denomination.

When he left the West in early 1919, to become minister of Broadway Methodist Tabernacle and TORONTO Methodism's most controversial preacher, his continued advocacy of Labor's cause and attacks upon fundamentalism brought bitter opposition from members of his new charge. Although he won general congregational support after a protracted struggle, the stationing committee could find no new station for him in 1923. However, for three years after church union (1925) he served Western United Church in Toronto. Superannuation in 1928 found him embarking on a twenty-year journalistic career with the progressive Toronto Daily Star, Canada's largest newspaper.

In the 1930's, still influential in the upper courts of the church, he became something of a grand old man of social reform in Canada—an outspoken defender of civil liberties, a leading spokesman of the new Socialist party, the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation, and an initiator of the Fellowship for a Christian Social Order. As war clouds gathered, he espoused several popular front movements, a children's home in Barcelona being named after him in recognition of his efforts for the League for Defence of Spanish Democracy. During the war years and thereafter, Bland was a person of little active influence. He died in Toronto, Feb. 6, 1950.

The record of Bland's thought lies in a large collection of sermons (United Church Archives), his many newspaper articles, and in two books, The New Christianity (1920) and James Henderson, D.D. (1926). His writing does not reveal any new contribution to Methodist or Social Gospel conceptions in general, but rather a catholic mind and an exceptionally able apologist and controversialist. Severely crippled and possessed of an engaging manner and voice, he was an arresting figure, whose impact was probably greater on the platform and in the pulpit than in the press. A prominent, well-traveled Canadian scholar, C. B. Sissons, ranked him with the best preachers of the time. Bland appears as the stern, prophetic preacher and not as the gentle person known to his friends, in the striking Lawren Harris portrait hanging in the Toronto Art Gallery. Bland's long career is prominent among the evidence for the observation by the eminent Canadian historian, A. R. M. Lower, that Methodism fathered much of the movement for social justice in twentieth-century Canada.

BLANTON, JEPHTHA WALLIS, SR. (1866-1962), American lay leader and philanthropist, was born in Bell Buckle, Tenn., April 26, 1866, son of Mr. and Mrs. Elisha Blanton. The family moved to TEXAS soon after the Civil War closed. Apparently his education ended at about the elementary level. He became a leader in the church at Gainesville, Texas, and was a delegate to the M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH annual conference of 1910; at that session he was named on the state-wide commission that established SOUTHERN METHODIST UNIVERSITY and located it in DALLAS. Moving to Dallas in 1914, he continued active in local, annual, and state-wide activities of the church. He was a loyal and generous contributor to the university he helped to establish, especially in the early days of struggle, and eventually probably gave close to $100,000. A second major Methodist concern to which he gave many years of volunteer service was the C. C. Young home for older women which expanded later into Blanton Gardens, home for both men and women. He guided it through the desperate years of the depression in the early thirties and accumulated slowly endowment and properties which now are valued at about $3,000,000. He died in Dallas on Jan. 10, 1962.

BLASDEL, HENRY GOODE (1825-1900), American layman, was a quiet, deeply religious man who was a strange contrast to the raucous, turbulent state of NEVADA, whose first governor he was from 1865 to 1870.

Henry Blasdel left an INDIANA farm for CHICAGO and the CALIFORNIA gold fields, and then went to the Comstock Mines. In business he was modestly successful.

The first property of record in Nevada for Christian worship was in Virginia City, purchased by Blasdel and seven others "for a house of worship for the M. E. CHURCH." When statehood was proclaimed in 1864, an election was held. Blasdel, nominated by the Republicans for governor, had a clear majority. He was reelected two years later. The first legislature passed a statute permitting gambling, which Blasdel vetoed.

In the capital, Carson City, he and his wife were active in the Methodist Church, as they had been in Virginia City. He insisted that the Methodist pastor live with him in the Executive Mansion. He was strictly temperate and honest in a bibulous and morally careless society. He had a watch inscribed: "Presented by a few friends who can appreciate true Christian integrity."

He was a member of the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1872. In 1845 he was married to a childhood friend, Sarah Jane Cox.

LOUIS BLAYLOCK

BLAYLOCK, LOUIS (1849-1932), American publisher and churchman, was born in Sevier County, Ark., on Oct. 21, 1849, but moved to TEXAS with his family the next year. He started to work as a printer in the office of the Texas Christian Advocate in 1866 when seventeen years old. Eventually he became a partner in the publishing firm printing the Advocate, and by 1874 was sole owner of the company. From this time until 1924 he poured his life—and money—into keeping the Advocate going into the Methodist homes of Texas. Against great initial odds, he helped increase the circulation, the amount of advertising, and paid the editor's salary. By 1887 the circulation reached 18,000; in this year the offices were moved from GALVESTON to DALLAS.

During these years he proved himself to be a devoted churchman; at First Church, Dallas, he was prominent in many areas of the church's life including the chairmanship of the Board of Trustees and of the Board of Stewards. He was a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE (MES) in 1906, 1910, 1918. He was twice elected mayor of the city of Dallas, and also served the city as Police, Fire, and Finance Commissioner. His length of service as a church publisher is perhaps unique in Methodist circles. On the occasion of his death (Dec. 8, 1932) he was, his church colleagues declared, "for a generation one of the most distinguished citizens of Dallas and Texas."

BLEBY, HENRY (1809-1882), distinguished British missionary to the WEST INDIES, was born at Winchcombe, England, on March 16, 1809, and entered the ministry in 1830. He served in the West Indies from 1832-48 and 1856-82, forty-three years longer than any other minister in the field during the century. Arriving at Falmouth, JAMAICA, just before emancipation, he was attacked, tarred and feathered, and just escaped death. Throughout his ministry he was the champion of full rights for Negroes. Much of his ministry was in Jamaica, but he served widely throughout the West Indies, notably in Antigua, Barbados, Demerara, and the BAHAMAS, where he was chairman. A wise leader and brilliant administrator, he knew the whole area intimately and wrote prolifically about it. His Death Struggles of Slavery (1853) is of great importance. He founded a great missionary family and one of his sons, John L. Bleby, served for many years in the West Indies. Henry Bleby died at Bristol on May 2, 1882.

BLEDSOE, ALBERT TAYLOR (1809-1877), a strong-minded philosopher, editor and protagonist of the Confederate States of America during the third quarter of the nineteenth century. He was born on Nov. 9, 1809, the son of Moses Onsley and Sophia (Childress) Bledsoe. He became editor of a Kentucky paper, the Commonwealth, in 1830. Then he was a cadet in West Point with Robert E. Lee and Jefferson Davis, whose friendship and patronage later stood him in good stead. He married Harriet Coxé of Burlington, N. J., in 1838. His first serious writing was in 1845, when he made a careful examination of Jonathan Edwards' Inquiry into the Freedom of the Will. He began to manifest at this time his great theme which was insistence upon the absence of compulsion upon the human will if there were to be any freedom at all in its functioning.

In 1848-54 he was at the University of Virginia where he taught mathematics, and then at the University of Mississippi where he also taught mathematics. Later he moved again to take the same chair at the University of Virginia, serving there from 1854-61.

An intense southerner, he always defended slavery, both before and after the Civil War. In 1861, he entered the Confederate Army with the rank of Colonel, but Jefferson Davis said that his brains would be of more service to the Confederacy than his arm, and made him assistant Secretary of War. He was sent to London in an endeavor to enlist British support for the southern Confederacy, but failing in that, returned in 1865 to his native land. An intense protagonist of southern rights, he published Is Datis a Traitor and always proudly remembered that General Lee once said to him that all depended on him to maintain the principles of the southern cause.

Although a Baptist, Bledsoe founded in 1867 the Southern Review, and by the strong championship of this publication in upholding the freedom of the will, and by reason of the failure of the Quarterly Review of the impoverished M. E. Church, South, the General Conference of that body in 1870 adopted Bledsoe's Southern Review as its official organ.

Subsequently, the separate quarterly issues of The Southern Review were found to contain articles and material of the highest interest, and Bledsoe's own striking writings were not least of the journal's attractions. Extant sets of the Southern Review—47 or 48 volumes in all—are held today in a few libraries among their rare and precious possessions.

The great and striking work of Bledsoe was his A Theodicy or Vindication of the Divine Glory as Manifested in the Constitution and Government of the Moral World, published in New York by Carlton and Phillips in 1854. This book, somewhat before the time of Whedon and Pope, was considered by American Methodists to be the answer to predestination, and in its cogent reasoning and in its systematic analysis of the freedom of the will gave to Methodism in its time a much needed antidote to the logic of the Presbyterians. Bledsoe's thesis was that morality cannot be compelled; that Almighty God, sovereign as He is, cannot compel a human will without destroying that which He is after—namely, personal goodness and holiness which cannot be the product of any compulsion.

It was Bledsoe's stand in this ethical battle which then gained him the support of Methodists, and in time the patronage of the M. E. Church, South, for his magazine. Upon the death of Bledsoe in 1877, the Southern Church shortly resumed again its publication of its own journal, The Methodist Quarterly Review.

Bledsoe was a typical child of genius, not being able and perhaps not greatly caring to support himself, but depending upon his daughter who taught school for their mutual support. His daughter said of him, "When a piece of work was completed in his mind it was done; and he lost all interest in it. He would then let it lie indefinitely, unfinished; and could press eagerly on to the next thing which was to be a bonanza." He belonged in many respects to the regime which was "gone with the wind" at the close of the Civil War. His last days were spent in Charlottesville, Va.

BLINN, VERA B. (1890-1920), American U.B. leader in women's work, was born into a parsonage home Feb. 12, 1890, at Penalosa, Kan. A brilliant child, she graduated early from high school and college, took graduate work at the University of Chicago and for several years taught in YORK COLLEGE.

In 1912 she was called to be the national secretary of young women's work of the UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST. She reorganized the department under the name Otterbein Guild, and for many years this organization had great enthusiasm and influence.

In 1917 she became editor of the Woman's Evangel (later The World Evangel), and then the General Secretary of the Women's Missionary Association.

She was a dynamic speaker—one of the bishops said of her messages, "she impressed the Church as few men and women have done in the last century"; she was deeply understanding in her discernment of the total task of the church.

It has been said of her that she carried the whole world on her heart and joyously laid down her life at the age of thirty to help meet its need. She died in Dayton, Ohio, Sept. 28, 1920, and was laid to rest in the Pleasant Valley Churchyard near Wichita, Kan.

The Women's Missionary Association, on their fiftieth anniversary, established the Vera Blinn Chair of Missions at Bonebrake (now UNITED) THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY in her honor.

BLOOMINGTON, ILLINOIS, U.S.A. Wesley Church. Two pioneer "god-fearing" families from Ohio, the John Hendrix and J. W. Dawson, became in 1822 the first white settlers in what is now McLean County, Ill. Friendly Indians helped them build their log cabins at what was called "Blooming Grove," just south of the present city. To the Hendrix cabin came JESSE WALKER, Methodist minister from ST. LOUIS, on one wintry day. He had heard of a white family among the Indians there, and had come to find them. A PRAYER MEETING was held, and Walker made Hendrix a CLASS LEADER in anticipation of other families settling here. "Thus was born the First Methodist Church," as we read in the 1936 Centennial booklet.

James Stringfield arrived in 1824 and formed a class of seven members, and preaching services were held in the Hendrix home until 1831. McLean County had been formed, and its small frame courthouse was rented for church services for four years. Zadoc Hall, in charge of the Bloomington Circuit (24 preaching points), in 1835 built with help the "first church building between Chicago and Springfield," costing $1,000, being 32 by 44 feet, as the booklet states. It was located at the southwest corner of Olive and Main Streets, and was dedicated in August, 1836. This was the church home until 1851, when it became too small to hold the congregation which had greatly increased because of revivals and immigration. The building was sold, taken down, shipped and rebuilt at Rutland, for the Methodists there.

The names of early members and attendants live on in the street names in Bloomington: James Allin, who built the first house here; Judge John E. McClun, who was superintendent of the Sunday school three terms totaling 25 years; Jesse Fell; James Miller.

A new two-story church was built in 1851 at the southwest corner of East and Washington Streets at a cost of $8,000. This was used until 1874. During this period Normal (1865) and Grace (1867) churches were formed from its membership, and yet the church grew until a new building and location were needed.

An imposing structure with a tall steeple was then erected on the southwest corner of Grove and East Streets, costing $60,000, and was dedicated in October, 1875. The list of members in its cornerstone showed 703 full members and 209 probationers. The church entertained the Annual Conference sessions often, including the 1924 Centennial session.

Grace Church was organized in 1867 with about one hundred members, and was first known as "University Charge." W. H. Webster was the first pastor. Services were held for five years in "Old North" on the ILLINOIS WESLEYAN campus, and then in Amie Chapel of "Old Main." The property of the Third Presbyterian Church on Locust near Main was purchased in 1877, and used for ten years. The name "Grace" was adopted for this church in 1880. A new church was built and dedicated in 1889, with a pipe organ installed later. About 1929 a cathedral-like building nearer the campus was planned, but this did not materialize since plans were under way to merge First and Grace congregations. This was done in 1944 with Edgar E. Atherton as pastor, and "Wesley" became the new name. Loyal M. Thompson had been pastor at First Church since 1937, and Frank Marston at Grace since 1936.

Services were first held in both churches, then later only in Grace Church building until the new Wesley was built, and consecrated in 1952. It is located at Washington, McLean and Front Streets. The new addition and chapel were erected in 1958, the chapel named in honor of E. E. Atherton, who served as pastor for fourteen years, 1944-57. Charles M. Smith became pastor in 1958. The new Wesley Church has become the Conference center with many annual sessions and other events held there. Its architecture is modern, and a far cry from the first church building back in 1836. In 1970 the property was valued at $2,000,000, and a membership of 2,185 was reported.

BLUE LAKE CAMP in Covington County, Ala., U.S.A., is an assembly ground owned by the ALABAMA-WEST FLORIDA CONFERENCE of the United Methodist Church. It is located eighteen miles south of Andalusia, and is in the heart of the Conecuh National Forest. The Alabama-West Florida Conference purchased 304 acres on the east, south and west shores of Blue Lake.

Construction of the facilities under Conference sponsorship began in 1951, and growth and development has continued to date. The Conference has an investment of three quarters of a million dollars in the property and this will probably be increased to a million dollars upon the completion of a present building program. There are three complete units of camping facilities: Pinewood Camp, Dogwood Camp and Oakwood Lodge, which is the most recent development and is under the auspices of the Conference Woman's Society of Christian Service.

In 1965 Blue Lake Camp served more than twelve thousand Methodists within the bounds of the Alabama-West Florida Conference with an operating budget of more than $75,000. Blue Lake Camp provides facilities for all conference and district agencies of the Alabama-West Florida Conference and for many local church activities, such as camps, retreats, and assemblies.

BLUE RIDGE-ATLANTIC CONFERENCE was a descendant of the NORTH CAROLINA and HOLSTON CONFERENCES which the M. E. Church organized in 1869 and 1865, respectively. In 1879 the North Carolina part of the Asheville District of the Holston Conference and the white work in the North Carolina Conference were merged to form the Southern Central Conference (called Blue Ridge Conference beginning in 1881). The Southern Central Conference was organized at Greensboro, N. C. during the session of the North Carolina Conference, Jan. 30 to Feb. 3, 1879, with Bishop JESSE T. PECK presiding. The Blue Ridge Conference was organized at Leicester, N. C., Jan. 20, 1881 with Bishop HENRY W. WARREN presiding. The Blue Ridge Conference began with four districts, Asheville, Blue Ridge, Greensboro, and Eastern; 28 charges, and 4,575 members.

In 1896 the Blue Ridge Conference was divided to form the Atlantic Mission Conference, the latter being organized during the session of the former in Asheville on Sept. 27, 1896, Bishop WILLARD F. MALLALIEU presiding. In 1897 the Atlantic Mission Conference reported 12 charges and 957 members. Failing to grow into a full conference, the Mission Conference was merged with the Blue Ridge Conference in 1912 to form the Blue Ridge-Atlantic Conference. The organizing session of the Blue Ridge-Atlantic Conference was held at Marshallberg, N. C., Nov. 20, 1912, with Bishop THEODORE S. HENDERSON presiding.

At its last session in 1911, the Atlantic Mission Conference had 12 charges and 1,706 members. As it began in 1912, the Blue Ridge-Atlantic Conference had four districts, 51 charges, and 10,467 members.

After reentering North Carolina following the Civil War, the M. E. Church started some twelve institutions of learning (see North Carolina Conference for Negro schools). Nearly all of the schools were in the western part of the state. Apparently most of the institutions were short-lived, and little is known about them. Only one school for white youths, PFEIFFER COLLEGE at Misenheimer, has survived. What is now Pfeiffer College began as a primary school near Lenoir in 1885 with support from the WOMAN'S HOME MISSIONARY SOCIETY of the M. E. Church. It was moved to Misenheimer in 1909, achieved recognition as Mitchell Junior College in 1932, was renamed Pfeiffer College in 1935, received large donations from HENRY PFEIFFER and his wife, became a four-year college with full accreditation in 1953, and achieved affiliation with and support from the WESTERN NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE in 1961. Today Pfeiffer College has a plant valued at nearly $8,000,000, an endowment of $2,000,000, and an enrollment of more than 1,100.

The Blue Ridge-Atlantic Conference had a net growth of 3,969 members between the time of its organization in 1912 and unification in 1939. Throughout the period the work of the Northern Church in North Carolina was overshadowed by that of the stronger Southern conferences. Between 1912 and 1939 the North Carolina Conference (ME) and the Blue Ridge-Atlantic Conference together had an increase of about 6,000 members, while in the same period the two North Carolina conferences of the M. E. Church, South had a net growth of some 114,000 members.

In 1939 the Blue Ridge-Atlantic Conference reported two districts, Asheville and Statesville, about 50 ministers, 57 charges, 14,436 members, and property valued at $544,562. Thirty-one of the ministers were appointed to charges in the Western North Carolina Conference of The Methodist Church and eight to charges in the North Carolina Conference.

ALBEA GODBOLD

BOADEN, EDWARD (1827-1913), outstanding British minister of the UNITED METHODIST FREE CHURCHES, was born at Cury, Helston, Cornwall, on May 1, 1827. Trained as a lawyer, he entered the ministry of the WESLEYAN METHODIST ASSOCIATION in 1849, and his gifts were recognized by his appointment as chapel secretary in 1864, which office he held until 1902. He produced the first draft upon which the Act of Union of 1907 was framed, and he guided the fashioning of the Model Deed of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH. He had a hand in almost every important development of the United Methodist Free Churches—in the establishment of the Theological Institution (Victoria Park College), of Ashville College in Harrogate, and the Silver Wedding, or Thanksgiving Fund of 1882. He was also a powerful evangelical preacher and a composer of hymns. He was president of the U.M.F.C. Assembly in 1871, and the first president of the United Methodist Church in 1907. He died at Leamington Spa on June 2, 1913.

RICHARD BOARDMAN

BOARDMAN, RICHARD (1738-1782), early itinerant preacher in England, and one of the first two volunteers commissioned by JOHN WESLEY at the 1769 Leeds Conference to travel to America. This commissioning, following the appeal from the first American Methodists, has been described as the conscious undertaking of world responsibility by Methodism. With his companion, JOSEPH PILMORE, he landed at GLOUCESTER POINT, N. J., Oct. 20, 1769. NEW YORK became the center for his preaching and pastoral work, and he was an important member of the first American Conference of 1773.

In 1774 he returned to the British Isles because of the political changes, and his subsequent ministry, except for one year, was in IRELAND. He died in Cork and was buried there in the graveyard of St. Fin Barre's Cathedral. American Methodism in 1969 celebrated at Gloucester Point, N. J. the bicentennial of Boardman's and Pilmore's arrival.

BOAZ, HIRAM ABIFF (1866-1962), American bishop, was born at Murray, Ky., on Dec. 18, 1866. He was educated at SOUTHWESTERN and Kentucky universities and held an honorary degree from SOUTHERN METHODIST UNIVERSITY. He joined the NORTHWEST TEXAS CONFERENCE on trial in 1889 and served several circuits and churches in Georgetown, Fort Worth, Abilene, and Dublin, all in TEXAS.

In 1902 he became president of Polytechnic College in Fort Worth; in 1911 he was vice-president of Southern Methodist University in DALLAS, and in 1913 returned to the Fort Worth school, renamed Texas Woman's College. In 1918 he became secretary of the Board of Church Extension of the M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH, and in 1920 was made President of Southern Methodist University.

A leader in the church, he was a member of various GENERAL CONFERENCES and was elected bishop in 1922. His episcopal assignments were in JAPAN, KOREA, LIBERIA, and CHINA; and in the United States he served the conferences in ARKANSAS, OKLAHOMA and Texas.

He retired in 1938 but remained active in various social and religious capacities, publishing three books, one of them being a history of the Boaz family. He died in Dallas, Texas on Jan. 2, 1962.

BOCOBO, JORGE C. (1886-1965), Filipino layman, jurist, and public servant, was born in Gerona, Tarlac, on Oct. 19, 1886. He finished his law course at Indiana University and was three times awarded the LL.D. degree honoris causa. He was married to Felisa Z. de Castro and they had seven children: Elvira, Florante, Celia, Ariel, Dalisay, Israel, and Malaya. He started his public career as law clerk in the Executive Bureau in 1907. When the University of the Philippines College of Law was founded in 1911, he was appointed lecturer to teach civil law. Among his first students three became President of the PHILIPPINES—Manuel A. Roxas, Jose P. Laurel, and Elpidio Quirino. In 1917 he became Dean of the College. From 1927 to 1928 he was acting President of the University and was permanent President from 1934 to 1939. He was Chairman ex-officio of the U.P. Board of Regents when he was elevated to the position of Secretary of Public Instruction in 1939. In 1942 he was appointed Associate Justice of the Supreme Court. In 1947 he was designated Chairman of the Code Commission which drafted the Civil Code of the Philippines. It was primarily through his efforts that provisions giving more rights to married women, implanting the principle of equity in Philippine jurisprudence, promoting the solidarity of the Filipino family, elevating Filipino customs to the category of law, and exalting the human personality were incorporated in the code.

He was a distinguished member of the International Commission created to draft a common penal code for all Spanish- and Portuguese-speaking peoples. Bocobo had a complete mastery of the English and Spanish languages, wrote the first Filipino novel in English, became an honorary member of the Academia de la Lengua Espanola, and translated from Spanish to English Rizal's novels and letters.

He was an outstanding Methodist layman, who won a place in the social and educational life of the country. Aside from being an active member of Central Church, where he taught a Sunday school class and served on the board for many years, he was also a member of the Hospital Board for several terms. He was the delegate from the Philippines to the Jerusalem Conference in 1928. From 1929 until the outbreak of World War II, he served as president of the cooperating evangelical churches, whose organizational name changed from The Evangelical Union to the National Christian Council and finally to the Philippine Federation of Christian Churches.

Bocobo left a deep impress on his church and country.

BODIE, CALIFORNIA, U.S.A., is a lonely collection of 168 abandoned buildings in mideastern California and is considered so picturesquely typical of ghost towns it has been made a state historical park. It is named for Waterman S. Bodie, one of the prospectors who came in following discovery of gold in 1852. He died of exposure in 1859, having found gold on the site where later the settlement would bear his misspelled name. Bodie reached its peak in the 1870's with a population of 10,000 and an output of high-grade ore valued at $100 million. By 1900 it had declined to 2,000 and had been abandoned in 1932 when a fire broke out and destroyed most of the buildings.

The town had had two churches, Roman Catholic and Methodist, neither strong, for Bodie was a mining camp not given to churchly ways. The Methodist building was erected in 1879, and the weatherbeaten frame structure was the first restoration project which began in 1964. Vandals had wrecked its interior, even purloining the "Thou Shalt Not Steal" sign from the altar. By making Bodie a state historical park, these earlier days—California Methodism among them—have been brought into focus for present-day people.

HENRY BOEHM

BOEHM, HENRY (1775-1875), American itinerant preacher, was born in Lancaster County, Pa., June 8, 1775, the son of MARTIN BOEHM, who was expelled from the Mennonites for his "too evangelical opinions" and became a bishop of the UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST. The family home at Conestoga sheltered many of the itinerant preachers of the pioneer period of Methodism. Henry Boehm's boyhood was passed under frontier conditions and amid these religious influences. He was a self-trained man of twenty-five when he became an itinerant preacher of the M. E. CHURCH, traveling circuits in MARYLAND, VIRGINIA, and the regions beyond. Later he served in PENNSYLVANIA, introducing Methodism into Harrisburg and Reading.

Boehm was able to preach in both English and German. Before 1810 he had preached in German in fourteen different states. At FRANCIS ASBURY'S request he superintended the translation of the 1805 Methodist Discipline into the German language, printed in 1808 at Lancaster, Pa. As traveling companion of Bishop Asbury for five years he visited annually not only all the states along the Atlantic coast, but all the frontier settlements and many of the isolated homes. After he ceased to travel with Bishop Asbury he was appointed to various important districts of the rapidly growing denomination needing skilled leadership, and then to pulpits of commanding influence in Pennsylvania and NEW JERSEY until old age compelled him to ask release from regular ministerial duties. After his one hundredth birthday he preached several times, and only a few days before his death on Dec. 28, 1875, he gave a formal address.

BOEHM, JACOB, was one of the eight children of MARTIN BOEHM, and the brother of HENRY BOEHM. There is little known of him, and the usual historical sources of early American Methodism record neither the dates of his birth nor of his death. He may have been the eldest son of Martin Boehm, since he was named after his grandfather and later was given charge of the family farm so that Martin could travel more widely as a preacher. Henry Boehm says that Jacob gave the ground for BOEHM'S CHAPEL but the original deed reads, "From Martin Boehm to a Society of Christians calling themselves Methodists." FRANCIS ASBURY speaks well of Jacob Boehm in his Journal, stating in 1799 that Jacob had "followed us nearly the space of twenty years," mentioning also that "God hath begun to bless the children of his family." Henry Boehm spoke highly of a John Boehm, who he said was his nephew. The boy was probably a son of Jacob. In 1812 and again in 1813 Asbury records in his Journal that he not only visited Jacob but preached at his house.

FREDERICK E. MASER

BOEHM, MARTIN (1725-1812), American U.B. bishop, was born Nov. 30, 1725 in Lancaster Co., Pa., to Mennonite parents who had come from Germany. He married Eve Steiner in 1753 and they became parents of eight children. Youngest of these was Henry who attained much prominence as a Methodist preacher and traveling companion of Bishop FRANCIS ASBURY.

In 1756, Martin Boehm was chosen by lot to be one of the preachers of the German-speaking Mennonite Society to which he belonged. Since formalism characterized the Mennonite Church, his preaching task proved difficult. Although he attempted to preach as required, he felt unqualified to teach others the way of salvation. His own salvation seemed questionable to him. One day, probably in 1758, while plowing, he became so wrought with his lost state that he cried out to God for help. A stream of joy poured over him as he received God's assurance. From then on he became a truly evangelical speaker. The next year he was advanced to full pastoral standing among the Mennonites with the designation of bishop.

Martin Boehm became attracted to the Methodist preaching of GEORGE WHITEFIELD because it was along the line of his own spiritual awakening. He began to share in "great" meetings with other evangelical ministers. At one of these, probably on Pentecost Day, 1767, on the farm of ISAAC LONG, Boehm's preaching so warmed the heart of PHILIP WILLIAM OTTERBEIN, a clergyman of the Dutch Reformed Church of York, Pa., that he hurried forward at the close of the sermon to embrace the preacher and exclaim, "Wir sind brüder (We are brethren)." From this occasion spiritual roots were being formed that ultimately were to bring these two men together as co-founders of the Church of the UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST.

A formal break between Martin Boehm and the Mennonites took place around 1777 when Boehm was censured for his doctrine, manner of preaching, and associating with men of other denominations. Turning his farm over to his son JACOB, Martin Boehm gave himself entirely to traveling and preaching. He associated with Otterbein, in giving guidance to their co-laborers among the German-speaking people of MARYLAND and PENNSYLVANIA. In 1789 a conference of their followers was held in Otterbein's parsonage in BALTIMORE, Md., to plan for the means of carrying on their work. Subsequent meetings were held until in 1800 a formal organization of the Church of the United Brethren in Christ was effected, with Otterbein and Boehm being chosen by their associates to serve as superintendents or bishops. They were recognized in this relationship until their death; though neither, on account of advanced age, could give effective leadership after 1805.

Methodists formed a class at Martin Boehm's home about 1775, and his wife was one of the first to join. In 1791, a chapel was built on land which had belonged to the Boehms. In 1802 Martin Boehm joined the M. E. Church at BOEHM'S CHAPEL, although this did not interfere with his relationship to the United Brethren. The fellowship between English-speaking Methodists and German-speaking United Brethren was very cordial and they frequently shared in one another's services.

After fifty-five years of preaching, Martin Boehm died at his home March 23, 1812. A few days following the burial in the cemetery at Boehm's Chapel his son Henry and Bishop Francis Asbury arrived at the home. A fitting sermon was preached the following Sunday by Asbury in tribute of his deceased friend who was "greatly beloved in life, and deeply lamented in death."

BOEHM'S CHAPEL, Lancaster County, Pa., U.S.A. Built in 1791 on property given by "MARTIN BOEHM to a Society of Christians calling themselves Methodists" and according to a plan furnished by RICHARD WHATCOAT, it was the first Methodist church in Lancaster County, Pa. Martin Boehm later was one of the founders of the UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST, being elected one of their bishops in 1800. In his old age, however, he also joined the M. E. CHURCH. His son, HENRY BOEHM, who became a Methodist minister and a traveling companion of FRANCIS ASBURY, is often mistakenly mentioned as the founder of Boehm's Methodist Church; but an older son, JACOB BOEHM, was far more influential in its erection and organization, Henry being only sixteen years old when the church was built. Henry refers to the church in his Reminiscences, recalling that various Boehm families aided in its establishment, and adding that his brother, Jacob, gave the ground, a statement contradicted by the original deed.

A pamphlet issued by the Willow Street Church, under whose care the building has been placed, describes it as "forty feet long and thirty-two feet wide . . . It had a gallery on each side and at the entrance end. The pulpit was directly opposite the door and sufficiently high to enable the preacher to see all the movements of the hearers who occupied the gallery." The building was modernized in 1883, the old pulpit and galleries being removed and the windows enlarged. Henry Boehm in his autobiography speaks of the many bishops and great men of Methodism who preached at Boehm's Chapel in the early days of Methodism, and also adds that his parents are buried in its little churchyard. Unfortunately the present church records date back only to the year 1897.

BOHEMIA MANOR, Cecil County, Maryland, U.S.A. Here at the home of Solomon Hersey in 1771 or January 1772, RICHARD WRIGHT organized the first Wesleyan Methodist Society on the Delmarva Peninsula. It included individuals awakened by GEORGE WHITEFIELD in 1739. The manor, granted in 1660 to Augustine Hergen by Lord Baltimore, soon had a second Society at Thompson's schoolhouse. This group in 1780 built Bethel Church at Back Creek, where in 1799 it is claimed Dr. Chandler gave the first altar call in the world. Prominent among early Manor Methodists were the Bassetts and Bayards.

PETER BOHLER

BÖHLER, PETER (1712-1775), probably the most influential of the Moravians in the conversion of the WESLEYS, was born at Frankfurt am Main on Dec. 31, 1712. He was brought up a Lutheran, but was attracted by Pietism and was persuaded by Count ZINZENDORF and SPANGENBERG in 1737 to become a Moravian. He was largely instrumental in the formation of the FETTER LANE SOCIETY on May 1, 1738, and was highly regarded by the Wesley brothers during the many years in which Moravians and Methodists were at variance. CHARLES WESLEY called him "a better physician" than his own medical attendant. The hymn, "O for a thousand tongues to sing," is said to have been inspired by some words of his. He died in London on April 27, 1775.

BOISE, IDAHO, U.S.A. First Methodist Cathedral of the Rockies is a strong, well-known church. The Gothic structure of sixty-four rooms is constructed of Arizona rosestone and Indian limestone. It is surrounded by landscaped gardens and patios covering a downtown city block. The 153-foot tower houses the Schulmerich carillon on which recitals of well-loved hymns and melodies are often played. Stained glass windows add beauty to the dignity of the sanctuary and Cana Chapel. The Holy Scriptures Window at the sanctuary altar is of vivid color by day but is gold, because of an overlay, when spotlighted at night. The edifice was completed in 1961 at an approximate cost of $2,400,000 and is debt free.

The staff of First Methodist carries on an extensive program of worship services; an educational system for all ages including an active Golden Years organization and week-day kindergartens—one for four-year-olds and a second for five-year-old children. About 650 children and adults participate in the graduated choir system in which twelve choirs function. Several weekly radio and television programs are presented by staff members.

BOLIVIA, an inland republic of west central South America, was named in honor of Simon Bolivar, liberator of Spanish colonies in South America. About one-third of the area consists of high mountains which are home to three-quarters of the population, the other two-thirds of the area being tropical lowlands of the Amazon basin. The population is about 3,596,000, and of these between fifty and sixty percent are indigenous Indian tribes. The actual seat of government is at LA PAZ, whose elevation of 12,-300 feet makes it the world's highest capital.

In the pre-Spanish epoch, Bolivia was a part of the Inca Empire, which began about A.D. 1400. Remains of this civilization are found, as are pre-Inca ruins and artifacts. After defeating the Incas, Spain included this region in the Vice-royalty of PERU. Much wealth was derived from the silver mines, particularly those in Potosi Province. Independence was declared in August, 1825.

Never a powerful nation, Bolivia has been weakened by a series of wars. While a republic in form, the country has often found her democratic theories subverted by caudillos, or chieftains. A succession of strong men have ruled through most of Bolivian history, each depending upon the army for support. The revolution of 1952 nationalized the mines, provided a sweeping program of land reform, and vastly improved the social and economic status of the Indians. Economic problems are rooted in the fact that there simply is not enough to go around. Per capita income in 1961 was $122 a year, lowest of any country in Latin America.

The illiteracy rate is one of the worst in all Latin America, with sixty-nine percent of adults estimated as unable to read and write. Approximately one percent of the population is Protestant. The Roman Catholic religion was introduced to nearly all of the population in colonial times, but animistic religions are still practiced in tribal areas. In many instances Indians have preserved their primitive religious beliefs within a nominal Christianity.

The first Methodist contact with Bolivia was the tour in 1877 by WILLIAM TAYLOR, later bishop, who dreamed of a chain of self-supporting missions on the west coast of South America. He visited Peru, Bolivia, and CHILE, but most of the area in which he started work—including the port city of Antofagasta—was soon to become Chilean territory in the War of the Pacific.

In 1879 Jose Mongiardino, a colporteur, took Bibles into Bolivia, but he was murdered and his stock of Scriptures burned. In 1883 the noted Methodist team of Bible agents, ANDREW M. MILNE and FRANCISCO PENZOTTI, succeeded in entering Bolivia and worked in Tupiza, Potosi, Sucre, Oruro, and La Paz, as well as country villages. Penzotti was the evangelist and Milne the colporteur. The next year Penzotti returned with two other colporteurs, holding public services and establishing one Sunday school.

In 1890 JOHN F. THOMSON arrived from ARGENTINA and found a Bible Society agent selling Bibles and holding services in La Paz. Thomson joined him in services for a time and helped to organize Sunday schools for the Indians.

The beginning of permanent Methodist work in Bolivia is dated from 1906, when FRANCIS M. HARRINGTON rode a donkey across the mountains from Chile, where he had worked in the Iquique school. He organized the first Methodist church in the country at La Paz in August, 1906, and in 1907 launched the American Institute (now Colegio Evangelico Metodista). By February of 1908 Harrington was dead of tuberculosis, but his work prospered, and in 1912 a second American Institute was established in COCHABAMBA by government invitation. Later medical work was added. In 1916 Bolivia became a mission conference. Church development was slow, however; and thirty-four years after its founding, Methodism could boast only one congregation, two schools, and a clinic.

The Revolution of 1952, with its deep social ferment, brought changes in religious attitudes and a new openness to the Protestant witness. Mission leaders recognized this change by declaring Bolivia to be a "Land of Decision" in 1956, and for four years Methodist resources were concentrated upon Bolivia on a scale hardly matched at any time in the history of the church's missions. At the start of the Land of Decision program there were two districts in the BOLIVIA Provisional ANNUAL CONFERENCE, with eight organized churches enrolling just over 500 members. At its 1965 session the conference (now a full annual conference) counted 3,100 full and preparatory members, a gain of fifteen percent in just one year. In 1965 the church had forty-three ministers as members of the conference, forty-four supply pastors, and 151 lay preachers. An outstanding leader of the Land of Decision program was MURRAY S. DICKSON.

Among present centers of activity are La Paz, Cochabamba, and SUCRE. ANCORAIMES, site of a medical mission, is the center for work among Aymara Indians, and there are churches for worship in the Aymara Tongue in a number of villages and also in cities where the Aymaras have migrated—especially La Paz. In Ancoraimes there are boarding schools for boys and girls, and in the vicinity there are eighteen Methodist primary schools for Indian children. The Alta Beni region is the site of new work in the selva or jungle region of eastern Bolivia. A school, Panamericana in Trinidad, serves 130 students. MONTERO, in southeastern Bolivia, is another center of lowland work. Here the mission is not only to the established Bolivian population but also to Indians and foreign immigrants who are opening new lands. Here the United Church of Christ in JAPAN has sent three missionaries to work among Japanese and Okinawan colonists.

Major institutions of the church in 1969 were the American Clinic (also known as Pfeiffer Memorial Hospital), La Paz, probably the leading private hospital of the country; a school of nursing related to it; Colegio Evangelico Metodista in La Paz, a primary and secondary school with 1,500 students and ninety-two teachers; American Institute in Cochabamba, a primary and secondary school with 1,025 students and seventy-one teachers; the Paul Harris Home (for crippled children) in Cochabamba; Wesley Seminary in Montero, which trains ministers for all Bolivia; and the school and Rural Instituto at Montero, headquarters of an ambitious community development program. The church administers a hospital in Montero under contract with the Ministry of Health. A publishing venture, Icthus Press, is supplying religious books in Spanish, many of them by Bolivian authors.

Methodist work is in a unique position in Bolivia because of the absence of most of the Protestant denominations with which the church commonly cooperates. The only such group is the Canadian Baptist mission, with whom Methodists work in a radio ministry, "Southern Cross," and a few other projects. Other Protestant missions represent extremely conservative theological positions. At the same time, the United Methodist mission itself is an international enterprise. The Argentina Conference has supported a missionary in Bolivia for a number of years, and workers have come from URUGUAY, Chile, BRAZIL, PUERTO RICO, and other countries. Financial support has come also from SWITZERLAND and sister republics of South America.

In its early years, the Methodist movement in Bolivia relied heavily upon foreign leadership—most of it from North America. The middle 1960's saw a breakthrough in the development of national leadership. The two principal schools now have Bolivians as directors, and an increasing number of Bolivian pastors are assuming positions of leadership. The training of leaders has been aided substantially by the Crusade Scholarship program.

Icthus Press is the Methodist literature center for Bolivia, located in Cochabamba. Icthus Press functions under the Commission of Literature and Literacy of the Bolivia Annual Conference to produce and distribute literature. Booklets written by Bolivian and missionary church workers are edited by a committee, printed by the press, and sent to bookstore outlets in Cochabamba, La Paz, Santa Cruz, Sucre, and Trinidad in Bolivia, and also to Peru, Chile, Paraguay, Nicaragua, and other Latin American countries.

Several collections of booklets are published. The Popular Collection includes booklets on the fourth-grade reading level on subjects such as religion or health. The Select Collection is at the high school or college level and deals with social questions, Bible and doctrine, faith and culture, inspirational literature, and personal testimonies. Another series is the Bible Study Collection. An easy-to-read series of personal experiences is Entrance Into Life.

In 1965 the booklets and books sold by Icthus numbered 5,973 in Bolivia and 5,790 in other countries. Sales were valued at $1,200.

above. The 1960 GENERAL CONFERENCE of THE METHODIST CHURCH granted permission to the Bolivian Provisional Annual Conference to become an Annual Conference in its own right when and if twenty-five ministers in full connection could be reported. This condition was met in 1964, and the conference took its place with the other regular conferences in Methodism.

It organized with a Central District in which COCHABAMBA, MONTERO, Santa Cruz, Trinidad, and Eucaliptus are located; a Southern District about SUCRE, the capital and perhaps the cultural center of Bolivia; and a Northern District based upon LA PAZ and Santa Fe. There was also a Lake Titicaca District with ANCORAIMES its center. The conference supported the Icthus Press and carried on other conference-wide institutions and missionary work as it could.

Bolivian Methodists had the advantage of being supported by wide cooperation from many sections of world Methodism. The Argentine church maintained a missionary in Bolivia, and other Latin American Methodists also supported work in this land.

In 1968 the Bolivia Annual Conference joined Methodist churches of other countries of Latin America in requesting autonomy of the General Conference (the UNITING CONFERENCE of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH). The request was granted, subject to the fulfillment of certain conditions by the Bolivian church.

The Evangelical Methodist Church of Bolivia. Conditions were fulfilled and the autonomous Methodist Church of Bolivia, Iglesia Evangelica Metodista en Bolivia, was inaugurated at the constituting conference Nov. 30-Dec. 3, 1969, in Cochabamba, Bolivia. The Rev. MORTIMER ARIAS, executive secretary of Bolivian Methodism, was elected by the conference on its sixth ballot as bishop of the autonomous church.

It was formed, as is stated above, from the former Bolivia Annual Conference of the United Methodist Church and reported 3,150 members (full and preparatory), 45 organized churches, 170 preaching places, and 4,320 Sunday school members. There are presently 63 ordained and lay ministers. The Bolivian Church will continue in close relationship with the United Methodist Church as do the other autonomous churches which have been formed in the South American countries.

The bylaws of this church give almost full autonomy to the districts of the former conference—now of the Church. These districts have the appointive power over certain ministers and laymen who are not under supervision of the whole church. There is a general committee in charge of all the ministers in full connection, however, and these are assigned in a block to their respective districts and these districts make their appointments within their geographical limits. This, of course, greatly curtails what had been the complete appointive power of bishops, as had been the case formerly. The bishop serves for a term of four years, though he may be reelected once or possibly twice. After a bishop has served a tenure of eight or twelve years, however, he may not be reelected again unless a period of four years has elapsed since he left his episcopal supervision.

BOLIVIA ANNUAL CONFERENCE. The growth and organization of Methodist work in BOLIVIA is narrated

BOLTON, ALBERT EDWARD (1862-1914), Canadian medical missionary, was born Sept. 9, 1862, at Newboro, Ont., and died Dec. 28, 1914, in Vancouver, B. C. He was educated at Queen's University (Kingston), and New York University, from which he secured a doctorate of medicine in 1888.

Bolton was deeply interested in church work, and twice offered himself to the missionary society of the Methodist Church for work in the Canadian field. His offers were refused for lack of funds. Hearing the appeal of THOMAS CROSBY, pioneer minister on the West Coast, for a medical doctor, and being both consecrated and determined, Mrs. Bolton and he set out for British Columbia at their own expense, arriving at Port Simpson on Nov. 17, 1889. At that time he was the only doctor within a radius of 500 miles. In his first year he treated over 5,400 patients. In a letter published in the Christian Guardian, Dec. 24, 1890, he wrote:

To instruct in hygiene, to check the progress and alleviate the suffering of seated disease, to soothe the dying agonies, and at the same time to point to Jesus, the Savior, as the healer of the soul, have been my work, together with preaching occasionally, and helping with class meetings, Sabbath School, Day School and Boys' Home. Under Providence, I hope I have done some good.

He soon realized the necessity of a hospital, so he turned to industry and government for assistance. With donations from Indians, white residents and personal friends, he financed the building of a hospital at Port Simpson, opened in 1892. It was operated as a general public hospital, owned and directed by a hospital association incorporated under a special act of the legislature. Thus he became the first (although self-appointed) medical missionary of Canadian Methodism. "His name must ever stand high in the annals of his Church as the man who pioneered the establishment of Medical Home Missions, a branch of Christian service which later blossomed out into one of the principal efforts of the Methodist Church," wrote R. G. Large.

In 1902 he returned to private practice in VICTORIA, and in 1905 moved to Vancouver. The hardships and privations he endured while at Port Simpson undoubtedly contributed, in no small degree, to his early death at the age of fifty-two.

BOMBAY, India, is a city on the island of Bombay, connected with the mainland by causeways. In recent years a part of the mainland was brought within the municipal limits, and the civil district, now extended to a distance of twenty miles, is known as Greater Bombay. It is the capital of the state of Maharashtra formed by the bifurcation of the bilingual stage of Bombay into two unilingual states of Maharashtra and Gujarat. Bombay is the principal seaport of western India, and has a population of almost 5,000,000.

Methodist work in Bombay began in 1869 under WILLIAM TAYLOR, after earlier attempts failed. There are nine Methodist churches, including six in the city proper, one of which is a joint project of The Methodist Church in Southern Asia, the American Marathi Mission, the Church of Scotland Mission, United Church of North India, and the Church of India, Burma and Ceylon (Anglican) with a combined membership of over 500, of whom 249 are Methodists.

Robinson Memorial Church, erected in 1926, is now headquarters of Bombay Methodist work and provides residential quarters for the pastors and the resident bishop.

Friendship Center and Nursery School is located in a slum area of Bombay, and has a library, a sewing class, guidance for women, and a day nursery for sixty children.

There are eighteen Women's Societies of Christian Service with 701 members. Adult Literacy projects are among the finest, joining with evangelistic and church development programs in the poverty stricken areas of refuge communities.

The Inter-Mission Business Office is used by ninety-nine mission boards and societies to handle exchange, insurance, and transportation, as well as the treasurers' offices of the four cooperating boards.

Other institutions in the city include the Club Back Road Guest House, maintained for church leaders and other guests and which serves as headquarters of the city evangelistic work; Wicke Building, named for Bishop LOYD WICKE, which contains apartments for residents and a social hall for Methodists in the city; and the Christian Bookshop, which is an interdenominational project.

BOMBAY, BENGAL AND MADRAS MISSION became the first connective organization of Methodist churches outside the original chosen field of the M. E. Mission in INDIA. This mission was organized by drawing together the ministers of the churches which had been created as a result of the evangelistic meetings conducted by WILLIAM TAYLOR, who was known generally in India at that time as "California" Taylor. When the GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church gave permission for the organization of a second annual conference, the name of the Bombay, Bengal and Madras Mission was changed to the "South India Annual Conference," and the India Conference was renamed the "North India Conference." These geographical names were open to criticism, because the South India Conference actually extended further to the north than did the other conference.

There is now a BENGAL CONFERENCE and a BOMBAY CONFERENCE, but instead of a Madras Conference there are now two conferences—HYDERABAD and SOUTH INDIA. Out of other areas that were contained in the Bombay, Bengal and Madras Mission, have been carved the Indus River Conference, and the Sindh Mission Conference in PAKISTAN, as well as the Madhya Pradesh and the Gujarat Conferences in India.

BOMBAY CONFERENCE of The United Methodist Church covers all Maharashtra in INDIA except environs of Sironcha. BOMBAY, of course, is the principal city of the conference, though Poona, 119 miles east of Bombay, becomes the capital of the Bombay state during the rainy season. Poona is a healthful city of 793,016. Nagpur is the leading commercial city of central India, with a population of 729,712, and Dhulia, a town of 100,000, is also in the Bombay Conference.

The Bombay Conference came out of the South India Conference. Its districts are Bombay, Poona, Dhulia, Puntamba-Sangammer, Nagpur, Udgir, and Nanded. Statistics of the conference include fifty-eight Methodist congregations with a membership (including baptized children) of 19,598. Bombay is the seat of an episcopal area. (See also BOMBAY, BENGAL AND MADRAS MISSION.)

BOND, GEORGE JOHN (1850-1933), the son of a native of Torquay, England, who became a merchant in Newfoundland. He was born in St. John's, July 1, 1850. Educated at the General Protestant Academy in that city, he was received on probation for the ministry in 1871, and entered MOUNT ALLISON UNIVERSITY.

After graduation in 1874, Bond returned to Newfoundland, where he was ordained in 1876, and labored on different circuits, including some in St. John's. In 1891 he was transferred to the Nova Scotia Conference, and became editor of The Wesleyan in 1895. At the 1902 General Conference he was appointed editor of The Christian Guardian. Failing health and the death of his wife forced him to resign in 1906. Later, he traveled extensively in CHINA and JAPAN. From 1909 to 1923 he was again active, serving churches in the Maritime Provinces, until he retired to Halifax.

He wrote a number of articles on missionary work, the book Our Share in China, and the novel Skipper George Netman, which deals with Methodism in Newfoundland outports.

Bond held a number of offices within the church. With him the idea of the Twentieth Century Thanksgiving Fund originated, and he was on the committee to promote it. For many years he was a member of the Board of Regents of Mount Allison University, and was honored with a D.D. degree in 1912.

During his last visit to Mount Allison, he fell ill and returned to Halifax to die, June 22, 1933.

BOND, JOHN WESLEY (1784-1819), an American minister of pioneer days who was the traveling companion of Bishop Asbury when Asbury died in 1816 in northern VIRGINIA. John Wesley Bond was born in Baltimore on Dec. 11, 1784, and joined the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE in 1810, and thereafter was sent to the Calvert, Fairfax, and Great Falls circuits. He seems to have dropped out of the conference for a year or so, for he was "readmitted to the Baltimore Conference" on March 16, 1814. Thereafter, he traveled with Asbury as a sort of chaplain to the bishop, the companion of his travels. In 1816—this must have been just after the death of Asbury on March 31—he was appointed to the Severn circuit in southern MARYLAND, and in 1817 to Harford, above Baltimore. During this year he contracted a fever, which was the cause of his untimely death. He was said to be a man of clear and sound judgment, faithful in his ministerial and Christian duties.

BOND, ROBERT (1870-1952), British Methodist, was born at Willington, Durham. He entered the Wesleyan ministry in 1894, and soon made his mark as an administrator. In 1928 he became secretary of the Wesleyan Methodist Conference; he remained as secretary of the Methodist Conference from 1932 to 1936. In 1937 he was elected president of the Methodist Conference, and from 1937 to 1942 he had charge of the Department of Connexional Funds. He died at Penarth on Oct. 24, 1952.

THOMAS E. BOND

BOND, THOMAS EMERSON, SR. (1782-1856), American physician and editor, was born Feb., 1782 in Baltimore, of Methodist parents. Following medical studies at the University of Pennsylvania, he enjoyed a large practice in BALTIMORE. In 1807 he was appointed a Professor of Medicine at the new University of Maryland, but declined due to illness. Subsequently, he occupied numerous public offices.

Licensed to preach in 1824, he soon became involved in religious journalism and in 1827 penned an Appeal to the Methodists against the reform movement. Later he briefly edited The Itinerant, an anti-reform paper. Elected editor of the New York Christian Advocate (1840-48 and 1852-56), for a time he refused to admit discussion of slaveholding but vigorously advocated African colonization. When he died, Bishop WAUGH said, "No one rendered more valued service to Methodism in the last half century," while a later editor, J. M. BUCKLEY, wrote that Bond "left a reputation for ability as an editor unequalled before and unsurpassed since." E. J. DRINKHOUSE, the METHODIST PROTESTANT historian, thought him devious and almost spiteful.

A son, Thomas E. Jr. (1813-1872), followed his footsteps as both physician and editor, organizing a dental college in 1839 and editing the Baltimore Christian Advocate (1859-61) and several Southern Methodist papers after the Civil War.

BONNER, ISAIAH HAMILTON (1890-), an American bishop of the A.M.E. CHURCH, was born in Camden, Ala., on July 27, 1890. He was educated at Knoxville College (Tennessee) from which he received the degrees A.B., and B.D. in 1912 and 1914, respectively. In 1942 he received the honorary D.D. degree from Payne College (Alabama). He was ordained DEACON in 1913 and ELDER in 1920, was pastor of churches in TENNESSEE and ALABAMA, served as a presiding elder in Alabama and was elected to the episcopacy in 1948 from the pastorate of Bethel Church in Mobile, Ala.

BONNET SCHOOL-HOUSE, Mt. Pleasant, Pa., was the site of the first session of the GENERAL CONFERENCE OF THE UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST. On June 6, 1815, fourteen of eighteen delegates met in this log structure situated along the Old Glade Road one mile east of Mt. Pleasant on the Abraham Draksel (TUXAL) farm. It was named for John Bonnet, a farmer, who erected it at his own expense so children could be educated. The schoolhouse was built in 1810 and was used for both school and church purposes. A granite marker now stands at the site.

BOOK AGENTS. The title of the executive officers of the METHODIST PUBLISHING HOUSE, or BOOK CONCERN, of the Methodist Church in its developing years. The title of "Book Steward" was the original name. In the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1792, the question was asked, "Who is employed to manage the printing business? Answer: JOHN DICKINS. Question 2—What allowance to be paid him annually for his services? Answer: $200 for dwelling house and for a book room." Certain other allowances were given John Dickins, who thus became the first Book Steward and whose own personal contribution had begun the Book Concern itself.

In 1820 in certain regulations having to do with the Book Concern the title of Book Agent appeared in connection with the legislation having to do with the editors and general managers of the Book Concern in New York, and the title of Book Steward seems to have become that of Book Agents from that time on. Eventually there were chosen two Publishing Agents, or Book Agents (the terms were sometimes interchangeably used in the M. E. Church, South), one a clerical agent, the other a lay; in the M. E. Church, with the great growth of the CINCINNATI and the CHICAGO branches of the Book Concern, there came about in time three Book Agents, or Publishing Agents. This was how it was at the time of church union in 1939.

At UNIFICATION of the three Methodisms, a clerical and a lay publishing agent were decided upon and under their supervision all the publishing interests of the three uniting churches were put. These Agents were elected by the BOARD OF PUBLICATION of the united Church. Two agents continued until the reorganization of many administrative offices of THE METHODIST CHURCH was effected in 1952, when a single executive was established for the Methodist Publishing House and given the title of Publisher of The Methodist Church (Discipline, 1964, paragraph 1123). This officer is also declared to be the president of each corporation under the direction of the Board of Publication. He is sometimes referred to as "publisher," sometimes as "president" interchangeably in the Discipline (paragraph 1138, 1140). He is elected by and is under the general supervision of the Board of Publication of The Methodist Church (now the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH). (Discipline, 1964, paragraphs 1123, 1138, 1140-1142; 1968, paragraph 956-959).

BOOK COMMITTEE. For the origin of this Office in early American Methodism and its development, see PUBLICATION, BOARD OF.

BOOK CONCERN. (See METHODIST PUBLISHING HOUSE.)

BOOK EDITOR. In the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH, U.S.A., the Book Editor is an executive officer of the METHODIST PUBLISHING HOUSE, directed to edit "all the books of our publication." The title Book Editor supplanted that of the old Book Steward of the beginning days of American Methodism, when JOHN DICKINS, as Book Steward, was both publisher and editor and general manager of the BOOK CONCERN itself—later the Methodist Publishing House. As the Book Concern and the publishing interests of the Church grew enormously through the years, BOOK AGENTS were in time elected to oversee the general managerial work of the Publishing House. While for a time these also were responsible for the general editorial work of the House, it came about that eventually an editor was elected who should have sole responsibility for the editorial content of all books put out by the House. Thus came about the office of Book Editor in both the M. E. Church and the M. E. Church, South.

THOMAS O. SUMMERS of the ALABAMA CONFERENCE seems to have been the first Book Editor of the M. E. Church, South, elected in 1850; the M. E. Church in time also put the general editorship of its books under a Book Editor who was elected by the GENERAL CONFERENCE. The Discipline of 1876 refers to Book Editors but in 1904 one person came to hold this title in the M. E. Church.

Under the editorship of the Book Editor the Methodist Quarterly Review was published in the M. E. Church, and the Methodist Review in the M. E. Church, South. Within recent years the responsibility for editing the journal, Religion in Life—which supplanted the old Reviews—has been made the responsibility of the Book Editor. (Discipline, 1968, paragraph 962).

A trade name for the publication of general books was adopted by both Episcopal Methodists in the earlier years of the twentieth century. The ABINGDON PRESS was the trade name adopted by the M. E. Church for this part of its work, and the M. E. Church, South, adopted COKEBURY PRESS as its trade name. The Book Editor in each church became the editor of these respective presses. With the combination of the two presses at union in 1939-40, there came about the Abingdon-Cokesbury Press; later the name was shortened to Abingdon Press. Editorial responsibility for this Press continues to devolve upon the Book Editor.

The Book Editor is always named to edit the Book of Discipline and is the chief of its editorial committee as set up by the General Conference. He is also tacitly assumed to have the responsibility for the textual correctness of the Hymnal, Ritual, and all official documents of The United Methodist Church.

BOOK OF OFFICES, THE. In 1784 JOHN WESLEY published his adaptation of the Anglican Book of Common Prayer under the title of The Sunday Service of the Methodists. Although this did not meet with the use for which he had hoped in America, it continued to be reprinted for use in England. Editions were published every year or two until 1882, when it was drastically revised and appeared with a new title, The Book of Public Prayers and Services. This remained in print until about 1910.

By resolution of the WESLEYAN METHODIST CONFERENCE of 1839 "Mr. Wesley's Abridgment of the Order for the Administration of Baptism and the Lord's Supper [was] published in one convenient volume, distinct from the other parts of the Liturgy." This much smaller book was entitled Order of Administration of the Lord's Supper and Baptism. Later this was enlarged by the addition of orders for the Solemnization of Matrimony, the BURIAL OF THE DEAD, and ORDINATION. To these, apparently in 1879, was added an adaptation of Wesley's COVENANT SERVICE.

Although both books had progressively undergone revision in minor details through the years, the Conference of 1874 called for a major overhaul of both "the Liturgy and Book of Offices" so as to remove "all expressions which are susceptible of a sense contrary to the principles of our evangelical Protestantism." In 1882 this thorough revision issued in a new Sunday Service entitled The Book of Public Prayers and Services, and also in a revised Order of Administration of the Sacraments and other Services. In one locality or another all these books continued in regular or occasional use, as in fact did the Book of Common Prayer.

With the approach of METHODIST UNION the Wesleyan Methodist Conference of 1929 appointed a committee "to consider the question of the revision of the Book of Offices, and to consult with the representatives of the other Methodist Churches." The convener was the BOOK STEWARD, who at that time was J. Alfred Sharp, later succeeded by Edgar C. Barton. The strong united committee thus inaugurated was not able to prepare an agreed book before the Uniting Conference of 1932, and that body agreed that the forms customary in the uniting denominations should continue in use until the new Book of Offices was ready. By order of the 1935 Conference a new book was issued on an experimental basis, and with some minor alterations this was authorized by the Conference of 1936, with the title The Book of Offices, being the Orders of Service authorized for use in the Methodist Church. Although by no means in universal use within the British Methodist Church, this book has largely displaced earlier books, and at least some of its sixteen sections are in occasional use even in many congregations which had previously avoided all set forms of prayer.

The Book of Offices continues the tradition of Wesley's Sunday Service by opening with an "Office for Morning Prayer," followed by "The Collects, Epistles, and Gospels to be used throughout the Year." Neither of these sections, however, appear to be used very widely. Two Orders are provided for the Lord's Supper; the briefer alternative one, although distasteful to most liturgical purists, served to break the liturgical ice for many who were more familiar with the extemporaneous ordering of Holy Communion. The Book of Common Prayer is followed in adding to the Baptism of Infants an Order of Baptism for Adults, as well as a modernized "Churching of Women" entitled "Thanksgiving of Mothers on the Occasion of the Birth of a Child." Anglican Confirmation is paralleled by "The Public Reception of New Members." The more familiar Solemnization of Matrimony and Burial of the Dead are supplemented by an additional Order for the Burial of a Child. "The Order of Service for the Ordination of Candidates for the Ministry" demonstrates a belief in one ministry to both Word and Sacrament, rather than a two-fold or three-fold ministry.

Other commissioning services are included: for the "Ordination of Deaconesses," the "Public Recognition of Local Preachers," and the "Dedication of Sunday School Teachers." One service is even more peculiarly Methodist: "For such as would enter into or renew their Covenant with God." Contrary to popular belief, however, this particular form carries only vestigial remnants of that introduced by Wesley, being in large measure based upon one prepared for twentieth century use by a Wesleyan minister who served on the Book of Offices Committee, George B. Robson. British Methodism's Book of Offices seeks an ecumenical blending of ancient and modern, east and west, the formal and the extemporaneous, and on the whole seeks it successfully. At the time of writing a further revision of the Book of Offices is in the experimental stage.

BOOK ROOMS. The name "Book Room" has become the generic title for the publishing houses of the British Methodist churches.

JOHN WESLEY, whose father had tried his hand at a Young Students' Library in 1692, conceived that his task must include the production of short, incisive tracts, together with abridgments from learned, devotional, and useful volumes. PHILIP DODDRIDGE supplied him with a list of such books in 1746, and in 1749 he began to issue his "CHRISTIAN LIBRARY," which grew to fifty volumes. His first publication had been A Collection of Forms of Prayer (1733).

Wesley's early printers included William Strahan of LONDON and Felix Farley of BRISTOL. Between 1760 and 1777 William Pine of Bristol was used, but Pine displeased Wesley by his enthusiasm for the American "rebels." He used Robert Hawes of London between 1773 and 1780. After the Arminian Magazine (now the Methodist Magazine) began, Wesley bought type and a printing press and put John Paramore in charge of them. The work was done on this press from the latter part of 1779 until 1825. It was installed first in the FOUNDRY, which had been left vacant by the removal to CITY ROAD CHAPEL, but in 1787 was transferred to North Green, Moorfields. After 1825 Methodist printing was put out to commercial undertakings, except that the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH had the Magnet Press from 1901 until the Union in 1932. After the first World War the Wesleyan Book Room started a bindery for paperbacks, but this was short-lived.

It is significant that each of the Methodist churches, as it arose, gave great importance to publishing. The sixth question on the agenda of the first METHODIST NEW CONNEXION Conference (1797) was, "What shall we do respecting books this year?"

Wesley's original Book Room was at the Foundry chapel, where one end of the Bandroom was fitted with shelves. Other preaching houses were similarly fitted. When Wesley's City Road Chapel was opened in 1778, the Book Room removed there. In 1808, with increased business, the work was removed to 14 City Road; to this were added in 1838 other premises on Windmill Street (now Worship Street) and Castle Street (now Epworth Street). The present building was based on a reconstruction in the 1930's.

Each constituent of the United Methodist Church commenced its publishing work in the provinces and later moved to London. After they came together the former UNITED METHODIST FREE CHURCHES premises on Farrington Avenue were used from 1907 until 1932. The PRIMITIVE METHODISTS began in 1820 at BEMERSLEY, but JOHN FLESHER effected a removal to London in 1843, where the Sutton Street Church premises (Commercial Road) were progressively annexed to the work. After a period at Aldersgate, the business was transferred to Holborn Hall, built in 1875 and acquired by Sir WILLIAM P. HARTLEY for occupation from 1910. At the time of METHODIST UNION in 1932 the three Book Rooms came together in the new building at City Road.

It is impossible to detail the widespread activities of the present Book Room on both the wholesale and the retail sides. The declared policy is to provide everything that a church requires for its varied work. In addition, much business is done today with the general book trade (see also BOOK STEWARD, CONNEXIONAL EDITOR, JOHN TELFORD, THOMAS JACKSON, JOHN MASON).

BOOK STEWARD (British). John Wesley says in his Journal, Feb. 8, 1753, that "a proposal was made for devolving all temporal business, books and all, entirely on the stewards, so that I might have no care upon me (in London at least) but that of the souls committed to my charge. Oh when shall it once be?" THOMAS BUTTS and JOHN ATLAY served Wesley in this capacity. After Wesley's death the idea of a book steward was adopted by all the Methodist denominations, though the METHODIST NEW CONNEXION abolished the office in 1893. The PRIMITIVE METHODISTS rigidly maintained a principle of five-years' service only. Well-known WESLEYAN METHODIST book stewards were JOHN MASON, F. J. JOHNSON, and CHARLES H. KELLY. F. W. BOURNE was prominent among the BIBLE CHRISTIANS, and ROBERT ECKETT in the UNITED METHODIST FREE CHURCHES. The Wesleyan Conference of 1904 defined the steward's job as to "have control of the general business of the House, and in particular of its finances, subject always to the decisions of the Board of Management; and . . . be in regular consultation with the [CONNEXIONAL] EDITOR." This system still exists in the present Methodist Church.

(In the United States the title Book Steward was given in a few early instances to JOHN DICKINS and EZEKIEL COOPER who first managed the Book Concern, but the title was changed to BOOK AGENT.)

BOOK OF WORSHIP, THE, is an official publication of The United Methodist Church first adopted by the 1944 GENERAL CONFERENCE (TMC), and later revised at the order of the General Conference of 1956. In it are the orders and offices for the Ritual and official rites of the Church, as well as an anthology of scripture, prayers, and other liturgical material denominated "Aids for the Ordering of Worship." Some of these aids are arranged according to the Christian year; while others are arranged according to their sequence in the prescribed ORDER OF WORSHIP. These aids, in the nature of prayers, graces, and so forth, are available equally for the ordering of special services, as well as for family and private devotions.

"The Book of Worship for Church and Home with orders of worship services for the administration of Sacraments, and aid to worship according to the usages of The Methodist Church," as it is officially named, was first prepared by the official Commission on Worship of The Methodist Church, 1940-44, under the leadership of Bishop IVAN LEE HOLT. Since no formal prayer book had been known in American Methodism since the original SUNDAY SERVICE of JOHN WESLEY was discarded in 1792, there was some discussion in the Commission as to whether or not The Methodist Church was "ready for" a formal book of prayers and offices of this nature. However, the manuscript was compiled and presented to the General Conference with the understanding that it was to be published for "optional and voluntary use."

The book however won such wide acceptance that the Church came to use it more and more. It served as a convenient volume in which to publish certain of the minor offices of the ritual, thus taking these out of the Book of Discipline where various minor offices were being increasingly published along with the more stately and ancient forms of the actual ritual itself. The book proved popular with the ministry of the church as a reservoir of devotional material, not only for private devotions but for prayers, etc., which might be published in the local church's Sunday bulletin.

The Book of Worship as revised and made ready for the union of The Methodist Church and the E.U.B. connection in 1968 is now the sole publication in which is to be found the entire ritual of The United Methodist Church and all matters having to do with worship. The ancient offices of the Ritual (always published in the Discipline from 1792 to 1968) have now been omitted from the 1968 Discipline, in part because that book has grown very large, and The Book of Worship seemed to be a convenient place in which to publish all the forms for worship, thus leaving the Discipline to become entirely a book of law.

A new lectionary of scriptural readings has been created for the 1968 Book of Worship and there are invocations, calls to worship, collects, prayers of petition and intercession, canticles, and versicles of the Church both ancient and modern, all providing a rich reservoir of devotional material. There are also litanies, table graces, specific prayers and acts of praise, and readings for use in public or private devotions.

The preface of the volume states: "The Book of Worship is designed to provide significant structure for the worship of the Church. It is not intended in any way to fetter the spontaneity or reject the reliance upon the Holy Spirit which have characterized Methodist worship throughout its history. Rather The Book of Worship seeks to claim for the Church and its people the total Methodist heritage in worship. John Wesley himself, by his devotion to the Book of Common Prayer and his ordering of the 'Sunday Service of the Methodists in America,' has made us heirs of the deeply meaningful historic forms of devotion of the universal Church. As we make these our own we shall find that the Holy Spirit will move among us with mighty power." (See also WORSHIP in AMERICAN METHODISM).

BOOT, JOHN F. (?-1853), a Cherokee Indian, and charter member of the INDIAN MISSION CONFERENCE of OKLAHOMA. He was converted and joined the church in his eastern home on Gunter circuit in ALABAMA in 1824. Of his conversion he himself said:

I had a bad heart;
I knew I was a great sinner;
But God loved me.
I prayed to him;
In my sorrow and despair
He forgave me,
And gave me a new heart.
I am happy in his love.

He was licensed to preach and was ordained elder before coming to the Indian Territory. He came west with the Cherokees at the time of their removal. He was an eloquent preacher, and always effective among his own Cherokee people. When his name was called at the annual conference of 1853 the brief but eloquent response of his presiding elder was, "Brother Boot died at his post in great peace."

OSCAR FONTAINE

BOOTH, NEWELL SNOW (1903-1968), missionary to AFRICA and bishop, was born on June 14, 1903, at Belchertown, Mass., the son of Charles Edwin and Elizabeth M. (Snow) Booth. He was educated at BOSTON UNIVERSITY with the S.T.B. degree in 1927, and the S.T.M. in 1930. He received his Ph.D. from Hartford Seminary Foundation in 1936. In 1925 he married Esma Rideout, and to them were born two children: a son, Newell S. Booth, Jr., and a daughter, Esma Booth Ferre. He served appointments in Bryantville, West Duxbury, Wesley Church in New Bedford and Freetown, all in Massachusetts. He went to Africa to become the principal of the Congo Training Institute in 1937 and was appointed superintendent of the Belgian Congo Mission Conference of the M. E. CHURCH, and he served until 1944. He was the CONGO representative at the sessions of the World Sunday School Association in OSLO, NORWAY in 1946, and was sent as a delegate from his conference to the General Conference and the Northeastern Jurisdictional Conference in 1944. On a special ballot ordered for the Congo, the Conference elected him a bishop. There he served until strife in all Central Africa made it necessary for him to be assigned another superintendency in the Northeastern Jurisdiction.

Throughout his service in the Congo, as school principal, superintendent, and bishop, he was noted for the training of able young laymen as pastor-teacher-agriculturalists to serve out in their villages, and also for the training of their wives for practical community service. Much of the rapid growth of Methodism in the Congo has been attributed to this plan.

The Northeastern Jurisdiction, in 1964, assigned him to the Harrisburg Area, where he served until his death. He wrote Serving God in the Sunday School, Educating a Bantu Community, and The Cross Over Africa.

Bishop Booth died on May 17, 1968 in Harrisburg, Pa., after a prolonged illness. Funeral services were held in Grace Church, Harrisburg, with Bishop LLOYD C. WICKE giving the memorial address. Interment was in Belchertown, Mass., his birthplace.

BOOTH, WILLIAM (1829-1912), the founder of the Salvation Army, was born on April 10, 1829, and died on August 20, 1912. He was born in Nottingham, where he was apprenticed at the age of thirteen to a pawnbroker. He experienced conversion in 1844 and became a local preacher in the WESLEYAN METHODIST CHURCH. In these early years something of the pattern of his later life began to show itself, when he resigned his position as a local preacher to give himself to open-air preaching and evangelistic work. Associating himself with the WESLEYAN REFORMERS, he ministered to one of their congregations in London for a period of three months, and then in Spalding, Lincolnshire; but he found himself attracted to the METHODIST NEW CONNEXION and offered himself as a candidate for its ministry. In 1854 he was appointed to the New Connexion London Circuit, a note being added that he was to reside near the new chapel near Stockwell.

It was in this chapel that he married on June 16, 1855, Catherine Mumford (1829-90), who came from a Devonshire family. Catherine was of exceedingly firm mind, was outspoken about the equality of the sexes, published a pamphlet on the ministry of women, and in her insistence that her husband should not be tied down to circuit work by the conference played a vital role in his resignation and in the creation of the Salvation Army.

In 1855 William Booth was stationed in the Manchester North Circuit, and again a special note followed his name: "For special Connexional services, under the direction of the Annual Committee." He was obviously more suited for special evangelistic work than for the routine of the circuit ministry, and tension arose between the connexional officials and himself. There was no thought that he could be allowed to have a position as connexional evangelist without circuit appointment; but it was difficult to define the conditions under which he could act within a circuit and at the same time exercise a wider ministry. In 1857, when he was at Brighthouse in the Halifax South Circuit, the following directions were appended to his name in the Minutes:

Who shall have liberty to visit two or three circuits during the year, but not to be absent from his circuit more than four weeks in succession. The Circuits visited shall send satisfactory supplies for him, and pay all expenses connected with the exchange. Applications for his services may be addressed to Mr. Booth, but no arrangements shall be concluded without the consent of his circuit; but should the applications exceed two or three, and a satisfactory arrangement cannot be made with the circuits, the cases shall be referred to the Annual Committee.

In 1858 Booth removed to Gateshead, where he continued to follow his calling as an evangelist. He kept pressing to be allowed to spend his whole time in wider work, and the matter came to a crisis at the New Connexion Conference in 1861. He was given an appointment in the Newcastle-upon-Tyne circuit. When this was confirmed by the conference, despite protests from Booth and many of his friends, Catherine rose from her seat in the gallery to cry out her famous "Never." The Booths now left Methodism and began the work that eventually led to the formation of the Salvation Army in the 1870's. An important Methodist element in the teaching of the army was the Booths' emphasis on the doctrine of "CHRISTIAN PERFECTION," though they drew their version of this from American rather than English Methodist sources.

BORDER WAR. When the Methodist Episcopal Church in America split into Northern and Southern branches in 1844, the PLAN OF SEPARATION permitted annual conferences to decide upon their allegiance to either of the parts. Also districts, and later circuits and local churches, which found themselves "on the border" might decide upon the transfer of their affiliation. As this privilege was denied to "interior societies," churches not on the border sometimes agitated for action in neighboring congregations, hoping for a chain of events which would bring the border to them, and permit them to switch. The resulting Border War affected Methodism chiefly in the northern tier of slave states—VIRGINIA, KENTUCKY, MISSOURI, and later MARYLAND.

A main area of contention was the Virginia portions of the BALTIMORE and PHILADELPHIA CONFERENCES. Both conferences had large areas of slave-holding territory, but both had remained in the M. E. Church in 1844.

Throughout this section there was much agitation for adherence to the VIRGINIA CONFERENCE, and to Southern Methodism (the M. E. Church, South). This was marked by close votes, locked churches, court action, and, in a few cases, by armed conflict.

Methodist historian W. W. Sweet tells of the 1847 visits to the border country made by Bishop WILLIAM CAPERS of the Southern Church, who "visited churches such as those of the Northern Neck (Virginia), which had already voted to adhere to the South, cementing the affection of that area to the Virginia Conference and to the Southern Church. But in other cases Bishop Capers visited societies still loyal to the M. E. Church. It would be difficult to prove that the Bishop did anything to persuade these churches to leave that church and to throw in their lot with the Southern Church, but it will be noted that their decision to do so in many cases followed shortly the Bishop's visit" (Virginia Methodism—A History, p. 249).

Elsewhere in such Northern Virginia towns as LEESBURG, Winchester, Fredericksburg and Alexandria congregations split. By 1848 the Virginia Conference organized a Fredericksburg District in old Baltimore Conference territory, and in 1852 it further added a Washington (D. C.) district, which extended into Maryland, into what is now WEST VIRGINIA, and eventually even to Maryland's Eastern Shore.

When the Civil War broke out, the ecclesiastical Border War entered a new phase. The Baltimore Conference then split, one section remaining loyal to the M. E. Church and its GENERAL CONFERENCE, while the other in one breath claimed to be part of the M. E. Church but refused allegiance to any General Conference, North or South. The latter section continued work in Virginia as best it could throughout the war years, and in 1866 joined with Maryland Methodists of Southern sympathy, and with the Virginia Conference churches in Baltimore Conference territory—those above the Rappahannock River—to form the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church, South. This action was at first opposed by the Virginia Conference, and it seemed as if one of the battles of the Border War would be between the two Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South.

During the Civil War the Northern Church took the offensive in the Methodist Border War. Methodist "missionaries" had followed Federal troops to RICHMOND, NORFOLK, and Hampton, and in 1869 the Northern Church organized a Virginia Conference in the hope of further advance. Its position gradually weakened however, and the Virginia Conference (ME) in 1907 was merged with its stronger (ME) neighbors such as the Baltimore and Holston conferences.

After this an attempt was made through exchange of churches to bring the Border War to a close, but as late as 1915 the two denominations were organizing competitive churches in the Border area. With the appointment of the Commission on Unification in 1916, the aggressive stage of the Border War ceased, but as late as 1955 district superintendents in Northern Virginia were trying to unsmarl questions of parsonage equity which had arisen out of the Border War.

BORELLI, ENRICO (1815- ?), the first Italian minister to be ordained in the American M. E. mission to ITALY. His story is typical of the first generation of Italian Methodist ministers. He was born at Albenga, Italy, in 1815, and became a Passionist Father. At twenty-five when he was a tutor in the Order at Rome, Bible-reading made him critical of contemporary Roman religion. Thereupon he was sent to Recanati under suspicion. To escape arrest and the Inquisition he took sanctuary with the British consul at Naples. He went to Malta, joining with other similarly placed ex-priests, and thence to England. There he was offered and refused Anglican ordination, but enlisted under the Nice Committee in the service of the Waldensians. He married in 1854 into a famous continental Protestant family of Milan. He served in Nice until 1856, when with others he separated from the Waldensians over questions of status. After fifteen years as keeper of a pensione, he retired (after a fire) to near Torre Pellice. M. LEROY VERNON sought him out and used him as minister and writer following ordination by Bishop HARRIS in September, 1874, in Borelli's residence in Bologna. His son Emilio, born at Torre Pellice, July 25, 1855, also entered into the ministry of the M. E. Church in 1878. Enrico retired in 1887 to Torre Pellice.

BORGEN, OLE EDVARD (1925-), bishop of the United Methodist Church, Northern Europe Area, was born in Lillestrom, Norway, Nov. 8, 1925. Studying in the U.S.A., he received the B.A. from GREENSBORO COLLEGE; the B.D. from DUKE DIVINITY SCHOOL; and the Ph.D. from DREW UNIVERSITY. While in America he served as minister of music and assistant minister at the Edgemont Baptist Church in Durham, N. C.; as pastor in charge of West Side Avenue Methodist Church in Jersey City, N. J.; and as interim pastor in First Presbyterian Church, Stirling, N. Y. In 1966 he became administrative assistant to Bishop ODD HAGEN, and he served as pastor of Bollmora Ecumenical Church in SWEDEN in 1969.

Bishop Borgen was ordained elder in 1963 and was a member of the WESTERN NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE (TMC) until 1966, when he transferred his membership to the NORWAY CONFERENCE. He was a delegate to the WORLD METHODIST CONFERENCE in OSLO, 1961; has lectured and taught throughout Scandinavia and Continental Europe; and has written numerous articles and recently published two books in English and German. His wife was the former Matha Rygge and they have a daughter and a son.

Dr. Borgen was elected a bishop at a special session of the Northern Europe Central Conference on Sept. 24-27, 1970, and succeeds Bishop Hagen, who died in January 1970. At the special session, which was held in COPENHAGEN, an effort was made to withhold electing a bishop until the regular Central Conference session in 1972, but the motion lost overwhelmingly and Bishop Borgen was elected for a life term on the second ballot and subsequently was consecrated in the Jerusalem United Methodist Church, Copenhagen. Bishops FRIEDRICH WUNDERLICH, GERALD H. KENNEDY, FRANZ SCHAEFFER, ARMIN HAERTEL (East Germany), and C. ERNST SOMMER participated in the consecration. Bishop Borgen preached the sermon which was carried on television in Sweden, DENMARK and Norway. His episcopal residence is in STOCKHOLM.

His publications include John Wesley, The Man and His Thought (Holland: Brills, 1966) and John Wesley on the Sacraments, A Theological Study (Zurich: Gott-helf-Verlag; Nashville: Abingdon Press, 1971).

BORING, JESSE (1807-1890), American pioneer minister and administrator, was born in Georgia, Dec. 4, 1807. He lived in Shiloh, Jackson County, the son of the first superintendent of the first county (day) school and the second Sunday school in Georgia.

At fifteen, Jesse served Gwinnett Mission; at eighteen, Chattahoochie Circuit; later, Milledgeville, all in the GEORGIA CONFERENCE. He was presiding elder at Mobile in the ALABAMA CONFERENCE in 1844. It is said that Boring "discovered" HOLLAND McTYRE (later bishop) at Demopolis.

He returned to Athens, Ga., but Bishop ROBERT PAINE chose him to establish Southern Methodist churches in CALIFORNIA. He sailed March 1, 1850 from NEW ORLEANS to SAN FRANCISCO where he erected Wesley Chapel. He dedicated churches in San Jose and Stockton, edited the Christian Observer, and organized the Pacific Conference, the first Methodist annual conference in California, April 15, 1852.

He remained in Georgia after attending the GENERAL CONFERENCE there in 1854. He studied medicine, and then transferred to TEXAS in 1858, where he presided at the first session of the RIO GRANDE CONFERENCE at San Antonio in 1859.

Boring served as medical purveyor to Gen. McCullough's Division of the Confederate Army. He was appointed to Coliad in the Texas Conference in 1865. He headed the Medical Department at Soule University in Galveston, co-edited the Galveston Medical Journal, and was a delegate to the General Conference of the M. E. Church, South at New Orleans in 1866. His preacher son was accidentally killed at Chappell Hill, seat of the Literary Department of Soule University.

In 1868 Boring became presiding elder of the Griffin, Atlanta, La Grange, and Augusta Districts in Georgia. He died in Dixie, Ga. in 1890 and is buried in Atlanta. He founded the North Georgia Orphan's Home at Decatur; the South Georgia Orphan's Home near Macon; and the San Antonio Female College in Texas.

BORLASE, WALTER (1694-1776), Anglican vicar of Madron, vice-warden of the Stannaries, Cornwall. As a magistrate, he issued warrants for the arrest of JOHN WESLEY and several of his early preachers. The arrests were made under the vagrancy laws and were prompted by genuine suspicions that Wesley and his helpers were secret agents of the Jacobite Pretender. Borlase was a good man and, for the times, a good parish priest. Wesley's surprise that Borlase, "a person of unquestioned sense and learning, could speak evil of this way," may have contributed to the subsequent common confusion between Walter Borlase and his brother, WILLIAM BORLASE.

BORLASE, WILLIAM (1695-1772), rector of Ludgvan and vicar of St. Just in Penwith, Cornwall, historian and archaeologist. His Observations on the Antiquities, Historical and Monumental, of the County of Cornwall (1754) is still of some importance. Wesley read it with interest when in Cornwall in 1757. William Borlase has often been confused by historians with his brother WALTER BORLASE.

BORNEO. As a geographical expression, the name Borneo designates a large island in Southeast Asia, the southern and larger part of which, known politically as Borneo, forms part of the unitary state of INDONESIA. The northern third of the island consists of Sabah in the extreme north, and SARAWAK to the northwest, which are states of MALAYSIA, together known as East Malaysia, and the tiny British Protected State of Brunei (estimated population 1969, 112,000). There are only a very few Methodists in Brunei, which is a strongly Muslim State.

BOSS, CHARLES FREDERICK, JR. (1888-1965), an American minister and peace leader, was born in Washington, D. C., on July 22, 1888. He was the son of Charles Frederick and Katie V. Boss. He was educated at George Washington University (1915-16); Harvard Graduate School (1921); BOSTON UNIVERSITY (1920-22) receiving the B.R.E. degree; AMERICAN UNIVERSITY (1923-24); and NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY (1928-29). He was awarded an honorary LL.D. by ADRIAN COLLEGE in Michigan in 1946.

On June 3, 1920, he married Hazel Stuart Price.

Boss entered the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE, M. E. CHURCH, in 1916 and served several pastorates in MARYLAND. He then became Director of Religious Education of the Baltimore Conference, 1922-26; Superintendent of Church School Administration of the General Board of Education, 1926-28, and Director of the Bureau of Research of the same board, 1928-33. Boss was elected Executive Secretary of the Board of WORLD PEACE of the M. E. Church, serving there from 1926 until his retirement in 1960, by which time it had become the Board of World Peace of The Methodist Church.

The second World War broke during the opening years of his tenure. He was active in the development of alternate civilian service for conscientious objectors and served for many years as a member of the National Service Board for Religious Objectors. Under his leadership the Board assisted and defended conscientious objectors and succeeded in raising funds to cover ninety percent of the costs of Methodist objectors serving in projects of the Quakers, Mennonites, and Brethren.

He served as a leader at the World Conferences of Christian Youth at Amsterdam in 1939 and Oslo in 1947; was a member of the Department of International Affairs, NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, for many years. He pioneered in the convening of European Methodist leaders to consider international issues. He was a non-governmental organization observer at the United Nations Charter Conference at SAN FRANCISCO in 1945. His interest in the United Nations continued, and he established the first Methodist office at the United Nations in the Carnegie Peace Center in 1953. He led many seminars on the United Nations in New York. After retirement he entered the Methodist Hermitage home in Alexandria, Va., where he and his wife resided until his death in 1965.

BOSS was passionately devoted to the cause of peace and yet kept a balanced viewpoint in the midst of the intense failings which surrounded issues of war and peace. The Boss Room in the Church Center for the United Nations is named in his honor.

BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS, U.S.A., state capital and hub of New England transportation routes, has a total metropolitan population of some two and a half million. It is a center of medicine, culture, and scientific research. Methodism struggled for a foothold here; in spite of opposition its influence has always exceeded its numbers.

CHARLES WESLEY in 1736, en route to England, preached in "Old North" Church and King's Chapel. Four years later, and in some subsequent years, GEORGE WHITEFIELD preached in Boston. RICHARD BOARDMAN formed a small society in 1772, which, without supervision, ceased. The father of Nova Scotia Methodism, WILLIAM BLACK, preached for six months in 1784 in homes and halls. During the early summer of 1790 FREEBORN GARRETTSON preached and planned for Methodism, but formed no society. Immediately thereafter, on July 9, 1790, JESSE LEE, New England Methodist organizer, arrived. Lee preached July 11, under "the Great Elm" on the Common. Later in 1790 he twice attempted unsuccessfully to establish a preaching place here. ASBURY came preaching June 23, 1791; not well received, he left discouraged. Not until the summer of 1792 was a society of twelve members formed in the home of Samuel Burrill. Unconquered by difficulties, this group four years later erected a building on "Methodist Alley" (Hanover Avenue) and met there until 1828. Then the congregation relocated on North Bennett Street. During the nineteenth century other congregations were formed; the most noted was the Mariner's Bethel served by "Father" EDWARD T. TAYLOR for forty-three years (1829-72). Bethel Chapel (now the building of the Sacred Heart Church) had a seaman's residence, store, and school.

In 1871 the Wesleyan Association of Methodist Laymen, publishers from 1823 until the present of the independent journal Zions Herald, built a center for Methodist activities. This headquarters, housing the Boston area episcopal office, is now located in Copley Square.

Mergers and relocations of churches have frequently occurred in Boston. Tremont Street Church, where the WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY of the M. E. Church was founded in 1869, has an inter-racial program; Union Church has an influential Negro congregation; the Church of All Nations, where Morgan Memorial GOODWILL INDUSTRIES was established by Edgar E. Helms in 1912, ministers to all ethnic groups; and "Old West" Church serves a government and a medical-center area.

The aggregate membership of these churches in 1969 was 2,426.

Also related to Boston Methodism is Cooper Community Center, BOSTON UNIVERSITY, and the New England Deaconess Hospital.

Charles Street A.M.E. Church, the "Mother Church" of New England African Methodism, was organized in 1839 by Noah C. W. Cannon on Belknap Street in Boston's West End district, and was known as the "First African Church" or "First A.M.E. Society of Boston." Its other locations have been West Cedar Street, Cambridge Street, North Russell Street, and Anderson Street. In December, 1876, the pastor, William H. Hunter, led the people in the purchase of the famous Charles Street Baptist Church in the fashionable Back Bay Section of Boston, at a cost of $40,000. This feat was attempted with a membership of less than 200. In 1881 John T. Jenifer was appointed to the church, now popularly referred to as "Charles Street." Jenifer's wise and vigorous leadership liquidated the huge indebtedness on the church and secured its place in the religious life of Boston. The names of more prominent Boston pastors who aided in the effort to save the church financially were Edward Everett Hale and Phillips Brooks. In the 1930's, due to the shift of the Negro population in Boston from "Beacon Hill" to the "South End," Charles Street found it necessary to move again. This was accomplished under the leadership of Oliver W. H. Childers, who in 1939 moved the congregation to its present location on Warren Street and Elm Hill Avenue. Four pastors of Charles Street Church have been elected to the episcopacy of the A.M.E. Church: JABEZ P. CAMPBELL (1864), THOMAS M. D. WARD (1868), WILLIAM F. DICKERSON (1880), and REVERDY C. RANSON (1924).

New England Deaconess Hospital was first established in 1896 in a red brick residence at 691 Massachusetts Avenue. There were five floors, and beds for fourteen patients, with no elevator. Nurses and doctors had to carry patients up and down a steep, narrow staircase. There was only one clinical thermometer. A bell rung once, twice, four times, indicated the floor upon which it was needed. In answer to these calls, the thermometer traveled up and down in a basket on a pulley.

Difficult and dangerous operations were made more so by the limited dimensions of the operating room and by the Welsbach gas burners that furnished the only light. But there were plate glass shelves and an operating table of the "very latest design and finish" which cost $250.

The new hospital proved immediately popular, and after the first few months it was necessary to turn away many patients for lack of room. The Superintendent of Nurses often slept on chairs in her office in order that a patient might have her bed. This popularity was strikingly significant since in those days hospitals were objects of dread, the final refuge for those for whom there was little hope of recovery.

The cornerstone of a new hospital building, nucleus of the present plant, was laid in 1903, but not until four years later were funds available to complete the 44-bed building, then planned as the surgical wing of a 100-bed hospital.

A new 125-bed wing was added to the Deaconess building in 1923; the Palmer Memorial building was erected in 1927, and in 1935 the George F. Baker Clinic was opened for the study, treatment, and care of chronic diseases. In 1951 a Cancer Research Institute was opened—the first of its kind in New England.

With the opening in March, 1957, of the Hospital Teaching Unit, a new concept in nursing care for ambulatory patients was put into practice. With this building the bed capacity was increased to 370—making this hospital one of the largest voluntary hospital services in Massachusetts. Later came another floor for the Cancer Research Institute, Norwich House, a psychiatric unit, and the Deaconess Medical Office. The Shields Warren Radiation Laboratory was dedicated in October, 1965.

Trustees approved plans in 1965 to add six floors to the Central Building, increasing the hospital capacity to 460 beds. The next several years will continue to prove exciting in this latest chapter of the Hospital's distinguished history.

Tremont Street Church is not only noted for its distinguished history begun in 1847, but more especially as the place where the WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY of the M. E. Church was organized. This was through the leadership of the Women's Benevolent Society of the church. "The Founders' Room" of the Missionary Society can still be seen in the church and contains memorabilia of missionaries supported by the organization.

The church had its beginnings when a class meeting was organized in 1847 in the then newly settled South End of Boston. This section of the city had, for the most part, been reclaimed from marshland that was overflowed by the sea at high tide.

In 1848 the church was incorporated and the Trustees held their first meeting Oct. 30, 1848. On December 2 of that year the President of the Board was authorized to sign a contract for a church building, which was erected on Suffolk Street, now West Newton Street. Subscriptions of money were slow, and the progress of the church lagged until the Honorable LEE CLAFLIN, ISAAC RICH and JACOB SLEEPER assumed the leadership of the project, providing substantial gifts and a loan. In 1852 the church was named after Bishop ELIJAH HEDDING, and from then onward its growth was little short of phenomenal.

Not many years later it was decided that a new location should be found and property on West Newton Street was offered by the city. The site was later exchanged for one on Tremont Street where, through the leadership of BISHOP W. F. WARREN, an entire block was purchased for the new building. The cornerstone was laid July 30, 1860, and the church became known as the Tremont Street M. E. Church.

The new structure was pure Gothic, and created a tremendous sensation not only in the city but throughout Methodism. The church became influential also as the recognized church to BOSTON UNIVERSITY, an enviable distinction it no longer possesses.

The Woman's Foreign Missionary Society was organized here in 1869. Two women, Mrs. WILLIAM BUTLER and Mrs. E. J. Parker strongly felt a need for a society which would minister to children and women in countries not accessible to male missionaries. Mrs. Butler and her husband had been missionaries to INDIA in 1847 and had miraculously escaped the dangers and ravages of the Sepoy Rebellion. The two women brought the challenge to leaders of the Women's Benevolent Society of Tremont Church. The Society sent an invitation to women of other Methodist churches in Boston to discuss the matter. The day announced for the meeting was stormy and few attended, but the small group decided to go forward, and another meeting was scheduled for March 30 (1869), when a constitution was adopted and officers elected.

The Woman's Foreign Missionary Society spread throughout Methodism and continued to grow until the time of the union of the three branches of Methodism in 1939 when it became a part of the WOMAN'S DIVISION OF CHRISTIAN SERVICE. At that time it had nearly a million members and had spent over $63,000,000 for missionary work. Today the room where these first organizational meetings of the society were held is called "The Founders' Room" and attracts visitors from all over the world.

From 1862 to 1942 little was done for the Tremont Church building by way of rebuilding beyond the usual maintenance programs. In 1942, however, the congregation determined to place the entire building in perfect repair and restore it to its original Gothic beauty. The windows in the sanctuary, it was decided, should be a permanent memorial to the eleven former branches of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society. Enthusiastic response came from the former branches: New England, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Cincinnati, Northwestern, Des Moines, Minneapolis, Topeka, Pacific, and Columbia River. A twelfth window was placed in honor of the achievements of the Society in its seventy years.

Today the Tremont Street Church is no longer in a wealthy residential area, but it carries on a needed ministry of social service to a changing, inner city population.

BOSTON UNIVERSITY. Since its founding in 1869, Boston University in Boston, Mass., has enjoyed an historic, mutually supportive, and often creative relationship with The Methodist Church. Three Methodist laymen—ISAAC RICH, LEE CLAFLIN, and JACOB SLEEPER—secured the charter and contributed their influence and personal fortunes to launching the institution. The Methodist General Biblical Institute (formerly Newbury Seminary) became the first academic unit of the university, designated as the School of Theology. The BOSTON UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY is an official seminary of The United Methodist Church, and is supported in part by funds voted by the General Conference. The annual deficit of the school, over and above total income including contributions by Methodist annual conferences and by The United Methodist Church through World Service and other funds, is underwritten by the university. Through the years, The Methodist Church has continued as a vital presence in the life and works of Boston University.

In 1966, a thirty year project of consolidation was completed, and all schools and colleges except the School of Medicine now occupy the Charles River Campus. The School of Medicine is located in the south end of Boston, a most advantageous site both for its instructional programs and for its considerable clinical and visiting services to the people of Boston.

The administration of Boston University is conducted under the direction of a self-perpetuating board of trustees, with chief executive responsibilities charged to the president, who is aided and supported by an executive council and two special assistants (public affairs and planning). The first five presidents were all Methodist ministers: WILLIAM FAIRFIELD WARREN (1873-1903), WILLIAM EDWARDS HUNTINGTON (1903-11), LEMUEL H. MURLIN (1911-24), DANIEL L. MARSH (1926-51), and HAROLD C. CASE (1951-67).

The student body is national and international, coming from all sections of the United States and from seventy-four countries. One of the nation's largest urban institutions of higher education, the university serves some ten thousand Greater Boston residents in a broad range of adult education courses offered in the Metropolitan College. Overseas, Boston University operates two pioneer programs of graduate education in Germany for personnel of the United States armed forces: a sequence leading to the M.A. in government is available in Heidelberg and West Berlin, and another for the M. Ed. is offered in Stuttgart and Munich.

Boston University is distinctive for its broad-scale commitment to education for metropolitan living at all levels of university work, and for a large and rapidly growing number of multidisciplinary enterprises. In recent years, it has pioneered in general integrated under-graduate curricula, graduate nursing, public communication, engineering science, six-year medical education, and graduate dentistry. Also distinguishing are such interdisciplinary research and service groups as the Human Relations Center, the African Studies Center, and Metrocenter.

Boston University's diversified programs attract support from a broad range of resources: research, scholarship, and building aid from the federal government, bequests and annual gifts from alumni, research grants from foundations, and general funds from corporations to assist the university in its current operations and contribute to its growth.

Its schools are the College of Basic Studies, College of Business Administration, School of Education, College of Engineering, School of Fine and Applied Arts, College of Liberal Arts, School of Nursing, School of Public Communication, Sargent College, School of Social Work, School of Law, School of Medicine, School of Graduate Dentistry, School of Theology, and Metropolitan College.

BOSTON UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY, developed from the first institution for theological education of ministers in American Methodism, dates from April 24, 1839, when a convention was called for the purpose of organizing a school. The school was named The Wesleyan Theological Institute. It was formed in 1840, in connection with the Academy in Newbury, Vt. The first professor (later dean) was OSMAN C. BAKER, who taught sacred theology and oratory.

In 1847, the institute was moved to Concord, N. H., where the Congregational church, with a new building, turned over its first parish church for the school. The name was changed to the Methodist General Biblical Institute; the faculty was enlarged; the curriculum was expanded; and the enrollment was increased. JOHN DEMPSTER, engaged as financial agent, obtained enough money to meet the pressing emergency.

In 1859, the alumni urged the trustees to move the institute to Boston. The move from rural Newbury to the town of Concord had been beneficial; a move to a city like Boston promised even more.

The celebrations of centennials of American Methodism in 1866 and 1869 fired the church with fresh zeal that produced lasting results. The moving of the Methodist General Biblical Institute to Boston in 1867 was one. It was renamed The Boston Theological Seminary. Chairman ISAAC RICH, Vice-Chairman LEE CLAFLIN, and Treasurer JACOB SLEEPER obtained from the State of Massachusetts a charter which enabled them to establish BOSTON UNIVERSITY, and the seminary became the Boston University School of Theology. In 1867, the trustees appointed WILLIAM FAIRFIELD WARREN as professor and president, first of the seminary and then in 1873 of the university.

Since 1950 the theological school has occupied a seven-story educational building adjacent to Marsh Chapel, at the center of the university on its Charles River campus. The CRUSADE FOR CHRIST, the first church-wide movement after UNIFICATION in 1939, made possible a gift of $333,333 to the university toward its multimillion-dollar development (see BOSTON UNIVERSITY).

The School of Theology has consistently held to high educational standards. It grants the Bachelor of Sacred Theology, Master of Religious Education, Master of Sacred Music, Master of Sacred Theology, and Doctor of Theology degrees. The degrees of M.A. and Ph.D. are granted through Boston University's graduate school.

A new degree program leading to the Master of Theology was inaugurated in 1966.

BOSWELL, CHARLES M. (1858-1934), American minister and well-known GENERAL CONFERENCE figure, was born at Toms River, N. J., Dec. 26, 1858. Becoming a minister, he joined the PHILADELPHIA CONFERENCE of the M. E. CHURCH in 1880. In 1894 he was appointed Secretary of the City Missionary Society of PHILADELPHIA serving until 1906 when he became Secretary of the Board of HOME MISSIONS AND CHURCH EXTENSION. In 1917 he became Corresponding Secretary of the Methodist Hospital. He was seven times elected to the General Conference where his bulky figure, smiling face, and piercing black eyes became a familiar sight. His interests at the Conference were centered for the most part in missions. A camp meeting evangelist, he was president at various times of the Island Heights Camp Meeting, the Chester Heights Camp Meeting and the Ocean Grove Camp Meeting. He died Dec. 20, 1934.

BOULDER, COLORADO, U.S.A., is a city of 37,718 inhabitants, the fourth largest city in the state, approximately twenty miles northwest of DENVER. Located at the foot of the Rocky Mountains, the city is the site of the University of Colorado, and has the fourth existing Methodist congregation to be established in the state.

Methodism began in Boulder when JACOB ADRIANCE, father of COLORADO Methodism, preached the first sermon in the county on Aug. 14, 1859. November 27 of that year he organized a class of six or seven members. Supervision of the Methodist Church in Colorado was at first under the direction of the NEBRASKA ANNUAL CONFERENCE, and the minutes of 1860 list Boulder as an appointment. Adriance rode to Boulder to hold services on alternate Sundays in order to serve Golden City also. The present First Church is the successor to that early congregation, having functioned continuously since 1859. The first church building was constructed in 1872, at the site still occupied by the church. This first building was replaced by a larger structure in 1892, at the cost of $22,500. The shell of the building of 1892 was incorporated into a much larger plant constructed in 1959 at a cost of $358,000. It serves a congregation of over 2,500 members.

The need for a WESLEY FOUNDATION at the University of Colorado in Boulder was recognized by FRED E. ADEN, a professor at the University and member of First Church. Dr. Aden started a Sunday school class and Wesley Foundation for college students in 1919. In 1923 the church made possible the purchase of a Wesley Foundation Student Center at Twelfth and Broadway. When this unit proved much too small by 1945, First Church again purchased property, this time at 1313 University Ave., and adapted it for use as a student center. More recently the property acquired in 1945 was sold and a fine Wesley Foundation Center was constructed at 2400 University Heights Ave.

Frasier Meadows Manor. A third major Methodist institution became a reality in Boulder when this home for retired people, built on a twenty-acre site, opened its doors in 1960. Under the direction of Ben H. Christner as executive director the home has made good progress. It is financed by a plan whereby occupants become founders by paying for the cost of their unit. A new wing was added in 1965 which brought this building to 188 living quarters and dining hall. The building boasts a chapel, several lounges and recreation areas, a shop, other rooms where hobbies may be pursued, individual garages, and a health unit for ill residents. In 1967 the value of the property was $3,581,375.

Mountain View Church was built across the street from the site of Frasier Meadows Manor in 1959. The new congregation was sponsored by the First Church and was organized Feb. 2, 1958 with 200 charter members. By 1967, the congregation reported nearly 1,300 members.

St. Paul Church is the newest of the Methodist churches in Boulder. Begun in 1965 in the southern section of the city, the congregation reported 402 members in 1969.

BOUNDARIES OF ANNUAL CONFERENCES. In American Methodism the Annual Conferences from 1773 to 1796 really had no definite boundaries. The ministers attended whichever conferences—really assemblies of preachers—which were most convenient to them, as they were notified where these would be held by the bishops. At one time a conference was held in almost every presiding elder's district, the chief conference being in BALTIMORE. These gatherings were sometimes known as district conferences rather than annual. However, in 1796 the General Conference determined to assign to the Conferences definite geographical boundaries and divided the territory into six "Annual Conferences" as they began to be called at that time.

In 1804 a separate section in the Discipline was devoted to the subject of boundaries. These boundaries were changed from time to time by the GENERAL CONFERENCE as seemed wise, and as it created new conferences and sometimes divided older ones. As the church grew, there came to be more difficulty in realigning boundaries, especially where joint property rights were involved, or where great loyalties had been established to a particular region or name.

The General Conference of the M. E. Church (and later that of the M. E. Church, South) usually constituted a "committee on boundaries." In the M. E. Church, this consisted of one member from each annual conference. At several quadrennial sessions this committee reported for the consideration of the General Conference its recommendations for boundary changes, but in 1872 the committee was given power to make its decisions final in the matter of boundaries. However, in order to avoid trouble, the Conference of 1876 (ME) resolved that no change should be made until the plan should have been submitted to the annual conferences interested. It also provided that adjacent Conferences might settle and alter boundary lines between themselves should they agree through their respective committees as to how this should be done. (Consult Disciplines referred to and Journals of the respective Conferences.) The General Conference itself reserved the right to determine and approve all such adjustments.

The General Conference of the M. E. Church, South pursued something of this same course, having full power to establish new conferences, divide old, or otherwise order any realignment of conference lines which seemed desirable. Naturally, the General Conference followed the wishes and directions of the particular annual conferences involved, and where there was any conflict endeavored to see that this was reconciled by the interested parties. Sovereignty over conference boundaries, however, always inhered in the General Conference of both the large Episcopal Methodisms.

Under the PLAN OF UNION establishing THE METHODIST CHURCH in 1939, the determination of conference boundaries was placed in hands of the respective Jurisdictions, which were given the right to determine all such matters in re the annual conferences composing them. Such actions as were taken by the respective Jurisdictions were made following the report of its Committee on Conferences, or as was sometimes the case, that of a special committee empowered to study and report on particular matters of boundary realignment. The Northeastern Jurisdictional Conference of 1960 made certain territorial adjustments affecting Methodists in western Massachusetts—Berkshire County was taken from the TROY CONFERENCE and put into the NEW ENGLAND—a move which was strongly opposed by some of those involved.

The Constitution of 1968 of The United Methodist Church continues the above plan and gives the right to the Jurisdictional Conferences "to determine the boundaries of their Annual Conferences; provided that there shall be no Annual Conference with fewer than fifty ministers in full connection except by the consent of the General Conference; and provided further that this provision shall not apply to Annual Conferences of the former The Evangelical United Brethren Church during the first three quadrenniums after union." (Constitution of The United Methodist Church, Section Four, Article Five, page 14, The Constitution of The United Methodist Church.)

BOURNE, FREDERICK WILLIAM (1830-1905), British BIBLE CHRISTIAN minister, was born at Woodchurch, Kent, on July 25, 1830, and entered the itinerancy in 1850. After JAMES THORNE's death in 1872 he became preeminent in the denomination, being thrice president of the Conference (1867, 1875, 1891), and for long periods treasurer, connexional editor, book steward, and missionary secretary. Fervently evangelical and antisacerdotal, he was a writer of distinction; and his books include biographies, a denominational history (1905), and most notably his early account of the colorful local preacher BILLY BRAY, The King's Son (1869), which went through numerous printings during his lifetime and is still in print. He tirelessly advocated Methodist union and the Free Church Council movement. Politically he was Liberal, democratic, and anti-imperialist. His character was an admirable blend of strength, dignity, and sweetness. He died in London on July 25, 1905, and was buried at Lake, Devon.

BOURNE, HUGH (1772-1852), British Methodist, co-founder with WILLIAM CLOWES of PRIMITIVE METHODISM, was born at Ford Hays Farm, Stoke-on-Trent, Staffordshire, on April 3, 1772. The family moved to BEMERSLEY in 1788. There during several years he sought for spiritual light and was greatly influenced through reading in particular JOHN FLETCHER'S Six Letters on the Spiritual Manifestation of the Son of God, and was converted in 1799. A moorland carpenter by profession, he was instrumental in a revival of religion in the Harseahead society in the Burslem Circuit, where by his own hands he built a chapel. As a result of preaching by an American evangelist, LORENZO DOW, he became the main figure behind the first CAMP MEETING held on Mow Cop, May 31, 1807; and despite the criticism of such evangelistic enterprises by the Liverpool Wesleyan Conference of 1807 he continued in his conviction. For this he was excluded from membership by the Burslem Circuit in 1808. Going forward quietly with his spiritual labors, he conducted pastoral work over a large area, traveling on foot throughout Cheshire and Staffordshire, later extending his ministrations throughout the whole country.

Hugh Bourne was chief architect of the new Primitive Methodist denomination, becoming its chief administrator and its first connectional editor. Numerous tracts and larger works came from his pen, in particular his History of the Primitive Methodists (1823; 2nd ed., 1835); Ecclesiastical History (1825); Studies of Language (1832)—he was self-taught in Hebrew, Greek, Latin, and French—and a small Commentary on St. John's Gospel (published posthumously in 1866). He was responsible for the compilation of three hymn book collections (1809, 1821, 1824), in which were some hymns of his own composition. His later years were given to the advocacy of teetotalism, and he became known as "the man who fought the serpent." After his superannuation in 1842 he went on a mission to America (1844-46). He died Oct. 11, 1852, and is buried at Englesea Brook, Cheshire. Part of his manuscript journal, which he kept for nearly fifty years, is in the library of Hartley Victoria College, Manchester.

BOURNE, JAMES (1781-1860), British Methodist, was born Feb., 1781, the younger brother of HUGH BOURNE, and co-founder with him of PRIMITIVE METHODISM. Like his older brother, James obtained a preacher's LICENSE under the Toleration Act on July 16, 1807, in preparation for the second CAMP MEETING on MOW COP. For their participation in this both were excluded from the WESLEYAN METHODIST SOCIETY. Two years later they jointly undertook financial responsibility for Primitive Methodism's first paid preacher, JAMES CRAWFOOT, in 1810 assumed joint control of the first Primitive Methodist society at Stanley, and in 1811 built (again jointly) the first Primitive Methodist chapel at TUNSTALL. From the beginning of the Primitive Methodist BOOK ROOM in 1821 they shared full responsibility for its operation in their jointly-owned farmstead at BEMERSLEY near Tunstall, Hugh as editor, James as BOOK STEWARD. Bemersley also served as the connexional headquarters until 1843, when James Bourne, submerged by bad debts, was declared bankrupt. Nevertheless James was more levelheaded and businesslike than Hugh, who throughout his life remained something of a dreamer. Hugh re-established himself in the eyes of Primitive Methodism, but James remained aloof and almost forgotten, dying Jan. 15, 1860.

BOVARD is the name of a remarkable family in the M. E. Church whose members made notable contributions between the 1870's and 1930's as pastors, presiding elders, district superintendents, missionaries, educators, editors, and board secretaries. James Bovard (1823-1889) and Sarah Young Bovard (1828-1888), who lived on a farm at Alpha, Scott County, Ind., had eleven sons and one daughter. They regularly read the Bible and conducted family prayers in the home. Sarah kept a "quaint, interesting, and informing" diary from 1861 to 1863. She hoped that all of her sons would enter the Methodist ministry, and six of the nine who reached maturity did.

Marion McKinley Bovard (1847-1891), oldest of the minister sons, served as a physician, pastor, and chief founder of the UNIVERSITY OF SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA. As a youth he taught school two years, studied medicine, and settled briefly in Cincinnati. In 1873 he was admitted to the NORTH INDIANA CONFERENCE and appointed to a circuit. Volunteering as a missionary to CHINA, he was unable to go because of his wife's health. In 1874 he transferred to the CALIFORNIA CONFERENCE, served as a missionary to ARIZONA, and then as a pastor in San Diego and LOS ANGELES. While in the latter city he launched the University of Southern California and served as its first president. Beginning with fifty-three students and one wooden building, at his death eleven years later the school had 700 students and an endowment of $3,500,000. It is claimed that he exerted a commanding influence in the educational and religious life of southern California.

Freeman Daily Bovard (1851-1920) served as a pastor, presiding elder, professor of mathematics, editor, and board secretary. Educated at DEPAUW (B.A., 1875 and M.A., 1878), ILLINOIS WESLEYAN later awarded him the D.D. (1890) and Ph.D. (1891) degrees. He was admitted on trial in the California Conference in 1875 and appointed to Riverside. He served five years (1880-85) as vice-president and professor of mathematics at the University of Southern California, six years (1887-93) as presiding elder of the San Francisco District, 13 years (1900-13) as editor of the California Christian Advocate, (he made it "gleam with light"), and three years as corresponding secretary of the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension (ME). He was a member of five General Conferences (1900-16), and a delegate to the 1911 ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE at TORONTO. Bishop EDWIN H. HUGHES said F. D. Bovard was "a wise master builder" and the "most influential" Methodist preacher in northern California.

Melville Young Bovard (1852-1938) served briefly as a foreign missionary and then as a pastor. Graduating from Moore's Hill College in INDIANA, he sailed in 1878 as a missionary to West Africa. The next year he went to INDIA where he met and married a missionary, M. J. Edna Taylor. After four years, Bovard returned to the United States and in 1884 was received by transfer into the NEW YORK EAST CONFERENCE. During the next thirty-nine years he served pastorates in that conference and in the NORTHERN NEW YORK and NEWARK CONFERENCES. Retiring in 1923, he made two trips to the Orient, serving a year as pastor of an English-speaking church in Bangalore, India and six months in a church at Rangoon, BURMA. He did supply work in the Newark Conference until his death at 85 in 1938.

George Finley Bovard (1856-1932), pastor, presiding elder, and university president, was admitted on trial in the SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA CONFERENCE in 1883 and immediately appointed a teacher in the University of Southern California where one of his brothers was president and another a professor. Then came three years as pastor at Orange, after which he was appointed PRESIDING ELDER of the PASADENA DISTRICT. He superintended the Arizona Mission seven years and built First Church in PHOENIX. Then came six years (1897-1903) on the Los Angeles District and eighteen years (1903-21) as president of the University of Southern California. During his presidency enrolment increased from 628 to 4,861. He was a member of the UNIVERSITY SENATE and a delegate to the 1900, 1904, and 1916 General Conferences.

Charles Lincoln Bovard, pastor, district superintendent, and educator, studied at two Indiana colleges and received the Ph.B. degree from ILLINOIS WESLEYAN. He was admitted to the Southeastern Indiana Conference in 1884. In 1889 he went as a missionary to ARIZONA, and served seven years as superintendent of the NEW MEXICO English Mission. During the next twenty-eight years he held pastorates in Indiana, OHIO, NORTH DAKOTA, and MONTANA, was president of MONTANA WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY (1911-16), served eight years in two terms as district superintendent in Montana, and was executive secretary of the Helena Area for four years. He was a delegate to the 1916 General Conference and was a member of the Board of Foreign Missions. In considering him for the district superintendency, one bishop said, "As long as it is a Bovard, it is all right."

William Sherman Bovard (1864-1936), pastor, educator, and board secretary, was educated at the University of Southern California (A.B., A.M.) and BOSTON UNIVERSITY (S.T.B.). He held pastorates at San Francisco and San Jose, Calif., and at York and Portland, Me. He served four years (1904-08) as dean of the School of Theology, UNIVERSITY OF CHATTANOOGA. From 1913 until his death in 1936 he served with several of the general boards of the church, his most important assignment being corresponding secretary of the Board of Education (1924-32). He was considered a talented preacher and an able executive.

He was a pastor in the North Alabama Conference from 1908 to 1914; then professor of religious education in Woman's College, Alabama, 1914-21; and in Millsaps College, 1921-24. He became associate editor of church school publications, M. E. Church, South, 1925-30, and editor-in-chief, 1930-39. J. MARVIN RAST

BOWEN, ELIAS (?-1870), American early FREE METHODIST leader. He was pastor and presiding elder in the ONEIDA CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church and seven times a delegate to the M. E. general conference. He joined the Free Methodist Church in 1869. He was author of The History of the Origin of the Free Methodist Church. All agree that Bowen was an able administrator, a strong doctrinal preacher, an effective servant of Christ and the church. He died Oct. 25, 1870.

BOWEN, GEORGE (1816-1888), saintly missionary to INDIA, was born in Middleburg, Vt., but at the age of twelve his parents took him to New York City where he worked in his father's counting house. He studied French, Italian, and Spanish under a tutor and read widely. At seventeen he settled on Deism as a rational explanation of the universe, and held that position for eleven years. In his youth, he had an opportunity of traveling and living abroad for three years and began to lead a full active life.

At the age of twenty-six he met a young woman with whom he fell in love, but her untimely death caused him to begin to read the Bible for consolation. From that he proceeded to Paley's Evidences of Christianity, and on Good Friday in 1844, he entered in his diary, "The Christianity of the Bible is true." He then went into the Union Theological Seminary and at graduation offered himself to the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions in India and was accepted. On Jan. 19, 1848, he landed in Bombay.

A year later his conscience led him to renounce his salary and live in poverty that he might "exhibit to the heathen self-denial and indifference to the world." Bananas and bread sufficed for food; he wore old, but clean clothing, and lived in one room furnished with only a table from which he ate, and on which he slept. For five years he continued as a member of the American Mission Board without salary, but in May, 1855, he severed connections entirely. However, ten years later his relationship was reestablished for six years. In 1874, influenced by the evangelistic spirit and method of WILLIAM TAYLOR, he became a member of the South India Conference.

Bowen made a great contribution by his writing. For many years he edited the Bombay Guardian, which was widely read and much appreciated. Among his many books were The Amens of Christ and Daily Meditations. These were so highly appreciated by Queen Victoria, that, on the occasion of the visit to India of the Prince of Wales, later King Edward, she charged him to call on George Bowen and express to him her thanks. This he did. His carriage was stopped in front of the single room in the bazaar, and Bowen stepped out to receive the royal message.

He continued until his death a self-supporting worker, honored and beloved alike by missionaries and Indian Christians. In the words of Dennis Osborne, "The life of George Bowen has been an open book, every line of which has portrayed godliness and truth. Christ lived in that life and shone from it at every point."

J. W. E. BOWEN

the son of John W. E. and Ariel Serena (Hedges) Bowen. He studied at Philips Exeter Academy (1904-07), WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY (A.B., 1911), and Harvard (A.M., 1913), and held the honorary D.D. and LL.D. degrees. He married Margaret L. Davis, Aug. 31, 1921; they had one son, J. W. E. Bowen, III. Admitted to the Atlanta Conference (ME) in 1917, he was ordained deacon that year by Bishop F. D. LEETE and elder by Bishop W. F. McDOWELL in 1918. He served as a U. S. Army chaplain, 1918-19. A student of world history, Bowen taught at Tuskegee, 1916-17; Walden College, Nashville, Tenn., 1917-18; CLAFLIN COLLEGE, 1922-24; and was an instructor at GAMMON at the time of his death. He was field agent for the Board of Sunday Schools, 1919-22, and editor of the Central Christian Advocate, 1944-48. His pastorates were: Jackson, Miss., 1925-29; Trinity Church, New Orleans, 1929-31; Shreveport, 1931-35; Grace Church, New Orleans, 1935-36; the New Orleans District, 1936-42; and First Street Church, New Orleans, 1942-44. He was a member of the 1939 UNITING CONFERENCE and of the 1940, '44, '48 GENERAL CONFERENCES. Elected bishop by the 1948 Central Jurisdictional Conference, he was assigned to the Atlantic Coast Area where he served until retirement in 1960. A delightful and witty companion, Bowen loved young people and was esteemed by them. Strength of character, sharpness of intellect, and depth of spiritual fervor combined to make him a positive and forceful preacher. He visited the Holy Land and traveled to Africa in 1951, representing the COUNCIL OF BISHOPS. A similar mission took him to INDIA and PAKISTAN in 1954. He died suddenly July 12, 1962 in Atlanta, Ga.

BOWEN, SR., NICHOLAS TALLEY (1842-1930), American Negro preacher and conference leader, was born in Sumter County, S. C., March 15, 1842. He was received on trial in the SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE of the M. E. CHURCH in 1870. In 1871 he married Rachel Anna Coleman, sister of Andrew Coleman of Camden, S. C.

He was appointed to and served all the prominent appointments of his conference—among them Spartanburg, Orangeburg, and Sumter—after which he was appointed presiding elder, 1894-99, of the Spartanburg District. He was then appointed to West Orangeburg and served nine years, after which he was appointed to Camden Circuit, Kershaw Co., S. C. Later on he was appointed to West Sumter, serving this appointment two successive terms through 1926, at which time he retired because of ill health.

He was known as "the thunderbolt of the South Carolina Conference." He died in 1930 at his home in Sumter. His sons, N. T. Bowen, Jr. and Thomas W. Bowen, were Methodist preachers, and several grandsons are in the itinerancy.

GILBERT HAVEN BOWEN

BOWLES, RICHARD PINCH (1864-1960), Canadian minister and educator, was born near Brampton, Ontario. He was educated at Brampton High School and VICTORIA UNIVERSITY, from which he graduated in 1885. Ordained in 1888, he subsequently held important pastorates in Toronto, Montreal, and Winnipeg.

Richard Bowles made his greatest contribution to his church and to society in education rather than in the pulpit. In 1905 he was appointed professor of homiletics at Victoria, where he quickly added to the reputation he had gained as a student. He was held in esteem by his colleagues, and his generous, genial personality earned him the regard of the students. Not surprisingly, therefore, in 1913 he was appointed president and chancellor in succession to NATHANAEL BURWASH.

The period from 1913 until Bowles' retirement in 1930 was one of the most difficult in Victoria's history, marked as it was by the first World War, church union, and the subsequent reorganization of Victoria. The new president, a shrewd and cautious man, moved carefully through the many pitfalls presented by new circumstances, to preserve and enhance the college's reputation. At his instance, the governing statute of the college was clarified in 1915. His efforts to strengthen its financial position were rewarded by a substantial increase in the endowment. Most important, however, was the adjustment he helped effect between Victoria and Knox College, the Presbyterian theological institution. The building of the latter was awarded to the continuing Presbyterians; in 1928 its staff became the faculty of theology in Victoria under the title of Emmanuel College. Henceforth, Victoria consisted of two colleges, for arts and theology respectively. Once again, Bowles' vision and charity had resolved a difficult and contentious situation.

In 1930, Chancellor Bowles, who had long chafed at administrative duties and financial stringency, announced his retirement. His last official comments stressed the need for a spontaneous approach to intellectual endeavor, and for a close connection between religion and learning. He left the college, as he put it, to return to the farm after an interval away from it. Happily he enjoyed thirty years of peace before his death on June 16, 1960. It was then said of him: "We rejoice in the gift of his life and are grateful to Almighty God for this man of faith and knowledge who gave of himself so generously that the truth which makes men free might prevail."

BOWLING GREEN, KENTUCKY, U.S.A. State Street Church is a city landmark. It is the church away-from-home of many students of Western Kentucky University and a large number of the faculty.

Preaching in Vance's Tavern was the beginning of its history, and Benjamin Vance, the tavern owner, once rang a bell all through the service in efforts to break it up. He was angry because his wife had asked the Methodists to pray for her. This was in 1809 and the society was organized in March, 1819, with eight members.

The first church building was constructed in 1820 at 620 Green Street, now Center Street. The lot was purchased for twelve and one-half cents. PETER CARTWRIGHT was the church's first presiding elder.

The growing congregation moved into a larger church erected in 1842, and located at 816 State Street, then called Nashville Street. The church was lighted by wax candles, and there was a large balcony for the Negro members. This building was used as a hospital by the Confederate troops in the winter of 1861, and naturally was abused and had to be repaired and renovated when it was returned to the congregation.

In 1896 the present sanctuary was erected on the corner of State and Eleventh Streets, and was formally dedicated in July, 1901. In 1928, under the ministry of A. R. Kasey, a three-story educational annex was completed. In January 1952, the sanctuary was redesigned, and the inside was completely rebuilt and renovated, thus doubling the seating capacity and making the church more beautiful and worshipful. The only things that were kept intact were the rose windows. This was during the pastorate of John Burns Horton.

The last bishop from the north before the 1844 separation held his conference in the newly finished 1842 structure. In this same church Bishop H. H. KAVANAUGH, "Kentucky's Own Bishop," delivered his last sermon at eighty-two years of age.

During its one hundred forty-six year existence, State Street Methodist Church has sent out eight ministers and two missionaries.

The ministers still living and serving are Walter McGee, Larry Jones and Neil Shenton. The missionaries are the Reverend and Mrs. James Jones, now serving in BOLIVIA. More than half of their support comes from State Street and the Bowling Green District.

BOWMAN, GEORGE BRYANT (1812-1888), American minister and college founder, was born May 1, 1812 in North Carolina. He began work in the Missouri Conference of the M. E. Church in 1834 and was ordained deacon in 1837 and elder in 1839. Through the personal efforts of Bishop THOMAS A. MORRIS, he was transferred to the Iowa Conference in 1841 to establish the work in Iowa City. Here he formed the congregation, built a church and paid for it through donations raised by a preaching tour of the east. He took the lead in the establishment of "The Iowa City College" in 1842 and this extended under conference auspices until 1847. Two years at Dubuque were followed by seven years as PRESIDING ELDER of the Muscatine and Dubuque Districts. In 1851 he was assigned to the Linn Grove Circuit where in 1852 he initiated the founding in Mount Vernon of the "Iowa Conference Seminary" which became CORNELL COLLEGE in 1855. He obtained the land, let the contracts, raised the funds and supervised the construction of the first building. He is well called "the Father and Founder of Cornell College." Bowman Hall, built through his personal gift of $10,000, still serves as a residence hall. The great west window of the chapel, dedicated in 1882, is a memorial to his wife and four sons. In the same year, Cornell College conferred upon him an honorary D.D. Ill health forced his retirement in 1864. Moving to CALIFORNIA, he was transferred to the California Conference in 1867 and served five different churches until 1873. Preaching, Sunday school work and service on the Board of Control of the UNIVERSITY OF THE PACIFIC occupied his time until his death in San Jose on Oct. 9, 1888.

BOWMAN, THOMAS (1836-1923), American EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION bishop, born May 28, 1836 in PENNSYLVANIA. Converted at the age of eighteen, he became a member of the Evangelical Association and was licensed to preach in 1858, receiving his first trial pastorate in the East Pennsylvania Conference in 1859. He rapidly gained prominence by his outstanding ability as a pulpit orator and an evangelistic pastor, and for a time served as a PRESIDING ELDER.

He was elected bishop by the GENERAL CONFERENCE in 1875, and served in that capacity for forty years, retiring in 1915. During these years he served with distinction in various official capacities and attended the ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE in London as a representative of the Evangelical Association. He visited the European conferences many times and also the work in Asia. Wherever he went he was an inspiration and a blessing.

His strength was in the pulpit and especially at CAMP MEETINGS. With gripping eloquence he preached the gospel of salvation through Jesus Christ. He lived to witness the merger of the Evangelical Association and The United Evangelical Church, which was a great joy to him. His death occurred March 14, 1923.

He became assistant professor of modern languages at the last named institution in 1875, and the following year he was on the staff of The Independent. This was followed in 1879 by Studies in Theism, his first in the theological field. Thirteen other books were published, among them being Philosophy of Theism, The Principles of Ethics, The Christian Revelation, The Christian Life, The Atonement, and The Immanence of God. BOYCE, WILLIAM BINNINGTON (1803-1889), Wesleyan missionary in SOUTH AFRICA and AUSTRALIA and a General Secretary of the Wesleyan METHODIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY, was born at Beverley, Yorkshire, England on Nov. 9, 1803. He entered the ministry in 1829 and travelled in South Africa from 1830 to 1843. During this period he became the life-long friend of WILLIAM SHAW whose biography he was later to write (Memoir of the Rev. W. Shaw, London, 1874). He founded the Buntingville Mission in 1830. While living in the wilds, he discovered the "euphonic concord" which explained the etymological structure of the Xhosa language. He published the first Xhosa Grammar in 1834. When war broke out on the Frontier in 1834-5 he became advisor to the Governor, Sir Benjamin D'Urban, and acted as mediator with the Xhosa chiefs. His continuing political interest was revealed by his Notes on South African Affairs (London and Grahamstown, 1839).

After two years in Bolton, England (1843-45), he was sent to SYDNEY as General Superintendent of Wesleyan Missions in Australia. He prepared the ground for the Australasian Conference and presided over the first two sessions in 1855-56. Between 1858 and 1876 he was a general secretary of the W.M.M.S. in London. In this capacity he presided over the first Conference of Eastern British America (1861) and was associated with decisions which led eventually to the establishment of the South African Conference.

After his retirement to Sydney in 1876 he gave himself to preaching and writing. The Higher Criticism of the Bible (1881) was a conservative attack upon contemporary trends in biblical studies, while An Introduction to the Study of History (1884) revealed encyclopaedic knowledge and monumental diligence.

Boyce's intellectual and administrative gifts were outstanding. He was a man of decided opinions and disconcerting frankness, but nevertheless won the affection of those who served under him. He died at Toxteth, Sydney on March 8, 1889.

BOYD, GEORGE M. (1814-1890), American preacher, was born March 9, 1814, in Lewis Co., Ky. He was left an orphan when small and lived with an uncle at Urbana, Ohio. He was converted when sixteen and when twenty was licensed to preach. In 1835 he came to INDIANA and supplied Cassapolis Circuit. Admitted on trial into the INDIANA CONFERENCE in 1836, he served Fort Wayne station, and in 1843 was PRESIDING ELDER of the Fort Wayne District. When the NORTHWEST INDIANA CONFERENCE was organized in 1852 he was taken from the Crawfordsville District and sent to INDIANAPOLIS to organize the work and build a church. Of his fifty-two years of service, eight were on circuits, thirty-four in stations and ten as presiding elder. He was elected twice to GENERAL CONFERENCE. He married Martha E. Thorpe, Sept. 12, 1871. He retired in 1888 and lived in Valparaiso where he died Jan. 26, 1890.

BOZEMAN, MONTANA, U.S.A. First Church began in July, 1866, when W. W. Alderson and Matthew Bird, both local preachers, organized a Sunday school in Bozeman. The church was organized on Aug. 8, 1866, by A. M. Hough, superintendent of Montana Missions. A frame church was built during the winter of 1866-67, the first church in Bozeman. Chief Justice Hezekiah Hosmer of Montana held a two-weeks term of court in this building, and the 1868-69 term of school was held in it. Also in it Sheldon Jackson in 1872 organized the Bozeman Presbyterian Church. In 1870 the church secured its bell, now famous for having guided THOMAS C. ILIFF safely home through a blizzard in 1874. That was in the days of few roads and fewer fences in Montana, and Iliff, one cold winter Sunday after morning services in Bozeman, went to Middle Creek, some fifteen miles away, to officiate at a wedding that afternoon. Returning in a terrific blizzard, he and his team became lost, floundering in the blinding driving snow. As the evening congregation gathered, alarmed at finding no pastor at the church, they began to ring the bell, vigorously and continuously, with prayer, and Iliff, hearing the bell above the blizzard, guided his horses in the direction of its pealing and arrived safely at the church.

There have been additions and alterations since, but the sanctuary still is the same and is considered the oldest Methodist sanctuary in the state.

The Bozeman Church ministers to State College students and to skiers and has a strong music program. From this church Grace Clark went to Africa as a missionary, 1912-47.

The M. E. Church, South, began work in Bozeman in 1871 which developed into the Morton Memorial Church there. In 1911 Blair Sanitarium became Bozeman Deaconess Hospital. In 1956 plans began for Hillcrest, the two million dollar Methodist retirement home which opened its doors on Aug. 9, 1963.

ROBERT BAUR WEST

BRACKENBURY, ROBERT CARR (1752-1818), British Methodist, of Raithby Hall, Lincolnshire, was a man of wealth and talents, who held an unusual position in early Methodism. Educated at St. Catharine's College, Cambridge, he became one of WESLEY's preachers and traveled for forty years, but with a measure of independence allowed him by Wesley. An intimate friend of Wesley, Brackenbury helped to form many Methodist societies, especially in Portland and the Channel Islands, where he worked with ALEXANDER KILHAM and later ADAM CLARKE, having first gone to Jersey in December, 1783, in response to a call for a preacher who could speak French. During Wesley's last days, Brackenbury appears to have lived at CITY ROAD, where he was present at Wesley's deathbed.

SAMUEL BRADBURN

BRADBURN, SAMUEL (1751-1816), British Methodist, was born at GIBALTAR, the son of a soldier. He served as an itinerant preacher from 1774. An eloquent preacher, often called "the Demosthenes of Methodism," he was an ecclesiastical and political liberal who, according to ADAM CLARKE, was guilty of "the lowest Republicanism." Bradburn is said to have had considerable initial sympathy with ALEXANDER KILHAM's attempt to democratize Methodism before his expulsion in 1796. Bradburn's pamphlet, The Question, Are the Methodists Dissenters? Fairly Examined, was an important contribution to the debate. He was secretary of the Wesleyan Conference in 1796-98 and 1800; he was president in 1799. In 1802 he was censured by the Conference and suspended for a year because of his overindulgence in wine, though the incident occurred in the context of sickness and bereavement.

He was a passionate character, whose eccentric humor was proverbial.

He received the A.B. degree from BAKER UNIVERSITY in 1909, and its D.D. in 1943. He studied at Columbia (1911-12); at the Union Theological Seminary (B.D., 1912); and at the University of Chicago (Ph.D., 1926). He married Grace Eleanor McMurray on Oct. 24, 1911 (dec. Dr. Braden was ordained to the ministry of the M. E. Church in 1914. He went as a missionary to BOLIVIA before that in 1912, and served there until 1915. He served in CHILE from 1916 to 1922, editing El Heraldo Cristiano, and also serving as professor and president of the Union Theological Seminary at SANTIAGO and manager of the Union Book Store. He served at times as pastor of First Church, Santiago, and other churches. He was assistant secretary of the M. E. Board of Foreign Missions, and secretary of the Methodist Life Service Commission at the same time, with headquarters in Chicago from 1923-25. He taught in the department of Religion and Literature of Religions at NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY, as assistant, associate and full professor from 1926 until retirement in 1954, serving in the later years as chairman. He has been a frequent lecturer in Methodist Pastors' Schools.

BRADFORD, HENRY B. (1761-1843), American pioneer local preacher, friend of FRANCIS ASBURY, and leader in the establishment of the M. P. Church in NORTH CAROLINA, was the son of one of the early settlers in Halifax County, N. C. He was born on Dec. 4, 1761, and was a direct descendant of Governor William Bradford of the Plymouth Colony. His marriage to Sarah Crowell was performed by Francis Asbury on Jan. 1, 1782. He was ordained as a DEACON by Asbury at WHITAKER'S CHAPEL near Enfield in Halifax County, March 2, 1804. Asbury's Journal records accounts of visits in the Bradford home on several occasions during 1801-04, and in February, 1815. On Feb. 5, 1802, Asbury complimented Bradford's work as a preacher.

Bradford's Church, near Enfield, was established prior to 1800, largely through the efforts of Henry Bradford, who is credited with having given the land and helped to build the first church. Prior to the erection of the first structure, CAMP MEETINGS were held on the site with log huts used for lodging. The deed for the land, dated July 18, 1829, was made to Bradford, Benjamin Hunter and WILLIAM E. BELLAMY from Matt. C. Whitaker. Asbury and Bishop RICHARD WHATCOAT preached at Bradford's Church on Sun., March 15, 1801.

When the reform movement within the M. E. Church became active in the 1820's, Bradford early became identified with it. He joined the Roanoke Union Society in November, 1824. Bradford's Church was the scene for the fourth meeting of the Society on Oct. 4, 1825. In April 1828, Bradford was among a group of Methodist ministers summoned to trial for patronizing the publication, MUTUAL RIGHTS, and for being a member of the Roanoke Union Society. He was present at the organizational meeting of the NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE of the M. P. Church, which was held on Dec. 19-20, 1828, at Whitaker's Chapel. In 1829 Bradford was assigned to serve the Roanoke Circuit. In 1836 and 1854 the North Carolina Conference met at Bradford's Church. The church was closed about 1910.

RALPH HARDEE RIVES

JOSEPH BRADFORD

BRADFORD, JOSEPH (?-1808), British Methodist, was for much of his ministry JOHN WESLEY's traveling companion. Little is known of his early life, but he was accepted as an itinerant in 1773, and the Minutes for 1774-79 and 1787-89 record under the stations, "Joseph Bradford travels with Mr. Wesley." Between these dates he was in regular circuit work. Wesley had the highest regard for his piety and gifts, and in 1785 entrusted to him the farewell letter to be read to the Conference after his death.

Bradford transcribed Wesley's Journal, and was with him in his last illness and when he died. After Wesley's death he favored the establishment of provincial conferences. Bradford was president of the vital Conference of 1795 which adopted the PLAN OF PACIFICATION; he was president a second time in 1803. The curiously brief obituary in the Wesleyan Minutes for 1808 tells virtually nothing of his career. He died on May 28, 1808.

JOHN NEWTON

BRADFORD, England. In 1780 Bradford was a small town in the wapentake of Morley, with a population of some 8,800, many engaged in the cloth-dyeing trade. As a result of the Industrial Revolution, however, the population bounded to 29,794 in 1801, 149,543 in 1851, and 194,411 in 1911. Today, a cathedral city, in area the fifth and in population (298,220) the tenth largest city in England, Bradford is the center of the country's worsted manufacturing industry and of the world's wool trade.

Up to the First World War, Methodism grew as the town expanded; and although Methodism has declined since then, it still has a considerable effect on every aspect of the town's life. Membership grew steadily in the eighteenth century; there were a thousand members scattered over fifteen societies at the beginning of the nineteenth century. Chapels at Pudsey and Eccleshill supplemented the more famous OCTAGON, built to a favorite pattern of JOHN WESLEY's in 1766. Following several revival campaigns, notably that of 1805 under Alexander Suter and Stephen Wilson, the circuit membership had risen to nearly two thousand by 1807. In 1808 the town's first Sunday school, with 850 scholars and 160 teachers, was opened in a warehouse in Union Street. (Great Horton, two miles from the city center, claims the country's oldest Sunday school, dating from 1766.) In 1811 the Octagon was declared unsafe, and a new chapel, seating fourteen hundred and believed to be the largest in Methodism, was opened in the Kirkgate by CHARLES ATMORE and ROBERT NEWTON, the cost being £9,000.

In 1812 was founded at Woodhouse Grove near Apperley Bridge the Wesleyan Academy, for the education of the sons of preachers in the north of England. The first headmaster was the Rev. John Fennee, whose orphaned niece, Maria Branwell, was soon to meet and marry the visiting examiner in theology, the Rev. Patrick BRÖNTE, and to become the mother of a more famous family. (Woodhouse Grove School, no longer confined to ministers' sons, came under the board of management for Methodist residential schools in 1905.) The next few years saw the formation of the Woodhouse Grove Circuit, the Bradford Wesleyan Methodist Missionary Auxiliary, and Sunday schools at Baildon, Dudley Hill, Heaton, and Undercliffe, the forerunners of many others.

Meanwhile PRIMITIVE METHODISM was introduced to Bradford by pioneers from Barnsley. The poorer weavers responded; and in 1823 a circuit was formed with three ministers and over three hundred members, which nine years later entertained the Primitive Methodist Conference. Their first chapel, at Dudley Hill, has been preserved as a memorial institute attached to the present "Ebenezer," itself built in 1866. Another, on the Manchester Road, was succeeded first by "Providence" and finally by the Central Hall.

The expansion of Wesleyan Methodism under leaders like JOSEPH ENTWHISLE necessitated a new center; and in 1825 Eastbrook Chapel (cost £8,000) was opened by JABEZ BUNTING and ADAM CLARKE, who feared, however, that it was too far out of the town. In 1900 over a hundred thousand people lived in its vicinity—but by then, after years of splendid service, the chapel had become unsafe and had to be pulled down. Eastbrook became the head of a new circuit in 1835, and further circuits were soon formed at Great Horton (1842) and Manningham (1866). New chapels included White Abbey (1838) and Centenary (1839). Among ministers prominent at the time were W. J. SHREWSBURY, also famous as a missionary overseas, and W. W. Stamp.

The mid-century troubles of Wesleyan Methodism affected Bradford far less than they did, for instance, neighboring LEEDS. A small circuit of WESLEYAN REFORMERS was formed at Bridge Street in 1836, and after 1857 WESLEYAN REFORM UNION societies continued at such centers as Wibsey and Shipley, where they survive to this day. Other Wesleyan Reformers chose to join the METHODIST NEW CONNEXION, which was never very strong in Bradford; of the New Connexion's six chapels the largest was that of the Manville Society, whose magnificent building is now the Regional College of Art.

For all branches of Methodism the second half of the century was the great period of building, both of Sunday schools and of chapels. These ranged from the tiny "Egypt" in Thornton to the huge premises of "Wesley" at Great Horton, and included, in a total of more than a hundred, Girlington (1870), Thorp (1871), and Otley Road (1874) in the Wesleyan connection; Horton Bethel and Horton Bank among Primitive Methodist buildings; Salem (Methodist New Connexion), and Toller Lane (BIBLE CHRISTIAN). Much of the cost was borne by wealthy mill owners and other businessmen who also served as stewards and trustees and often taught in the schools and led men's classes. Special mention should be made of Sir Henry Mitchell, first freeman of Bradford and chief benefactor of St. John's Chapel, Manningham (1879), a noble building famous for its white marble pulpit, font, and reredos, and for being one of the chapels in which Wesley's version of Morning Prayer was still used after the Second World War. Unhappily, few of these chapels were adequately endowed, and after the Second World War the cost of their maintenance and repair proved too much for reduced congregations; Greenhill, Girlington, and even St. John's itself all had to close within the space of a few months in 1965-66.

The outstanding event in the early years of the twentieth century was the opening in 1904 of the Eastbrook Hall Mission on the site of the former Eastbrook Chapel. This was a somewhat delayed reaction to the pressure of the FORWARD MOVEMENT. The hall has played a conspicuous role in the spheres of religion and social work; renowned at first for its brotherhood movement and for what was pioneer youth work, its program now includes a club for teenage drug addicts, the oversight of a growing student population (Bradford having become a university town in the 1960's), and work among the thousands of Pakistani immigrants. The Central Hall of the Primitive Methodists exercised a complementary ministry in the shum areas adjoining the Manchester Road until its closing in 1956.

For Bradford the First World War was something of a watershed. Men's classes dwindled progressively. The Union of Methodism in 1932 was accepted with good will on the whole, and the process of rationalization, with amalgamation of circuits and societies, was set in motion. When the Methodist Conference met at Bradford in 1937 there were 17 circuits in the area with nearly 10,000 members, and just under 100 chapels with a seating capacity of 45,000. The city suffered little physical damage in the Second World War, but the drain of church members continued. In 1966 there were six Bradford circuits with a membership of about 6,500; they form part of the West Yorkshire District. Since 1945 the number of chapel buildings has been halved, and only a few glaring cases of redundancy remain. A new chapel was built at Undercliffe in 1954. In the center of the city a redevelopment program has created problems for the remaining inner-city churches, perhaps only to be solved by reunion schemes on an interdenominational scale. However, there are still many prominent Methodist laymen in Bradford, and Methodism is still a powerful religious force.

ANTONY PEPPER

BRADLEY, DAVID HENRY (1905-), American historian of the A.M.E. ZION CHURCH, was born in the small community of Franklin, Pa., Sept. 20, 1905, where his father, Daniel F. Bradley, was pastor at the time. Daniel F. was the son of an ex-slave named Peter, whose manumission papers are dated March 10, 1836. David's mother, Cora A. (Brewer) Bradley, was evidently the daughter of free parents as well, residents of central Pennsylvania.

David's early education was secured in various schools in PENNSYLVANIA and OHIO, as his father was assigned to churches in these areas. At his father's death, the family again took up residence in Bedford, Pa., where David completed high school. He then went to LIVINGSTONE COLLEGE, Salisbury, N. C., under a grant of the Job Mann Trust, a scholarship fund established for the training of prospective ministers. He graduated with honors from Livingstone in 1929, and began graduate studies at the University of Pittsburgh. In 1932 he was awarded the M.A. in history; his thesis was "The Federal Elections Bill of 1890," the last effort of the Republican Party to bring out the Negro vote of the South. He was then assigned to the church in Ridgewood, N. J., and transferred his studies to Washington Square College of New York, where he pursued studies leading to the Ph.D. degree.

Dr. Bradley began his ministry in the Allegheny Conference of his denomination, later transferring to the Ohio area, where he served churches for three years. He returned to the Allegheny Conference was assigned to Altoona, Pa., from where he accepted the chair of history at his Alma Mater. His service in Ridgewood followed, and he was pastor there for fourteen years, when he was elected Editor of the A.M.E. Zion Quarterly Review by the General Conference of 1948. He has been elected to his office by acclamation in every General Conference since.

In connection with his editorial work he became Assistant Secretary of Christian Education of his denomination by the Joint Boards of Christian Education, serving in this capacity until 1956, when the General Conference elected him to the office of Secretary of the A.M.E. Zion Historical Society in connection with the Review work.

During the years as Assistant Secretary of Christian Education, he headed the section of Administration and Leadership until the reorganization of the National Council of Churches, when the denomination likewise made changes. He represented his denomination in the old National Christian Teaching Mission and the Central Department of Educational Evangelism. He was also the A.M.E. Zion representative in the early days of the Protestant Film Commission and worked with the special group involved in the Cooperative Curriculum Development, an interchurch project.

In 1946 Dr. Bradley wrote a series of articles on the history of his denomination originally designed to be the foundation of his dissertation. In 1956 these papers were expanded into the first volume of a two-volume History of the A.M.E. Zion Church. The second volume was published in 1970. This is the first such production of the denomination in the past seventy-four years.

Dr. Bradley has been a member of the A.M.E. Zion General Conference since 1940. He is married to Harriette (Jackson) Bradley, and they have two children, Mrs. La Verne Findlay and David H. Bradley, Jr.

JOHN H. NESS, JR.

BRADLEY, JAMES A. (1830-1921), founder of Asbury Park and militant American reformer, was born of Roman Catholic parents at Rossville, S. I., N. Y., on Feb. 14, 1830 and died in New York City on June 6, 1921. His parents were poor, so the boy was apprenticed to a brush manufacturer. In 1857, he and his brother founded a brush making factory of their own. In 1870, he came to OCEAN GROVE, N. J. for a visit and observed that the land to the north and south was undeveloped. He purchased 500 acres to the north, named the place Asbury Park in honor of Bishop FRANCIS ASBURY whom he greatly admired, and sold lots only to those who subscribed to his temperance views. The beach was to be forever reserved for public use.

The Tercentenary Almanac of NEW JERSEY states that Bradley influenced the North Jersey Shore more than any other person. He was strongly opposed to the social life and behavior of Long Branch, N. J., whose summer residents, gathered around President U. S. GRANT, had given that resort a somewhat notorious reputation. Asbury Park was advertised as a Christian resort. Bradley had been president of the board of trustees of Central Church in BROOKLYN, and was for many years a Bible class teacher in the First Church of Asbury Park. In 1893 he was elected to the New Jersey state senate from Monmouth County, and in 1894 he cast the deciding vote on a bill outlawing bets on horse races. Bradley was not only militantly in favor of reforms, he was distinguished as a philanthropist. He left bequests to most of the churches in Asbury Park, to the Salvation Army, and to many hospitals, libraries and old people's homes in the North Jersey and metropolitan areas. Bradley Beach, built on the land which is south of Ocean Grove, was also founded by him.

BRAGG, GRACE L. (Mrs. J. D.) (1889-), the first president of the Woman's Division of Christian Service following the union of the three Methodisms in 1939. She was born Nov. 28, 1889, near Zanesville, Ohio, the daughter of B. Allen and Mercy (Jordan) Warne. She married John D. Bragg on March 11, 1911, and they have one son, Paul D. She early became a worker in the church and has been a member of the Kingshighway Methodist Church, St. Louis, since 1933. She has served as a trustee of SCARRITT COLLEGE, the United Christian College, China; Chosen College in Korea and Severance Hospital in SEOUL, KOREA. She was a member of the GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M. E. CHURCH in 1936, the UNITING CONFERENCE, 1939, and of The Methodist Church, 1940, '44, and '48; was a delegate to the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, Amsterdam, 1948. She was given the L.H.D. degree by Wesley College (Illinois), 1942, and by Wesleyan University (Illinois), in 1945.

Mrs. Bragg early achieved leadership in the Missionary Society of her Church, being the home base secretary, 1926-40. She was elected president of the Woman's Division of Christian Service in 1940, and served for eight years in that capacity. This also carried with it the vice-presidency of the Board of Missions and Church Extension of The Methodist Church. She belonged to the Home Missions Council of North America and was its president from 1947-48. Also she served on the old FEDERAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. Upon retirement she resides in the Ozark Methodist Manor at Marionville, Missouri.

JOHN W. BRANSCOMB

BRANSCOMB, JOHN W. (1905-1959), American bishop, was born at Union Springs, Ala., on May 11, 1905. He was graduated from Oglethorpe and Emory Universities at Atlanta, Ga. and received honorary doctorates in divinity and laws from EMORY UNIVERSITY, FLORIDA SOUTHERN COLLEGE, and BETHUNE-COOKMAN COLLEGE.

He became a member of the FLORIDA CONFERENCE in 1928 and was appointed to Boca Grande. His other pastoral assignments were St. Petersburg; Arcadia; First Church at Tampa; and First Church at Orlando. Under his administration the church at Orlando made such progress that it was featured in an article in the Christian Century as one of the great churches of the nation. He was elected bishop in 1952, and his episcopal assignment was to FLORIDA and CUBA.

Bishop Branscomb was a very able promoter of all causes dear to him. He greatly helped Cuban Methodism during his tenure by making the Florida Conference aware of the needs in Cuba, and in obtaining financial assistance for the Cuban churches in pre-Castro times. Afterwards, the Florida Conference proved to be a great help for refugees from Cuba.

Somewhat short in stature, John Branscomb was blessed with a resonant, commanding voice, and had an optimistic and outgoing personality which won friends for him everywhere. He was deep in the affections of Florida Methodism. His Conference elected him as a member of the General and Jurisdictional Conferences of 1940, '44, '48, and '52. In 1958 he was sent by the COUNCIL OF BISHOPS on a visitation tour to South America. He suffered a heart attack while there and died sometime later, after returning to Jacksonville, Fla., on Jan. 16, 1959.

BRANSCOMB, LEWIS CAPERS (1865-1930), American clergyman, was born at Union Springs, Ala., on Aug. 27, 1865, and was educated at Southern University and Emory College and received the honorary D.D. degree from the latter. He was ordained to the ministry of the M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH, in 1886, and for a quarter of a century served pastorates in the NORTH ALABAMA CONFERENCE. From 1912 to 1916 he was presiding elder of the Birmingham district and then for six years was editor of the Alabama Christian Advocate. He was pastor at First Church in Anniston from 1922 to 1927, and First Church in Gadsden in 1928, when he became PRESIDING ELDER of the Bessemer district.

Branscomb was a member of four General Conferences and was secretary of that body for many years. He was a member of the Commission on the Unification of American Methodism, the executive committee of the FEDERAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES of Christ in America, the Book Committee and several other important organizations.

Branscomb made his home in Birmingham in later life and died there on Oct. 30, 1930.

He was elected bishop of The Methodist Church at the North Central Jurisdictional Conference in 1944 and assigned to the DES MOINES Area, where he served from 1944 to 1952, then going to the CHICAGO Area, 1952-64, when he retired.

He served as a delegate to the General Conferences of 1928 and 1932, M. E. Church, and of The Methodist Church in 1940 and 1944. As bishop and representative of the COUNCIL OF BISHOPS he attended the 1949 session of the South Asia Central Conference, and was a delegate to the Second Assembly of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES at Evanston, Ill. in 1954. BRASHER SPRINGS CAMP MEETING. (See GALLANT, ALABAMA, Brasher Springs Camp Meeting.)

BRASILIA, Brazil. The idea of an interior capital for BRAZIL for reasons of defense as well as of stimulating the development of the country's hinterland dates from the country's independence in 1822. But though written into the constitution, it was a dead letter until 1955 when President Juscelino de Oliveira Kubitschek insisted on its fulfillment.

Brasilia proper is surrounded by five or six "satellite towns," the first of which was the Cidade Livre (Free City). As there were no funds for starting Methodist work, Bishop ISAIAS SUCASAS of the Third Region borrowed money from Central Methodist Church in SAO PAULO, and proceeded to the Free City, there to implant Methodism. The government had made land available for Catholics and Protestants alike; so Bishop Sucasas staked out the allotted territory, and with his own hands helped build a frame structure which was to serve temporarily as chapel, Sunday school, and day school. On April 29, 1957, he held the first Methodist service there, following it on May 5 with the first Sunday school. This took place before the celebration of the first Roman Catholic mass in the city, though the Baptists had already built a small chapel and had a primary school going.

The bishop's wife, Dona Jacira Sucasas, had been invited by Dona Zaida Guerra, general agent of the Voz Missionaria (official women's magazine), to attend the inaugural celebration and mass as official representative of the magazine. Dona Jacira flew to Brasilia with copies of the Voz and other Methodist literature. Within a few minutes the cardinal, Dom Carmelo, walked off another plane holding in his arms an image of Our Lady of the Aparecida—a blackened image that had been fished up years before from a river and named patroness of Brazil, and was now to be named Brasilia's "godmother." When the mass ended, Dona Jacira gave part of her load to a boy helper, pushed through the crowd to the front where the officials stood, and began distributing the magazines, even leaving a copy of the Voz in the hands of the cardinal. In a few minutes her supply was exhausted and the crowd was asking for more.

Bishop Sucasas returned to São Paulo, leaving a layman in charge as teacher-evangelist. The following year he appointed a regular minister, Antonio Mendes, who remained throughout 1960.

On April 21, 1960, when Brasilia was officially inaugurated, Methodist work had already spread to the nearby satellite town of Taguatinga, where Deaconess Ruth Prates went to direct Sunday school and other activities. In 1961 Almir Pereira Bahia was sent to Brasilia proper; and in 1962 another deaconess, Iatiára Sucasas, the bishop's niece, went to work in the Free City's kindergarten. Under Bahia's leadership a frame chapel was erected in Brasilia, on government-donated land. He also obtained lots in the satellite towns of Taguatinga, Cama, and Sobradinho. In 1966 programs of visitation, literacy, hygiene, nurses training, and Bible classes were being carried out in these places by graduates of the Instituto Metodista in São Paulo.

With the arrival in September 1962, of John R. Martin and family, the work in Taguatinga was consolidated and new centers opened. A master plan with blueprint for Brasilia proper was made by a young Methodist architect, Silas Raposo, which includes the temple itself, to seat 800, a parsonage, an educational building with offices and apartments for deaconesses and custodian, rooms for the choir and Board of Stewards, a nursery, kindergarten and primary space, ladies' parlor, dining room, and field and dressing rooms for basketball and volleyball players. The educational edifice, now in use, was completed with the financial aid of the Florida Annual Conference, the Woman's Society of Christian Service, and other miscellaneous gifts from the U.S.A. It will be some years before the entire plan can be completed.

The Kenneth Traxlers served Central Church in Brasilia for two years, but family illness forced their return to the United States. At the General Conference in 1965, CHARLES W. CLAY, who had been for fifteen years Secretary of the Board of Christian Education, was appointed to Brasilia.

Brasilia is considered a missionary field to be supported by the six conferences of the Methodist Church in Brazil, and by donations from Advance Specials and other gifts in the U.S.A.

BRAY, JAMES ALBERT (? -1944), a bishop of the Colored Methodist Episcopal Church (now CHRISTIAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH), was born at Carnesville, Ga.

He received the A.B. and M.A. degrees from Atlanta University and did post-graduate work at Harvard and Chicago Universities. Bishop Bray was ordained deacon in 1900 and elder in 1901. He served as a pastor in GEORGIA, president of LANE COLLEGE and MILES COLLEGE, and a PRESIDING ELDER in ALABAMA. In 1914, he was elected General Secretary of Education where he served for twenty years. At this time, he was instrumental in securing large contributions for the colleges owned by his denomination. He also obtained the help of the M. E. Church, South, for the promotion of Leadership Training Schools throughout the church. At the General Conference in 1934, he was elected to the office of bishop. Bishop Bray was the author of numerous tracts. He died on Sept. 1, 1944, in Little Rock, Ark., and was buried in Chicago.

BRAY, JOHN, British layman, referred to in CHARLES WESLEY's Journal as a "poor, ignorant mechanic, who knows nothing but Christ; yet, by knowing him, knows and discerns all things." On May 11, 1738, Charles Wesley, a very sick man, went to live with Bray and his wife in Little Britain, and there Charles Wesley's evangelical conversion took place. On May 24, 1738, JOHN WESLEY went there immediately after his ALDERSGATE experience. Both the Wesleys when in London lived with the Brays until late in 1739. PETER BOHLER had formed a society to which the Wesleys and the Brays belonged; and when Böhler left England for America, Bray acted in his stead. When the Wesleys, opposed to the doctrine of "stillness" inculcated by some of the Moravian members, withdrew, Bray remained, though he never formally joined the Moravian Church. Of the closing years of Bray's life nothing is known.

BRAY, WILLIAM ("BILLY") (1794-1868), Cornish miner and BIBLE CHRISTIAN LOCAL PREACHER, was born at Twelveheads, near Truro, on June 1, 1794. Drunken and dissolute until his conversion at twenty-eight, he thereafter led a saintly, self-sacrificing life. His joyful and unconventional preaching and the marvelous efficacy of his prayers made him celebrated, and his picturesque sayings are legendary: "God's word is as good as ready money," on visiting a landowner; "I am the son of a King, and I shall go in frontways." He built six chapels, either with his own hands or by irresistible appeals. He died at Twelveheads, May 25, 1868, and was buried at Balldhu.

BRAZIL. The opening to the world in 1808 of Brazilian ports also marked their opening to the gospel. Up to then Brazil had been barricaded behind a wall that made it almost impossible for anyone to land there who did not serve either the crown of Portugal or the Roman Catholic Church. As late as 1800 the scientist Humboldt was not allowed to visit Brazil for fear that he might infect the minds of the people with "new ideas and false principles." The opening of the ports also opened to merchants, sea captains, and travelers an opportunity to see the conditions of ignorance, illiteracy, and immorality in a people for whom little or nothing had been done in the way of preaching the gospel. Bible societies in England and the U.S.A. began sending their books; churches began studying the possibility of sending missionaries.

And so it was that when the TENNESSEE CONFERENCE of the M. E. CHURCH met in 1835, Bishop JAMES O. ANDREW asked FOUNTAIN E. PITTS of the NASHVILLE station to go to Brazil, ARGENTINA, and URUGUAY to survey opportunities for Methodist work. Pitts, after raising funds to defray his expenses, sailed for Brazil, arriving in RIO DE JANEIRO on Aug. 19, 1835. There he organized a Methodist society among English-speaking persons; then he proceeded to BUENOS AIRES and MONTEVIDEO, returning to the U.S.A. in the spring of 1836.

Upon Pitts' recommendation to open work, JUSTIN SPAULDING was sent to Brazil almost immediately. In Rio de Janeiro he organized a congregation of forty, all English-speaking; and a few months later a Sunday school of thirty, including some Brazilians. In November 1839, the church sent DANIEL P. KIDDER and his wife Cynthia, R. McMurdy, a teacher, and Marcella Russell, also a teacher. The last two were soon married.

Kidder traveled extensively in areas around Rio de Janeiro, to the state of SAO PAULO, and by ship as far north as Pará. He distributed Scriptures, surveyed the ground, and took copious notes on all he did and observed. But in 1840, having lost his wife, presumably with yellow fever, he returned to the U.S.A. with his two children, one an infant in arms. Sickness and discouragement struck at the others also, and only Spaulding stayed through 1841, when the Missionary Society recalled him and closed its South American mission.

Yet brief as it was, the Spaulding-Kidder Mission stirred the Roman Catholic clergy to bitter attack. With cutting, insulting words, a Catholic priest wrote: "These so-called missionaries have been two years with us, . . . scattering false truncated Bibles and inviting the people to join the Methodist sect, of all Protestants the most turbulent, fanatic, hypocritical and ignorant." Thus ended the first Methodist mission to Brazil. Daniel Kidder, upon his return, wrote two books which helped keep up interest in Brazil—one entitled Reminiscences of Trips and Residence in Brazil, which was published in two volumes, and Brazil and the Brazilians, in collaboration with a Presbyterian missionary, J. G. Fletcher.

For over a quarter of a century, Methodism's voice was not raised in Brazil. In the U.S.A. itself, the debates over slavery and abolition were breaking down the church's incipient participation in foreign missions. With the 1844 division, the bitterness caused by the Civil War, and the impoverishment of the Southern Church, no effort was made to reopen the work.

In the years 1865-67, hundreds of southern Confederates, unwilling to pledge allegiance to the new government or to live under what they considered injustice, emigrated to Brazil, among them farmers, teachers, dentists, and preachers. One of these was JUNIUS E. NEWMAN, of the ALABAMA CONFERENCE, who arrived in Rio de Janeiro in 1867, authorized by Bishop W. M. WIGHTMAN to organize Methodist work among his American countrymen. From Rio Newman moved to Salinho, an area between Limeira and Vila Americana, in the then Province of São Paulo, where most of the exiles had settled.

Newman began preaching regularly in English in Salinho, and in August 1871 he organized the first Methodist church in Brazil. Later his two daughters, Mary and Annie, opened a small school in the town of PIRACICABA, which became the forerunner of the Colegio Piracicabano, now the Instituto Educacional de Piracicaba.

But Newman was not content. Observing the religious needs of Brazil, he pled fervently with the M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH to send out missionaries. The GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1874 responded, deciding to establish a mission, and in 1876 sent out J. J. RANSOM of the Tennessee Conference. He was followed in 1881 by JAMES L. KENNEDY, JAMES W. KOGER and wife, and MARTHA WATTS for educational work.

About this same time WILLIAM TAYLOR, later bishop of the M. E. Church, also became interested in starting work in South America, and on the principle of self-support he sent to the northeast and Amazon areas of Brazil what he termed "some very strong men." Among these were JUSTUS H. NELSON and GEORGE B. NIND. Due to discouragement, disease, and death, these missions did not prove permanent, although Nelson alone labored on for forty-six years.

Another M. E. mission, originating in Argentina and Uruguay, moved across the Uruguayan border into south Brazil, and started work there in 1855, under the direction of João Corrêa, a Brazilian who also founded an evangelical school which was the forerunner of the present-day Colegio Americano. This work, however, was transferred in 1899 to the M. E. Church, South, already working in Brazil.

The latter, taking in the states of Rio de Janeiro, São Paulo, and Minas Gerais, was now expanding so that in July 1886, Bishop JOHN C. GRANBERY came to Brazil, bringing with him his daughter Ella and another missionary, HUGH C. TUCKER. On Sept. 16, 1886, he organized the first Brazil Annual Conference, with three members—J. L. Kennedy, JOHN W. TARBOUTX, and H. C. TUCKER, who became known as the "Golden Trio." This conference was unique in being the smallest ever organized anywhere in Methodism. Ransom was not included because a few months previously he had resigned from the field.

Because Junius E. Newman organized the first work that proved continuous, he is now regarded as the founder of Brazilian Methodism, and the date of his arrival in Brazil—August, 1867—was designated, though not unanimously, by a committee as that of its founding. Of him, J. J. Ransom wrote: "J. E. Newman, from all we can gather, was the person who was most instrumental in getting our dear Church to begin anew its proclamation of the blessed Gospel in Brazil."

From then on there was a gradual but steady growth of the Methodist Church, despite financial difficulties, persecution, and tragic loss of personnel due to yellow fever. The mother church carried the big end of the financial support, especially the building of churches and schools, but the Brazilian church was never parasitic.

In the earliest days the matter of self-support was seriously considered and accepted as a goal. In January, 1885, at a missionary meeting in Piracicaba, it was stated: "The evangelization of Brazil will depend ultimately more on converted Brazilians than on missions supported by the Mother Church." In October, 1886, soon after organization of the Brazil Conference, James L. Kennedy wrote in a letter home: "The principal problem now absorbing our attention is that of self-support, self-proclamation, and self-government." At nearly every session of the annual conference, the topic was brought up and discussed.

Self-proclamation began with the enlistment of national preachers, the first three being the brothers, BERNARDO and LUDGERO MIRANDA, and FELIPE DE CARVALHO, in the middle 1880's.

Self-government soon became a concern and a problem. In those days bishops came from the U.S.A. to supervise the work, preside over the conferences, and ordain deacons and ministers. They stayed a short time, never learned the language well, if at all, so that all communications had to be through interpreters which made procedures lengthy and subject to misunderstandings by both parties. Moreover, the bishops did not come under certain conditions, as during the first World War, when submarines off the Brazilian coast made travel dangerous.

In 1909 the annual conference moved to ask the COLLEGE OF BISHOPS to consider the matter of having a bishop fix residence in Brazil. This was not done, but in 1917 Bishop JOHN M. MOORE stayed six months on the field. In 1916 JOAO E. TAVERES, in the bishop's absence, became the first Brazilian to preside over the conference. By 1918 the original annual conference had been divided into two.

As the years passed and the young church matured, and their preachers were better trained, the need arose for self-government or autonomy. Some of the missionaries and bishops opposed the movement. "I firmly believe," declared Bishop JAMES CANNON, "that Methodism will render a more effective service in the world as a great Christian fraternity than as separate churches in each nation."

But the movement was a natural, democratic, Christian step forward, and in September 1930, the Methodist Church of Brazil was proclaimed autonomous and organized into three conferences.

A retired pioneer missionary, John W. Tarboutx, was elected bishop of the autonomous church, and five years later CESAR DACORSO was elected the first Brazilian bishop. As a connecting link between the Methodist churches of Brazil and the U.S.A., a council of nationals and missionaries was created.

In 1955 the Northern and Central conferences were renamed regions, making then a total of five. A further modification took place in 1965, when a sixth region was created, leading to the election of four new bishops—NATHANAELO DO NASCIMENTO, OSVALDO DIAS DA SILVA, ALMIR DOS SANTOS, and WILBUR K. SMITH, a second generation missionary and the only American elected.

The First Ecclesiastical Region harked back to the first annual conference in Rio de Janeiro in 1886, and now includes the state of Guanabara (the new name of what was the Federal District when the nation's capital was moved to Brasília) and the state of Rio de Janeiro. The Second Region includes the territory of the old Southern conference, originally occupied by the M. E. Church as an extension of their work in the River Plate, and afterwards turned over to the M. E. Church, South. This is the state of Rio Grande do Sul. The Third Region centers in the city of São Paulo and the coastal area of that state, which was a part of the old Central conference. The Fourth Region was the rest of the old Northern conference and presently includes also the states of Espírito Santo and Baía, and most of the state of Minas Gerais. The Fifth Region includes the remainder of the former Central conference and of the state of São Paulo, the states of Mato Grosso and Goiás, and what is called the Minas Gerais Triangulo (Triangle). The Sixth, created by the General Conference of 1965, includes the Southern states of Paraná and Santa Catarina.

Autonomy offered the church inspiration and a tremendous challenge. Except for some very large needs—such as a publishing house with modern machinery, a school building, or the opening of an important new mission like BRASÍLIA—the church has supported its work in a splendid way. Even before autonomy it had demonstrated its missionary fervor by sending contributions for the work in Africa then being started by Bishop WALTER R. LAMBUTH. It also sent to Portugal, the mother country, first an evangelist, HIPÓLITO DE CAMPOS, and later a missionary couple; and it sent a missionary doctor, Nelson de Araujo, for medical work among the Caiú Indians. Today the church in Brazil cooperates with others in supporting a Mexican missionary couple to work among Indians of Ecuador.

Methodism has expanded both north and south of its original confines. Its membership, not counting some 16,000 baptized children, is nearly 50,000, and over 44,000 call themselves adherents, though not yet professing members. During the quinquennium of 1960-65, 17,000 members were received on profession of faith—an average of ten members a day.

The church maintains forty-five parochial schools in addition to fifteen government accredited educational institutions, which together touch the lives of around 20,000 students. The theological seminary in Rudge Ramos, near São Paulo, in 1966 had the greatest number of men ever enrolled for ministerial training. In the last five years eighty-nine graduates entered the active ministry, raising the total number of pastors to 201, including thirty-six missionaries. In addition to the theological seminary, there are two Bible schools—the Seminario Cesar Dacorso Filho in Rio de Janeiro and the Instituto João Wesley in Porto Alegre.

The efforts Methodists have always made to stamp out illiteracy and encourage education among their own members were recently proven in a survey made in a large city of the state of São Paulo—no illiterates were found in this group, and in all the homes visited there was at least one Bible, one hymnal, and the official organ of the church.

The Instituto Metodista in Santo Amaro, a suburb of São Paulo, which has been a training school for deaconesses and full-time church workers, has now become co-educational. It increased its goals in 1966 to include courses in sacred music and religious journalism, and periods of short intensive studies for laymen and church officers.

There are almost 1,200 preaching points in the Methodist Church in Brazil—662 are regular chapels or "temples." A new one has been built every two weeks during the past five years.

Medical clinics, food distribution, and literacy classes for adults are carried on on local and conference levels. There are three homes for children and a fourth under construction, four small homes for the aging, and several rural service centers, such as the Instituto Rural Dawsey.

In Savador, state of Baía, a German deaconess runs the clinic. Both German and Canadian missionaries now work in the Methodist Church of Brazil, as well as former EVANGELICAL UNITED BRETHREN since union in 1968.

The Methodist Church of Brazil has perhaps the highest grade Methodist publications in any country outside the United States—nine in all, including the Upper Room, the Expositor Cristão (Official organ), and magazines for men, women, youth, and children. Subscriptions, which total over 93,000, mean a readership of at least 300,000. The Methodist publishing house, IMPRENSA METODISTA, built with financial aid from the U.S.A., has increased production of Christian literature over 300 percent in ten years.

In several cities Methodists have regular hours for broadcasting. In São Paulo, under the leadership of the late Joel J. de Mello, a radio station, Cometa, was bought especially to broadcast evangelical programs. These have proved fruitful and popular, especially in hospitals.

From almost the beginning, considering Brazilian customs and traditions, women have played an important role in the church. When one recalls that even in the U.S.A. Methodist bishops would not commission the first women missionaries, Brazilian women have done extremely well. It was in 1909, at the twenty-fourth session of the Brazil Annual Conference, that women missionaries were invited to sit within the limits of the conference delegates to present their reports. By 1918 the conference had unanimously passed a law giving them lay rights.

The first "Ladies Aid Society" in Brazil was organized by the James L. Kennedys on July 5, 1885, in Catete Church, Rio de Janeiro, and it was affiliated with the Women's Missionary Societies in the United States. Local-aid societies were organized in most churches, but it was in April, 1916, that a conference society was formed under the leadership of LAVONA GLENN, with the help of James L. Kennedy. This was followed by conference societies in the other areas. Today there are over 407 Methodist women's societies with a membership of around 12,000.

Besides direct help to their local churches, women have worked on a conference basis to establish homes for children and the elderly, medical clinics, and other social services. They have helped support medical work among Indians of Brazil and have contributed toward the support of Latin American missionaries in other countries (BOLÍVIA). In September 1930, women founded a quarterly magazine, Voz Missionaria, which has by far the largest circulation of Methodist periodicals.

Brazilian women have occupied places of leadership in Methodist schools and churches, and several now head educational institutions for girls. Some of the women, like OTTILIA DE O. CHAVES, have held positions of importance, such as president of the WORLD FEDERATION OF METHODIST WOMEN, as delegate to the International Missionary Conference in Madras, and as chairman of the legislative committee of the Methodist Church of Brazil. Others have been editors of the women's and children's magazines, and some have won political positions.

On the deficit side, however, the church at its late General Conference reported some serious problems. First, a decrease in the number of its Sunday school students, and in the membership of its youth societies. The youth problem is found in every country, but in Brazil recent domestic turmoil, political instability, social and economic revolution, and the world ferment in general have involved youth in a new evaluation of the church's goals and methods. This, rightly or wrongly, has resulted in defection of some who consider the position of the church antiquated and irrelevant. On the other side, some youths' liberal, near-leftist position has led to criticism by the more conservative elements.

There has also been a decrease in subscriptions to church papers, despite their fine quality. Without a doubt, part of this decrease can be rightly attributed to the galloping inflation which has struck extremely hard at the middle classes which would subscribe to the periodicals. There is encouragement, however, in that after a long period of instability, the publications are now firmly established financially and do not depend on outside aid.

Finally, in 1966-67 a strong Pentecostal influence (glossolalia and the outpouring of the Holy Spirit elements) split many churches, especially in the First Region, causing the defection of some 700 members and six pastors.

The General Conference of 1965 was epochal in many ways. Two bishops were reelected and four new ones elected—twice the previous number. The conference also revised the constitution, changed from two orders of the ministry to one, created an order of full-time lay workers, and established a separate and permanent Ecumenical Commission, and another to draw up a new Liturgy and a church calendar. It also voted to elect bishops for life, with certain safeguards, reversing the original five-year tenure voted in 1930.

Some of the goals as expounded in the Bishops' pastoral letter are: (1) to achieve a membership of 70,000 by 1970; (2) to make a permanent effort to enlist youth and laymen in a voluntary sacrificial year of service in behalf of a better Brazil—a plan to be named "Christ's Volunteers in the Country's Service"; (3) to study the question of family planning as a means of controlling the population explosion, considered the highest in the world today, since forty percent of Brazil's population in 1966 was fifteen years of age and under; (4) to urge parents to strive for their children's higher education; (5) to encourage Methodists to active and conscientious participation in public service and in the political life of their country; (6) to reinterpret and define the message and mission of Methodism not only for Brazil but for the world of today.

The Evangelical United Brethren Church had work in Brazil for several years. In August 1949 the Executive Committee of the Board of Missions of that church voted "to enter into negotiations" with the Evangelical Union of South America (London) and the Union of Evangelical, Congregational and Christian Churches of Brazil "with the hope of establishing a joint program in which we would share the privilege and responsibility for this rapidly expanding and fruitful missionary work." Through the initiation of work by Rev. and Mrs. A. W. Archibald, who served in Brazil for several years, and the assistance of Rev. and Mrs. James Hough (both couples appointed in 1950), a ministry of evangelism, community development and education was begun in Goiaz. Since those early days these programs have developed to include literacy and literature distribution, theological education, and curriculum development. With fourteen missionaries related to the Brazilian Methodist Church from the co-operating denominations, the mission continues to meet human need, physically, mentally, and spiritually.

Free Methodist Church. In 1928 the Church in JAPAN reluctantly released Daniel Nishizumi for missionary work in Brazil. He came to Brazil at his own expense and supported himself by teaching. Other Japanese laymen and ministers felt called to Brazil. The first Free Methodist church in Brazil was organized in 1936.

World War II interfered with plans of the American church to assist in the Brazil missionary work, but in the spring of 1946, the president of the Commission on Missions and the General Missionary Secretary visited this country. Day schools as well as Sunday schools were being operated in several Japanese settlements. Plans were made to send missionaries to São Paulo and establish Free Methodist Mission headquarters there. The first missionaries from the United States arrived in 1946.

This field is characterized by the active participation of laymen in the evangelistic program of the church. There is much emphasis on education. The conference is operating an excellent primary school with an enrollment of 180 children. A Bible School and Seminary is located in São Paulo, with both missionary and national instructors on the staff. Several churches sponsor gospel radio broadcasts.

Late reports show twenty organized churches and fifty-one preaching points. The Brazilian work is organized as two separate conferences. The Japanese-speaking churches form the Nikkei Conference while the Portuguese-speaking Brazilian churches constitute the Paulista Conference. Free Methodism claims a membership of almost 2,000.

Publications. Bem-Te-Vi, a magazine for children of the Methodist Church of Brazil, the title being the name of a favorite bird in that country. Founded in 1922 by LILLA EPPS, it superseded O Juvenil, which had run continuously since Jan. 1, 1895. Miss Epps, the first editor, was a missionary of the Woman's Board of Foreign Missions of the M. E. Church, South, who had been named to help promote literature for the Methodist women and children of Brazil.

The magazine has become very popular. its influence extending beyond the confines of the Methodist Church, and it has been a factor in creating interest in the field of children's literature in that country. In 1967 the magazine was divided into two editions—one for children 6-8, the other for children 9-12, and Church School lessons were added to the regular features. Publication is under the direction of the General Commission of Periodicals, with editorial offices in São Paulo. Since 1927, by government decree, all editors must be Brazilian.

Cruz de Malta (The Maltese Cross), a youth publication of the Methodist Church of Brazil, was founded in 1929 by JAMES E. ELLIS, as a quarterly magazine to carry program material and articles of interest for the youth fellowships, then called EPWORTH LEAGUES. In 1936 it became a monthly and began challenging the creative spirit of Brazilian Methodist youth who were invited to contribute articles, poems, news, drawings. As many as two thousand a year did so.

The magazine has been the training ground for outstanding laymen in Brazil, such as Claudius Cecon, one of Brazil's leading cartoonists, and Delri Barroso, whose art work hangs in the United Church Center, New York, and WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES headquarters in GENEVA, SWITZERLAND.

The magazine has been influential in urging a liberal interpretation of the social doctrine of the Church in seeking Christian solutions for the life and needs of Brazil. In 1967 church school curriculum was added, broadening the scope and reach of the publication.

Like other Methodist publications in Brazil, Cruz de Malta is under the direction of the General Commission of Periodicals, Caixa Postal 8816, São Paulo, S.P., Brazil.

Em Marcha (On the March) is a 64-page quarterly magazine created to give impetus to laity in mission in church and world. It was founded in 1946 by CHARLES W. CLAY, then secretary of the Board of Christian Education of the Methodist Church of Brazil.

In 1967 church school curriculum material was added to its regular features, and this increased subscriptions to over 20,000. It is one of the outstanding Protestant publications in Brazil, its influence extending beyond the subscription list.

Expositor Cristão (Christian Expositor) is the official weekly organ of the Methodist Church of Brazil. Its precursor was the Metodista Católica, which began as a fortnightly in January 1886, by J. J. Ransom. In August 1887, on the recommendation of the annual conference, the name was changed to Expositor Cristão, under which it continues. In the last decades all editors have been Brazilian Methodist preachers.

In 1961 it became one of the Methodist periodicals under the direction of the General Commission of Periodicals of the Methodist Church of Brazil, and until 1968 under the managership of WILLIAM R. SCHISLER, JR. The format is that of a religious weekly, and it contains twelve pages of informative, inspirational, and evangelistic items. As the official organ of the Methodist Church of Brazil, it publishes the church's official declarations, episcopal reports, et cetera.

O Juvenil (The Juvenile), is a Methodist children's magazine founded in Rio de Janeiro, July 1894. It was to carry stories and the International Sunday School lessons, up to that time published in the official weekly, the Expositor Cristão.

At first the editor of O Juvenil was the same as the editor of the Expositor Cristão. In 1895, however, J. M. LANDER was named as editor. By 1919 the Board of Publications reported a subscription list of 3,100, exceptional for that time. O Juvenil ceased to exist in 1923, when Leila Epps founded a new magazine called the Bem-Te-Vi, which continues as the official Methodist children's magazine.

ISNARD ROCHA

Metodista Católico (The Catholic Methodist), Brazilian Methodist's first venture into religious journalism, was founded by J. J. Ransom, first missionary of the M. E. Church, South in Brazil. The first issue was dated Jan. 1, 1886. Started as a fortnightly, it was occasionally issued as a weekly and carried the Sunday school lessons for adults and children. When Ransom withdrew from Brazil in August 1886, James L. Kennedy became editor. In August 1887, on the recommendation of the Brazil Annual Conference, the paper's name was changed to Expositor Cristão, under which name it continues to this day.

BREEDEN, HENRY (1804-1878), British Methodist, was born at Southwell, Nottinghamshire, on Aug. 11, 1804. He joined the ARMINIAN METHODISTS in Derby on their secession from Wesleyan Methodism in 1832, and became their minister, joining the WESLEYAN METHODIST ASSOCIATION when the two groups amalgamated in 1837. He was a successful evangelist, and held several offices in the church, being president of the Arminian Methodists from 1833 to 1835, and president of the Wesleyan Methodist Association Assembly in 1848. He died in Leeds on Nov. 24, 1878.

BREMEN, Germany, with more than 600,000 people, was originally founded as a bishopric in A.D. 787; from here Ansgar went forth as the "Apostle of North" (Scandinavia). The Lutheran Church of the Reformation in Bremen became strongly influenced by Calvinism later on. A certain inbred ecumenicity of this city, as well as its 1848 revolutionary legislation favorable to religious liberty, caused LUDWIG S. JACOBY to make Bremen the bridgehead of Episcopal Methodism in GERMANY and SWITZERLAND when in 1849 he had the choice between Bremen and Hamburg. His first divine service, on Dec. 23, 1849, in the guild hall of merchants was attended by 400 people. The founding of a local church was officially consolidated on May 21, 1850, when the first circuit conference was held.

From Bremen, where Jacoby had his headquarters as superintendent, the work spread throughout Germany and Switzerland. In 1852 the first of Bremen chapels was built. Then a publishing house and a printing shop followed, and a theological school was begun. When Bremen in 1944 was severely hit by bombing, all Methodist church property was destroyed. By 1949 the new Church of the Redeemer, in memory of the beginnings at Bremen a hundred years before, was finished and dedicated by Bishop J. W. E. SOMMER. There are now three circuits and churches of the United Methodist Church and a very modern institute for aged people in connection with the Church of the Redeemer.

BRESEE, PHINEAS FRANKLIN (1838-1915), American minister and later founder of the CHURCH OF THE NAZARENE in CALIFORNIA, was born in Franklin, Delaware Co., N. Y., Dec. 31, 1838, the second child of Phineas P.

and Susan (Brown) Bresee, both earnest Christians and members of the M. E. CHURCH. Young Bresee's early education was intermittent due to the demands of the family farm, but he attended an academy at Oneonta and later studied at Franklin Institute. Converted in a Methodist revival in 1855, Bresee was given an exhorter's license. Two years later the family moved to Iowa, where Bresee began to preach and was appointed junior preacher on the Marengo circuit. He was moved to Pella, admitted to full connection in 1859, and ordained an elder in 1861. In 1860 Bresee married his childhood sweetheart, Maria Hubbard. Six children were born to the union.

After pastorates at Galesburg and Des Moines, Bresee served for two years as presiding elder of the Winterset District covering western Iowa. Thereafter he held pastorates at Chariton, Council Bluffs, Red Oak, Clarinda, and Creston, all in Iowa. He served for a time as editor of the Inland Christian Advocate, and was a delegate to the M. E. GENERAL CONFERENCE in New York in 1872. In 1883, Bresee moved to southern California where he became pastor of the First M. E. Church of Los Angeles, and three years later of Pasadena First. After one year as pastor at Asbury Church, Los Angeles, Bresee was appointed PRESIDING ELDER of the Los Angeles District, a post he held only one year. Brief pastorates at Simpson Memorial and Boyle Heights followed. Bresee was influential in the early days of the UNIVERSITY of SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA, and served as vice-president and later chairman of its board from 1884 to 1894.

In 1894 Bresee began a year's affiliation with the Peniel Mission in Los Angeles. His relationship to the M. E. Church terminated in October 1895, with his organization of an independent congregation which he named the Church of the Nazarene. The local Church of the Nazarene soon took on denominational aspects, and in 1908 united with two other groups of holiness churches. Bresee served as general superintendent of the new denomination until his death, Nov. 13, 1915.

Bresee's break with the Methodist Church was due in large part to his desire to place central emphasis on the doctrine of entire sanctification and, in his words, more effectively to "evangelize the poor." He incorporated much of the theology and discipline of the Methodist Church in his new organization, and remained on friendly personal terms with his former colleagues.

BRETHORST, ALICE BEATRICE (1879-), American missionary, registered nurse and teacher, was born Sept. 8, 1879 at Freeport, Ill., the daughter of Peter John and Certie (Wiggen) Brethorst. She graduated from high school at Lennox, S. D. in 1896; from Asbury Hospital School of Nursing in Minneapolis, Minn. in 1904; attended Northwestern Bible School in 1905; received the B.A. and M.A. degrees from the University of Washington in 1922, and the Ph.D. in 1931.

BREVARD COLLEGE, Brevard, N. C., was founded in 1934 from a merger with Rutherford College (founded, 1853) and Weaver College (founded, 1872). Its location is the site of Brevard Institute (founded, 1895). The governing board has fifty-six members elected by the WESTERN NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE.

BREWER, THEODORE FRELINGHUYSEN (1845-1928), American minister and leader in mission work with the Indian tribes of OKLAHOMA, was born Jan. 20, 1845, in the state of MISSISSIPPI. All during the Civil War he served in the Confederate Army. In 1874 he transferred from the MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE, where he was an ELDER, to the Arkansas Conference and was stationed at old Lewisburg (now Morrilton) where he taught school in connection with his pastoral duties. On account of ill health, he was in 1877 assigned to Boonsborough Circuit. In 1878 he was received by transfer in the INDIAN MISSION CONFERENCE, and appointed to Muskogee and Eufaula. He also taught in the ASBURY MANUAL LABOR SCHOOL.

Soon after his appointment to Muskogee station in 1881, he began the work of founding John Harrell International Institute, one of the most influential institutions of higher learning in the conference. He also began the publication of a conference organ called Brother In Red and continued as editor until 1895. He was then made PRESIDING ELDER of Okmulgee district. In 1896 he was appointed to the McAlester district. In 1899 he was made president of Willie Halsell College at Vinita. In 1901 he became president of Spalding College (successor to Harrell Institute). He continued as president until the end of the Indian Mission Conference in 1907.

Brewer was elected as delegate to General Conference of the M. E. Church, South four times—1890, 1894, 1898, and 1906. He died on April 6, 1928 and is buried in Muskogee, Okla.

OSCAR L. FONTAINE

BREWSTER, WILLIAM NESBIT (1862-1915), missionary builder of the Hinghwa Annual Conference, was born in Highland, Ohio, and studied at OHIO WESLEYAN and BOSTON UNIVERSITIES. After ordination in 1888, he was sent as a missionary to SINGAPORE, but in 1890 he was transferred to Hinghwa, in Fukien Province, CHINA, as the first resident missionary in that dialect region. In that year he married Elizabeth Fisher of the Foochow Mission and together they worked for the next twenty-six years building the church on the foundations already laid by NATHAN SITES and two of the "Seven Golden Candlesticks," Sia Sek-ong and Lin Ching-ting. His heart was in the task of building strong and intelligent churches, and although he established schools and an orphanage, he always kept his own time free for continual visiting from village to village.

His alma mater in Boston called him back in 1904 to deliver a course of lectures on missions and to be acting professor of missions in the school year 1913-14. Ohio Wesleyan University awarded him a D.D. degree in 1908. He was the author of two books: The Evolution of New China (1907) and The Cost of Christian Conquest (1908). His greatest literary contribution was the version of the whole Bible in Hinghwa Romanized, a form of writing which he himself had devised. Through this form of writing, comparatively easy to learn, the Hinghwa church became, more than any other part of China, a Bible-reading and Bible-loving church.

Brewster was delegate to two GENERAL CONFERENCES of the M. E. CHURCH in 1908 and 1916. While returning to China from the conference of 1916, he died. For twenty-five years after his death his widow continued his work with unabated zeal, and three of their seven children became missionaries: Mrs. George Hollister, author of a number of children's books on China; Mrs. Frank Manton, of Burma and Taiwan; and Dr. Harold Brewster, medical missionary in the Foochow Conference, later medical secretary of the Mission Board in New York and builder of Christ Hospital, SARAWAK, who died in 1965.

BREYFOGEL, SYLVANUS C. (1851-1934), American Evangelical bishop, was born in Reading, Pa., July 20, 1851, the son of the Rev. and Mrs. Seneca Breyfogel. He was licensed in the East Pennsylvania Conference (EA) and ordained in 1877. He served in the pastorate and as district superintendent until 1891, when he was elected bishop at the GENERAL CONFERENCE in Indianapolis. He continued in this office with distinction for thirty-nine years until he retired at the General Conference in 1930.

Bishop Breyfogel was a man of exceptional talent and genial social qualities. He possessed unusual executive ability which stood him in good stead as a bishop. Above all he was a brilliant preacher of rare popularity and power.

He was a creative leader of enterprises. Under his guidance the Superannuation Fund was formed. He also was especially influential in the development of ALBRIGHT COLLEGE, Reading, Pa.

Bishop Breyfogel traveled throughout the bounds of the church in the U.S.A. and CANADA, visiting the work in Europe many times and the missions in JAPAN and CHINA. His work in interdenominational organizations was also notable, particularly in the FEDERAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. He was frequently a speaker at such places as OCEAN GROVE, N. J. and Winona Lake Assembly, Ind.

Best known as an educator, Bishop Breyfogel for thirty years was president of the EVANGELICAL SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY at Reading and had been the chief sponsor of the Evangelical Correspondence College, organized in 1885. He wrote several books: Landmarks of the Evangelical Association, 1800-1877; Great Sermons by Great Preachers; The Preacher's Assistant; and The Polity of the Evangelical Association.

He was married in 1877 to Kate Boas, a member of a prominent Evangelical family. His wife preceded him in death, Aug. 1, 1928. Bishop Breyfogel died at his home in Reading, Pa., Nov. 24, 1934.

BRIDGEPORT, CONNECTICUT, U.S.A. JESSE LEE, who was appointed to Stamford Circuit in 1789, brought Methodism to this region. Lee says that on May 19, 1790, "we organized the first class in Stratford (New Bridgeport), composed of a few loving persons, who were much despised in town on account of their attachment to the Methodists." The name of the Stamford Circuit was changed to Fairfield in 1790, and to Reading in 1795. Stratford Circuit was organized in 1813.

Bridgeport Methodism grew slowly. In 1840 the Bridgeport charge reported 220 members. From 1856 to 1877 there was a Bridgeport District. In 1876 there were five churches in the city with a total of 890 members. By 1900 there were six churches and 1,855 members, and by unification in 1939 there were 3,019 members in the same number of churches.

Methodism reached a peak of eight churches and 3,260 members in Bridgeport in 1950 and has slowly declined since that time. In 1960 there were 3,081 members in six churches, and in 1969 the number of churches was five with a total of 2,562 members and property valued at $3,177,514. First Church is the largest congregation with 1,003 members and property valued at $2,060,322.

Beginning in 1900, Fannie J. Crosby, the hymn writer, lived in Bridgeport and while there was active in First Church until her death in 1915.

BRIDGEPORT, WEST VIRGINIA, U.S.A. Bridgeport Church, a building of rare beauty, represents and fulfills the uniting of two streams of Methodism, the M. E. and the M. P. A quarterly conference was held in July, 1805, in what is now Bridgeport, for a Methodist society known as the "Benjamin Webb preaching appointment." For several years the Methodists worshiped in a building which was also used by Baptists and Presbyterians. In 1857 the M. E. class meeting began in a one-room stone schoolhouse near the present site, and then erected a frame building on the same site in 1871. The M. P. group built a frame building in 1874, and then later in 1923 moved to a new brick building. In 1943 the two congregations merged, and worshiped as one in this brick church for ten years.

On Oct. 25, 1953, there was dedicated in Bridgeport what some hold to be one of the most beautiful of modern church buildings in the state or nation. It was a gift of the late MICHAEL LATE BENEDEUM.

In 1959 the congregation began plans for an educational building in keeping with the church edifice. This building was completed in 1962 at a cost of more than $600,000, including land and furnishings. The Claude Worthington Benedum Foundation contributed $250,000 toward its construction. The total church plant offers facilities that cost in excess of $2,100,000.

The membership at the time of merger in 1943 was 524, with a budget of $6,964. The membership in 1968 was 1,715.

BRIGGS, MARTIN CLARK (1823-1902), called "Methodist Trumpeter" of CALIFORNIA, was born in Oneida County, N. Y. At the age of seventeen he visited TENNESSEE, remaining a year and a half, making a first-hand study of slavery; he attended auctions of slaves and conversed with masters. This led to his being a life-long champion of human freedom, with a consuming passion. Graduating from Concord Biblical Institute in 1850, he was almost immediately commissioned to the California mission field and reached SAN FRANCISCO October 17. Shortly afterward he married Ellen Green, of Portage, N. Y., devoted help-mate throughout his long career. He had been preceded in California the year before by WILLIAM TAYLOR and ISAAC OWEN. The trio became prominent Protestant leaders. Briggs was the first editor of the California Christian Advocate, a chief founder of the UNIVERSITY OF THE PACIFIC, and a leading preacher, serving pastorates in San Francisco, Santa Clara, Alameda, Napa. He stood always and everywhere for personal morality and civic righteousness.

He contributed significantly throughout the state during the Civil War as a fearless, powerful advocate for the Union. He possessed remarkable power over audiences. He stood for strict observance of the Sabbath, served as field agent of the Sabbath Association, was author of the scholarly book, The Sabbath Made for Man. The cause of TEMPERANCE was always a vital interest. In him the ideal and the practical were happily blended; but in his robust character there was no room for compromise in questions of fundamental morality. He died Jan. 14, 1902, at his ranch in Alameda County, leaving his wife and four sons—two of them, Arthur and Herbert, being ordained to the ministry.

BRIGGS, WILLIAM (1836-1922), Canadian minister and publisher, was born in Banbridge, Ireland, Sept. 19, 1836, and died Nov. 5, 1922. He received a commercial education in LIVERPOOL, from which city he migrated to CANADA. Briggs was taken on trial in 1858 and ordained in the WESLEYAN METHODIST CHURCH in 1863. Subsequently he held many pastorates in Ontario and Quebec, his last being the Metropolitan Church in TORONTO.

In 1878 Briggs was appointed BOOK STEWARD and held this post until 1918. During this long interval he transformed the publishing operations of the Methodist Church. Under his skillful direction, a new and much larger building was constructed on Queen Street in

WILLIAM BRIGGS

Toronto, in which were prepared and printed not only the church newspaper and other religious literature, but a large number of other publications. By 1918 the Methodist Book Room had become one of the most successful publishing houses in Canada, and the imprint of William Briggs had become a familiar sight to readers.

In addition to his strenuous task as Book Steward, Briggs served his church in many other capacities. Although he did not have a station, he preached regularly and effectively. His preaching was characterized by careful preparation and by a determination to bring the best insights of ancient and modern scholarship to bear on the role of modern Christianity.

Briggs played a valuable part in the broader development of Methodism. He was one of those who helped to launch the union of 1874. As a member of all succeeding general conferences until 1918, he contributed materially to the union of 1884 and to the subsequent expansion of Methodism. In particular, as a member of Victoria College's Board of Regents, he encouraged the consolidation of federation; as a member of the Missionary Board he gave impetus to its work.

For his great services, Briggs was honored by his church with various offices, and by VICTORIA UNIVERSITY with the D.D. degree. His greatest reward was the affection and honor in which he was held by his brethren. As was said at his funeral, he was the last "of a noble band of men whose names are household words throughout the Methodism of the Dominion."

BRIGHOUSE, Yorkshire, England, a chapel in the Halifax Circuit, was alienated by the trustees from the control and appointment of preachers by the Wesleyan Conference. They made it available for the use of the METHODIST NEW CONNEXION. In 1806 the Conference took legal steps for its recovery. The action in the High Court of Chancery was delayed, but in 1840 a decree was issued ordering the trustees to obey the trust deed which they had denied, and to restore the chapel to its proper use.

BRIGHT, JOHN COLLINS (1818-1866), American U. B. preacher, was born near Canal Winchester, Ohio, Oct. 13, 1818, the son of Major and Deborah (Moore) Bright. He united with the Sandusky Conference, Church of the UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST, in 1841, and was appointed to a circuit. As pastor and PRESIDING ELDER he served the conference until 1853 when the GENERAL CONFERENCE named him to be the first corresponding secretary of the newly formed Home, Frontier, and Foreign Missionary Society. Under his guidance missions were organized in Tennessee, Nebraska, Canada, Minnesota, Michigan, Missouri, Kansas, Oregon and Africa.

After four years in missionary service his health broke. He subsequently regained his strength, returned to the pastorate and for several years again was presiding elder. However in 1866 he suffered another breakdown and died Aug. 6 of that year. His remains were interred in Green Lawn Cemetery, Columbus, Ohio.

BRIGHTMAN, EDGAR SHEFFIELD (1884-1953), American minister and philosopher, was born in Hollbrook, Mass., Sept. 20, 1884, the son of George Edgar and Mary Sheffield Brightman. He attended Brown University (A.B., 1906; A.M., 1908). During the next two years he completed both the S.T.B. at BOSTON UNIVERSITY (1910) and preliminary doctoral courses in philosophy under BORDEN PARKER BOWNE. As Jacob Sleeper Fellow, he studied in Berlin and Marburg, Germany (1910-11), receiving the Ph.D. from Boston in 1912.

In 1912 Brightman married Charlotte Hülsen, who died in 1915. In 1918 he married Irma Fall. He had three children: Howard Hülsen, Miriam Fall, and Robert Sheffield. The latter is a Methodist minister in Maine.

Brightman was ordained deacon April 3, 1910, in Attleboro and admitted to the NEW ENGLAND SOUTHERN CONFERENCE. From 1915 he was a member of the NEW ENGLAND CONFERENCE and active in local and conference committees, particularly those related to social concerns. He taught frequently at Pastors' Schools across the country.

From 1912 to 1915 he taught psychology, philosophy, and Bible at NEBRASKA WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY. Then he moved to WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, Middletown, Conn., as Professor of Ethics and Religion. In 1919 he went to Boston University where he was Borden Parker Bowne Professor of Philosophy in the Graduate School until his death.

His dynamic teaching for forty years had a profound influence on students in theology as well as philosophy. Though an exponent of Bowne's personalism, he developed its historical and contemporary connections more fully. His major contribution was to the metaphysics of personality. In philosophy of religion he stressed the problem of good-and-evil in relation to God. He wrote fourteen books and several hundred articles and reviews.

He died Feb. 25, 1953. Interment was in Elmwood Cemetery, Mystic, Conn.

BRISBANE, Australia, a city of 700,000, the capital and metropolis of Queensland. It is the center of much Methodist work and the dominant city in the Queensland Conference. For the history and development of Methodism, see QUEENSLAND CONFERENCE.

Special institutions in present-day Methodist work in Brisbane are its Blue Nursing Service, Central Mission, Discharged Prisoners' Homes, Home for the Aged, and King's College.

Blue Nursing Service. A home nursing service, available to the community seven days a week, irrespective of class, creed or color, was begun by Arthur Preston at the West End Mission in 1953. It soon became an accepted community service supported by public subscriptions and subsidized by the government. Branches have been opened at twenty-one strategic centers throughout the state. There are now 108 nurses who travel over half a million miles a year to make nearly 300,000 calls. Associated with the Blue Nursing Service are four hospitals for the aged and five settlements for senior citizens.

Central Mission. The Albert Street Church in Brisbane dates from 1847. The first church was erected in 1848 and the second, a much larger one, in 1856. In 1887 the present attractive Gothic structure was built opposite the imposing City Hall. In 1906, GEORGE EDWARDS ROWE constituted the church a Central Mission and introduced a program of community service. He had a staff of twelve Sisters-of-the-People who cared for the poor. After a vigorous ministry of twenty years, Rowe was succeeded by H. M. WHELLER for twenty-five years. He extended the social work, setting up hostels for young people, homes for the aged and service to the unemployed. George Nash has further extended this ministry by erecting a hospital for the chronically ill, through service to Aborigines living in the metropolitan area, and by an evangelical concern with a social emphasis.

Discharged Prisoners' Homes. Two homes for discharged prisoners, one for men and another for women, supplement and extend the ministry of jail chaplains. The Men's Home and a farm were established in 1922 through the initiative of William Powell, and bears his name. Four successive laymen have conducted the home with much success: S. Webb, Stuart Collard, S. D. Webb, and C. Taylor. The home for women, named Stewart Lodge, was opened in 1954 and has provided a haven for many women. They are counselled and restored to useful living by the matron, Sister J. Lovelock. The home was named for Mrs. Stewart, the first Methodist chaplain to the women's prison.

Homes for the Aged. In 1936 H. M. WHELLER established the Garden Settlement Movement for senior citizens. A gift of twenty-four acres of land in Brisbane and a substantial contribution from George Marchant enabled him to erect small cottages for couples, a central administrative block and dining room for forty-four residents. Subsequently more units were built over a wide area to accommodate 400 people. Two chapels, two community halls and a hospital have been added. The site is defined with roads, lawns and gardens; a bowling green and a croquet lawn are provided. The total value of the property is $1,000,000. Similar settlements are functioning in four other cities in Queensland, under the control of local circuits.

King's College, a residential college within the University of Queensland, was established through the initiative of R. Stewart, F. Duesbury, and E. W. H. Fowles. It was opened at South Brisbane in 1914 with twenty-four students. Accommodation was progressively increased and recently the College was relocated on the new campus of the University at St. Lucia. It has been wisely administered by four successive masters—M. Scott-Fletcher, 1913-15; L. E. BENNETT, 1916-23; H. H. TRIGGE, 1924-59; I. H. GRIMMETT, 1960-. Professor Trigge, president of the Queensland Conference in 1942 and President-General of the Methodist Church of Australasia, 1957-60, directed the erection of the new building in 1951 to accommodate 190 students of all faculties, including men in training for the ministry. The H. H. Trigge Memorial Wing acknowledges his conspicuous service through thirty-five years. The present master is assisted by a deputy master and a principal of the Theological Hall, housed within King's College.

BRISTOL, FRANK MILTON (1851-1932), American bishop, was born at Jeddo, N. Y., on Jan. 4, 1851. He earned two degrees at NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY and received the honorary D.D. from the same school. He was ordained to the ministry in the ROCK RIVER CONFERENCE of the M. E. CHURCH in 1877 and served Trinity, Grace, and Wabash Avenue Churches in CHICAGO, First Church at EVANSTON, and Metropolitan Church in WASHINGTON, where he served eleven years. For a time he was BOOK EDITOR and then was elected bishop in 1908. He served as bishop at BUENOS AIRES, ARGENTINA; OMAHA, Neb.; and CHATTANOOGA, Tenn., and retired in 1924. He then lived at Montclair, N. J., where he died on April 24, 1932, and was buried in Graceland Cemetery in Chicago.

Bishop Bristol was a delegate to the Third ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE in LONDON in 1901. He published fifteen books and addresses, including The Ministry of Art, Shakespeare and America, The Religious Instinct of Man, and The Life of Chaplain McCabe. He was in London when President WILLIAM MCKINLEY was killed, and he delivered an address on the President's assassination before the Ecumenical Conference, as President McKinley was a member and frequent attendant at his Metropolitan Church in Washington while Bristol was pastor.

BRISTOL, England, a city spanning the river Avon, which divides Gloucestershire from Somerset in Great Britain, is an ancient port with extensive docks and a great variety of industries. A cathedral and university city with a population of about 450,000, it is the commercial capital of the West of England, with a marked cultural life of its own. It was a royal borough before the Norman conquest, and received a charter granting it county status from Edward III in 1373. In JOHN WESLEY's day the port of Bristol was in constant use by slave traders, who carried on their gruesome trade with America and the West Indies.

In the eighteenth century, with an estimated population of 30,000, Bristol was the second city in the kingdom and, together with LONDON and NEWCASTLE UPON TYNE, became one of the three chief centers of Wesley's activities. Wesley first visited Bristol on March 31, 1739, at the urgent request of GEORGE WHITEFIELD, and made frequent visits each year for the next fifty years until his last in September, 1790, six months before he died. His brother CHARLES lived in Bristol from 1749 until 1771 and there published many of his hymns.

Some of the outstanding characteristics of Methodism originated in Bristol, including the CLASS MEETING, WATCH NIGHT services, and the CIRCUIT system. It was in Bristol that Wesley first preached in the open air (April 2, 1739). The first Methodist chapel in the world, and now the oldest, was opened there by Wesley in 1739; originally called "the New Room in the Horsefair," it is now known as Wesley's Chapel, Broadmead. No less than eighteen of his annual conferences were held at Bristol, the first in 1745. In 1748 Wesley founded his school at KINGSWOOD for the education of the sons of his preachers and others, but the school was moved to Bath in 1852. The Conference of 1771 at Bristol appointed FRANCIS ASBURY and RICHARD WRIGHT to serve in America. The Methodist Church of America, formally constituted in 1784, can trace its beginnings to Wesley's ordination in Bristol of RICHARD WHATCOAT and THOMAS VASEY as deacons and elders, and THOMAS COKE as superintendent, for the Methodist societies in America.

THE NEW ROOM, BRISTOL, SHOWING THE EQUESTRIAN STATUE OF JOHN WESLEY IN FRONT OF THE STABLE

The influence of the sacramental teaching and practice of the Wesleys was nowhere more evident than in Bristol, where great crowds flocked to receive Holy Communion. At the Conference of 1794 the Bristol societies became the center of a heated controversy over the administration of the Lord's Supper, an argument which was disposed of in 1795 by the PLAN OF PACIFICATION.

Portland Chapel. After the New Room, the most historic Methodist sanctuary in Bristol is Portland Chapel, Kingsdown. At the time of its erection in 1792, largely by the efforts of Captain THOMAS WEBB, who lived across the way in Portland Street, the Chapel was designed to accommodate Methodists living in the fashionable hill-side suburb, and was remarkable for its apsidal architecture. From 1794 it became also the home of those who insisted that Methodist preachers should be allowed to administer the sacraments. In August that year HENRY MOORE was refused entry to the pulpit of the New Room, Bristol, because he had assisted THOMAS COKE in administering the Lord's Supper, and a large crowd of supporters (including Captain Webb) accompanied him up the hill to swell the congregation at Portland. The congregation flourished during the nineteenth century but then decayed along with the prosperity of the area. The chapel is now little more than a historic shrine, with many memorials of Thomas Webb, including the vault where he lies buried. In the burial ground outside lies THOMAS WESTELL, one of Wesley's first three itinerant preachers—the only one to remain until death within Wesley's societies. The Conference decided in 1970 that from that date the chapel would have to be formally closed.

One of the newest Methodist buildings in Bristol, St. Andrew's, Filton, is in direct line of descent from the New Room, having been built from money given in compensation for the demolition of the old King Street Chapel, which was erected in 1795 to serve the congregation which left the New Room in protest against the treatment of their minister by the trustees.

Some large and notable chapels were built in Bristol during the nineteenth century by the BIBLE CHRISTIANS, PRIMITIVE METHODISTS, and UNITED METHODIST FREE CHURCHES. The Primitive Methodists began to make their influence felt about 1823. In 1849 the reform agitation in Wesleyan Methodism affected the Bristol societies, and the antagonisms of those days are reflected in the large chapels which stand in close proximity to one another in certain parts of the city. After World War II, Didsbury College, originally founded as the Wesleyan Methodist theological college in Manchester, was reopened in Bristol; more recently it has been amalgamated with Headingly College under the name of "Wesley College." Methodism is a strong religious influence in the life of the city today.

BRISTOL, VIRGINIA-TENNESSEE, U.S.A., is a city that has the distinction of being on both sides of a state line. What is now State Street Church had its beginning in 1856 when a Methodist congregation of nineteen persons was organized as a charge of the Blountville Circuit with John Boring appointed as pastor. Bristol was then known as Sapling Grove. A church building was erected in 1857 near the present intersection of Lee and Scott Streets. This was the first Methodist church building erected in the town. In 1873, during the pastorate of M. J. Tyler Frazier, this building was given to the colored members of the church as their own house of worship. The church on this site is now known as the John Wesley Church.

In 1876 a new building was erected at the intersection of State (then Main) and James Streets. It was a frame building and known in Methodist parlance as "Bristol Station." At the HOLSTON CONFERENCE held in ASHEVILLE, N. C., in October 1888, the value of the church property at this location was listed in the minutes as $5,700. In 1902 this building was demolished.

The second church building at State and James Streets was erected during the pastorate of WILLIAM S. NEIGHBORS in 1901-04. The educational building on James and Good Streets, adjoining the church building, was constructed in 1927, during the administration of J. STEWART FRENCH. Even at that time it was realized that the church in the future would be compelled to expand its facilities. Therefore, it was erected in the form of a business building with the thought that this type of structure would be more salable. With expansion on this site in mind, in 1945 the church purchased a strip of ground to the rear of the educational building, but when the time came to consider a larger and better equipped church, the property owned was found inadequate to fill the pressing needs. Therefore, in the latter part of 1951, under the pastorate of W. F. Blackard, a committee was appointed to select a church site. After much study and consideration of several sites, the committee recommended a location in Spring Garden at Long Crescent and Valley Drive consisting of approximately nine acres. This tract included the home of William T. Martin, which the committee recommended for use as a parsonage. Plans were drawn and adopted and ground breaking ceremonies were held on the site on Sept. 27, 1953. The present Georgian Colonial structure was completed in April 1956 under the pastorate of H. Olin Troy.

In 1970 the church reported 1,725 members, property valued at $1,015,000, and a total paid for all purposes of $157,287.

BRITISH COUNCIL OF CHURCHES was formed in September 1943, to take over the work of several earlier bodies such as the Christian Social Council. The official representation on the council includes members appointed by all those churches in the British Isles which participate in the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. In addition there are members appointed by certain smaller churches and interdenominational bodies. The council is the official instrument of the churches to facilitate common action, promote cooperation, and further the cause of Christian unity. Its principal departments of study and action are: Education, Evangelism, International Affairs, Social Responsibility, Youth Service, Faith and Order, Inter-Church Aid, and Refugee Service. It encourages the formation and affiliation of local councils of churches.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY was founded in LONDON in 1804 for the printing and distribution of the Bible at home and overseas. It was an offshoot of the interdenominational Religious Tract Society, founded in 1799, which published Christian literature. The Bible Society is also interdenominational. Its committee consists of fifteen Anglican and fifteen non-Anglican representatives, as well as six members from abroad. British Methodism has always assisted the Society, and has permitted its ministers to serve the Society, notably JOHN RITSON, who was one of the two General Secretaries from 1899 to 1931.

BRITISH METHODISM, ORGANIZATION OF. The governing body of the British Methodist Church is the Conference. All other church courts and committees derive their authority from the CONFERENCE and are responsible to it for the due exercise of their appropriate functions.

For administrative purposes there is a church court at every level—DISTRICT, CIRCUIT, and SOCIETY.

The British Methodist Church is divided into thirty-four geographical districts, each district being administered through the District Synod, presided over by a chairman, who must be a minister. The chairmen are appointed by the Conference on the nomination of the respective synods. In all but six districts the chairman has no other pastoral charge. In three small island districts, and in the three Welsh-speaking districts, the chairman is one of the ministers in the district who also fulfills a normal ministerial appointment. The District Synod consists, in addition to a number of ex-officio members, of all the ministers stationed in the district and laymen elected by the various CIRCUIT QUARTERLY MEETINGS. For special disciplinary cases a Minor District Synod may be called.

Each district is divided into circuits, the number varying with the size of the district, most having between thirty and forty. Every circuit is placed under the direction of a superintendent minister and as many ministerial colleagues as the work of the circuit requires.

Ministerial appointments are always to circuits and not to individual societies. The circuit is the effective unit of Methodism in Britain, and the appointment in recent years of district chairmen with no other pastoral charge has not been allowed to trespass in any way upon the authority of the superintendent minister in the circuit. The circuit is administered through the Quarterly Meeting, consisting of the ministers, LOCAL PREACHERS, and TRUSTEES of the circuit, officials from the local societies, and elected representatives of the various society meetings to the LEADERS' MEETING, in the proportion of one for every thirty members of society up to a maximum of eight. At the circuit level there is also a Local Preachers' Quarterly Meeting, which is responsible for the discipline of the local preachers and other matters concerning their work.

Each circuit is divided into local societies, the number of which varies considerably. There are still a few circuits consisting of only one society, but a wide circuit in a rural area may consist of as many as fifty societies or even more. The society is administered through the Leaders' Meeting, presided over by the superintendent minister or one of his colleagues. It meets at least once a quarter and is responsible under the minister for the spiritual welfare of the society. It admits members and, should occasion arise, also removes them. For the general business of the society, the Leaders' Meeting consists of the CLASS leaders, various local officials, and the elected representatives from the Society Meeting referred to below. A smaller Leaders' Meeting is responsible for the annual reviews of the membership roll name by name, and also acts as a Court of Discipline, if necessary.

The Society Meeting consists of all the members of society in each church, and is held at least once a year. At the annual meeting the society representatives to the Leaders' Meeting are elected.

In addition to these church courts each property within the circuit is administered by a body of trustees, who are responsible for the maintenance of the fabric. Over ninety percent of these trusts are held on a Model Deed (see DEEDS, TRUST) thereby ensuring uniformity of practice within the denomination. There are still a few private trusts, most of which date back to a period before the Union of the Methodist denominations in 1932. In local societies with not more than twenty-five members, where the above arrangements are not practical, the local church government is carried on through a single church court known as the Church Council.

It will be recognized that the organization of British Methodism resembles a pyramid with the Conference as the apex and the lower courts fanning out at district, circuit, and society levels. By this means, communication is maintained between the Conference and all the members. Decisions of the Conference are remitted to the lower courts; while in the reverse direction, statistical and other reports pass through the various stages and ultimately reach the Conference.

The administration of the British Methodist Church, however, is not only delegated by the Conference to lower courts as indicated, but is also entrusted to Connexional Departments. These are thirteen in number, their titles denoting their respective areas of responsibility. They are the CONNEXIONAL FUNDS, HOME MISSION, CHAPEL AFFAIRS, YOUTH, LOCAL PREACHERS, CHRISTIAN CITIZENSHIP, EDUCATION, MINISTERIAL TRAINING, and LONDON MISSION DEPARTMENTS, the METHODIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY, the WESLEY DEACONESS ORDER, the NATIONAL CHILDREN'S HOME, and the Methodist Publishing House (see BOOK ROOMS). Each of these departments has one or more ministerial secretaries, and a committee appointed by and reporting annually to the Conference. Where it is appropriate, the work of each department is carried on at district level by a committee appointed by the synod, and the work of the Home Mission, Overseas Missions, Youth, and Christian Citizenship departments is delegated at circuit level to a committee appointed by the Quarterly Meeting. A similar arrangement operates in many large societies. In addition to the departmental committees, the general policy of the church and all matters which do not come under any specific department are the concern of the General Purposes Committee and the Policy Committee, of which the secretary of the Conference is the convener, and in which all departments and districts are represented. This committee acts in cases of emergency in the intervals between sessions of the Conference. By this means the Conference maintains its control over the work of the districts, circuits, and societies, and also over the whole range of activities of the church entrusted to the various departments. The regulations in accordance with which the whole work of the church is carried on are set forth in the Standing Orders of the Conference. These are more than three hundred in number, and no annual session of the Conference passes without the addition, deletion, or modification of some of these regulations. In this way the Conference seeks to maintain an organization adequate to meet the needs of an ever-changing situation.

Minutes of the Methodist Conference contain the legislative decisions and proposals of the Conference of the year of publication.

BRITTINGHAM, BETTIE SLEMMONS (1903-49), American editor, educator and leader in youth and women's activities, was born Aug. 29, 1903 in Salisbury, Md. She graduated from WESTERN MARYLAND COLLEGE with an A.B. degree in 1930 and received the M.R.E. degree from BOSTON UNIVERSITY in 1931. From September, 1931 until July, 1933 she taught at Westminster College, Tehuacana, Texas, where she headed the Department of Bible and Religious Education and was Dean of Women.

She was prominently identified with the work of the M. P. CHURCH for a decade prior to the unification of Methodism in 1939. In 1933 she became executive secretary of the Board of Missions of her church and editor of its official publication, The Missionary Record. As a member of the Board of Young People's Work of the M. P. Church, she organized and conducted leadership training schools for young people and church workers. She rallied women to the whole program of the denomination by organizing Woman's Missionary Societies and teaching missionary courses. In 1934 she was elected as the First Vice President of the Women's Interdenominational Missionary Union. In 1937 she was elected to membership on the Committee of Reference and Counsel, the legislative body of the Foreign Missions Conference of North America, and the Home Mission Council.

She served as editor of The Missionary Record until September 1940, when this publication was consolidated into The Methodist Woman. After unification in 1940, she became the first editor of the new official publication for Methodist women, with her office in New York City. Because of this association for the nine years prior to her death, Miss Brittingham was affectionately known throughout the denomination as "THE" Methodist Woman.

In 1946 she made a survey of religious and social conditions in ALASKA for the WOMAN'S SOCIETY OF CHRISTIAN SERVICE and the Home Missions Council. She attended the meeting of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES at Amsterdam, the Netherlands, in 1948.

Miss Brittingham was recognized as an outstanding public speaker and organizer, characterized for her vitality and warmth and, as President Lewis B. Carpenter, of the NATIONAL COLLEGE for Christian Workers, observed: "Her fine spirit, her sense of balance, her ever-ready humor, added to her unique talents, made her one of the leaders of united Methodism." She died April 29, 1949.

BROADBENT, SAMUEL (1794-1867), pioneer Wesleyan Methodist missionary in SOUTH AFRICA and subsequently a circuit minister in England, was born at Baistow, near Skircoat, Yorkshire, England in 1794. In 1815 he was sent to CEYLON but was transferred to the South African mission field in 1820. After a short period at Reed Fountain, a substation of the Leliefontein (Lily Fountain) mission, he was instructed to attempt a mission to the Bechuana country in association with S. Kay. Tribal warfare and ill-health frustrated his endeavours. At the first attempt he did not go beyond Griquatown. On the second occasion Broadbent and T. L. Hodgson established themselves with Chief Sifunyello of the Barolong at Maquassi, nine miles from present-day Wolmaransstad. This was the first Christian mission in what was later to become the Transvaal and it was here that Broadbent's son Lewis was born—reputedly the first white child to be born in the Transvaal. Unfortunately Hodgson was recalled, Broadbent's health collapsed, and Maquassi was abandoned in May 1824. Broadbent embarked for England in November 1825, and from 1827 to 1863 he served in English circuits. He died at Lytham on June 3, 1867.

BROCKWAY, WILLIAM HADLEY (1813-1891), American preacher, was born in Morrystown, Vt. on Feb. 24, 1813. The family emigrated to Westville Township, N. Y. in 1820. William moved to southern MICHIGAN in 1831, and taught the first school in Dexter. At a QUARTERLY CONFERENCE in Dexter in 1833, he became the first man living in Michigan licensed to preach in Methodism, while Michigan was still part of the OHIO CONFERENCE. He first served the Huron Mission of the Detroit District, then other Indian missions in southern Michigan. In 1838 he was appointed to the Sault St. Marie and Kewawenon missions of Michigan's Upper Peninsula, and in 1839 he became superintendent of the Indian Mission District of the MICHIGAN CONFERENCE. He served as superintendent for nine years, and was chaplain to Fort Brady at the Sault during most of that time. In 1848 he went to Albion as financial agent for Wesleyan Seminary (later ALBION COLLEGE) until 1855. He raised funds for buildings and endowments, and helped stabilize the young institution. Settling in Albion, Brockway served in the Michigan Senate during 1855-56; was its sergeant-at-arms in 1863; and served in the Michigan House of Representatives in 1865-66 and 1871-72. He was chaplain to Michigan's 16th Infantry in 1862-63. He was a trustee of Albion College for a long period, and a trustee of the village of Albion for many years, several years its president. He died at his home in Albion on Oct. 21, 1891, and is buried in Riverside Cemetery.

BRODHEAD, JOHN (1770-1838), American minister and legislator, was born in Smithfield, Northampton Co., Pa. on Oct. 5, 1770. He entered the itinerant ministry in 1794, serving first Northumberland, Pa. and Kent, Del. In 1796 he went to Readfield, Me. For the next forty-two years he labored in the NEW ENGLAND CONFERENCE, serving widely scattered appointments. As a PRESIDING ELDER he had a notable record: New London District, Conn., 1801; Vershire District, Vt., 1802; New Hampshire District, 1804-06; Boston District, Mass., 1807-08.

Brodhead and Benjamin Sabin were elected in 1811 to attend GENERAL CONFERENCE, but they could not attend. Daniel Webb and Joel Winch then asked for this privilege. The New England Conference consented and reserve delegates were sent to General Conference—the first time this occurred in American Methodism.

As a result of a meeting in 1815 in John Brodhead's home in Newmarket, N. H., steps were taken to establish a Methodist academy. Largely as a result of Brodhead's work in Newmarket, the school opened on Sept. 1, 1817, as Wesleyan Academy, with Moses White as instructor; in 1818 MARTIN RUTER was elected principal. In 1825 the academy moved to WILBRAHAM, Mass.

On July 1, 1822, Brodhead and TIMOTHY MERRITT introduced a motion in the New England Conference to establish a weekly paper. Subsequently ZION'S HERALD has been published as a Methodist journal.

Broadhead served four years in Congress, and he declined to serve as Governor of New Hampshire.

He died on April 7, 1838.

BROMILOW, WILLIAM E. (1857-1929), Australian minister and pioneer missionary to FIJI and PAPUA, was born in Geelong, Victoria, AUSTRALIA. In 1879, immediately after his marriage and ordination, he sailed to Fiji with his wife for missionary service. Within two years of their return to Australia, they offered to go as pioneer missionaries to Papua. On May 27, 1891, the three-masted schooner, The Lord of the Isles, set off for the selected site on Dobu Island with the materials for two large mission houses on board. Among the pioneer party also were twenty-two men from TONGA, SAMOA and FIJI, twelve of them accompanied by their wives. The mission was a success from the start, despite plots to kill and eat the missionaries. Only three years after their arrival, the first baptisms took place with fifty others attending preparation classes. The Bromilows spent seventeen years in Papua, and in 1920 in response to an urgent call for staff, returned for a further three years and completed the translation of the Bible into Dobuan.

Mrs. Bromilow instituted a system whereby nurses from Australia assisted in mothercraft training and medical care. The Bromilows retired in 1925 to their home in the Blue Mountains, west of Sydney, where on June 24, 1929, William Bromilow died and was buried at Gore Hill cemetery in Sydney.

BROMLEY, JAMES (1785-1860), British Methodist, one of the leading WESLEYAN REFORMERS, became a Wesleyan itinerant in 1811. He was a friend and supporter of SAMUEL WARREN, but actually voted for his expulsion at the Conference of 1835. He was, however, the only member of the Conference to vote against the expulsion of SAMUEL DUNN in 1849, and was himself expelled in 1850.

BRONTËS. Perhaps the most famous literary family in English history, the Brontës had many links with Methodism. The Rev. Patrick Brontë was born at Loughbrickland, County Down, Ireland, on March 17, 1777, and died at Haworth, in Yorkshire, England, in 1861. He was vicar of Haworth from 1820 to 1861. He married Maria Branwell (1783-1821), a native of Cornwall, and there were six children. The two eldest, Maria (1814-25) and Elizabeth (1815-25), died in childhood. The son, Patrick Branwell (1817-48), was a grave disappointment and lived an unhappy life. So it is through the literary work of the other daughters that the family has left its mark. Writing under the names of Currer, Ellis, and Acton Bell, the sisters produced poems as well as their famous novels. The latter, written largely by the restricted experience of Haworth, were filled with biographical material concerning the family. Charlotte's Jane Eyre was based on the cruel treatment of her two eldest sisters at Cowan Bridge School, near Kirby-Lonsdale. Villette is based on her experiences in Brussels. Emily's Wuthering Heights mirrors northern life at the time.

The first link between the Brontës and Methodism begins with Thomas Tighe, rector of Drumgooland, in Ireland. He had been connected with John Wesley, who had been especially welcome at the home of his half-brother, William, at Rosanna. In 1798 Tighe appointed the young Patrick Brontë as teacher in the parish school at Drumballyrone, and later as tutor to his own children. Brontë was encouraged by Tighe to go to Cambridge University, and afterward found himself perpetual curate of Hartshead-cum-Clifton, in Yorkshire. A few miles away, at Woodhouse Grove, near Leeds, there was opened a Wesleyan academy, and it is of significance that Brontë was appointed as first visiting examiner at the school (see Bradford). It was at Haworth, however, that the links between the Brontë family and Methodism came to maturity. Patrick was following in the steps of WILLIAM GRIMSHAW, who had been vicar there from 1742 to 1763. Grimshaw's preaching and pastoral work had been greatly influenced by Methodism. So great was his concern that such preaching should continue after his death that he desired to build the Methodists a chapel at Haworth. This was made possible at length by a legacy from Mrs. Mercy Thornton, of Leeds, and the West Lane Chapel was built. Patrick Brontë was therefore almost haunted by the deeds of his famous predecessor, whom he doubtless wished to emulate. On the early death of Patrick's wife Maria in 1821, her sister Elizabeth Branwell came from Cornwall to preside over Haworth parsonage until her death in 1842. As a Methodist she may be presumed to have brought with her copies of the Wesleyan Methodist Magazine, and through this contact with the Christian experience and "happy dying" of the Methodists, and their aunt's disciplinarian ways, the children's thoughts will have been molded. It is on this basis that Elsie Harrison builds her thesis, The Clue to the Brontës. Claiming that the Methodist background influences the Brontë novels and is the clue to the understanding of the family, she offers details such as the following: derivation of names (in Wuthering Heights, Earnshaw from Grimshaw, Heathcliff from Sutcliffe, Lockwood unchanged); the character Jabez Brandherm drawn from JABEZ BUNTING; romantic love described in terms of religion; Heathcliff "praying like a Methodist."

We are dealing with illuminating guesswork rather than scholarly proof; but although Mrs. Harrison overstated her case, there can be little doubt that she argues on the right lines and that there is genuine Methodist influence in the sisters' writing, especially in the case of Emily Brontë.

Patrick Brontë was drawn more and more to Methodism toward the end of his life. His perpetual curate was Arthur Nicholls, who had married Charlotte. Disappointed that he possessed a Puseyite as a son-in-law, Brontë would from time to time worship on Sunday evenings with the Methodists in Grimshaw's chapel at West Lane.

BROOK, DAVID (1854-1933), British Methodist, was born at Elland, Yorkshire. He entered the ministry of the UNITED METHODIST FREE CHURCHES in 1875. As a circuit minister he took a prominent part in the negotiations which led to the METHODIST UNION of 1907. He was president of the National FREE CHURCH COUNCIL in 1901 and secretary of its Twentieth Century Fund. He served as principal of the United Methodist Theological College at Victoria Park, Manchester, from 1913 to 1918. Afterward he became the chief United Methodist advocate of Methodist Union, being chairman of the Union Committee of his own church from 1921 to 1932 as well as chairman of the interdenominational committee. Despite advancing age and illness he lived to attend the first conference of the United Church in 1932, dying on March 22, 1933.

BROOKLINE, MASSACHUSETTS, U.S.A. St. Mark's Church, located three miles southwest of BOSTON, traces its origin to the 1863 Sunday evening services conducted by GILBERT HAVEN in the Town Hall. Ten years later a church was formed, a former Congregational property and building purchased, and a pastor, E. D. Winslow, appointed. The property was soon lost in the financial panic of the 1870's and the congregation met for two years in the new Town Hall. A chapel, built and used from 1879 to 1891, became inadequate. On April 9, 1892, the cornerstone of the present imposing French Romanesque structure at the corner of Vernon and Park Streets was laid; four years later the building named "St. Mark's" was dedicated.

From 1910 to 1940 St. Mark's enjoyed a tremendous period of growth, leadership and influence in the metropolitan Boston area. Notable was the thirty-seven-year pastorate of William R. Leslie from 1921 to 1958. Today, set in the midst of a changing social scene, the 377 members of this church have linked themselves in "a specialized ministries program" with the nearby Baptist and Congregational churches.

BROOKLYN, NEW YORK, U.S.A., a borough of NEW YORK CITY, lies directly across the East River from downtown Manhattan. Its population of 2,630,000 is made up of residents of varied ethnic, racial, and national origins. The combined Negro and Puerto Rican groups hold at least thirty-five percent of the total.

In 1624 the Dutch founded their colony on the southern tip of Manhattan Island. Tiny settlements sprang up on the Long Island shore and at nearby inland locations. Breucklen was established as an organized village in 1636, connected with Nieuw Amsterdam (Manhattan) by sailboat ferry. Brooklyn ceased to exist as a corporate entity on Jan. 1, 1898, being included as one of the five boroughs of the new City of New York.

From early days Brooklyn has been called "The City of Churches." Eminent preachers have occupied its pulpits, among whom were Bartholomew Creagh, Henry Ward Beecher, Newell Dwight Hillis, S. PARKES CADMAN, FRANCIS J. MCCONNELL, LYNN HAROLD HOUGH.

Despite lack of definitive documentation, it appears most likely that the first Methodist sermon was preached in Brooklyn by Captain THOMAS WEBB during the winter of 1767-68. Following him were JOSEPH PILMORE and FRANCIS ASBURY, whose Journals note frequent travels through Brooklyn, and the brothers, John and James Mann, local preachers of JOHN STREET CHURCH, New York. Summing up the hints of historical record, Noah Levings, early Brooklyn Methodist preacher, wrote: "Brooklyn continued to be visited occasionally by the preachers stationed in New York, and by the local preachers residing there." Prior to 1790 "Brooklyn was unquestionably an outpost of the New York station."

It was not until 1790 that the classes of Brooklyn Methodists were transferred from John Street Church to become a unit of the new Long Island Circuit. Shortly thereafter a society was established in Brooklyn, and Methodism in that growing community appeared as a separate conference appointment.

In 1787, while preacher-in-charge at New York, fragile Woolman Hickson preached in Brooklyn, standing on a table under trees along Sands Street. This dramatic episode prompted a surge of interest in Methodism. Hickson organized a class as part of the New York Society, the entries of the names of the class being in Hickson's writing in the John Street Church records. The first recorded class leader was NICHOLAS SNETHEN.

The original NEW YORK CONFERENCE had wide ranging boundaries, including all Long Island, New York and Westchester Counties, and much of western CONNECTICUT. This conference grew increasingly unwieldy, and in 1848 Brooklyn and Long Island, with parts of New York State and western Connecticut, were set apart as the NEW YORK EAST ANNUAL CONFERENCE.

Meantime, certain old vernacular churches and their related institutions were units of the EAST GERMAN, EASTERN SWEDISH, and NORWEGIAN-DANISH CONFERENCES. Negro churches that developed were appointments in the Delaware Conference. Thus five separate conferences held churches and institutions in the city, and later in the Borough of Brooklyn. After the turn of the century, the three vernacular conferences disappeared, their churches and institutions being absorbed by the various conferences within whose boundaries they sat. Acting upon the authority given by GENERAL CONFERENCE, the New York East and the New York Conferences merged in 1964 to form a new, greatly enlarged New York Conference. The churches of the DELAWARE CONFERENCE in New York City, including Brooklyn, have all adhered to the new New York Conference. The churches in Richmond Borough (Staten Island) have transferred from the NEWARK to the New York Conference. After the long years of conference and area division, Methodism in the total of New York City is now included within the bounds of only one conference, a great gain in administrative and spiritual power.

Several important institutions are included in Brooklyn Methodism. The Brooklyn and Long Island Church Society, an element in the previous New York East Conference, stands in the new New York Conference as coordinate with the New York City Society whose sphere is Manhattan and Bronx Boroughs. Henry C. Whyman is executive secretary of both Societies. The office is in Hanson Place-Central Church.

The Methodist Hospital of Brooklyn was chartered by the New York State Legislature, May 27, 1881, the first hospital to be built by American Methodism. Its complex of buildings occupies an entire block.

The Bethany Deaconess Hospital of Brooklyn, organized in 1895, was an institution of the East German Conference, entering New York East when the German Conference was liquidated. This hospital is recognized as one of Brooklyn's outstanding medical institutions.

The Brooklyn Methodist Church Home has served the conference for eighty-three years, and the Bethany Methodist Home came from the East German Conference. These institutions rank among the leading elements in Brooklyn in the care of the aged.

As the City of Brooklyn grew, other branches of Methodism entered the field. The dates are as follows: A.M.E., 1818; PRIMITIVE METHODIST, 1839; A.M.E. ZION, 1840; M. P. (at Williamsburgh), 1852; German-speaking church, 1852; Swedish-speaking church, 1869; FREE METHODIST, 1869.

The 1968 minutes of the New York Conference present the appointments to thirty-seven churches of the conference in the Borough of Brooklyn. Some are large—Kings Highway and Newman Memorial having over 1,000 members; some are small, mission locations in difficult areas, with less than one hundred members. The 1968 total membership of these Brooklyn churches was 12,966.

Hanson Place-Central Church is situated on Hanson Place and St. Felix Street, and is thus the easiest and most directly accessible Methodist church from all sections of Brooklyn as well as from much of Queens and Manhattan Boroughs.

In 1847 a small Methodist church was built on Dean Street. The location was not advantageous, and ten years later the property on Hanson Place at St. Felix Street was purchased. A gift of $1,000 from the first donor, Mary Powers, prompted many others to active participation in the project. Among these were Samuel Booth, then mayor of Brooklyn, and John Frank, a noted civic leader, who organized and led the new Sunday school.

Within a few years the first Hanson Place building proved inadequate, and an imposing new structure was dedicated in 1885. The organ was celebrated; Tali Essen Morgan developed a famous choir; the tiered galleries accommodated great congregations. Among the pastors who served in this period were JAMES M. BUCKLEY, CHARLES L. GOODELL, CYRUS D. FOSS, CHARLES E. LOCKE, and THEODORE S. HENDERSON.

Since the turn of the century, the area adjacent to Hanson Place Church has become largely business, wholesale food, industrial, and hotel in character. There are measurable enclaves of Negro, Puerto Rican, Chinese and other ethnic groups living within walking distance in crowded and squalid slum conditions. The function of the church has changed from the resounding pulpit in a residential area to the downtown missionary service center.

Under the impact of the changing conditions the need for a "Methodist and Protestant Center for Brooklyn" became apparent. The pastor of Hanson Place Church in the late 1920's, J. Lane Miller, and other leaders of the New York East Conference, were confident that Hanson Place Church should be the heart of the enterprise. On Feb. 23, 1927, the Summerfield Church, William C. Judd, pastor, merged with Hanson Place to form Central Church. The task of development became extremely difficult as "The Depression" took its toll in the value of pledges and subscriptions. FREDERICK B. NEWELL, then secretary of the New York City Society, gave unstinted help in advice and personal leadership, the financial interests involved being most generous. After some years of hardship and agony, the present building, standing on the old property, was consecrated Feb. 5, 1930, in the pastorate of J. Lane Miller and William C. Judd. The loyalty and heroism of S. J. Harding, William Kennedy (father and son), and many others of the laity, brought the project to culmination.

Modified Gothic in style, the structure is sturdy and inspiring. The vaulted interior, with skillfully arranged lighting, is worshipful and uplifting. The wood carvings of the Apostles, by Edgar Keen, are outstanding elements. Two other unique features in the sanctuary are a dozen stones, brought from the most important Biblical sites and placed in the chancel floor, and the Cross of the Knights of Jerusalem that dominates the symbolic carving of the altar and sanctuary and stands on the cornerstone.

Numerous interdenominational, cultural and professional groups hold their meetings in the hall and the sanctuary of the church. The administrative office of the Brooklyn and Long Island Church Society is located there. From the church consecration to 1964, when the New York East Conference merged with the New York Conference, more sessions of the New York East were held in Central than elsewhere. The ample facilities for religious education and social service are in constant use. Contacts with community and civic interests are effective. Across a number of years Central Church has given warm and generous support to evangelical work in CUBA, very meaningful in these late years of oppression.

The church school and congregational membership of Central Church are multi-racial. Caucasians are integrated with members of Negro, Puerto Rican, British West Indian, Chinese, Korean, and Filipino origin. This fact creates a significant influence in the conglomerate neighborhood, and throughout the intricately mixed Borough. Central Church continues to achieve its basic purpose, and steadily broadens its appeal as a vital church at the heart of the city.

Methodist Hospital of Brooklyn was the first hospital built by American Methodists. Chartered by the Legislature of New York State, May 27, 1881, the institution continues on the original 3 1/5 acres located near the geographical and population center of greater New York City.

JAMES MONROE BUCKLEY, founder of the Hospital, was pastor of the M. E. Church of Stamford, Conn. in 1879, when his church organist, visiting New York, was struck down by a runaway team and died for lack of adequate care and in an unchristian atmosphere.

In 1881 Buckley became editor of the Christian Advocate and wrote editorials calling on the Methodists to build a hospital. "The time has come when the Methodist Episcopal Church should turn her attention to providing charitable foundations. She is today, so far as we can learn, without a hospital, a bed in a hospital, a dispensary, . . ."

GEORGE INGRAHAM SENEY, President of The Metropolitan Bank, a Methodist minister's son and a liberal benefactor to the institutions of Methodism, gave 14 lots of ground and a total of $410,000 to start the project. The building of the first hospital began at once. The building has continued through 85 years.

Today this church-related hospital expends more than $8 million annually in its patient-care program. The hospital has 471 beds and 70 bassinets, and records more than 90,000 patients treated each year in its outpatient department, emergency rooms, and in-patient services.

Four annual conferences support the charitable programs: New York, Northern New Jersey, Troy, and Wyoming. The 160 member student body of the School of Nursing, established in 1888, comes largely from communities served by these conferences.

In 1959 a $7 million renewal program, including the erection of the Miner Memorial Pavilion, was completed. Mr. and Mrs. Stanley H. Miner gave $3 million in their wills for this purpose. In 1966 a $2 million Staff House, twelve stories high and containing 119 apartments, was erected to house student resident physicians, nurses and other key personnel close to the Hospital. The $25 million long range planning includes a nursing home pavilion of 200 beds; physician's office building; research buildings; and an ambulatory care center.

cate. Elected a bishop in 1944, he was assigned to the NEW ORLEANS area. In 1947 he made an official visit to Africa representing the COUNCIL OF BISHOPS, and in 1948 a visit to the mission stations in South America. His wife was Edith Crogmen, whom he married on Sept. 3, 1919, and who always joined him in his work.

Tall and imposing in appearance, Bishop Brooks was always welcome as a speaker as well as church leader. Death came in August 1953, at Waveland, Miss., and he was buried there.

BROOKS, WILLIAM SAMPSON (1865-1931), American bishop of the A.M.E. CHURCH, was born in Calvert County, Md., the son of Robert and Margie Brooks. He was educated at Centenary Biblical Institute (Morgan State College), 1886-94. He married Susan Williams, and after her death he married Elizabeth Carter. He served as pastor in Minnesota, Illinois, Iowa, Tennessee, Missouri, Kansas and Maryland. He was elected to the episcopacy in 1920 from the pastorate of Bethel Church, BALTIMORE, Md., and requested assignment to West Africa (1920-28). BROOMFIELD, JOHN CALVIN (1872-1950), American bishop, was born July 4, 1872 in Eyemouth, Scotland, the son of James and Christina (Mason) Broomfield. On Oct. 6, 1898, he married Moselle Mar Donaldson. In his youth Broomfield became a sailor on the high seas, but later he became a naturalized citizen of the United States, and lived at Beaver Falls, Pa. He attended ADRIAN COLLEGE, and was graduated from Geneva College in 1896. He later received the D.D. degree from Geneva

JOHN C. BROOMFIELD

College and from KANSAS CITY UNIVERSITY; and the LL.D. degree from Adrian and Central Colleges.

Broomfield was admitted on trial to the PITTSBURGH CONFERENCE of the M. P. Church in 1895, was ordained in 1896, and served successively at Uniontown, Fourth Church in Pittsburgh, and at Fairmont, W. Va. He continued on the roll of the Pittsburgh Conference, serving from 1924-1929 as its president, until elected a bishop of The Methodist Church by the delegates to the UNITING CONFERENCE in 1939.

He was traveling president of the M. P. Church, 1928-1936; in 1937 he was a member of the Edinburgh and Oxford Conferences; he was President of the M. P. Board of Missions and surveyed the work of the church in Japan, China and India; he was a member of the Administrative Committee of the M. P. Church and of the FEDERAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

He was admittedly the leader of his denomination. While he was serving as its President, he became chairman of the M. P. Commission on Methodist Union in 1931, and served in all meetings of the joint Commission on Union during the succeeding years. The PLAN OF UNION of the three Methodisms involved provided that since the united church was to be an Episcopal Church, the M. P. group, who had no bishops, should be empowered to elect two at the Uniting Conference. When that came at Kansas City in 1939, John C. Broomfield was immediately chosen by the M. P. delegates to be one of their two bishops, the other being JAMES A. STRAUGHN. The consecration of these two men as bishops of the new united Methodist Church was a high point in the ceremonies incident to union at KANSAS CITY.

Broomfield was cleverly introduced to the members of the Uniting Conference by Bishop JOHN MOORE who read a sort of citation as he presented the bishop-elect: "John Calvin Broomfield—a Methodist: Born in Scotland, and a naturalized American; a Methodist Protestant—and a Bishop!" The delegates applauded their new bishop who was assigned to the South Central Jurisdiction and given the presidency of the ST. LOUIS area for the next four years (1940-1944), when he retired for reason of age.

He was a lecturer and contributor to many church periodicals, and after retirement continued to preach vigorously and hold revival services in many pulpits over the land. He died very suddenly in 1950.

BROWN, ARLIO AYRES (1883-1961), American educator, was born April 15, 1883, in a Methodist parsonage at Sunbeam, Ill. He graduated from NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY in 1903, from DREW THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY in 1907, and then did graduate work at Union Theological Seminary, New York for four years. Honorary degrees were awarded him by SYRACUSE, BOSTON, CHATTANOOGA, and Northwestern Universities.

The first Social Survey of the NEWARK CONFERENCE was conducted by Brown in 1913-14. The following seven years he was superintendent of Teacher Training of the Board of Sunday Schools of the M. E. Church, but he also served as a major in the Army Chaplain Corps for a period during the first World War. On February 14, 1914, he married Grace Hurst Lindale, who was also born and reared in a Methodist parsonage.

In 1921 Brown began his work as a university president at Chattanooga University, 1921-29. He then became president of DREW UNIVERSITY, 1929-48. His administration there was marked by increased student enrollment and enlarged endowment. The Lenox Rose Memorial Library was erected and the Rose Memorial Scholarships established while he was president. A teacher said, "President Brown creates an atmosphere in which all of us can do our best work." He had an unusual ability to hold together some quite diverse elements in his faculty and to reconcile different groups in a very fine administrative way. In 1960 the Brown Memorial Lectureship in the Drew Graduate School was established by the gift of $35,000 from James B. Eliason.

Brown's educational responsibilities were extensive, serving as he did in the advisory councils of the International Council of Religious Education, the Y.M.C.A., the Boy Scouts of America, and the Department of Ministerial Training of the Methodist General Board of Education. He was the author of six books, the best known being A History of Religious Education in Recent Times. As a member of the Appraisal Committee of the Laymen's Foreign Missionary Inquiry, he participated in preparing the report entitled Rethinking Missions.

His death occurred on Dec. 19, 1961 at Wilmington, Del. and he was buried at Chestertown, Md.

BROWN, FANNIE KENNEDY (1859-1944), American missionary to BRAZIL, was born at Strawberry Plains, Tenn., on Oct. 28, 1859, the daughter and granddaughter of Methodist preachers. She studied at Martha Washington College, Abingdon, Va. and at an eastern conservatory, majoring in music. In 1887, she married Robert C. Brown of Culpeper, Va. and they had a little girl, Robbie. Within three years, both husband and child had died of pneumonia. A widow, Mrs. Brown taught music for several years at her alma mater.

She applied to the WOMEN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY of the M. E. Church, South to go to Brazil as a music teacher, was not accepted. Finally in 1895, on her brother James' insistence, and with him advancing her the passage money, Mrs. Brown sailed to Brazil. After a year in her brother's school in Taubaté, learning the Portuguese language and adjusting to the customs of the country, she received a letter from MARTHA WATTS who offered to share with her her salary of $750 a year if Mrs. Brown would teach music at the Colegio Americano, which she was opening in Petropolis, state of Rio de Janeiro. Mrs. Brown worked there with Miss Watts until circumstances closed this school. The two women were transferred to the Methodist Girls' School in PRACIACABA, and Mrs. Brown served there until her retirement.

Through her influence, many who otherwise would never have entered a Protestant church joined the Methodist choir and were converted. Many of the teachers in the Methodist schools came out of her classes. She started a Sunday School in one of the city slums; took the gospel message to jails, hospitals, and a nearby lepers' colony.

When growing deafness began to handicap her usefulness, she retired in 1937. After a few years with two sisters, she entered the Methodist Home in Gaithersburg, Md. where she died on Sept. 7, 1944.

BROWN, GEORGE (1792-1871), American minister and leader of the M. P. Church, was born in Washington County, Pa., on Jan. 29, 1792. His father came from England, married a Miss Stevenson, and settled on Pipe Creek in MARYLAND where they were members of the class formed by ROBERT STRAWBRIDGE, which by many historians is regarded as the first Methodist class in America.

In 1800 the parents moved to Jefferson County, Ohio. Young Brown enlisted in the United States Army in 1812 and became a sergeant. On August 13, 1813, he was converted in a camp meeting held near Baltimore by NICHOLAS SNETHEN, ASA SHINN and ALEXANDER MCCAINE, all of whom later identified themselves with the Reform Movement which opposed episcopacy and led to the METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH. He joined the M. E. Church and in 1815 was sent as an assistant to the Anne Arundel Circuit in Maryland. He entered the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE in 1816 and served for several years circuits in Maryland, Virginia and Pennsylvania. In 1823 he was PRESIDING ELDER of the Monongahela District and two years later he was in the PITTSBURGH CONFERENCE when it was set off from the Baltimore. In 1826 he was appointed to Steubenville.

Brown became interested in the Reform Movement and published in MUTUAL RIGHTS a series of articles addressed to the junior Bishop and signed Junius. In 1828 he withdrew from the parent church and joined the Associated Methodist Churches, which became the Methodist Protestant Church in 1830. He assisted in organizing the Ohio Conference of that church and was sent to Pittsburgh for two years. He was president of the Conference in 1831, 1832 and 1833. When the Conference divided in 1832 he remained in the Ohio section until 1836, when he transferred to the Pittsburgh Conference.

He served Allegheny City, the Ohio circuit, Pittsburgh, Connellsville and Manchester circuit, and was superannuated in 1853. He was eight times elected President of his Conference. In 1853 he was appointed to compile a new hymn book. In the same year he was elected President of the Board of Trustees of Madison College in Pennsylvania, and shortly thereafter he became President of the college. In 1860 and 1861 he was editor of the Western Methodist Protestant, published at Springfield, Ohio.

Brown was a member of the General Convention which organized the M. P. Church in 1830 and of nine General Conferences. He was awarded the D.D. degree by Madison College in 1853. He published Reflections of Itinerant Life in 1866, and a biography of Mrs. Hannah Reeves entitled The Lady Preacher in 1870.

He died on Oct. 26, 1871, at Springfield, Ohio, and was buried there.

BROWN, GEORGE (1835-1917), pioneer Australasian missionary, was born in England but grew up in New Zealand and entered the ministry of the Australasian Methodist Church in 1860. He was appointed to SAMOA, where he stayed for fourteen years. In 1871 he wrote to the Overseas Missions Board in Sydney calling for the opening of a new mission field in New Guinea and the neighbouring islands. He claimed it could be largely staffed from their existing areas. When his plan was accepted, he enlisted helpers to accompany him and gathered a band from TONGA, Samoa and Fiji. After their arrival in New Britain the first service was held on Sunday, Aug. 15, 1875. Though the missionaries were tolerated at first, in a few months trouble broke out and most of those brave pioneers and their wives lost their lives. Brown and his wife struggled on, laying the foundations for enduring service although they had to face the loss of two of their three young children.

He completed three terms in Britain before returning to Australia to become General Secretary for Missions, a position in which he served for another twenty-one years; this gave him an almost unbroken term of forty-eight years missionary service. He played a prominent part in founding not only New Britain but New Guinea and the Solomon Islands missions and also became Special Commissioner to Tonga for a very valuable period. In 1891 he was installed as President of the Conference of New South Wales and Queensland, completing his distinguished career by becoming President-General of the Methodist Church of Australasia in 1913.

He wrote George Brown, an Autobiography (London, Hodder & Stoughton, 1903) and contributed the chapter on "Languages" in James Colwell's A Century in the Pacific.

He passed away in 1917 and was buried at Core Hill Cemetery, N.S.W.

BROWN, JAMES GEORGE (1880-1956), Canadian minister, was born of Irish parents in Lakefield, Ontario on Sept. 6, 1880. He graduated from Victoria College, University of Toronto. He was ordained by the Bay of Quinte Conference in 1908, and after preaching in Beaverton and St. James' Church, Peterborough, Ontario, came in 1912 to British Columbia where he held several pastorates.

In 1923 he was appointed principal of the newly chartered Ryerson Theological College of the Methodist Church which, after church union in 1925, became part of Union College of British Columbia. As principal, Brown was instrumental in planning the new building and also in arranging for a cooperative program of lectures with the Anglican theological college. Through the years of inadequate financial resources and a shortage of students for the ministry, it was largely due to his untiring and sacrificial devotion that the college was able to keep open.

In 1936 he was honored with the presidency of Conference. Strong in the pulpit and able in administration, he was a worthy spokesman for it. He traveled extensively throughout the province on behalf of temperance, during the losing fight to retain Prohibition after the first World War. After retiring from the principalship of Union College in 1948, he and his family went to Oxford, where he studied extensively. On his return to British Columbia, he undertook the supply of the Reformed Episcopal Church in Victoria, B. C.

He died suddenly on Oct. 15, 1956.

Mrs. Brown became active in the temperance movement in Ohio, where her parents moved when she was only two years old. She was an officer of the Grand Lodge of Ohio Good Templars, 1866, rose to the chief office in the state and nation and was international chancellor in 1911. She lectured abroad on four occasions.

Mrs. Brown started the Bible Cadets; the movement for temperance lessons in Sunday school literature; temperance questions in the quarterly conferences of the M. E. Church; was one of the founders of the Prohibition Party in the United States; organizer and lecturer of the National Prohibition Alliance; and was active in many other similar movements. BROWN, MARY SUE (1885-1968), American teacher and missionary to BRAZIL, was born in Gatesville, Texas, on May 14, 1885. She received her M.A. from the University of Texas, graduated from SCARRITT COLLEGE, took graduate work at VANDERBILT, and received a B.S. in school-house construction from George Peabody College, Nashville.

She went to Brazil as a missionary in September, 1915, teaching first at the Colegio (Instituto Educacional) Piracicabano, for four years. She served next as Reitora (principal) of the COLEGIO ISABELA HENDRIX in BELO HORIZONTE, Minas Gerais, for six years; then as Reitora of the Colegio Americano in PORTO ALEGRE, Rio Grande do Sul, for twenty-five years. While serving in the last two named, she reorganized the curricula to conform to new government regulations, and designed and supervised the construction of their much admired school plants, a difficult job then for a woman in Brazil.

In Porto Alegre she was active both in community and Methodist church activities, serving on the state committee for planning elementary school buildings for rural areas (the first so named). Miss Brown was also a member of the Central Council, which is the link between the autonomous church of Brazil and the Methodist Church in the U.S.A. As a tribute to her work and character, the alumnae raised funds with which to build a chapel on the school grounds, named in her honor—the first time such was ever done in Brazilian Methodism.

After retirement in April, 1951, Miss Brown worked for three years among Latin Americans, in the Fort Worth, Texas, Wesley Community Center. After this, she lived in or near Waco, Texas continuing active in many ways, especially in the International Pan-American Round Table Association, and in 1952 was named its delegate to a biennial convention in Mexico City. She died on June 3, 1968.

BROWN, MORRIS (1770-1849), second bishop of the A. M. E. CHURCH, was born in Charleston, S. C. on Jan. 8, 1770. He was ordained deacon in 1817 and elder in 1818 by RICHARD ALLEN in PHILADELPHIA, Pa. Brown organized the Negro Methodists of CHARLESTON and vicinity into the first Negro M. E. Church in the South. In fear of implication in the Denmark Vesey plot to overthrow slavery in SOUTH CAROLINA, Morris Brown and other leaders fled to Philadelphia in 1822, where Brown became assistant to Allen at Bethel Church. In 1826 Brown became assistant bishop and in 1828, at Allen's explicit request he was elected the second bishop of the denomination. Morris Brown laid the foundations for the establishment of the A. M. E. Church in the West and Canada with the founding of the Ohio Conference (1830), the Canada Conference (July, 1840), and the Indiana Conference (October, 1840), having traversed all of this territory on horseback and advanced the church to the Mississippi River. Following a paralytic stroke, Brown was retired in 1845. He died on May 9, 1849.

BROWN, WILLIAM (1796-1868), American U. B. bishop, followed PHILIP WILLIAM OTTERBEIN not only in the office of bishop in the Church of the UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST, but also as pastor of the OLD OTTERBEIN CHURCH, BALTIMORE, Md. He was born July 7, 1796, the son of Peter Brown, who resided in Cumberland County, Pa. He was converted in 1812 and began a strong and beautiful Christian life.

In 1816 Brown was licensed to preach by the EASTERN CONFERENCE. He married Sarah Koch on Sept. 27, 1819, and was ordained to the ministry the same year.

He was a delegate to four GENERAL CONFERENCES, the first being in 1821. He took part in much of the discussion about the moral problem involved in the use of intoxicants, being the maker of the motion that no member of the church be allowed to operate a distillery.

BROWNLOW, WILLIAM GANNAWAY (1805-1877), American preacher and controversial political figure known as "Parson Brownlow," was born in Wythe County, Va. on Aug. 29, 1805. He received little formal education and became a carpenter at an early age. In 1826 he joined the HOLSTON CONFERENCE and was appointed to Black Mountain, in the ASHEVILLE, N. C. District, where he served two years. His other appointments were chiefly in various TENNESSEE TOWNS. He located in 1836.

Brownlow took great interest in public questions and wrote and spoke pungently on these and religious matters. As a result there were objections to passing his character at the conference of 1831 and he was censured by resolution. However, he was elected as a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE at the same session.

In 1838 he became editor of the Tennessee Whig, published at Elizabethton, and in 1839 he took over the Jonesboro Whig and Independent, which he edited for ten years. In 1849 he became editor of the Knoxville Whig and developed it into a large and influential organ. This projected him into politics on a national scale.

Brownlow was not at first opposed to slavery, but he was strongly pro-Union in the controversy that led to the Civil War. His house in KNOXVILLE was the last over which the Union flag was displayed, and the Whig was the last Union paper in the South. It was suppressed on Oct. 24, 1861. He was imprisoned late in that year but was released and sent to Ohio in March, 1862, returning to Tennessee with Burnside's invading army the following year.

In 1865 he was elected Governor by acclamation at a convention at which no one who sympathized with the South was allowed to be present. In 1869 he was elected to the United States Senate at the height of the Reconstruction era. The last bill he introduced was for the purchase of a site for Fisk University for Negroes at Nashville.

Brownlow wrote five books on political and religious subjects. One of these, published in 1856, was a defense of Methodism, entitled, The Iron Wheel Examined and Its False Spokes Examined, a reply to Elder J. R. Graves' criticism of the Methodist system entitled The Great Iron Wheel.

In 1836 Brownlow married Eliza Ann O'Brien whom he met on the Scott Circuit. He died on April 2, 1877.

BRUCE, PHILIP (1755-1826), American minister, born Dec. 25, 1755, was from a family of French Huguenot extraction, whose name, according to tradition, was originally De Bruise.

Early traditions, given wide circulation in W. W. Bennett's Memorials of Methodism in Virginia (1859) and followed consistently by later historians, say Philip Bruce was born near Kings Mountain and participated in that battle as a kind of chaplain. A study of land transactions, though, make it certain that his family lived just before and after the Revolutionary War in Wake County, N. C., and there is no other evidence of Methodism in the Kings Mountain section until after the Revolution was over. That he participated in the War on the American side is not to be questioned, and while he was on his very first circuit, he was thrown into the midst of a vicious Whig and Tory War, which wrecked that section.

Philip was the first of his family to embrace Methodism and entered the itinerancy from NORTH CAROLINA in 1781, where he was appointed to the New Hope Circuit near his home. For the next thirty-six years he was in the front ranks of the traveling ministry and filled the most important southern circuits and districts in the work. After annual conferences with clear bounds were set up, he was connected with the VIRGINIA CONFERENCE. He was a member of the Council of 1790, and one of a three-man committee to write a constitution for the METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

He assumed superannuate relations with the Virginia Conference in 1817 and spent the closing years of his life with his mother and brothers in TENNESSEE, where he died at the home of his brother, Joel Bruce, in Giles County, Tenn., on May 10, 1826. He was at that time the oldest traveling preacher in the M. E. Church with the exception of FREEBORN GARRETTSON.

BRUMBAUGH, THOBURN TAYLOR (1896-), American minister, missionary to JAPAN and executive secretary for East Asia in the Board of MISSIONS OF THE METHODIST CHURCH, was born in Agosta, Ohio, Aug. 4, 1896, the son of Edmund Green and Belle C. (Smith) Brumbaugh. His education included OHIO WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY (A.B., 1920; D.D., 1938), BOSTON UNIVERSITY (S.T.B., 1924), and further training at Union Theological Seminary, New York (S.T.M., 1930). Yonsei University at SEOUL, Korea gave him the LL.D. in 1957, and the Tokyo Union Theological Seminary in JAPAN the D.D. degree in 1959. He married Gladys Grace Davenport on Aug. 28, 1924.

After two years as an assistant and as student pastor, Brumbaugh was ordained and joined the West Ohio Conference of the M. E. Church in 1924. That year he became a missionary to Japan, serving there until 1941. He was in Tokyo from 1924 to 1925; Hirosaki, 1925-27; Sapporo, 1927-29; director of the Wesley Foundation in Tokyo, 1931-41, at which time, due to the war, he returned to America and became executive director of the Detroit Council of Churches, 1942-46. In 1947 he was made executive secretary for East Asia in the Division of World Missions, Board of Missions, with headquarters in New York, in which position he served for seventeen years. He became secretary of education for the World Division in 1965. During 1967-68 he was a special assistant for the United Board for Christian Higher Education in Asia, and in 1968-69 was state director of the Florida Chain of missions.

Dr. Brumbaugh was a second lieutenant in the United States Army and served the A.E.F., 1917-19, in France and Belgium. He was recipient of the Distinguished Alumni Award, Boston University, 1964. He wrote Religious Values in Japanese Culture, 1934; was the editor of the Japan Christian Yearbook, 1937, and of the Japan Christian Quarterly, 1939-41.

BRUMMITT, DAN BREARLY (1867-1939), American clergyman and editor, was born in Batley, England on Aug. 13, 1867, and emigrated to America in 1882. He studied at Kansas Agricultural College, earned degrees at BAKER UNIVERSITY and DREW THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, did post-graduate work at New York University, and received the honorary L.H.D. from SYRACUSE UNIVERSITY.

Brummitt entered the ministry of the M. E. CHURCH in 1891 and served as pastor at several towns in KANSAS, and at FORT SMITH and LITTLE ROCK in ARKANSAS. He embarked on his editorial career in 1901 as assistant editor of The Epworth Herald, official organ of the EPWORTH LEAGUE youth organization, in which position he served until 1910. He was manager of the circulation department of the Methodist Book Concern for two years, and in 1912 he returned to The Epworth Herald editorship. From 1924 to 1932 he was editor of the Northwestern Christian Advocate and then became editor of the Northwestern and Central editions of The Christian Advocate.

Brummitt was a delegate to the ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE at London in 1921 and a member of the Anglo-American newspaper mission to the war areas in 1918 and 1919. He was the author of Epworth League Methods, The Efficient Epworthian, War's End and After, and three novels. The last of the novels was named Shoddy, being a fictitious character who managed to get elected a Methodist bishop by certain devious means which the author evidently took delight in lampooning.

BRUNNER, JOHN HAMILTON (1825-1914), an American minister of the HOLSTON CONFERENCE, M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH, was born in Green County, Tenn., on March 12, 1825, and alternated between the pastorate and the Presidency of Hiwassee College (Madisonville, Tenn.) over the span of his active ministry. Thirty-three years of his ministry were spent as head of the college, founded in 1849. He had the distinction of being the oldest college president in the United States.

He was married on Dec. 10, 1850 to Elizabeth Key of Monroe County, Tenn., a sister of Postmaster-general Key in President Andrew Johnson's Cabinet. They had seven children.

Brunner was a preacher of the old school, rather terse and sententious in style, but lucid and comprehensive. He was a learned man, well read in all types of literature and history, teacher of renown, and an effective administrator.

G. C. RANKIN said of him in the Texas Christian Advocate, "He (Brunner) made it his business to see that no aspiring and worthy boy was ever turned down in his efforts to obtain an education. Forty years ago, poor and without friends, when I applied to him for entrance into that well-known school, he gave us his warmest welcome and at no time did he ever suggest to us the financial part of it. We sat at his feet until we had finished his course and then entered Holston Conference. Our love for him was like that of a son for a father. He stands out in memory today as the most valued counselor and friend we have ever had outside the home circle."

Brunner possessed literary gifts, which he expressed through the publications of his day. He was the author of several books, including Sunday Evening Talks to Children and The Union of the Churches. He was in the forefront of the leaders of his day in contending for the union of the then divided American Methodism. "Dr. John H. Brunner of the Holston Conference," says Bishop JOHN M. MOORE in his The Long Road to Methodist Union, "in a border territory where altar stood against altar, published a book, The Union of the Churches, in which he deplored the sectional feelings and border competitions, and pleaded for union on some basis that might be found."

Brunner died on Feb. 18, 1914, and is buried on the campus of Hiwassee College, overlooking the scenes of his labors. His wish was that after his earthly pilgrimage was closed, he would live on in the lives of students who fell under his molding influence.

BRUNSON, ALFRED (1793-1882), American minister, was born at Danbury, Conn., Feb. 9, 1793, the eldest of seven children. At thirteen years of age he was apprenticed to a shoemaker. Following his service as a soldier in the War of 1812, he was licensed to preach. In 1818 he formed a new circuit in Huron County, OHIO, and in six months time he had organized twenty-four appointments. Later in northwest PENNSYLVANIA, he organized a circuit 400 miles around with forty-four appointments. He preached in the Ohio and Pennsylvania Conferences, being a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE in 1832.

In 1835 he went to serve among the Indians in the Upper Mississippi valley, moving his family to Prairie du Chien, Wis. They went by boat from Meadville, Pa., a distance of 1,950 miles, taking their house with them—surely one of the first times that a pre-fabricated house was ever used. Brunson came to be the PRESIDING ELDER of a district extending from Rock Island, Ill. to the head of the Mississippi, and was the first Methodist preacher north of the Wisconsin River. He continued in this area for the remainder of his life.

Due to ill health he was at times forced to give up preaching, at one time being admitted to the Bar, practicing law and serving as a member of the Territorial Legislature. The WEST WISCONSIN CONFERENCE was organized in 1856, and Brunson was a delegate to the General Conference in 1860, 1868, and 1872. He was a chaplain in the 31st Regiment of Wisconsin Volunteers during the Civil War.

He was awarded an honorary M.A. degree by ALLEGHENY COLLEGE in 1834, and a D.D. by Galesville University in Wisconsin in 1861.

He was a man of great force of character, of indomitable will and wonderful perseverance. His habits of study and systematic thought continued throughout his long life. He was known throughout the church and in political circles as a writer and his articles concerning questions on political or ecclesiastical jurisprudence appeared in many newspapers and periodicals, including The Methodist Quarterly. He was also the author of A Western Pioneer, a two-volume autobiography.

Father Brunson, as he was affectionately known, died at Prairie du Chien, Wis. on Aug. 3, 1882.

BRUSH, WILLIAM (1827-1895), American minister and educator, was born Feb. 19, 1827, at New Fairfield, Conn. Although reared in poverty, he nevertheless, by dint of hard toil and study, completed the classic course at Yale College in 1850.

In October following his graduation, he was married to Electa J. Brush (of the same name) who became the trusted and beloved companion of all his after years. His active work in the ministry began in 1851 in the NEW YORK CONFERENCE, where he served successful pastorates until 1858. Then he transferred to the UPPER IOWA CONFERENCE and was appointed pastor of the M. E. church at Dyersville.

Brush was called, in 1860, to the presidency of Upper Iowa University at Fayette, Iowa, which position he filled for nine successive years. Entering again upon the active work of the ministry, he served a four-year term as PRESIDING ELDER of the Charles City district. In 1873, finding the rigor of the northern winter too severe for his wife's health, he decided to move south, locating at Austin, Texas, and became presiding elder of the Austin district. From the result of his eight years' labor in this field the Austin Conference was formed. In 1881 he again moved north and filled appointments as pastor of the churches at Maquoketa and Vinton, Iowa.

He moved to Dakota Territory in 1885 and became one of the founders and the first president of Dakota University, which position he filled for six years, until his appointment in 1891 by President Harrison as U. S. Consul to Messina, Italy. On his return from his foreign mission in 1892, he was elected chancellor of the University of the Northwest, at Sioux City, Iowa, where he labored until a few months prior to his death, which occurred at Englewood, Chicago, Ill., April 29, 1895.

Both church and Christian education are indebted to Brush for forty-four years of eminent and efficient service; eighteen years as college president and twenty-six years in the ministry. During this time his name was associated with many important issues and undertakings. On several occasions he acted as Chaplain of the House of Representatives in Washington, D. C. Five times he was elected delegate to the General Conference of the M. E. Church, and once received a large vote for the office of bishop.

BRUSSELS, capital of Belgium and historic European city, is noted for its art and architecture as well as the key position it occupies in central Europe. Its population was reported 1,000,744 (1969).

American Church (Wesley Church) was organized in 1923 in a room of the Methodist Central Building. The building was constructed in 1924 by H. H. STANLEY. It became "Wesley Church" in 1934. No services were held during the Nazi occupation, 1940-44. It resumed activities with the arrival of British and American armies in 1944. In 1959 it became an interdenominational American church and moved into new, larger premises in 1961, 19 Kattenberg, Boitsfort-Brussels. Pastors have been W. C. Cowart, 1923-24; W. C. Twynham, 1925-30; Fred Woodard, 1930-34; H. H. Stanley, 1934-40; WILLIAM C. THONGER, 1944-46; H. H. Stanley, 1946-55; W. Starnes, 1956-67; Kermit Morrison, 1958-62; and H. Mohler since 1962.

Central Building, Brussels, 5 rue du Champ Mars (Porte de Namur), is the headquarters of Belgian Methodism. From 1921 to 1940 it was called Maison Fraternelle. There are offices, conference rooms, and a social hall. The sanctuary of the Central Methodist Church was built in the garden in 1924 by H. H. Stanley. The building includes also a Protestant bookstore, the Bureau of Protestant Missions in the Congo (since 1945), the headquarter Central Methodist Church (French) of the Belgium Conference. Services were started in September 1921 in a room of the Methodist Central Building. The congregation was organized in 1922, and a fine building was constructed in a garden there in 1924 by H. H. Stanley. This has become one of the leading Protestant communities in Belgium. It receives state subsidies since 1964. Pastors have been G. W. WILMOT, 1922-40; R. Van Goethem, 1940-44; W. C. Thonger, 1944-46; and MAURICE DESCAMPS since 1946.

Clinique Protestante is a small Belgian Protestant Hospital of twenty-five beds, established at Uccle-Brussels in 1920 by the Dutch Reformed Church of Brussels and the Methodist Mission. It was seriously damaged by a V-I bomb in 1944. Plans are in preparation for a new modern building.

Faculte de Theologie Protestante, a Protestant theological school of university standards, was established in October 1950 (French section only) by the Evangelical Protestant Church, Belgian Missionary Church, and Methodist Church. The latter was represented by William G. Thonger, Maurice Descamps, and WILLIAM THOMAS, who served as president from 1952 to 1958. The Flemish Section was organized in 1954. A new permanent building was occupied in October 1965, with enrollment of eighty students.

Foyer des Enfants (Children's Home) is a Belgian orphanage opened in October 1920 by the Methodist Mission in a residential section of Brussels. For over thirty years the institution secured a Christian home to hundreds of destitute children. During the Nazi occupation (1940-44) twenty Jewish children were secretly kept and saved. In 1953 new child welfare legislation rendered the institution unnecessary. The old buildings were pulled down for erection of the Susanna Wesley Residence.

Librairie Protestante, Belgian Methodist bookstore, was established in 1926 in the Central Building of the Methodist Church in Brussels, 5 rue du Champ de Mars.

Les Marronniers School, the first and only Belgian Protestant High School for girls, was opened in October 1920 by the Methodist Mission at Uccle-Brussels, 112 Avenue Longchamp. During the financial depression in 1932 the school was compelled to close, in spite of its highly appreciated school record and enrollment of over two hundred.

The home has been operating since December 1958, with fifty residents under the direction of Mr. and Mrs. Ed Griffin-Thonger. Prior to opening the newly erected building, from April to October 1958, the building served very effectively as a Methodist Center for Protestant visitors coming to the Brussels Universal Exhibition of 1958. Over three thousand guests were received coming from twenty-seven countries.

Uccle-Brussels Methodist Church (French) was started as an annex of the Brussels Central Church in connection with the Susanna Wesley Residence. The church was organized in 1959 and has received subsidies from the state since 1965. Plans are at present being made for the construction of a regular church building. Pastors have been D. van Offel, 1959-62; A. Pieters, 1963; and P. Vandembroeck, since 1964.

BRYAN, JOHN (1770-1856), Welsh Methodist, was born at Llanfyllin, North Wales. He was converted in 1798 while he was employed at a draper's shop owned by a Methodist family at Rackny, near Gresford. He first joined the WELSH CALVINISTIC METHODIST society at Chester, but he soon left them for the Wesleyan society which met at the Octagon Chapel. In later years he became a staunch supporter of ARMINIANISM.

He began to preach in February, 1800, and the following year he was called into the itinerant ministry. Between 1801 and 1815 he labored in Wales with great success. In 1800 the Conference had appointed OWEN DAVIES and JOHN HUGHES as the first missionaries to North Wales;

but as neither of them was very fluent in the Welsh language, the addition of a gifted preacher like Bryan to the staff must have added considerably to its effectiveness. At times he was impetuous, and his witticisms were not always in the best taste, but his passion for evangelism bore rich fruit.

He translated a large number of the hymns of JOHN and CHARLES WESLEY into Welsh. In addition to translating the works of Owen Davies into Welsh, he also published some tracts and articles of his own, mainly in defense of Arminianism. He traveled in England from 1815 until 1824, when he left the ministry and settled in business in Leeds, moving to Caernarvon in 1831, where he died on May 28, 1856. Until near the end of his life he continued to serve as a local preacher.

HARRISON J. BRYANT

BRYANT, HARRISON J. (1899-), American bishop of the A.M.E. CHURCH, was born in Georgetown, S. C. on Nov. 20, 1899. He earned the A.B. degree at ALLEN UNIVERSITY and the B.D. degree at Payne Theological Seminary in Ohio. The honorary degrees of D.D. and LL.D. were later bestowed on him. Following his ordination as deacon and elder, he was the pastor of churches in South Carolina, Ohio and Kentucky. He was elected to the episcopacy in 1964 from Bethel Church in BALTIMORE, Md. He resides at Baltimore and supervises the work of the Fifteenth Episcopal District, comprising five annual conferences in South Africa.

BUCHANAN, THOMAS CLARKE (1850-1941), Canadian minister and home missions superintendent, was born near Richmond in eastern Ontario and was educated in the Richmond and Cobourg grammar schools and at VICTORIA UNIVERSITY. After a period as a probationer in the Montreal Conference, he was ordained as deacon in the IOWA CONFERENCE.

In 1884 he joined the Manitoba and Northwest Conference, where he served on several circuits, before his appointment in 1902 as superintendent of Methodist missions in Alberta. From 1902 to 1913 he was responsible for the whole province, and from 1913 until his retirement in 1923 for the northern section. As such, he was active not only in church extension, but also in the development of Wesley and MOUNT ROYAL COLLEGES.

Though modest and retiring, he was possessed of outstanding executive ability and energy. His superintendency coincided with years of heavy immigration and settlement in Western Canada, and the establishment and supervision of church missions and schools was his constant concern.

For his services he was elected president of the Manitoba Conference in 1902 and of the Alberta Conference in 1908. Wesley College conferred the doctorate of divinity on him in 1918.

BUCK, FANNIE LORRAINE (1898-), an American missionary to MEXICO and CUBA, was born to Francis Blumer and Frances Margaret (McDonald) Buck in Bessemer, Ala., Aug. 27, 1898. Volunteering for missionary work she was sent to Mexico in 1922, where she served for seven years in Chihuahua and Saltillo. Returning to the States for several years on account of the illness of her father, she was later sent to Cuba in 1936, where she served first as a teacher in Colegio Irene Toland. With a companion she became a pioneer of rural work in Cuba, traveling almost exclusively by horseback, and these two were the first women missionaries to be ordained ministers. Their first and second areas of work were Omaja and Baganuos, both in the Oriente Province.

In Baganuos she organized and built a church with two flourishing congregations, later a school and a large circuit. When the Union Theological Seminary was established in MATANZAS, she served as Dean of the School of Religious Education and as treasurer of the Seminary. At the same time she developed another rural area at Santa Rosa and under her direction chapels were built at Pueblo Nuevo, Rayonera, and Boca de Camarioca.

Her crowning achievement was serving as director of the Buenavista School for Girls in Marianao (HAVANA) when it became a part of the newly organized Candler University. In this position she remained until forced to leave by the communist regime. She was next to the last missionary to leave the island.

After leaving Cuba she continued to work under the direction of the METHODIST COMMISSION ON OVERSEAS RELIEF with Cuban refugees in MIAMI, until her retirement in 1965. At the present time she lives in Bessemer, Ala.

BUCK, PHILO M. (1846-1924), was a highly successful early American missionary in the North India and North West India Annual Conferences. A graduate of DREW THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, he arrived in INDIA in 1870. He labored five years at Shahjahanpur, five years as PRESIDING ELDER of the Kumaun District, one year at Kanpur, and five years as principal of the Philander Smith Institute in Mussoorie. He was then appointed to the Meerut District and remained there until his retirement in 1922. The membership within the District grew from 200 to 35,000.

He was thrice elected as delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M. E. CHURCH. In 1894 he wrote "the accessible people within our bounds number 600,000 or more." He made a profound impact on the public. The church grew rapidly in his district and in regions beyond, carried by influences generated under his ministry.

Buck wrote many books in Urdu and conducted an extensive correspondence with patrons in the United States, whose gifts were needed for his expanding program. A son, OSCAR M. BUCK, was for some years an instructor in the Bareilly Theological Seminary, and later for decades professor of missions in Drew Theological Seminary. A daughter, Dess, married James H. Wilkie and served with him many years in the LUCKNOW Annual Conference. Carrie McMillan, his wife, was an ardent evangelistic missionary.

Dr. Bucke has served on the Joint Commission on Membership and Training Materials of the Church, and of other important commissions on which the Book Editor traditionally serves. He was made a member of the executive committee of the Association of Methodist Historical Societies in 1960, and has been a member of the Commission on Worship since 1956; also a member of the Curriculum Committee of the Board of Education. New York Christian Advocate in which position he had a distinguished career from 1880 to 1912.

He was president of the Methodist Hospital in Brooklyn for more than thirty-five years. He was a delegate to every GENERAL CONFERENCE from 1872 to 1912, and exerted enormous influence. He was an editor in the field of the religious press par excellence. It was said that when any important matter came to the fore in public attention, many people did not know what to think until "Dr. Buckley's editorial" came out in The Advocate. At the General Conference it was once said that "until Dr. Buckley sat down, the General Conference was not in session." He lived at Morristown, N. J., and died on Feb. 8, 1920.

BUCKNER, WALTER C. (See JUDICIAL COUNCIL.)

BUDD, WILLIAM ROBERT (1853-1943), Irish minister, had a wide and extensive circuit ministry in which his administrative and financial ability became evident. As a result he had many official appointments, the outstanding one of which was General Secretary of the Home Mission Department of the church from 1908 until 1930, through which department the whole organization and finance of Irish Methodism was and is guided. In 1914 he was called to the highest office of the church, then officially known as Vice-President of the Conference.

FREDERICK JEFFERY

BUDDLE, THOMAS (1812-1883), NEW ZEALAND minister, was a native of Durham, England, and was reared in the Church of England. Attached to the Methodist Church at the age of seventeen, he became a probationer in 1835 and was ordained in 1839. He was probably the leading figure in the band of six missionaries who came to New Zealand on the mission brig "Triton" in 1840. His first appointment was at Waingarua (Rgalan), where he and his wife shared the home of JAMES WALLIS. Later instructed to found a new station at Porirua, near Wellington, the Buddles embarked at Kawhia on the "Hannah," which was wrecked on the bar as it attempted to leave the harbor. Instead of going south, the Buddles were appointed to Te Kopua—inland from Kawhia—where they spent four years.

When the Wesleyan Native Institution was opened in 1845 at AUCKLAND (on the site where Trinity College now stands), he was appointed principal. With JOHN WHITELEY, Buddle attended the first Australian Conference at Sydney in 1855, where he was appointed to the Manukau Circuit (with headquarters at Onehunga) and elected chairman of the Auckland District. After six years at Onehunga, he moved back into Auckland, dividing his time between European and Maori work.

Other appointments were Christchurch (1866) and Wellington (1870). In both of these centers he was chairman of the district. Nelson was his last circuit appointment, from whence he was called in 1875 to be principal of the recently opened Wesley Three Kings College, where he labored for six years until his retirement in 1881.

He was twice president of Conference, once of the Australasian Conference in Hobart in 1863, and on the second occasion, of the New Zealand Conference at Christchurch in 1874.

BUELL, MARCUS DARIUS (1851-1935), American scholar, teacher, and authority on the Greek New Testament, was born on Jan. 7, 1851, at Wayland, N. Y., his father being a Methodist preacher. Marcus Buell received his collegiate education at New York University, graduating in 1872. He then attended BOSTON UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY, graduating in 1875 with the S.T.B. degree. He joined the NEW YORK EAST CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church, serving successively four different churches.

In 1884, he was elected Professor of New Testament Greek and Exegesis at Boston University School of Theology. Before entering upon his new work, he spent a year abroad, studying at Cambridge and Berlin Universities.

From 1889 until 1904, Buell was Dean of Boston University School of Theology. He continued to teach until 1922. His devotion to the School of Theology was wholehearted. By choice, the Buells lived in the school's dormitory where they sustained a kind of parental relation to the students. The distinguished professor-dean was affectionately called "Daddy Buell" by all the students.

Buell was such an enthusiastic teacher of the Pauline Epistles that it was difficult for some of the students and alumni to dissociate him from the Apostle Paul. Some of them thought that Buell looked like Dürer's portrait of Paul, with scraggly beard and glittering eyes.

BUENOS AIRES, capital and metropolis of ARGENTINA, is one of the great cities of the world, with a population of four million and more. It is a center of commerce and trade of the political, social, and cultural life of Argentina. There are approximately ten Methodist churches in the city and sixteen others in the metropolitan area about Buenos Aires, with something like 3,000 full members. For Methodist beginnings and development in Buenos Aires, see ARGENTINA.

Methodist institutions in Buenos Aires include the American School, known as the "ragged school," which existed from 1883 until 1925. For girls of poor families, it was a school which was opened with support of the Board of Missions and the WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY of the M. E. CHURCH. In 1888 it became a boarding school, the only Protestant school with higher education for girls. Leonora Le Huray added a training school for teachers, with twenty-five pupils. Economy in rent necessitated many moves with loss of patronage. In 1910 land and a building were purchased in a suburb known as Flores, and the school grew rapidly. It flourished in that location for fifteen years, but in 1925 it was discontinued by decision of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society. Grace Barstow, the missionary then in charge, returned to the U.S.A. On the premises of the school in Flores later was built the FACULTAD EVANGELICA DE TEOLOGIA (Union Theological Seminary).

CENTRAL CHURCH, BUENOS AIRES

Central Church is a prominent Methodist church on Rivadavia Avenue, Buenos Aires, said to be the largest street in the world. Along with the pioneer First Church, on Corrientes Avenue, Central Church has shared in much of the history of Methodism in the city. In 1932 the Central Church pastor, JUAN E. GATTINONI, became the first Latin American to be elected a Methodist bishop.

Other pastors who have become bishops are ENRIQUE C. BALLOCH, JULIO M. SABANES, SANTE UBERTO BARBIERI, and CARLOS T. GATTINONI. The congregation conducts a vigorous ministry of worship, education, and service. Some of the headquarters offices for the Argentina Annual Conference are housed in its building.

Colegio Ward is a school in Ramos Mejia, sponsored by the United Methodist Church and the Disciples of Christ. Unique in its country, though similar to many private schools in the U.S.A., it has been called an important showcase for Protestantism in Argentina. The school was founded in 1913 under auspices of the Board of Foreign Missions of the M. E. Church. It was made possible by a donation from George S. Ward in memory of his mother, Mrs. Gracey S. Ward. In 1917 the Disciples of Christ joined in sponsorship. Colegio Ward has some twenty buildings on a campus of twenty-eight acres. Enrollment in 1966 was 960, of which about 140 were boarding students. The school is coeducational. It offers primary classes, normal school, and a college preparatory course, following the official Argentine curriculum. It is recognized by the government and enjoys high prestige in Argentina and adjoining countries. Administration is entirely in the hands of Argentine citizens, and the only missionary on the staff is one in the library. For a number of years it has been fully self-supporting. It has its own scholarship program, which has been helped from time to time by the Methodist Board of Missions in New York. In 1963 Colegio Ward celebrated its fiftieth anniversary by inaugurating its Aden Center, named in memory of its most important director, FRED ADEN, a missionary who headed the school for thirty-seven years. The center consists of a chapel, a library (open to the community), and a laboratory building. Alumni and friends contributed half of the cost, and the school supplied the other half. The Woman's Division of the Board of Missions later contributed a language laboratory.

BUFFALO, NEW YORK, U.S.A. In 1807 what is now Buffalo was included in a vast circuit designated as Holland Purchase in the Genesee District of the PHILADELPHIA CONFERENCE. The area became a part of the GENESEE CONFERENCE when it was formed in 1810, and in 1812 the Holland Purchase was divided, and what is now Buffalo was in the New Amsterdam Circuit. In 1813 James Gilmore visited the hospital and preached to the soldiers at what is now Buffalo. In 1817 a class of eight or nine persons was formed at Buffalo, and the next year Clezen Fillmore was appointed to Buffalo and Flat Rock. Despite some opposition to Methodism in the community, Fillmore built a 25 by 35-foot church, the first to be erected in the region. He reported forty-five members in 1819, and eighty-two the next year. Fillmore, who lived until 1875, was appointed pastor four times in Buffalo, and served twenty-seven years as presiding elder. He was influential in the founding of Genesee Wesleyan Seminary at Lima, N. Y., in 1832. Methodist membership in Buffalo grew slowly—250 in 1838 and 535 in 1850—but by 1876 there were eight churches with a total of 1,846 members. There has been a Buffalo District since 1825.

There was one German Methodist church in Buffalo with over sixty members when the EAST GERMAN CON-

ERENCE was formed in 1866. In the 1890's there were three churches with over 200 members. The last of the German work in the city was absorbed into the English-speaking churches in 1936.

The Buffalo Christian Advocate was launched Jan. 1, 1850 by J. E. Robie. It continued for some years and was finally merged with the New York Christian Advocate. The 1860 GENERAL CONFERENCE was held in Buffalo. In 1883 the Buffalo Methodist Episcopal Union was organized, and in 1889 EPWORTH LEAGUES were organized in twenty-one Buffalo churches. In 1890 the Buffalo Deacons Home was established.

In 1969 The United Methodist Church had sixteen churches in Buffalo with 5,900 members, property valued at $5,669,000, and $505,000 raised for all purposes. Central Park is the largest church with 839 members and a plant valued at $1,095,000.

BUFORD'S BRIDGE, SOUTH CAROLINA, U.S.A., is a ghost town which now holds Mizpah Methodist Church, which is the last vestige of what once was a thriving community. It is located between Bamberg and Allendale in southern SOUTH CAROLINA. This historic church is a white frame building a few feet from a highly traveled highway. Mizpah is not only a picturesque site but also a sacred institution to those who know its history. It was the only building left by the northern army under General W. T. Sherman when that army made their march through the south burning edifices everywhere.

The legend is that Sherman left the church and burned all the other buildings in Buford Bridge because he was a Methodist. The church itself dates from 1832, the place of worship then being two miles from the present location. The present church building has been a place of inspiration since 1856. On July 25, 1946, a marker was unveiled just off the national highway indicating the site of Buford's Bridge and something of its history.

Worship is conducted at Mizpah every Sunday, usually at three in the afternoon, and the church participates fully in the program of South Carolina Methodism. Early settlers of the town and Mizpah church members bore the stalwart names of Brabham, Kearse, Kirkland, McMillian, and Moye, and today many of their descendants reside in the surrounding communities. Descendants of these and other old families come back usually on the third Sunday in July for a reunion each year.

After unification he served with C. A. BOWEN as church school editor at NASHVILLE until his retirement in 1944. He then moved to Bemus Point, N. Y., where he continued to write and to preach. Bugbee was a delegate to the 1924, '28, '36, '40, and '44 GENERAL CONFERENCES and to the 1939 UNITING CONFERENCE. He published five books: Mosaic Map of Madeba, 1901; The Man Who Was too Busy to Find the Child, 1915; Flutes of Silence, 1920; Living Leaders, 1923; and Christ Today, 1926. A quiet, unassuming man, Bugbee nevertheless exerted great influence among his colleagues by his character and his ability. He was fatally injured in a traffic accident while en route to church, Sunday, Feb. 22, 1948. Funeral services were held in the Bemus Point Church.

BULANDSHAHR is a district and town west of the Ganges in Uttar Pradesh, INDIA. The number of Christians scattered through 796 villages of the district is reported as 37,595. They are served by fifteen ministers and eight teachers. The city is headquarters both for the government and the church in the district.

The first Methodist work in Bulandshahr was projected from Meerut. Missionaries based there, including PHILO M. BUCK, toured extensively in the district. Several women missionaries, occasionally two at a time, lived in the city, but no male, Methodist, non-Indian minister ever made his residence in the district.

Primary schools have been established and maintained for a few years in various villages, but no boarding school, hospital, or clinic has been set up by the church within the district. A few children from Christian homes have attended boarding schools in Chaziabad and Meerut. The converts in the district are, with rare exceptions, from the ranks of the socially and economically oppressed. During the last quarter of a century all the district superintendents have been Indians.

BULGARIA, proclaimed as the People's Republic of Bulgaria in September 1946, is situated in the Balkan Peninsula in southeastern Europe. It is bordered in the north by the Danube River and Rumania; on the east by the Black Sea; on the southeast by Turkey; on the south by Greece; and on the west by YUGOSLAVIA. In 1968 the population was estimated at 8,370,000. The principal Bulgarian cities are Sofia (pop. 810,300), the capital city; Plovdiv (pop. 225,800), Varna, and Burgas. The principal religious groups are the Orthodox (89 percent), Muslim (9.54 percent), Roman Catholics (.78 percent), Protestant (.13 percent), and Jewish (.04 percent). Bulgaria is a member of the United Nations.

In the 1850's the Missionary Society of the M. E. CHURCH expressed interest in entering the Bulgarian territory then under Turkish occupation. The American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, a Congregational agency, worked in Turkey for some years with some success. Upon a suggestion of the American Board, the two missionary agencies agreed to open almost simultaneously mission stations in Bulgaria. The Methodists opened their first one in 1857. Initially there was very little success among the Bulgarian nationals, but in 1869 the first Bulgarian Methodist society was organized by the first Bulgarian Protestant convert, Gabriel Eliev, in Svishtov. The work was carried on under trying conditions, the land being ravaged by war, a struggle for independence, and hostility. A number of Protestants suffered martyrdom, both from the Turks during the Russo-Turkish War of 1877-78, and from the intolerant Orthodox populace.

Yet there were many bright moments. Not the least was the founding of a Boys' School and a Girls' School in 1880. The Girls' School proved to be one of the most successful Methodist institutions in Bulgaria. But in 1948 it was taken over by the government and turned into a school for foreign languages. The two schools, which were located in Svishtov and Lovetch respectively, stimulated fairly vigorous churches in those towns. In addition to these, there were churches in Tirnovo, Shumen, Ruschuk, Varna, and Tultcha. By 1892 the work was sufficiently strong to warrant the organization of the Bulgarian Mission Conference, consisting of about twenty ministers. Of the missionaries ALBERT LONG was perhaps the most useful to the Bulgarians. He and Elias Riggs, a Congregational missionary, worked together with two Bulgarians on the translation of the Bible into the Bulgarian vernacular. This was completed in 1871.

Prospects for good work were then increasing. Suddenly they were frustrated by the Balkan War of 1912-13 and the first World War. Most of the churches ceased operating during the war years, and the pastors remained without any financial support. With the termination of the first World War, the Methodists were enabled to revive rapidly, especially as the native efforts were matched by the support of American Methodists. The number of ministers increased, many of them having been sent abroad for their theological studies, especially to the Methodist Theological Seminary in FRANKFORT, GERMANY.

With the faithful support of Bishop JOHN L. NUELSEN, Elmer Count, Alfons Pratsch, and others, the Bulgarian Methodists made a gradual comeback until the outbreak of the second World War. The end of this war spelled the end of the Bulgarian monarchy and brought about the gradual assumption of power by the Communists. By 1948 the takeover was complete. Representatives of The Methodist Church visited the Bulgarian churches, but since 1950 the Bulgarian Methodists have had to sever all ties with world-wide Methodism. The Methodist Church in Bulgaria was proclaimed "independent," but no session of the Annual Conference could be held these last years. Yet the churches are finding new ways to operate and many are ready to acknowledge God and to testify to the vitality of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, their Lord and Savior.

Bulgaria Provisional Annual Conference. As stated above the Bulgaria Mission Conference was organized in 1892. It was empowered in 1924 by the GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M. E. CHURCH to become an Annual Conference, provided it met the disciplinary conditions set forth at that time. It remained a Mission Conference until 1940, when it was recognized in the first General Conference of The Methodist Church as a Provisional Annual Conference. It has so remained and is so recognized in the 1968 Discipline (Para. 1901). It is in the Central and Southern Europe Central Conference Area and is administered by the bishop at GENEVA, the headquarters of that Area.

JAMES BULLER

BULLER, JAMES (1812-1884), New Zealand minister, was born at Helston, Cornwall, England, of Baptist parents. At the age of twenty he joined the Methodist Church. In 1835 he emigrated with his wife to AUSTRALIA where he agreed to act as tutor, for two years, of NATHANIEL TURNER'S large family. When Turner went to NEW ZEALAND in 1836, Buller went with him and soon found all his spare time taken up with Maori mission work.

Recommended by the district meeting, he was accepted as a probationer in 1837 and was ordained in 1840. In 1838, he was given sole charge of the Newark Station at the Hokianga Heads, but a few months later was transferred to the Kaipara Station at Tangiteroria. A year after that he was appointed to Port Nicholson (WELLINGTON). Eager to begin, he set out to walk—a journey of about five hundred miles. He arrived in time to conduct worship aboard the first immigrant ship "Aurora."

Unhappily, he soon found that a site thought to have been reserved for the mission was in the hands of the New Zealand Land Company. Perplexed, he sailed north almost immediately to consult his chairman. In a short time, Buller was sent back again to Tangiteroria, from which base he pioneered Methodist work among the European community in AUCKLAND. The first service was held in September, 1841, and twenty months later, a church was opened in High Street. He remained at the Kaipara Station until 1852.

Transferring to the European work, Buller took up an appointment in Wellington in 1855. He moved to Christchurch in 1860, where the famous Durham Street Church was opened during his six-year ministry. Appointed to Auckland in 1866, he had to face the responsibility of a heavy debt incurred by the building of Pitt Street Church. In 1870 he was appointed to Thames, where the discovery of gold had attracted many newcomers. His active ministry reached its end with a further term at Durham Street Church from 1873 to 1876. He was elected president of Conference in 1875.

In retirement he visited England, where he persuaded over a dozen young men to offer for work in New Zealand, and wrote his memoirs under the title Forty Years in New Zealand (1878). Returning to New Zealand in 1880, he spent his remaining years in Christchurch, where he died on Nov. 6, 1884.

BULLOCK, DILLMAN S. (1878-), American agricultural missionary to CHILE, was born in Elba, Mich. He went to Temuco, Chile, in 1902 as an agricultural missionary of the Church of England, remaining there until 1912, when he returned to the U.S.A. as director of the Agricultural School in Marinette, Wis. From 1916 until 1920 he was an extension specialist with the University of Wisconsin. Then in 1920-23, Bullock was the first trade commissioner of the U. S. Department of Agriculture in Buenos Aires, Argentina.

In 1923 he returned to Chile under the auspices of the M. E. CHURCH as director of a newly organized agricultural school at Angol. He served as director of the EL VERGEL AGRICULTURAL INSTITUTE as well as pastor of the church there from 1924 until 1946, when he became director of a museum bearing his name, provided by the Methodist churches of MICHIGAN. He was ordained and became a member of the Chile Annual Conference in 1932. With ELBERT REED, he helped through the years to build El Vergel into the commanding and unusual institution it is today. He was retired by the Board of Missions in 1953, but remained in Chile to direct the museum and participate in the life of the agricultural school.

He was honored with the Doctor of Science degree by the College of the Pacific in 1939 and the Alumni Award for Distinguished Service by Michigan State University in 1956. The Bernardo O'Higgins Award of Merit, highest honor the Chilean government bestows upon a foreign resident, was given to Bullock in 1947 for his work in agricultural education. In 1965 the Chilean Scientific Society declared him an honorary member, and he is an honorary member of three other scientific societies in Chile and one in Argentina.

Bullock's collections of natural history material have revealed at least 116 species new to science, and twenty-three of these bear his name. They include birds, mammals, amphibians, plants, mollusks, insects, and fish. Bullock's archaeological studies discovered a civilization predating the present Indian cultures in the area, and he has an extensive collection of artifacts from this civilization.

BULTITUDE, ELIZABETH (1809-1890), British Methodist, was born at Hardwick, Norfolk, of Wesleyan parents. She was converted at a PRIMITIVE METHODIST CAMP MEETING at Mousehold Heath in the same county in 1826, when seventeen years old. Six years later, in 1832, she began her work as a female itinerant preacher in the Norwich Circuit. She traveled for thirty years and retired to Norwich in 1862. Her proud boast was that in her thirty years of itinerant ministry she missed only two appointments, and these on account of severe weather conditions. She was accustomed to preach five to six times a week, and three times on each Sunday; most of her journeys were made on foot. Two thirds of her ministry was in East Anglia, but in the last nine years she went further afield. She was the last of the Primitive Methodist women preachers, as SARAH KIRKLAND was the first. She died in Norwich on May 14, 1890.

BUMBY, JOHN HEWGILL (1808-1840), New Zealand minister, was born at Thirsk, England, and entered the ministry in 1829. After notable work in Birmingham, he volunteered for work in NEW ZEALAND. Though still a young man, his gifts of leadership were so marked that the missionary committee appointed him superintendent of the New Zealand Mission succeeding NATHANIEL TURNER, in 1839. Later that year, Bumby went on an extensive tour of the southern districts with JOHN HOBBS, visiting WELLINGTON, Cloudy Bay, Kapiti, New Plymouth and Kawhia. In April, 1840, the brig "Triton" arrived with a number of missionaries aboard, including General Superintendent J. Waterhouse. After Waterhouse had made a full inspection of mission activities at Mangungu, it was suggested that Bumby should accompany him on the "Triton" as far as Kawhia, and then return overland. On June 26, 1840, while being rowed across the Hauraki Gulf, Bumby's canoe capsized and he and thirteen of twenty Maori companions were drowned. His death was a grievous loss to the New Zealand Mission.

BUNTING, JABEZ (1779-1858), British Methodist, was born in Derbyshire, May 13, 1779, of devoted Methodist parents. His father was a tailor in poor circumstances, yet he managed to give his son an excellent education. During a course of medical training, Bunting was moved to offer for the WESLEYAN METHODIST ministry and was accepted by the CONFERENCE of 1799. In 1803 he was appointed to LONDON, where, in addition to his circuit duties, he undertook the straightening of the tangled affairs of the BOOK ROOM and the Missionary Society. From 1814 to 1819, and again from 1824 to 1827, he was the secretary of the Conference.

On four occasions he was elected to the chair of the Conference, first in 1820 and thereafter at intervals of eight years. From 1821 to 1824 he was the CONNEXIONAL EDITOR. His enthusiasm for foreign missions helped to establish missionary meetings throughout the denomination. Through his advocacy, the Theological Institution for the training of the ministry was established in 1834, and from that year to 1857 he was nominally its president (see THEOLOGICAL COLLEGES). He did much to weld Methodism into a compact and efficient ecclesiastical corporation. One of his reforms was the inclusion of laymen on conference committees.

For many years Jabez Bunting was the most dominating and controversial figure in Methodism and also the storm center of contending opinions and policies, particularly during the Warrenite (see SAMUEL WARREN) agitation of 1833-35, and that of the FLY SHEETS in 1849. Bunting's supporters and admirers were many and ardent; and his opponents were equally ardent in their opposition, though fewer in numbers. But all parties were compelled to acknowledge his sterling Christian character and sincerity of purpose, his outstanding gifts of leadership and statesmanship, his cultured, logical mind and power in debate, his strong personality, and his popularity and power as a teacher. He died June 16, 1858.

BUNTING, THOMAS PERCIVAL (1810-1885), British Wesleyan Methodist, was born in 1810, the third son of JABEZ BUNTING. He became a solicitor in Manchester. He is best known for his unfinished biography of his father, The Life of Jabez Bunting. After publishing "Vol. I," covering the years 1779-1811, in 1859, he left at his death a quarter century later a manuscript taking the story only to his father's fiftieth year. G. Stringer Rowe completed the account and published the entire work in 1887.

Bunting also contributed the biographical introduction to the memorial volume for his brother, WILLIAM MACLARDIE BUNTING. There are references to him in Side Lights on the Conflicts of Methodism (1898) by BENJAMIN GREGORY, and it is clear that he took his father's part vigorously as a layman in the FLY SHEETS controversy. He was the father of Percy William Bunting, the social reformer and editor of The Contemporary Review.

BUNTING, WILLIAM MACLARDIE (1805-1866), British Methodist, eldest son of JABEZ BUNTING, was born on Nov. 23, 1805, in Manchester, and entered the Wesleyan ministry in 1824. After serving in a number of circuits, ill health forced him to a premature retirement in 1849, but he continued to preach and work in a number of ways, becoming one of the honorary secretaries of the Evangelical Alliance and also of the British Society for the Propagation of the Gospel Among the Jews. Some of his writings were collected in a memorial volume, which included hymns and sacred poems. He died on Nov. 13, 1866 in Kentish Town, London.

He served as a member of the Board of Christian Education of his denomination and was director of adult and youth work for that board. From 1943 to 1946 and from 1948 to 1950, he was a chaplain in the United States Army and reached the rank of Major. He was elected bishop in 1962 and is chairman of the Publishing Board of the C. M. BURBANK, CALIFORNIA, U.S.A. First Church. In the year 1883 a Sunday school was organized in the historic Providencia School. The surrounding community was largely ranches and the population consisted of a few scattered families. The first Methodist church was built and dedicated on Sept. 14, 1884. This building was used for a period of four years, then allowed to stand vacant and later sold and converted into a residence which is now owned and occupied by one of the church members.

The second church was built in 1888. This was one year after the City of Burbank was established, and this building served the growing community until 1919. The development of the property at Third and Olive was begun in 1919 with the building of the parsonage, which was used as a church until January 1921. At that time the church basement was completed and was used for services until a new building was dedicated in October 1922. The membership was then 276 and the population of Burbank was approximately 3,000.

Due to the mushrooming of population to 85,000 as the result of World War II, the church found itself faced with inadequate facilities to serve its 1,000 members. In 1944 a new building fund campaign was begun and $22,000 was raised for the purchase of property on which to relocate the church. On Sept. 19, 1950, with appropriate ceremonies, ground was broken and the building task was begun. Using not only contributed money, but contributed labor as well, the dream of expanding facilities came closer brick by brick to reality.

By the end of the pledge period it was necessary to launch another building fund campaign, which resulted in the pledging of $75,000, which with the $91,650 obtained from the sale of the old property to the court for a court building, made possible the completion of a new edifice.

The first services in the new sanctuary took place May 25, 1952, although the early morning services had been held in the chapel of the incompleting church since February of that year. Consecration Sunday was Sept. 14, 1952.

Since the completion of the church plant in 1956, there has been a steady growth in membership and program. By 1970 the membership was 1,880. The value of all property was listed at $733,000. Benevolences are about thirty percent of the church's giving.

BURD, ISAAC C. (1863-1946), an American EVANGELICAL CONGREGATIONAL layman, was a businessman in Shamokin, Pa. who gave the first property for the organization of the Burd and Rogers Home for the aging. This institution has cared for hundreds of aged people, and is under support of the EVANGELICAL CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH. Following the merger of The United Evangelical denomination with the EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION to form The Evangelical Church in 1922, the East Pennsylvania Conference, a majority of whom refused to enter this merger, were without any church home for aging. Burd and his sister-in-law, Catherine Rogers, donated a farm near Herndon, Pa. for this purpose. This was located adjacent to the historic Herndon campmeeting ground in which Burd was also a lay leader. The Home was later moved to Myerstown, Pa. and has ministered to retirement needs of people outside of the denomination as well as within. Burd also served on the Board of Publication, the Educational Aid Society and earlier as a trustee of Albright College at Myerstown, Pa. He was born July 9, 1863 in Swengel, Union Co., Pa. and died Nov. 23, 1946 at Shamokin, Pa. where his body was laid to rest.

BURDSALL, RICHARD (1735-1824), British LOCAL PREACHER, was born at Kirby Overblow, Yorkshire. On New Year's Day, 1751, he heard WILLIAM GRIMSHAW in a barn at Bingley and was convinced of sin. He received a sense of peace in May, 1762, after reading CHARLES WESLEY's sermon on "Awake, thou that sleepest." He claimed a cleansing from sin following Christmas of that year, and began expounding the Bible to neighbors in his own home and then in the preaching house when the preacher failed to arrive. He was doubtful of his call, but eventually was appointed and spent seventeen years in LEEDS Circuit. He preached in North Lincolnshire, the East Riding as far as HULL, and in the North Riding. He declined an invitation to become a traveling preacher and another to be pastor of an independent congregation, saying he preferred to keep to the trade of buckle making.

He supplied for the traveling preacher in YORK Circuit, 1778-79, and moved there in 1782. He was the class leader of eighty members at times. He died Feb. 25, 1824.

BURGESS, HENRY THOMAS (1839-1923), was a prominent and influential Wesleyan Methodist minister in South AUSTRALIA in the latter half of the nineteenth century. Born in England, he came to South Australia in 1848 and ten years later was received, at the age of nineteen, as a candidate for the ministry. The whole of his active ministry, covering a period of forty-four years, was spent in rural and suburban circuits in South Australia.

In 1880 and 1890 he was President of the Wesleyan Conference in South Australia. He was twice Secretary-General of the Australian Conference and President of the national body from 1897-1901.

Burgess was one of the chief architects of the Methodist union which was realized in South Australia in 1899. His contribution was recognized in his election as President of the first United Conference in that State in 1900. He retired from the active work in 1902.

Burgess was a man of wide cultural and literary interests, a regular contributor to the daily Press, the author of several books, and editor of an encyclopaedia of South Australia. It was for his work in the field of letters that he was awarded an honorary D.D.

BURGESS, JOHN (1821-1897), American preacher, was born May 2, 1821, in New Market, Frederick Co., Md. He was baptized in infancy by NICHOLAS SNETHEN. In early childhood he removed to Mt. Vernon, Ohio, where he was reared in a home, described by ADAM MILLER as "the half-way house for Methodists between the Atlantic Ocean and the Rocky Mountains." With law as his professional choice, he attended Kenyon College and then entered Newark Seminary in Ohio at the age of seventeen, graduating with honor in 1841. He was licensed to exhort in 1842 and, soon afterward, to preach, while teaching in Sandusky County, Ohio. He was employed, in 1843, by John H. Power to travel Amity Circuit, NORTH OHIO CONFERENCE, M. E. Church, and entered that Conference's itinerary in 1844, beginning a career which entailed twenty-eight moves and covered fifty-four years. Ordained a deacon in 1846 by Bishop HAMLIN and an elder in 1847 by Bishop JAMES, Burgess labored ten years in Ohio before transferring to the ILLINOIS CONFERENCE and, from thence, in 1858, to the IOWA CONFERENCE.

He was Chaplain of the Thirtieth Iowa Infantry during the Civil War. In 1867 Burgess was PRESIDING ELDER of the Albia District, serving for one term. He was granted a supernumerary relation in 1873, retiring to Keokuk, Iowa, where he died May 6, 1897.

BURGESS, WILLIAM (1845-1930), British missionary pioneer in INDIA, was born in November, 1845, and appointed as a Wesleyan missionary to Madras in 1869. Part of his work was superintending the institution for the training of Indian ministers, in addition to evangelistic work and preaching. In 1878 he began to learn Telugu in order to preach to workers who had come to Madras from the Nizam's dominions in HYDERABAD. At this point, after sixty-five years work, there were only 256 Indian members in Madras and Negapatam districts. Burgess moved north to explore prospects in Hyderabad and began work there in 1878 among British soldiers at Secunderabad. He immediately ranged into villages outside the cantonment and asked financial help from the Wesleyan METHODIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY, but was refused because of the difficulties of beginning a new district.

When his health broke, Burgess took furlough in AUSTRALIA and gained financial support there for the establishment of schools and churches. In 1888 he was made chairman of the new Hyderabad District, where converts were made far more quickly than at any other time or place in India till then. Karim Nagar was opened in 1884. In 1896 he returned to England, being replaced by C. W. POSNETT, whose mass-movement harvest owed much to Burgess's labors. In 1902 he went to ITALY, taking over the chair of the district from H. J. PIGOTT and consolidating his work with great vision and administrative ability. He retired to England in 1918 but died in Italy, at Alassio, Sept. 3, 1930.

BURIAL OF THE DEAD AND FUNERAL RITES. The disposition of the bodies of the dead is among every people closely connected with religion. Belonging as it does to a mystery, death itself has been interpreted according to everyone's faith, hope, or charity, and so each people has disposed of its dead according to religious conviction. Jewish practices in regard to the dead are referred to all through the Scriptures. "When life had fled, the relatives kissed the body, then closed the eyes (Gen. xlv. 4, 11); it was then washed (Acts ix. 37), and wrapped in numerous folds of linen (Matt. xxvii. 59), or in graveclothes (John xi. 44) between which there were laid odoriferous spices, myrrh, aloes, etc." (Schaff-Herzog Encyclopedia). The Jews buried and did not burn their dead as did the Romans.

With the advent of Christianity and the hope of immortality which burns so powerfully through it, greater care and reverence for the dead were manifested. This was perhaps from a twofold reason: The belief in the immortality of the person would inspire much greater respect; and the heightened consciousness and duty of the living Christians would cause them to go farther than Paganism would in this charitable work. The Christians buried the dead, a contrast again to the Romans.

Burial places in the late empire were outside cities and towns, but the soil in Rome permitted the digging of passages under the earth—and so the catacombs. When in time the Christians became so favored that they might bury where they chose, gradually there grew the custom of burying near the last resting place of some saint or martyr. Interment in churches dedicated to such personages then came into being, and shortly grew to such proportions that there was an attempt to suppress it. But the desire to be buried on "holy ground" was so strong that, in one way or another, the more influential generally obtained the right to such a burial. In England, especially the old families, usually secured a tomb inside the church.

Funeral rites have always reflected the religious conviction of a people. With the pagan this was defeat and sorrow, but the Christian has ever sounded a note of victory and joy. Cyprian (de mortal. Sec. 20) and Augustine (de consol. Mort. ii. cap. 5) endeavored to alter the dress of mourning from black to joyful robes, but in this nature would not be denied, and sad hearts desire sad clothing. The earliest rites at Christian burial consisted mainly of hymns and psalms expressive of the joy and hope anticipated in the new life.

During the middle ages with the growth of the mass as a repetitive sacrificial act, there grew the institution of masses for the dead. These are termed the Requiem Mass; and Dirges, an office for the dead. There were also Trentals or Masses said for thirty days after death.

With the Reformation and First English Prayer Book which embodied Protestant teaching with respect to funeral rites, as well as elsewhere, much of this was swept away. Indeed, the first Prayer Book which called for a commendation as part of the burial office was greatly attacked by the Reformers and omitted from the second Prayer Book. The Committal in the Burial Office, which is a Prayer of Commendation at the graveside, has been a real battle ground in this office and to a certain extent it is so today. The Committal appeared to the Reformers to be a prayer for the dead and they, especially the Puritans, would have none of it.

JOHN WESLEY omitted the Committal from his Office for the Burial of the Dead when he edited this in the SUNDAY SERVICE for American Methodism. However, in America itself in the mid-nineteenth century, a Committal Prayer was put back into the Ritual, the said Prayer being a close copy of the same prayer in the Prayer Book of the Protestant Episcopal Church in America.

The Discipline contains little direction as to the duty of the ministry toward the conduct of funerals. What directions are given may be found in the rubrics connected with the funeral office in the Ritual itself. A Methodist direction in former early Disciplines stated "we will on no account make a charge for burying the dead." The 1964 Ritual has it: "The pastor should not accept an honorarium for this service when the deceased was a member of his parish." Present disciplinary directions regarding the duties of elders, and deacons, and so forth, do not mention the burial of the dead as either the privilege or duty of any special order or kind of minister. "To perform all the duties of a traveling preacher" doubtless covers this service. In Methodism, as in most Protestant churches, there is no objection to a layman reading the Office if no minister be present. This frequently happens where need calls for it.

Methodist churches have never had any rubric excluding any person from Christian burial, as the unbaptized, a suicide, or excommunicated person. Mr. Wesley struck out the rubric of the Church of England which forbade the Office to be used for those classes. Methodist ministers have ever felt it their duty as Christians to pay such honor as is possible to the human body in a burial service, and never refuse to officiate at any funeral where they feel they may help. Bishop R. J. COOKE once implied that the prayer, "I heard a voice from Heaven, 'Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord,'" should not be used at the burial of any but Christians. (R. J. Cooke, Commentary on the Ritual, p. 276.)

The Burial Office in American Methodism has been greatly enlarged within recent years by the addition of many more prayers and readings which may be used in the service itself. This came about because the rather brief funeral office as it was transmitted by Wesley, had to be used so frequently in some of the larger churches that there was a need felt for an enlargement and variation of the readings and prayers. The 1964 revision in The Methodist Church has quite a number of these from which the officiating clergyman may make a selection. Also there are two alternate committal prayers in the 1964 Discipline, beside the traditional one from the English and Protestant Episcopal Office ("Earth to earth, ashes to ashes, dust to dust, looking for the General Resurrection at the last Day," etc.)

BURKE, WILLIAM (1770-1855), a talented strong-minded American pioneer preacher, was born Jan. 13, 1770, in Loudon County, Va. He preached on the Guilford Circuit in NORTH CAROLINA in 1791, and then was sent to New River, a large, sparsely settled circuit in the mountains of southwest VIRGINIA. He married in 1796 and was the first preacher in the west to continue to travel after taking a wife. Bishop ASBURY felt that he should move Burke in 1800, but on learning that Burke had "rode down his horses," worn out his clothes, and had not a cent in his pocket, he "yielded to the necessity of the case." Burke was secretary of the WESTERN CONFERENCE in 1800. In 1803 he was appointed to the OHIO DISTRICT of the Western Conference. In 1811 he organized and took charge of the first Methodist station in CINCINNATI, thought to be the first in Ohio. In 1808 he was a member of the committee of fourteen which drafted the restrictive rules of the church. During this period he was one of the recognized leaders of the M. E. CHURCH.

Few if any made greater sacrifices or served the church in the west with greater success than Burke. Then in 1813 he was suspended from the OHIO CONFERENCE for treating a presiding elder with contempt. His case was handled injudiciously, and though he had done no moral wrong, he was finally expelled from the conference in 1820. Such treatment of one of the oldest and ablest members of the conference seems harsh and unjust. It was due to the fact that the church of that day demanded regularity. After his expulsion Burke organized an independent church in Cincinnati which flourished a few years and then failed. After a long investigation, the 1836 GENERAL CONFERENCE restored Burke's name to the minutes, but by that time he was past his prime. He served twenty-eight years as postmaster in Cincinnati and died in that city in 1855.

BURLINGTON, IOWA, U.S.A. First Church is the historic downtown church, successor to "Old Zion" which served as the first IOWA capitol building.

A Methodist society was organized in the log cabin of WILLIAM R. ROSS, M.D. in the spring of 1834. Ross sent a request to PETER CARTWRIGHT, presiding elder in ILLINOIS, asking for a preacher. Having none available, Cartwright took with him on the circuit his young cousin, Barton Cartwright, and on March 22, 1834 licensed him to preach and sent him to Flint Hills (later Burlington) "to preach and form societies, if practicable, and to report to the Church." Barton Cartwright took with him four yoke of oxen, a breaking plow, and a load of supplies, thus making his own way as he pioneered for the Methodists in the new territory.

Old Zion church was built of brick in 1837. The first Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Iowa convened in it Nov. 12, 1838. The House of Representatives used the upper story and the Council met in the basement. In 1841 the legislature moved to Iowa City, but the brick Zion was used by the government for several years. There the Territorial Supreme Court met, and from the pulpit the death sentence was read to the notorious Hodges brothers.

At a WATCH NIGHT service in 1850, three teen-agers knelt at the Old Zion altar and dedicated themselves to Christ and the ministry. One was CHARLES C. McCABE, later bishop; another was H. W. Thomas, founder of People's Church, Chicago; the third was Addison Williams, to become pastor in Kansas City, St. Louis, Hennepin Avenue in Minneapolis, and Temple Methodist in Los Angeles.

First Church, successor to Old Zion, is housed in a jasper (red granite) building. It was dedicated in 1889. The Akron plan of architecture appeared in it for the first time west of the Mississippi, with the original architect, C. W. Kramer from Akron, drawing plans and specifications. More recently the church has adapted the Akron plan to contemporary concepts of education and worship, and has bought a funeral home across Washington Street and adapted into a youth center. The church, which has sent twelve into the ministry and mission field, and has mothered many advances for the church in Iowa, remains a 2,000 member pacesetter with a strong outreach.

BURLINGTON, NEW JERSEY, U.S.A., population 12,687, was settled in 1677 on the Delaware River, fifteen miles north of PHILADELPHIA. Located there was one of the earliest two Methodist societies in NEW JERSEY.

It is probable that GEORGE WHITEFIELD preached in Burlington during one or more of his visits to America between 1738 and 1770. Captain THOMAS WEBB spent a week in Burlington during November, 1768, the first of many visits by this Methodist leader. Webb formed a Methodist class on Dec. 14, 1770. (There is "academic dispute" as to whether this society or the one in TRENTON is the first permanently organized Methodist society in New Jersey.) Webb appointed JOSEPH TOY the leader of this first class. The present Broad Street Church dates from the organization of this first society.

Burlington was the first place in New Jersey where FRANCIS ASBURY preached, Nov. 7, 1771, and he visited the town many times afterward. Prominent in early Methodist work in Burlington was JAMES STERLING, prosperous merchant, who has been called "the most valuable Methodist layman of his time."
