He retired on Aug. 31, 1949, but a formal recognition of his retirement was held in conjunction with the annual meeting of the Board of Missions at Buck Hill Falls, Pa., on Dec. 8 of that year. On that occasion he concluded the evening by telling something of his own career and thanking those present for supporting him all the while. He then asked leave to walk out with his wife through the assembled audience, and all stood in appreciation applauding. After retirement he took a leading part in helping to found an international Christian university in JAPAN.

He died on Jan. 31, 1951.

Clark and Stafford, Who's Who in Methodism. 1952.
C. T. Howell, Prominent Personalities. 1945.

N. B. H.

DILLARD UNIVERSITY, New Orleans, La., was founded by the FREEDMEN'S AID SOCIETY of the M. E. Church in 1869 as New Orleans University. In 1930, the school merged with Straight College, a Congregational school founded in 1869, to form Dillard University, named in honor of James Hardy Dillard, who had been an important influence in the improvement of Negro education. The university continues to maintain an organic relationship with both the United Church of Christ and The United Methodist Church.

New Orleans University operated Flint Medical College and the Sarah Goodridge Hospital. The medical school was discontinued in 1911, but the Flint-Goodridge Hospital continues as a unit of the university. The school continues the practice of two parent institutions, as it makes no distinction as to religion, race, or sex in the admission of students or selection of faculty.

The merger of the two colleges in New Orleans grew out of the interest of the General Education Board and the Rosenwald Fund. The first chief administrator of the merged school who pulled the organization together and selected the first faculty was Will W. Alexander, a Methodist minister, who, following the first World War, gave distinguished leadership in improving race relations in the South. Degrees granted are the B.A. and B.S. in Nursing. The governing board has seventeen trustees, six elected by the Board of Education of The United Methodist Church, six by the Congregational Church, and five at large.

LAWLESS MEMORIAL CHAPEL, DILLARD UNIVERSITY

JOHN O. GROSS

DILLE, ELBERT RILEY (1848-1933), American minister. His education was in Frankfort Seminary, Indiana; the UNIVERSITY OF THE PACIFIC awarded the D.D. degree in 1886. Elbert R. Dille was considered the foremost preacher-pastor, evangelist-reformer of the California Conference in the closing quarter of the nineteenth century, and the opening years of the twentieth. He went from the farm to a year of service in the Union Army during the Civil War, and then had three years of schooling. At twenty-two he was received on trial in the NORTH-WESTERN INDIANA CONFERENCE and was appointed to "an eight weeks' circuit." Here he received the first of more than 4,000 persons he was during his career to take into the church on profession of faith.

Transferred to CALIFORNIA in 1873, in eight years he was in the foremost pulpits of the Conference—Central Church, SAN FRANCISCO, and First, OAKLAND, which were the strongest churches. With the five-year time limit on the pastorate, as it then was, he went from one of these to the other for the next twenty-six years. He was as prominent in civic as in religious circles. He was an appreciated pastor, not only by his parishioners, but especially by the young ministers of the Conference.

He was married, Sept. 16, 1871, to Clara Florence Connor. They had no children.

Elbert Dille was a member of the GENERAL CONFERENCE (ME) in 1888, 1900, 1904, and 1908; also of the ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE of 1911; a trustee of University of the Pacific and of the Fred Finch and the McKinley Orphanages; Chaplain of the State Assembly; a Mason, and Chaplain of the Grand Lodge of California of Odd Fellows.

C. V. Anthony, Fifty Years. 1901.

L. L. Loofbourow, In Search of God's Gold. 1950.

C. F. Price, Who's Who in American Methodism. 1916.

LEON L. LOOFBOUROW

DILLINGHAM, PAUL (1799-1891), American legislator and governor, was born Aug. 10, 1799, in Shutesbury, Mass. In 1805 he moved with his parents to a Waterbury, Vt. farm. Admitted to the practice of law in Vermont in 1823, he served five terms in the legislature. From 1835 to 1837 he was the state's attorney; later he served in the State Seante (1841 and 1861). From 1843 until 1847 he served in the House of Representatives in Washington. Following service as Lieutenant Governor and President of the Senate in 1862, he was overwhelmingly elected Governor of VERMONT on the Republican ticket in 1865 serving until 1867.

He became a Methodist in his youth. He was lay delegate to the 1872 General Conference representing the VERMONT CONFERENCE.

When Sarah Carpenter, his first wife, died in 1831, he married in 1832 her sister, Julia. He had several children including William P. Dillingham, who later also served as Governor of Vermont.

Paul Dillingham died at Waterbury, Vt., July 27, 1891.

Boston Evening Transcript, July 27, 1891.

M. Simpson, Cyclopaedia. 1878.

ERNEST R. CASE

DILLONDALE, OHIO, MISSIONARY PROJECT of the Methodist Protestant Church (1926-1937) was established by two ministers laboring in the OHIO River Valley who realized the spiritual need of the immigrants living in this area, especially the Bohemians and Italians and the many who were atheists. The work was endorsed by the Board of Missions of the denomination and Mrs. Hazel Greenwald was appointed to serve as Superintendent of the Mission Work. Because of overlapping missionary work, when Mrs. Greenwald was forced by illness to resign her position, the Dillondale Mission was discontinued in 1937.

The Methodist Protestant-Recorder, April 6, 1934.

The Missionary Record, July, 1937.

RALPH HARDEE RIVES

DIOCESAN EPISCOPACY is that system in use in the other Episcopal Churches wherein a bishop has jurisdiction over a certain district which in ecclesiastical nomenclature is called a diocese. The Roman Catholics, the Church of England, the Scandinavian Lutheran Churches, and the Protestant Episcopal Churches have Diocesan Episcopacy. The "general superintendency" of the Methodist Episcopal Churches by its definition is supposed to be church-wide and not diocesan.

In Episcopal Methodism the bishop has always been a general superintendent whose supervision has theoretically been over the whole Connection—as, indeed, the supervision of the first American bishops really and actually was. With the growth of the American M. E. Churches and the increase in the number of bishops, it was found impossible to insist that the authority of every bishop in every part of the Church should be paramount to the authority of the particular bishop who had been entrusted with the presidential supervision of a particular Annual Conference or Area. Thus, in time, as bishops came to be assigned to oversee certain Conferences, and were expected to carefully supervise these, the idea of an "itinerant general superintendency" became largely a theoretical rather than a practical matter. However, the bishops themselves in the United Methodist Church, through the respective Jurisdictional COLLEGES OF BISHOPS, make their own assignments of Conferences which each is to hold, and a bishop anywhere (apart from presidential supervision) is a bishop everywhere.

The assigning of residences to bishops first by the General Conferences and latterly by Jurisdictional, has been held by Methodist constitutional authorities to break somewhat the ideal of general superintendency, and to give more of a diocesan pattern to Methodist supervision. Likewise the Jurisdictional plan, creating separate colleges of bishops within each Jurisdiction, is said to have made the idea of general superintendency a constitutional abstraction. But with all that, the COUNCIL OF BISHOPS of the Church has been given full constitutional power to "oversee the spiritual and temporal affairs of the (whole) Church," and what the individual bishop lacks by being jurisdictionalized, the Council of Bishops gains by being constitutionally established as the chief supervisory and controlling body in the executive management, both spiritual and temporal, of the entire Church.

The argument that a bishop should be assigned to each State of the Union or geographical division thereof has seemed to some to be leaning more toward the diocesan idea; as does the continued residence of a particular bishop in a particular state or area. Nevertheless, there is in The United Methodist Church a general superintendency not a diocesan one, and each bishop plays his part in it. (See also EPISCOPACY.)

Discipline, 1964; 1968.

N. B. Harmon. Organization. 1962.

N. B. H.

DISCIPLINE. When Methodists use the word "discipline" in connection with their life and activity, they are referring either to the general pattern and regimen of Methodist life as this is outlined in the GENERAL RULES and the constant habits and procedures of Methodists through the years; or, if it be in American Methodism, and its progeny of church organizations over the world, the word "discipline" quite often refers to the Book of Discipline, which will be subsequently described.

In English Methodism under the general head of Discipline, one may be referred to British CLASS MEETINGS, COMMUNION TOKENS, FASTING, the LIVERPOOL MINUTES, the ORGANIZATION OF BRITISH METHODISM, LOCAL PREACHERS, ROUND, RULES OF THE METHODISTS, STANDARD SERMONS, and all else having to do with the connexional system in Britain and its daughter churches in different parts of the world. Methodist discipline, of course, as far as all these particular regulations and customs affecting it are concerned, is a general term embracing, and to a degree outlining and holding to a common standard the practical living of each Methodist's daily life.

Methodism early earned the reputation of having strict—not to say stern—discipline among its members, and this was certainly true in its early years. Discipline then was enforced strictly by CLASS LEADERS, and ministers, but through the years as the Methodist Church grew in strength and power, there has been a relaxation of the tight discipline of the earlier decades of the nineteenth century. Nevertheless, it may be said that even today the organizational pattern of Methodist life, and the close connexionalism which it embodies, does demand a certain regimentation of Christian life and habit, and is of help in keeping all Methodists in line with the doctrines, teachings, worship, organizational moves, and personal habits called for in any truly Methodist church. With all the slackening of discipline in recent years—much bewailed by each older generation as it has watched the succeeding generation coming on—there is yet considerable iron in the Methodist blood. Methodist discipline, and the regimen for life which it demands, is yet a tremendous factor in the ongoing of the Methodist movement, in Methodist churches, and in Methodist people.

N. B. H.

DISCIPLINE, THE BOOK OF. Entitled officially The Doctrines and Discipline, this volume has since the formation of the M. E. Church in America been the book of law, administration, doctrine, organizational work and procedure for American Methodism and for other churches which have branched from or been founded by American Methodists. Commonly called The Discipline, this book has been for American Methodism not only a book of law and doctrine, but also a practical manual for use, embodying the ancient offices of the ritual, and also the structural organization of conferences, jurisdictions, and mission fields of the entire church.

ROBERT EMORY, historian of the Discipline through its formative years, thus describes its origin:

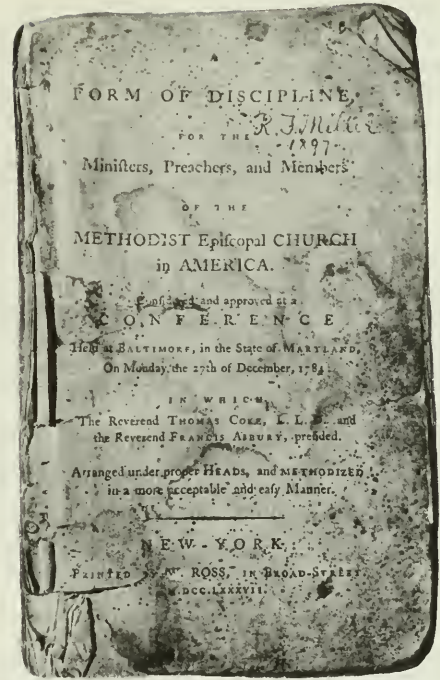

The Methodist Societies were originally governed by the General Rules, drawn up by the Wesleys, in 1743, and by the regulations adopted in the conferences, which were held yearly from 1744. These regulations were first published in the Minutes from year to year. They were afterward collected together, and printed, with some slight alterations, in a tract entitled "The Large Minutes." The same rules and regulations, so far as applicable to their condition, governed the Methodist Societies in America, from the time of their first formation in 1786. At the first conference in 1773, the preachers formally recognized "the doctrine and discipline of the Methodists," as contained in the English Minutes, to be "the sole rule of their conduct." They adopted, however, at successive conferences, some additional regulations, rendered necessary by their peculiar circumstances. These were inserted, from year to year, in the Annual Minutes, until 1784, when the Methodists in America ceased to constitute mere societies, and were duly organized into a church. To learn, then, what was the Discipline of the Methodist Societies in America, prior to 1784, the Large Minutes must be compared with the Annual Minutes of the American conferences. (Emory, pp. 9-10.)

As it came about, the Discipline represented even in its first issues something more than was in the Minutes of the British Methodist Conference. JOHN WESLEY sent over to America with THOMAS COKE, RICHARD WHATCOAT and THOMAS VASEY an edition of the Book of Common Prayer of the Church of England which he called the SUNDAY SERVICE. He may have thought that this book would be for American Methodism what the Prayer Book, which he abridged, has always been for the Church of England, namely, its Ark of the Covenant and the complete embodiment of churchly worship. But in America a different type of book was to evolve since the Sunday Service, while adopted by the CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE, never proved popular.

The first Discipline was adopted by the Christmas Conference and published in 1785 under the title, Minutes of Several Conversations . . . Composing a Form of Discipline for the Ministers, Preachers and Other Members of the Methodist Episcopal Church in America. The Sunday Service and "the Collection of Psalms and Hymns" sent over by Wesley were bound in this volume. In 1786 a new and revised edition was printed, and this was the last to use the Sunday Service. This form of Discipline was revised and printed in a new edition each year until 1792.

Revisions of the Discipline. Following 1792, revisions were made on a quadrennial basis by the General Conference, although printings may have appeared annually for some years and were sometimes identified as a numbered edition.

One of the duties of the General Conference, it is commonly stated, is to "revise the Discipline." All the laws and regulations which that body passes, and all amendments and deletions of matter in former Disciplines must be given in the succeeding book, or that issued after each General Conference. Methodist historians study the changes in successive volumes and so can record the general changes in the church.

TITLE PAGE, 1787 EDITION

In the former M. E. Church, David Sherman, building upon and continuing Emory's work, issued in 1874 a history of the revisions of the Discipline. The M. E. Church, South issued its first Discipline in 1846, subsequent to its first General Conference held that year, and thereafter issued succeeding Disciplines after each of its General Conferences every four years until its last in 1938. The history of this Discipline was written by P. A. Peterson and published in 1889. These histories were able, by a typographical scheme of display, to indicate just what matter had been discarded and what new matter had been put into each issue. Since the time of Sherman and Peterson, revisions have been so many and multifarious due to the great growth of the church and its organizational life, that today it would be impossible to carry in any one volume a comprehensive listing of all former General Conference revisions.

The Discipline of the Methodist Protestant Church, and, indeed the Book of Discipline of the other episcopal Methodisms, as A.M.E., A.M.E. Zion, and C.M.E., have had a development somewhat similar to the general development which we are tracing of the original Discipline—the Discipline which was their own also at the time they separated. For the changes which have occurred in these various Disciplines, the records of each individual Church must be sought. Fortunately there are preserved chains of Disciplines in various Methodist headquarters, theological libraries, etc., and these will allow interested persons to see exactly what the development has been in each instance.

When the GENERAL CONFERENCE sits in session, it has the right and power to change any of the statutory enactments of the Discipline as these have been in effect up to that date. However, it may take no action which involves or contravenes the Constitution of the church, or creates any new or does away with any old constitutional matter. In practice the General Conference in debating proposed measures or enacting legislation pays no attention to any possible inhibiting effect which previous legislation may be considered to have. Nor do conflicting reports, which when adopted are seen to be contradictory, give immediate concern. The General Conference has a committee carefully scrutinizing all legislation and resolutions passed, and where resolutions are passed or legislation adopted which clearly is in conflict with other legislation passed by the same General Conference, this Committee apprises the Conference of that fact, and presumes that it will take action to clarify such a conflict.

In publishing the Discipline, the General Conference empowers a committee—usually headed by the Book Editor of the Church—to publish the book so as to embody all legislation passed. Book Editors have occasionally been forced to reconcile as best they can some special unresolved ambiguity which may be found in statutory enactments. The Discipline is always published by the Publishing House of the Church, and so made available for Methodists everywhere.

Organization of the Discipline. The present Discipline of The United Methodist Church contains in its first part the Constitution of the Church together with Wesley's General Rules and the ARTICLES OF RELIGION. This entire section is considered "constitutional matter" and no General Conference may take any action which contravenes it.

The second section of the Discipline, and by far the greater part of the volume, consists of statutory matter or legislative enactments. The third section consists of appendix material and the index. At one time directories of boards and committees, a glossary of Methodist terms, Judicial Council decisions, and episcopal assignments were included in the appendix portion of the Discipline. However, this material came to be so lengthy it was not practical to include it in the Discipline, and it is now presented in a quadrennial Directory, with some portions being carried in the General Minutes.

The resolutions once carried in the back of the Discipline presented something of a problem, as while these represented the mind of the then sitting General Conference upon the matters with which they dealt, they were not binding Methodist law as were the legislative enactments in the main body. Finally it was decided that each General Conference would be informed that the resolutions of each former General Conference would be automatically removed from the new Discipline, unless and until such were reenacted by direct order of the General Conference.

The format of the Discipline, or size of the book, differed from issue to issue during the early years, but for at least sixty years, each Discipline of the M. E. Churches was of a standard sized page, approximately 6 by 4 inches. With The United Methodist Church, the size increased to an average book size, 6 by 8½ inches. The Discipline has grown appreciably in thickness through the years as more and more legislative material has been added, especially that having to do with the work of the boards and agencies of the Church. There has also been a considerable growth in pension legislation and in legislation having to do with trial law.

At the General Conference of 1944, an effort was made by J. EDGAR SKILLINGTON, the chairman of the Rules Committee, to keep out of the forthcoming Discipline all "resolutions" in order that the book should contain the Constitution of the Church and statutory enactments only. This effort failed as the second World War was then raging and both the "pacifists" and the "militarists" agreed in insisting that the Conference speak out on the war in formal disciplinary resolutions—which it did after an epochal debate.

An effort was made from time to time to remove from the Discipline all ritualistic and worship materials. The 1964 Discipline of The Methodist Church eventually was published with most of the material of the Ritual, except the time-honored Ritual proper, put into the Book of Worship. The 1968 Discipline of The United Methodist Church placed all ritualistic materials in The Book of Worship for Church and Home.

R. Emory, History of the Discipline. 1844.

N. B. Harmon, Rites and Ritual. 1926.

P. A. Peterson, Revisions of the Discipline. 1889.

D. Sherman, Revisions of the Discipline. 1874.

Files of the Disciplines of the respective Methodist Churches. N. B. H.

The Evangelical United Brethren Church. There has not been great variation in the development of the Book of Discipline of the E.U.B. Church from that of American Methodism. The first Discipline, approved at the time of the union of The Evangelical Church and the Church of the United Brethren in Christ in 1946, had been compiled by the joint Commissions on Church Union and duly approved by the respective conferences and local congregations. It could not be changed by the first General Conference of The Evangelical United Brethren Church, for it was a part of the basic Plan of Union.

Subsequent General Conferences had the authority—and exercised it—to change by a two-thirds affirmative vote any section of the Discipline except Part I which dealt with Constitutional Law. Revisions of Part I required a three-fourths affirmative vote of the members of the General Conference and a two-thirds affirmative vote of the aggregate number of members of all the annual conferences in North America present and voting.

The original Discipline consisted of sections known as Constitutional Law, Temporal Economy, and Rituals and Formulas. In time the Disciplines also became the repository for constitutions of institutions and agencies, official certificates, and the code of ethics for ministers.

The Discipline of the Evangelical Association, predecessor to The Evangelical Church, was first prepared in 1809. JACOB ALBRIGHT, its founder, had been authorized to compile a book of rules and articles of faith, but his death occurred before the completion of this task. GEORGE MILLER finished the Articles of Faith and Book of Discipline which were adopted. There were only slight differences between this German book of faith and order, and the German edition of the kindred book of the M. E. Church which had been published in 1808. Tradition has asserted that FRANCIS ASBURY encouraged the preparation of a German translation of the 1805 M. E. Discipline so that the Evangelical Association and United Brethren in Christ, both popularly referred to as "German Methodists," might use it to compile their own books of faith and rules.

Evangelical Disciplines were revised by each General Conference in keeping with the changes in faith and society. Revisions were authorized similarly to that which was given above for the subsequent revisions of Evangelical United Brethren Disciplines. German editions of Evangelical Disciplines were published until the close of World War I. The first English edition did not appear until 1832.

There were differing circumstances that effected the evolution of the Disciplines of the Church of the United Brethren in Christ. In 1813, the Original (EASTERN) CONFERENCE authorized that a Confession of Faith and Evangelical Discipline be printed. This had probably been approved at that session, although no printed edition seemed to be issued after all. The following year the Discipline was revised by the same group. The Miami Conference, learning of the Discipline that had been authorized by the eastern brethren, objected strenuously to a book of faith and rules in preparation of which its members had had no participation. They therefore issued a call for a General Conference, established the basis of its membership and place of meeting, and this was agreed to by the eastern conference.

The first General Conference was convened in 1815 and approved a Discipline, similar to the one issued in 1814. Two years later a second General Conference met and made moderate revisions to the Discipline of 1815. Thereafter a quadrennial pattern for sessions of General Conference was followed. English appeared for the first time in parallel columns with the German edition when a reprint of the 1817 Discipline was published in 1819. There were editorial changes, mostly in the appendix, which may not have been regarded as an official part of the Discipline.

United Brethren Disciplines, at first, were not clear in delineating the method for revising the Confession of Faith and Constitution. The sole power resided in the General Conference until the 1841 assembly approved the statement that "there shall be no alteration of the foregoing constitution, unless by request of two-thirds of the whole Society." (Discipline of 1841, Section 2, Article 4.) In 1889, this was sharpened to require that in the revision of the Confession of Faith a two-thirds affirmative vote of the General Conference was needed to propose a change and three-fourths of the annual conferences were necessary to approve. In the case of the Constitution, a revision required a two-thirds affirmative vote in the General Conference and a majority of the votes cast among the congregations.

Whereas the Evangelical Association leaned heavily upon the Methodist Episcopal Discipline from its beginning, the Church of the United Brethren in Christ did not. Although CHRISTIAN NEWCOMER was successful in a limited way in encouraging United Brethren to adopt some Methodist practices and faith, moderation was necessary in the early years to satisfy those who were strongly opposed to any Discipline, Confession of Faith, or membership rolls. For these persons the Bible was asserted to be sufficient to serve as the book of faith. In practice, however, United Brethren did become imitative of Methodists so that subsequent Disciplines were adopted that drew heavily upon Methodist faith and order.

R. W. Albright, Evangelical Church. 1942.

Articles of Faith and Book of Discipline of the Evangelical Association (later The Evangelical Church), printed at various places from 1809-1942.

The Discipline of The Evangelical United Brethren Church, Harrisburg, Pa. and Dayton, Ohio, published from 1946-67. Doctrine and Discipline of the United Brethren in Christ, printed at various places, from 1819-1945 (handwritten copy, 1814).

A. W. Drury, Disciplines. 1895.

JOHN H. NESS, JR.

DISNEY, RICHARD RANDOLPH (1830-1891), an American bishop of the A.M.E. Church was born in North East, Md., on June 24, 1830. After conversion he was licensed to preach in 1856. He was admitted into the conference in 1857, ordained a DEACON in 1858 and ELDER in 1860. He united with the British Methodist Episcopal Church, i.e. the Canadian A.M.E., and was elected to the episcopacy by that body in 1875. Accepted by the A.M.E. Church as full bishop when the B.M.E. Church reunited with the A.M.E. Church in 1884, he was assigned to the Tenth District, South America; and the Eighth District, Mississippi and Arkansas (1888-1921). He worked earnestly to reorganize in the A.M.E. Church the conferences which had come into that church from the British Methodist Episcopal Connection. Bishop Disney died on April 18, 1891 in Baltimore, Md.

R. R. Wright, The Bishops (AME). 1963.

GRANT S. SHOCKLEY

DISOSWAY, GABRIEL POILLON (1799-1868), American layman and pioneer in the organized missions movement, was born Dec. 9, 1799, in New York City, the son of Israel Disosway and Anne Doty, who had been active in Methodist beginnings on Staten Island before their removal to New York in 1790. FRANCIS ASBURY frequently preached in the Israel Disosway home on Staten Island between 1771 and 1790. Marc du Sauchoy, Gabriel's first French Huguenot ancestor in America, settled on the Island in the seventeenth century.

Gabriel entered Columbia College and graduated with the M.A. degree in 1823. He moved to Petersburg, Va., where he established a dry goods business and where he married. While in Petersburg, he helped to found RANDOLPH-MACON COLLEGE in 1830. Returning to the north in 1831, he entered the dry goods business in New York City, maintaining his residence in West New Brighton, Staten Island.

Gabriel Disosway aided in founding the Methodist Missionary Sunday School Societies, and called upon NATHAN BANGS to urge "the immediate organization of a Methodist Missionary Society such as other denominations had formed." As a young layman he aided the concerted movement for missions and became a manager of the Missionary Society. His call in The Christian Advocate and Journal in 1833 stirred the Church to missionary endeavor directed toward the Wyandot Indians of OREGON. The labors of these missionaries became a part of the basis for the American claims to Oregon Territory.

Disosway wrote hundreds of articles in The Christian Advocate. One of his successful projects was the promotion of colonization of LIBERIA by freed Negro slaves from America. Among his published works was a History of the Earliest Churches in New York. He engaged in historical research as a member of the New York Historical Society and the Staten Island Historical Society, which he founded and of which he was president in 1856. In 1849 he was elected to the New York State Assembly from Richmond County (Staten Island). He died in his Staten Island home on Clove Road July 9, 1868.

The Christian Advocate, Sept. 9, 1926; March 2, 1933.

V. B. Hampton, Newark Conference. 1957.

M. Simpson, Cyclopaedia. 1881. VERNON B. HAMPTON

DISPENSARIES, British Methodist. JOHN WESLEY opened dispensaries for the free supply of medicines and advice to the needy poor in LONDON and BRISTOL in 1746. These dispensaries rank among the first to be set up in England. In such large centers of population the poor lived in squalor and ignorance, and the sick languished and died without means of healing or amelioration.

The Bristol venture was short-lived. From the first many came seeking relief, but Wesley says he had difficulty in Bristol in obtaining the medicines he would choose. Probably, too, he could find little time for the oversight of this dispensary, and besides, certain well-disposed persons, "in obedience to the rules of our holy religion," had already opened a dispensary in connection with the Bristol Infirmary in 1735.

The London dispensary carried on for several years "till the number of patients still increasing, the expense was greater than we could bear." Here was effected the famous cure of William Kirkman, a weaver, who had had "a very sore cough for about three score years."

Bristol Medico-Chirurgical Journal, December 1899.

A. W. Hill, John Wesley. 1958.

Munro Smith, History of Bristol Royal Infirmary.

J. Wesley, Letters. 1931. A. W. HILL

DISSENTING WESLEYAN METHODISTS AT PAISLEY. (See CONGREGATIONAL METHODISTS.)

DISSINGER, MOSES (1824-1883), American Evangelical pioneer preacher, was born March 17, 1824 at Schaeffers-town, Lebanon Co., Pa. Soon after his birth he was baptized by a Lutheran minister. He never went to school but early started to work for farmers and later became a blacksmith. On his father's side he descended from German stock. His mother's people were Irish.

As a youth Dissinger was somewhat of a rowdy, a natural leader of youth in doing mischief. But his good nature and ready wit secured the good will of the community. He developed unusual physical strength which he later used to good advantage in handling other rowdies when they disturbed his religious meetings.

Dissinger was converted at the age of eighteen and became a member of the EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION. He said that he fought seventeen battles before he was eighteen years of age, but the last was the hardest, the one against his own wicked nature. After his conversion he was taught to read by his wife and by friends. He had an unusual memory. He was licensed to preach in 1853, was ordained DEACON in 1856 and ELDER in 1859. He preached in the East Pennsylvania Conference, 1856-1878.

WILLIAM YOST said of Dissinger, "He was a unique character, an extraordinary man, both in body and mind, gifted with tireless energy, an original and peculiar person." He was eccentric but this eccentricity helped to draw a crowd. He was a powerful preacher who often moved his audiences to great religious fervor and enthusiasm. His public prayers were often associated with the outpouring of the Holy Spirit. He was one of the most popular German-speaking preachers of his day and stories about Moses Dissinger are circulated among the Pennsylvania Dutch to this day.

People were surprised when Dissinger was assigned to PHILADELPHIA Station, and wondered how he would adapt himself to a city situation. But he was accepted immediately and at the close of the year he reported 100 conversions and receipts of $1,200.

In 1878 he went to the KANSAS CONFERENCE where he encountered great hardship and died there Jan. 25, 1883.

Melton Rubincam and Thomas R. Brendle, William Rittenhouse and Moses Dissinger. Scottsdale, Pa.: Pennsylvania German Society, 1959. GEORGE C. COCKER

DISTRICT is in The United Methodist Church, U.S.A., a definite geographical division of an Annual Conference. However the putting together of local churches and charges to form a district may not be a matter entirely of geographical area or location, for occasionally a church belonging to one district may be well within the bounds of another. However, Annual Conferences, since the early days, have been divided into districts, and each of these has been presided over by a "PRESIDING ELDER" in the earlier days; and now by a "District Superintendent."

In the beginning years, in the time of Bishop ASBURY, the word "district," especially when pertaining to the holding of a "district Conference" referred to a rather large indefinite geographical area, such as "The Baltimore District," "The New York District." Bishop COLLINS DENNY asserts that there were no true Annual Conferences until 1796, and that prior to that date the conferences called together were termed "District Conferences," and that these were held annually at a date fixed by the bishop. They were in these early days to consist of "not fewer than three, nor more than twelve" circuits. In time, the word "Annual" supplanted the word "District" with relation to these annual meetings, and the ANNUAL CONFERENCE became the prime and basic organization of Methodism. The District Conference as such was not to appear until much later.

However, within each Annual Conference, districts were early outlined and maintained usually in geographic units, each one presided over by a presiding elder. Such district division of Annual Conferences has persisted to the present day, with the number of charges in each district, or the grouping of charges into districts ("forming the Districts") by the long time polity of American Methodism being the prerogative of the presiding bishop. The Discipline in outlining the duties, powers and limitations of bishops, provides that they are "to form the Districts according to his (the bishop's) judgment, after consultation with the district superintendents, and after the number of the same has been determined by vote of the Annual Conference." This last provision, allowing the Annual Conference to determine the number of its districts, came about at the time of church union in 1939, and was something of a limitation upon Episcopal power. In Episcopal Methodist Churches, previous to the time of church union, a bishop would frequently create a new district, or "take out" a district by reassigning its churches to other districts. This he had the right to do under the empowerment to form the districts "according to his judgment." Sometimes a new district was created in order to make a place for a certain conference member for whom it was otherwise difficult to find an appointment. It was felt wise, therefore, by the General Conference at the time of Union, to allow each Annual Conference to determine for itself the number of its districts, with the bishop still holding the right to fix the charges that should be in each. This is the way it presently stands. The usual district, however, is such an entity in its own right, that changes in its charges, except certain marginal ones, are not normally looked for.

The number of churches in each district varies somewhat with conditions. A district superintendent may supervise a much larger number of churches when these are in a city, than where they are in a mountainous or sparsely settled region, or where travel is difficult and communication uncertain. Each district must be so drawn up that it may be supervised by the district superintendent to best advantage. The bishop and his CABINET are usually able to determine and make allowances for unusual conditions or situations which may occur with any one particular district, so that the district as outlined and agreed upon will be one where both the district superintendent and the churches may best work together. (For other matters having to do with Districts, see DISTRICT CONFERENCE; also, BRITISH METHODISM, ORGANIZATION OF.)

C. Denny, Manual of the Discipline. 1931.

Discipline, UMC. 1968.

N. B. Harmon, Organization. 1962.

H. N. McTyeire, Manual of the Discipline. 1870. N. B. H.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, U.S.A. The national capital of the United States of America is a Federal District of Columbia on the Potomac River in the mid-Atlantic section. Originally ten miles square, it was ceded by MARYLAND and VIRGINIA in 1790, but the smaller Virginia portion, now Arlington County, was retroceded in 1846. Major Pierre C. L'Enfant laid out a grand plan for the city with wide avenues radiating from a commanding Capitol Building and from "circles" at strategic points over the city. However, in the city named for George Washington, muddy streets and miasmal summers long persisted as Federal attention focused on internal improvements in the States.

When established, the District of Columbia included the existing towns of ALEXANDRIA, Va. and Georgetown, Md. Dumbarton Church, Georgetown, traces its origin to the preaching of RICHARD OWINGS in 1772. FRANCIS ASBURY himself drew the Alexandria meetinghouse plans in 1786. The Methodists first organized in Washington in 1801 at Greenleaf's Point, using a tobacco house as a place of worship. They built on Fourth Street, S.E., in 1811. The continuing churches, Capitol Hill and Ebenezer, still minister nearby. HENRY FOXALL's forge was spared when the British burned Washington in 1814. In gratitude, Foxall built Foundry Church, near the White House, in 1815. Wesley Chapel was begun in 1828, and a group of Reformers organized Congress Street M. P. Church in 1829 and East Washington Church soon afterward. Some Negroes from Ebenezer as early as 1820 began Israel Metropolitan, and A.M.E. Church until 1874, and C.M.E. since that time. Asbury Church was a Negro congregation connected with Foundry Church from 1836. In rapid order the following churches were established, Ryland in 1843; Anacostia and McKendree in 1845; and Union in 1846. In 1850 the newly constituted M. E. Church, South began a church at Mount Vernon Place, N. W., replacing it in 1917 with a monumental white marble structure. Designated as the National Methodist Church, Metropolitan (M.E.) was begun in 1850 and was finally finished with Centenary funds in 1869. The present Gothic Metropolitan Church adjacent to AMERICAN UNIVERSITY was dedicated in 1932.

In early days, sessions of Congress saw required Sunday morning preaching at the Capitol by the congressional chaplains. An unusual number of Methodist preachers served in that capacity, including JESSE LEE, NICHOLAS SNETHEN, HENRY B. BASCOM, HENRY SLICER, GEORGE G. COOKMAN, WILLIAM RYLAND, J. P. DURBIN, and L. R. Reese. Slicer's antidualing sermon contributed to the subsequent outlawing of that bloody custom. Later, J. P. NEWMAN, subsequently bishop, was Senate chaplain for three terms. James Shera Montgomery and FREDERICK BROWN HARRIS were long-time chaplains in the twentieth century.

President WILLIAM MCKINLEY was one of several Methodist chief executives. He worshiped at Metropolitan Church, as did U. S. GRANT, who was a trustee. President and Mrs. RUTHERFORD B. HAYES attended Foundry Church. She was the first president of the WOMAN'S HOME MISSIONARY SOCIETY of the M. E. Church. In her memory the LUCY WEBB HAYES Training School for Deaconesses was founded on North Capitol Street. While he was vice-president, Richard M. Nixon attended Metropolitan Church.

Methodist institutions took root slowly in Washington. After several abortive attempts to start a college, finally in 1890, Bishop JOHN F. HURST bought a 92-acre hilltop tract in northwest Washington for a National Methodist University. Although chartered in 1893, American University was unable for financial reasons to open its doors for students until 1914. Meanwhile, a home for the aged was begun in 1889; Sibley Hospital opened in 1891; and the Swartzell Home for Children was occupied in 1912, though it has since been relocated near Baltimore. In 1958, WESLEY THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY (formerly Westminster) was moved from Westminster, Md., to Massachusetts Avenue at Wesley Circle adjoining American University.

The Methodist Building, a handsome apartment-office structure, was erected at First Street and Maryland Avenue, N. E., by the M. E. Board of Temperance in 1923. Adjacent to the Supreme Court Building and the Capitol, it houses the General Board of CHRISTIAN SOCIAL CONCERNS and the offices of the resident bishops of three Methodist denominations. A large tract of land adjacent to American University was acquired in 1957 for a proposed Methodist Center; it is being held by the Methodist Corporation for the denomination.

Among Methodist landmarks in the District of Columbia are important bronze equestrian statues of Bishop Asbury by Lukeman at 16th and Mount Pleasant Streets, N. W., and of JOHN WESLEY on the grounds of Wesley Seminary where it is overlooked by Friedlander's statue of the Christ on the Oxnam Chapel. The Asbury statue was dedicated in 1924 by President Calvin Coolidge. The statue of Wesley is a replica of the famous NEW ROOM monument at BRISTOL, England.

Noteworthy Methodist graves in the District of Columbia include those of Bishop HURST and the eccentric LORENZO DOW at Rock Creek; of Bishop EARL CRANSTON at Arlington, and of Bishop MATTHEW W. CLAIR, Sr. at Harmony; while the ashes of Bishop G. BROMLEY OXNAM rest under the seminary chapel. The episcopal residence (ME) was moved from BALTIMORE to Washington in 1880. Bishops E. G. ANDREWS, HURST, WILLIAM F. McDOWELL, CHARLES W. FLINT, OXNAM, and JOHN WESLEY LORD are among prominent long-term resident episcopal leaders.

Methodist membership (ME, MES, MP) in the District of Columbia was 24,990 in 1926. In the same year other Methodist bodies had twenty-one churches and 9,917 members. By 1955 The Methodist Church had 39,693 members, its peak strength. Thereafter the number of members declined as people moved to the suburbs. In 1970, there were forty-two United Methodist churches in the District of Columbia with a total of 29,897 members.

Lillian Brooks Brown, A Living Centennial, Commemorating the 100th Anniversary of Metropolitan Memorial Methodist Church. The church, 1969.

Homer L. Calkin, Castings from the Foundry Mold. Arlington, Va.: the author, 1968.

William Martain Ferguson, Methodism in Washington. . . History of Fourth Street M. E. Church. Baltimore, 1892.

General Minutes, ME, MES.

Journal of the Maryland Conference, MP. EDWIN SCHELL

DISTRICT CONFERENCES. The name District Conference has appeared in American Methodist records at three different periods—each one referring to a different institution. In the earliest days from 1786 to 1796, the District Conferences, as spoken of by Bishop ASBURY, were simply the conferences of preachers held within a "district" or large indefinite geographical area, as "The New York District," "The Philadelphia District," etc. Some authorities hold that there were no real Annual Conferences until 1796, and that prior to that date all the Conferences were called "District Conferences." Bishop COLLINS DENNY states that these were to consist of "not fewer than three, nor more than twelve circuits." As annual meetings of the District Conferences continued to be held, however, the word "annual" soon supplanted the word "district" and the ANNUAL CONFERENCE became the prime organization of Methodism, and the name "District Conference" was dropped.

But in 1820, in the M. E. Church, after the PRESIDING ELDERS' districts had come to be a unit in each Annual Conference, it was decided to organize in each of these districts a District Conference which would consist of LOCAL PREACHERS only. These were supposed to meet once a year, organize and elect their own chairman, and plan their district-wide work. However, since all district leadership and overall planning was of necessity in the hands of the presiding elder and traveling ministers, local preachers found they could do little, if anything, when they did meet. Bishop HOLLAND McTYEIRE observed that this type of District Conference was "never popular nor useful" and the General Conference of 1836 did away with the legislation calling for it as a particular organization.

But in 1870, first in the M. E. Church, South, and in 1872 in the M. E. Church, District Conferences, after the pattern which have continued to the present, were first created. These were to consist of all the traveling preachers as well as local preachers in a given district; they were to be presided over by the presiding elder, or the bishop, if he should be present; and lay church officers and representatives of the various charges elected by their QUARTERLY CONFERENCES were also members. The organization thus created provided an opportunity for each district—and especially the District Superintendent or presiding elder—to supervise and plan the district work as a unit, with a heavy emphasis upon evangelistic and missionary activities. There were special inquiries with reference to any "unchurched" area in the district. Preaching and devotional services became a prominent feature of these District Conferences.

The District Conference was made mandatory by the M. E. Church, South, in 1870, and was permissive only in the M. E. Church. In that Church, the establishment of each District Conference was made to depend upon the desire of a majority of the Quarterly Conferences in any district where it was proposed to establish such a Conference. The majority of the Quarterly Conferences could discontinue a District Conference if they so pleased. As it turned out, in the M. E. Church the district conference did not come to be anything like the strong factor it became in the M. E. Church, South. In fact, district conferences were seldom held.

In the M. E. Church, South, however, in 1870, the District Conference was made a fixed part of the temporal economy of that Church, and each District was compelled to hold a District Conference annually. By 1886 the Southern bishops could state to the General Conference of that year that the District Conference had been found to be "an increasingly efficient part of our system."

In 1894, the M. E. Church, South, went further and took from its Quarterly Conferences the right to license local preachers and hear their reports and lodged this power entirely in the District Conference. The District Conference could also recommend proper persons for admission to the Annual Conferences and for ordination. The measure was adopted, after being bitterly fought in the General Conference (MES) of 1894, as belittling to the Quarterly Conferences. This action, however, put the District Conference in the M. E. Church, South into the key position that it occupied until the time of church union in 1939.

At that time under the Plan of Union (see UNIFICATION OF AMERICAN METHODISM) whether or not a District Conference was to be held in each district superintendent's district was made to depend upon the will of the Annual Conference in which the district was located. Where an Annual Conference chose to have District Conferences, they were—and are—created; where an Annual Conference does not wish them, they are not. The same plan has been continued in The United Methodist Church, U.S.A., the disciplinary direction being, "A District Conference shall be held if directed by the Annual Conference of which it is a part and may be held upon the call of the district superintendent, which call shall specify the time and place."

The membership of the District Conference is now specified as consisting of all the preachers in the District, DEACONESSES, LAY LEADERS, church school superintendents, presidents of W.S.C.S., and others, and "such other persons as the Annual Conference may determine." The Conference has the right to vote on the issuing or renewing of licenses to preach on recommendation of the District Committee on Ministerial Qualifications.

In general, it may be said that the District Conference has not been established with anything like consistency by the Annual Conferences which were in connection with the former M. E. Church, though there are notable exceptions. Also, while it has been continued rather generally by the Conferences in the former connection of the M. E. Church, South, it has lost something of its earlier importance due to several intangible factors. The faster tempo of modern life makes it more difficult to assemble ministers and laymen for sufficient periods of fellowship, prayer and preaching after the pattern of an older day. It is difficult, also, to find time for a program which should ideally take the better part of two days; and since much of the work formerly done by the District Conference is taken care of by other types of meetings over the District, such as those having to do with lay activities, or with social concerns, or evangelism, the District Conference has consequently dropped back somewhat in importance in the organized life of United Methodism. It does, however, yet give a district superintendent a formal opportunity to preside over and manage and plan all the general affairs of his district in an able administrative way.

Collins Denny, A Manual of the Discipline. 1931.

Discipline, United Methodist Church. 1968.

Episcopal Address. 1886.

N. B. Harmon. Organization. 1962.

H. N. McTyeire, Manual of the Discipline. 1920. N. B. H.

DISTRICT MEETINGS, SYNOD, British. (See BRITISH METHODISM, ORGANIZATION OF.)

DISTRICT SUPERINTENDENT. (See SUPERINTENDENT, DISTRICT.)

DIVINITY OF CHRIST, THE, has always been a central element in the Christian faith. The traditional doctrine may be stated in this manner: The Person known to history as Jesus of Nazareth was actually the Son of God who possessed from all eternity a life as fully divine as that of the Creator-God and the Holy Spirit. It was this Person who, in entering history, completely and permanently joined His life with our genuine human nature to live a truly human life among men. This is known as Incarnation, God's method of identification with the human race, until in Jesus Christ we meet the One Person at once both fully Divine and fully human.

Abundant evidence for this is found in the New Testament. It was expressed by the early formulators of Christian dogma. The ecumenical councils gave prime place to the idea. The historic confessions of faith have adhered completely to it. And in spite of various attempts to construct a reduced Christology, it survives not only in the many branches of Christendom, but has now become the basic criterion for membership in the World Council of Churches. Any adequate ecumenical movement, theologically, must include serious consideration of and commitment to the two definitive creeds of Christendom: the APOSTLES' and NICENE CREEDS. And the Divinity of Christ is held firmly at the center of both. Thus this doctrine is an essential article of the doctrinal standards of every branch of the Methodist Church. (See ARTICLES OF RELIGION, DOCTRINAL STANDARDS OF METHODISM.)

Certain reductionist efforts to modify the doctrine cannot be considered here. They may be consulted in any adequate textbook under such names as: Gnosticism, Docetism, Arianism, Sabellianism, Nestorianism, Adoptionism, and others up to and including both the "liberal" Christology of the 19th and 20th centuries, as well as some current types of existentialist theology. But it is needful to move beyond the definition used at the beginning of this essay.

The Divinity of Christ can never be separated from His humanity. Jesus was a completely human person. However divine those who knew Him best came to regard Him, they knew Him first as a man. The earliest threat to an adequate understanding of His person came before the New Testament was completed. Some people, the "docetists" (from docere, to seem, to appear), so emphasized His divineness that they denied His human life. He only "seemed" to be a man, they said. This was firmly rejected. John insists that those who deny that "Jesus Christ has come in the flesh," i.e., is a complete human personality, constitute "the spirit of antichrist" (I John 4:2 f). Thus His earthly life was limited by the conditions of human existence. Whatever divine powers or life may have resided in Him as an infant, He was apparently unaware of them. As Luke says: "Jesus increased in wisdom and in stature, and in favor with God and man" (2:52), i.e., He grew intellectually, physically, and spiritually. He was hungry and became weary. He asked questions in order to learn. There was a perfectly human character even of His religious life. He struggled with temptations as a man, and did His "mighty works" through faith in God. He acquired knowledge even of His own divine life—through the Father's chosen means to reveal it. Likely this came gradually just as self-awareness comes in the developing life of any person. Thus we never meet His Divinity apart from His humanity. They must always be held together.

But it is never adequate to regard Him as only a man. There was about Him a quality of life which requires the term "divine" to describe it. What, then, does this mean?

1. It does not mean that He was God. It is not correct to say, "Jesus is God." Even the few New Testament expressions which appear to say this do so always in the understanding that He was God-Incarnate, God expressed in human life.

2. He was no divine emanation. That is, He was no section of the divine life split off into history, like the rays of the sun reflecting back to their source. "For it is in Christ that the complete being of the Godhead dwells embodied." (Col. 2:9, N.E.B.)

3. He was no semi-divine being more or less untouched by human frailty. There is no half-god, half-man in the New Testament. He was "made like his brethren in every respect," (Heb. 2:17) and thus "in every respect has been tempted as we are," and therefore He is able "to sympathize with our weaknesses" (Heb. 4:15).

4. He did not begin as man and then become divine. Whatever happened in His baptism, or in other special revelations of the Father to Him, He can never be regarded as having been elevated into Divinity. He became man; He never became divine. No adoptionism can account for the Christ of the New Testament.

5. He was not partly divine, partly human. The idea that He acted sometimes as man, at other times as God, is unacceptable. This is no schizoid monstrosity, alternating between the divine and the human. His is the pattern of sanity, actually the only truly human person who ever lived, since without the alien element of sin; and hence the only clear example of a fully adequate channel of the Divine in history.

6. He was not a man endowed with special gifts of the Holy Spirit. Prophets and other persons have been Spirit-filled men, but Christ's Divinity was not acquired. It was His by inherent right; it was His own life.

7. He was not God AND man. That is, His is no constructed personal life, an amalgam of the divine and the human. Nor were the divine and human loosely related, or connected here and there.

As Article II of our religion expresses it in awesome language, "The Son, who is the Word of the Father, the very eternal God, of one substance with the Father, took man's nature in the womb of the blessed Virgin; so that two whole and perfect natures, that is to say, the God-head and Manhood, were joined together in one person, never to be divided; whereof is one Christ, very God and very Man, who truly suffered, was crucified, dead, and buried, to reconcile his Father to us, and to be a sacrifice, not only for original guilt, but also for the actual sins of man." (Discipline, 1968, p. 37.)

However difficult the Divinity of Christ may be to express in words, this interpretation has survived as a necessary statement about the One Life which was at once both so truly human and so truly divine as to be regarded as the perfect expression of both simultaneously. Thus His Divinity means that He brought into history a quality of Divine life which, in turn, experienced growth and development as it was expressed in completely human ways. Of course, this is mystery. But without mystery we would have simply another historical person, a view which the church has never been willing to accept. But, now, HOW is this divinity to be understood? It has found expression in various ways:

1. The theological term is Incarnation. This means that in Christ God appeared in history in human form, human flesh. In becoming man He added to the primary Divinity of His being the experience, the existence, of true humanity. And this Divinity was both experienced and expressed under the limitations of early existence.

2. Philosophically, it is expressed by the term Logos. While there is ambiguity in this New Testament term (it may mean Word or Reason), the Christian usage refers to the historical appearance of One from within the very life of God. This is the meaning in the first chapter of the Fourth Gospel.

3. There is the idea of pre-existence. This means He had an existence within the Divine life prior to His appearance in history. And in this pre-earthly life the New Testament assigns to Him a special role in the creation of the world. (See: Col. 1:16; Heb. 1:2; John 1:3; 8:58.) John 1:3 in the New English translation is especially significant: "All that came to be was alive with his life."

4. The Virgin Birth also accords with the Divinity of Christ. This doctrine claims that the presence of Jesus in history can be accounted for only as due to the action of God. The doctrine has been questioned, but it has not been successfully discredited. And even those persons who do not take it literally, often hold that it does indicate the basic Divine origin of Christ.

5. Some New Testament titles suggest the Divinity of Christ. Oscar Cullmann has shown that the various titles assigned to Him (Kurios, Messiah, Son of God, Suffering Servant, Logos, Son of Man, Saviour, etc.) eventuate in a cumulative witness to "Christ as God's self-communication."

Thus Cullmann says: "Jesus Christ is God in his self-revelation."

6. Much attention today is given to the Divine activity of Christ. Sometimes it is said that the idea of His "work" more fully expresses His "Divinity" than any reference to "nature" or "essence" can ever do. Thus in Christ there is a pattern of Divine activity seen in terms of creation, judgment, and salvation. Above, in item #3, His active role in the creation of the world has been cited. Then, as Son of Man, Jesus claimed for Himself the prerogative of judgment at the last day, a specifically Divine function, a role supported also by Paul and the writer of the Fourth Gospel. As for salvation, the Divine activity in forgiveness and resurrection of the dead is expressed in the ministry and passion of Jesus.

Christian tradition has regarded Christ's miracles as a mark of His Divinity. The idea has been strongly questioned by many in the modern period. However, the issue may be far less complicated than formerly imagined if we regard miracle as simply God's manner of action in a world which is no closed system, especially when it is seen as the arena where God is present as personally alive and available, and is able to move in ways beyond our understanding. Thus the very presence of this Person, Jesus of Nazareth, may be seen as miracle. He can never be "explained" in terms of human antecedents. Apart from the specific initiative of God there never would have been a character in history known as Jesus of Nazareth.

One neglected aspect of His Divinity is that He never laid aside His human life. Thus in becoming man in the Incarnation, He so united God and man that they may never be separated. To put it otherwise, having participated in the struggle of sinful man under the destiny of death on earth, seeking a way to God, He gathered into His own experience the sorrow, suffering, and sin of man. And this identification with man is not a temporary vesture to be cast off upon His departure from earth. As Donald M. Baillie has so well expressed the idea found in the Second Article of Religion: "If we believe in the Incarnation, we cannot possibly say that Jesus ceased to be human when He departed from this world."

There are further intriguing attempts to interpret the Divinity of Christ, but due to limited space they must be omitted. Among them, however, are those of W. Norman Pittenger who uses the structures of "process philosophy" (The Word Incarnate); the "personality principle" employed by H. Wheeler Robinson (Redemption and Revelation); the agape theology of Nels F. S. Ferré (Christ and the Christian); Paul Tillich's idea of the "new being" (Systematic Theology II); Donald M. Baillie's use of the "paradox of grace" (God Was in Christ); and various existentialist views.

At the moment it would seem that the conclusion of Bruce M. Metzger will commend itself to scholars as they continue to investigate the sources and the theology concerning Jesus of Nazareth. He says:

After making the most rigorous examination of the sources, therefore, one must conclude that Jesus of Nazareth, in his bearing as well as in his words, made claim to be the unique Son of God. (Metzger, p. 157.)

Donald M. Baillie, God Was in Christ.
Oscar Cullmann, The Christology of the New Testament. 1959.
John W. Deschner, Wesley's Christology. 1960.

John Lawson, Comprehensive Handbook of Christian Doctrine, 1967.

Bruce M. Metzger, The New Testament: Its Background, Growth, and Content.

Arthur W. Wainwright, The Trinity in the New Testament.

CLAUDE HOLMES THOMPSON

DIVISIONS OF AMERICAN METHODISM. (See UNIFICATION OF AMERICAN METHODISM.)

DIVORCE. (See ETHICAL TRADITIONS and MARRIAGE.)

DIXON, ARMINIUS GRAY (1870-1962), American M. P. minister and official, was born in Rockingham Co., N. C., on Feb. 13, 1870, the son of John F. and Elizabeth Harrison Dixon. He was educated in the local county school; graduated from Oak Ridge Academy in 1895; Western Maryland College in 1899; WESTMINSTER THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY in 1901; and received the D.D. degree from ADRIAN COLLEGE in 1919.

In 1901 he united with the NORTH CAROLINA ANNUAL CONFERENCE of the M. P. Church and began his pastoral ministry at Rocky Mount. Afterward, he served appointments in Henderson, Orange Circuit, HIGH POINT, Liberty, and Siler City. In 1908 he was chosen as the first Field Secretary for the Young People's Work in the North Carolina Conference of his denomination. As National Secretary of the Board of Young People's Work, 1917-1922, he worked with Sunday School and Christian Endeavor leaders in thirty-three states. He served as President of the North Carolina Annual Conference of the M. P. Church from 1922 to 1927. He was Superintendent of the Methodist Protestant Children's Home in High Point from 1928 until his retirement in 1941. He served as an official delegate from the North Carolina Conference to six General Conferences of his church. He took an active role in the establishment of HIGH POINT COLLEGE and in helping to bring about the union of the three major Methodist denominations in 1939.

Dixon conducted many revivals throughout the North Carolina Conference area and is credited with influencing many men to enter the ministry. He once wrote: "There is no position in the church of our Christ that is more important than the pastorate"; yet his own diverse talents as administrator qualified him to hold positions of leadership outside the pastorate for three-fifths of his active years of service.

Dixon married his college classmate, Mary Etta Watts, of Baltimore, Md., in October, 1902. In July, 1904, shortly after the birth of a daughter, Mary Vista, Mrs. Dixon died of typhoid fever in Henderson, N. C. In 1908, Dixon married Margaret Minerva Kuhns, a returned missionary, who died on July 31, 1950. Dixon died in Baltimore, Md., on Jan. 12, 1962, and was buried in the mausoleum at Guilford Memorial Park, High Point, N. C.

Ruth G. Coble and Mildred L. Clodfelter, This Is Your Life—Arminius Gray Dixon, 1960.

Journal of the Western North Carolina Conference, 1962.

The North Carolina Christian Advocate, Jan. 25, 1962.

The Sunday Telegram, Rocky Mount, N. C., July 24, 1962.

Who's Who in America. RALPH HARDEE RIVES

DIXON, ERNEST THOMAS, JR. (1922-), minister and educator, was born at San Antonio, Texas, Oct. 13, 1922, the son of Ernest T. and Ethel L. (Reese) Dixon. He received his education at Samuel Huston College

(A.B., 1943), and DREW THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY (B.D., 1945). HUSTON-TILLOTSON COLLEGE (as it became) gave him the D.D. degree (1962). On July 20, 1943, he married Lois F. Brown, and they have four children.

Joining the WEST TEXAS CONFERENCE in 1943, Dixon was assistant pastor, East Calvary Church, New York City 1943-44; Wallace Chapel A. M. E. Zion Church, Summit, N. J., 1944-45; director of religious extension service, Tuskegee Institute, 1945-51; visiting instructor, rural church work, GAMMON THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, 1949-51; executive secretary, West Texas Conference board of education, 1951-52; staff member, General Board of Education, The Methodist Church, 1952-65; and president, PHILANDER SMITH COLLEGE, 1965—. He served as president of the board of directors, Bethlehem Center, Nashville, 1956-59 and 1963-65; trustee, ST. PAUL SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY METHODIST, 1964—; and Morgan Christian Center, Morgan State College, 1964—.

Who's Who in The Methodist Church, 1966.

JESSE A. EARL

JAMES DIXON

DIXON, JAMES (1788-1871), British minister, helped to foster the friendly connection between British and American Methodism. He was born at Castle Donington, Leicestershire, England, on October 29, 1788, entered the Methodist ministry in 1812, was PRESIDENT of the Wesleyan Conference in 1841, and received in 1843 the degree of Doctor of Divinity from the University of Pennsylvania. As President of the Canadian Conference in 1848 he helped to cement the reunion of the previous year; and after a visit at this time on behalf of the British Conference to the Methodist Episcopal Church of America, he wrote his best-known book, Methodism in America. He died at Bradford, Yorkshire, on December 28, 1871.

Richard Watson Rixon, The Life of James Dixon. London: Wesleyan Conference Office, 1874. G. ERNEST LONG

DIXON, JAMES MAIN (1856-1933), American educator, author and editor, was born on April 20, 1856, in Paisley, Scotland, the son of James Main and Jane (Gray) Dixon. His father was a Presbyterian. He was educated at Neilson Institute in Scotland, finishing in 1866, at Ayr. Academy, 1872; then attended Edinburgh University, 1872-74; and at St. Andrews University, at which he received the M.A. degree in 1879.

In America, DICKINSON COLLEGE in PENNSYLVANIA gave him the L.H.D. degree in 1908. He married on March 26, 1885, Clara Richards. For a time he served as Professor of English at the Imperial College of Engineering in JAPAN, 1880-86; and was Professor of English Literature in the Imperial University of Japan, Tokyo, 1886-92. Dixon gave himself to a study of Japanese Literature and received the "Rising Sun" decoration from the Emperor of Japan in 1888 for services rendered the Empire. Thence he came to America, teaching at Washington University, St. Louis, 1892-1901. He was joint editor of the American Illustrated Methodist Magazine, 1899-1903; professor of Columbia College, Milton, Ore. (MES), 1903-04; professor of English Literature at the University of Southern California, 1905-11; and then to the chair of Oriental Studies and comparative literature. He was the author of the Dictionary of English Idiomatic Phrases (Nelson, 1891, 1912); with Bishop NATHANIEL LUCCOCK and Dr. J. W. LEE, he did an Illustrated History of Methodism, 1901. He also wrote "Matthew Arnold" in Modern Poets and Christian Teaching, 1906; A Survey of Scottish Literature in the Nineteenth Century (University of California, 1906). He was the editor of Twentieth Century Life of John Wesley, 1902 (published by Thompson, St. Louis); and had much to do with the West Coast Magazine in 1907, as he became a contributor of articles to this magazine.

A member of the M. E. Church, he continued to live in California until his death on Sept. 27, 1933.

C. F. Price, Who's Who in American Methodism. 1916.

N. B. H.

DIXON, JOHN HENRY WILLIS (1899-1958), Australian minister, was born at Merewether, New South Wales, AUSTRALIA. He entered the Department of Education and in 1923 was appointed as a teacher to Papua. The call to preach as well as to teach caused him to return to SYDNEY, New South Wales, where he entered LEIGH THEOLOGICAL COLLEGE, Enfield.

In 1929 he was appointed to Dobu, Papua. He established a printing press and published the Scriptures in the Dobuan language. He was a competent linguist and anthropologist. In 1942 he returned to New South Wales and was appointed to Wellington but voluntarily returned after two years to assist in the work of rehabilitation towards the end of World War II. In 1946 he was appointed State Secretary of Overseas Missions. He made significant contributions to the National Missionary Council, the Bible Society, the Religious Films Society and the Australasian Methodist Historical Society.

AUSTRALIAN EDITORIAL COMMITTEE

DIXON, MARGARET MINERVA KUHNS (1867-1950), M. P. missionary to JAPAN and leader in the WOMAN'S FOREIGN and HOME MISSIONARY SOCIETIES in her church, was born in Youngstown, Pa. In 1893, following three months' training at the Moody Bible Institute, she went as a missionary to Yokohama, Japan, where she remained for about five years. For fourteen years she served as traveling secretary for the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society. In 1908 she married ARMINIUS GRAY DIXON and in the same year became the first president of the Woman's Home Missionary Society of the NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE of the M. P. Church. In 1909 she was elected to serve as the national president of the Home Missionary Society, a position which she held for many years.

In 1928 her husband was appointed to serve as superintendent of the M. P. Children's Home in High Point, a project of the North Carolina branch of the Woman's Home Missionary Society. The Dixons were in charge of the home until his retirement in 1941. This administration was characterized by a great emphasis on the need of education beyond high school, and the Dixons were personally responsible for helping more than sixty young people in their efforts to attain professional and college training. On many occasions they took young ministers into their home until they could get started in college or in a pastorate.

Mrs. Dixon died in Baltimore, Md.

J. Elwood Carroll, History of the North Carolina Annual Conference of the Methodist Protestant Church. Greensboro, N. C.: McCulloh and Swain, 1939.

Mrs. E. C. Chandler, History of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society of the Methodist Protestant Church. Pittsburgh, 1920.

Ruth C. Coble, Mildred L. Clodfelter, This Is Your Life—Arminius Gray Dixon. 1960.

The North Carolina Christian Advocate, January 25, 1962.

The Rocky Mount (North Carolina) Telegram, July 24, 1960.

RALPH HARDEE RIVES

DOANE, NEHEMIAH (1820-1905), American minister and pioneer in the northwest, was born at Eastham, Mass., Jan. 22, 1820. He was converted in 1836 and admitted on trial in the GENESEE CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church in 1849. Within the year he was transferred to the OREGON AND CALIFORNIA MISSION CONFERENCE, where, in 1850, he was appointed principal of the Oregon Institute at Salem. In 1851 he was appointed to Oregon City and Clackamas. The following year he served Oregon City alone. In 1853 and 1854 he was pastor at Yamhill, Ore.

Doane became presiding elder of the Puget Sound Missionary District of the Oregon Conference in 1859 and served four years. The district comprised all the territory in Western Washington north of the Columbia River and west of the summit of the Cascades to the Pacific Ocean. He resided at Olympia and served as pastor of the congregation there. Part of the time he served Whidbey Island, spending two Sundays and the week between them there, each quarter.

In 1863 Doane became pastor of the church at Seattle, serving two years. When the Puget Sound Conference became separated from Oregon Conference in 1883, he remained with the latter conference. He had been appointed lecturer on theology at Willamette University in 1883 and remained in that position four years. He became instructor in theology at Willamette in 1889, and in 1891 accepted a call to a similar position at the newly organized Portland University at Portland.

Nehemiah Doane was recognized as a tireless and devoted worker on his pastoral charges, a diligent supervisor as a presiding elder and a strong influence in the educational endeavors of the Northwest. He died at Portland, Ore., May 4, 1905 and his remains rest at the Jason Lee Cemetery at Salem.

A. Atwood, Glimpses on Puget Sound. 1903.
Journals of the Oregon Conference.
 T. D. Yarnes, Oregon. 1958.

ERLE HOWELL

DOBBS, HOYT MCWHORTER (1878-1954), American bishop, was born at Antioch, Cherokee Co., Ala., Nov. 16, 1878, the son of Samuel and Laura (Clayton) Dobbs. He was educated at Southern University (now BIRMINGHAM-SOUTHERN), A.M., 1899; and VANDERBILT, B.D., 1904. He held honorary doctorates in divinity, law, and literature. On Nov. 14, 1906, he married Lessie Ruth Jackson of Arcadia, Louisiana, and they had two daughters and a son.

Licensed to preach in 1901, Dobbs was ordained deacon in 1904 and elder in 1908 in the NORTH ALABAMA CONFERENCE. His pastorates were: Mt. Vernon Church, BIRMINGHAM, 1904-06; Fountain Heights, 1907; Highlands, Birmingham, 1907-09; Central, KANSAS CITY, Mo., 1909-13; Troost Avenue, Kansas City, 1913-14; First, FORT WORTH, 1914-16. He served as dean and professor of Christian doctrine, School of Theology, SOUTHERN METHODIST UNIVERSITY, 1916-20, and then was pastor of First Church, ANNISTON, Ala., 1920-22. He was a delegate to the 1918 and 1922 General Conferences (MES).

Elected bishop in 1922, Dobbs' assignments were: BRAZIL, 1922-26; ALABAMA and FLORIDA, 1926-30; ARKANSAS and LOUISIANA, 1930-34; MISSISSIPPI and Louisiana, 1934-38; MISSISSIPPI, NORTH MISSISSIPPI, and MEMPHIS CONFERENCES, 1938-40; and the Jackson Area 1940. After presiding over his annual conferences in 1940, he was granted a leave of absence due to failing health. He retired in 1944.

Dobbs had a strong voice and was an able and forceful preacher. He was a Southern gentleman of the old school, extremely polite and thoughtful in all personal relationships. When assigned as the bishop in Alabama, his own father was serving as a presiding elder in the North Alabama Conference. Contemporary Alabamians delighted to tell how the father, even in the intimacies of cabinet meetings, always addressed his son as "Bishop," and the son always called his father "Dr. Dobbs." Bishop Dobbs died Dec. 10, 1954 in Shreveport, La.

F. D. Leete, Methodist Bishops, 1948.
National Cyclopaedia of American Biography. JESSE A. EARL

DOBBY, ELEANOR (1887-), New Zealand deaconess, was born and brought up in Marshlands, Christchurch. She was received as a deaconess probationer in 1921 and entered work among the Maori people. From 1923 until 1939, she worked in the Hokianga district, cradle of Methodism in New Zealand. Her travels on horseback, launch, and foot earned her the name of the "Mary Slessor of the North." During this time she was largely responsible for the erection of the Maori churches at Otatau, Taheke, and Lower Waima. In 1940, she was appointed to the South Island but after 1950 confined her labors to Christchurch city and suburbs, where she was living in retirement.

Official Records of the Deaconess Order.

WESLEY A. CHAMBERS

DOBEŠ, JOSEPH (1876-1960), Methodist superintendent and missionary in Czechoslovakia, was born on June 5, 1876, in Bohumilice, Bohemia, near Brno. He studied in the Missionary School at Neukirchen, Germany, and later moved to the United States, where he served the German Protestants and also his countrymen in Methodist congregations in Texas. In 1923 he received the honorary Th.D. from Southwestern University in Georgetown, Texas. In 1920 he was sent as missionary to Czechoslovakia, where he became a tent evangelist and founder of the Methodist Church there. For many years Dobeš served as pastor of the First Methodist Church in Prague, Vrsovice, and as District Superintendent. After twenty years of active service, he returned at the beginning of the Second World War to his two sons in the United States. He died in Texas.

VACLAV VANCURA

DOBSON, HUGH WESLEY (1879-1956), Canadian Methodist and United Church of Canada minister, was born March 4, 1879, in Molesworth, Ontario, to John Wesley and Amelia (Ross) Dobson.

After graduating from WESLEY COLLEGE (Winnipeg) with a distinguished record, he was ordained in 1906 and was appointed assistant to JOSEPH W. SPARLING at Grace Church, WINNIPEG, succeeding JAMES SHAVER WOODSWORTH. Here Dobson tested the social teachings of his professors, SALEM C. BLAND and J. H. RIDDELL.

Subsequently, he was appointed to Regina College's Chair of Biology and Human Relations. In 1913, he began a thirty-six-year period as field and later as associate secretary of the Board of Temperance and Moral Reform. During his stay at Regina, the board became in turn, "Social Service and Evangelism," and "Evangelism and Social Service."

Following up on Mackenzie King's Opium Report of 1908 and J. S. Woodsworth's survey of tolerated vice in Vancouver, Dobson first attempted to deal with these problems; with the assistance of the new Christian Social Service Council of Canada, his attack was successful. Research into conditions in immigrant settlements in 1916, and the supervision of child welfare, social reconstruction and conservation exhibits took him across CANADA. Much community interest and improvement resulted.

In the temperance struggles of the 1920's and thereafter, he gave vigorous, informed leadership toward the achievement of prohibitory legislation, and in combating the resurgence of the liquor trade after the war. He was sought across Canada, and also assisted the temperance cause in the midwestern states.

His interest in family welfare helped to bring about the formation of the Canadian Child Welfare Association, which he assisted as writer, speaker, and organizer. Youth programs and summer camps, housing problems, unemployment, institutional care of unmarried mothers, and encouragement of the oriental population, sometimes against bitter prejudices, also engaged his attention. The health insurance campaign of the mid-1930's in British Columbia in which he was active could have resulted in North America's first public plan, had it not been blocked by an astute medical clique.

As Dobson's preaching was of a high order, he was sought for anniversaries and conventions. In discussion groups and area conferences on the church and rural and urban problems, which he helped organize, he stimulated practical approaches. His keen interest in biblical, especially New Testament, scholarship, informed both clerical and lay minds. A constant stream of mimeographed material flowed to pastors' desks, conveying information and study suggestions.

He was elected British Columbia Conference president for 1941-42, a post that meant more responsibility and work. Concern for pacifist students and coastal Japanese groups were new burdens. Breakdown resulted. Several months' recuperation provided opportunities for study, and he developed an increasingly comprehensive grasp of the world situation.

Politically, he was a left-wing Liberal. While he admired Woodsworth and valued the C.C.F. program, he dealt pragmatically with the governments of the day. Social welfare bodies were his constant interest.

Retiring on June 30, 1949, he continued part-time administration until 1951. He died in Vancouver on June 9, 1956.

Records of the British Columbia Conference.
B. C. Dobson Papers, Union College.

H. T. ALLEN

DOCTRINAL STANDARDS OF METHODISM. Historical:

JOHN WESLEY'S principal concern was to preach "Scriptural Christianity," that is to say, the whole range of Christian doctrine as set forth and expounded in the Bible. He accepted without question the creeds of undivided Christendom as true and valid expressions of that doctrine, and, with them, the Articles of the Church of England, of which he was and remained an ordained minister. But, in the interests of promoting the "spread of Scriptural holiness throughout the land," he found it necessary to emphasize certain Scriptural doctrines which he believed to be either neglected or denied by some or all of the teachers and preachers of his church. In particular, he stressed the doctrines of justification by faith, free grace, the witness of the Spirit, and Christian perfection. These doctrines, when speaking to Methodists, he came to refer to as "our doctrines," by which he meant, not "the doctrines which we alone in Christendom have received and understood," but "the doctrines which we, in default of others, have been especially called to proclaim." Under the head of "our doctrines," therefore, he did not include the whole substance of the Christian faith, but only those parts of it which had come home to the Methodists with especial force.

The conditions for belonging to the Methodist societies in Wesley's time and after were not doctrinal. All that was required was "a desire to flee from the wrath to come, to be saved from their sins." Such conditions have of course considerable doctrinal implications. Wesley's followers, for the most part, were unaware of these, but it was different for the preachers in connection with Wesley.

When in 1763 he drew up a "Model Deed" (DEED, TRUST) for those who acquired and held Methodist preaching-houses, he inserted a clause to the effect that those appointed by Conference should preach in them on condition that they "Preach no other doctrine than is contained in Mr. Wesley's Notes upon the New Testament, and four volumes of sermons." This implies, of course, that the Notes and the Sermons handle or touch upon all the doctrines of the Christian faith and not simply "our doctrines," and Wesley claims this more or less explicitly in his preface to the 1771 edition of his Works (to which, indeed, he had added some sermons and treatises not in the four volumes referred to in the Deed): "... there is scarcely any subject of importance, either in practical or experimental divinity, which is not treated of more or less, either professedly or occasionally."

The Notes upon the New Testament were published in 1754, and Wesley's Preface makes it quite clear that he makes no claim to originality. On the contrary he acknowledges that a great number of the Notes are translated or abridged from J. A. Bengel's Gnomon Novi Testamenti, and also that he derived many ideas from Heylyn, Guise, and Doddridge.

The "four volumes of sermons" referred to in the Model Deed of 1763 were published in 1746, 1748, 1750 and 1760. These, in their first editions, contained forty-three sermons in all; a second edition of the 1750 volume, published before 1763, adds a further sermon, and makes the total forty-four. In the 1771 edition of the Works, the first four volumes are made up of sermons, but include nine not previously published in this form. A new form of the Model Deed brought out in 1787 slightly alters the words relating to sermons to "the first four volumes of sermons," and this change was retained in the various forms of the Model Deed in the Wesleyan Methodist Church until Methodist Union in 1932. In many quarters the phrase "the first four volumes of sermons" was taken to mean the four volumes of sermons in the 1771 edition (containing fifty-three sermons), but in 1914, after taking Counsel's opinion, the Wesleyan Methodist Conference ruled that the phrase in the current Model Deed related to the four volumes published before 1763 and containing forty-four sermons.

It is well known that Wesley used the hymns written by his brother Charles and himself as vehicles of Christian doctrine to the minds and hearts of his hearers and followers. He says in the Preface of the Collection of Hymns for use of the People called Methodists that it contains "a distinct and full account of Scriptural Christianity" and "all the most important truths of our most holy religion, whether speculative or practical." But though the hymnbook can certainly be used to express and illustrate the truths to which Methodist preachers are expected to be loyal, it has never been included among the standards of Methodist doctrine.

The smaller Methodist churches, in the Deed Polls executed at the time of adopting a legal constitution, laid down certain doctrinal principals which are wholly in accord with those of the Wesleyan Methodists. The PRIMITIVE METHODIST Deed Poll of 1830 states that its doctrinal clauses are to be interpreted agreeably to the "first four volumes of John Wesley's Sermons" and his Notes on the New Testament. The United Methodist document of 1907 contains similar provisions.

The Deed of Union adopted by the Uniting Conference of the British Methodist Church in 1932 states that "the doctrinal standards" of the Methodist Church cannot be altered or varied in any manner whatsoever by the Conference, and that the Conference is "the final authority within the Methodist Church with regard to all questions concerning the interpretation of its doctrines" (section 31). The doctrinal standards contain the following paragraphs at the beginning (section 30):

The Methodist Church claims and cherishes its place in the Holy Catholic Church which is the body of Christ. It rejoices in the inheritance of the Apostolic Faith and loyally accepts the fundamental principal of the historic creeds and of the Protestant Reformation. It ever remembers that in the Providence of God Methodism was raised up to spread Scriptural Holiness throughout the land by the proclamation of the Evangelical Faith and declares its unflinching resolve to be true to its Divinely appointed mission.

The Doctrines of the Evangelical Faith which Methodism has held from the beginning, and still holds, are based upon the Divine revelation recorded in the Holy Scriptures. The Methodist Church acknowledges this revelation as the supreme rule of faith and practice. These Evangelical Doctrines to which the preachers of the Methodist Church, both Ministers and Laymen, are pledged, are contained in Wesley's Notes on the New Testament and the first four volumes of his Sermons.

The Notes on the New Testament and the Forty-four Sermons are not intended to impose a system of formal or speculative theology on Methodist preachers, but to set up standards of preaching and belief which should secure loyalty to the fundamental truths of the Gospel of redemption, and ensure the continued witness of the Church to the realities of the Christian experience of salvation.

The remaining paragraphs of the "Standards" concern the office and functions of ordained ministers, and of the laymen who share their ministries with them, and state that Baptism and the Lord's Supper are of Divine origin and perpetual obligation.

The Deed marks no substantial change from the enactment of Wesley that no preacher of his should preach "any other doctrine than is contained" in the Notes and the Sermons. The doctrinal standards of 1932, however, are so-called in order to indicate that no doctrines opposed to them may be preached in Methodist churches, and there is, apparently, no ban on the preaching of doctrines additional to those indicated by Wesley in the Notes and the Sermons, or alluded to in the "standards," so long as they are not opposed to them. It should also be observed that there is a reference in the Standards, not to be found in Wesley's express provision, though doubtless acted upon by him in practice, to the belief of the preachers as well as to their actual pronouncements, and the question is in fact from time to time asked of every British Methodist preacher, ministerial and lay: does he believe and preach our doctrines?

On the other hand, the proviso that the Notes and Sermons "are not intended to impose a system of formal and speculative theology" on the preachers clearly allows liberty of thought and expression on theological issues about which opinion in the Church has shifted since the days of Wesley, so long as there is still loyalty to the basic principles of his theology, and so long as the varieties of doctrine are contained within the limits of the evangelical faith. To the Conference is given the power of ensuring that this loyalty is observed and these limits are not exceeded.

The Teaching of John Wesley. In what follows an account is given of what Wesley called "our doctrines," that is, of the doctrines which occupy the major part of the Notes upon the New Testament and the Forty-Four Sermons. But they are to be seen at all times against the background and in the context of the Trinitarian, Christological and Pneumatological doctrines of the historic creeds, which Wesley accepted so firmly as almost to take for granted.

The sole authoritative source of doctrine for Wesley is Holy Scripture, and Scripture contains all doctrine necessary for salvation. If any Scriptural passage seems obscure it is to be compared with parallel passages. If the true explanation is still elusive, the writings of those "experienced in the things of God" are to be consulted, but always and at every point the last word lies with Scripture. The Fathers, Luther, Calvin, the Prayer Book, Homilies, the Anglican and Puritan divines, William Law, and others are not to be despised, but there is no question of comparing their authority, or the authority of any human assembly, with that of Scripture (see BIBLE, AUTHORITY OF).

When Scripture has spoken, experience should be called in to confirm what Scripture has said. By "experience" is meant not subjective feeling, but the whole work of God in the soul. Nineteenth and early twentieth century Methodist theology sometimes placed an emphasis on "experience" (using it, too, in a much narrower sense than Wesley) which is not to be found in Wesley's writings. For him the testimony of experience is wholly ancillary; without the prior utterance of Scripture it is worthless (see EXPERIENCE, CHRISTIAN).

The doctrines which Wesley was at great pains to elicit from Scripture for the purposes of preaching, teaching, and building up men and women in the faith, were all concerned with "the way to heaven"—the path laid down by God by which we may find our way under the guidance of the Holy Spirit from our fallen state to the presence of God. We are born "fallen," because of the sin of Adam. Adam was created in God's natural, political and moral image; he was a spiritual being, he had the right and power to govern this world, he had received and was able to obey God's perfect law of love. He also had freedom of choice, and through this freedom he disobeyed God, and so cancelled his whole status before God. We are born into the condition into which he fell.

The image of God has been taken from us, and we are in the image of the Devil, as witness our pride and idolatry. Therefore we are doomed to death, death of the soul. But with the Fall came pain and suffering for animals and men, and after a life of suffering, death of the body as well as the soul. From this dreadful position we are completely incapable of rescuing ourselves by any effort that we make or any good that we do (see ORIGINAL SIN).

But we are not destitute of divine assistance. God has given us the Law. It was originally given to Adam (not, be it noted, to Moses), and is the moral law of God. We are no longer capable of keeping it, and in this sense the fall of Adam has robbed us of it. But it is still mysteriously written on our dark and sinful minds, as well as in the Old Testament, revealing to us our sin in all its horror, and thus preparing us to receive the message of grace when it is brought to us. We recognize the Law for what it is by the use of "natural conscience," itself a gift of God, and usually identified by Wesley with the prevenient grace of God. By the use of our consciences, we know, all too well, that we have failed to keep God's law. That we may be able to use our consciences, God has left us some use of our reason, limited and corruptible though it is (see LAW and GOSPEL).

As fallen creatures, we no longer possess free will; we are inevitably dragged down by our sinful natures into more and more sin. But by a special gift of God, which at this point neutralizes the corruption of our nature, we are able to distinguish right and wrong, to choose either of them, and to receive or reject the Gospel of Grace (see FREE WILL).

This is Wesley's answer to the Calvinists, with whom, as he said on one occasion, he agreed that there is no natural free will and no power antecedent to grace. The Gospel, he said, is meaningless if we refuse to man all power of decision, and deny that he is a moral agent. Yet "Man is free, but by grace, not by nature." (See CALVINISTIC CONTROVERSY.)

Because of these divine mitigations man, for all his depravity, is able to repent, and to do good works which bethaken that fact. These works are truly good—Wesley will have none of the idea that all works done before justification are hopelessly evil—but they contain no merit whatsoever. For they are not man's good works at all, but God's, since they are done in the power of his grace alone. To trust in them for salvation is blasphemous and useless.

This account of man's fallen nature is a necessary preliminary for the proclamation of the Gospel, but Wesley, though he is very clear about it, does not dwell on it unduly. The positive doctrine of salvation is much more to his taste. God has made provision for our salvation from the first moment of our earthly life. For He has given to us the Sacrament of Baptism, by which we are born again, enter into the covenant of grace, and are received into the Church. The effect of infant baptism (though not, as he maintains, of adult baptism) is to wash away Original Sin and make us children of God. But, alas, there is no instance of anyone surviving infancy who has not "sinned away" the effects of his baptism, and become guilty of actual sin. Thus baptismal grace is obliterated for us, and we are again helpless sinners in the sight of God. (See BAPTISM.)

But God's grace is sufficient for this situation also. Baptism is itself "the application of the merits of Christ's death," and these merits are still available for us though we have fallen again into sin, and are, in fact, always available for us, however often and however heinously we sin. Wesley does not specify any particular doctrine of the Atonement as the necessary and only one; he makes use of most of those which were current in Christian thought in his time, with, perhaps, especial mention of the one which speaks of the imputation of Christ's merits. He is more interested in pointing out and emphasizing the grace of God which took the initiative for our salvation in the cross of Christ, than in any theory of how that salvation was accomplished. For "grace is the source of salvation"—and, of course, the only source. (See ATONEMENT; GRACE.)

"Faith is the condition of salvation." The doctrine of JUSTIFICATION by faith—or, as it should better be expressed, of justification by grace through faith—holds a central place in Wesley's theology. However much he disagreed with Luther on the matters of the Law and of sanctification, and it has been maintained strongly that this disagreement rested on a misunderstanding of Luther, he was wholly at one with him on the matter of justification. He speaks of several kinds of faith, but there are only two which help in the matter of salvation—the "faith of a servant" and the "faith of a son." The "faith of a servant" enables a man "to fear God and work righteousness," and by virtue of it he is in a state of acceptance with God. But he is a servant and not a son of God, and this faith is greatly inferior to the faith of a son, which is "a sure trust and confidence that Christ died for my sins, that He loved me and gave himself for me." By such faith, which is the gift of God, not his own achievement, a man becomes a loving child of God, and enters on all the privileges of sonship. (See FAITH.)

By grace, through faith, we are justified. On the matter of justification Wesley avoids both the classic Roman Catholic definition, that it means "being made just," and the classic Lutheran definition, that it means "having righteousness imputed to one who is not righteous." He says that it simply means "being pardoned"; when we are justified, our sins are blotted out, and we are treated by God as if we had never sinned. At the same time God's image is restored to us, so that righteousness and true holiness begin to work in us. (See JUSTIFICATION.)

But the effect of grace working through faith which Wesley stresses most of all is that we are born again. This rebirth, he says, is "a vast inward change, a change wrought in the soul, by the operation of the Holy Ghost; a change in the whole manner of our existence." We are different people living in a different world, or rather, living in the same world in so entirely different a manner that the world itself seems new. The things which we once desired with all our hearts no longer have any appeal to us; the things of the spirit which once left us cold move us now with deep desire to attain them. (See NEW BIRTH.)

But not only are we thus reborn and renewed, we know that this has happened to us. Or at any rate we have every reason to expect that God will give to us this assurance of salvation, though He does in fact withhold it from some of His children. (Wesley at one time held that if there was no assurance there was no salvation, but he withdrew this extreme doctrine.) God gives this gift to us by the Holy Spirit, who adds His testimony to that of our own spirits (that is, our "good conscience") that we are the children of God. We can recognize this "witness of the Spirit" by its direct and unmistakable quality, but still more by the humility, patience and gentleness which invariably accompany it—and this latter test is the one which others can and should apply to it. Such a gift as assurance of salvation seems very liable to confusion with the brash and arrogant self-confidence which is sometimes to be observed in those who claim to have "seen the light." Wesley takes all possible steps to avoid this confusion by asserting the necessary connection between assurance of salvation and the Christian virtues, especially those associated with humility. (See WITNESS OF THE SPIRIT.)

This salvation is for all, for Christ died for all. Any suggestion that the grace of God is limited to a few people, or even to a great number of people, he dismisses as a blasphemous lie. The grace of God is not limited at all; there is no one under heaven or in heaven for whom it is not available. Why then do so many not accept it? Not because God has predestined them to damnation—for that makes God worse than the Devil—but because they have used their freedom of choice the wrong way. And when the Calvinists objected that this doctrine diminished the sovereignty of God, he replied that God's mightiness is safeguarded by the fact that He foreknows who will have faith and who will not—for he knows all things in an eternal Now—and elects to salvation those of whom he knows that they will have faith; but to go further, and to say that God foreordains some to faith and some to unfaith, is to make nonsense of the whole Christian religion and its ordinances, not least the ordinance of preaching. (See ELECTION.)

The first major part of Wesley's doctrine of salvation concerns justification and new birth. The second major part concerns sanctification, or growth in holiness. Wesley, in his own spiritual development, was convinced of the necessity for holiness before he discovered his personal need for justification and forgiveness—though, of course, he had always accepted the doctrine of justification by faith. When he did become aware of the importance of justification for himself he did not relax the quest for holiness; on the contrary, he found for the first time that it was not hopeless. So also in his theology he stressed the need for holiness all through his career, and came at a certain point in his life to underpin it with the doctrine of justification and the new birth and thereafter taught the two doctrines as integral parts of the one truth. His doctrine of holiness begins with the surprising statement, culled from the First Epistle of John, that "he who is born of God does not sin." Conscious that he is here straining the credulity of his hearers, and risking the scorn of his opponents, Wesley defends the statement by a somewhat narrow definition of sin as "an actual, voluntary transgression of the law; of the revealed, written law of God; of any commandment of God, acknowledged to be such at the time that it is transgressed." Thus "sin" here does not include evil inclinations, or intellectual mistakes, or wrong actions done without due thought. But even with these modifications the notion that the believer is sinless has not gained acceptance even from the majority of Methodists.

Its positive complement is much more acceptable. The believer does fulfil the law of God, and not only outwardly, but inwardly, by bringing forth the fruit of the Spirit. Here Wesley set himself against certain Calvinists who were Antinomians into the bargain, and who said that once a man was justified he was set free from all obligation to carry out the commands of God, for "faith supersedes holiness." Christ himself fulfilled the law of God in every particular—not the ceremonial law of the Pentateuch, which was a temporary provision for God's people until the Messiah should come, but the perpetual law of God, revealed in the first place to Adam; we who belong to Christ must follow in His footsteps in the power of the Holy Spirit. (See LAW AND GOSPEL.)

Thus we shall be sanctified, by grace through faith. Sanctification is a process by which inward sin is purged away and the positive virtues of the Christian life steadily develop. Those interpreters of Wesley who suppose that sanctification takes place in a moment of time rely on certain unguarded statements of his which are not true to the general tenor of his thought, and so are led to confuse the culmination of the process, which is momentary, with the process, which is not. But there is a culmination of the process, and this culmination can take place, if God so wills it, in this present life. Wesley sometimes calls it "Christian Perfection," which is, perhaps, the technical term, sometimes "Entire Sanctification," which is the most accurate term, and sometimes "Perfect Love," which is the term which he prefers.

Wesley describes this many times, both positively and negatively. Positively, it means above all the fulfilment of the two Great Commandments—and such fulfilment, properly understood, embraces the whole content of what God bestows on those whom he sanctifies. It can also be called "all the mind that was in Christ; the renewal of the heart in the whole image of God; the devoting, not a part, but all, our soul, body, and substance to God." Negatively, it is freedom from both outward and inward sin. Some interpreters have supposed it to be freedom from outward sin only, in view of the definition of sin as voluntary transgression of a known law which Wesley gives when he speaks of the sinlessness of those who are born of God. But this is incorrect. When he speaks of Perfect Love, he uses a definition of sin which is far more inclusive, and includes all the ingrained faults of human nature—envy, malice, wrath and unkindness. Perfect love denotes the conquest of all these.

This is the goal of the Christian life on earth, and it is attainable on earth by the power of the Spirit. But it is not absolute, since we are to grow in grace through all eternity, and Christian Perfection must, therefore, be called, somewhat paradoxically, relative perfection. And if we do attain it on earth, it can be lost again. Most of us, in fact nearly all of us, fail to attain it on earth. Yet "without holiness no man can see the Lord." Therefore at the moment of death those of us who have not been made entirely holy on earth become entirely holy by God's infinite grace (this is not stated explicitly in the official "Standards," but it is implied by Wesley's teaching in them, and is made explicit elsewhere). (See CHRISTIAN PERFECTION.)

Everyone must appear before the Great Assize, and be judged by his works (not his faith). Those who have not done works of holiness because they have refused God's gift of faith will be condemned to hell, which means both the loss of all good things and eternal torment, spiritual and physical (Wesley rarely refers to this, but it is present in his teaching). Those who have been made holy will enter the fellowship of all the saints and live for ever in God's near presence.

Wesley does not expound his teaching on the Church and the Sacrament of Holy Communion in the Notes and Sermons, for the sufficient reason that he accepted and taught the doctrines of the Church of England on the subject. But he certainly assumes in all his writings that the "way to heaven" is taken within the Holy, Catholic Church, and never ceases to point out the duty of loyal membership of it. He says that the Catholic Church consists of all Christians on earth, who have one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one Spirit; he holds that the Church of England consists of all members of the Catholic Church who live in England; he refuses to unchurch the Church of Rome, since Christians who have the same Lord and the same hope belong to the one Church, even if their opinions are wrong and their worship is superstitious; and he recognizes the Church as existing wherever two or three are gathered together in the name of Christ. He condemns schism with the utmost severity, especially when it takes the form of actual separation from the Church; only when remaining in the Church involves a breach of God's commands is it right to separate. He commands to his hearers and readers a truly "catholic spirit," which asks of other Christians, not that they should conform in doctrine or liturgy or polity, but only that their heart should be right with God (see CATHOLIC).

On the Holy Communion, an indication of his views can be found from his publication of his brother's eucharistic hymns with extracts from Daniel Brevint's The Christian Sacrament and Sacrifice. In these the doctrines of transubstantiation and of the opus operatum are rejected, but much stress is laid on the Real Presence of Christ in the Sacrament, and it is held that in the Sacrament we represent the sacrifice of Christ which was made once for all (see Eucharistic Doctrine and Devotion).

British Conference Pronouncements on Doctrine. The practice by which the Conference interprets the "standards" of Methodist doctrine has its historical justification in Wesley's publication, from time to time, of the Minutes of Conversations with his preachers, which were often on matters of doctrine. Since the Methodist Union of 1932 it has been the constitutional duty of Conference to interpret the doctrinal clauses in the Deed of Union, though the clauses themselves are unalterable. It has discharged this duty, partly by the issue of a Junior Catechism in 1951 and of a Senior Catechism in 1952; and partly by the issue of "Statements" on various specific issues (the "Statements" have been made the more necessary by the participation of the Methodist Church in the Ecumenical Movement, and the consequent need to make its doctrines clear to other churches as well as to itself).

The Statement of 1937 on "The Nature of the Church according to the Teaching of the Methodists" makes plain the adherence of the Methodist Church to the Scriptural doctrine of the One, Holy, Catholic and Apostolic Church and its claim to be part of that Church, and disposes of the notion that Methodists believe the Church to be invisible by asserting the existence of the Church in the world as an organic structure, with ministry, sacraments and order.

The "Statement on Holy Baptism" of 1952 says that Christ Himself is the minister in baptism, and that in His name the Church receives a child into "the congregation of Christ's flock," so that he becomes a member of the Holy Catholic Church. It expressly defends Infant Baptism against Believers' Baptism as being required by the teaching of the New Testament, as well as by the practice of the Church. It does not, however, reaffirm Wesley's own belief in baptismal regeneration. (See BAPTISM.)

The "Statement on Ordination" of 1960 develops the teaching of the 1937 "Statement on the Nature of the Church," and claims that Methodist ministers are the equivalent of the presbyter-bishops of New Testament times. Their only reason for ordination is that they are called and enabled by God; it is the duty of the Church to test their call, to train them and ordain them. (See CALL TO THE MINISTRY.) The ordination is carried out by the Church in the name of Christ, and in Methodism it takes the double form of "receiving them into full connexion" in the meeting of Conference and of the laying on of hands by the President or his deputy, and by other ministers assisting, at a subsequent service. By ordination to the ministry of Word and Sacraments a minister is entitled to administer the Sacrament of Holy Communion (others may be authorized to do this, but only for a limited period in a particular place by a "dispensation" of Conference), and thereafter unites in his office all the ministries entrusted to the Church as the People of God. (See ORDINATION.)

The "Statement on Church Membership" of 1961, with its appendix, the "Statement on Confirmation" of 1962, develops the "statement on Holy Baptism" by indicating that the membership of the Holy Catholic Church conferred by baptism is completed, on profession of faith and commitment to Jesus Christ, by reception into full membership of the Church, and authorizes the use of the term "Confirmation" as an alternative to "Reception into Full Membership." It also elucidates the complications caused by the fact that a member of the Methodist Church is a member of the Methodist "society" and at the same time a member of the Holy Catholic Church.

American Methodist Doctrinal Standards. The twenty-four ARTICLES OF RELIGION sent over to American Methodism by John Wesley in 1784 (one was added in America, making twenty-five) and published in every issue of the Discipline from that of 1790 until the present have always been held to set forth and embody the standards of doctrine of American Methodism. These Articles, while sent over by Wesley in 1784 (as part of the Sunday Service) and selected from the thirty-nine of the Church of England, were not inserted into the Discipline until 1790. Along with the Articles, the fifty-two Sermons of John Wesley (a later redaction took only forty-four of these) and the Notes on the New Testament have always been commonly taken as normative for Methodist standards of doctrine.

These Articles have ever been placed in and are now in the Constitution of The United Methodist Church. They have likewise ever been put beyond the reach of revision or change by the GENERAL CONFERENCE. This was done by the first Restrictive Rule adopted in the M. E. Church in 1808 and yet in force. "They [the General Conference] shall not revoke, alter, or change our Articles of Religion, or establish any new standards or rules of doctrine contrary to our present existing and established standards of doctrine" (Discipline, 1968, Para. 16).

Since the sermons which Wesley selected as containing the doctrines he held, together with his Notes on the New Testament, are of such a general nature and treat of so many matters that they lend themselves here and there to different interpretations, American Methodists usually take the Articles of Religion which are absolutely fixed and firm as the concrete expression of their belief. Where there may be a question as to the meaning of an Article or its specific interpretation, they refer back to the teaching or preaching of Wesley, or to that of the early Methodist preachers, and of course to present-day authorities, to help them settle any matter at issue. It should be noted, however, that the Wesleyan emphases, "our doctrines," find expression in the Sermons and Notes rather than in the Articles.

The bishops of The Methodist Church in addressing the General Conference of 1952 said, "Our theology has never been a closely organized doctrinal system. We have never insisted on uniformity of thought or statement." They added, however, in opposition to the idea that Methodism had no formal doctrine, "there are great Christian doctrines which we most surely hold and most firmly believe." They then went on to give their own interpretation of some of these beliefs as part of the episcopal address at that General Conference.

From time to time, because of the archaic language of the Articles of Religion, there have been calls for "re-stating the faith." The General Conference of 1908, M. E. Church, South, saw a determined effort to empower a committee to revise the Articles and bring their expression more in line with modern day thought. This effort, however, was defeated, and similar efforts from time to time have likewise come to naught.

As has been stated, no one—not even the General Conference—has the right to change even one word of the historic Articles of Religion. They can only be changed by a long, drawn-out process of amending the church's Constitution, and this would require a two-thirds vote of the General Conference and a three-fourths vote of the membership of all the annual conferences, present and voting, during the subsequent quadrennium. No amendment calling for doctrinal change has ever been proposed by any General Conference of any body of American Methodism.

The adoption of a new Constitution for The United Methodist Church in 1968 called for the incorporation in that Constitution of the CONFSSION OF FAITH of the E.U.B. Church and directed that this be published alongside the twenty-five Articles of The Methodist Church. The JUDICIAL COUNCIL of The Methodist Church ruled that the separate items of belief in the Confession of Faith of the E.U.B. Church did not add anything new or different from the doctrine contained in the Articles of Religion of The Methodist Church, and that therefore they might be adopted by the normal constitutional process which required two-thirds of the General Conference and two-thirds of the church-wide annual conference membership present and voting. A three-fourths vote of the annual conference membership was, therefore, not required, and The Methodist Church did adopt by the above described constitutional process the E.U.B. Confession of Faith and it now goes alongside the historic Articles of Religion as embodying standards of doctrine of The United Methodist Church. It, too, is protected by a new Restrictive Rule.

A committee, however, was appointed by the Uniting Conference of 1968 to endeavor to see if it might be possible to synthesize the Articles and Confession and possibly in time restate the doctrinal standards of the Church in a more modern way. This committee is expected to report at a subsequent General Conference. As it is now, the twenty-five Articles of Religion and the Confession of Faith, together with Wesley's Sermons and his Notes on the New Testament are to be taken as embodying the doctrinal standards of The United Methodist Church.

It is significant that the Book of Discipline of The Methodist Church, and now The United Methodist Church, has always been entitled "The Doctrines and Discipline of The Methodist Church." The doctrines, as far as the Book of Discipline is concerned, may be found in the twenty-five Articles; certain of their applications to life in the General Rules printed there, and something of their import or expression in the Ritual, especially in the Sacramental services and the forms for the reception of members into the church.

- E. W. Baker, Faith of a Methodist. 1958.
 J. C. Bowmer, Sacrament. 1951.
 G. C. Cell, Rediscovery of John Wesley. 1935.
 W. R. Cannon, Theology of John Wesley. 1946.
 Davies and Rupp, History of British Methodism. 1963.
Discipline, ME, MES, MP, TMC, UMC.
 A. B. Lawson, John Wesley. 1963.
 H. Lindstrom, Wesley and Sanctification. 1946.
 B. L. Manning, Hymns, of Wesley and Watts. 1942.
Minutes of the Methodist Conference.
 J. R. Parris, Wesley's Doctrine of the Sacraments. 1963.
 W. B. Pope, Compendium of Christian Theology. 1880.
 J. E. Rattenbury, Eucharistic Hymns. 1948.
 R. Watson, Theological Institutes. 1823-26.
 J. Wesley, Explanatory Notes on the New Testament. 1755.
 _____, Journal. 1909-16.
 _____, Letters. 1931.
 _____, Standard Sermons. 1921.
 _____, Works. 1829-31.

RUPERT E. DAVIES
 N. B. H.

DODD, JAMES BEST (1807-1872), JAMES WILLIAM (1834-1886), and THOMAS JOHN (1837-1899) were a father-and-sons combination that made significant contributions to education in the M. E. Church, South, across much of the nineteenth century. James Best Dodd was born in Leesburg, Va., on April 3, 1807, and joined the historic church there as a young man. He attended Leesburg Academy, and became a teacher at such towns as Winchester and Harper's Ferry. He served as professor and vice-president of Centenary College, Brandon Springs, Miss., 1841-45; and in the same capacities at CENTENARY COLLEGE, JACKSON, La., 1845-46; and at Transylvania College, LEXINGTON, Ky., beginning in 1846. In 1849 he became president of Transylvania College when HENRY B. BASCOM resigned (just before he was elected bishop), and served in this capacity for twelve years. During his presidency he prepared a series of mathematical texts that were published by Pratt, Oakley, and Co., of New York City, and widely used across the nation. He died on March 27, 1872.

James William Dodd, American educator and churchman, was born in Winchester, Va., on March 25, 1834. He graduated from Transylvania College in 1850 at the age of sixteen. He taught at several private schools until 1855 when he established the Shelbyville High School. He was called in his day "the Arnold of Kentucky," and the school was called "the Rugby of Shelbyville." In 1872 he became president of Kentucky High School, later known as Kentucky Eclectic Institute, at Frankfort. In 1877 he was given the LL.D. degree by Indiana Asbury University (now DEPAUW UNIVERSITY), and in 1879 he went to VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY as Professor of Latin. At Vanderbilt he established the famous Bachelor of Ugliness tradition which is still maintained there. He died on Aug. 15, 1886.

Thomas John Dodd, American clergyman and educator, was born on Aug. 4, 1837, at Harper's Ferry, Va. (now W. Va.). He graduated from Transylvania College in 1857. He joined the KENTUCKY CONFERENCE, M. E. Church, South, in 1860, and was a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1886. He served pastorates at Scott Street in Covington, and at Frankfort. He taught private schools at Paris, Nicholesville, Shelbyville, and Lexington, and was principal of the Conference High School at Millersburg. He was elected president of KENTUCKY WESLEYAN COLLEGE in 1875. The following year he was called to the chair of Hebrew and English Literature at Vanderbilt University, Nashville. He left this position in 1885 and conducted the Dodd Select High School in NASHVILLE for twelve years. He was a scholar in Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Chaldee, Syriac, and other languages, and was ranked as one of "the ablest linguists in the South, and the peer of any in the North." He was given a D.D. degree by Centre College. He wrote two books: John Wesley, A Study of the Times (1891), and Miracles: Were They or Were They Not, Performed by Jesus? (1899). He was a frequent contributor to Methodist journals and periodicals and a sermon of his was included in a volume entitled Sermons by Southern Methodist Preachers (1890). He died on Feb. 9, 1899.

Biographical Encyclopedia of Kentucky of the Dead and Living Men of the Nineteenth Century. Cincinnati: J. M. Armstrong and Co., 1878.
 WALTER N. VERNON

DODGE, RALPH EDWARD (1907-), American bishop, was born in Terril, Iowa, on Jan. 25, 1907, the son of

RALPH E. DODGE

Ernest Ira and Lizzie (Longshore) Dodge. He received the B.A. degree from Taylor University in 1921; the M.A. from BOSTON UNIVERSITY in 1933, and the S.T.B. in 1934; S.T.M. from the Hartford Seminary Foundation, 1943, and Ph.D. in 1944. On June 28, 1934, he was united in marriage to Eunice Elvira Davis, and they have four children.

Ralph Edward Dodge was admitted on trial in the ERIE CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church in 1933, ordained DEACON in 1934, and to full connection and ELDER, 1935. He was a missionary to ANGOLA from 1936-50; executive secretary for Africa, Board of Missions of The Methodist Church, 1950-56; and elected bishop in 1956 by the AFRICA CENTRAL CONFERENCE for a term of eight years. He was assigned to the Salisbury (RHODESIA) Area, 1956-64. He was reelected and reassigned to the Rhodesia Area in 1964, although he had been expelled from Rhodesia by the white minority government. On the death of Bishop SIGG, he was placed in charge of part of the Geneva Area from November 1965 until a new episcopal leader was consecrated in September 1966. Except for that period he has resided in ZAMBIA since leaving Rhodesia.

Bishop Dodge was secretary of the Angola Conference, 1937-40, and again 1945-48; president of the South Rhodesia Christian Conference, 1962-64. He is the author of The Unpopular Missionary (1964), and has contributed numerous articles to church periodicals. He is presently serving as chaplain at the Mindolo Ecumenical Institute in Kitwe, Zambia. Mrs. Dodge is serving as field treasurer for the World Division of the Board of Missions in Zambia.

Bishop Dodge retired at the Africa Central Conference held at Gaberones, Botswana, Aug. 24-31, 1968. He was then elected to the episcopacy for life on the first ballot, getting sixty out of seventy votes. He then declared his intention to retire under provisions of that Conference allowing optional retirement to bishops at the age of sixty.

Ralph E. Dodge, The Pagan Church: The Protestant Failure in America. New York: J. P. Lippincott, 1968.
Who's Who in The Methodist Church, 1966. N. B. H.

DODGE CITY, KANSAS, U.S.A. Methodism in Dodge City dates from June 14, 1874, when S. A. Newell, a local preacher and a trainman of the Santa Fe, organized a class of thirteen people. These people represented several denominations. After this congregation was organized, a Union Church was built on the northeast corner of First and Spruce Streets, and N. F. Tipton was appointed pastor by the SOUTH KANSAS CONFERENCE. Then in November, 1883, the work of constructing a frame church building by the Methodists alone was begun. It was built on the site now occupied by what is known as the "old parsonage" at 707 First. At this time the membership was under one hundred. A. P. GEORGE preached the first sermon in the new church. By the turn of the century more room was needed, and additions were made so that nearly 200 could be seated in the sanctuary at one time. Soon this was not sufficient.

Plans for a second building were begun in 1911 and in 1913 a brick building was constructed, with space available for 400, and about 200 young people in the west part of the building. Bishop WILLIAM O. SHEPARD dedicated the building when S. M. Van Cleve was pastor. Attendance continued to grow, adult classes were organized, facilities proved inadequate, and by 1928 over 500 persons were attending Sunday school each week. So again construction was called for and in 1929 an educational building was dedicated for use. A parsonage was also attached to the educational building. H. L. Gleckler was the pastor.

Depression, drouth, and hardships were realities that took their toll in the years that followed. Then came the war, military personnel began flowing into Dodge City, and the church began again to grow. A new parsonage was completed in 1954, and the old parsonage was converted to Sunday school rooms.

As Dodge City continued a slow steady growth, plans were formulated for another new building which was located at 210 Soule Street. The cornerstone was laid June 14, 1964, and the first service was held Jan. 3, 1965.

From a Sunday school class of thirteen loyal Christians in 1874, the church has grown to 1,977 members in 1970.

BRYCE GLECKLER

DOESCHER, ARTHUR H. (1892-1958), American E. U. B. minister, was born in Clay Center, Neb., July 14, 1892, the son of Frederick H. and Martha (Franzen) Doescher. During his early years Arthur Doescher lived in various parsonages in NEBRASKA and CALIFORNIA. He graduated from Fremont (now Midland) College, Fremont, Neb. in 1914 with the A.B. degree and a year later with the B.S. degree. He received the B.D. degree from EVANGELICAL THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY in 1917 and then enrolled for post-graduate studies at the University of Chicago. Western Union (now WESTMAR) College, Le Mars, Iowa conferred upon him the D.D. degree in 1935.

Arthur Doescher was licensed to preach by the Nebraska Conference, Evangelical Association, in 1911, was ordained a DEACON by the Indiana Conference, Evangelical Association, in 1918, and the following year was ordained an itinerant ELDER by the same conference. He served pastorates in the Indiana Conference from 1917 to 1933 and held various conference offices including that of conference secretary. He was elected Treasurer of the Superannuation Fund of The Evangelical Church in 1933, and became the Executive Secretary-Treasurer in 1938. He continued this same responsibility in the Board of Pensions, The E. U. B. Church, until his retirement in 1958.

Doescher was a member of the General Conference, the General Council of Administration, the Commission of Church Ritual, and the Board of Christian Social Action. For the year 1944-45 he was also the president of the Church Pensions Conference of North America.

Miss Marie Trott and Arthur Doescher were married June 14, 1917, but the union was broken with her death, Dec. 30, 1953. Later he was united in marriage to Leona A. Marks Hansen, which wedding was solemnized April 6, 1955.

Following an extended illness Doescher died at his home in Dayton, Ohio, June 6, 1958, and was buried in the Woodland Cemetery of that city, June 9, 1958.

HARRY O. HUFFMAN

DAVID S. DOGGETT

DOGGETT, DAVID SETH (1810-1880), American minister, educator, author and bishop in the M. E. Church, South, was born on Jan. 26, 1810, in Lancaster County, Va. He was a descendant of John Doggett, Anglican minister who immigrated to VIRGINIA about 1650 and served as rector of White Chapel Church in Lancaster County. Bishop Doggett's father was a lawyer and both parents were devout Methodists. He was educated at the University of Virginia where he studied jurisprudence. Later he decided to enter the ministry. In 1829 he joined the VIRGINIA CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church and became a traveling preacher on the Roanoke Circuit in NORTH CAROLINA. This circuit had been the scene of the establishment of the M. P. Church at WHITAKER'S CHAPEL in December 1828, and several M. E. churches, including Whitaker's Chapel and Eden Church, had withdrawn as congregations to join the M. P. movement. In 1831 Bishop Doggett was sent to Petersburg, Va., and afterwards he served churches in RICHMOND, Lynchburg, NORFOLK, and Charlottesville. In 1850 he was made editor of the scholarly Quarterly Review of the newly organized M. E. Church, South and moved to Richmond, where he stayed during the Civil War. He traveled and preached throughout the Southern states and was the author of The War and Its Close, published in Richmond in 1864. In 1866 he accepted a professorship at RANDOLPH-MACON COLLEGE, but in that same year he was elected bishop. He was about to take charge of the California Conference of the M. E. Church, South, when he died on Oct. 27, 1880. He was buried in historic Hollywood Cemetery in Richmond.

Appleton's Cyclopaedia of American Biography. New York, 1888.

F. D. Leete, Methodist Bishops. 1948.

Ralph Hardee Rives, "A History of Oratory in the Commonwealth of Virginia Prior to the War Between the States." Unpublished dissertation, University of Virginia, 1960.

RALPH HARDEE RIVES

DOHERTY, ROBERT R. (1847-1909), American editor of church publications and descendant of John Remington, noted Canadian Methodist pioneer, was born Dec. 24, 1847.

He attended New York College, completed work toward an M.A. degree at DICKINSON COLLEGE, and received a Ph.D. degree from Grant University (now UNIVERSITY OF CHATTANOOGA).

His journalistic career was begun as a proofreader in the Methodist printing office at Mulberry, N. J. Later he was on the editorial staff of the National Repository and a daily newspaper in Jersey City. His work attracted the attention of JAMES M. BUCKLEY, the editor of the Christian Advocate, and in 1883 he was named assistant editor of that publication. He held this post until 1888, but remained with the BOOK CONCERN as a member of the Sunday school editorial staff for twenty years, editing Biblical commentaries and widely used Sunday school lesson aids.

Doherty was one of the founders of the 1480-chapter EPWORTH LEAGUE in 1888, and was its first recording secretary. He was honored four times with election as a lay delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church (1884, 1888, 1896, and 1900).

Co-author of Illustrative Notes: A Guide to the Study of Illustrative Lessons, he published Representative Methodists in 1888, and was author of Torchbearers of Christendom in 1895.

A long-time resident of Jersey City, N. J., Doherty took an active part in civic activities, holding many responsible positions in various organizations. He died in Jersey City on Dec. 1, 1909.

Robert R. Doherty, Representative Methodists.

V. B. Hampton, Newark Conference, 1957.
Who's Who in America, 1906-07.

MARWIN W. GREEN

DOLLIVER, JONATHAN PRENTISS (1858-1910), American statesman and churchman, was born near Kingwood, W. Va., Feb. 6, 1858, the son of J. J. Dolliver, a Methodist circuit rider. Educated at West Virginia University (A.B., 1875), several schools conferred on him the LL.D. degree. He married Louise Pearsons in 1895. Settling in Fort Dodge, Iowa, he became a lawyer and entered politics. He was elected to congress six times, 1888-1900. Appointed to the senate in 1900, he later was elected to the office, and was still a senator at the time of his death. Powerful friends supported him for vice-president on the Republican ticket in 1900, but he declined. Had he accepted, he might have been president instead of Theodore Roosevelt.

Dolliver was a delegate to the 1908 GENERAL CONFERENCE, and was appointed fraternal delegate to the 1910 General Conference (MES). According to Bishop EDWIN H. HUGHES, Dolliver's fraternal address melted even the fiercest anti-unionists and contributed to the healing of the division in American Methodism. Dolliver died at Fort Dodge, Oct. 15, 1910.

Dictionary of American Biography.

Edwin H. Hughes, I Was Made A Minister. Nashville: Abingdon, 1943.

Who Was Who in America, 1897-1942. JESSE A. EARL.

DOMINICAN REPUBLIC. Midway between CUBA on the west and PUERTO RICO on the east lies Hispaniola, the second largest of the West Indies islands. On Christmas Day, 1492, Columbus landed on the north coast and claimed the land for Spain. It is a beautiful island with high mountains and broad fertile valleys in the north central area where rainfall is abundant. The extreme southern section is dry and arid. HAITI's four and one-half million people occupy the western third of the island, leaving the eastern two-thirds to the Dominican Republic and its nearly four million inhabitants.

The main agricultural products are sugar, cocoa, molasses, coffee, rice, corn, and tobacco. There are rich deposits of silver, platinum, iron, salt, coal, and petroleum. These are still largely undeveloped. Industries include the manufacture of rum, alcohol, textiles, clothing, chemicals, shoes, and furniture.

The capital is Santo Domingo. Spanish is the spoken language, although English is required in all schools. The Dominicans are a mixture of Spanish, native Indian, and imported Negro. The country is nominally Catholic. Freedom of religion is guaranteed and the church is more tolerant here than in some Latin countries.

The Republic boasts an impressive list of "firsts": the oldest cathedral in the Americas, established in 1514, where according to tradition the remains of Christopher Columbus are buried; the first hospital of the western world whose ruins date from 1503; the oldest city in the New World, probably founded Aug. 4, 1496; and the University of San Domingo which received its charter in 1531 and claims to be the first such institution in the western world.

Hispaniola, seat of Spanish power in the Caribbean, has experienced frequent and violent political upheaval. The French seized the western coastal area in the mid-1660's. Two separate nations were established in 1697. A series of confused events and bloody revolutions followed. In 1844 the Republic was established. A line of weak dictatorships ruled the country until 1930, when Rafael Leonidas Trujillo Molina (1891-1961) became president. His dictatorship was cruel and absolute. However, he succeeded in greatly improving economic conditions. A middle-class of business and professional people developed. There are still too many of the "peons" who live on dirt floors in abject poverty, however.

Several years of turmoil followed the collapse of the Trujillo regime. In 1966 a relatively calm election chose Joaquin Balaguer as president. His middle-of-the-road policies seem to be successful in consolidating the country and establishing international confidence.

Wesleyan Methodists (Br.). In 1832 the Wesleyan Methodist missionary Theophilus Pugh visited Santo Domingo and called his Society's attention to the needs of American Negro emigrants there. Two years later, a young Wesleyan minister, John Tindall, was stationed at Puerto Plata on the northern coast, but his mission had little success among the Spanish-speaking inhabitants, and the military authorities of the capital refused him permission to preach there. However, churches and schools were opened at Puerto Plata and Samana. From 1853 to 1878, Wesleyan Methodist work in the Republic was included in the Bahamas district. In 1863, non-Roman Catholic worship was prohibited, and mission property pillaged and destroyed by Spanish troops. One member was shot, others were imprisoned, and one died in prison. Most Methodists dispersed to other parts of the West Indies. Legal restrictions on Protestants were removed in 1865, and catechists were stationed at Puerto Plata and Samana, but it was not until 1882 that a minister was again appointed. Distinguished leadership was given by W. E. Mears from 1891 to 1933, when British Methodist activity in the Dominican Republic ceased. Part of the work had been transferred to the Moravians in 1916.

American Missions. American Methodists came to the Dominican Republic in 1885, when a Dominican layman visiting Puerto Rico was converted. He returned home, witnessed to his neighbors, and a Methodist church was born. In 1920 Methodists, United Brethren, Presbyterians, and Moravians united to form the Board of Christian Work in Santo Domingo. This has been called "the oldest piece of cooperative denominational work in the world." They have an excellent bookstore in the capital. Approximately twenty daily vacation Bible schools are conducted each summer. The churches maintain eight day schools with a total enrollment of 1,300. Nationwide evangelistic campaigns are held each year. Church membership is increasing ten percent each year. There are three medical clinics that serve the needs of 250 babies each week.

The Dominican Evangelical Church is self-governing, with its own charter, constitution and doctrinal statement. It includes work formerly conducted by Methodists, Presbyterians, Moravians, and United Brethren. There are sixty-six churches with 2,702 members.

Other missions working in the Dominican Republic are: A.M.E., Assemblies of God, Baptist Mid-Missions, Church of God (Anderson), Church of God (Cleveland, Tenn.), Christian Missions in Many Lands, Evangelical Mennonite, Missionary Church Association, Seventh Day Adventists, and the West Indies Mission. These missions report a total of 18,000 members.

Other missions that have opened work in the Republic in recent years are the Southern Baptists with 200 members, and Unevangelized Fields Mission with eight churches. The Protestant Episcopal Church sent missionaries to the island in 1918. They report nine day schools and 3,000 members. The Missionary Alliance supported work here for a short time.

Evangelical United Brethren missions in the Dominican Republic were an outgrowth of the work in Puerto Rico. Upon the recommendation of N. H. Huffman and Philo Drury of the Puerto Rican mission, Church of the United Brethren in Christ, who had visited the island, the Board opened work in 1911. Two churches were started, supported by churches in Puerto Rico. Missionaries and mission board executives saw here an opportunity to demonstrate missionary cooperation and worked to that end.

In 1920 the Board for Christian Work in Santo Domingo was organized to administer this joint undertaking of Presbyterian, Methodist, and United Brethren boards. The work has continued in The United Methodist Church.

INSTITUTO EVANGELICO (FREE METHODIST)

The Free Methodist Church has long had strong work in the Dominican Republic. The first North American Protestant missionary there was Samuel E. Mills, a member of the Free Methodist Church in Ashtabula, Ohio. As a layman, influenced by the example of the M. E. Bishop WILLIAM TAYLOR and by the appeals of Dwight L. Moody, Mills established work at Santiago. He maintained his work on a self-support basis until his death in 1913, making frequent reports to the Free Methodist missionary leaders. At his request in 1893, the Free Methodist Missionary Board sent Esther D. Clark to assist Mills, appropriating her transportation and providing a large share of her support for a number of years.

In 1907 the Free Methodist Missionary Secretary visited the field, and the Board immediately sent reinforcements, including Dr. William C. Willing, who started medical work. Miss Nellie Whiffin opened the Lincoln School for Girls in 1912 at San Francisco de Macoris. In 1927 that school was joined with the Boys' School at Santiago, as the Instituto Evangélico, to become the first and only coeducational boarding school in the Republic, its graduates now coming into places of national leadership. In 1930 the work was organized into a Provisional Conference of the Free Methodist Church, and articles of incorporation were approved in 1948. George Mills, son of the founder, was superintendent for many years. In 1965 full conference status was achieved.

Presently the emphasis is on training indigenous leadership. The church membership includes business and professional workers, such as teachers, nurses, medical doctors, and civil servants. In recent years gospel teams have held successful crusades in many places. The new converts have been added to the church. Also, extensive church building programs have gone forward.

A Biblical Seminary was established to better prepare church leaders. At the Santiago Instituto, the principal and teachers are Dominicans. Missionaries teach courses in the Seminary. The main Free Methodist work centers at Santiago. Recently several churches have been established at Santo Domingo. A new Christian Day School and several medical clinics, staffed by Free Methodist doctors, have been started in the capital. There are now 300 churches and outstations, 5,000 members, and 1,800 students.

Dominican Republic. Board of Missions, The Methodist Church, pamphlet.

Encyclopaedia Britannica.

Findlay and Holdsworth, Wesleyan Meth. Miss. Soc. 1922.

B. S. Lamson, Free Methodist Missions. 1951.

_____, Venture. 1960.

National Geographic, Sept. 1961.

Report of the Free Methodist Church World Missions. Winona Lake, Ind.: Light and Life Press, 1965.

Benjamin Winget, Missions and Missionaries of the Free Methodist Church. Winona Lake, Ind.: Light and Life Press, 1911.

ARTHUR BRUCE MOSS

BYRON S. LAMSON

LOIS MILLER

DONATTI, MATEO (1847-1907), Italian Bible colporteur and lay preacher in BRAZIL, was born in the village of Gavenola, province of Porto Maurizio, ITALY. His parents were evangelicals who brought him up in the Reformed faith. When a young man, Donatti emigrated to ARGENTINA and settled in BUENOS AIRES. He sought a church, manifested deep interest in religious matters, and was hired by the AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY to be a colporteur. So striking was his record that it was claimed that no one had ever sold as many books in a year as he had. He was next employed by the River Plate Mission of the M. E. Church and appointed to work in the state of Rio Grande do Sul, Brazil, among the Italian colonists who lived in a mountainous grape-growing region.

Becoming a regular preacher, Donatti was ordained ELDER in 1905. Everywhere he traveled—always on mule or horseback—he preached the Word and organized congregations. If today there is Methodist work in Bento Gonçalves, Gramado, and Garibaldi, it is from his early zeal. But the task was not easy. That region was populated mostly by ignorant and fanatical Roman Catholics, at whose hands Donatti suffered cruel persecution.

A true and amazing story regarding him has to do with a day when he was riding a narrow trail through the woods. Suddenly, from behind some trees, three men leaped out and ordered him to dismount. Donatti obeyed. "Prepare to die," said the leader, "for we are going to kill you." "That's all right," replied the bearded, white-haired Donatti, "but allow me one last favor—let me kneel in prayer before I die." The men consented, for they were not really bloodthirsty murderers but men who believed they were doing their duty in killing a "heretic."

So on the dusty trail, beneath the trees, Donatti knelt, eyes closed and hands clasped, praying earnestly and movingly for his family, for the work he was trying to do in telling men about God's love, for the souls of those threatening him now, that they might repent and be won for the Lord. And all the while he awaited the fatal blow or stab. When the prayer was ended and he opened his eyes, still unharmed, the three men were kneeling beside him and crying to God for mercy.

Donatti's name appears on the conference records of appointments until 1907, when the presiding officer announced, "Brother Donatti is sick, and I fear for his health." He died soon afterward in Rio Grande do Sul, a stalwart, fearless pioneer of Methodism in South Brazil.

Eduardo Menna Barret Jaime, Historia do Metodismo no Rio Grande do Sul. Porto Alegre: Empresa Grafica Moderna, Ltda., 1963.

World Outlook, June, 1934.

EULA K. LONG

DONEY, CARL GREGG (1867-1955), American minister and educator, was born to hardworking and highly respected Christian farmer parents near Columbus, Ohio. He planted, cultivated, harvested and marketed the produce of a three-acre truck garden to earn his way through preparatory school and college. He earned his B.S. and LL.B. degrees at Ohio State University, and some years later his Ph.D. from the same school. Between his law degree and the doctorate, he took added graduate work at OHIO WESLEYAN and Harvard.

A brief experience in law practice convinced him that legal work did not give him the satisfaction in life he wanted, so he gave up law for the ministry, and about this time he married his boyhood sweetheart, Jennie Evans. From 1893 to 1907 he quickly worked his way from the hard scraping pastorates to larger churches in Ohio, and then to Hamline in Washington, D. C. In 1907, while pastor at Hamline, he was called to the presidency of WEST VIRGINIA WESLEYAN COLLEGE. This was at the time a struggling school to which he devoted eight years of hard building work, an experience which constituted a foundation for his later work at WILLAMETTE UNIVERSITY.

He became president of Willamette in OREGON in 1915, the twelfth president of the pioneer university, and the first who was not either primarily a teacher struggling along under a spirit-breaking load of classroom work, or a financially burdened administrator who had to spend most of his time soliciting funds to support the school.

During the Doney administration a substantial endowment was raised, giving the pioneer school its first real financial security. Doney worked hard in these campaigns, but the major planning and work was done by a professional fund-raising organization using ministerial and lay volunteer workers. In campus housing his administration brought a new gymnasium, a fine brick residence hall for women, and the renovation of Waller Hall. Doney's efforts were chiefly devoted to the administration of the university. In this work he had nineteen years in which to build into the school his ideals of life and education. The history of the oldest university of the Pacific Northwest bears a deep impress of his work. Later a very fine residence for women students has been named Doney Hall in honor of Carl Gregg and Jennie Evans Doney.

In 1934 Doney retired to Columbus, Ohio. There he enjoyed occasional preaching and much writing for the church press. Two books were written during these years: Cheerful Yesterdays and Confident Tomorrows (Binfords and Mort, 1942), and Broken Circle (Fleming and Revell, 1943). The first told largely of his Willamette years, and the other of his eldest son, Paul H. Doney, a professor of English literature at DICKINSON COLLEGE, whose early death cast deep shadows over the last years of the father's life.

Doney died at Columbus, Ohio, on Nov. 4, 1955.

Robert M. Gatke, Chronicles of Willamette, the Pioneer University of the West. Portland: Binfords and Mort, 1943.

ROBERT MOULTON GATKE

DONNELLY, WALTER EDWARD (1890-), Canadian minister, was born in Harwich, Ontario, Jan. 8, 1890, the son of John Donnelly, an Irish Roman Catholic, and Mary (Purdy) Donnelly, a devout Methodist. Walter was converted through the influence of a Methodist Sunday school teacher at the age of eleven years. He began preaching when sixteen and was soon in great demand as a "boy evangelist," preaching as many as sixty times in one year and winning many converts. In 1907, at seventeen he was received on probation by the Methodist Church and given charge of a circuit for two years under the supervision of an ordained minister.

Donnelly entered Victoria College in 1909, and in 1913 he graduated in honors philosophy. He was ordained in the London Conference on June 8, 1913, and shortly thereafter, married Edith Vanvelzer, of Union, Ontario. There were five children, one son and four daughters. He served charges at Gesto, Alvinston, Amherstburg, Exeter, Stratford, and Brockville. In 1935 he was called to Young Church in WINNIPEG, where he served until his retirement in 1958.

For twelve years he made devotional broadcasts under the title, "The Voice of Inspiration." The material used was both scriptural and literary and was widely followed throughout Winnipeg and western Canada. In this period he published three works: The Golden Side of Life, The Gate Beautiful, and The Top of the Hill. He was awarded the doctorate of divinity by United College in 1942. He became president of the Manitoba Conference in 1948 and was frequently a commissioner to the General Council of the United Church, where he participated chiefly in discussions of evangelism and social service.

A pioneer in the ecumenical movement, he was a Manitoba representative on the Canadian Council of Churches. In 1950 he was elected president of the Lord's Day Alliance for Manitoba.

He was chiefly responsible for the building of the Chinese United Church in Winnipeg, and following his retirement at sixty-eight, he began the organization of two new churches in the suburban area of the city.

Donnelly has gained a unique place in the city of Winnipeg, where he has been the living symbol and essence of that warmth, enthusiasm, and durability that were the outstanding characteristics of early Methodism. His preaching is still strongly evangelistic. He is very willing to see the church's beliefs presented in modern form, but he believes that the young especially should make a real decision for the Christian life.

F. W. ARMSTRONG

DONOHUGH, THOMAS S. (1875-1963), missionary in INDIA 1904-12, and a secretary in the New York office of the Methodist BOARD OF MISSIONS for thirty-three years thereafter, was born in PHILADELPHIA, Pa., and was reared in a home of culture and affluence. Educated at Swarthmore College, the University of Pennsylvania, and Columbia University, he practiced law in Philadelphia for a time, until he heard Bishop FRANCIS W. WARNE call for volunteers to serve as missionaries. In prayer young Donohugh became convinced that God had spoken to him through Bishop Warne. He volunteered to go and was appointed to Meerut, where he worked with the legendary Philo M. Buck, whom he succeeded as district superintendent. A sister, Emma Donohugh, followed him to India, and for more than twenty years gave notable service as an honorary missionary.

On the staff of the Board of Missions, Donohugh held many positions after his return from India. He participated productively in the Inter-Church Missionary activities that pointed the way to ecumenical understandings and aspirations.

He was a man of singular grace and urbanity. DAKOTA WESLEYAN conferred upon him the honorary D.D. degree, and the government of LIBERIA made him a Knight of the Liberian Order of African Redemption.

He died in Los Angeles, Calif., on Feb. 28, 1963.

J. WASKOM PICKETT

DORSEY, DENNIS B. (1799-1860), American preacher, physician, and leader of the Reformers whose agitation led to the formation of the M. P. Church, was born in Baltimore County, Md., on Dec. 28, 1799. His parents later moved to Brooke County, Va., near Wellsburgh, where he was reared.

He was converted in 1817 and joined the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church in 1820, and was appointed as an assistant on the Loudon circuit. He was then sent to the Mahoning, East Wheeling, Huntingdon, Bedford and Harford circuits. His ministry as a traveling preacher was terminated in 1826. He studied medicine under Dr. S. K. JENNINGS and graduated from the Washington Medical College of Baltimore in 1831.

Dorsey took an active part in the arguments favoring lay representation in the church, and in opposition to episcopacy. In 1827 he was suspended from the church for one year for circulating Mutual Rights, the periodical of the Reform element. At the following Conference he adhered to his position and was expelled along with William C. Poole and fourteen local preachers in Baltimore.

He became one of the organizers of the Associated Methodist Churches, which became the METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH in 1830, and he was editor of The Mutual Rights and Christian Intelligencer for two years. He was stationed in Georgetown and then in Wheeling. He gave up his ministerial work for the practice of medicine in 1832, but was president of the PITTSBURGH CONFERENCE in 1834. He was a pastor in CINCINNATI in 1854 and in 1857 he started The Independent Press in Martinsville, Ohio.

He died at the home of one of his sons at Fairmont, Va., on March 20, 1860, and was buried there.

T. H. Colhouer, Sketches of the Founders. 1880.

E. J. Drinkhouse, History of Methodist Reform. 1899.

M. Simpson, Cyclopaedia. 1878.

ELMER T. CLARK

DOUB, PETER (1796-1869), minister of the M. E. Church, South, was born in Stokes County (now Forsyth), N. C. on March 12, 1796. He died at Greensboro, N. C. on Aug. 24, 1869. He was the product of German ancestry, the American frontier and the Methodist itineracy.

His parents, Johan and Mary Eva Spainhour Doub, were Pennsylvania Dutch who migrated to the Yadkin Valley. Formerly devout members of the Dutch Reformed Church, they became Methodists under the leadership of Andrew Yeargen, and later Johan served as an effective local preacher.

PETER DOUB

Peter, the youngest of nine children, experienced climactic conversion in a meeting at Wards Camp Ground in Davie County on Aug. 6, 1817. A latent call to preach now claimed him completely, and he was admitted on trial to the VIRGINIA CONFERENCE at NORFOLK in February 1818.

For fifty-one years thereafter he performed a variety of labors as a Methodist itinerant; twenty years on circuits in VIRGINIA and NORTH CAROLINA; twenty-one years as a Presiding Elder—which included duty on the Yadkin, Salisbury, Raleigh, Fayetteville and Greensboro Districts in North Carolina and on the Danville District in Virginia; one year as Temperance Lecturer; one sabbatical year's leave to recover his health; and his last three years as Professor of Biblical Literature in Trinity College (later DUKE UNIVERSITY) which had honored him with the D.D. degree in 1855.

He was elected to seven GENERAL CONFERENCES and has the distinction of suggesting the name, "Methodist Episcopal Church, South," to designate the new Church resulting from the great division of 1844.

While on the Yadkin District (1826-29) 2,738 souls were converted at meetings he held in person while more than 7,000 were converted in the bounds of the District.

In 1830 he organized the first Methodist church in GREENSBORO and established Greensboro Female School. Greensboro Female College (now GREENSBORO COLLEGE) was the outgrowth of this school. Dr. Doub was the most active and influential of those who worked to establish Greensboro College, and served on its first Board of Trustees.

Peter Doub had scarcely seen an English grammar when he joined the Conference. Life-long self-study made him into a capable preacher, careful theologian, and a crushing antagonist in theological polemics. Although he was known to preach as long as four hours in later years, complaints were heard that his early sermons were too short. Doub replied that he had said all he knew and did not like to repeat himself.

THE NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE MINUTES of 1869 contains the following words: "Peter Doub's labors for his church were enormous. It is estimated that over 40,000 people were brought in the church . . . through his ministry. . . . He was a great man physically, mentally and spiritually."

The day before his death he sent a message to his colleagues: "Tell my brethren of the Conference that if I am alive I am fighting my way to the skies; if I am dead, I am alive."

E. T. Clark, Western North Carolina. 1966.

R. HERMAN NICHOLSON

DOUGHERTY, GEORGE (1772?-1807), American pioneer in the early days of the SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE. He was admitted on trial into the Conference in 1798 at the session which Bishop ASBURY was prevented from attending by reason of sickness and had appointed Jonathan Jackson to preside and to station the preachers.

Dougherty, who at that time is described as "a young man about 26 years old, who had been a raftsman on the Edisto, and whose educational advantages were better than most at that time, but far from liberal. He had been teaching school and came from Newberry, coming in with George Clark, the preacher in charge on the Saluda Circuit. He was ungainly, had lost an eye, his face pock-marked, shoulders stooping, knees bending forward, his walk tottering; his costume a straight coat, knee breeches, stockings, shoes, sometimes fair topped boots with straps at the top buttoned to the knee."

This young man was to live but ten years longer, but in that time he was to leave "an undying record of worth," and long after LOVICK PIERCE, who knew Dougherty in his youth, said that he really was "South Carolina's great Methodist preacher."

As a pastor in CHARLESTON, Dougherty, because of giving his attention to Negro children and speaking against slavery, was attacked by a mob at one time, dragged to a pump, where water was pumped upon him until he might have died had not a heroic woman interfered and "kept the mob at bay until he was rescued."

Dougherty, in a letter to Bishop Asbury, wrote: "The epithet of Negro schoolmaster added to that of Methodist preacher makes a black compound sure enough; yet, wonderful to think, the congregations are as large and as serious as they have been at any time since I came to Charleston . . . Outward persecution seems to abate, and I am again cheered at the sight of some black faces in the galleries at night" (Chreitzberg p. 82.). This man, handicapped as he was, saw the value of ministerial training and not only strove to improve his own knowledge, but Pierce said that, "As far back as I knew him, he was incessantly engaged to get the Church awake to denominational education, talking on it, begging for it and after two or three years, got his Bethel Academy underway" (Chreitzberg, pp. 90-91).

Pierce also remembered that in 1805 when Dougherty was his first presiding elder, "He used to get me to read from my English Bible for him, while he pored on his Hebrew in the Book of Genesis."

The last Conference he attended was at Sparta, Ga., then in the South Carolina Conference, and Pierce remembered that Dougherty "introduced his resolution (and it is recorded on the Journals of our Conference) to dismiss forever from the rolls of the Conference any member of it that should run off from his charge for fear of an epidemic. It produced the only high excitement I ever saw in our old Conference. It was debated two days, Dougherty defending it from his seat, too far gone in consumption to stand up. It prevailed by one vote—yeas, 15; nays, 14. All his glory was in his great mind and heart; he had no personal attractions. He made his way from this Sparta Conference to Wilmington, N. C. and died March 3, 1807." (Chreitzberg, p. 91).

A. M. Chreitzberg, Methodism in the Carolinas. 1897.

M. Simpson, Cyclopaedia. 1881.

N. B. H.

DOUGLAS, GEORGE (1825-1894), Canadian minister and educator, was born in Ashkirk, Scotland, on Oct. 14, 1825. In 1832 he migrated to Montreal with his family where, despite his Presbyterian background, he attended a Methodist Sunday school. He secured considerable education with a view to becoming a marine engineer, but his health prevented him from carrying out his design. Dramatically converted in 1843, his thoughts soon turned to the Methodist ministry.

After serving briefly as a junior preacher in 1848, Douglas went to England to attend Richmond Theological College. As happened to many others, he was swept into the mission field at the urging of ROBERT ALDER and his colleagues. Douglas proceeded to Bermuda, but when his health deteriorated he returned to Montreal. He was received into full connection in 1853, and in 1854 was stationed in Kingston.

From this point forward Douglas' health was rarely good, but he held pastorates as he was able. In 1873, when the Wesleyan Theological College in Montreal opened, Douglas was appointed principal. He held this office for twenty-one years and left behind a flourishing institution. Moreover, during these years he held the highest positions in his church and contributed greatly to the working out of its complex problems.

For his services, George Douglas was honored with an LL.D. from McGill University and a D.D. from Victoria. His greatest reward was the knowledge of the respect in which he was held as preacher, debater, and educator.

Douglas died after prolonged sufferings, on Feb. 10, 1894.

G. H. Cornish, Cyclopaedia of Methodism in Canada. 1903. Minutes of the Montreal Conference, 1894. C. S. FRENCH

DOUGLASS, THOMAS LOGAN (1781-1843), American pioneer preacher and presiding elder, was born in Person County, N. C., July 8, 1781. Converted at seventeen, he entered the VIRGINIA CONFERENCE in 1801, which then included a part of NORTH CAROLINA. His appointments in that conference were: Hanover and Williamsburg Circuits, 1801; Swannanoa Circuit, 1802; Guilford Circuit, 1803; Greenville Circuit, 1804; Portsmouth Circuit, 1805; Bertie Circuit, 1806; Salisbury District, 1807; Yadkin District, 1808; James River District, 1809-12; and Richmond Circuit, 1813.

During 1813 Douglass was transferred to the TENNESSEE CONFERENCE and was appointed to NASHVILLE. He served the Nashville District, 1814-18; 1819-23; and 1833-36. He was conference missionary and superintendent of the Indian Missions for one year, 1823-24; and served the Franklin Circuit one year, 1827-28. He superannuated for one year in 1826 and for another year in 1828. He was supernumerary in 1818-19, and from 1829 until his death he held the same relationship, except for 1833-36 when he was on the Nashville District.

Douglass was a delegate to three GENERAL CONFERENCES. He was an able preacher, winning many converts and persuading a number of men to enter the ministry. It was claimed that he was more influential in molding the character of the Tennessee Conference than any of his contemporaries. He was a friend of Bishops ASBURY, MCKENDREE, ROBERTS, and SOULE. Shortly after transferring to Tennessee, Douglas married Frances M'Gee. He died April 9, 1843.

General Minutes, MEC.

M. Simpson, Cyclopaedia. 1878.

JESSE A. EARL

DOVE, JAMES (1827-1908), Canadian minister, was born at Darlington, Durham, England, Dec. 23, 1827. He was educated at Darlington Grammar School and at Wood House Grove, the Wesleyan College.

Dove was sent to Newfoundland as a missionary in 1855 by the Missionary Society. Before and after his ordination in 1859 he served on the principal Newfoundland circuits. As a minister he was noted both for his administrative capacity and for his preaching ability. Not surprisingly, he held the various offices in his Conference, including the presidency, and was a delegate to General Conferences and to the 1881 ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE.

In 1893 the D.D. degree was conferred on him by MOUNT ALLISON UNIVERSITY in recognition of his cultured, learned, and impassioned preaching. The pulpit was indeed his real home.

After his retirement he lived quietly, but with continued devotion to his beloved Methodism he began to write a history of that church's work in Newfoundland. Unfortunately, if he completed his work it remains unpublished and unknown.

W. F. BUTT

DOVER, NEW HAMPSHIRE, U.S.A., Stratford County seat, is situated on the Boston and Maine Railroad. It was settled in 1623, only three years after the landing of the Pilgrims, by a company of fishmongers from London, and is the oldest town in the state. Methodist services may well have been conducted here as early as 1819 by preachers who had first come to Portsmouth. When first mentioned in the NEW HAMPSHIRE CONFERENCE Minutes of 1823, it was in the Stratford Circuit. The society was then organized by Jotham Horton, and the first church, erected in 1825, was dedicated on April 28 of that year by EPHRAIM WILEY of Boston.

Forty-nine years later the building was raised twelve feet and a vestry built under it, together with provisions for choir and organ. This made of it a handsome edifice in spite of the secession of some sixty members of prominent and influence who were opposed to having instrumental music in the church. (This group built a church in which Methodist services were held for a time, but their society was later dissolved and the church building fell into other hands.) The loss, though serious, seemed to have prompted regular attendance on the means of grace and better financial success.

Dover has entertained the Annual Conference seven times. The session of 1865 was being held when the shocking announcement came of the assassination of President Abraham Lincoln, who was a personal friend of the presiding officer, Bishop EDWARD RAYMOND AMES. During the pastorate of O. H. Scott, who came to the charge in 1875, the church was in a state of revival most of the time, and nearly a hundred persons were added to the church. As a result, the old building had to be given up in 1875, and the present brick structure was erected in 1876 and dedicated that September by Bishop RANDOLPH S. FOSTER. On Jan. 8, 1950, Bishop JOHN WESLEY LORD preached at St. John's and rededicated the sanctuary, which had been completely renovated. Edwin T. Cooke was then pastor.

Continuing to be one of the choice appointments in the New Hampshire Conference, the Dover church reported in 1970, 548 members, 224 preparatory members, 287 in the church school, property valued at $301,031, and a total raised for all purposes, $27,309.

Cole and Baketel, New Hampshire. 1929.

Journals of the New Hampshire Conference.

M. Simpson, Cyclopaedia. 1878. WILLIAM J. DAVIS

LORENZO DOW

DOW, LORENZO (1777-1834), American pioneer preacher and evangelist, was born Oct. 16, 1777, at Coventry, Tolland Co., Conn. He credited HOPE HULL with his conversion in 1791 when Hull was on a preaching mission in New England, and in 1794 Dow began to preach. In 1798 he was admitted as a preacher on trial by the annual conference, receiving his license from Bishop FRANCIS ASHURY. For reasons of health he made a sea voyage to IRELAND in 1799, reaching DUBLIN on December 15. In BELFAST he suffered a brief imprisonment for street preaching, and later visited the Isle of Man. While in Dublin he had an attack of smallpox and was attended by Dr. Paul Johnson, with whom he formed a friendship, the latter being interested in evangelistic work.

Dow returned to America in 1801 and at the annual conference received an appointment to a New England circuit, but after six months he left it and took ship for GEORGIA. Here he commenced a wide independent itinerancy, visiting state prisons in NEW YORK and going on to CANADA, back to Georgia, and west to the Mississippi. Through an interview with SAMUEL K. JENNINGS, author of a tract on CAMP MEETINGS, he became committed to this form of evangelism. On Sept. 3, 1804, he married Peggy Holcomb, who was born in Granville, Mass. in 1780. In November, 1805 they both sailed for England. Coming to Warrington, Lancashire, he met PETER PHILLIPS. Later he visited Harsehead in Staffordshire; and at Congleton, HUGH BOURNE purchased camp meeting tracts after hearing him preach. Dow returned to America in 1807 and traveled extensively through the states and Canada. In 1818 he again felt the call to England, and by his preaching near Warrington still further influenced Bourne. Later, near Nottingham, Bourne met him in an open-air service at which DOROTHY RIPLEY took part. In April 1818, Dow was back in America. He continued his labors without remission until his death on Feb. 7, 1834, at Georgetown, D. C.

Though never willing to accept the restraints of conference membership, Dow remained a professed Methodist and preached Methodist doctrines. His eccentricities in dress and style of preaching attracted large crowds. In 1804 he published his Life and Travels, a journal to which he added in later editions under different titles. This and other writings, as well as Peggy Dow's autobiography, were widely circulated during his lifetime and for a generation thereafter. He exerted considerable influence on the Methodists of both America and Britain, especially on early PRIMITIVE METHODISM in England.

Lorenzo Dow, Collections of Spiritual Songs. Liverpool, 1806. The Eccentric Preacher. Lowell, Mass.: E. A. Rice and Co., 1841.

James W. Lee et al., Illustrated History of Methodism. The Methodist Publishing Company, 1900.

JOHN T. WILKINSON
RICHARD J. STOCKHAM

DOWNERS GROVE, ILLINOIS, U.S.A. First Church is in the center of one of the fast-growing western suburbs of CHICAGO, twenty-two miles west of the loop. Now a church of 2,293 members, its small beginning in 1836 was the result of a circuit rider called "Father Beggs" sharing the gospel with a few persons in the log cabins surrounding Pierce Downer's home.

In about 1838 a schoolhouse was built in which the Methodists met for Sunday worship. In 1852 the congregation became sufficiently large to build its first church building on the same spot occupied by today's edifice. In 1894 a new church was erected which was commonly designated as "The Welcome Church" because of a large sign with the word "Welcome" attached to the front. In 1927 the present Church was erected and in 1963 a new educational building was added to accommodate the growing church school.

In 1880 the women members founded the home and foreign missionary societies. In 1891 an EPWORTH LEAGUE was organized to enable the youth to develop their own program.

During the depression years the members almost lost their new building through foreclosure, but through the sacrificial gifts of a few members it was recovered. The mortgage burning in 1946 was consequently an eventful occasion.

The ministerial staff in 1970 has grown to three and the total staff includes fifteen persons.

DOWNES, CHARLES, was born in England and came to Newfoundland to work in a business establishment, "in which he found with regret that a Christian character was not regarded as an advantage." In 1850, he was appointed by the Newfoundland district as a lay agent to Sound Island, Placentia Bay, and served there in that capacity until 1874. He visited many islands and coves in the area, and the people profited greatly under his ministry. He and his wife served as schoolteachers. The chairman of the district authorized him to perform the rite of BAPTISM, and he was granted by Governor Bannerman a license to perform marriages. Under his lay ministry a strong Methodist cause was built up in that part of Placentia Bay.

The Provincial Wesleyan, Jan. 19, 1874.

T. W. Smith, Eastern British America. 1890. N. WINSON

DOWNES, JOHN (?-1759), eighteenth-century Church of England clergyman, was rector of St. Michael's, Wood Street, and lecturer of St. Mary Le Bow, London. He published in 1759 a violent pamphlet, Methodism Examined and Exposed: or, The Clergy's Duty of Guarding their Flocks against False Teachers, which JOHN WESLEY answered in a long letter written on Nov. 17, 1759. Downes concluded that "all ancient heresies have in a manner concentrated in the Methodists" (Methodism Examined, pp. 101-2). Downes died in 1759.

J. Wesley, Letters, iv, 325 ff.

N. P. GOLDHAWK

DOWNES, JOHN (1722-1774), British preacher, was an itinerant for thirty-one years, and was one of the four lay preachers invited to the first Conference in 1744. He was something of a mathematical, mechanical, and artistic genius, and was regarded by JOHN WESLEY as one of the outstanding men of his time. He engraved the portrait of Wesley which was prefixed to the Explanatory Notes upon the New Testament. Around 1763 he married Dorothy Furlly, to whom John Wesley wrote many letters. When his health failed, Downes took charge of Wesley's printing. Downes died on Nov. 10, 1774, after preaching in West Street Chapel, London.

J. Wesley, Letters, iii, 85.

_____, Journal, iii, 135; vi, 46. N. P. GOLDHAWK

DOWNEY, DAVID GEORGE (1858-1935), American minister and BOOK EDITOR of the M. E. Church, was born on Sept. 21, 1858, near Manor-Hamilton, County Leitrum, Ireland. He was the son of Archibald and Mary Anne (Hawksby) Downey. He was educated in the New York public schools and at WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, where he received the A.B. degree in 1884; the A.M. in 1887; the D.D. in 1899. He also attended DREW THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY. He was married on June 2, 1887, to Lillian M. Terrill (who died on April 1, 1915). Their son, Bradford Downey, also became a graduate of Wesleyan.

Downey joined the NEW YORK EAST CONFERENCE in 1884, and James E. Holmes who published his memoir in 1935 says that he "became the undisputed leader of this Conference and later on of the General Conference of the entire Church." He was a member of the GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church, 1904, '08, and '12, at which time the Conference elected him Book Editor. He was a trustee of Wesleyan University and president of its Board for years, and also a member of Delta Kappa Epsilon fraternity on whose general council he served. He was made chaplain of the Connecticut House of Representatives in 1886, and of the Connecticut Senate in 1887. He wrote Modern Poets & Christian Teaching.

Downey was somewhat short in stature, shrewd and affable in line with his Irish ancestry, and had a place in the inner councils of his Church. He continued keeping the Book Editorship in the M. E. Church on the high level of power and esteem in which it was always held in that Connection. He is credited for working out the trade name, ABINGDON PRESS, for the Publishing House of his church. He was a great friend of Bishop McDOWELL and other church leaders, and was put in rather strong nomination for the episcopacy at one or two General Conferences. At the DES MOINES Conference, however, he asked that his name be withdrawn from consideration for the office of bishop. After retirement from the Book Editorship he lived until March 7, 1935. He was buried in Woodlawn, N. Y.

Journal of the New York East Conference, 1935.

C. F. Price, Who's Who in American Methodism, 1916.

N. B. H.

DOWNEY, J. R. (1836-1859), early American missionary to INDIA, who arrived in LUCKNOW with his wife on Sept. 3, 1859. They were in a party of nine from the U.S.A. He became ill almost immediately and died on September 16, the first M. E. missionary to die in India. Mrs. Downey remained there in charge of the boys' orphanage at BAREILLY. She later married JAMES M. THOBURN, but died in October 1862.

Downey's spirit is well expressed in this quotation from a letter to J. W. Waugh, one of his schoolmates at GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE, and one of his traveling companions on the trip to India: "I have felt a burning desire to become as faultless as grace can make the human soul."

J. WASKOM PICKETT

DOWNEY, CALIFORNIA, U.S.A. For years it was believed that Methodism in Downey began in 1869. While preparing for a centennial celebration, however, documented records of the beginnings of this church in 1854 were found in the Methodist Historical Society in Los Angeles. A group called Los Nietos was organized with sixteen members in 1854, and J. T. Cox was sent to them from the conference held in Sacramento in April 1855.

Early in 1869 the small group of pioneers laid the foundations for Los Nietos Collegiate Institute, a school for boys and girls from primary grades through college. This was the first Protestant school of higher education in southern California. As this was a Methodist institution, the church held its Sunday and weekday services here for several years. In 1877, the cornerstone was laid for the first sanctuary. This building had two interesting features. On top of the steeple was a ten-foot hand with the forefinger pointing heavenward; the 800-pound bronze bell in the belfry was cast in CINCINNATI, Ohio, and brought around the Horn.

With the coming of the railroad, Downey formed its center some distance from the little church. In 1894, following a recommendation by Bishop A. G. HAYGOOD, the building was moved to the center of town, and the name was changed to Downey M. E. Church, South.

In 1922, a larger house of worship and a parsonage were built on the corner of Downey Avenue and Fifth Street. This corner, plus purchases of adjacent land, remains its location. With unification the name was changed to Downey Methodist Church.

Continued population growth has meant constant expansion. New and larger facilities have continued to replace the old, including another sanctuary. In January 1968, a new multi-use building was opened on the site where the old sanctuary formerly stood. This $390,000 building of three floors houses administrative offices, church library, lounge and church school rooms for youth and adults. In 1970 the church membership was 1,826.

History of Downey Methodist Church. Manuscript, 1954.

Mrs. Easter Morrison, History of Downey. Unpublished.

J. C. Simmons, Pacific Coast. 1886. (MRS.) ERLA S. FISK

DOXOLOGY. A tribute of praise (from Greek doxa, glory, praise; logos, word) which is usually a sentence, or a collection of sentences, uttered with special reference to giving praise and glory to Almighty God. Quite a few doxologies are found in the New Testament, and also in the liturgies of various churches. Often again these are found connected with or appended to hymns and songs as these are used in divine service. Frequent doxological expressions are also found in the Scriptures, as "Blessing and honor and glory and power be unto Him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb forever and ever." The Lord's Prayer now frequently closes with a doxology—"for thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever. Amen." This doxology was added to the Lord's Prayer in some versions subsequent to the appearance of the Lord's Prayer in the earlier versions of Matthew and Luke. Nevertheless it is in the Authorized version in St. Matthew, and is a "fitting climax to the grandest prayer of all."

In the ancient church the doxologies as used in the liturgies were usually of three kinds. There was the Gloria Patri, or the lesser doxology, which is supposed to have been formulated during the Arian controversy and was for the purpose of checking that heresy—"Glory be to the Father, and to the Son and to the Holy Ghost." This doxology—the "Gloria" as it is now commonly called—is prescribed in the regular orders of worship of The United Methodist Church in America and was used in the big M. E. Churches since their joint Hymnal of 1905.

The western Church added to the original Gloria, "as it was in the Beginning, is now and ever shall be, world without end." This last expression means "to all eternity." It is the Tudor English Prayer-Book rendering of the frequent phrase in the old Latin offices, et in saecula saeculorum ("and unto the ages of the ages"). This is the equivalent of the Greek eis tous aionas, "unto the ages," which occurs in some late manuscripts of Matthew vi, 13, and which is translated "forever" in the doxology at the end of the Lord's prayer. (K.J.V.)

This doxology is considered a noble testimony to the church's faith in the Holy Trinity. It is of frequent use in the Church of England, the Protestant Episcopal Church, and now in The United Methodist Church.

Gloria in Excelsis, sometimes called the major Doxology, is supposed to be founded upon the words of the angels, "Glory to God in the Highest and on earth good will toward men." It was of very early origin, and is supposed by some to have been in existence as early as A.D. 139. It is found, some authorities feel, almost in its verbal integrity in the Apostolic Constitutions, and is used by both the Greek and the Latin churches. The Roman Catholic dictionary declares this doxology to be repeated at every mass, except votive and requiem masses. It has been used in the Church of England for about 1,200 years.

The Gloria in Excelsis has always been repeated at the conclusion of the LORD'S SUPPER in Methodist forms for that office, as it is in the similar office in the Church of England, Methodism always following the English Rite in this service. A late revision—that of 1964—has placed the Gloria in the first part of the Communion Service, as it is in the Roman Mass.

A third form of liturgical doxology now commences with the words "therefore with angels and archangels and with all the company of heaven, we laud and magnify Thy glorious name, evermore praising Thee and saying, Holy, Holy, Holy." It is used in the Church of England, in the Protestant Episcopal Church, in certain other Protestant Churches, and in The United Methodist Church, and is said by the minister as part of the Sacramental service previous to his administering the elements to the people.

The doxologies which are used in connection with the hymns and psalms of the church are such as are usually found in every hymnbook. The traditional doxology, "Praise God from whom all blessings flow, Praise Him all creatures here below, Praise Him above ye heavenly hosts, Praise Father, Son and Holy Ghost," is a grace from a hymn by Thomas Ken, and has become The Doxology—when that term is used—in Protestant Churches almost universally. Former M. E. Disciplines directed "that a doxology be sung at the conclusion of each service, and let the Apostolic Benediction be invariably used in dismissing the congregation."

N. B. Harmon, Rites and Ritual. 1925.
Schaff-Herzog, Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge, in loc.
N. B. H.

DOYLE, BERTRAM WILBUR (1897-), senior bishop of the C.M.E. Church, was born at Lowndesboro, Ala., on July 3, 1897. He received an A.B. degree from OHIO WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY in 1921, and an M.A. (1924) and Ph.D. (1934) from the University of Chicago. He holds honorary degrees from LANE COLLEGE (D.D.) and MILES COLLEGE (LL.D.). In 1925 he was ordained a DEACON and in 1927 an ELDER. From 1921 to 1922, he taught at Samuel Huston College; from 1922 to 1924 at CLAFLIN COLLEGE; and from 1924 to 1925 at CLARK COLLEGE. He became dean of PAINE COLLEGE in 1925 and held that position until 1927. In 1927 he became professor of sociology at Fisk University, where he taught until 1937. At that time the General Conference of the C.M.E. Church elected him secretary of the department of education, where he served until 1950, when he was elected to the office of bishop.

BERTRAM W. DOYLE

Who's Who in America.

Who's Who in the Clergy.

E. L. Williams, Biographical Directory of Negro Ministers.
1965.

RALPH G. CAY

DRAKE, BENJAMIN MICHAEL (1800-1860), American minister and strong leader of the MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE and of Southern Methodism during its early years, was born in Robeson County, N. C., on Sept. 11, 1800. When he was eight years of age his parents moved to the valleys of Green River, Ky. A series of earthquake shocks in the New Madrid area when he was about eleven years old gave him a sense of spiritual concern, but it was not until May 22, 1818, that he found spiritual peace. On June 7, 1819, he was licensed to exhort and then licensed to preach on Sept. 19 following. He was admitted on trial into the KENTUCKY CONFERENCE in 1820 and appointed to the Fountainhead Circuit as associate of S. P. V. Gillespie for the Conference year of 1820-21. Part of that year was spent at home on account of ill health, but in the fall of 1821 he was appointed to the Catawba Circuit in ALABAMA, which was at that time in the MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE. In company with John Russell Lambuth, who was licensed to preach the year B. M. Drake spent on the Fountainhead Circuit, he came to his new appointment in Alabama and began a long acquaintance with John C. Burruss, his presiding elder. It seems improbable that at any time three more distinguished Methodist ministers were associated on the same charge as these three. John R. Lambuth was the father of JAMES WILLIAM LAMBUTH, missionary to CHINA and JAPAN, and the grandfather of Bishop WALTER R. LAMBUTH; John C. Burruss was the grandfather of the well-known Parker brothers of New Orleans, FRANKLIN N. and FITZGERALD SALE PARKER.

B. M. Drake was admitted into full connection in the Mississippi Conference in 1822 and elected to DEACON'S orders; he was ordained an ELDER by Bishop JOSHUA SOULE at Tuscaloosa, Ala., on Dec. 22, 1824. His pastorates after Fountainhead and Catawba were Attakapas (in Louisiana), Natchez, New Orleans, Washington (Miss.), Port Gibson, and President of ELIZABETH ACADEMY, Adams, New Orleans (for the second time), Coles Creek, Natchez District (which was his first four-year appointment), Natchez, Washington, Natchez District (again), Coles Creek (for the second time), Washington (for the third time), Natchez District (for the third time), Jackson District, Vicksburg District, Washington, and Fayette District, which he was serving at the time of his death. He also served one year as acting President of newly founded CENTENARY COLLEGE.

Like most of his contemporaries, B. M. Drake had only minor educational advantages but he had a scholarly mind and was a student to the end of his life. Centenary College in 1852 conferred upon him the honorary degree of Doctor of Divinity. He held a large place in the leadership of the conference and of the whole church. He was regularly elected a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE, and more than once he was called to preside over the Annual Conference in the absence of a bishop. He was a delegate from Mississippi to the LOUISVILLE CONVENTION and to the first General Conference of the M. E. Church, South.

Two of his proposals have come down as the standard practices of the churches generally. He was one of the chief promoters of the COURSE OF STUDY for Methodist itinerant preachers, which regimen remains until this day. He was also strongly in favor of parsonage homes for the preachers, when such were few and far between, the then pioneer church generally regarding such homes as unnecessary luxuries. It is probable that Drake never lived in a parsonage but many others have profited by his insistence on providing homes for the pastors, no matter how large a circuit they might serve.

B. M. Drake and Susan Priscilla Hawkins Magruder, daughter of Capt. James Truman Magruder of Jefferson County, Miss., were married in 1827 at the home of the latter, with WILLIAM WINANS officiating. For more than thirty years they lived in harmony and usefulness. Five of their children died in infancy or early childhood but other children came to bless the home and became useful members of church and society. Two of the sons, James Perry Drake and William Winans Drake, became Methodist ministers and two of his grandsons also. One granddaughter, Nell Drake, was for many years a missionary to China.

B. M. Drake died on May 8, 1860, while serving as presiding elder of the Fayette District, and was buried in the family cemetery near his home.

Henry G. Hawkins, Methodism in Natchez. Nashville: Hawkins Foundation and Parthenon Press, 1937.
J. G. Jones, Mississippi. 1908.

J. B. CAIN

DRAPER, DANIEL J. (1810-1865), Australian minister and church builder, was born on Aug. 28, 1810, in the Hampshire village of Wickham, England. His father (the village carpenter) and mother were members of the Established Church. For both, it was their second marriage.

Often Daniel Draper lingered near the door of the Wesleyan Chapel, but when rebuked for not going inside, declared he would never go near it again. However, shortly afterwards he dreamed that he was playing cards and saw Christ, with a mingled expression of sorrow and anger in His face, pointing to his dust-covered Bible and bidding him to read it. This so disturbed him that a few weeks later he went back to the chapel and was there converted.

Although converted in the Wesleyan Chapel, his family opposed his joining the Methodists. He loved the Scriptures, Wesley's hymns, and had a great gift in prayer. He was a builder by trade, apprenticed to his father. He and his father erected the local Methodist chapel.

At twenty he became a local preacher. Two years later he went to live at Brecon in South Wales. Here he joined the Methodist Society. He was recommended to Conference as a candidate and sent to Chatteris Circuit in Cambridgeshire. The Missionary Society heard of his work and after his ordination appointed him to New South Wales.

He went to Parramatta (N.S.W.) then to Bathurst and SYDNEY. In 1846 he became the first Superintendent of a Circuit which covered the whole of South AUSTRALIA. Pirie Street, ADELAIDE, was one of the churches he built.

He came to Victoria in 1855. He was in charge of the Collingwood circuit and Chairman of the Victorian District. In 1856 he was freed from Circuit work and for two years was a Methodist "bishop" travelling extensively through the country. During 1858-61 he was in charge of St. Kilda Circuit and during 1861-64 of Wesley Circuit, Melbourne. In 1864 he returned to St. Kilda.

Although not an outstanding preacher, he had great administrative ability and was very shrewd. He had a passion for building beautiful churches. He was the inspiration behind the building of Wesley Church, Melbourne. He helped establish the Supernumerary Fund and was the first Ministerial Treasurer. He was Secretary of Conference in 1857, '58 and '60. In 1859 he was appointed by the British Conference as President of the Australasian Conference.

The Jubilee celebrations in 1864 helped to raise funds for WESLEY COLLEGE and the Church Building Loan Fund of which Draper was a strong advocate.

Physically he was a strong man, of medium height, vigorous build, decided, resolute, cheerful, gentle and kindly. He was practical, had a rich vein of humor, was ready to learn and apt to teach, and above all a man of strong faith and devotion.

He was remarkable in his farsightedness. In all his plans and efforts he had a constant regard to their bearings upon the future. Having the firm conviction that Australia was destined to become a great nation, he did not regard mere present appearances and present wants, but felt sure that in devoting himself to securing good sites for churches, erecting substantial buildings and extending the ordinances of religion, he was both serving the present and preparing for the advancement and benefit of future generations. He was an enthusiastic advocate for the cause of education and his name will be identified for all time with Wesley College (which in the early years included the theological college), as one of the founders.

In 1865 he visited England and on the return journey the London was overtaken by a storm. The captain tried to return to Plymouth, but in vain. On January 10, the day that faraway Wesley College was opened, Draper began a prayer meeting which lasted until the ship sank at 2 o'clock on January 11. Of the 208 on board only nineteen got away and were picked up by an Italian brig—the last man to leave heard the others singing “Rock of Ages Cleft for Me.”

So lived and labored this man of Christ. His memory is perpetuated by the Draper Memorial Church in Adelaide, a marble tablet in Wesley Church, and an endowed scholarship at Wesley College.

AUSTRALIAN EDITORIAL COMMITTEE

DRAVO, JOHN FLEMING (1819-1905), American local preacher and philanthropist, was born in West Newton, Pa., Oct. 29, 1819, the son of Michael and Mary (Fleming) Dravo. After two years of study at ALLEGHENY COLLEGE, he withdrew because of poor health. He married Eliza J. Clark on Nov. 23, 1843, and they had ten children. He was converted in 1837 and was licensed as a local preacher in 1854. In 1872-73 he was president of the National Local Preachers' Association. For twenty-five years he preached twice a month at Vanzort Chapel. As a businessman he was one of the principal organizers of the Pittsburgh and Lake Erie Railroad and several other businesses. In 1868 he moved to Beaver, Pa., and by his energy and large gifts helped to build one of the largest churches in the conference. He served as a trustee of Allegheny College and as president of the board of trustees of Beaver College. He gave the latter school $20,000, a great sum for that day. He was president of the State Reform School for four years. With ability as an orator, he opposed slavery and advocated temperance. He served as collector of customs and later as surveyor of customs at Pittsburgh. He died Sept. 30, 1905.

Beaver Times, September 30, 1905.
M. Simpson, Cyclopaedia. 1878.

JESSE A. EARL

DREES, CHARLES W. (1851-1926), American preacher and missionary to ARGENTINA and other countries of Latin America, was born in Xenia, Ohio, on Sept. 13, 1851. From childhood he was surrounded by strong religious influences which led him to decide early in life to be a Methodist preacher. He graduated from OHIO WESLEYAN in 1871, and received his S.T.B. from BOSTON UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY in 1874. When the M. E. Church, then opening work in MEXICO, appealed for volunteers, Drees responded, and became a charter member of the Mexico Conference. His first appointment was to Puebla, a large and fanatical city. Yet in four years he built up a fair congregation, organized a boys' orphanage, and founded a seminary. Returning briefly to the U.S.A. in 1877, he married Ada Combs of Owensville, Ohio.

In 1878 he was named superintendent of the Mexico Mission, and for about ten years worked in that country. He was then appointed to Eastern South America, where he remained until his death. Though Drees and his wife made their home in BUENOS AIRES, his work carried him over a vast territory, even into the province of Rio Grande do Sul, BRAZIL. At that time the M. E. Church was expanding northward into territory not yet occupied by the M. E. Church, South. In May 1889, Drees went to PORTO ALEGRE, Brazil, taking with him the JOHN W.

PRICES, who elected to remain in Brazil when the M. E. Church, South took over the work. From Porto Alegre, Drees traveled north to attend the Brazil Conference in Petropolis as a fraternal delegate in 1900. On this occasion plans were made for the transfer of the Brazil Mission of the River Plate Conference to the Brazil Conference.

Drees was sent for a four-year period to PUERTO RICO, to supervise the organization of M. E. work on that island. In 1912, at the request of the AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY, he went to Spain to help in the revision of the Spanish New Testament. He was known for his splendid command of that language. He also revised the Spanish translation of Watson's Life of John Wesley and translated the M. E. Discipline.

In October 1924, Drees retired, after fifty years of active, continuous service on the mission field. He was a “man blessed with a fine mind, a sound body and wonderful endurance; with tact, dignity, good judgment and scholarly achievements . . . , and he added greatly to the impress of the Gospel upon the thought and scholarship of these Latin countries.”

He died on Aug. 30, 1926, in Buenos Aires, Argentina.

W. C. Barclay, History of Missions, iii, 779.
Christian Advocate, Sept. 1, 1926.

E. M. B. Jaime, Metodismo no Rio Grande do Sul. 1963.
J. L. Kennedy, Metodismo no Brazil. 1928. EULA K. LONG

DREISBACH, JOHN (1789-1871), American Evangelical minister and co-laborer of JACOB ALBRIGHT, founder of the Evangelical Association, was born in Buffalo Valley, Union Co., Pa. Charter member, Dreisbach Class, November, 1806—a fruitage of an eventful “big meeting” under Jacob Albright and his co-laborers. Seeing the urgency of Albright's mission, Dreisbach joined his workers at their first conference session, November, 1807. His license bears Albright's signature and the name, “The Newly Formed Methodist Conference.” As a probationer, age eighteen, on his first field, Dreisbach met the test of his ability and devotion when he was left alone by Albright's untimely death (May 1808) and the sickness of his senior colleague, GEORGE MILLER.

He served as conference secretary, 1809-1813, and was elected first presiding elder, 1814. He then became virtual head of the Albright followers, presiding over most of the conference sessions. In the historic year of 1816 he headed both the annual and first general conference sessions; dedicated the first church building, and established the first printing concern. He influenced the production of all but three of the first ten books published, 1809-1821.

He was a likely candidate for bishop when his health broke in 1821. He was widely respected and left the imprint of his influence on many progressive measures. He died on Aug. 20, 1871. There is a memorial near his grave on the site of the former Dreisbach Church near Circleville, Ohio.

A. Stapleton, Evangelical Association. 1900.
R. Yeakel, Jacob Albright. 1883.

ROY B. LEEDY

DREISBACH, MARTIN, HOME, near New Berlin, Pa., was the site of the first GENERAL CONFERENCE of the Evangelical Association in 1816. It had become a center of evangelical activity shortly after 1803 and soon was wielding a strong influence west of the Susquehanna River. Also, one of the sons of the Dreisbach household, JOHN DREISBACH, became the successor to JACOB ALBRIGHT and GEORGE MILLER, and with his brother-in-law, HENRY NIEBEL, compiled the first hymnbook for the Evangelical Association, founded a printing establishment, and revised the Discipline.

R. W. Albright, Evangelical Church. 1942.

BRUCE C. SOUDERS

DRESCHER, MILDRED G. (1888-), served as a missionary within the territory of the BOMBAY ANNUAL CONFERENCE IN INDIA from 1920 to 1949. After leaving India, she became acting secretary of missionary personnel for the Woman's Division of the BOARD OF MISSIONS, and then field worker. She was the adviser to foreign students at the University of Michigan for two years and assistant to the director of the Y.W.C.A. in Grand Rapids, Mich. for three years. In 1959 she went to Kathmandu, capital of NEPAL, as hostess for the Shanti Bhawan Hospital of the United Christian Mission. The staff there represented a wide range of denominations, nations, creeds, and philosophies, and the public was just getting acquainted with Christians and with representatives of Western culture.

Miss Drescher was born in Jones, Mich., and was educated in Michigan state universities. She obtained, in December 1918, a lifetime certificate of qualifications for teaching within the state. In 1927 she was awarded the B.A. degree in education, and in 1941 the M.A. degree.

Her missionary service in India began in 1920 at Nagpur, then the capital of the Central Provinces. She helped to purchase land for three schools. The property was named Mecosa Bagh: "Mecosa" for Methodist Church of Southern Asia and "Bagh" for garden. Such a name proved to be immensely popular; it was regarded as an indication of cordial feeling toward Indian customs. She helped to make the schools successful and popular, and then supervised village schools and a program of village evangelism. For some months she lived in a village on village levels in diet and customs.

From 1936 to the end of her service in India, Miss Drescher was superintendent of the missionary residence and guest house and of social service and evangelism in Bombay. During those years, alike in war and peace, people from many countries were introduced to India in the graciousness of her home and under the influence of her kind and understanding interpretation. She acquired great influence among the leaders of India's depressed classes. Bhim Rao Ambedkar, later attorney general in Prime Minister Nehru's cabinet and chairman of the drafting committee that prepared the Indian constitution, sought and greatly esteemed her advice on many issues related to the welfare of needy people.

Journals of the Bombay Annual Conference, 1920-49.
Minutes of the United Christian Mission to Nepal, 1959-64.

J. WASKOM PICKETT

DRESS. From the very beginning of the Methodist movement JOHN WESLEY advocated plainness of dress. In his Advice to the People called Methodists, with Regard to Dress he wrote,

Some years ago, when I first landed at Savannah, Georgia a gentlewoman told me, "I assure you, Sir, you will see as well drest a congregation on Sunday, as most you have seen in London." I do so; and soon after took occasion to expound those scriptures which relate to dress, and to press them freely upon my audience, in a plain and close application. All the time that I afterward ministered at Savannah, I saw neither gold in the church, nor costly apparel. But the congregation, in general, was almost constantly clothed in plain, clean linen or woollen.

In the same pamphlet Wesley urged upon his followers not necessarily "to wear a hat of such dimensions, or a coat of a particular form" but to be neat, and clean, with apparel "cheap, not expensive, . . . grave, not gay, airy, or showy." Continuing in the same vein, he wrote, "Wear no gold, . . . no pearls, or precious stones; use no curling of hair, or costly apparel, . . . Buy no velvets, no silks, no fine linen, no superfluities, no mere ornaments though ever so much in fashion. Wear nothing, . . . of a glaring color; . . . nothing apt to attract the eyes of the bystanders. . . . I do not advise women to wear rings, earrings, necklaces, lace, (of whatever kind or color) or ruffles, which, little by little, may shoot from one to twelve inches deep. Neither do I advise men to wear colored waistcoats, shining stockings, glittering or costly buckles or buttons, either on their coats, or in their sleeves, any more than gay, fashionable, or expensive perukes."

Wesley went to great length to prove that he had scriptural support for his position, quoting among other scriptures the words of St. Paul, "Let not your adorning be that outward adorning; but let it be the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit."

In his sermon "On Dress" Wesley went a step further, insisting that to "adorn ourselves with gold, or pearls, or costly apparel" engendered pride, increasing vanity, tended to beget anger, inflamed lust and was directly opposite to being adorned with good works. In a letter written Sept. 15, 1770 he wrote, "A Methodist using fine or gay apparel, must suffer loss in her soul, although she may retain a little life; but she never will attain a high degree, either of holiness or happiness."

In his sermon "On the Education of Children" he was particularly severe on parents who gave their children "pretty playthings, glittering toys, shining buckles, or buttons, fine clothes, red shoes, laced hats, needless ornaments, as ribands, necklaces, ruffles: yea, and by proposing any of these as rewards for doing their duty, stamped great value upon them."

His severity reached unreasonable proportions when he wrote, "If, in spite of all the Apostle can say, you encourage your children by your example, to adorn themselves with gold, or pearls, or costly apparel, you and they must drop in the pit together."

The result of Wesley's attitude was that both in England and in America the Methodists dressed as "plain people," copying more the dress of the Quakers and Moravians rather than that of the Anglicans or Presbyterians.

John F. Watson, in his Annals of Philadelphia and Pennsylvania in The Olden Time, wrote at some length about the dress of the Methodists and persons of other denominations: "The Episcopalians," he wrote, "showed most grandeur of dress and costume, next the Presbyterians, the gentlemen of whom freely indulged in powdered and frizzled hair; the Baptists showed a graver and humbler style, with scarcely any powdered head visible among them. The Methodists desired to be a 'peculiar people,' and for a time effected their purpose. No powdered heads of men, and no gay bonnets or ribands were to be seen among them. It was really so, that persons gaily dressed shunned to go there lest they might be 'preached at.'

"They aimed in general to dress much like the Friends, except that they intended not to be mistaken for them, and therefore they wore collars to their coats, and their clothes of various colors—avoiding only such as should be esteemed gay, and such as were drab, because that color was then a much more prevalent one among the Friends than now. The Methodists all wore 'shad breasted' coats, and low—crowned hats;—the women all wore plain black satin bonnets—straw bonnets were never seen among them—no white dresses—no jewelry—no rings. No male persons were to be seen with tied or queued hair, but lank long locks straitly combed down in thick and natural profusion. The females wore no curls, no side locks, or lace or ornaments. Their ministers, as such, could be readily recognized when abroad in the streets. They moved with solemn looks and pace—never in black, but in a kind of 'parsonic attire' called 'parson's gray'—a gray in which a proportion of blue was given; their coats were without lapels—and their hats were generally white and large brimmed. They wore small clothes and vests of cotton-velvet of olive color, and sometimes of black-lastings, such as are now used in shoes. Their Bishop, Asbury, wore an entire suit of blue-gray cloth, with a big white hat, and a fine, solemn, venerable looking man he surely was. He had greatly the dignity and port of a ruler.

"Such was the adherence to the things afore mentioned for principles' sake, that it was long before all these distinctive marks of a people could be broken down. The first ministers that wore pantaloons and frock coats were scarcely tolerated; and the members who first began to wear lapels, and frock coats, and the women to wear straw bonnets, were subjects of concern. But in time, as it wearied in watching at invading breaches,—one and another of the barriers which marked them from the world around them gave way,—and now, if the heart be right, they leave their own consciences to regulate their sumptuary obligations." (Watson was writing in 1831.)

HENRY BOEHM, who was a traveling companion of Asbury when he was older, says he wore "a low crowned broad brimmed hat, a frock coat, which was generally buttoned up to the neck, with straight collar. He wore breeches or small clothes with leggings. Sometimes he wore shoe buckles. Indeed, all the preachers, . . . wore breeches and leggings till 1810, and then several left them off, which Bishop Asbury heartily disapproved."

While they seemed to have conformed in general to Wesley's ideas of dress, JOSEPH PILMORE and RICHARD BOARDMAN, the first Methodist missionaries to the new world, did wear wigs and possibly silk stockings. The old Cash Book at St. GEORGE'S records: "March 24, 1770—to Mr. Ohara for a Wigg & Shaving Mr. Pilmoor, 3 pounds 0 shillings. July 6, 1770—paid for hinges etc to Mr. Boardman's Wig Box, 3 shillings." On June 8, 1770, a sum of thirteen shillings was paid out for silk stockings which was refunded to the treasury by Mr. Boardman, himself, on Monday, July 16.

At the organizing Conference of the M. E. Church in 1784 the question was asked, "Should we insist on the Rules concerning Dress?" The answer was, "By all means. This is no time to give encouragement to superfluity of apparel. Therefore give no tickets to any, till they have left off superfluous ornaments. . . . Allow no exempt case, not even of a married woman. Better one suffer than many. Give no ticket to any that wear high-heads, enormous bonnets, ruffles or rings." The Discipline continued the rules on dress in this form until 1852.

Until recent times the dress of the Methodist minister has been uniformly plain and simple. Following the Conference of 1784 Asbury and some of the elders took to wearing gowns, cassocks and bands. JESSE LEE, a leading preacher, objected strongly to the practice as did many of the other Methodists who felt it was a departure from the spirit of humility and a step in the direction of the exaltation of a person or an office. The custom of wearing gowns was therefore abandoned, although as late as 1791 a preacher named Henry Willis wore a black gown at Old St. George's. He found it gave offense to many "simple-minded people" however, and he discarded it.

For a time the Methodist preacher was identified by wearing a black suit or Prince Albert coat, white vest and white bow tie. Later still he effected a frock coat and winged collar in the pulpit together with striped trousers. Recently, in the East, he has worn the clerical collar with a dark suit during the week and the clerical collar together with a Geneva robe on Sundays, and here and there a stole with the color according to the liturgical season. Other ministers wear academic hoods, though this is not usually done except on academic occasions.

The Methodist Discipline today nowhere regulates the dress of the clergy or the people except to warn against the putting on of gold and costly apparel. The bishops often dress in the clerical collar around which they place a bit of purple as the sign of their office, and on their gowns they have recently sewn a red heart crossed by a shepherd's crook. In The United Methodist Church, however, another design has been adopted which the bishops wear on the sleeve or shoulder of their gowns—a design with the pastoral staff and the alpha and omega acrostic about it.

Annals of Philadelphia and Pennsylvania, . . . John Watson, rev. by Willis P. Hazard. Philadelphia: Stewart Leary & Co., 1927. H. Boehm, Reminiscences. 1875.

Disciplines, ME.

J. Wesley, Works. 1829-31.

FREDERICK E. MASER

DREW, DANIEL (1797-1879), an American capitalist and railroad director in New York, whose name has been perpetuated in DREW UNIVERSITY which he largely founded. He was born in Carmel, Putnam County, N. Y., in 1797, and while he began business as a cattle-drover, he subsequently became interested in steamboats and railroads. He went into heavy stock operations in the New York stock market, and became a powerful and commanding figure in the financial world. In middle life he united with the M. E. Church.

Daniel Drew has frequently been cited as a typical captain of industry who, in what James Truslow Adams called "the age of the mastodons" in American business, rose to prominence in and during the middle and latter part of the nineteenth century. Drew was pointed to by moralists as one who combined relentless business aggressiveness and enormous manipulations of the stock market, in which he saw no wrong at all, with a personally correct life and a sincere desire to do good with all the means he possessed.

He founded DREW THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY at Madison, N. J., and the Drew Ladies' Seminary at Carmel, N. Y. He also built in great part a Methodist church at Carmel, besides aiding a number of church enterprises. He died in New York, Sept. 18, 1879.

Dictionary of American Biography.
M. Simpson, Cyclopaedia. 1878.

N. B. H.

DREW, SAMUEL (1765-1833), British Methodist, born at St. Austell, Cornwall on March 3, 1765, was converted under the early ministry of ADAM CLARKE. Though illiterate in his youth, Drew's spiritual experience prompted him to intellectual pursuits, the outcome of which was an amazing literary development. In 1788 he became a Wesleyan LOCAL PREACHER, and in 1799 produced a pamphlet, Remarks on the First Part of Paine's "Age of Reason." He discovered an innate ability for philosophical study, and in 1802 wrote his Essay on the Immateriality and Immortality of the Human Soul, which was followed in 1809 by An Essay on the Identity and General Resurrection of the Human Body. In 1813 Drew wrote Scriptural and Philosophical Arguments to prove the Deity of Christ and the Necessity of his Atonement; in 1817, The Life of Thomas Coke. In 1820 he produced his two-volume work, An Attempt to demonstrate from Reason and Revelation the Necessary Existence of an Eternal Being. In 1819 he became editor of The Imperial Magazine, founded in Liverpool and later transferred to London. As a preacher he drew large congregations. In May, 1824, he received the honorary degree of A.M. from Marischal College, Aberdeen. Drew died at Helston, Cornwall, on March 29, 1833. His example of self-improvement was extensively noticed by Samuel Smiles, the popular Victorian educator.

J. H. Drew, Samuel Drew. 1835.

Samuel Drew, M.A.: The Self Taught Cornishman. 1861.

J. T. Wilkinson, Samuel Drew: 1765-1833. London.

JOHN T. WILKINSON

DREW UNIVERSITY, Madison, N. J., U.S.A., was chartered by the State of NEW JERSEY on Feb. 12, 1868. The first property of the University, the campus which it still occupies, was the gift of DANIEL DREW, who had determined to make a thank offering to theological education on the centenary of American Methodism.

The site selected was the estate of William Gibbons, a member of a distinguished and wealthy southern family. During the years from 1833 to 1836, Gibbons erected the mansion in the midst of a forested area, and this became the home of the family for thirty-one years. It now stands as Mead Hall in "Drew Forest," the University administration building.

Methodists had previously balked at suggestions for establishing schools for training ministers, pointed to the success of their pioneer preachers over college-educated clergy of other established churches. However, when Daniel Drew responded with his generous offer in answer to the plea for more ministerial education made by John McClintock, chairman of the centenary committee, the General Conference accepted.

The University was founded in 1866, but it was not until two years later in 1868 that the forest, mansion, and other buildings were deeded over to the corporate body of Drew University, the trustees. The first class of the seminary in 1869 consisted of nine men who graduated with B.D. degrees. Until 1928 the University was known as Drew Theological Seminary.

The Seminary weathered losses both in men and money in the first eight years of its existence. JOHN MCCLINTOCK, first president, died three years after assuming office. The acting president died three months later, and the second president, RANDOLPH S. FOSTER, left in 1873 upon his election to the episcopacy. He was succeeded by JOHN F. HURST. Three years later, Daniel Drew had to withdraw his financial support in the face of losses on the Stock Exchange, and Hurst went on a successful traveling appeal which made the name of Drew familiar in Methodist conferences across the nation.

Hurst was elected a bishop in 1880, and he was succeeded by HENRY A. BUTTZ, who held the post for thirty-two years. When EZRA SQUIER TIFPLE succeeded Buttz as president in 1912, the institution entered a new era of expansion.

On Jan. 26, 1928, ARTHUR J. BALDWIN and LEONARD D. BALDWIN expressed to President Tipple their willingness to erect a building and provide endowment for a college of liberal arts on the Drew campus. The board of trustees accepted the gift and changed the corporate name to Drew University on Feb. 7, 1928. The College opened in that year with a freshman class of twelve; one class was added each year until the four-year program was in operation. In 1929, in the course of this expansion, ARLO A. BROWN became president. In the summer of 1943, the College became coeducational, as are the other schools of the University.

Under FRED C. HOLLOWAY, who became president in 1948, physical facilities were expanded, and the Graduate School became a separate division in 1955. President Holloway was elected a bishop in 1960. Robert Fisher OXNAM became president in 1961. Degrees offered under current programs are the B.A. from the College of Liberal Arts; the B.D., M.R.E., and S.T.M. from the Theological Seminary; and the M.A. and Ph.D. from the Graduate School.

Graduates of the University number several thousand today. In 1962 nineteen of these graduates represented almost one-fourth of the living bishops of The Methodist Church, and at that time seventeen Drew alumni were presiding over colleges and universities. Included among the distinguished faculty which has served Drew University are OLIN B. CURTIS, CLARENCE T. CRAIG, JOHN A. FAULKNER, JAMES STRONG, LYNN H. HOUGH, EDWIN LEVINS, JOHN MILEY, ROBERT W. ROGERS, CHARLES F. SITTERLY, and SAMUEL F. UPHAM.

A strong emphasis in the curriculum is on international education. The college sponsors a United Nations study program for students from Drew, from about forty other colleges and universities, and from abroad. The Brussels semester on the European Common Market for students in economics and the semester in London for political science students are also offered by the college, and a program at the World Trade Center in New York City is in preparation. The DREW UNIVERSITY THEOLOGICAL SCHOOL has a cooperative program with the University of Edinburgh.

A rechartering of Drew University took place on June 4, 1969, when the governor of New Jersey, pursuant to the action of that State's legislature and in agreement with instructions given regarding Drew by the 1968 GENERAL CONFERENCE, signed the new charter. All control is now placed in the hands of the institution's Board of Trustees, and of these at least twenty-five percent must be members of The United Methodist Church, and the Methodist bishops of New Jersey, New York, and PHILADELPHIA must be additional members of the Board. Prior to this and under the original charter, all Drew trustees were required to be Methodists elected by the General Conference and were "subject at all times and subordinate to the directions and instructions of the said General Conference." It was felt that such rigid control hindered the university in seeking grants and government aid. The Theological School, the revised charter states, "shall be continued and maintained in relation to the founding Methodist Episcopal Church and its successors." An enrollment of 1,500 was reported from the three schools of Drew University for 1968.

The Drew library is the official repository of the JUDICIAL COUNCIL of The Methodist Church, and houses one of the largest and most complete single collections of Methodistica in the world.

"History," Drew University Bulletin, March 1962.

J. R. Joy, Teachers of Drew, 1942.

C. F. Sitterley, Drew University, 1938.

E. S. Tipple, Drew Theological Seminary, 1917.

Together, New Jersey Area News Section, September 1969.

JOHN O. GROSS

DREW UNIVERSITY THEOLOGICAL SCHOOL, at Madison, N. J., was the first division of the present DREW UNIVERSITY. The history of the seminary has been outlined in the history of Drew University. Prior to 1928 the seminary was the only school of the University and its work was carried on under the title of Drew Theological Seminary. Now as a part of the University, its control rests with the trustees of the University and its degrees, of Bachelor of Divinity, Master of Sacred Theology, and Master of Religious Education are granted by the University upon the recommendation of the faculty of the seminary. The M.A. and Ph.D. degrees in theology and related fields are given by the graduate school. The library contains one of American Methodism's largest collections of Wesleyana and Methodistica.

JOHN O. GROSS

DRINKHOUSE, EDWARD JACOB (1830-1903), American minister, editor, and author, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., of German parentage March 26, 1830. His parents were members of the German Reformed Church, but young Drinkhouse was converted to Methodism in 1847 under the preaching of ALFRED COOKMAN. He united with the M. P. Church in 1849 and was licensed to preach that same year. The MARYLAND CONFERENCE of the M. P. Church received him on trial in 1850.

He served pastorates in VIRGINIA, MARYLAND, and the DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA until 1863 when he went to CALIFORNIA to recover his health. While there he completed medical studies at Toland Medical College in SAN FRANCISCO, receiving his M.D. degree in 1865.

Instead of going into medical practice, Drinkhouse returned to Maryland in 1866 and resumed his pastorate, serving the West Baltimore Station for two years, and the Ninth Street, Washington, D. C. Mission for an unusual period of six and a half years.

In 1874, Drinkhouse was elected editor of the Methodist Protestant, a post he served with distinction for eighteen years. He was a member of every GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M. P. Church from 1870 to 1902, and was a member of the Conference which united the two branches of the Methodist Protestant Church.

EDWARD J. DRINKHOUSE

Edward Jacob Drinkhouse was a man of intellectual turn of mind. He was slender and dignified, with a manner revealing his literary tastes. He was a considerate and kind person whose first thought was for the church and its people. At his own expense he instituted the well-known Bible School Series of Sunday School Lessons.

Late in life Drinkhouse completed his monumental and authoritative History of Methodist Reform . . . the History of the Methodist Protestant Church. This traces developments in the Methodist movement from the early 1700's to 1898. The work is noted for its clear style and wide ranging scholarship.

Drinkhouse was one of the original trustees of WESTERN MARYLAND COLLEGE and was President of the Board of Governors of WESTMINSTER THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, which was one of the major beneficiaries of his will. Drinkhouse expressed a quite modern concept of ministerial education, feeling that it should consist more of practical than of theological training, and should stress the cultivation of a regenerated heart as well as the development and adornment of the mind.

Drinkhouse died April 18, 1903 and is buried in Oak Ridge Cemetery, Washington, D. C.

Minutes of the Maryland Conference, M.P., 1904.

M. Simpson, Cyclopaedia, 1878.

J. H. STRAUGHN

DROMGOOLE, EDWARD (1751-1836), early American preacher, was an Irishman, born at Sligo about 1751. He became a Methodist and read a public recantation in the Catholic Church, which caused a commotion. He sailed for America in 1770.

Settling in BALTIMORE, he was led into the ministry by ROBERT STRAWBRIDGE, another Irish immigrant who introduced Methodism in Maryland (and probably in America), and who raised up more early Methodist preachers than any other man. Dromgoole began preaching in 1774 and was appointed to Baltimore by the second Conference held by the American Methodist preachers.

He was sent to the Carolina circuit in 1776 and added 257 members that year. He then went to VIRGINIA but in 1782 he returned to the Edenton area of NORTH CAROLINA to form a new circuit. The Rev. Mr. Pettigrew, an Anglican, received him kindly there and he soon visited Plank Bridge on the Pasquotank River, Indian Town, River Bridge, Yeopin Church, and other places. In 1784 he was sent to the Mecklenburg Circuit, and then to the Bertie.

In the meantime he had married Miss Walton of Virginia and this in due course necessitated his location. Bishop ASBURY wrote in his Journal, "Edward Dromgoole is a good man, but entangled with a family."

Dromgoole was a member of the CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE which organized the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1784-1785, and he lived to see Methodism spread over half the continent. He died in 1836 in Brunswick County, Va. One of his sons was for many years a Congressman from that state and a grandson was a professor in RANDOLPH-MACON, LA GRANGE COLLEGE, and the University of Alabama.

F. Asbury, Journal and Letters. 1958.

W. L. Crissom, North Carolina. 1905. LOUISE L. QUEEN

DROPIOWSKI, PETER ZYGMUNT WLADYSLAW (1871-1963), first Polish Methodist minister, was one of the first Polish intellectuals to join the Methodist Church. Born Oct. 19, 1871, in Lwow, a city located in a part of Poland then under Austrian domination, he received his education there and attended the University of Jan Kazimierz, where he studied philosophy and philology, receiving his M.A. degree in 1893.

During the early years of his career he taught Polish, Latin, and Greek at state junior colleges, where he was later appointed director. While he served in this capacity from 1914-23, his work in the field of education was so outstanding that he was decorated for his achievements by Emperor Franz Joseph of Austria.

From early adulthood Dropiowski had strong religious interests; but repelled by the aridity of the teachings and the hypocrisy of the acts of the church in which he had been born, he became an atheist. However, in 1921, he came in touch with some small, informal groups of Protestants whose simple but ardent faith made a deep impression on him; and in 1922 he met THOMAS J. GAMBLE, a Methodist preacher, through whom he became acquainted with Methodism. Under the influence of these contacts he experienced a deep spiritual awakening, joined the Methodist congregation in Lwow; and, on deciding to dedicate his life to religious work, resigned his government position. This was despite severe pressure from his superiors, as well as threats of physical harm to him and his family, and other forms of persecution on the part of the community.

From 1923 to 1933 he served as head of the Methodist School and Children's Home in Kларыsew near Warsaw. He was ordained deacon in 1924, elder in 1928, as member of the Polish Methodist mission. In 1933, ill health forced him to retire from the ministry and active pedagogical work. He continued for another four years as editor of the Pielgrzym Polski, the Methodist monthly.

Wladyslaw Dropiowski was a prolific writer. He wrote numerous textbooks, literary essays (in Polish and German), religious editorials, pamphlets, short stories and polemics, in which he combined a brilliant style, incisive wit, Christian realism and elements of Polish culture. He was coeditor of the first Polish Methodist hymnal and wrote the Polish words to numerous traditional American hymns.

In 1946, he came with his wife, Camille, to the United States, where he made his home with his daughter and son-in-law, GAITHER P. WARFIELD, in Rockville, Md. In 1953, at the age of eighty-two, he became an American citizen. He died April 11, 1963. His deep faith, intellectual scope, and powerful preaching, as well as the undaunted courage of his convictions have left an indelible mark on the young Methodist Church of POLAND.

GAITHER P. WARFIELD

DRUMMOND, JAMES (1804-1888), physician and preacher, was born in Manchester, England, May 19, 1804, and came to America in 1810. He practiced medicine from 1827 to 1836. However, he was licensed to preach in 1833, and the death of his preacher brother, Thomas, in 1835, moved him to join the PITTSBURGH CONFERENCE in 1836. He was a delegate from that conference to the 1844 and 1848 GENERAL CONFERENCES. A change in conference boundaries placed him in the WEST VIRGINIA CONFERENCE in 1852, and that body elected him a delegate to the 1856, '60, and '64 General Conferences. Another reordering of boundary lines left him in the East Ohio Conference in 1876.

Drummond served as an army hospital chaplain for eighteen months during the Civil War, was agent for ALLEGHENY COLLEGE for one year, and was a presiding elder for six years. He contributed $10,000 to the church extension society. Drummond was known as a strong preacher and, as G. C. Wilding said, was virtually a walking encyclopedia of poetry, history, and scripture. He retired after forty-one years in the itineracy, and died May 7, 1888 at Cadiz, Ohio.

M. Simpson, Cyclopaedia. 1878.

G. C. Wilding, Promoted Pioneer Preachers of the West Virginia Conference (MEC). Parkersburg: Charles L. Scholl, 1927. JESSE A. EARL

DRURY, AUGUSTUS WALDO (1851-1935), American United Brethren historian and theologian, was born near Pendleton, Ind., March 2, 1851, to Morgan S. and Elizabeth (Lambert) Drury. His education was received at Western College (B.A., 1872), Bonebrake (now UNITED) THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY (B.D., 1877), and at the University of Berlin (1886). In 1876 he married Sophia Bookwalter, and to them were born five children.

After ordination in the IOWA CONFERENCE, Church of the United Brethren in Christ, in 1877, he was pastor of churches in IOWA and OHIO. Called to Bonebrake Seminary in 1880, he taught church history and theology and served as librarian until his retirement in 1934. Other services included a trustee of the U.B. Publishing House for thirty years, secretary-curator of The Historical Society in which post he made the original collection of sources for that institution, and a member of the Dayton Board of Education.

His writings constituted a major contribution to his church. Among these are: Life of Philip William Otter- bcin, 1884; Life of Bishop J. J. Glossbrenner, 1889; Baptism, 1902; History of Dayton and Montgomery County, 1909; Outlines of Doctrinal Theology, 1914, revised 1924; History of the Church of the United Brethren in Christ, 1924. In addition to serving as editor of the United Brethren Review, he edited and published translations of Disciplines of the United Brethren in Christ, 1895, and Minutes of the Annual and General Conferences—1800-1818, 1897.

Retiring in 1934, after fifty-four years of teaching and writing, he died Feb. 18, 1935. Interment was in Woodland Cemetery, Dayton, Ohio.

Marion R. Drury, Augustus Waldo Drury. Dayton, O.: Otterbein Press, 1936.

J. P. Landis, "An Appreciation," Bonebrake Theological Seminary Bulletin, Vol. xxiii, 1935, no. 1.

Who Was Who in America.

ARTHUR C. CORE

DRURY, MARION RICHARDSON (1849-1939), American United Brethren educator and author, was born near Pendleton, Ind., Dec. 27, 1849 to Morgan S. and Elizabeth (Lambert) Drury. His education was received at Western College (A.B., 1872, A.M., 1875) and Bonebrake (now UNITED THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, B.D., 1875). He married Lucinda Denny, June 20, 1872, and to them were born two children.

Ordained in the IOWA CONFERENCE, Church of the United Brethren in Christ, in 1875, he held pastorates in IOWA, OHIO and CALIFORNIA. Writing soon claimed his gifts. He helped edit THE RELIGIOUS TELESCOPE, 1881-

1897, first as assistant and then as associate editor. Published works include Pastor's Pocket Record, 1883; Handbook for Workers, 1888; Pastor's Companion, 1894; his one theological work was Our Catechism, 1897. Four biographical works came from his pen: Life and Career of James W. Hott, 1902; Memorial Record of the Western College Class of 1872, 1930; his own autobiography, After Eighty Years, 1930; Life of Augustus Waldo Drury (his brother), 1930. Missionary Triumphs in Puerto Rico and Santo Domingo, 1924, stemmed from association in missionary work with his son Philo.

Other contributions included two college presidencies: Philomath, 1910-1913, and Leander Clark, 1913-1916; after serving Coe College as student secretary, 1919-1922, he became one of its trustees. He was a delegate to three GENERAL CONFERENCES and an official representative of the Foreign Board of his church and of the Evangelical Union of Puerto Rico to the Hispanic American Evangelical Congress in CUBA, 1929. After fifty-eight years of service, he died Feb. 21, 1939, in Ponce, Puerto Rico.

A. W. Drury, History of the U.B. 1924.

Marion R. Drury, After Eighty Years. Ponce, P.R.: Puerto Rico Evangelico, 1930.

Who Was Who in America.

ARTHUR C. CORE

DUBLIN, Ireland. In JOHN WESLEY's day the city of Dublin was second only to LONDON in size in the British territories. There was no reluctance on Wesley's part to take advantage of the first opening there that came his way.

CENTENARY CHURCH, ST. STEPHEN'S GREEN, DUBLIN, IRELAND

This was in August 1747. Thereafter on each of his twenty-one visits to IRELAND, Dublin was his main center. It was his point of arrival and departure on every occasion except three, and Dublin became overwhelmingly the center of Irish Methodism.

The Methodist characteristic of social welfare was in Dublin from the beginning. The Connexional headquarters at Whitefriars Street included not only the preaching house and book room, but also a Widows' Home, a Free School, and an Orphan School for Girls. Here also met the STRANGERS' FRIEND SOCIETY, founded by ADAM CLARKE in 1790. These traditions have continued ever since in one form or another and remain a feature of Dublin Methodism in the twentieth century.

The Centenary Church, St. Stephen's Green, which in 1843 replaced Whitefriars Street as the "mother church" of Irish Methodism, has maintained the Prayer Book tradition of liturgical worship to the present day, though in the form of its own unique Service Book.

Nearly all the early Conferences were held in Dublin. Plans were well ahead to hold the 200th Irish Methodist Conference in 1969 in the historic Centenary Church, but just before Christmas, 1968, a disastrous fire destroyed the interior, and by kind invitation the 200th Conference was eventually held in the spacious premises of Christ Church (Presbyterian), Rathgar, Dublin. The Centenary congregation continues to worship and maintain its traditions in the Chapel of Wesley College.

Dublin Methodism as a whole owes much to WESLEY COLLEGE. In June 1969, in the presence of Mr. Eamon de Valera, President of the Irish Republic, completely new premises were opened on a magnificent site on the south side of Dublin. This is but one indication of the gradual move of Protestants from the north side of the city. The main suburban congregations are now on the south side. Here have been the chief twentieth century extensions of Irish Methodism in what is now the Republic of Ireland.

In Ireland as a whole the end of the nineteenth century saw the shift of Irish Methodist membership to the BELFAST area in the northeast of the country. The division of Ireland into two political units has further complicated the situation, and though the church is still organized as one body, North and South, the administrative and departmental work is no longer concentrated solely in Dublin, but is shared with Belfast.

The Belfast urban area, with approximately the same total population as Dublin, has well over six times as many Methodists. However, Dublin remains the significant center of Methodism in the Republic of Ireland, with an adult membership of just under 2,000, i.e., about two-fifths of the total Methodist membership of that country. (See IRELAND.)

R. L. Cole, Methodism in Dublin, 1932.
Irish Conference Handbook, 1969.

FREDERICK JEFFERY

DU BOSE, HORACE MELLARD (1858-1941), American bishop, was born in Choctaw County, Ala. He was educated at Waynesboro Academy and EMORY AND HENRY COLLEGE, though it is said that he employed private tutors during certain years. He was licensed to preach in 1876, admitted to the MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE in 1877, and ordained in 1879. In 1881 he was transferred to TEXAS and served in Galveston, Huntsville, Houston, and Tyler. He was then sent to the Pacific Coast and served in LOS ANGELES, Calif. He was editor of The Pacific Methodist Advocate, San Francisco. He returned to Texas for a year's pastorate in Tyler, and served in JACKSON, Miss. the following year.

H. M. DuBOSE

Du Bose was executive secretary of the EPWORTH LEAGUE Board of the M. E. Church, South, and editor of The Epworth Era from 1898 until 1910. He then returned to the pastorate and served churches in GEORGIA. In 1915 he became Book Editor of the M. E. Church, South, and editor of the Methodist Quarterly Review until his election as bishop in 1918. He was assigned to the Berkeley, Calif. Area. He was a member and chairman of various important commissions, including the Commission for Unification of the Southern and Northern branches of American Methodism.

Bishop Du Bose was much interested in archeology and collaborated with a professor of the University of Berlin in uncovering the site of Shechem in Palestine. He was the author of several volumes, including a history of Methodism and biographies of Bishops FRANCIS ASBURY and JOSHUA SOULE. He was noted for the exuberance of his language and the colorful array of adjectives he used in preaching and in conversation. He made his home during his last years in NASHVILLE, Tenn., giving full support to the movement to unite American Methodism, which he lived to see happen.

He died on Jan. 15, 1941.

Who Was Who in America.

ELMER T. CLARK

DUBS, C. NEWTON (1862-1936), American Evangelical preacher and missionary, was born in Plainfield, Ill., in August 1862, the eldest son of Bishop RUDOLPH DUBS. He studied at Oberlin College and later took post graduate work at Tübingen and Bonn, GERMANY. He served one year in the Germany Mission of the Evangelical Association. In 1889 he became a member of the ILLINOIS CONFERENCE, where he served Lane Park and Highland Park in CHICAGO, and Naperville.

He was made editor of the Evangelische Zeitschrift and moved to Harrisburg, Pa., where he served ten years. On Jan. 10, 1900, he was appointed the first missionary of The United Evangelical Church to CHINA, with power to locate and found the mission. After careful study and survey, he decided on the province of Hunan as the mission field. This was the capital city of Changsha. This province was the last of eighteen to open its doors to the influence of Christian missions.

Dubs continued as superintendent of the mission until his extended furlough in 1927. His interest in the work to which he had given his life never abated. Evidence of declining health did not alter his desire to finish his life work in China, so the Board of Missions authorized his return. On March 4, 1931, he arrived at Liling, East Hunan, and he died in Changsha, Hunan, China, July 9, 1936.

Dubs was married first in June 1889, to Emma M. Hasenpflug of Cleveland, Ohio, who died in China in 1914. Then in May 1920, he married Minnie Gohn of Conemaugh, Pa., who had served in the China mission for ten years.

The Evangelical-Messenger, July 25, 1936; Aug. 29, 1936.

ALFRED JOHN THOMAS

DUBS, RUDOLPH (1837-1915), American Evangelical preacher, was born near Worms on the banks of the Rhine River in South GERMANY, May 31, 1837. When he was fifteen years old, his parents emigrated to America and settled in Stephenson County, Ill.

Young Dubs experienced conversion and was eager to witness to the event. His father objected to experimental religion and gave his son the option either to give up this new decision or not return home. The young man countered: "Will you answer for me at the judgment, if I heed your advice?" "I cannot do that," was the answer given by his father. "Then," said the boy, "I must see to it that I can."

Rudolph Dubs was licensed to preach by the Evangelical Association at the age of eighteen years. He served a few years as a pioneer missionary pastor in the Middle West. He also served as an agent for the college now known as NORTH CENTRAL. In close succession he was a presiding elder, elected as editor of Der Christliche Botschafter, and finally was elevated to the episcopacy in 1875, when he was but thirty-eight years of age. For twenty-seven years he served as bishop, but having chosen to go into The United Evangelical Church where an eight-year limit on the term of bishop was in effect, he in 1902 was elected editor of the Evangelische Zeitschrift. Again in 1914 he was elected bishop, but he died in less than a year in Harrisburg, Pa., at the age of seventy-eight.

He had the unusual ability to read quickly yet remember accurately what he read. He had the remarkable power of moving great audiences who proved reluctant after an hour's sermon to have him stop. He was a capable executive, a skilled parliamentarian, a scholar and theologian, a forceful preacher, a good and great man.

Minutes of the Central Pennsylvania Conference, UE, 1916.
R. M. Veh, Evangelical Bishops. 1939.

ALFRED JOHN THOMAS

H. H. DUGMORE

DUGMORE, HENRY HARE (1810-1897), Wesleyan missionary in SOUTH AFRICA, was born in Birmingham, England, on April 21, 1810, and emigrated to South Africa with his parents Isaac and Maria Dugmore in 1820. He married Elizabeth Simpson of Grahamstown on Nov. 13, 1838 and there were eight children. Converted on New Year's Day 1831, he entered the ministry in 1834 and was ordained in 1839. He served in various white and African circuits in the Eastern Cape Province, but pre-eminently in Queenstown (1854-57; 1864-71) where he retired in 1876.

Although Dugmore received no formal education, he possessed considerable linguistic and literary ability. He mastered Xhosa in less than six months, taught himself Greek, and studied German in his old age. Besides translating the Prayer Book and portions of Scripture into Xhosa, he wrote about 150 hymns, of which 98 appear in the 1926 edition of the Xhosa hymnal. He read widely in theology, philosophy, history and literature, with close attention to style, and shared his knowledge in powerful preaching and public lectures. His most famous lecture was "The Reminiscences of an Albany Settler," delivered at the Jubilee Celebrations of the British Settlers in 1870. He also composed a certain amount of verse and music. Blindness and deafness marred his closing years and he died in Queenstown on June 14, 1897.

E. H. Crouch, Life of Rev. H. H. Dugmore. Cape Town, 1920.
Verses by Rev. H. H. Dugmore. Grahamstown, 1920.

H. H. Dugmore, The Reminiscences of an Albany Settler (edited by F. G. van der Riet and L. A. Hewson, Grahamstown, 1958).
D. G. L. CRAGG

DUKE, BENJAMIN NEWTON (1855-1929), American industrialist and philanthropist, was born on the farm of his father, Washington Duke, near DURHAM, N. C., on April 27, 1855. He attended the nearby elementary schools, Dr. Cross's Academy in Durham, and the New Garden Quakers' School, which later became Guilford College.

The family went into the tobacco business and founded the firm of W. Duke Sons and Company at Durham, and soon began making cigarettes. A branch factory was established in New York and others elsewhere in the world and in 1890 the Dukes combined them in the American Tobacco Company. Other mergers followed. The corporation gained control of the industry in America. In 1911 it was dissolved as a trust by the Supreme Court.

Benjamin Duke then became a banker, purchased a small railroad, cotton mills, and real estate, and interested himself in hydroelectric power projects. His fortune was estimated at $60,000,000. In later life he withdrew from active participation from all except the Southern Power Company and the Durham Realty Corporation, which owned hotels and apartment houses in New York, New Jersey and elsewhere.

He had plans to establish an orphanage in Durham but was diverted from this by plans to move Trinity College (now DUKE UNIVERSITY) to Durham. This was done in 1892 and Duke gave over $2,000,000 to the institution. He also gave liberally to Methodist churches, a Negro hospital in Durham, and other causes. He died in New York on Jan. 8, 1929 and was buried at Durham.

Dictionary of American Biography.
Who's Who in America.

ELMER T. CLARK

DUKE, JAMES BUCHANAN (1856-1925), American industrialist and philanthropist, was born near DURHAM, N. C., Dec. 23, 1856, the son of Washington and Artelia (Roney) Duke. He was educated at an academy in Durham and in a boarding school in Guilford County, staying at the latter institution less than a year. His teachers noted that he was quick with figures. Later he completed the course at Eastman Business College, Poughkeepsie, N. Y., in record time. At forty-eight Duke married Mrs. William D. McCready of New York, and divorced her a year later. His second marriage was to Nanaline (Holt) Inman of Atlanta, July 23, 1907, by whom he had one daughter, Doris.

Washington Duke returned from the Confederate Army in 1865 to find that his farm had been swept clean by the invading Northern forces. Luckily, a quantity of leaf tobacco had been overlooked, and Duke and his two sons pounded it out with hickory sticks, packaged it, took it to the southern part of the state and sold it. That shrewd maneuver launched the Duke family in the tobacco processing business. At fourteen, "Buck" Duke, as James was called, supervised the black boys in the factory, and at eighteen he was a member of his father's firm. At twenty-eight he went to New York and set up a branch factory. Five years later he was manufacturing half the cigarettes produced in the nation. A fierce competitor, Duke precipitated the "tobacco war" and forced mergers; at one time his combinations controlled 150 factories capitalized at $502,000,000. On two occasions the courts ruled against him, compelling the discontinuance of a holding company and the dissolution of the American Tobacco Company.

In 1904, Duke began developing the water powers of the Southern Piedmont and soon formed what is now called the Duke Power Company.

In 1924, Duke turned to philanthropy on a large scale, creating the Duke Endowment, composed principally of his holdings in the power company and administered by a board separate from the causes it was to benefit. He directed that the Duke Endowment or the income from it be used to transform Trinity College at Durham into DUKE UNIVERSITY and to assist hospitals, orphanages, and rural churches and retired ministers of the Methodist denomination.

Because of Duke's beneficence, Duke University has become a great educational institution. In the first thirty years after its creation, the Duke Endowment contributed nearly $2,000,000 to some 900 rural churches, about $1,500,000 toward the salaries of rural ministers, over $4,000,000 to orphanages, and more than $27,000,000 to hospitals over and above large amounts to the Duke Hospital at Duke University.

Duke Memorial Church is the largest Methodist congregation in Durham. A life-sized bronze statue of James Buchanan Duke stands in front of the magnificent chapel which dominates the Duke University campus. Duke died in New York, Oct. 10, 1925, and was buried in Durham.

Dictionary of American Biography, Vol. 5.

John W. Jenkins, James B. Duke, Master Builder. 1927.

Duke Endowment Yearbook, No. 23. Charlotte, N. C.: Duke Endowment, 1955.

Who Was Who in America, 1897-1942.

ALBEA GODBOLD

DUKE, WILLIAM (1757-1840), American Methodist and Episcopal minister and educator, was born in Baltimore County, Md., Sept. 15, 1757, and entered the traveling ministry at the young age of sixteen. After serving acceptably for five years and keeping a journal covering pastorates in MARYLAND, VIRGINIA and NEW JERSEY, he then located. His Minutes of the American Conferences, 1774-77 and his Journal are valuable sources. Duke's later career saw him return to the Protestant Episcopal Church and receive ordination by Bishop Seabury, 1785. He held pastorates and was a leader in diocesan affairs to 1803, and then taught at St. John's College, Charlotte Hall School, and Elkton Academy. His book, Observations on the Present State of Religion in Maryland (Baltimore, 1795), takes his church to task for its laxity. His papers are preserved in the Diocesan Collection, Maryland Historical Society.

EDWIN SCHELL

DUKE ENDOWMENT, THE, is a charitable trust established by JAMES B. DUKE for the benefit of health, child care, and education in NORTH CAROLINA and SOUTH CAROLINA and of religious causes in North Carolina. In an Indenture executed on Dec. 11, 1924, Duke conveyed to the Trust, which has perpetual existence, shares of stock with a market value at that time of forty million dollars. His purpose is set forth in his own words:

. . . I have endeavored to make provision in some measure for the needs of mankind along physical, mental and spiritual lines, largely confining the benefactions to those sections served by these water power developments. (The Duke Power Company)

The Indenture provided that the income should be distributed, after expenses and a provision for making additions to principal, in the following ratio:

	Percent
To Duke University, Durham, N. C.	32
For Hospitals in North Carolina and South Carolina	32
To Davidson College, Davidson, N. C.	5
To Furman University, Greenville, S. C.	5
To Johnson C. Smith University, Charlotte, N. C.	4
To orphanages in North Carolina and South Carolina	10
For superannuated preachers and widows and orphans of preachers who have served in a Conference of the Methodist Church in North Carolina	2
For building rural Methodist churches in North Carolina	6
For maintaining and operating rural Methodist churches in North Carolina	4
	100

In his will, Duke made two bequests to The Duke Endowment. One was of ten million dollars of which four million dollars was to be spent in building and equipping a medical school, hospital, and school of nursing at DUKE UNIVERSITY, and the balance was to be held in trust with the net income designated for Duke University. The other was two-thirds of his residuary estate, which consisted of assets with a market value of approximately fifty-eight million dollars. He directed that seven million dollars of this amount be spent in building and equipping Duke University, and the remainder be held in trust, the net income to be distributed ninety percent to and for hospitals, and ten percent to and for Duke University.

Methodism in North Carolina has benefited through the grants to rural churches, which it is stipulated should be ". . . those churches located in the sparsely settled rural districts of the State of North Carolina, and not in any city, town or hamlet, incorporated or unincorporated, having a population in excess of fifteen hundred people according to the then last Federal census."

Far more than monetary grants, The Endowment has provided incentive which makes the grants become "enabling assistance" rather than a substitute for local responsibility. Designed to "help churches help themselves," the local church makes plans for a building project and after approval by the Annual Conference, The Endowment helps to make it possible for the church to obtain professional architectural assistance and to erect buildings of high quality. In cooperation with the Annual Conferences, boards, and agencies, emphasis is placed upon the development of a program which justifies the size, quality and cost of the building.

Under the program of maintenance and operation of rural churches, The Endowment cooperates with the Annual Conference in providing:

1. Salary supplements for ministers serving rural churches.
2. Educational grants whereby students of the Duke Divinity School participate in Summer and Winter Field Education Programs designed to assist rural churches.
3. Grants which make it possible for rural ministers to take advantage of Inservice Training and Continuing Education opportunities.
4. Grants to Special Projects such as cooperative and group ministries in which several pastoral charges participate, providing a more effective ministry for the area.

A particularly significant benefit is the annual gift at Christmas to superannuated preachers and the widows and orphans of preachers. Detailed information is published annually and may be obtained from The Duke Endowment offices in New York, N. Y., Charlotte, N. C., and Durham, N. C.

The Duke Endowment, a booklet containing The Indenture.
M. WILSON NESBITT

DUKE UNIVERSITY, Durham, N. C., traces its beginning to Union Institute, Randolph County, 1839. BRAXTON CRAVEN became principal in 1841 and, with the exception of two years (1863 to 1865), was associated with the institution until his death in 1882. Renamed Normal College in 1851, the school had another name change in 1859, when it became Trinity College under the patronage of the NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE.

In 1892, it moved to Durham where it received large support from George Washington Duke, pioneer in the tobacco industry, and where General JULIAN S. CARR donated sixty-two acres for the campus. Under the patronage of Duke and his two sons, JAMES B. and BENJAMIN N. DUKE, Trinity College soon had the largest endowment of the colleges of the M. E. Church, South. In 1924, James B. Duke created Duke University through the establishment of an indenture of trust of approximately $100,000,000 for educational purposes. This gift for Christian education exceeded any previously made to an institution of Christian higher education in the nation.

This Methodist university, a memorial to the Duke family, carried with it a deep sense of appreciation for the Methodist Church. The elder Duke often remarked that, if he had amounted to anything in his life, it was due to the Methodist circuit riders who frequently visited his home and whose preaching and counsel brought out the best that was in him.

The transition of Trinity College to Duke University was carried through by WILLIAM PRESTON FEW, the first president of the university. Included in the educational plan was a cathedral-like chapel which is one of America's finest examples of Gothic architecture. The chapel, Few said, symbolizes "the truth that the spiritual is the central and dominant thing in the life of man." One of the significant developments of this relatively new university is the library. Trinity became the Woman's College.

DUKE CHAPEL

Duke has a chapter of Phi Beta Kappa.

The schools are liberal arts, education, engineering, forestry, graduate, international relations, law, medicine, music, nursing, and DUKE UNIVERSITY DIVINITY SCHOOL. The governing board consists of thirty-six trustees who nominate their successors, twelve elected by the North Carolina Annual Conference, twelve by the Western North Carolina Annual Conference, twelve by the Alumni Association.

N. C. Chaffin, Trinity College. 1950.

JOHN O. GROSS

DUKE UNIVERSITY DIVINITY SCHOOL, at Durham, N. C., began its work in 1926, as the first graduate professional school in the new university. JAMES B. DUKE's indenture for the university explicitly included the training of ministers of the Gospel. The Divinity School is set in the midst of unusual cultural and educational resources, including the university library. The library of the Divinity School has acquired the Frank Baker collection of Wesleyana and materials on British Methodism containing more than 175,000 items, including many early editions of John and Charles Wesley.

Three degrees are offered through the Divinity School: B.D., M.T. (Master of Theology) and M.R.E. (Master of Religious Education). The Graduate School of Arts and Sciences offers the M.A. and the Ph.D. in religion.

The Divinity School is an integral part of Duke University. The description of the campus will be found under DUKE UNIVERSITY. There are no separate endowment funds for the Divinity School; it participates in unsegregated endowment funds of Duke University on an appropriation basis.

JOHN O. GROSS

DULUTH, MINNESOTA, U.S.A., is located at the head of the Great Lakes, across the bay from Superior, Wis. and 165 miles north of MINNEAPOLIS. Duluth has often been described as a city thirty miles long and one mile wide. It has a population of 99,761 (1970). It is an important shipping center where millions of tons of iron ore have been loaded onto ships and barges to be transported to the iron refinery mills at the end of Lake Erie.

Methodism began in West Duluth in a community called Oneota. In 1869, Harvey Webb was appointed to serve this church. The Oneota church was later called Merritt Memorial Church in honor of another of its early pastors, Lucius Merritt. In 1920 Merritt united with a mission church called Asbury, and the union became Central Avenue Church, with W. J. Barr as its first pastor. The church reported 618 members in 1970.

First Church has been and is today the strongest Methodist church in Duluth. It has had outstanding preachers and has rendered significant leadership in the growth and development of the city. In 1965 the church moved its site from the downtown area to the top of a hill overlooking the harbor and much of the long city. Its present membership is 1,360.

Endion Church for many years was located east of

First Church and rendered an excellent service to the city. It has moved its site to the east end of the University campus and is now called University Church. In the downtown location it formerly held, members were lost until in 1970 they recorded 382.

Lester Park in far east Duluth, located in the residential area, has remained pretty much the same in size, with 404 members reported in 1970. Wesley, once a strong church, is located in the west end of Duluth and is an inner city church today, with a membership of 629. It was formerly a Norwegian-Danish church. There were two Asbury churches in Duluth—one a mission located in the west end, and the other a Swedish church. Both have merged with other churches in the city.

Woodland was a mission church for many years, but is now on its own with a growing membership of 405. Chester Park has a membership of 418, and Riverview has 379 members. Bethany Church is also located in west Duluth, a former Norwegian-Danish congregation, and has a membership of 128.

Churches located in the small communities of Gary, Fond du Lac, and Morgan Park have merged with other Methodist churches through the years or have united with Community churches. Duluth is a strong Catholic and Lutheran city, and Methodism has not kept up with the population increase. Instead, the denomination seemingly has lost members. However the present churches seem to be stable and are serving a mighty need in this interesting and thriving Great Lakes waterfront city.

ORVAL CLAY DITTES

DUNCAN, JAMES A. (1830-1877), American preacher and educator, was born at Norfolk, Va., April 14, 1830. He was graduated from RANDOLPH-MACON COLLEGE in June, 1849. He was twice married, first to a Miss Twitty from NORTH CAROLINA, by whom he had four children. She died in 1870, and in 1873 he married a Miss Wade, and they had two children.

Duncan joined the VIRGINIA CONFERENCE in 1849. He served in Leesburg, Washington, D. C., and Alexandria, and in 1857 was appointed to Trinity Church, RICHMOND. In 1859 he was sent to Broad Street Church, Richmond, where he led in building a sanctuary. He gave full time as editor of the Richmond Christian Advocate, 1861-63, and then went back as pastor of Broad Street Church, 1863-66. (He was editor of the paper on a part-time basis, 1860-61, and 1863-66). Following two years as pastor of Washington Street Church, Petersburg, Duncan became president of Randolph-Macon College in 1868, just as the school was moving from its original location of Boynton to Ashland, Va. He soon built the college enrolment to its highest peak up to that time. A natural orator, he was in great demand as a speaker while president of the college. He was a delegate to the 1866, '70, and '74 General Conferences (MES). In 1870 when only one bishop was being elected, Duncan, on the first and second ballots, came within three or four votes of receiving as many as JOHN C. KEENER who led on the ballots. Keener was elected on the third ballot. No bishops were elected in 1874. Duncan died, Sept. 24, 1877. His brother, WILLIAM WALLACE DUNCAN, was elected bishop in 1886.

General Minutes, MECS, 1877.

General Conference Journal, 1870.

M. Simpson, Cyclopaedia. 1878.

JESSE A. EARL

W. W. DUNCAN

DUNCAN, WILLIAM WALLACE (1839-1908), American bishop, was born at Boydton, Va., Dec. 20, 1839, the son of David and Alice (Piemont) Duncan. He studied at RANDOLPH-MACON COLLEGE, and was graduated from WOFFORD COLLEGE in 1858. He received the D.D. degree from both EMORY and CENTRAL METHODIST in 1882, and the LL.D. from Trinity (now DUKE UNIVERSITY) in 1900. He married Medora Rice, March 19, 1861. After graduating from college, Duncan spent a year preparing for the ministry under his brother, JAMES A. DUNCAN, who was at the time pastor of Trinity Church, RICHMOND. In November 1859, William Duncan was admitted on trial in the VIRGINIA CONFERENCE and was appointed to a station, Elizabeth City, N. C. Succeeding appointments were: Leesburg, 1860; Alexandria, 1861-62; Confederate chaplain, 1863-64; Danville, 1865-67; Cranby Street, NORFOLK, 1868-71; and Washington Street, Petersburg, 1872-74. In 1875 he accepted a professorship in Wofford College and was transferred to the SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE.

He was elected a bishop in the M. E. Church, South in 1886. He established his episcopal residence in Spartanburg, S. C., and administered such conferences as were assigned to him over the South while residing in that city. As a bishop, he was straightforward and deeply concerned with the welfare of the pastors in his area and in all the work of the church. His letters as late as 1904 are full of human interest stories. He belonged, however, in the list of rather autocratic bishops whom both M. E. Churches knew in the latter years of the nineteenth century, and some of the conferences felt that he was a bit too irascible when sitting in the chair as presiding officer. However, over the Carolinas there have been many churches named for him. He died in Spartanburg, March 2, 1908, and was buried there.

F. D. Leete, Methodist Bishops. 1948.

The National Cyclopaedia of American Biography.

JESSE A. EARL
N. B. H.

DUNEDIN, New Zealand. Central Mission was established in April 1890, under the superintendency of WILLIAM READY. The mission first met in Rattray Street and then moved to the Garrison Hall. In 1911, a central site in the Octagon, center of Dunedin City, was purchased, and the Octagon Hall was erected. Later the hall was leased during the week to Amalgamated Theatres for use as a cinema, but continuing to be used on Sundays for mission services.

Under the superintendency of Leslie B. Neale, the social service work of the mission was considerably expanded. Plans were well advanced in 1966 for the erection of a new block of mission buildings on the Octagon site.

In 1954, the Dunedin Central Mission Circuit and the historic Trinity Church amalgamated to form the Dunedin Central Church and Mission Circuit.

Eventide Home and Hospital, Company Bay, provides care for over seventy elderly people, and a hundred-acre farm supplies much of the food required. Other institutions of the mission include Wesley Manor (founded 1953) which cares for twenty elderly men, and Wesley Residential Hall (founded 1958), a hostel for university students.

D. BRUCE GORDON

Otakou Centennial Memorial Church, near the city of Dunedin, is built on ten acres of land given by Karetai in 1859, and dedicated as a mission reserve for a church, burial ground, and minister's residence. On this land the upper part of the village of Omaté once stood. Here J. F. Riemenschneider opened the second Maori church in the district on Christmas Day, 1864. Upon the same site the third church was consecrated by W. A. Burley, the president of the Conference, on March 22, 1941.

The church commemorated the establishment of the first Christian mission in the South Island of New Zealand, and also the signing of the Treaty of Waitangi by chiefs Karetai and Koroko at Otakou, and by chiefs Tuhawai, Taiaroa, and Kaikoura at Ruapuke Island, off the south coast of the South Island. It is therefore part of the Government National Centennial group of memorials.

The church is constructed of Maori design, and contains many architectural items of historical interest. A stone, dated 1832, from Weller Brothers whaling station store is built into the base of an outside wall. Inside the church, there is a brick inset in the wall from the chimney built by James Watkin and a piece of stone from the Venerable Bede's monastery of St. Paul, Jarow, England. A large greenstone boulder is set in left of the entrance porch, while above in the bell tower hangs the bell of Tuhawai's schooner "Perseverance," in which Bishop George Augustus Selwyn (1809-1878), first Anglican bishop of NEW ZEALAND (1841-1868), sailed much of the east coast of the South Island and Foveaux Strait. All the windows are lead lighted in three colors, designed after Maori weaving patterns. The chancel is paneled in tukutuku work, while in front of it stands the communion table newly carved in Maori designs, but, like the remodeled pulpit, originally made by Riemenschneider for the previous church. The original stone font is still used, but it has been mounted on a handsome pedestal of New Zealand green serpentine. In addition, local relics of tribal or missionary significance lie within the museum section of the church.

SOUTH ISLAND CENTENNIAL MAORI CHURCH AND MEETING HOUSE, OTAKOU, DUNEDIN, NEW ZEALAND

Near to the church stands the whare runanga (meeting house) called Tamatea, which was opened by Prime Minister Peter Fraser Dec. 7, 1946. It contains a beautiful memorial window dedicated in memory of the Maori soldiers who fell in two world wars.

Overlooking the entrance waters of the Otago Harbour, the whole reserve is entered through the Centennial Gate which is in keeping with the other memorial buildings. This whole work of art, the Maori Centennial Church Reserve, Otakou, is largely due to the inspiration and labors of T. A. Pybus, who spent the whole of his long ministry within the Otago Province, and who was a diligent student of, as well as pastor to, the Maori people of the South.

WESLEY A. CHAMBERS

Trinity Church, the first Methodist church to be built in the city, was opened on Bell Hill on July 14, 1862. Three months later, it was almost destroyed in a gale. The following year it was reopened, and seven years later the foundation stone was laid for a new building in permanent materials. This is the present Trinity Church at the corner of Moray Place and Stuart Street, which is recognized as the mother church of Otago Methodism. In 1954, it merged with the Central Mission to form the Dunedin Central Church and Mission Circuit. In the mid-1960's a thorough renovation of the church, both inside and out, was accomplished.

D. BRUCE GORDON

DUNHAM, DARIUS (17?-c. 1825), Canadian minister, was born in British North America. Educated as a physician, he was taken on trial in 1788, and was ordained elder in 1792. In that year he volunteered for the new mission in Upper Canada. Between 1792 and 1800 he served on the Catarauqui, Niagara, Bay of Quinte, and Oswegatchie circuits. From 1794 to 1799 he was the presiding elder in Upper Canada, and was largely responsible for the early expansion of the Methodist cause in the province. Unlike some of his colleagues, he was a firm disciplinarian rather than an eloquent preacher—one who treated all with a mixture of bluntness and honesty.

In 1800, Dunham located and settled near Napanee in the heart of the territory which he had opened for Methodism. He resumed medical practice and continued as a local preacher. Many years before his death (c. 1825) he had become a legendary figure among the Methodists of Upper Canada.

J. Carroll, Case and His Cotemporaries. 1867-77.

G. H. Cornish, Cyclopaedia of Methodism in Canada. 1881.
G. F. Playter, Canada. 1862. G. S. FRENCH

DUNKLE, WILLIAM FREDERICK, JR., (1911-), American city pastor and liturgist, was born in McAlester, Okla., on May 16, 1911, the son of William Frederick and Nell (Munn) Dunkle. He was educated at the University of Florida and received the B.D. degree from EMORY UNIVERSITY in 1937; the Th.M. from Union Seminary in 1949, and was awarded the D.D. degree by AMERICAN UNIVERSITY in 1951 and the LL.D. degree by MACMURRAY COLLEGE in 1968. His wife was Olga Carolyn Watson, whom he married on June 12, 1936, and they have a son and two daughters. He joined the FLORIDA CONFERENCE on trial in 1933 and served as the pastor in Pinecastle-Conway for a year and then was sent to Fernandina Beach, 1936-41, Snyder Memorial Church, JACKSONVILLE, 1941-44. Then he transferred to the VIRGINIA CONFERENCE and was sent to Barton Heights Church, RICHMOND, where he remained from 1944-48, at which time he moved to WILMINGTON, Del. where he became pastor of Grace Church there. He has served as a member of the General Commission on Worship of The Methodist Church, 1940-48; president of the Board of Education of the PENINSULA CONFERENCE, 1960-64; president of the Wilmington Council of Churches, 1956-58; the Delaware Council of Churches, 1959-60; and was the exchange minister to London, England, 1950. He was a delegate to the WORLD METHODIST CONFERENCE, 1951, 1961, and 1966, and a delegate to the Northeastern Jurisdictional Conference, 1960 and 1964, and to the General Conference of 1964. He was a lecturer at Crozer Theological Seminary, 1960 through 1966, a trustee of Wesley College at Dover, Del., and of DREW UNIVERSITY, 1952, and American University, 1962. He received the Silver Beaver Award from the National Council of Boy Scouts of America in 1962. He has written Values in the Church Year, 1959; The Office of Steward in the Methodist Church, 1962; and was the compiler of The Lectionary of The Methodist Church for The Book of Worship and The Methodist Hymnal, 1962 and '64.

In 1953 the joint chiefs of chaplains invited him to conduct preaching missions for military forces throughout the Far East, and in 1961 the British Council of Churches invited him to conduct a preaching mission in four English cities. From 1964 through 1968 he was on the Curriculum Committee of the Board of Education and the Secretarial Council of the Interboard Commission on the Local Church—both of The Methodist Church.

In 1966 he transferred to the ROCK RIVER CONFERENCE where he has been stationed at Trinity Church in Wilmette, Ill. He was a consultant for the Commission on Worship of The Methodist Church and the production of The Methodist Hymnal of 1964, and is now serving as vice president of the Commission. He is also serving as an adjunct professor at GARRETT THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.

Who's Who in America, Vol. 34.

Who's Who in The Methodist Church. 1966. N. B. H.

DUNLAP, JOHN FRANCIS (1865-1941), American bishop of the Evangelical Church, was born at York, Pa., July 10, 1865. He graduated from the York Academy in 1885 and in 1889 from EVANGELICAL THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY. In the denominational division that rent the Evangelical Association, he joined the United Evangelical Church, serving in the Central Pennsylvania Conference as a pastor, 1889-1906; a presiding elder, 1906-09; and as president of ALBRIGHT COLLEGE, 1909-15. A presiding elder once more, 1915-22, Dunlap labored arduously for the reunion of the two Evangelical bodies. He served as bishop of the reunited Evangelical Church, 1922-34, and contributed significantly to the denomination's educational and summer camping program. His first marriage (1882-1936) to Mary Kniesley was ended by her death. In 1937 he married Mrs. Elmeda Smith who, with two of the three sons of his previous marriage, survived his death at Williamsport, Pa., Jan. 1, 1941.

R. W. Albright, Evangelical Church, 1942.

The Evangelical Messenger, Jan. 18, 1941.

David Koss, "Bishops of the Evangelical Association, United Evangelical Church, and Evangelical Church." Manuscript.

K. JAMES STEIN

DUNN, CHARLES S. H. (1855-1894), American clergyman and editor, was born in BALTIMORE, Md., on Jan. 7, 1855. He was educated at Claverack-on-the-Hudson and graduated from DREW THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY in 1878. In 1881 ILLINOIS WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY conferred the Ph.D. degree upon him.

Dunn united with the MINNESOTA CONFERENCE of the

M. E. Church in 1880 and was stationed at Morehead for two years. He married Belle Ryburn in 1882. Succeeding appointments in Minnesota were: Redwood Falls, Saint Peter, Stillwater, and DULUTH.

In 1890 he transferred to the IOWA CONFERENCE and served First Church, BURLINGTON, for two years. Then, because of poor health, he resigned, taking a supernumerary relation with the conference, and went to CALIFORNIA. Soon he assumed the editorship of the Southern California Christian Advocate. After a year he returned to Duluth, Minn., where he supplied a church as pastor until May 1894, when he resigned again because of poor health. Going abroad to consult eminent physicians, he died in London, England, on Aug. 17, 1894.

Charles Dunn, a persevering student and a forcible preacher, was energetic and aggressive in his work; the churches he served grew in numbers.

E. H. Waring, Iowa Conference. 1910.

Year Book of the Iowa Conference, ME, 1890-95.

MARTIN L. GREER

DUNN, EDWARD HOWARD (1826-1906), American layman, industrialist and philanthropist, was the son of a sea captain who was lost at sea when Edward was six years of age. His mother, a native of BOSTON, Mass., brought him up "in the nurture and admonition of the Lord." His formal education was received in the public schools of Boston and the Academy of South Reading.

Edward Dunn started to work in a leather store at fourteen years of age. At twenty-one he entered business on his own account, and became one of the leading hide and leather dealers in Boston. He was the senior member of Dunn, Green and Company, a director of Hudson National Bank, a trustee of Home Savings Bank, and a director of Fireman's Insurance Company.

Dunn was a member of Governor Gaston's Council, presidential elector in the election of U. S. GRANT, and a member of the school board. He had two leading interests; one was First Methodist Church of Boston, and the other interest was BOSTON UNIVERSITY. He had one son, Danforth, who died in early youth. Dunn was expecting the boy to become a Methodist minister and grief over his son's death sublimated him into helpfulness to students in BOSTON UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY. Edward H. Dunn was elected an associate founder of Boston University.

DANIEL L. MARSH

DUNN, SAMUEL (1797-1882), British minister, was born at Mevagissey, Cornwall, on Feb. 13, 1797, and became a Wesleyan Methodist minister in 1816. He was the first Methodist missionary to the SHETLAND ISLES, a friend of ADAM CLARKE, a fervid evangelist, and author of some twenty volumes of theology and biography. Dunn was a leading reformer in the 1840's, editing the Wesley Banner, and with JAMES EVERETT and WILLIAM GRIFFITH was expelled in 1849 because of the suspicion that he had helped to write the FLY SHEETS. For nine years Dunn was pastor of a Free Methodist church in Camborne, Cornwall, for whose use he compiled a hymnbook, Hymns for Pastor and People. He went to NEW YORK in 1865, where he became a minister of the M. E. Church, NEW YORK EAST CONFERENCE, but returned to England in 1868, laboring thenceforth in a free-lance capacity among all branches of Methodism in Cornwall. He died in Hastings on Jan. 24, 1882.

Dunn, The Transfiguration and other Sermons, with a biographical sketch of the venerable S. Dunn. London, 1890.
OLIVER A. BECKERLEGGE

DUNSTON, ALFRED GILBERT (1915-), American bishop of the A.M.E. Zion Church, was born June 25, 1915 in Coinjock, N. C., the son of Alfred G. and Cora Lee (Charity) Dunston. He was converted in Elizabeth City, N. C., preached his trial sermon on Sept. 4, 1935, at Mt. Lebanon Church, Elizabeth City. He was ordained a deacon in July 1937 and elder in June 1938. He was consecrated a bishop of the A.M.E. ZION CHURCH at Indianapolis, Ind., May 21, 1964. He was educated at LIVINGSTONE COLLEGE (A.B., 1935), and pursued graduate studies at DREW UNIVERSITY, 1938-39 and 1941-42. He was awarded the D.D. degree by ALLEN UNIVERSITY in 1960 and the D.C.L. from Monrovia College, LIBERIA. He married Fernilla R. Flack, June 18, 1940, and they have three children.

Bishop Dunston served as a U. S. Army CHAPLAIN in World War II, and is a Reserve Major. Prior to his election as bishop, he was pastor of the following churches: Mt. Sinai Circuit, Advance, N. C.; St. John, Thomasville, N. C.; Wallace Temple, Bayonne, N. J.; Price Memorial, Atlantic City; Wallace Chapel, Summit, N. J.; Logan Temple, Knoxville, Tenn.; Wesley, Philadelphia, Pa., and Mother Zion, New York City. He is presently assigned to supervise the NIGERIA Conference of his church.

DAVID H. BRADLEY

DUNTON, LEWIS MARION (1849-1936), American preacher and college president, was born in Martinsburg, N. Y., on May 19, 1849, the son of Lorenzo M. and Mary Seymour Dunton. He was united in marriage to Mary E. Phelps Oct. 15, 1873, in Martinsburg by Daniel Marvin. In the 1880's the Duntons went to SOUTH CAROLINA because of his health. There he became a member of the SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church and served as pastor and presiding elder. In 1882 he was elected president of CLAFFLIN COLLEGE, becoming its third president, and serving in that capacity for forty years. Under his leadership the institution grew to become one of the largest educational institutions for Negroes in the southeast.

Dunton played a leading role in the development of the South Carolina Conference. He championed the cause of the Negro in the M. E. Church, as well as in the field of education. He was active against the "Regional Conference" idea.

After retirement from the presidency of Claffin, the Duntons continued to live in ORANGEBURG and gave of their energy to secure funds and build sentiment for the school. He was also interested in the building of Trinity Church in Orangeburg and the establishment of Harmon Field, a place of recreation. In South Carolina several churches and schools are named in his honor.

Mary Phelps Dunton died May 25, 1931 and was buried in Orangeburg. On June 19, 1933, Dunton married Violetta Cynthia Hazen in Schenectady, N. Y. Dunton died July 19, 1936, and was buried in the Sunnyside Cemetery, Orangeburg.

J. W. CURRY

DUNWELL, JOSEPH R. (1806-1835), first British Methodist missionary to the Gold Coast. There is no record of his place of birth or early life, but he entered the Wesleyan ministry in 1834 and landed at Cape Coast, West Africa, on Jan. 1, 1835. A group of young Africans, led by Joseph Smith and William de Graft—who later became a minister and staunch helper of T. B. FREEMAN—had begun studying the Bible. This group needed Bibles and asked a trader, a Captain Potter, to bring some from England. Potter went further and approached the Wesleyan Methodist Missionary Society for a missionary for Cape Coast. Dunwell lived only six months after his arrival, but in that time drew up the plans of the first Cape Coast church, visited the coastal towns of Saltpond, Winneba, and Anamabu, preached constantly, and laid foundations on which Freeman was to build from 1838. Dunwell died of fever at Cape Coast, June 24, 1835.

W. Fox, Wesleyan Missions (Western Africa). 1851.

W. Moister, Wesleyan Missionaries. 1878. CYRIL J. DAVEY

DUNWOODY, SAMUEL (1780-1854), a pioneer American minister who became a prominent member of the SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE in its early years. He had been born in Chester County, Pa., on Aug. 3, 1780, but moving to the South had joined the South Carolina Conference in 1806, and is said to have organized the first Methodist church in SAVANNAH, Ga. He was a very successful preacher and influential in establishing new preaching places and for a number of years served as presiding elder.

Chreitzberg, the South Carolina historian, says of Dunwoody:

"As a preacher he was original, both as to matter and manner; and his sermons were Scriptural and great. He combined the intellectual greatness of the theologian with the simplicity of a child . . . In many respects he was one of the most remarkable men ever connected with our Conference. Ill-shaped in body, careless in his attire, with little refinement in manner or attractiveness of style; with a rough voice, monotonous and rapid utterance; awkward gesticulation; with an abstracted, almost idiotic, expression of countenance—he was certainly the most logical and the most Scriptural preacher in the [Conference] body."

Elected a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1844, he heatedly championed the South when the great slavery debate was on. At one point the cry was made, "Can't hear you!" "You'll hear me presently," he shouted back; and certainly they did.

As in those days there was no age limit, he was exceedingly anxious—although he had failed greatly—to continue in the active work, but his brethren refused to allow it. "The thought of location, superannuation, or cessation from a loved employ never entered his mind," writes Chreitzberg (p. 227). "He was amazed and confounded when told by his loving brethren he was actually an old worn-out man." He died on July 8, 1854, and was buried at the Tabernacle Church near Abbeville, S. C.

A. M. Chreitzberg, Methodism in the Carolinas. 1897.

M. Simpson, Cyclopaedia. 1881.

N. B. H.

DUPRE, ARTHUR MASON (1869-1949), American college professor and dean, was born in Abbeville, S. C.,

Nov. 22, 1869, son of Julius Franklin Carne and Mary Power (Huckabee) DuPre.

He was graduated from WOFFORD COLLEGE, A.B., 1895; A.M., 1896. He studied summers in Vanderbilt, Chicago, Cornell, Wisconsin, and Columbia universities. Furman University conferred upon him the LL.D. degree in 1933.

He began teaching in the Wofford College Fitting School in 1895, and in 1897 became its second headmaster, serving in that post until 1912. He was professor of Latin and mathematics at Wofford College from 1912 until his retirement in 1947, then served as emeritus dean and professor of mathematics. He was the first dean of Wofford College from 1920 to 1925, and 1926-40. He was acting president of the college in 1920-21. In retirement he also taught mathematics at SPARTANBURG JUNIOR COLLEGE. He was dean of Spartanburg Hospital, 1913-18, and president of the South Carolina Teacher's Association, 1922-23. He served also as a member of the UNIVERSITY SENATE of The Methodist Church.

DuPre was a leader in the prohibition movement in SOUTH CAROLINA. He was a member of Phi Beta Kappa, Kappa Alpha, and a Mason. For many years he taught the Men's Class of Central Church, Spartanburg. He is esteemed by many as one of the greatest men ever to serve Wofford College.

He was married to Caroline Elizabeth Chambers in June 1905, and they had two children.

DuPre died in Spartanburg on Oct. 28, 1949. On Nov. 17, 1962 a portrait of him was unveiled in A. Mason DuPre Hall, a beautiful dormitory erected to his memory in 1950 on the Wofford College campus.

D. D. Wallace, Wofford College. 1951.
Who Was Who in America. 1950.

J. MARVIN RAST

JOHN PRICE DURBIN

DURBIN, JOHN PRICE (1800-1876), American minister of great strength and character who gave churchwide leadership in many ways to the M. E. Church during the nineteenth century. He was born in Bourbon County, Ky. of an old Methodist family, and was carefully trained by pious parents. In his eleventh year he was converted and shortly afterward joined the church. He was licensed to preach in about a week thereafter and was soon sent out as a supply upon a circuit. Of a strong personality, he had the ability to hold his audience as if by some "strange spell," and frequently "thrilled them with electric sparks of surprising eloquence." After a time his health failed and his voice seemed broken. He was advised to go into the Negro cabins and sit down and endeavor to talk to the inmates in a conversational tone. Other occupants came in, and with care his voice, thus attuned to small groups, became powerful enough to be again heard by large congregations. It is said that this experience probably produced the peculiar conversational style in which he preached—something which was not in line with the rather fulsome forensic type of oratory then prevalent.

In 1820, Durbin joined the OHIO CONFERENCE and while he traveled a circuit of 200 miles in extent, he read on horseback during the day, and in the evening by the light of pine knots thrown upon the fire. He commenced to study the ancient languages, and attended Miami University during weekdays, and later on Cincinnati College where he was given the M.A. degree. In 1826 he was elected Professor of Languages in AUGUSTA COLLEGE, at that time one of the leading educational centers in the Kentucky-Ohio country. In 1831 he was elected chaplain of the United States Senate, probably at the instance of Henry Clay. In 1832 he became editor of the Christian Advocate in New York, but in 1834 DICKINSON COLLEGE, having been accepted by the Baltimore and Philadelphia Conferences, and Durbin's election having been unanimous and enthusiastic, he accepted the presidency of Dickinson. In this place he remained until 1845.

In 1836 he had become a member of the PHILADELPHIA CONFERENCE in which he kept his membership during the remainder of his life. Dickinson College gave him the opportunity to manifest unusual administrative and executive abilities. In 1842-43, he travelled in Europe and in the East, and published as the result "four volumes of observations."

Durbin was a member of the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1844 and took part in the famous debate which there occurred over a southern bishop owning slaves—of course, on the anti-slavery side. Durbin was a member of the Committee of 1844 to draw up a Reply to the Protest, which protest the southern delegates had drawn up. He was elected chairman of this Committee and presented the "Reply" on the last day of the 1844 Conference. This, by a vote of 116 to 26, was ordered to be entered on the Journal. He was, however, considered somewhat conservative, and on Aug. 7, 1866, when the FREEDMEN'S AID SOCIETY was formed in Cincinnati, the group organizing it was said to be suspicious, especially of John P. Durbin (who had become the secretary of the Missionary Society), "who was reputed to be indifferent, if not hostile, to the evangelisation of the Negro."

He was a member of seven successive General Conferences and had the reputation of being a wise and prudent counselor. He early advocated lay representation in the councils of the church, though it did not come into being until about the time of his death.

After he had served eleven years as president of Dickinson College, he returned to the pastorate, filling the pulpits in Union and Trinity Churches in PHILADEL-PHIA, and then becoming presiding elder on the North Philadelphia district. In 1850 the health of Dr. Pitman, who was Missionary Secretary of the M. E. Church, failed and the Board of Bishops appointed Durbin to fill the vacancy. In 1852 he was formally elected by the General Conference to be Missionary Secretary and he remained such all the rest of his active life.

Durbin, by his administrative power, rare tact, great prominence and strong personality, and by stirring eloquence, aroused the church greatly, and at this particular time American Methodism was moving well ahead towards the establishment of its great missionary empire. Durbin was eminently successful in the management of the affairs of the mission work of the church. With the exception of the mission in LIBERIA, and one which had just commenced in CHINA, all the foreign missions of the M. E. Church grew up under his personal supervision. Receipts for missions increased from $100,000 to nearly $700,000 a year during his tenure.

He declined re-election as Missionary Secretary in 1872. Seldom afterwards did he appear in public. He was stricken with paralysis and died on Oct. 18, 1876.

Bishop Simpson says of him that few men ever equaled him in solid and widespread popularity; few have been his equals in ability, fidelity, tact, and industry. "He ranked among the first in the church as a pulpit orator, a Christian pastor, an educator, a writer, and an administrator."

John A. Roche, The Life of John Price Durbin, D.D., LL.D., with an Analysis of his Homiletic Skill and Sacred Oratory. N.Y.: Hunt & Eaton, 1890.

M. Simpson, Cyclopaedia. 1878.

N. B. H.

DUREN, WILLIAM LARKIN (1870-1965), American pastor and editor, was born Oct. 27, 1870, in Carroll County, Miss., the son of Jesse George and Annie E. (Rogers) Duren. After teaching school some ten years, he won the A.B. (1902) from MILLSAPS COLLEGE, and that institution later awarded him the D.D. degree. He married Ethel Bennett, July 1, 1903, and they had three children.

Admitted into the NORTH MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE in 1902, Duren was ordained elder in 1904. His appointments were: Itta Bena, 1902; Jonestown, 1903; Macon, 1904-05; Clarksdale, 1906-08; Tupelo, 1909-12; First Church, Columbus, 1913-16; Columbus District, 1917-19; RAYNE MEMORIAL, NEW ORLEANS, 1920-25; St. MARK, ATLANTA, 1926-29; Griffin (Ga.) District, 1930; Monroe (La.) District, 1931; New Orleans District, 1932-33; and editor, New Orleans Christian Advocate, 1934-46. He was a supernuminate during the last four years of his editorship, because by the law of the church he had to retire at 72 or in 1942. He was a delegate to the UNITING CONFERENCE in 1939, a trustee of CENTENARY COLLEGE, Shreveport, and a member of several church boards. He published four books: Francis Asbury, 1928; The Top Sergeant, 1930; Charles Betts Galloway, 1932; and The Trail of the Circuit Rider, 1936. He died June 21, 1965, in his ninety-fifth year, in New Orleans and was buried there.

C. T. Howell, Prominent Personalities. 1945.

Minutes of the Louisiana Conference, 1966. JESSE A. EARL

DURHAM, PLATO TRACY (1873-1930), American theologian, preacher, and seminary dean, was born on Sept. 10, 1873 in Shelby, N. C. The Durhams were an old family of Cleveland County, N. C., an ancestor, Plato Durham, having an iron plaque placed in his honor there today on the courthouse square in Shelby, as a leader of his State. Young Durham was educated at Trinity College in North Carolina, where he received an A.B. in 1895; then took further work at the Yale Divinity School, and the Union Theological Seminary in New York; and subsequently studied in Oxford, England for two years. He married Lucy Cole in 1906, the daughter of John Cole, a minister of the NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE.

After teaching Biblical literature at Trinity College (now DUKE) for six years, Plato Durham joined the WESTERN NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church, South in 1899 and served successively old Trinity Church in CHARLOTTE; Central Church, Concord; and at an early age was made presiding elder of the Winston-Salem District, and then of the Charlotte District of his Conference. In 1914 he became dean of the newly begun CANDLER SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY OF EMORY UNIVERSITY in Atlanta, and subsequently had great influence upon the young ministers whom he taught there. He also became a leader in many matters looking toward social betterment especially for the Negroes of the South.

Durham was wont to tell his own personal experience to the young ministers at Emory. He confessed that he had never really found himself spiritually during his early years, and although thrust into high position by virtue of his abilities and the culture and bearing natural to him, he admitted that for some years as a minister he never quite had his heart in his work. Then upon a certain Sunday, as a youthful presiding elder, he went out "on his rounds" to preach for an old mountain preacher. He said that he went unwillingly, and did not want to preach and did not much feel like preaching, but perforce went through the form of delivering a sermon to the simple, expectant people. At the conclusion of his message, with an inner realization that he had not preached well because he was living in pretense, he said that the old pastor of the people got up, and extending his arms upward to his people said simply: "Oh, my people, that I could make you to know the love of God." Plato Durham said, "That broke my heart." He went back home, found himself, and became a flaming brand used mightily by the Spirit of God to kindle spirituality in those who listened to him.

He was at his best when preaching to preachers. "I do not know anyone more miserable," he once told a group of them, "than a half-priest of God, and a half something else."

On the Emory Campus he led a noteworthy revival in his later years. The "Durham Revival" it was called. This mightily influenced the lives of young men all over the campus. There was a poetic strain in him also, and A. W. PLYLER, who wrote his memoir for the Conference minutes, said frankly of him, "He was a mystic who held direct fellowship with the spiritual world."

In his youth he served as a First Lieutenant of the Second North Carolina Regiment in the Spanish-American War, and the influence of his military training never quite left him. His Conference had elected him as a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1930 (MES) when, some weeks before this convened, on Feb. 10, 1930, he died with a sudden heart attack in his home in ATLANTA. The chapel built at the Candler School of Theology during his tenure, whose unusual architectural design and striking emblems of early Christian symbolism were largely influenced by Dean Durham, has been named "Durham's Chapel" in his honor. A plaque upon its wall inscribes his name and honors.

Minutes of the Western North Carolina Conference. N. B. H.

DURHAM, NORTH CAROLINA, U.S.A. Bishop FRANCIS ASBURY visited and preached in the vicinity of present-day Durham during the summer of 1780 and again in 1800. A revival conducted in 1830 by Willis Haynes and David Nicholson at Orange Grove, about one mile from the Durham County Courthouse, resulted in the organization of a Methodist church with some thirty members, and on April 25, 1832, William R. Herndon donated a building and one acre of land to be used for a house of worship and academy. John W. Hancock served as the first headmaster of the school which was conducted in the Orange Grove Methodist Church. This building was burned in 1835 but was immediately rebuilt. In 1860 the members of the Orange Grove Church and other Methodists who had recently moved into the village of Durham decided to erect a new Methodist church in the community and subsequently one and a half acres of land were bought for $150 at the site of present-day Trinity Church. Trustees of the new church were: William J. Duke, WASHINGTON DUKE, Archibald Nichols, D. M. Cheek, James Cheek, Z. I. Lyon and John Barbee.

William J. Duke and Washington Duke, the sons of Taylor and Dicie Jones Duke, God-fearing, sturdy pioneers of the Bahama community, near Durham, were destined to be strongly linked with the fortunes of Durham Methodism. William J. Duke, himself a preacher, once built a brush arbor with his own hands and out of his own funds and was a leader in the building of the Hebron Church on the Durham-Roxboro Highway. His descendants and others later built in his memory Duke's Chapel in Durham. Washington Duke first joined the Mount Bethel Church at Bahama and later the Orange Grove and Durham Methodist Churches. A state historical marker was erected at the Mount Bethel Church at Bahama in December, 1966, noting the connection between that church and the Duke family. On Aug. 20, 1869, JAMES BUCHANAN DUKE and BENJAMIN NEWTON DUKE joined the Methodist church in Durham.

The Durham Methodist Church was used as a muster center for Confederate soldiers in the War between the States and the churchyard served as a drill ground. The building was used by both the Confederate and federal armies as a hospital, military headquarters, and for the quartering of soldiers. In 1867 Durham Circuit was formed and in 1872 Durham became a separate station.

Among the prominent Methodist leaders in Durham during this period was General JULIAN SHAKESPEARE CARR, who, along with Washington Duke, Benjamin N. Duke and other Durham citizens, began in 1890 to make plans to bring Trinity Methodist College from Randolph County, N. C., to Durham. In 1881, General Carr took CHARLES JONES SOONG, a young Chinese boy living in Wilmington, N. C., into his home and sent him to Trinity College and later to VANDERBILT University. Upon his return to CHINA, Soong became a printer and publisher and a man of considerable means and several members of his family, especially his daughters, Mme. Sun Yat-sen and Mme. CHIANG KAI-SHEK, became prominent leaders in China.

A new church was completed in Durham in 1881, and a Methodist Female Seminary was opened with General Carr, E. J. Parrish, J. B. Whitaker, Washington Duke, and J. E. Lyon serving as trustees. The church became known as Trinity Church in 1886. About this time the Trinity congregation, under the leadership of T. A. Boone, began discussing the possibility of organizing new Methodist churches in both east and west Durham. The church in the west was started in 1885-86 on land given by Brodie L. Duke, and was known as Main Street Church until 1907 when it was named Memorial Church in memory of Washington Duke. The name was changed to Duke Memorial Church in 1924, and in 1970 it reported 2,062 members.

The church in the east end, established in 1886, was named Carr Church in honor of General Carr, who contributed largely to the cost of construction of the edifice. In 1970 that church reported 638 members.

In 1885 the Hillsboro District was replaced by the Durham District as a result of the growing influence of Methodism in Durham. The NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church, South met in Durham in 1881, 1894, 1908, 1916, 1926, and 1933. That conference of The Methodist Church held its annual sessions in Durham in 1941, 1953, and 1961. SAM JONES, the well-known Georgia evangelist, visited Durham in October 1888, and held revival services there for several weeks.

The cornerstone of the new Trinity College was laid on Nov. 11, 1890, and the institution was formally opened and dedicated on Oct. 12, 1892, with Franklin Crowell as president. In 1924, James B. Duke presented $24 million to Trinity College (which became known as DUKE UNIVERSITY) and to other institutions of higher learning in North and South Carolina, as well as to hospitals, church homes, rural churches, and retired ministers.

Bishop COSTEN JORDAN HARRELL was pastor of Trinity Church from 1917-19, and Bishop WILLIAM WALTER PEELE was pastor from 1924-27. Bishop PAUL NEFF GARBER, dean of the Divinity School at Duke University, founded the Francis Asbury class at the church and taught it for a number of years. Trinity Church was destroyed by fire on Jan. 21, 1923, but was rebuilt immediately.

The seventeen churches of Durham are: Aldersgate, Asbury, Bethany, Branson, Calvary, Carr, Duke's Chapel, Duke Memorial, Epworth, Glendale Heights, Lakewood, Maybrook, McMannen, St. John, St. Paul, Trinity, and Wellons Village. In Greater Durham are: Andrews, Soapstone, Bethesda, Fletcher's Chapel, Mount Sylvan, and Pleasant Green. The Centennial Edition of the Durham Morning Herald, April 26, 1953, devoted nearly an entire page to the history of Methodism in Durham County and noted that the churches then organized in and around Greater Durham had played a significant part in the social and religious program of the community.

Benjamin Guy Childs, Centennial History of Trinity Methodist Church. Durham, 1961.

Journal of the North Carolina Conference, TMC. 1966.

RALPH HARDEE RIVES

DUTCH GUIANA. (See SURINAM.)

DYER, JOHN L. (1812-1901), American preacher and western pioneer. "Father Dyer" was born in Madison County, Ohio, on March 16, 1812, and was received on trial in the Wisconsin Conference in 1851. He served three circuits in WISCONSIN, five circuits in MINNESOTA, and one in northwest Wisconsin for a year each.

Dyer went to COLORADO in 1861 where he served California Gulch Mission, Blue River Mission, Summit County, and South Park Mission. In 1863 he was one of seven ministers who organized the ROCKY MOUNTAIN CONFERENCE under Bishop E. R. AMES. He served as presiding elder of the South Park District for three years, and of Rio Grande and Santa Fe Districts in NEW MEXICO; and served six other pastorates in Colorado before he was superannuated.

In 1864 he carried mail and gold over Mosquito Pass on skis each week during the winter and preached three times a week, gaining the name of "The Snow-Shoe Itinerant." In the same year he presided over the annual conference in the absence of Bishop LEVI SCOTT. Because of his exploits in the early mining area, he was affectionately called "Father Dyer."

Dyer was married to Harriet Foster on Dec. 4, 1833, and they had three sons and two daughters. One son, Elias, was murdered by a mob in Lake County while trying to uphold justice as the county judge. Mrs. Dyer died on July 14, 1847. On Nov. 7, 1870, Dyer married

Mrs. Lucinda P. Rankin. Though he was superannuated in 1877, he continued preaching and working almost to the time of his death, June 10, 1901. He is honored by a place in the Hall of Fame in the Colorado State Capitol.

I. H. Beardsley, Echoes from Peak and Plain. 1898.

J. L. Dyer, Autobiography. 1890.

Lowell B. Swan, "A History of Methodism in Colorado, 1863-1876." Unpublished dissertation, Iliff School of Theology, 1951.

LOWELL B. SWAN

DYMOND, FRANCIS JOHN (1866-1932), British BIBLE CHRISTIAN missionary, was born at Torquay, Aug. 18, 1866, the son of John Dymond. He was president of the 1879 Bible Christian Conference. In 1886 he offered with SAMUEL POLLARD for Yunnan, CHINA, and labored there for forty-four years, suffering much hardship and bereavement with unshaken faith. His serene humility, companionability, and humor admirably complemented Pollard's practical gifts. Returning home in 1931, he died of pernicious anemia on March 18, 1932, and was buried at Lodge Hill, Selly Oak.

Mrs. M. M. Dymond, Yunnan. London, n.d., but c. 1926.

ALYN COURT

E

EARLY, JOHN (1786-1873), American bishop, was born in Bedford County, Va., Jan. 1, 1786, one of thirteen children of well-to-do Baptist parents, Joshua and Mary (Leftwich) Early. He was converted in 1804 in a revival led by STITH MEAD. He joined the VIRGINIA CONFERENCE in 1807, and his first preaching was to the slaves of Thomas Jefferson at Poplar Forest, some twelve miles from his Bedford County home.

Ordained deacon by Bishop ASBURY in 1809 and elder by Bishop MCKENDREE in 1810, Early served circuits near his home. He located in 1815, and his wife died in 1820. In 1821 he was readmitted to the Virginia Conference, and that body, aware of his administrative ability, appointed him to the Meherrin District which included Petersburg, Lynchburg, and the surrounding region. In 1822 he married Elizabeth B. Rives of Virginia, and they had six children, one of whom, Thomas, became a Methodist preacher. Untiring in evangelism, John Early received 500 members in one church on a circuit, and it was claimed that 1,000 were converted in one CAMP MEETING which he conducted. Prominent in the councils of the church and highly esteemed generally, he was offered the governorship of ILLINOIS Territory and ARKANSAS Territory, as well as Comptroller of the Treasury, but he declined secular preferment.

Early served as secretary of the Virginia Conference for twenty-seven years. Between 1812 and 1844 he was a delegate to six General Conferences. He was prominent in the events and maneuvers which led to the division of 1844 and the organization of the M. E. Church, South in 1845-46. He was elected the first Book Agent of the newly formed connection in 1845. He helped to establish RANDOLPH-MACON COLLEGE, and was president of its board of trustees from 1832 to 1868. After his elevation to the episcopacy he was active for twelve years. In appraising Early's episcopal service, Bishop JOHN M. MOORE said that he was a "routine bishop with autocratic proclivities." He died in Lynchburg, Va., Nov. 5, 1873, and was buried there.

F. D. Leete, Methodist Bishops. 1948.

J. M. Moore, Life and I. 1948.

M. Simpson, Cyclopaedia. 1878.

JESSE A. EARL
ALBEA GODBOLD

EARLY, JORDAN WINSTON (1814-ca. 1894), American Negro pioneer missionary-evangelist of the A.M.E. Church, was born in Franklin County, Va., on June 17, 1814. He received an exhorter's license from the M. E. Church in 1833 and in 1836 he was licensed to preach. Ordained DEACON in 1840 and ELDER in 1846, he built the A.M.E. churches at St. Louis, Mo. and Brooklyn (East St. Louis), Ill. J. W. Early founded African Methodism in LOUISIANA at NEW ORLEANS (St. James Chapel) in 1842, and he organized and served as pastor of churches in MISSOURI, TENNESSEE, IOWA and KENTUCKY throughout his ministry of almost fifty years (1844-1888). He served two terms as a presiding elder and was Conference Book Steward and Treasurer. A member of the General Conference for thirty years, he is recognized as the founder of his branch of Methodism in four states (Louisiana, Tennessee, Missouri and Iowa). Early retired in 1888 and died about 1894.

Sarah J. W. Early, The Life and Labors of Jordan Winston Early. Nashville: The A.M.E. Sunday School Union, 1894.

GRANT S. SHOCKLEY

EAST ASIA CHRISTIAN CONFERENCE, an organ of continuing fellowship and cooperation among the churches and Christian councils in East Asia, was founded in Kuala Lumpur, MALAYA, in 1959. By 1970, its membership included fourteen national Christian councils and seventy-five churches. At that time, its Chairman was D. T. NILES, of CEYLON, who was also the first General Secretary of the Conference. Other prominent Methodist leaders within the Conference include Bishop J. L. VALENCIA, of the Philippines; Bishop T. Lew of KOREA, Ho Seng Ong, of Singapore, V. K. Brown, of AUSTRALIA, B. E. Fernando, of Ceylon, and Bishop YAP KIM HAO, of SINGAPORE. Its secretariat includes members responsible for interchurch aid for mission and service, youth, the cooperation of men and women, and the life, message and unity of the Church.

JOHN EARLY

PAUL ELLINGTON

EAST COLUMBIA CONFERENCE (MES). (See OREGON.)

EAST GERMAN CONFERENCE, called the Eastern German Conference for the first two years, was organized in the Second Street Church, NEW YORK CITY, April 11, 1866 with Bishop EDMUND S. JONES presiding. The conference included all of the German language work of the M. E. Church east of the Allegheny Mountains. It had two districts, NEW YORK and PHILADELPHIA, twenty-two preachers, twenty-eight charges, and 2,450 members.

German Methodist work in New York City began in 1841 when a number of devout Germans who had united with English-speaking Methodist churches began holding German services in the church on Elizabeth Street. WILLIAM NAST, the father of German Methodism, heard of the New York services, visited the city, and addressed the NEW YORK CONFERENCE concerning the needs of German immigrants; and the conference adopted a resolution to start a German Mission in New York. Charles H. Doering, a German Methodist who had joined the PITTSBURGH CONFERENCE in 1841, was immediately transferred to New York to take charge of the work. In six months Doering gathered a mission of fifty-seven persons and then returned to Pittsburgh to begin a German mission there. Soon German Methodist work spread to Baltimore, Philadelphia, and other eastern cities.

In 1849 the entire German work in the east was organized as the German District in the New York Conference. In 1854 the conference added the Rochester German District.

In 1864 the General Conference organized three German conferences west of the Alleghenies and authorized the bishops to establish a German conference in the east if they deemed it advisable. Two years later the East German Conference was organized.

The churches of the East German Conference were nearly all in cities, but those of the western German conferences were mostly in rural areas. Most of the western German conferences merged with the overlying English-speaking conferences in the 1920's, while the East German Conference preserved its German-language identity until 1943.

The East German Conference gave support to the Berea Orphan Home and BALDWIN-WALLACE COLLEGE in Berea, Ohio. The conference maintained the Bethany Methodist Deaconess Hospital and the Bethany Home for the Aged in BROOKLYN, N. Y.

The East German Conference had about 5,500 members in 1900, and 4,000 in 1940. In 1943, its last year, the conference reported twenty-four charges, eighteen active and seventeen retired preachers, 3,309 members, and churches and parsonages valued at $1,027,000.

Fred H. Deming, The Onward Way Story of the New York Annual Conference. Saugerties, N. Y.: Catskill Mountain Publishing Corp., 1949.

P. F. Douglass, German Methodism. 1939.

Minutes of the East German Conference.

General Minutes, ME, TMC.

ALBEA GOBOLD

EAST MAINE CONFERENCE was created by the GENERAL CONFERENCE in 1848 which divided the MAINE CONFERENCE and consigned the new body all of the state of MAINE east of the Kennebec River. The Conference was organized at Bangor, Aug. 2, 1848, with Bishop ELIJAH HEDDING presiding. It had three districts, eighty-two charges, seventy-nine preachers, and 8,935 members.

At its first session the Conference elected a board of trustees with instructions to establish a conference school. In 1851 the East Maine Conference Seminary was opened at Bucksport, and by 1900 it had 312 students, an endowment of $20,000, and a plant valued at $30,000. In 1922 purportedly one-third of the members of the conference at that time had been students at the East Maine Conference Seminary. The school continued until 1933.

In 1922, its last year, the East Maine Conference reported two districts, 140 charges, ninety-six preachers, 10,479 members, and property valued at $1,141,475. In 1923 the conference was merged with the Maine Conference.

Allen and Pilsbury, Methodism in Maine. 1887.

General Minutes, ME.

Minutes of the East Maine Conference. ALBEA GOBOLD

EAST OHIO CONFERENCE (ME), was created by the 1876 GENERAL CONFERENCE which merged the Ohio part of the PITTSBURGH CONFERENCE and the Ohio part of the ERIE CONFERENCE. Essentially the territory of the new conference was Ohio east of the Muskingum and Tuscarara Rivers, including AKRON, and the city of Cleveland lying east of the Cuyahoga River. The Conference was organized at Steubenville, Sept. 20-26, 1876, with Bishop EDWARD R. AMES presiding. It had eight districts, 187 charges, 307 preachers, and 40,048 members.

At its first session the East Ohio Conference was invited to become a patronizing conference of OHIO WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, but replied that in justice to the educational institutions already under its patronage it could not accept the invitation at that time. Later the conference appointed a visiting committee to Ohio Wesleyan and recommended the school to the patronage of the people, while continuing to maintain relations with ALLEGHENY COLLEGE, Meadville, Pa., by electing members to that institution's board of control and by appointing visitors.

The East Ohio Conference joined other Ohio Conferences in launching the Methodist Children's Home near COLUMBUS and the Methodist Home for the Aged in CINCINNATI. It started St. Luke's Hospital in CLEVELAND in 1908. The official paper of the Conference was The Pittsburgh Christian Advocate.

In 1899, the membership of the conference was nearly 70,000, an increase of almost seventy-five percent in twenty-five years. In 1911, its last year, the conference reported seven districts, 258 charges, 84,928 members, and property valued at $5,417,250. In 1912 the conference merged with the NORTH OHIO CONFERENCE to form the NORTH-EAST OHIO CONFERENCE, the largest in the M. E. Church at the time.

General Minutes, ME.

Minutes of the East Ohio Conference.

M. Simpson, Cyclopaedia. 1878.

N. B. H.

EAST OKLAHOMA CONFERENCE. (See OKLAHOMA CONFERENCE, [MES], and OKLAHOMA CONFERENCE [TMC].)

EAST ORANGE, NEW JERSEY, U.S.A. Calvary Church is an outstanding church of the NORTHERN NEW JERSEY CONFERENCE (former NEWARK CONFERENCE), ministering effectively in an apartment-house, transient community. The church was organized in 1869 and its first pastor was Charles S. Ryman. A substantial brick chapel built in 1870 was succeeded by a large and imposing edifice on a new site at Main and Walnut Streets, East Orange, the new church being dedicated in 1887. Growing congregations and an expanding program necessitated several additions to the original structure. The longest pastorate in the history of the church was that of Fred Clare Baldwin, who served Calvary for nineteen years. An effective evangelism program, implemented by laymen through a "neighborhood lay ministry," has kept Calvary Church a dynamic force, in spite of rapid membership turnover. Calvary people are said to give as many manhours of church service as they give church dollars for the work of the Kingdom.

In 1970 Calvary reported 660 members, property valued at $1,214,860, and $73,098 raised for all purposes.

V. B. Hampton, Newark Conference. 1957.

William Adelbert Jones, History of Calvary. 1939.

Margaret C. Shaw, "History of Calvary," Manuscript.

VERNON B. HAMPTON

EAST TENNESSEE CONFERENCE (ME). (See TENNESSEE, TENNESSEE-KENTUCKY CONFERENCE, and TABLE OF METHODIST CONFERENCES.)

EAST TEXAS CONFERENCE (MES), called Eastern Texas Conference until 1847, was organized at Marshall on Feb. 4, 1846, with Francis Wilson presiding in the absence of Bishop JOSHUA SOULE who arrived later. The Eastern Texas Conference was organized in 1845 after the 1844 General Conference had authorized the division of the TEXAS CONFERENCE (ME) into the Eastern and Western Texas Conferences. (See TEXAS.) The 1846 session of the conference immediately voted to adhere South. The conference had 3,735 white and 694 colored members, three districts and sixteen charges. Three of its preachers were appointed to Wesley College which had been started at San Augustine in 1843. Unfortunately the conference lost the college in 1847, due to a defect in the charter. What is now LON MORRIS JUNIOR COLLEGE at Jacksonville came under the control of the conference in 1875.

The 1866 GENERAL CONFERENCE set off the Trinity Conference (called the NORTH TEXAS CONFERENCE after 1873) from the East Texas Conference. Before the division the conference had nine districts, sixty-four charges, and about 6,000 members. Five of the districts fell into the new conference, but thereafter the East Texas Conference grew rapidly; in 1868 it reported 6,676 members.

In 1902 the East Texas Conference was absorbed by the Texas Conference. The last session was held at Tyler, Dec. 4-9, 1901. At that time it had six districts, 97 pastoral charges, 36,696 members, and property valued at $425,016.

General Minutes, MES.

M. Phelan, Texas. 1924.

N. B. H.

EAST WISCONSIN CONFERENCE. (See WISCONSIN CONFERENCE.)

EASTER, JOHN, was an early American Methodist preacher who labored as an itinerant from 1782-95. Nothing seems to be known about his background or early life. From brief accounts left by those who knew him, his short ministry was extraordinarily successful, with unusual power in preaching and prayer. JESSE LEE comments frequently on his childlike trust in God.

In 1787, Easter was appointed to the Brunswick Circuit in VIRGINIA where, under his preaching, a great revival took place. Over 1,800 people were added to the church, and other thousands influenced for good. Among those converted and received into the church by Easter were WILLIAM MCKENDREE and ENOCH GEORGE. Later, both became bishops of the M. E. Church, and both have left testimonies of the power of Easter's preaching. He seems to have located after 1795, the date of his last recorded appointment, although Jesse Lee speaks of him as being actively engaged in preaching in 1795.

John Easter died in Virginia, leaving one son who served as a local preacher. Later the son became an Episcopal clergyman.

E. S. Bucke, History of American Methodism. 1964.

A. Stevens, History of the M. E. Church. 1867.

J. B. Wakeley, Heroes of Methodism. 1856.

C. WESLEY CHRISTMAN, JR.

EASTERN CONFERENCE (EUB). In 1963, seventeen years after the Church of the United Brethren in Christ and The Evangelical Church united to form the EVANGELICAL UNITED BRETHREN CHURCH, the East Pennsylvania Conference (UB) and the Northeastern Conference (Ev) united to form the Eastern Conference. This Conference extended from MAINE to the Mason-Dixon Line and from the Susquehanna River to the Atlantic Ocean. The majority of its members were concentrated in Berks, Dauphin, Lancaster, and Lebanon Counties, all in southeastern PENNSYLVANIA.

The history of Eastern Conference's two predecessor conferences was the history of the two former denominations. Both the Church of the United Brethren in Christ and The Evangelical Church had their beginnings in what became Eastern Conference territory. The original United Brethren Conference, which was formed in 1800, was divided in 1830 into the Virginia and Pennsylvania Conferences. This latter conference, also known as the Harrisburg and Eastern Conferences, was divided in 1846. At that time the conference which was formed east of the Susquehanna River assumed the name The East Pennsylvania Conference and retained this name until the conference was united with the Northeastern Conference (Ev) in 1963 to form The Eastern Conference. In 1869, the German-speaking churches of East Pennsylvania Conference formed the East German Conference; but these churches returned to the "mother" conference in 1901.

In 1862, largely due to the prompting of Sandusky Conference, the United Brethren in Christ established a Massachusetts Conference, but this conference was very short-lived.

The Evangelical Association on the other hand formed its New England Conference in 1896, and it continued until it was united in 1957 with the Atlantic Conference and the East Pennsylvania Conference (Ev) to form the Northeastern Conference. The Atlantic Conference, which had churches in several cities in NEW YORK, NEW JERSEY, PENNSYLVANIA, and MARYLAND, had been established in 1875 and existed until the formation of Northeastern Conference.

Within the borders of the Eastern Conference organized in 1963 were two colleges of the former E.U.B. Church: ALBRIGHT COLLEGE, Reading, Pa., begun in 1856 by the Evangelical Association, and LEBANON VALLEY COLLEGE, Annville, Pa., founded in 1866 by the United Brethren in Christ, Evangelical Manor, a home for the aged, was located in PHILADELPHIA.

The Eastern Conference was divided into two districts with 270 churches in 213 charges. It had 357 ministers, of whom 249 were under appointment. In 1967 it had a membership of 71,610, contributing $1,284,946 for missions and benevolences, providing $4,734,913 for other purposes, including a ministerial payroll of $1,484,806, and holding properties valued at $45,993,071. The conference maintained a Minister's Welfare Fund with assets that totaled almost $2,000,000. Beginning in 1916, it published The Eastern Conference Herald, which was mailed monthly to over 13,500 subscribers. Its Historical Society maintained an Archives Room in the Cossard Memorial Library at Lebanon Valley College. One of the National Historic Shrines of The United Methodist Church, the ALBRIGHT MEMORIAL CHAPEL, is located within the bounds of the former Eastern Conference, at Kleinfeltersville, Pa., adjacent to the cemetery where JACOB ALBRIGHT was buried.

In 1969, the conference united with the PHILADELPHIA CONFERENCE to form the Eastern Pennsylvania Conference, UMC. A number of churches in the Harrisburg area were transferred to the CENTRAL PENNSYLVANIA CONFERENCE and churches east of the Delaware River became affiliated with conferences in their respective states.

R. W. Albright, Evangelical Church. 1942.

A. W. Drury, History of the U.B. 1924.

P. B. Giblee, East Pennsylvania Conference. 1951.

HOWARD H. SMITH

EASTERN SWEDISH CONFERENCE was organized in Immanuel Church, Brooklyn, N. Y., April 24, 1901, with Bishop D. A. GOODSSELL presiding. Authorized by the M. E. GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1900, the conference included the Swedish missions and societies in the eastern states. It had twenty-eight charges, twenty-six preachers, some 3,500 members, and property valued at $384,300.

Swedish Methodism began in NEW YORK CITY in 1845. Peter Bergner, a Swedish layman, initiated shipboard services for Swedish sailors. With the help of the Methodist Missionary Society the noted BETHEL SHIP was fitted out as a meeting place. At the 1845 session of the NEW YORK CONFERENCE, OLAF G. HEDSTRÖM, who had been a Methodist circuit rider for ten years, was appointed to the "North River Mission," which was the Swedish ship lying at Pier 11, North River. Hedström met incoming ships from Scandinavian countries, distributed tracts, gave out Bibles provided by the AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY, and invited immigrants to services in the "John Wesley" or "Bethel Ship."

More Swedish missionaries were enlisted and the work spread. In 1850 Olaf Hedström assisted his brother Jonas with a revival in CHICAGO and a mission developed there. Hedström led in raising funds to build the Swedish Immanuel Church in BROOKLYN, dedicated in 1872. The Swedes now desired their own conferences, and the Northwest Swedish Conference, was organized at Galesburg, Ill., in 1877. In 1900 the Swedish brethren in the east petitioned the General Conference for permission to organize a conference to include the Swedish work from Maine to Delaware, and in 1901 the Eastern Swedish Conference was organized.

The Eastern Swedish Conference established the Bethel

Home for the Aged at Ossining, N. Y., and it strongly supported the Evanston (Illinois) Collegiate Institute which trained Swedish ministers. Today that institution continues as Methodist-related KENDALL (junior) COLLEGE.

Church membership in the Eastern Swedish Conference gradually increased until by 1913 it reached approximately 4,700. Thereafter it remained static until unification in 1939.

In 1940 the Eastern Swedish Conference voted to abide by the 1939 PLAN OF UNION which stipulated that an annual conference must have fifty ministers in full connection to continue as a conference. The conference requested up to two years to effect merger with the English-speaking conferences. Arrangements were perfected in one year, however, and the Eastern Swedish Conference was absorbed by the overlying English-speaking conferences on April 30, 1941.

At its last session in 1941, the Eastern Swedish Conference reported two districts, New England and New York, twenty-seven charges, twenty-six ministers, 3,966 members, and property valued at $1,084,400.

E. S. Bucke, History of American Methodism. 1964.

General Minutes, ME and TMC.

Minutes of the Eastern Swedish Conference.

C. G. Wallenius and E. D. Olson, A Short Story of the Swedish Methodism in America. Reprint from Vol. II, The Swedish Element in America. Chicago, 1931.

ALBEA GODBOLD

EAYRS ESSAY is a prize essay established in 1935 in memory of George Eayrs, British Methodist historian. Each essay must embody work of original research on some subject related to the history of Methodism. This annual essay is open to ministers of the British Methodist Church who have traveled not more than fifteen years. It was fitting that the first subject for the essay of 1935 was "John Wesley's Christian Library."

Wesley Historical Soc. Proceedings, xx. JOHN T. WILKINSON

EBENEZER ACADEMY, probably the first Methodist school in America (COKEsbury COLLEGE opened in 1787), was located near Merritt's Meetinghouse, Brunswick County, Va., on the road between Petersburg and Boydton, though the exact spot where its stone building 20 by 40 feet stood, is not known today. It is believed that Ebenezer opened in 1784 at least as a day school, though this is not authenticated by contemporary documents. However, about 1885, A. W. CUMMINGS, author of the reliable work, The Early Schools of Methodism, received a statement from the elderly son of Henry Merritt, pioneer preacher for whom Merritt's Meetinghouse was named, that Ebenezer Academy began in 1784. ASBURY first mentions the school in his Journal in 1794. A group sought a charter for the institution in 1796.

That Asbury should launch an elementary school in Brunswick County, Va., as early as 1784 is understandable. The county had been a Methodist stronghold since the great revival there in 1775-76 under the leadership of GEORGE SHADFORD and others. Believing strongly as Asbury did that Methodism must establish schools comparable to the KINGSWOOD SCHOOL in England (he was always lukewarm toward colleges, though he accepted Coke's plan and worked hard for Cokesbury College as long as it stood), the logical place to begin an elementary school was in a Methodist center that could give the project both financial and moral support.

Ebenezer Academy presented problems to Asbury. Among other things, he noted in his Journal that though the Methodists had raised money to start the academy, certain gentlemen in the county sought to wrest it from their hands. They soon did just that. Ebenezer continued for some years, but like many other Methodist institutions of learning since, it passed from Methodist control around 1800.

F. Asbury, Journal and Letters. 1958.

E. S. Bucke, History of American Methodism. 1964.

A. W. Cummings, Early Schools of Methodism. 1886.

ALBEA GODBOLD

EBRIGHT, DONALD F. (1910-), American missionary in INDIA from 1936 through 1958, was born at Bluff City, Kan., on March 15, 1910. He was educated in BAKER UNIVERSITY (B.A.), DREW THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY (B.D.), Hartford Seminary (M.A.), and the University of Chicago (Ph.D.). He served as pastor of English-language congregations in Lucknow and Kanpur; as district superintendent at Moradabad, and on the staff of the National Christian Council. He was a pioneer in India in the use of audio-visual aids for religious education and evangelism. Since retiring from India, Dr. Ebright has served as president of the Methodist University in ALASKA, and as secretary for the Meals for Millions Foundation. He was in 1966 Southern California representative of Church World Service. Mrs. Ebright (Elinor) is a daughter of Dr. and Mrs. Benson Baker.

Minutes of Lucknow Annual Conference, 1936-44, and North India Annual Conference, 1945-58. J. WASKOM PICKETT

ECAUSSINES D'EGHIEN, Belgium. The Methodist church here (French) was organized in 1924 following a revival under a gospel gent. The church and parsonage were built in 1926 by H. H. STANLEY. It is the head of a small Methodist circuit. Pastors have been J. Fischer, 1924-29; G. W. WILMOT, 1930-31; H. H. Stanley, 1932-37; A. Lheureux, 1938-56; J. Coviaux, 1957-59; Lester Griffith, 1959-60; and I. Steffek since 1966.

WILLIAM G. THONGER

ECKETT, ROBERT (1797-1862), British Methodist, main architect of the WESLEYAN METHODIST ASSOCIATION, was born at Scarborough, Yorkshire, on Nov. 26, 1797. His parents soon moved to London, where he became a successful builder. He was always a Wesleyan reformer; he wrote a pamphlet on the Leeds Organ Case (see PROTESTANT METHODISTS), he joined in the agitation resulting from the establishment of the Theological Institution in 1834 (see SAMUEL WARREN), and was expelled from the Wesleyan Methodist connection. He entered the ministry of the Wesleyan Methodist Association in 1838; he served gratuitously; he planned its Foundation Deed in 1840, stressing circuit independence and free representation in the Annual Assembly. In 1849, he wrote an incisive pamphlet entitled Methodist Reform, the Conference and the Fly Sheets Condemned, pointing out that the authors of the sheets were not sympathetic to lay aspirations. He shared in the creation of the UNITED METHODIST FREE CHURCHES in 1857; he was president of his denomination three times, and thirteen years editor. He died suddenly at Clevedon, Bristol, on July 28, 1862, on his way to the Annual Assembly.

M. Baxter, United Methodist Free Churches. 1865.

OLIVER BECKERLEGGE

ECKMAN, GEORGE PECK (1860-1920), American minister, church leader, and author, was born Jan. 8, 1860 in Gouldsborough, Pa. His father had been a presiding elder in the M. E. Church. Eckman was a graduate of Wyoming Seminary, DREW THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, and New York University where he received his Ph.D. degree in 1897. SYRACUSE UNIVERSITY awarded him both the D.D. and LL.D. degrees; Wesleyan University and HAMLINE UNIVERSITY presented him with honorary doctorates.

Eckman was ordained in the M. E. Church in 1886 in Newark, N. J. He served churches in several New JERSEY cities before he accepted a call to Saint Paul's in New York City, transforming it into one of the city's most prominent churches. While pastor at Saint Paul's, Eckman was listed as one of New York City's five great preachers.

In 1912, Eckman was elected editor of the New York Christian Advocate, but in 1915 he resigned to go to Elm Park Church, SCRANTON, Pa.

Eckman wrote a number of books on a wide variety of subjects. He was also active in Scranton civic activities, and led in seeking a solution to the problems caused by the mine cave-ins which were destroying the homes of many of the city's poor families. He died suddenly in 1920 at a meeting of the city's Board of Trade, after presenting a motion on behalf of the people displaced by the cave-ins.

The Methodist Year Book, 1921.

C. F. Price, Who's Who in American Methodism. 1916.

MARGARET ECKMAN

ECKSTEIN, HERBERT (1912-), German pastor of the Evangelical Methodist Church and Conference Superintendent since 1954, was born Dec. 10, 1912, in Berlin. He studied at the Theological Seminary (EUB), Reutlingen, 1935-38; was a member of the EUB East German Conference until 1968, and is presently Superintendent of the West Berlin Conference of the Evangelical Methodist Church. Prior to the act of church union, Dr. Eckstein was president of the EUB council of administration in Germany and chairman of the European uniting committee. Jointly with Bishop C. ERNST SOMMER, Dr. Eckstein represents the Church in both the Working Committee of Christian Churches in Germany and in the presidium of the Union of Evangelical Free Churches in Germany. On March 27, 1964, the Indiana Central College, Indianapolis, Ind., U.S.A. conferred on him the honorary D.D. degree. Up to 1969, he had participated in four General Conferences.

KARL STECKEL

ECUADOR is a country on the Pacific coast of South America, located at the equator, for which it is named. Low coastal areas are tropical, but the climate is moderate in the highlands. Much of the country is mountainous, and among Ecuador's twenty-two peaks are some of the highest volcanos of South America, Chimborazo being 29,577 feet. It is one of the smallest countries of South America (116,270 square miles and 4,726,000 people in 1963) and has the lowest percentage of Protestants (0.3 percent in 1960).

The country has mineral resources, largely undeveloped, but the present economy is based principally on agriculture (only twenty percent on industry). Ecuador is the world's largest exporter of bananas. Ecuador became independent at the break up of Simon Bolivar's Gran Colombia.

Once described by Bolivar as "a monastery," the country was under strong clerical influence through most of the nineteenth century, and through the aid of a series of proclerical rulers the Roman Catholic Church accumulated enormous land holdings.

The earliest recorded Methodist contact was in 1880, when J. G. Price, supporting himself by private teaching, organized a mission at Guayaquil which lasted only a few months.

The tireless Bible colporteur, FRANCISCO PENZOTTI visited Ecuador briefly from ARGENTINA in 1885 and again in 1888. Upon the latter visit a customs inspector was told that Penzotti's boxes contained Bibles. "As long as Chimborazo stands," said the inspector, "the Bible will not enter this country." Penzotti left, vowing to return, and years later fulfilled his promise, holding services and distributing quantities of books.

In 1893 Methodist work in South America was organized as an annual conference, and Ecuador was listed as a part of the PERU District. At the time of these early contacts, Protestant preaching was illegal in Ecuador. Active Evangelical work dates from 1895, when the liberal revolution of General Eloy Alfaro drastically reduced the influence of the Catholic hierarchy, and the Gospel Missionary Union and the Christian and Missionary Alliance established permanent work.

Within five years from that date, the Rev. and Mrs. Harry B. Compton, veteran workers in CHILE, visited Ecuador. Although their stay was short, they established Ecuador's first public normal school—an institution that continues today under government auspices.

In 1916 the Panama Congress assigned cooperating denominations to respective fields of work. Ecuador was listed for Methodists and the Christian and Missionary Alliance. The M. E. Church responded by assigning missionaries for a brief period, but because of stresses arising from the First World War, they were withdrawn.

During the intervening years, the Christian and Missionary Alliance, the Latin American Mission, and other theologically conservative groups continued to work in Ecuador. In 1943 the Committee on Cooperation in Latin America made a survey which led to formation of the United Andean Indian Mission by four denominations, including the United Brethren (later the Evangelical United Brethren) now in the United Methodist Church. The Methodist Church was invited to join, but the mission board felt unable to make additional commitments at the time. The United Andean Indian Mission began work in 1946, the same year that the church of the Brethren entered the field.

A 1961 survey by a team which included the Methodist leader from Bolivia, MURRAY S. DICKSON, recommended formation of a united church including the work of Latin American Methodists. This was accomplished in 1965.

In that year the United Evangelical Church of Ecuador was formed with the eleven congregations and three hundred members. Most of the work is within a hundred miles of the capital, Quito, but the United Church hopes to become truly national.

The Methodist missionaries arriving in 1965 were Mexicans, ULISES HERNANDEZ—both a minister and doctor of medicine—and his wife, Frances. They are presently sponsored by the Latin American Evangelical Mission Board, which represents the Methodist Latin American Central Conference, the autonomous Methodist churches in Latin America, and the Waldensian Church in Latin America. Dr. and Mrs. Hernandez are assigned to work with the United Evangelical Church.

MISS EUDOFILIA ARBOLEDA HAS TAUGHT SPANISH TO TWO GENERATIONS OF MISSIONARIES IN ECUADOR.

A unique Methodist is Eudofilia Arboleda, who was converted under the Comptons about 1900, and was the solitary representative of Methodism in the country during most of the years from 1900 until the arrival of Dr. and Mrs. Hernandez. She taught for several years in colleges of the United States and then returned to Ecuador, teaching in the normal school that the Comptons had founded.

United Brethren Work in Ecuador. In 1945 the United Brethren Church, together with the Presbyterian Church, U.S.A., the Presbyterian Church, U.S., and the Evangelical and Reformed Church formed the United Andean Indian Mission. The work has been initiated in northern Ecuador, and missionaries are at their tasks there to work among a tribe of a million and a half needy Indians. The first missionaries, the Rev. and Mrs. Paul H. Streich, began work in 1946. The mission was begun as an agricultural mission, and a farm was purchased at Picalqui, sixty miles from the capital of Ecuador. A fourfold program of evangelism, education, agriculture, and medical service was begun in 1946 and developed gradually through Sunday schools, Bible classes, home visitation, day school, clinic, and daily work on the farm.

When in 1965 The United Evangelical Church of Ecuador was organized, it embodied eleven congregations resulting from the work of the United Andean Indian Mission in addition to that of the Church of the Brethren.

The work of The United Evangelical Church of Ecuador has three ordained ministers, three primary schools, a student center, three dispensaries, one doctor, one nurse, and one practical nurse. The Evangelical United Brethren Church at the time of its joining the United Methodist Church supported four missionaries in Ecuador.

W. C. Barclay, History of Missions, 1957.

W. Stanley Rycroft and Myrtle M. Clemmer, A Factual Study of Latin America. New York: Commission on Ecumenical Mission and Relations, United Presbyterian Church, 1963.

Luis D. Salem, Francisco G. Penzotti, Apostol de la Libertad y la Verdad. Mexico City: Bible Societies of Latin America, 1963.

Robert Savage, "The Gospel Work in Ecuador." Unpublished manuscript, Voice of the Andes Headquarters, Quito, Ecuador.

EDWIN MAYNARD
LOIS MILLER

ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCES. (See WORLD METHODIST CONFERENCES.)

ECUMENICAL MOVEMENT AND BRITISH METHODISM.

The Ecumenical Movement is now usually dated from the INTERNATIONAL MISSIONARY CONFERENCE held at Edinburgh, Scotland, in 1910, though its roots ran deep into the nineteenth century. One element in the process was the tendency of the divided British Methodist churches to reunite after about 1870; on a wider scale this was echoed in the setting up of the ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE, which first met in 1881, and then at ten-year intervals except during periods of war. In 1951 the Conference, which met at Oxford, set up the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL, leaving the word "ecumenical" to the wider movement.

The Ecumenical Movement began as a striving after Protestant unity, but the Eastern Orthodox Churches became involved from the time of the Lausanne World Faith and Order Conference of 1927. British Methodism took part in the Ecumenical Movement from the beginning, and supported the formation of the CHURCH OF SOUTH INDIA in 1947, when for the first time episcopal and non-episcopal bodies, including the Anglicans and Methodists in South India, were united into a single church. In 1948 Methodist representatives shared in the formation of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES in Amsterdam: the World Council is neither a superchurch nor a substitute for local organic Christian unity. Conscious of the need for unity in Britain, British Methodism had been engaged in conversations with other churches ever since the Lambeth Conference of 1920 issued the famous Appeal to all Christian People.

In its reply to the Appeal the Wesleyan Methodist Conference of 1922 said that questions of the constitution and government of the church were the real dividing factors:

We are bound to state our own fundamental conviction that neither in our Lord's teaching nor in any part of the New Testament is one form of Church polity prescribed as essential to the Church; and that no particular form of ministry can claim the "direct commission of Christ" to his Apostles, as giving it an authority to which no others are entitled. (Bell, p. 113.)

There followed a series of joint Conferences between the Church of England and the British Free Churches, including the Methodist Churches; the first series ended in 1925 and a second series began after the Lambeth Conference of 1930. As a result three documents were published in 1938, The Outline of a Re-Union Scheme, The Practice of Inter-communion, and 1662 and Today.

The Re-Union Scheme resembled that which was the basis of the Church of South India, and included a plan for an organically united English Church which would be an episcopal church from the beginning. The Methodist Church (formed by the Union of 1932) thought that this scheme did not sufficiently allow for the free exercise of those differing forms of government and organization which had been granted to the various Free Churches in their separate existence; it was also stated that the doctrine of episcopacy must not be so applied as to exclude a united Church from communion with non-episcopal Churches; nor must episcopacy be regarded as so essential to the existence of the Church that it would not be free to follow the guidance of the Spirit to a change of polity.

It was 1941 before the FREE CHURCH FEDERAL COUNCIL published a report which summarized the views of the British Free Churches and made it clear that there was no hope of reunion on the basis of the proposed scheme. The Second World War prevented any further negotiation.

On Nov. 3, 1946, the Archbishop of Canterbury, Geoffrey Fisher, preached a sermon to the University of Cambridge which suggested a new approach to the problem of English reunion. In the meantime the BRITISH COUNCIL OF CHURCHES had been formed in 1943, and Methodism in Britain was committed both to this and to the final form of the Church of South India. In his sermons the archbishop suggested that the British Free Churches should consider the possibility of taking episcopacy into their systems, as a prior step toward full English constitutional reunion. On this basis conversations between the Free Churches and the Anglican Church were reopened in January 1947, when the Methodist representatives were R. NEWTON FLEW, HAROLD ROBERTS, and H. WATKIN JONES. As a result of these conversations, a report was issued in 1950 under the title Church Relations in England, which discussed the problems which the archbishop's plan would involve, and left it to individual churches "to decide whether, as a result of our work, they shall enter upon the stage of definite negotiations." In the meantime, groups of theologians had set to work to look at the more detailed theological considerations underlying British disunity, and there were published Catholicity, which represented the mind of the High Anglican and Anglo-Catholic section of the Church of England; The Fullness of Christ, which represented what is generally called the moderate and Evangelical section of Anglican opinion; and The Catholicity of Protestantism, a volume published in 1950 and edited by Newton Flew and RUPERT DAVIES, both Methodists. Thirteen Free Church theologians contributed, of whom five were Methodist, the others being GORDON RUPP, Philip Watson, and Kenneth Grayston. The book set out a very strong criticism of the version of Protestantism which had figured in Catholicity. The British Methodist Conference of 1953 approved a proposal of its Faith and Order Committee that the Methodist Church "would be prepared to proceed to a further state in the promotion of Intercommunion with the Church of England." The conditions then put forward for any further negotiations were fundamental, and have never been surrendered: the British Conference said that it would need to be satisfied that "the Church of England acknowledges that our divisions are within the Christian body which is throughout in a state of schism"; that "the same liberty of interpretation of the nature of episcopacy and of priesthood would be accorded to the Methodist Church as prevails in the Church of England"; and that the Methodist Church would not, if it took episcopacy into its system, be required to go out of communion with Churches with which relations of intercommunion already existed.

The Convocations of Canterbury and York replied to these conditions in 1955, and the Methodist Conference was so far satisfied with the reply that further conversations were authorized: no other Free Church was willing to open fresh talks with the Church of England. Meetings between Methodist and Anglican representatives began in July 1956. An Interim Statement, which really said that there was sufficient common theological ground to justify organic union if the problems of church government could be solved, was issued in 1958, but no further concrete step was proposed. The Methodist representatives were: HAROLD ROBERTS, ERIC BAKER, LESLIE DAVISON; DOROTHY FARRAR, who was then vice-principal of the Wesley Deaconess College and had been vice-president of the Conference in 1952; THOMAS JESSOP, vice-president of the Conference of 1955; W. Walker Lee, chairman of the Bolton and Rochdale District; C. D. Monahan, superintendent of the South London Mission; Philip Race, vice-president of the Conference of 1957; E. G. Rupp; W. E. SANGSTER; N. SNAITH; and LESLIE WEATHERHEAD. The final Report on the Conversations was issued in 1963; Monahan and Sangster had died, and Weatherhead had withdrawn because of ill health; new members were therefore added: Kingsley Barrett; Thomas Meadley, then principal of CLIFF COLLEGE; and Marcus Ward, tutor at Richmond College, Surrey.

When this Report was published, it was found that the Methodist representatives had divided. The majority produced a report, signed also by the Anglican representatives, which recommended that the British Methodist Church should proceed to take episcopacy into its system, bearing in mind the safeguards about its nature and consequences which the Methodist Conference had laid down in the past. The first step would be the holding of Services of Reconciliation, in which the ministry of both churches would take part; these would be followed by the consecration of bishops elected by the Methodist Conference for the Methodist Church. Thereafter, all Methodist ordination would be done by bishops. It would not be the intention to proceed from this straight to organic union; instead, the two churches would grow together over a period of at least a generation.

This Report of 1963 also contained a Dissentient View signed by four of the Methodist representatives, C. K. Barrett, T. E. Jessop, T. Meadley, and N. Snaith. The dissentients took the view that the proposals outlined above were unacceptable, chiefly on the ground that no sufficient case had been made out for Methodism accepting the historic episcopate, even with the safeguards laid down by the Conference. Two years of debate followed. In 1965 the Methodist Conference, meeting at Plymouth, endorsed the Majority Report, as it came to be called, as a way forward to the achievement of full communion between the two churches. The Church of England also accepted the Majority Report. New committees—to report to their respective churches in 1968—were set up to consider the practical application of the principles set out in the Majority Report.

New committees reported to their respective churches by 1968 with a document called "Anglican-Methodist Unity, the Scheme." This was a plan for the application of the principles laid down in the Majority Report. On this occasion there was again a formal dissent, this time by the Anglican Evangelical leader, J. I. Packer, principal of Tyndale Hall Seminary, Bristol. The proposals put forward were voted on in the course of 1969. The Methodist Synods and Conference voted heavily in favor of the scheme, but in the Convocations of the Church of England, it failed to obtain the decisive majority that was felt to be necessary: not only the Anglican Evangelicals, but also most Anglo-Catholics, voted against the plan. No further steps could therefore be taken for the time being, and it was widely felt that the impetus for unity in Britain had declined seriously.

Throughout the period of these negotiations the Methodist Church was also a member of the Free Church Federal Council, and therefore in full communion with the other English Free Churches. Some opinion in the Free Churches would have liked to see the establishment of a United Free Church of England, but nothing came of the idea. A proposal was made by an American Methodist at the English Conference of 1964 for a union of American and English Methodism, but in general English Methodists felt that national union must come before any wider union. An important background fact was the meeting of British theologians and church leaders, held under the auspices of the British Council of Churches at Birmingham in 1964, at which a famous resolution was passed challenging the British Churches in the Council to unite by 1980. Those who were present could not commit their own churches, but the effect of the resolution on the ecumenical climate in Britain was considerable. A further stimulus to activity was the reign of Pope John XXIII (see the Decree, De Oecumenismo, of the Second Vatican Council, dated Nov. 21, 1964).

For nineteenth century efforts at Anglican-Methodist reunion, see From Uniformity to Unity, 1662-1962 (O. Chadwick, ed., 1962). See for the twentieth century the reports mentioned in the text, and the three series on Documents on Christian Unity (G.K.A. Bell, ed.) starting from 1920. JOHN KENT

ECUMENICITY AND THE UNITED METHODIST CHURCH.

Methodist ecumenical concern began with John Wesley's love for the unity of the church and his strong opposition to any separation of the Methodists from the Church of England. Although his close-knit organization and the acquisition of property by the Methodists probably made it inevitable, Wesley never favored separation and some contend that he was reluctant even to approve the formation of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States because it amounted to final separation from the Church of England.

Early Methodist ecumenical involvement came through inconspicuous cooperation with other denominations in England, and throughout the world and, in the United States, through scattered negotiations for intercommunion and union with other denominations. The earliest such negotiations consisted of private and unauthorized correspondence and conversation between Bishop THOMAS COKE and Protestant Episcopal Bishop William White concerning the union of their two denominations in 1791 (see COKE-WHITE CORRESPONDENCE). The first official conversations, aimed at intercommunion, were initiated by CHRISTIAN NEWCOMER of the United Brethren and were carried on between the BALTIMORE and PHILADELPHIA

CONFERENCES of the M. E. Church and the Church of the United Brethren in Christ during the years 1809-14. Intermitently from 1843 to 1871, WILLIAM NAST spearheaded an unsuccessful drive to unite the M. E. Church and the Evangelical Association.

In spite of these developments, Methodists in the United States were being divided. JAMES O'KELLY led a dissident group out of the M. E. Church in 1792; the AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH was formed in 1816, the AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL ZION CHURCH, in 1820; the METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH in 1828; and the WESLEYAN METHODIST CHURCH in 1843. In 1844 the division of the M. E. Church occurred and the M. E. Church, South was organized; the FREE METHODIST CHURCH was organized in 1860, and the Colored (now CHRISTIAN) METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH was organized from and by the M. E. Church, South in 1870. Obviously, the spirit of separation was stronger than the ecumenical spirit in nineteenth century American Methodism.

The turn toward union came in the form of cooperative organizations on a worldwide and a nationwide basis. Beginning in 1881, an ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE was held every ten years (except in wartime, 1941) and finally, in 1951, the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL was formed to facilitate cooperative work among Methodists throughout the world. Bishop IVAN LEE HOLT, ELMER T. CLARK, and E. BENSON PERKINS were especially instrumental in the formation of this organization.

Beginning in the late nineteenth century, other ecumenical developments were taking place, and a Methodist layman, JOHN R. MOTT, who has been rightly acclaimed as Methodism's chief contribution to the Ecumenical Movement, had a formative influence on most of them. He was active in the formation of the STUDENT VOLUNTEER MOVEMENT (1856-89), the WORLD STUDENT CHRISTIAN FEDERATION (1895), and was an organizer and the presiding officer of the WORLD MISSIONARY CONFERENCE at Edinburgh in 1910 which eventuated in the INTERNATIONAL MISSIONARY COUNCIL (1921), the Life and Work Movement (1925), and the Faith and Order Movement (1927). The last two of these organizations came together in 1948 to form the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and John R. Mott served as the first honorary president of this organization.

Most branches of Methodism have been represented in these organizations and significant contributions to the ecumenical movement have also come from individual Methodist leaders such as John R. Mott, Bishop FRANCIS J. MCCONNELL, Bishop G. BROMLEY OXNAM, and others. Bishop Oxnam and CHARLES PARLIN, a Methodist layman, have served as presidents of the World Council of Churches.

Cooperative councils were likewise being formed on a national level such as the FEDERAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES in the United States (1908), which united with several other cooperative groups in 1950 to form the NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES of Christ in the United States of America. The major American Methodist denominations were charter members of these groups.

In recent years the most significant developments in Methodist ecumenical activity have come in the field of organic church union. The most impressive Methodist reunion in America was the merging in 1939 of the Methodist Episcopal Church, the Methodist Episcopal Church,

South, and the Methodist Protestant Church to form The Methodist Church. (See UNITING CONFERENCE.)

The Methodist Church has not been notably successful in its negotiations for unions across denominational lines. During the early years of the twentieth century the Methodist Protestant Church carried on unsuccessful negotiations with the Church of the United Brethren in Christ, and later (1928-32), the Methodist Episcopal Church had a similar experience with the Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. Between 1948 and 1958 The Methodist Church engaged in inconclusive conversations concerning intercommunion with the Protestant Episcopal Church. But, by 1958, The Methodist Church was involved in more hopeful negotiations with the EVANGELICAL UNITED BRETHREN CHURCH which had been formed in 1946 by a union of the Church of the United Brethren in Christ and The Evangelical Church. A decision on the proposed union of these two denominations came in November, 1966, when a special session of the Methodist General Conference met simultaneously with the EUB General Conference in Chicago to vote on the PLAN OF UNION. The vote was favorable, the annual conferences of both denominations approved the proposed union in 1967, and the uniting conference for The United Methodist Church was held in 1968 at Dallas, Texas.

While engaged in their own private negotiations, both The Methodist Church and the Evangelical United Brethren along with the A.M.E. Church, the A.M.E. Zion Church, the C.M.E. Church and five other denominations participated in the CONSULTATION ON CHURCH UNION which was launched in 1960. The announced goal of the Consultation (commonly referred to as COCU) is a united church which is "truly catholic, truly evangelical, truly reformed" and in 1966 a set of "Principles of Church Union" were approved for study and guidance in preparing a specific plan of union to be submitted to the participating denominations. The 1968 GENERAL CONFERENCE of The United Methodist Church gave specific authority to its Commission on Ecumenical Affairs to participate in the development of a COCU plan of union which was completed in April 1970 and submitted to the member denominations for their study and action. Meetings pursuant to this are continuing.

The A.M.E. Church, the A.M.E. Zion Church, and the C.M.E. Church are also considering a union (aside from their involvement in COCU) which could be culminated by the mid 1970's.

In other lands, autonomous descendants of the Methodist Church have entered two united churches: The United Church of Japan (Kyodan) (see JAPAN) was organized in 1941 partly as a result of pressure from the Japanese government; and in 1969 the Church of North INDIA was formed after forty years of negotiations. The United Methodist Church is actively participating in negotiations for national, or geographically limited unions, in other overseas areas. The 1968 General Conference granted permission to United Methodists in fourteen countries to become autonomous or enter united churches as they develop, and such negotiations may be expected to result in closer unions in the near future.

Many of these negotiations have pointed up a significant difference in the attitudes of British and American Methodists toward overseas autonomy and union. British Methodism has been more inclined than American Methodism to encourage its overseas branches toward autonomy and to seek union with denominations outside the Methodist family both at home and abroad (as in the United Church of Canada and the Church of South India).

Within The United Methodist Church (and, especially in The Methodist Church before the 1968 union) there has been a pronounced difference of opinion between those who favor union within the Methodist family on a national and world-wide basis, and those who feel that intra-Methodist union has run its course as a separate phenomenon. These favor union across denominational lines both at home and overseas in line with the goal of union of "all in each place" as suggested by the New Delhi Conference of the World Council of Churches.

Between 1950 and 1964, the Methodist family union sentiment prevailed in the Methodist Commission on Church Union. However, since 1964, when this commission was succeeded by a permanent Commission on Ecumenical Affairs, the larger view—regional not family unions—has more nearly characterized the statements and actions of the commission. This latter view was evident in a statement from the commission entitled "The United Methodist Church and the Cause of Christianity Unity" (published in pamphlet form as "On the Ecumenical Road") which was approved by the 1968 General Conference. However, these two points of view still remain distinct in 1970 in The United Methodist Church and they will have an important bearing on the denomination's decision on COCU and other possibilities for its future.

Other ecumenical actions of the 1968 General Conference include (1) an invitation to the A.M.E., A.M.E. Zion, and C.M.E. Churches to negotiate for union in addition to the negotiations through COCU; (2) an agreement with British Methodism which calls for reciprocal official voting delegates at the respective General Conferences (reflecting the result of American and British Methodist consultations in 1964 and 1968) also extending this agreement to other autonomous Methodist Churches; and (3) a provision for a World Methodist Congress, initiated by COSMOS, for the purpose of considering the future structure of world Methodism.

A General Secretary of the Commission on Ecumenical Affairs was chosen in 1964, Dr. Robert W. Huston.

The increase in Protestant-Roman Catholic fellowship following the Second Vatican Council (1962-65) has increased the importance of world denominational (or confessional) organizations such as the World Methodist Council, the Roman Catholic Church having chosen the World Methodist Council to be responsible for all Methodist observers to Vatican II. The World Methodist Council also cooperated in arranging Methodist-Roman Catholic theological consultations at Ariccia, Italy (1967); London (1968); Malta (1969); and Lake Junaluska (1970); where basic theological differences and similarities between these two communions were discussed. Another significant development in relations with Roman Catholics was the appointment in 1968 of Dr. J. Robert Nelson of BOSTON UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY as the first Protestant theologian to serve as visiting Professor at the Roman Catholic Gregorian University in Rome.

A large and authoritative literature has appeared dealing with this movement. Paul F. Blankenship, History of Negotiations for Union Between Methodists and Non-Methodists in the United States (Doctoral Dissertation, Northwestern University, 1965; University Microfilms, Ann Arbor, Mich. #65-12,051); Robert McAfee Brown, ed., The Challenge to Reunion (McCraw-Hill, 1963);

Rupert Davies, Methodists and Unity (New York: Morehouse-Barlow Co., 1962); Galen M. Fisher, John R. Mott, Architect of Co-operation and Unity (New York: Association Press, 1952); Paul N. Garber, The Methodists Are One People (Nashville: Cokesbury Press, 1939); Ivan Lee Holt and Elmer T. Clark, The World Methodist Movement (Nashville: The Upper Room, 1956); George L. Hunt and Paul Crow, eds., Where We Are in Church Union (New York: Association Press, 1965); James K. Mathews, A Church Truly Catholic (Nashville: Abingdon Press, 1969); Paul M. Minus, Jr., ed., Methodism's Destiny In An Ecumenical Age (Nashville: Abingdon Press, 1969); John M. Moore, The Long Road to Methodist Union (Nashville: Methodist Publishing House, 1943); John R. Mott, Methodists United for Action (Nashville: Methodist Board of Missions, 1939); J. Robert Nelson, Church Union in Focus (Boston: United Church Press, 1967); J. Robert Nelson, "Methodism and the Ecumenical Movement," History of American Methodism (Nashville: Abingdon Press, 1964), vol. 3, pp. 565-81; Albert C. Outler, Methodist Observer at Vatican II (Westminster, Md.: Newman Press, 1967); Albert C. Outler, That the World May Believe (Methodist Board of Missions, 1966); Henry D. Rack, The Future of John Wesley's Methodism (Richmond: John Knox Press, 1965); James H. Straughn, Inside Methodist Union (Nashville: Methodist Publishing House, 1958). (See also NEGRO METHODIST UNION NEGOTIATIONS.)

PAUL F. BLANKENSHIP

EDDINS, JOSEPH SAMUEL (1893-1954), American M. P. minister, was born on Feb. 18, 1893, near Pineapple, Ala. At the age of seventeen he became a local preacher, graduating later from BIRMINGHAM-SOUTHERN COLLEGE and WESTMINSTER THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY; finally uniting with the Alabama Conference of the M. P. Church. In addition to his successful pastorates he became president of his Conference. He was a member of the M. P. Commission on Methodist Union, of all the GENERAL CONFERENCES of his Church from 1920 to 1939, of the UNITING CONFERENCE, the 1940 General Conference of The Methodist Church, and a reserve delegate to every succeeding session until his death. He died Nov. 25, 1954, while serving the Decatur district of the NORTH ALABAMA CONFERENCE.

W. A. SHELTON

EDDY, FRANCIS ROLLIN (1882-), American Wesleyan Methodist minister and General Conference president, was born Aug. 1, 1882 near Wolcottville, Ind., and received his formal education at Houghton Seminary, Houghton, N. Y., where he graduated in 1904. He became a member of the Indiana WESLEYAN METHODIST Conference in 1904 and served as conference secretary from 1906-19 and as vice president from 1919-27. In 1931 he was elected Sunday School Secretary and Editor. He served continuously on the Book Committee (later known as the Board of Administration) from 1927-59. In 1935 he was elected vice president of the General Conference and Publishing Agent. In 1939 he became president of the General Conference, serving two four-year terms. Dr. Eddy held the position of Publishing Agent until 1959 after the publishing operation had been moved from Syracuse, N. Y., to Marion, Ind. Under his wise administration the publishing business increased five times in volume and inventories. He served as chairman of the Committee on Education during the General Conference session of 1924, and wrote the section of the Discipline placing all Wesleyan Methodist Colleges under the direct control of the Denominational Board. He was an effective member of the Indiana conference for fifty-five years. Now retired, Dr. Eddy lives in Syracuse.

GEORGE E. FAILING

EDDY, THOMAS MEARS (1823-1874), American pastor, editor, and board secretary, was born the son of a Methodist preacher near Cincinnati, Ohio, Sept. 7, 1823. He was admitted into the INDIANA CONFERENCE in 1842, and in the next twelve years served four circuits and four stations including Jeffersonville; Third Street, Madison; and Brookville. In 1854 he was appointed agent for the AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY, and in 1855 he was assigned as presiding elder of the Indianapolis District. In November 1856, he became editor of the Northwestern Christian Advocate in Chicago and served for twelve years, increasing the circulation of the paper from 14,000 to 30,000. Failing of reelection as editor at the 1868 GENERAL CONFERENCE, he was appointed as pastor of Trinity Church, CHICAGO, in October of that year. In March, 1869 he transferred to the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE and was assigned to the Charles Street Church, BALTIMORE. During three years there he helped to build the Mount Vernon Church of that city. In March, 1872, the conference sent him to Metropolitan Church, Washington, D. C., and elected him a delegate to General Conference (an honor accorded him three times previously by other conferences). Two months later the General Conference elected him as one of the general missionary secretaries of the church. Eddy was known as a strong preacher. Alive to all public issues in church and state, he was a forceful writer. During and after the Civil War, his editorials were not at all conciliatory toward the South or the Southern Methodist Church. He supported the Union and was zealous for the advancement of the M. E. Church. He died in New York City, Oct. 7, 1874.

General Minutes, ME.

Minutes of the Baltimore Conference, 1875.

M. Simpson, Cyclopaedia. 1878.

JESSE A. EARL
ALBEA GODBOLD

EDENS, ARTHUR HOLLIS (1901-1968), American University president and foundation executive, was born at Grove, Tenn., Feb. 14, 1901.

He received his training at Cumberland Mountain School, Crossville, Tenn.; EMORY UNIVERSITY; the University of Chicago; and Harvard University, where he received a Ph.D. degree in 1949. Eight universities and colleges conferred honorary degrees upon him.

He taught in Cumberland Mountain School, 1926-27; assistant principal, 1929-30; principal, 1930-37; was division executive and associate dean of Emory Junior College, Valdosta, Ga., 1937-42. He was dean of the undergraduate division of Emory University, 1942-44; associate professor of political science, 1944-47; dean of administration, 1946; was vice chancellor, University System, State of Georgia, 1947; associate director of the General Education Board, Rockefeller Foundation, 1948; president of DUKE UNIVERSITY, 1949-60; executive director Mary Reynolds Babcock Foundation, Inc., in 1961.

He served as member of the advisory board Air Training Command, 1954-56; president, National Commission on Accrediting, 1954-60, Southern University Conference, 1958-59; member U. S. Advisory Commission on Educational Exchange, 1954-60. Trustee of Emory University, 1963 to 1968. Member executive committee of the North Carolina Fund, 1963-68. Member of the National Association Schools and Colleges of The Methodist Church (president, 1954); Southern Association of Colleges and Secondary Schools (executive committee, 1949-53, 57-60); American Academy Political and Social Science, Academy of Political Science, American Political Science Association. He was a member of the Southeastern Jurisdictional Conference of The Methodist Church in 1956 and 1960.

He was married to Mary Kathleen Bussell on Dec. 24, 1930.

Edens moved to Atlanta after retiring from his work with the Babcock Foundation and became an active member of the Board of Trustees of Emory University. He died Aug. 7, 1968. After his death, the Board of Trustees of Emory said of him: "Dr. Edens' impressive stature, his rugged features, his commanding voice, and his wise words combined to give him the image of great strength of character . . . reflecting the inner strength of this good Christian man."

Who's Who in America, Vol. 34.

Who's Who in The Methodist Church. 1966.

J. MARVIN RAST

EDGEHILL COLLEGE, Belfast, Ireland. Theological training for the ministry of the Methodist Church in Ireland was transferred in 1919 to Edgehill, purchased in that year from the METHODIST COLLEGE where it had hitherto been undertaken. The 1926 Methodist College Act of the Parliament of Northern Ireland effected the legal separation of this theological department from the Methodist College itself. In 1951 Edgehill College was recognized as a constituent college of Queen's University, Belfast, in its faculty of theology. There were eleven theological students in residence in 1966, and their course of studies is a joint one with Assembly's College of the Presbyterian Church of Ireland. Edgehill is also used as a residential hostel for lay students at Queen's University. Principals of Edgehill have been John C. Robertson, 1920-31; Alexander McCrea, 1931-43; WILLIAM L. NORTHRIDGE, 1943-57 and 1961-62; R. Ernest Ker, 1957-61; and Richard Greenwood, 1962-

FREDERICK JEFFERY

EDISON, MINA MILLER (1865-1947), American lay woman and wife of Thomas A. Edison, the inventor, was born at Akron, Ohio. Her father, LEWIS MILLER, was associated with Bishop JOHN H. VINCENT and JESSE LYMAN HURLBURN in the founding of the CHAUTAUQUA Assembly. She attended Mrs. Johnson's Seminary in Boston, Mass., where she met a young inventor, Thomas A. Edison, at the home of friends. After he had taught her the Morse code, a whirlwind courtship followed, and a proposal of marriage by use of the code. Their marriage took place in Akron on Feb. 24, 1886. A daughter and two sons were born to them. One son, Charles, served as governor of NEW JERSEY from 1941-43. Mrs. Edison was for many years an active and generous member of the ORANGE (N. J.) Methodist Church. She died on Aug. 24, 1947 and is buried beside her husband at Glenmont.

New York Times and Newark (N. J.) Evening News, Aug. 25, 1947.

HENRY L. LAMBDIN

EDITORS, CHURCH, and PUBLISHING AGENTS. From its beginnings Methodism has encouraged and been instrumental in publishing "books, tracts, and periodicals." JOHN WESLEY saw the great value of providing Christian literature to his constituency, and, indeed, to everyone. He abridged and published many devotional and religious books of his time, and wrote articles, tracts, letters, and sermons which today fill many volumes of his Works.

During his lifetime, Wesley selected various persons to assist him in managing the book interests and in printing his magazine; but he, himself, was editor of the magazine, and all books were published under his immediate inspection. After his death, the publishing interests devolved upon the Conference, and from time to time that body elected a BOOK STEWARD who had general charge of the work. With the development of the publishing business, certain changes in organizational procedures and editorial supervision came about. (See CONNECTIONAL EDITOR.)

With the beginning of the Book Concern in America in 1789 for the publication of books—and in time church papers and periodicals—there arose a need for competent persons to act as editors. Since the business was church-centered, the men usually selected were clergymen, who by reason of personal talent or disposition had a gift for editorial work. There was some question in early days as to the wisdom of appointing ministers to be editors, and GENERAL CONFERENCE records reveal many debates dealing particularly with the question of how many times an editor might be reappointed to his post in an itinerant ministry. Indeed, it is said that one reason PHILADELPHIA asked for the removal of the Book Concern to another city was in order that the Book Steward, EZEKIEL COOPER, might be forced to "travel" as did the other itinerants. JOHN DICKINS, who first managed the Book Concern and who really began it, was appointed again and again by ASBURY to stations in Philadelphia so that he might continue to live there and manage the Book Concern. As other ministers had to move every two or three years, they murmured at this specialized treatment for Dickins and later for Ezekiel Cooper. To rectify this seeming injustice, Philadelphia requested the removal of the Book Concern to another city. NEW YORK and BALTIMORE both bid heatedly for it, with New York winning by a very slight majority.

Subsequently, editors were elected by the General Conference to have charge of the official publications of the church, and the bishops were "requested" to appoint them to their position. However, the situation which Asbury faced with Dickins in Philadelphia continued to arise in the General and annual conferences, and eventually editors were placed in a special category with no time limit as to the number of years they might serve.

Late in the life of the Methodist Episcopal Churches, the connectional editors were not always elected by the General Conference, but by the respective Book Committees of the Churches, who also were allowed to fill vacancies between sessions of the General Conference. At unification in 1939, the Board of Publication (which took the place of the former Book Committees) was directed to elect the Publishing Agents, the BOOK EDITOR, and the Editor of The Christian Advocate. The editor of church school publications was to be elected by the BOARD OF EDUCATION of the church. A periodical, The Methodist Review, had been discontinued by that time, but Religion in Life, the successor of the Reviews, was ordered to be published by the Publishing House with the Book Editor as its editor.

American Methodism has been blessed with some truly great editors, and the Christian Advocate, when managed by such minds as Bishop FOWLER, JAMES BUCKLEY, or the Nashville Advocate by E. E. HOSS, or The Methodist Reviews by thinkers like MILEY or SUMMERS or TIGERT, made a great impact upon the thinking of the church. It was said in the M. E. Church that people did not know what to think about current affairs until they read Buckley's editorials each week.

Publishing Agents, first called Book Stewards, at first had large responsibilities in the editorial field. When these appointments were made, the second person named was known as the "Assistant," until 1872, when the two agents were made co-ordinate. In 1916, when three agents were elected, these were also made coordinate.

Only ministers were selected for these positions until 1872 when JOHN M. PHILLIPS was elected. Since then other laymen have been chosen. At the time of unification, a clerical agent and a lay agent were elected to share the responsibilities and duties of the office. In practice the clerical agent acted as liaison man for the general church connection and the lay agent carried on the publishing activities. The M. E. General Conference of 1912 unified the two separate Book Concerns, as they had been since the CINCINNATI office had been established in 1820-24. There became again one Book Concern with headquarters and publishing houses at New York and branches at Cincinnati and CHICAGO. (See Appendix for list of editors and publishing agents.)

J. P. Pilkington, Methodist Publishing House. 1968.

M. Simpson, Cyclopaedia. 1878.

N. B. H.

EDITORS, CONNEXIONAL Br. (See Connexional Editors Br.)

EDMONTON, Alberta, Canada. GEORGE McDUGALL, founder of Methodism in Alberta, began to visit Fort Edmonton regularly in 1862. Nine years later he became superintendent of the Edmonton mission. During the year 1872-73 he built the first Methodist and indeed the first Protestant church in Edmonton, a small frame building, with a pulpit constructed by him. The first congregational meeting was held on Jan. 12, 1874, at which time the people committed themselves formally to the extension of missions, especially to the Indians of the western territories.

In 1875, McDougall left his foundation, but services continued regularly. In 1892, the old church, which survives as a shrine, was moved and a new church named McDougall Church was constructed. As the city grew, Grace Church was founded in 1905, with the future United Church moderator, AUBREY S. TUTTLE, as its first minister. In 1910, the present McDougall Church was opened by its growing congregation. At Union in 1925, it became McDougall United Church.

Throughout its existence, McDougall Church has sought to play a role commensurate with its place in what after 1905 was the capital of Alberta. It has supported Alberta

College, an important Methodist and United Church institution; it has inspired the mission to the Indians, and it has helped to keep alive an awareness of the history of the west. This was symbolized most aptly by the fiftieth anniversary celebration in which participated the sons of HENRY STEINHAUER, two daughters of George McDougall, PETER ERASMUS and JOHN MACLEAN, all of whom were associated with the conversion of the Indians. When, in 1960, the General Council of the United Church met in McDougall Church, it was able to recall and to celebrate a century of Christian activity in the western provinces.

Nineteenth Anniversary of McDougall United Church. Edmonton, 1961. G. S. FRENCH

EDMUNDS, ARTHUR (1872-1961), South African missionary, was born at Hulcott, England in 1872 and came to SOUTH AFRICA in 1896. After periods of service in Zululand, East London and Idutywa, he was sent to Palmerton, Western Pondoland, where he spent thirty-two years (1909-1940). Palmerton was located in a primitive tribal area sometimes termed "the Siberia of the ministry." Edmunds set out to evangelize the circuit and later established an Evangelists' Training Center which offered a six-month course to men from all over South Africa. The need for Christian literature in the vernacular led him to establish the Palmerton Press of which he was editor, publisher and manager. Among its publications was his Xhosa commentary on Ephesians and the magazine Indada-zovuyo (Joyful News) which circulated throughout the country. After his retirement in 1940, Edmunds edited a cyclostyled magazine, Opportunity, and served five years as a prison chaplain. He died near Benoni, Transvaal, on May 23, 1961.

G. Mears, Arthur Edmunds—Servant of God (Methodist Missionary Monograph).
Minutes of South African Conference, 1961. G. MEARS

EDMUNDSON, JONATHAN (1766-1842), one of Wesley's preachers, was born in 1766. With the idea of entering the ministry of the Church of England, he graduated as M.A., but having joined the Methodist society, he became an itinerant preacher in 1786. He was secretary of the WESLEYAN METHODIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY, 1814-15, and president of the Conference in 1818. He was the author of a number of books, including Short Sermons and An Essay on the Christian Ministry. He died on July 7, 1842.

Minutes of Wesleyan Methodist Conference, 1842.
G. Smith, Wesleyan Methodism. 1857-61. G. ERNEST LONG

EDNEY, SAMUEL (1768-1844), the first American Methodist preacher appointed west of the Blue Ridge Mountains, was born in Pasquotank County, N. C., in 1768, licensed to preach in 1790, and ordained by Bishop ASBURY in 1813. He served successively the New Hope, Bladen, Swannanoa and Yadkin Circuits, and then settled in Henderson County, N. C., where the community and church of Edneyville bear his name. As a local preacher, he was postmaster and also served for forty years as a Justice of the Peace. Asbury visited him several times and referred to him about a dozen times in his Journal.

Samuel Edney married Eleanor (Nellie) Mills, daughter of William Mills, an exhorter and a friend of Asbury's. Mills lived in Henderson County, where his name is perpetuated in Mills Chapel, Mills River, Mills Gap, Mills Spring and other spots.

Edney died on Sept. 17, 1844, and was buried at Edneyville.

W. L. Grissom, North Carolina. 1905. LOUISE L. QUEEN

EDUCATION, U.S.A. American Methodists begin consideration of their work in education by recognizing their indebtedness to John Wesley for this concern. A graduate of Christ Church at Oxford, Wesley was himself one of the great scholars eighteenth century England produced. While his name is generally associated with evangelism, it is inseparably connected also with the beginnings of Methodist education. He belongs high on the list of pioneers who created an interest throughout the English-speaking world for the education of the masses.

Some of the first Methodists migrating from England to America brought to this land Wesley's concern for education. Among them was JOHN DICKINS, a Methodist preacher who had attended Eton in England. As early as 1780 Dickins began conversations with FRANCIS ASBURY about establishing a school along the plan of KINGSWOOD SCHOOL, perhaps to be called "Kingswood School in America."

THOMAS COKE arrived in America in 1784 with the commission from John Wesley which enabled the Methodists of the United States to organize into a church. One of the first agreements which he and Asbury reached concerned the establishment of a school. Asbury, however, did not agree with Coke on the nature of the projected school. He preferred an academy similar to Kingswood; Coke argued for a college. The decision was left to the organizing conference itself—the CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE—and on January 1, 1785, it voted to establish a college. Again, when no agreement could be reached on a name, a compound one—COKESBURY—incorporating the names of the two bishops, Coke and Asbury, was proposed and adopted.

The site chosen, Abingdon, Maryland, was about twenty-five miles north of Baltimore. A three-story brick edifice, begun in 1785, was not completed until 1789. School work, however, started in December, 1787, with twenty-five students.

The Discipline of the M. E. Church (1789) contained a detailed announcement of three aims of the college: (1) the education of the sons of married preachers; (2) the education and support of poor orphans; (3) the establishment of a seminary "for the children of our competent friends where learning and religion may go hand in hand."

While the institution was called a "college," it was one in name only. Its curriculum was taken from Wesley's Kingswood. The strict and impractical rules which Wesley laid down for the Kingswood boys were also incorporated.

From the outset Cokesbury became a heavy burden upon Asbury. Only through his persistent efforts were the funds raised to erect the building. It is said that he personally secured from $75,000 to $100,000. When fire destroyed the building at Abingdon in 1795, the school was relocated in Baltimore. Here a building purchased for $22,000 was used for almost a year before it also burned.

If the first educational efforts of early Methodism seem to have been fraught with mishaps and failure, some encouragement may be gleaned from the students sent out. In the nine years of its existence Cokesbury probably never enrolled more than 400 students. Yet two of them became United States senators; one was secretary of the United States Senate for twenty-five years; and another is included in the list of founders of WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY. Others found places in many enterprises of the church and state.

Asbury's first interest in education centered in conference academies. He desired for the church a system of secondary education consisting of a boarding academy in each conference. He himself led in the organization of such schools in Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Kentucky, and Georgia. In 1816 a further effort was made to establish a college in Baltimore bearing Asbury's name, but it could not secure adequate financial support and closed after about two years of operation. This was the last educational effort for the Methodists of the Asbury era. Further development of educational institutions had to await the coming of new leadership.

During the early part of the nineteenth century the youthful church continued to move forward and to plan for its future. Its cultural level had risen rapidly; and in keeping with the change in character, new leaders appeared. The General Conference of 1820 adopted a resolution asking each one of its annual conferences to establish a literary institution within its bounds. The first response to this was made by the Kentucky and Ohio conferences in the chartering of Augusta College, Augusta, Ky., in 1822. The location of the school on the Ohio River enabled it to reach beyond its own conferences and to draw students from the Middle West and South. It had on its faculty some of the church's ablest men, including MARTIN RUTER, HENRY B. BASCOM, JOHN P. DURBIN, and JOSEPH TOMLINSON. Among its former students were RANDOLPH S. FOSTER, the first president of NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY and a bishop of the M. E. Church; JOHN M. MILEY, professor of systematic theology at DREW SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY; and Alexander Doniphan, one-time governor of Missouri and a general in the United States Army serving during the war with Mexico. The college closed in 1849.

The church was now committed to an educational program, and the educational movement spread with Methodism into every part of the nation. Before the Civil War, over 200 Methodist schools had been started in thirty-three of the thirty-four states. (Thirty-three of the schools founded between 1830 and 1861 had attained, by 1961, a century or more of service.) It has been estimated that, since Cokesbury, Methodism has had connections in one way or another with at least 1,000 schools. When the three main branches of Methodism united in 1939 to form The Methodist Church, educational institutions included nine universities, nine theological schools, sixty-seven senior colleges, twenty-seven junior colleges, seventeen secondary schools, and five schools with special classifications.

The war of 1861-65 adversely affected all of the colleges of the M. E. Church, South. With only one exception, its colleges for men closed. Ten institutions were completely destroyed, and many suffered severe losses of their educational plants and equipment. In addition, the small endowments accumulated were wiped out.

The war laid waste the economy of the Southern states, leaving them with limited means to rehabilitate their educational work. The M. E. Church, South, moved into this educational vacuum and projected plans for a program of secondary education. The General Conference urged the establishment of such schools in every presiding elder's district. Between 1860 and 1920, 187 academies were started by annual conferences of the M. E. Church, South.

One of the outstanding educational achievements of this church was the founding of a central institution, VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY, to serve the church. This university became the most powerful single influence in hastening the South's educational development. Not only did it serve the church with its graduate and professional schools, but its theological school furnished almost all of its professionally trained ministers. The university took the lead in forming the Southern Association of Schools and Colleges, the accrediting agency for the Southern region of the United States. To this association must go the credit for upgrading all collegiate work in the South and insisting that the institutions which call themselves colleges do the kind of work the name implies.

How far the schools of the South had come after the Civil War and until 1939 is shown by the following summary:

	Plant	Endowment	Indebtedness
Universities (3)	$22,568,221	$27,667,914	$ 516,560
Senior Colleges (26)	20,448,662	12,253,371	3,528,902
Junior Colleges (22)	5,860,315	1,365,620	835,013
Academies (20)	3,635,469	77,963	605,350
Grand Total	$52,512,667	$41,364,868	$5,485,825

Since the schools of the M. E. Church did not have the problems brought by the devastation of war, they were able to continue their strong development. In 1866 the M. E. Church celebrated the hundredth anniversary of the founding of American Methodism with a special drive for funds "for those institutions and agencies to which the church has been most indebted for its efficiency." This opened the way for its educational institutions to obtain additional funds for new buildings and endowments and to make unprecedented advances.

During this period of expansion the leaders of the church found that such educational work was not adequately organized or coordinated. There were no bonds of union between institutions, and their relationship to the church's program was often casual. In 1868, the General Conference of the M. E. Church authorized the chartering of a Board of Education which was to give some supervision to the schools. At the same conference, provision was made for a loan fund for Methodist students. In time, this grew to become the largest student-loan fund held by any Protestant church. In the 1960's it was lending to Methodist students more than a million dollars annually.

The emancipation of four million slaves in the South placed upon the nation the responsibility for their education. The close identification of the M. E. Church with the emancipation movement prompted it to take the lead in Negro education. In 1866 it founded the FREEDMEN'S AID SOCIETY, and this agency became the one through which the church provided for the vocational, educational, and religious needs of Negroes. At the outset its schools undertook only primary and elementary education; but as the states developed their educational work, the church's schools were either closed or upgraded to colleges. In 1970, the thirteen institutions of higher learning founded to serve Negroes included not only some of the church's strong colleges but also such important professional schools as MEHARRY MEDICAL COLLEGE, Nashville, Tenn.; and GAMMON THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, Atlanta, Ga. These two institutions have been foremost in furnishing medical and theological education for Negroes.

Three of the liberal arts colleges related to The Methodist Church were founded by the Methodist Protestant Church—ADRIAN, HIGH POINT, and WESTERN MARYLAND. WESLEY THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY was the official seminary of that church; it was called Westminster Theological Seminary and located in Westminster, Md. It was moved to Washington, D. C., in 1958. Other schools were founded by the M. E. Church in Texas, Kansas City, and Ohio. The one in Texas, a junior college, was made a part of SOUTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY (Georgetown, Texas) after unification and was later sold to another denomination. The school in Ohio merged with Adrian College in 1916. The three remaining colleges mentioned above have, since the unification of the three branches of The Methodist Church, experienced unusual growth and are fully accredited by their regional accrediting associations. The value of their endowments and physical plants increased from a total of $4,390,749 in 1939 to $35,946,814 in 1970.

American universities have had their greatest growth and expansion during this century. At the turn of the century, 1900, the total enrollment in the universities was less than six thousand. The Methodist universities have had their largest development since the Second World War and now represent the most influential group of church-related universities in the United States. They are strategically located in great centers which have offered unusual opportunities for growth and development. Two of them, DUKE at Durham, N. C., and EMORY at Atlanta, Ga., were made possible through the benefactions of the Duke and Candler families. Legal ties which relate Methodist institutions to the church vary. In some instances the ties may be described as moral and historical, not legal.

In 1968 twelve theological schools served The Methodist Church. These schools exist for the whole church, and about one-third of their income is received from the COUNCIL ON WORLD SERVICE, the general funds of the church. The slow development of theological education in The Methodist Church is due to the adverse attitude that Methodist leadership for many years took toward the professional education of Methodist ministers. Traditionally the education of Methodist preachers was to parallel and be a part of their practical work in the ministry. As late as 1939 more than half of all ministers qualified for membership in annual conferences by taking the conference "course of study"; they had received no formal training in theological schools.

All institutions listed are fully accredited except the ones mentioned as having "limited accreditation." Anyone desiring information about the accreditation of an institution listed as not meeting all of the standards should correspond directly with the institution. The Division of Higher Education of the Board of Education of The United Methodist Church (Box 871, Nashville, Tennessee) prepares annually a full report on each institution covering enrollment, financial operation, etc. This data is available upon request.

Currently, Methodist interest in educational institutions centers in universities, theological schools, senior and junior colleges. Yet at one time the church's concern in education included a large number of academies. Frequently these are compared with the secondary schools of our day, but actually they were broader and many of them attained a standard of excellence far beyond the diversified tax-supported high schools. It would be difficult to ascertain how many academies have been operated by American Methodism since Asbury's day. A list published in 1886 showed 84 academies owned and operated by the M. E. Church (Cummings, Early Schools, pp. 426-27); between 1860 and 1920, 187 academies were started by annual conferences of the M. E. Church, South (History of American Methodism, iii, p. 227).

At least a third of the ninety-seven senior and junior colleges had their beginnings as academies. The list of secondary schools related to The Methodist Church contains only six which were developed by annual conferences, and all but one of these are in the Northeastern Jurisdiction. Only one is coeducational. Eight mission secondary schools are operated by the Board of Missions.

The decades of the 1950's and 1960's registered great advance in theological education in The Methodist Church. Two new schools were established in Ohio and Kansas, and two others were relocated—the SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY AT CLAREMONT (California), and WESLEY THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, Washington, D. C. Gammon Theological Seminary, which had furnished the professional training for Negroes entering the Methodist ministry, formed the nucleus for the Interdenominational Theological Center that was at last report serving four of the principal Negro denominations of the United States.

Since 1939 the physical plants of all of the theological schools in the United States have been enlarged and improved. BOSTON UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY moved into a new building made possible by a substantial grant from the Crusade for Christ movement of 1944, and the school of Theology at SOUTHERN METHODIST UNIVERSITY was completely rebuilt through the benefactions of Mr. and Mrs. JOE L. PERKINS (see PERKINS SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY). The Kresge Foundation's gift of $1,500,000 to Wesley Theological Seminary, Washington, D. C., opened the way for a new plant on the campus of AMERICAN UNIVERSITY.

The UNIVERSITY SENATE is one of the most important educational bodies in The United Methodist Church. Created by the General Conference of the M. E. Church in 1892, it serves as the official accrediting agency of The United Methodist Church. By an act of the uniting conference in 1939, the senate was made a part of the united church. The legislation authorizing it requires that its membership be made up of practical educators qualified to deal with the academic administrative affairs of higher education. The senate meets annually to accredit the church's schools and to give special attention to the problems emerging in connection with the church's educational program. The senate was the accrediting agency founded in the United States. Myron F. Wicke in his Brief History of the University Senate of The Methodist Church (Nashville: Board of Education, The Methodist Church, 1956) says, "The history of American education can be traced in the actions and studies of the University Senate. In educational principle and practice, this senate was usually in the vanguard."

In the quadrennium opening in 1956, The Methodist Church recognized the importance of strengthening its relationship to its educational program. At the General Conference held in that year, a church-wide program was outlined emphasizing the place of education in the strategy of the church. A special appeal was then made to the church to increase its giving for its educational institutions. This movement lifted church support to an unprecedented level and enabled the institutions to meet the increased demands placed upon them by the enlarged enrollments.

In 1970 there were eight universities, eighty-three senior colleges, twenty-one junior colleges, fourteen theological schools, seventeen secondary schools, and four of miscellaneous classifications related to The United Methodist Church. These schools are held in trust for the church by boards of trustees. In most of the institutions the majority of the trustees are elected or confirmed by some authorized agency of the church, such as the general, jurisdictional, or annual conference. In 1970, the combined assets of these institutions for plant, equipment, and endowment amounted to $2,100,000,000. It took 175 years for the institutions to acquire a billion dollars in assets. Since 1959 they have been adding approximately $100,000,000 annually.

Schools Closed Since the Unification in 1939. The list of all the schools formerly operated by the three Methodist bodies that came together at unification in 1939 would be a lengthy one. With a few exceptions all of the schools that suspended operation prior to 1939 are omitted. (For a list of those discontinued prior to 1939, see Simpson's Cyclopaedia of Methodism and Cummings' Early Schools of Methodism. Data on many of the closed institutions are also available from the Division of Higher Education, the Board of Education of The United Methodist Church.)

The following schools identified with the three branches of The Methodist Church at the time of unification are no longer in existence or are operating independently of church support:

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH

Baxter Seminary, Baxter, Tenn., founded in 1910, sold to the Board of Education, Putnam County; now the Harry L. Upperman High School, named in honor of the president who served from 1923 until the school was sold. Cazenovia College, Cazenovia, N. Y., since 1943 an independent junior college.

Chicago Training School. Merged with Garrett Biblical Institute, now Garrett Theological Seminary.

Drew Seminary for Women, Cornell, N. Y., a secondary school for girls. Closed. Property now owned by Guide Posts, a widely circulated Christian monthly publication.

East Greenwich Academy, East Greenwich, R. I. Closed in 1943.

Gilbert Academy, New Orleans, La., a coeducational secondary school for Negroes. Closed and property sold; assets turned over to Dillard University.

Jennings Seminary, Aurora, Ill. Closed, 1943.

Kansas City Training School became a senior college (see National College) and in 1965 turned property over to Saint Paul School of Theology.

University of Southern California, Los Angeles, Calif. Wesleyan University, Middletown, Conn.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, SOUTH

Blackstone College, Virginia, closed in 1944. Property is owned by the Virginia Conference.

Lander College, Greenwood, S. C.

Morris Harvey College, Charleston, W. Va. (see West Virginia Wesleyan College).

University of San Antonio, San Antonio, Texas. Sold to Trinity College, Presbyterian Church, 1943. Now Trinity University.

Weatherford College, Weatherford, Texas.

METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH

Westminster College, Tehuacana, Texas.

American Junior Colleges. 1968.

American Universities and Colleges. 1968.

A. W. Cummings, Early Schools of Methodism. 1886.

E. S. Bucke, History of American Methodism. 1964.

Albert Keiser, ed., College Names and Origins. New York: Bookman Associates, Inc., 1952.

Yearbook of the Board of Education, UMC. 1970.

JOHN O. GROSS

EDUCATION, E. U. B. The Board of Christian Education of the E. U. B. Church was responsible for the program and work of Christian education, as directed by the GENERAL CONFERENCE, through the Annual Conference Boards and the Commission on Christian Education in the local church.

The educational program of the local congregations was integrated and unified through the church's PROGRAM COUNCIL. This program included all the educational emphases and activities of all the general departments and interests, such as evangelism, stewardship, missions, Christian social action, and Bible instruction. The program was developed as a comprehensive, unified, and coordinated Christian education program for children, youth, young adults, and adults in local congregations.

The objective was "that all persons be aware of God through his self-disclosure, especially his redeeming love as revealed in Jesus Christ, and that they respond in faith and love to the end that they may know who they are and what their human situation means, grow as sons of God rooted in the Christian community, live in the spirit of God in every relationship, fulfill their common discipleship in the world, and abide in the Christian hope."

The membership of the General Board consisted of ninety-two members and was inclusive of bishops, general board secretaries, persons of special competence in education, the annual conference directors of Christian education, and members elected at large. For functional purposes the membership was divided into three divisions: Local Church, Higher Education, Curriculum Research and Development. It was within these Divisions that the educational work of the church was carried forward.

The Division of the Local Church had the responsibility for the development and promotion of program and gave program guidance for use in the educational ministry of the church. It also devoted itself to studying, supervising, strengthening, and extending its ministry of study, worship, fellowship, and service.

The Division of Higher Education was responsible for the initiation and coordination of denominational policy related to collegiate education, the ministry of the church, theological education, pastoral services, and recruiting for church occupations. The policies affecting the colleges and the seminaries were developed in consultation with their presidents and the trustees.

The Division of Curriculum Research and Development had the responsibility for curriculum research, for the development of curriculum design (including objectives), for the approval of outlines and courses of study, and for the catechetical and doctrinal instruction courses.

The Church Curriculum Committee operated through the Board of Christian Education in behalf of the other boards and agencies of the church. The Committee was charged with the responsibility to take the necessary steps to build a curriculum based on the approved design, including descriptions of teaching-learning experiences for children, youth, young adults, and adults. This curriculum included teaching-learning units in all the areas of the church's educational ministry.

The Youth Fellowship operated as an auxiliary unit of youth through the Youth Department. Men's Work was related to the Adult Department but operated with lay officers and an independent budget. However, they correlated their programs and projects with the Adult Department and Adult Work Council of the Program Council.

The Board of Education as it was in 1968 at the time of Union with The Methodist Church came about on November 16, 1946, in the union of the EVANGELICAL CHURCH and the CHURCH OF THE UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST, to form the E. U. B. Church.

The Church of the United Brethren in Christ was organized in 1800, without any master plan or design for the organization of boards or agencies. The policy seemed to be to allow the need and time to dictate the type of organization and its purpose.

Sunday schools were established very early by leaders of the young denomination. The General Conference of 1865 established a Sunday School Association and a Brotherhood as a lay movement. The first General Secretary was Colonel Robert L. Cowden, who served for thirty-six years. Under his dynamic leadership many local organizations were established. This same General Conference authorized and elected a Board of Education which brought into being a theological seminary which is now known as UNITED THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, Dayton, Ohio.

The work of Christian Endeavor began in 1890, under the guidance of Professor J. P. Landis. It did not have a full-time secretary until the General Conference of 1913.

At the General Conference in 1929 a Board of Christian Education was formed which included the Sunday School Association, the Brotherhood, Youth Work or Christian Endeavor, and the Board of Education. This new Board found itself involved in fifteen areas of program to be integrated, correlated, and unified. This pattern continued to function in the church until the time of union with the Evangelical Church in 1946.

The EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION began as a denomination around 1803, during the time when preaching was in great evidence to the neglected PENNSYLVANIA German farmers. There were about 300,000 immigrants who were in the process of migration to this new nation. The preaching movement spread rapidly, and later they called themselves The Evangelical Association. No special attention was given to organization, for men were burdened for the souls of others and temporal organizations were of little concern. The first officially sponsored Sunday school was in Lebanon, Tenn., in 1832.

Long after the General Conference of 1879 heard that "the steam is up and the train is moving with a velocity hitherto undreamed of," so a General Secretary was elected and Sunday School Conventions began to increase rapidly with emphasis on Bible courses for lay leaders.

The first young people's society came into being on Sept. 13, 1880, and was known as the "Jugend Bund."

Thus, two groups were created—a Youth Department and a Sunday School Department. They continued in this way until 1919.

An unfortunate division arose among ministers over some temporal governing problems. Thus, two denominations emerged—The Evangelical Association and the UNITED EVANGELICAL CHURCH. A seminary was established at Naperville, Illinois, in 1873; and another seminary, United Evangelical, was organized at Reading, Pa., around 1905. The latter school was united in 1954 with Bonebrake Theological Seminary to form United Theological Seminary, located at Dayton, Ohio.

On Oct. 14, 1922, the newly merged Evangelical Church, which was comprised of the Evangelical Association and the United Evangelical Church, reunited and set in operation the plans for a Board of Christian Education and Evangelism at the three levels: general, annual conference, and local church. The purpose of this new Board was "to foster, promote, correlate, supervise, and make effective the work of religious education as done in and by the local church and to promote the work of the Sunday schools, the Evangelical Leagues of Christian Endeavor, vacation church schools, weekday schools of religious education, leadership training, catechetical instruction, pastors' classes, boys and girls clubs and kindred agencies, camp conferences, summer assemblies, conventions, summer schools, life work, vocational guidance, ushers' associations, etc." This organizational pattern continued in operation until 1946 when union took place with the Church of the United Brethren in Christ, and the newly organized Board became operational. In 1968 the E.U.B. Board of Education and that of The Methodist Church were merged into one Board for The United Methodist Church.

E. CRAIG BRANDENBURG

EDUCATION, BOARD OF. The earliest organized agency in American Methodism concerned with the Christian education of children, youth, and adults was the Methodist SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION of the M. E. Church. It was organized in 1827 with NATHAN BANGS as the corresponding secretary. It was concerned with promoting Sunday schools and providing literature for them. A Children's Magazine was started in the same year. Soon there was also a Youth's Instructor, and by 1844 there were 352 different titles of tracts. A Sunday School Advocate was started in 1841, and 1844 was the first time the GENERAL CONFERENCE recognized its obligation to provide funds for a general agency to promote Sunday schools, though it was another seventy-five years before the church began to plan for professional leadership in such work.

When the M. E. Church, South, met in General Conference in 1846, it elected T. O. SUMMERS editor of a proposed Sunday school paper, which was finally launched in 1851 as The Sunday School Visitor. In 1854 the General Conference created a Sunday School Society, and in 1858 it authorized a "Corresponding Secretary for the Sunday School Society . . . to encourage the formation of Sunday schools, and to take collections for the distribution of Sunday school literature." But it abolished the Society in 1866.

Meanwhile, in the M. E. Church the Sunday School Union made remarkable gains, reporting in 1857 that "During the last eleven years nearly eighty-nine per cent of the net increase of our church membership has been derived from our Sunday Schools." Leaders in this work were DANIEL P. KIDDER, Daniel Wise, and JOHN H. VINCENT (later bishop). By 1868 there were one and a quarter million pupils, officers, and teachers in more than seventeen thousand Sunday schools.

In 1868 the M. E. Church set up a Department of Sunday School Instruction, with chief emphasis on the training of teachers; and a Board of Education to supervise schools and colleges. In 1870 the Southern Church set up a permanent Sunday School Committee of five members, with the Sunday school editor as chairman.

In 1870 the General Conference of the M. E. Church, South, created a Department of Sunday School Literature and Requisites and an office of General Sunday School Secretary. It was filled until 1875 by ATTICUS G. HAYGOOD (later bishop), who was followed by W. C. E. CUNNINGHAM, both of whose tasks were primarily editorial.

Toward the end of the century both episcopal Methodisms established EPWORTH LEAGUE boards to look after this phase of youth work. In 1894 the Southern Church created a General Sunday School Board of which the Sunday School Editor served as general secretary.

The M. P. Church created a Department of Sunday School Literature in its Board of Publication in 1884, with J. F. Cowan as the first executive, followed by C. E. Wilbur. In 1908 a Board of Young People's Work was created to supervise both Sunday schools and Christian Endeavor Societies, with CHARLES H. HUBBELL as general secretary.

In 1904 the M. E. Church merged its work with colleges (Board of Education), with Negroes (FREEDMEN'S AID SOCIETY), and Sunday schools (Sunday School Union), into a Board of Education, Freedmen's Aid, and Sunday Schools. Four years later, however, the consolidation was rescinded and the former boards reinstated, except that the Sunday School Union became a Board of Sunday Schools.

Among leaders in this work were such persons as JESSE L. HURLBURT (Hurlburt's Story of the Bible), T. B. NEELEY (later bishop), JOHN T. MCFARLAND, DAVID G. DOWNEY, EDGAR BLAKE (later bishop), and WADE CRAWFORD BARCLAY.

In 1922 the work of Christian education at the local level in the Southern Church was divided; E. B. CHAPPELL was elected editor of church school publications, and JOHN W. SHACKFORD was elected the general secretary of the General Sunday School Board. Strong support of the program was given by JAMES ATKINS, later bishop. College work was carried on in a general Board of Education.

In 1924 the M. E. Church merged its Boards of Sunday Schools, of the Epworth League, of Education, and of Education for Negroes into a single Board of Education, continuing all the tasks of the predecessor boards. It had four departments: Schools and Colleges, Education for Negroes, Church Schools, and Epworth Leagues. Four years later the Board was reorganized into two major divisions: Educational Institutions and Religious Education in the Local Church. Church school publications were related to the Methodist Book Concern. During the years of 1924-28 local church schools gave heavily to missions (over $1,500,000); to the student loan fund (nearly $250,000); and to the Centenary Movement ($10,000,000 pledged). Leadership training was widely sponsored. From 1928 to 1932 more than 520,000 persons joined the church through the church schools and Epworth Leagues, and members of these groups gave nearly $6,000,000 to benevolences. The National Council of Methodist Youth became a dynamic factor in the life of the church.

Leaders of the educational work in these—and later—years included FREDERICK C. EISELEN, Frank A. Lindhorst, Roy E. Burt, John C. Irwin, N. F. Forsyth, Corliss P. Hargraves, H. D. Bollinger, Joseph W. Bell, Franklin H. Littell, and Edward D. Staples.

Meanwhile, changes were occurring in the M. E. Church, South. One of the greatest impacts was in the area of leadership training under the leadership of Dr. Shackford; JOHN Q. SCHISLER says the record in that regard was "perhaps unsurpassed in the annals of Protestant churches." Great strides were made in curriculum planning and production, including graded courses for children and youth. By 1928 almost half the Sunday schools in the denomination were seeking to meet a variety of standards set up by the general board, called Programs of Work. Home and foreign mission projects were strongly supported, "continuous evangelism" was carried on, and "good teaching, helpful worship, recreational and social service activities were emphasized as good in themselves and as the best means of gaining and holding members," writes Dr. Schisler.

To effect still greater coordination, the Southern Church followed the Northern branch by combining in 1930 its Board of Education (college work), Sunday School Board, and Epworth League Board under the leadership of PAUL B. KERN (later bishop). Going beyond the pattern of the Northern Church, the Southern branch included in its General Board of Christian Education the groups mentioned plus the work of preparing curriculum resources. The General Board thus had three major departments: Schools and Colleges, Local Church, and Editorial. Executive secretaries of these three departments were, respectively, W. M. ALEXANDER, John Q. Schisler, and C. A. BOWEN. Staff members in these and later years included several who gave long and outstanding service: Mary Skinner, Freddie Henry (later Mrs. John Q. Schisler), E. O. Harbin, Ina C. Brown, O. W. Moerner, M. Leo Rippey, Horace W. Williams, Frances C. McLester, Walter Towner, Rowena Ferguson.

During the decade of 1930-40 in the Southern Church more than seventy-five percent of the new members of the church came from the church school; over $2,000,000 was contributed to missions; and over a half million credits were earned in leadership training courses.

In the M. P. Church the merger of college work (in a Board of Education) and local church work came in 1928 by the formation of a General Board of Christian Education. Staff leaders were F. W. STEPHENSON for educational institutions, and Lawrence C. Little and F. L. Gibbs for local church Christian education. At union in 1939 there were about 195,000 members of the Sunday school, about 6,000 more than the church membership. Church school publications were related to the publishing arm of the church.

At Methodist Union in 1939 one General Board of Education was created for The Methodist Church, with three divisions: Educational Institutions, Local Church, and Editorial. Many complex problems required solution, one of the chief being the fashioning of a new youth program to bring together Christian Endeavor in the M. P. Church and Epworth Leagues in the other two branches. At the local level there was created the Methodist Youth Fellowship and at the national level the National Council of Methodist Youth.

Staff leaders in the new Board, organized in 1940, were—Educational Institutions: Executive Secretary—H. W. McPHERSON; Associate Executive Secretary—W. M. Alexander; Local Church: Executive Secretary—John Q. Schisler; Associate Executive Secretary—N. F. Forsyth; Editorial: Executive Secretary—LUCIUS H. BUGBEE; Associate Executive Secretary—C. A. Bowen.

During the period since 1940 the work of the General Board of Education made significant impact on the life of the church—and on its surrounding culture. The work of the Division of the Local Church resulted in great gains in missionary education and in missionary giving through the church school. A Church School Extension Corps enlisted sixty persons who each gave a year of service in areas crowded by war industries during World War II. A Youth Caravan program involved hundreds of youth and adult leaders in serving other youth for several summer months in many local churches across the nation. A Youth Emphasis, 1954-58, under the leadership of C. Glenn Minglehoff, reversed a declining trend in youth membership. Effective guidance was given to the church in the use of newer media, such as films, filmstrips, records, and tapes. During the years of 1948-52 church school membership increased by 630,314, and 678,670 church school pupils joined the church. Schisler retired in 1955, to be followed for eleven years by LEON M. ADKINS. In 1966 Howard M. Ham became the General Secretary of the Division of the Local Church.

Completely new curriculum resources for children, youth, and adults were prepared in the period of 1964-68, with many new types of media used in addition to print. A large volume of curriculum resources were prepared interdenominationally during this period. Special attention was given to the needs of ethnic minorities in the church's constituency. C. A. Bowen retired in 1952, and was succeeded as General Secretary of the Editorial Division (now called Division of Curriculum Resources) by Henry M. Bullock, who served until 1972.

The relation of colleges, universities, and seminaries to the church was clarified and strengthened in many ways during the years since 1940 through the efforts of the Division of Higher Education. Work with students was carried on at all Methodist campuses and at most state and private schools. A special magazine for students, notice, provided stimulating—and often controversial—material during this period. A loan and scholarship fund of over $6,000,000 is in use, serving thousands of students, and has served altogether some 125,000 students. By 1971 all higher educational institutions associated with the church were accredited. A placement office assists United Methodist colleges seeking teachers, and also assists teachers who are desiring or willing to take new positions. The Division provided much leadership in the 1970's in a church-wide movement to raise $8,000,000 for a Ministerial Education Fund. The Division assisted in 1970-72 in a church-wide effort to obtain $1,000,000 annually in loans and grants for black students, and to raise $4,000,000 for current operations for colleges for blacks. JOHN O. GROSS served as General Secretary of the Division from 1948 to 1965, to be followed by Myron F. Wicke, who served from 1965 to 1972.

As the church entered the seventies, its educational work was not in its most flourishing period—at least statistically—though there were many creative currents flowing, but not all in the same direction. The nation as a whole seemed to be in an anti-intellectual mood, Church school membership and attendance were in a declining state; the cry for more effective training of Christian education leaders was heard on every hand; and the nurture of youth in the church was an especially critical problem.

The use of the church's curriculum resources was declining and under criticism on certain points. Criticism came from varied sources—those who felt resources should be more strongly oriented toward (1) a more orthodox stance, (2) a more liberal stance, (3) the concerns of ethnic and cultural minorities, (4) the new freedom of women (and thus new roles for men and women, boys and girls), (5) a less structured way of carrying on Christian nurture.

United Methodist colleges were feeling the pinch of rising costs without comparable rises in income—as they competed to provide quality education on a par with that provided by state institutions that were supported by taxation. United Methodist schools traditionally serving black students were challenged as to the need for their continued existence, and such challenges still further reduced their former sources of support. Student Christian work was possibly at its lowest ebb since organized student work began through Wesley Foundations and the Methodist Student Movement.

It was "the best of times, it was the worst of times." Whatever the future of Christian education in The United Methodist Church, it was certain to be different.

C. A. Bowen, Child and Church. 1960.

Thomas K. Potter, Jr., "Education-Publication: Yoked Service to Methodism." 1970. Unpublished paper in Library of The Methodist Publishing House, Nashville.

J. Q. Schisler, Christian Education in Local Churches. 1969.
WALTER N. VERNON

EDUCATION, British. (See MINISTERIAL TRAINING IN ENGLAND.)

EDWARD WATERS COLLEGE, Jacksonville, Florida, the first institution for higher education of Negroes in the state of FLORIDA, was chartered in 1872. Charles H. Pearce, the first presiding elder of the A.M.E. CHURCH in Florida, raised funds for this school as early as 1866. It opened its doors as (Morris) Brown Theological Institute. From 1874 to 1883 the school suspended its operation and reopened in 1883 in JACKSONVILLE. The school flourished in this location and in 1892 was renamed Edward Waters, relocated and built on its present Kings Road site. The Benjamin F. Lee Theological Seminary is located on the campus of this institution. The present president of the college is W. B. Stewart and the dean of the theological seminary is J. B. Epperson.

GRANT S. SHOCKLEY

EDWARDS, ARTHUR, JR. (1834-1901), American minister and journalist, was born in Norwalk, Ohio, on Nov. 23, 1834. He attended the Wesleyan Seminary at Albion one year, and in 1858 graduated from OHIO WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY.

The same year he joined the DETROIT ANNUAL CONFERENCE. At the outbreak of the Civil War, he was appointed chaplain of the First Michigan Infantry, and served for over two years. He saw eighteen battles including Gettysburg, and often wrote descriptive letters to the Northwestern Christian Advocate and the Detroit papers. He was said to be the most popular chaplain in the Army of the Potomac.

Later he returned to the pastorate, and in 1864 he was made assistant editor of the Northwestern Christian Advocate. He became the editor of the GENERAL CONFERENCE Daily Advocate in 1868, and in 1872 he was elected to the editorship of the Northwestern Christian Advocate, in which capacity he served notably for twenty-nine years until his death. He had the instinct of a news-gatherer, and was a facile, graphic writer.

Edwards became a leading statesman of the Church. He was a member of every session of the General Conference from 1872 through 1892, and again in 1900. He served as secretary of the Detroit Conference twelve years. He was a member of the 1876 Church Hymnal Commission. In 1881 he was a delegate to the first ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE in London, and had a part in the program. He was a member of the CENTENNIAL Conference in BALTIMORE in 1884. He gave enthusiastic support to a pioneering student work at Ann Arbor after 1886.

Arthur Edwards married Caroline Whithead in 1866. Three children were born to them. He died in Chicago on March 20, 1901.

M. B. Macmillan, Michigan. 1967.

Minutes of the Detroit Conference, 1901.

E. H. Pilcher, Michigan. 1878.

RONALD A. BRUNGER

EDWARDS, DAVID (1816-1876), American U.B. bishop and editor, was born in North Wales, May 5, 1816. When he was five, his family migrated to Delaware, Ohio. After a single year of formal schooling, he left home and wandered to Lancaster, Ohio, where he found employment in a woolen mill. At eighteen, young Edwards was converted at a United Brethren meeting in Lancaster. Soon thereafter he entered the ministry and in 1836 was ordained in the Scioto Conference Church of the United Brethren in Christ.

For several years, due perhaps in part to ill health, Edwards seemed uncertain of his calling, twice returning to wool carding, and once to business for himself.

An important change occurred in his life when the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1845 elected him to the editorship of the Religious Telescope. He refused reelection in 1849, and the General Conference elevated him to the post of bishop. For six successive terms he was reelected to this important office. Bishop Edwards was a leader in the establishment of OTTERBEIN UNIVERSITY, and in the foreign mission enterprise. He served in virtually every district of the church, moving his home finally to BALTIMORE, Md., where, as presiding bishop over the Eastern District, he died on June 6, 1876.

Koontz and Roush, The Bishops. 1950.

H. A. Thompson, Our Bishops. 1889.

LYNN W. TURNER

EDWARDS, EDWARD (1793-1868), Wesleyan missionary in SOUTH AFRICA, was born at Deptford, Kent, England, in 1793 and was sent to the Cape in 1817 as the first assistant to BARNABAS SHAW. After three years at Leliefontein (Lily Fountain) Edwards removed to Cape Town where he recommenced Methodist services, first in a hayloft and later in a disused wine store. In 1821 he returned to Lily Fountain where he remained until 1837, except for a short but exciting interlude in the Bechuana Mission and a brief visit to England for marriage. His next appointment was Somerset West (1837-44), where he helped establish Cape Coloured people—some of them ex-slaves—in their own homes and trades. After a period as chaplain to Cape Coloured convicts engaged in road-making near George, he spent sixteen fruitful years (1848-64) at Stellenbosch. He died on April 6, 1868.

J. Whiteside, South Africa. 1906.

C. MEARS

EDWARDS, GEORGE (1850-1933), British Methodist, had no schooling and began work in the fields at the age of six. His education began when he became a PRIMITIVE METHODIST LOCAL PREACHER, and to the end, he was as proud of his sixty years' preaching service as of any of the other honors which came to him in local and national politics. He was a staunch Trade Unionist and founder of the National Union of Agricultural Workers. He entered Parliament for Norfolk South, after the war had loosened the ties between the Liberals and the unions. He sat as a Labour M.P. from 1920 to 1922 and 1923 to 1924. His chief political service was in local government and he became a county alderman.

George Edwards, From Crow-Scaring to Westminster. London, 1922.

E. R. TAYLOR

EDWARDS, JOHN (?-1784), British Methodist, was a native of IRELAND who became one of JOHN WESLEY'S itinerant preachers in 1747. After a few years, however, he embraced Calvinistic doctrines, left the Methodists c. 1753-55, and built the White Chapel in LEEDS, Yorkshire, where he ministered until his death in 1784. JOHN BERARDE, the Anglican Evangelical, heard him preach in Whitefield's Tabernacle, London, in 1763, and described him as "one who has swallowed John Calvin whole at a mouthful" (Laycock, p. 138).

J. W. Laycock, Methodist Heroes. 1909.

W. Miles, Chronological History. 1799.

JOHN KENT

EDWARDS, JOHN (1804-1887), Wesleyan missionary in SOUTH AFRICA, was born at Bridford, Devonshire, England in 1804 and was sent to South Africa in 1832. He spent seven years on various stations in the Bechuana District and was associated with JAMES ARCHBELL in the epic migration of the Barolong from Platberg to Thaba 'Nchu. The health of his wife necessitated a move to the coastal areas of the Eastern Province where he spent the remainder of his ministry. He was the first resident minister in the Port Elizabeth, Cradock and Somerset East Circuits and also served at Graaff Reinet and Salem. In all these places he laid the foundations of important Methodist work among both whites and Africans. He became a supernumerary in 1876 and died in Grahamstown on Nov. 11, 1887.

John Edwards, Reminiscences of the Rev. John Edwards. London, 1886.

C. MEARS

EDWARDS, KENNETH MORGAN (1912-), American minister and educator, was born in Plymouth, Pa., on Dec. 6, 1912, the son of Morgan Owen and Helen May (Shupp) Edwards. He was educated at LEBANON VALLEY COLLEGE, received the B.D. degree from DREW UNIVERSITY in 1938, and did postgraduate work at the University of Southern California, 1941-46, from which he received the D.D. degree, and later the L.H.D. from California College of Medicine. His wife was Evelyn Marie Sheetz, whom he married on Jan. 1, 1939, and they have four sons.

Dr. Edwards joined the PHILADELPHIA CONFERENCE in 1938 and after serving two appointments in PENNSYLVANIA, transferred to Williams, Ariz. In 1946 he became pastor of the First Church at GLENDALE, CALIF. He served the large First Church in PASADENA from 1951-61. He became Gerald Kennedy Professor of Preaching at the School of Theology at Claremont, California in that year—1961. He was a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1952, '56, '60, '64, and '68, and has delivered several series of scholarly lectures to various institutions of higher learning. He was the LUFF SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY graduate lecturer in 1963 and the Jackson Lecturer at SOUTHERN METHODIST UNIVERSITY in 1966. Since 1964 he has been chairman of the Board of Evangelism of the SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA-ARIZONA CONFERENCE of the United Methodist Church. He is a director of the Human Interaction Research Institute, a multidisciplinary agency dealing with major societal problems such as racial tension, crime, and America's changing values. During March, 1971, he visited AUSTRALIA to preach and lecture at the Methodist theological schools and in the major cities of Australia, invited by the General Conference of Australia, the first occasion on which the Australian Methodist Church invited an overseas lecturer for this role. He has written Hoping To Be Somebody, 1959; More Than Survival, 1961. He resides at Claremont, Calif.

Who's Who in The Methodist Church, 1966.

EDWARDS, MALDWYN LLOYD (1903-), distinguished British church historian, was born at Liverpool on May 18, 1903. He was educated at Liverpool Collegiate School, at the universities of Wales (M.A.) and Cambridge (M.A.), and at London University, where he took a Ph.D. He is also an honorary D.D. of WOFFORD COLLEGE, U.S.A.

He entered the Wesleyan Methodist ministry in 1926, and after serving as assistant tutor at Handsworth College, BIRMINGHAM, was the minister in charge of Central Halls (see FORWARD MOVEMENT) at MANCHESTER, BRISTOL, and Birmingham. From 1945 to 1948 he was secretary of the CHRISTIAN CITIZENSHIP DEPARTMENT of the Methodist Church. He began to write in the 1930's, producing a trilogy on Methodism in its social and political aspects for the past two hundred years: John Wesley and the 18th Century; After Wesley (1791-1849); and Methodism and England (1850-1932). Other books on Methodism include Adam Clarke (1942), S. E. Keeble (1949), and Family Circle (1949).

Edwards has also written books of a sociological type: Church and Society (1952), The Signs of Our Times (1957), and The Shaping of Tomorrow (1965). His devotional writings include The Coming of the Kingdom (1930), God and the Sparrow (1936), and In the Midst of the Throne (1960). In 1947 he gave the Beckly Lectures on social Christianity; and in 1957 the Cato Lectures in Australia. He is president of the INTERNATIONAL METHODIST HISTORICAL SOCIETY. Since 1957 he has been chairman of the Cardiff and Swansea Districts; in 1961 he was elected President of the Methodist Conference; and in 1971 he will become Director of the New Room at Bristol.

He married Eleanor Broadbelt, daughter of the Rev. J. A. Broadbelt, and they have two daughters. Edwards is well known in American Methodism and has visited the United States a number of times for lectures and addresses.

N. B. H.

EELS, WILLIAM (1744-1792), British Methodist, who was one of the itinerants to oppose the DEED OF DECLARATION in 1784. In 1788 he left the connexion, his name having been inadvertently omitted from the Minutes. He joined JOHN ATLAY in Dewsbury, where a secession had occurred owing to differences between the local trustees and the Conference. According to JOHN PAWSON, Eels and Atlay later differed and parted. Eels died on June 29, 1792, and was buried at Dewsbury.

C. Atmore, Methodist Memorial. 1801. N. P. GOLDBAWK

EGBERT, NICHOLAS (1729- ?), American layman who helped establish Methodism among the Dutch and Germans in Hunterdon County, N. J. in the late eighteenth century, was born on Staten Island, N. Y., the son of Jaques Egbertzen and Catharine Deuy. He was baptized March 23, 1729 in the Reformed Protestant Dutch Church of Staten Island. Egbert became a tanner and established a business in 1760 at Pleasant Run, Reading or Readington, in Hunterdon County. Itinerant preaching extended into this western county as early as 1773, but was virtually unknown during the Revolutionary War. Converted in 1780, Egbert gave a testimony at a LOVE FEAST conducted by George Mair who was traveling in east Jersey in 1780. His daughter, Susannah, was also converted about this time under Mair's preaching and Egbert's home at Pleasant Run became a stopping place and preaching appointment of FRANCIS ASBURY. In 1782 Asbury preached there after giving his message at Germantown (present Oldwick). This was during the Revolutionary War, when Methodists were looked upon with suspicion and patriot Committees of Safety scrutinized the passes of the preachers. Closely associated with Nicholas Egbert's defense of Methodist doctrine was that of MINDURT FARLEY, Tunis Mellick, Major Godfrey Rinehart, and others of the western German localities of New Jersey. Asbury's preaching at Nicholas Egbert's laid the foundation of the Grove Methodist Church in the NEWARK (NOW NORTHERN NEW JERSEY) CONFERENCE. Historians refer to Egbert as a vigorous defender of Methodist doctrines and Methodist itinerants.

J. Atkinson, Memorials in New Jersey. 1860.
Christian Advocate and Journal, Nov. 4, 1836, Aug. 11, 1837.
V. B. Hampton, Newark Conference. 1957.

VERNON B. HAMPTON

EGGLESTON, EDWARD (1837-1902), American author, preacher, and editor of various periodicals, was born of Methodist parents Dec. 10, 1837 at Vevay, Ind. The boy had only a few years of formal education, but he absorbed knowledge from his life-long habit of constantly reading. He lived for a time in VIRGINIA and later he spent four months for health reasons in MINNESOTA, returning to INDIANA in 1856 to become a Methodist preacher and circuit rider. His poor health, however, forced him to return to Minnesota once again, and he became an agent of the AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY and later pastor of churches at St. Peter's, St. Paul, Stillwater and Winona.

In 1866 he became associate editor of a children's magazine, Little Corporal. In 1867 he went to CHICAGO to become Editor of The Sunday School Teacher, increasing its circulation from 5,000 to 35,000 in three years. He also gained a reputation as a platform lecturer. In 1870 he went to New York to become literary editor of the New York Independent, to which periodical he had been contributing articles under the name "Pen-holder." He soon became superintending editor, but he left the magazine in July 1871 for the editorship of Hearth and Home.

His best known book, The Hoosier Schoolmaster, first appeared in this magazine as a serial. It was published as a book in 1871 and pioneered the genre novel. It is a vivid portrayal of American life in the backwoods of Indiana. It has been translated into German, French, Dutch, and Danish. He wrote a number of other books, including The Circuit Rider and The Graysons, picturing Abe Lincoln, young Illinois lawyer.

In 1874 he accepted a pastorate in Brooklyn, N. Y., but his health broke again, and five years later he resigned to retire to his home at Lake George where he continued his writing until his death Sept. 4, 1902. First editions of The Hoosier Schoolmaster, The Circuit Rider and The Grayson are of particular interest to collectors, for whatever faults his novels reveal in style and construction, they remain an excellent picture of a western frontier life that is no longer with us.

Appleton's Cyclopaedia of American Biography. Mildred Rutherford, American Authors, a Handbook of American Literature from Early Colonial Times to Living Writers. Atlanta: The Franklin Printing and Publishing Co., 1894.

FREDERICK E. MASER

EGGLESTON, LOUISE WAY (1888-), American prayer-group leader, lecturer, author, and world traveler, was born Louise Mavis Way in Rockingham County, Va., on April 26, 1888, the daughter of a Methodist minister. She married Aubrey L. Eggleston (deceased), who was a prominent businessman of NORFOLK, Va.

Mrs. Eggleston was for many years a spiritual life leader of the WOMAN'S SOCIETY OF CHRISTIAN SERVICE of the VIRGINIA CONFERENCE. She served as president of the World Literacy Foundation, Inc., in association with Dr. Frank Laubach, and as president of Koinonia Foundation. She is the writer of numerous materials dealing with prayer and the spiritual life. These have been distributed around the world. ATHENS COLLEGE conferred the honorary Litt.D. on her in 1954.

JOHN H. DAVIDSON

EGLISE RÉFORMÉE DE FRANCE. (See FRANCE.)

EGYPT (United Arab Republic), member of United Nations, occupies the northeast corner of Africa, spilling across the Gulf of Suez to include Sinai Peninsula, southwest tip of Asia. The area is 386,100 square miles, population being 32,501,000 (UN est., 1969).

In recorded history, Egypt pushes further back into the past than do most other countries. The long centuries of the Pharaonic Dynasties brought to full flower one of mankind's most brilliant civilizations, massive elements of which pose a present-day problem of preservation. The power of ancient Egypt, at times, was very great, and present-day Egypt, that hopes to lead the Arab peoples, must be reckoned with in every issue that confronts the United Nations and its member nations.

Egypt was a major factor in the development of the Judaeo-Christian tradition. From the days of Joseph to the infancy of Jesus, Egypt appeared constantly in the story. The twentieth century Coptic Church is the lineal descendant and direct heir of that Apostolic and heroic church.

FREE METHODIST CHURCH, CAIRO, EGYPT

Methodism entered Egypt only within very recent years, partly through the Holiness Movement Church of CANADA. In 1958 that church united with the FREE METHODIST CHURCH. Across preceding years, the Canadian unit had promoted the growth of a self-governing church in Egypt. This church also voted to unite with the Free Methodist Church, bringing over eighty organized congregations, many of them in populous centers with excellent buildings. There was a Biblical training school. The membership approached 5,000.

Full conference status was given to the Egyptian communion. The Free Methodist Book of Discipline, carefully translated and with a few minor changes to suit local requirements was approved, and governs the work. Missionaries from America are leading the enterprise with competent native preachers and teachers. There is marked evangelistic vitality. The Bible training school has been reorganized as "Wesley Theological College," approved by the denominational Department of Higher Education to grant B.Th. degrees. Six new churches have been opened since the 1959 merger with Free Methodist Church. Activities radiate from three centers—Alexandria, Assiut (city of 70,000 on the Nile half-way to Aswan Dam), and Cairo where the church possesses a share in the Nile Mission Press Bookstore. The membership is around 5,250.

Leslie R. Marston, A Living Witness. Winona Lake, Ind.: Light and Life Press, 1960.

Report, Free Methodist Church World Missions, 1962.
World Methodist Council Handbook. ARTHUR BRUCE MOSS
BYRON S. LAMSON

EHRHART, OLIVER T. (1881-1960), American minister and pastor of the Covenant E.U.B. Church, Lancaster, Pa., from 1920 to 1951, and Secretary of the East Pennsylvania Conference from 1927 to 1950, was born Oct. 8, 1881, at Hillville, Pa., the son of George Z. Ehrhart and Elizabeth Tillman Ehrhart. Graduated from the Millersville State Normal School in 1902, he received his A.B. degree from LEBANON VALLEY COLLEGE in 1911 and an honorary doctorate in 1928.

Before entering the ministry, he taught school in Manor Township, Lancaster County, for four years. He was ordained elder Oct. 8, 1917, and before assuming the pastorate of Lancaster Covenant Church, he served the Hebron Church in Lebanon, Pa., for three years.

Ehrhart was a member of four GENERAL CONFERENCES of the former Church of the United Brethren in Christ and of the Uniting Conference at Johnstown, Pa., in 1946. He was a member of the Board of the Foreign Missionary Society of the U.B. Church, 1933-46, and of the Board of Foreign Missions of The E.U.B. Church, 1946-50. He was a member of the Board of Christian Work in Santo Domingo, 1936-50, and was one of the incorporators of the United Andean Mission, serving as one of its Board members from 1945 to 1950.

In addition to being Secretary, he served his annual conference as a member of numerous boards and committees.

Ehrhart died May 22, 1960, and was buried at Stehman's Memorial Church Cemetery, Manor Township, Lancaster Co., Pa.

BRUCE C. SOUDERS

EICHELBERGER, JAMES W. (1886-1967), American A.M.E. Zion Church leader, was born in COLUMBIA, S. C., on Aug. 30, 1886. His father was a successful minister of the A.M.E. ZION CHURCH.

Baptized when he was six weeks old, he was admitted several years later to membership in Jones Chapel A.M.E. Zion Church in Columbia, S. C. He was employed as a printer in the A.M.E. Zion Publishing House at CHARLOTTE, N. C. upon graduation from LIVINGSTON COLLEGE at Salisbury, N. C. For three years (1904-07), he served on the faculty of Clinton Institute (now College) at Rock Hill, S. C. For two years he conducted his own printing establishment at Columbia. During this period James Eichelberger attended the International Sunday School Convention at Toronto, Canada, and he became devoted to the SUNDAY SCHOOL movement and also the allied work of the Christian Endeavor.

In 1907, through the generosity of SOUTH CAROLINA friends and his own means, Eichelberger was privileged to attend the Fifth World's Sunday School Convention in Rome. He also attended the Sixth World's Sunday School Convention in Washington, D. C. In 1909 James W. Eichelberger was elected principal of Walters' Institute and served until 1921.

In 1913, he was one of only two individuals from Zion Methodist to attend the Seventh World's Sunday School Convention at Zurich, SWITZERLAND.

In 1916 the General Conference, meeting in Louisville, Ky., provided for the first Sunday School Board, and James W. Eichelberger was elected General Superintendent of Sunday Schools on half time.

A year later (1917), the Sunday School Bulletin made its appearance and was published by Eichelberger until 1924.

In 1924 when the General Conference meeting in Indianapolis, Ind. merged the Sunday School and Varick Christian Endeavor Union, James W. Eichelberger was elected Director of Religious Education. In 1924, the Sunday School Bulletin was succeeded by the Church School Herald and was edited by Eichelberger until 1932.

Meanwhile, he was active on many international and world boards. Among these were the American Section of the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL and the World Methodist Council itself; also various Church Boards as well as the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; the Chicago Urban League; The Association for the Study of Negro Life and History; American Adult Education Association; the American Council of Education; and National Education Association and American Education Fellowship.

A trustee of Livingstone College, and the International Society of Christian Endeavor, J. W. Eichelberger held an official relationship to the NATIONAL and WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES as well.

James W. Eichelberger was a member of the General Conference of the A.M.E. Zion Church in every session from 1908 until 1964. He died on Jan. 30, 1967.

DAVID H. BRADLEY

EISELEN, FREDERICK CARL (1872-1937), Old Testament scholar and president of the then Garrett Biblical Institute (now GARRETT THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY), was born Nov. 28, 1872, in Mundelsheim, Germany, where he completed his early education. Coming to America, he earned an A.M. degree at New York University in 1899 with Phi Beta Kappa honors, and a B.D. at DREW in 1900. After graduate study at the University of Pennsylvania and at Columbia, he received the Ph.D. degree from the latter in 1907. His graduate studies were continued at the University of Berlin in 1908-09.

On Oct. 23, 1901, he married Lillian R. Robinson, and two children were born to that union.

He was called by Garrett Biblical Institute to the chair of Old Testament Interpretation in 1902, in which position he continued until he became president in 1924. He had previously served as Dean of Faculty and Professor of Biblical Literature at NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY.

At the M. E. GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1924, Frederick Carl Eiselen was chairman of the strategic Committee on Education and in 1932 was elected Corresponding Secretary of the Board of Education of the M. E. Church. While his leadership of the Board of Education was cut short by his death in 1937, the major emphases of his administration, the insistence of the highest standards for church institutions, are still at work in the church.

Eiselen was a member of many professional societies including the American Oriental Society and the Society of Biblical Research. In some cases he held membership in the German counterpart of the American society. He was also a member of the Religious Education Society, and the International Council of Religious Education. For many years, he served as a member of the Candidates Committee of the Board of Foreign Missions.

He was a frequent contributor to professional journals, wrote numerous books on the Old Testament, and was one of three editors elected to prepare the Abingdon Bible Commentary.

Frederick Carl Eiselen came to Garrett at a time when there had been a serious upheaval over the newer views of the Old Testament occasioned by the so-called higher criticism. If possible, he proposed to his students still more radical views than his predecessors, but did it in such an irenic fashion that the new was accepted as a part of the old.

Eiselen served the church as a member of the PHILADELPHIA and the ROCK RIVER CONFERENCES. He died May 5, 1937.

C. F. Price, Who's Who in American Methodism. 1916.

HORACE GREELEY SMITH

TORSTEN EKHOLM

EKHOLM, TORSTEN STANISLAUS (1892-), a Swedish-speaking Methodist minister in FINLAND, was born Aug. 25, 1892, in Viipuri (Viborg), Finland, an interesting medieval city in Karelia, the east province, where four languages were spoken. Early in boyhood he came in contact with Methodist work. After graduating from college he studied at the University of Helsinki, his main interest being history and fine arts. He was also active in the Student Christian Movement, being the first president of the Swedish-speaking group of Christian students. He became a member of the Swedish-speaking church in Helsinki, received his local preacher's license, and began his work as a Methodist minister in 1917, encouraged by his pastor, KARL JAKOB HURTIG. Ekholm was accepted on trial in 1918 and in 1920 into full connection with the Finland Swedish Conference, where he worked as pastor in several charges, as district superintendent and as secretary of the conference, until his retirement in 1958. He was editor of Nya Budbäraren (New Messenger) from 1936-60, well known as preacher and author both within the church and in wide circles among religious people in Finland. He has also been an artist, and among other pieces of work painted the altarpiece in one of the churches. Two of his children, a son and a daughter, are in the Methodist ministry.

Torsten S. Ekholm, Gamla Karleby Metodistförsamling 50 år Ekenäs, 1933.

Nya Budbäraren (New Messenger), 1942, 1952.

MANSFIELD HURTIG

EKIN, GEORGE (1782-1856), pioneer American preacher, was born May 22, 1782 in Newtown-Stuart, Tyrone County, Ireland. He became interested in Methodism at age fifteen, and preached without a license on the Newtown-Stuart Circuit a few years later. He finally received a license at the age of twenty-two. His conversion to Methodism was unpopular with his family, all of whom were strict Calvinists.

He arrived in the United States on May 1, 1810, landing at BALTIMORE, Md. with his wife. He brought with him a letter from his Circuit Superintendent attesting to his ability as a preacher, and was admitted to the HOLSTON CONFERENCE in September 1811. His first charge was the French Broad Circuit.

Ekin showed amazing success in bringing people into the church. In his diary, he stated that he had received 10,000 into the church and had been the instrument of conversion for 8,000 during his ministry. In 1842, while serving the Blountville Circuit, Ekin brought 1,214 new members into the church, the largest number ever received in the history of the Holston Conference.

He began organizing Sunday schools in 1813, and in one charge he organized eleven Sunday schools while serving twenty churches with nearly 1,800 members.

The secret of Ekin's power of persuasion lay in his intensity when preaching. His sermons reflected his single-mindedness of purpose: the saving of souls. Like many other ministers of his time he was emphatically anti-slavery, but he opposed violence over the question.

George Ekin died Aug. 2, 1856, and was buried in Abingdon, Va., but he now lies in Uriel Church cemetery near Jonesboro, Tenn.

I. P. Martin, Holston. 1945.

R. N. Price, Holston. 1903-13.

L. W. PIERCE

EKLUND, ANNA (1867-1949), "Sister Anna of Petrograd," a deaconess, served in St. Petersburg/Petrograd/Leningrad, Russia, for over thirty years. She was born in Turku (Åbo), FINLAND, May 25, 1867. She prepared for her future task as a deaconess at the Methodist Deaconess Institute in HAMBURG, GERMANY. The first years she served as a nurse to the Rettig and Wrede families. In 1907, when GEORGE A. SIMONS was named superintendent for Finland and RUSSIA, she was called to join him in his work in St. Petersburg, then the Russian capital. She started a deaconess institute, and several of her young pupils have continued her work in ESTONIA, the other Baltic States, and Germany.

During the hard years of the First World War she became Sister Anna of Petrograd. When Simons was compelled to leave Russia in October, 1918, she stayed and took care of church property, the pastors' home, and the congregation. Quite alone she had to take care of everything: she was caretaker and gravedigger; she took care of the sick and the dead; she acted as pastor and Sunday school teacher, and leader of steadily growing social work. In the 1920's she was the leader of the great relief work carried on by the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States. With an almost incredible energy and total self-offering she became the angel of help to thousands. Ultimately she was quite exhausted and had to leave Russia, fleeing to Estonia and thence returning to Finland in 1931. After months of rest she recovered and even kept in contact with friends on the other side of the Iron Curtain. Her last years were spent in the Methodist home for the aged in HELSINKI, Finland, where she died on Dec. 27, 1949.

ANNA EKLUND

Leslie A. Marshall, The Romance of a Tract and Its Sequel. Riga, 1928.

Nya Budbäraren (New Messenger), Jan. 15, 1950.

K. A. Wrede, Minen. Kuopio, 1940. MANSFIELD HURTIQ

ELBA FEMALE SEMINARY, Brinkleyville, Halifax Co., N. C., a private boarding school for young ladies in existence during the middle of the nineteenth century, was owned and operated by WILLIAM HENRY WILLS, a distinguished M. P. minister and educator. JESSE H. PAGE, son-in-law of Wills and a Methodist minister, served as Principal of Elba Female Seminary as well as Halifax Male Academy. In 1860, instruction at Elba Seminary was offered in general academic areas, and as a result of the influence of Wills and Page, special emphasis was placed on religious training. Many of the students boarded at the nearby home of L. W. Batchelor, prominent M. P. lay leader and local minister and a principal contributor, along with Wills and others, to the erection of Bethesda M. P. Church, which was built near the Seminary in 1853. A boardinghouse or dormitory for students at Elba Seminary was located near "Rocky Hill," the Wills home. Both Elba Female Seminary and Halifax Male Academy were highly rated for the quality of their educational program and were patronized by many Methodist families in northeastern North Carolina. Both schools during their existence received the enthusiastic endorsement of the NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE of the M. P. Church.

J. Elwood Carroll, History of the North Carolina Conference of the Methodist Protestant Church. N.p., 1939.

Ralph Hardee Rives, "A History of Methodist Education in North Carolina," The Rocky Mount (N. C.) Telegram, Oct. 23, 1966.

RALPH HARDEE RIVES

ELDER designates the higher order of the ministry in Methodist Episcopal Churches, the DEACON being the lower order. "Elder" is a word used synonymously with "Presbyter," which in turn comes from Presbuturos—the word in the New Testament which denotes the seniors of each Christian group. The Elders of the New Testament Church were plainly the pastors or overseers, who were expected to expound the Scripture and to administer the Sacraments. The word "Presbyter" came into English as the word "Priest," by one of those interesting deviations often found in folk-etymology. But the word "priest," by the time of the Reformation, had come to stand for a type of sacerdotalism which Protestantism could not accept, and certain of the Reformed Churches adopted the word "Elder" as more typical of the New Testament ministerial leader. However, in the Roman Catholic Church, the Church of England, and the Protestant Episcopal Church, the word Priest is used to this day (instead of Presbyter, or Elder) for the higher order.

JOHN WESLEY, when he abridged the Prayer Book for American Methodism, carefully changed the word Priest to Elder everywhere it occurred.

At the organization of the M. E. Church in 1784, the CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE agreed to form "an Episcopal Church under the direction of Superintendents, Elders, Deacons and Helpers, according to the Forms of Ordination annexed to our Liturgy and the Form of Discipline set forth in these Minutes." However, beginning with the Christmas Conference no one could be ordained an Elder without first being elected to that order by the Conference. English bishops, on the other hand, have always ordained men Deacons and Elders solely on their own authority. In America, however, Methodist orders always have been conferred first by vote of the Annual Conference, and then by the formal rite of ordination conducted by a bishop.

In The United Methodist Church only a bishop may ordain. In the ordination of Deacons he alone imposes hands upon the candidate. In the ordination of Elders, not only the bishop but other Elders present must assist him, thus forming a presbytery (group of priests) who, by the imposition of hands, ordain the ordinand.

There is no higher order than Elder in Episcopal Methodist Churches, as the bishop is not considered to be a third order in Methodism, but simply an Elder set apart and consecrated for a special type of work. He is sometimes said to be primus inter pares, or first among equals, but he claims no third ecclesiastical order as do the bishops of the Church of England, and those of the Protestant Episcopal Church in America.

A PRESIDING ELDER, as the district superintendent was formerly called, was an Elder appointed to preside over a DISTRICT. Local preachers who have acceptably filled the ministry as deacons for a certain number of years, are eligible, after certain disciplinary regulations have been met, to be voted into the office of Elder and to be ordained.

Among the Wesleyan Methodists the only ordination recognized is that of Elder. The same is true of nearly all the non-Episcopal Methodist Churches. There has been a growing sentiment within recent years in The United Methodist Church to do away with the order of Deacons, making this another office rather than an order in the Church.

Each Elder at his ordination is given a certificate of ordination—his CREDENTIALS—and he may exercise the power and privileges of his ordination as long as he lives.

N. B. Harmon, Rites and Ritual. 1926.
M. Simpson, Cyclopaedia. 1878.

N. B. H.

ELDERDICE, HUGH LATIMER (1860-1938), American minister, and noted college president, was born July 24, 1860 in Carlisle, Pa.

He was licensed to preach by the M. P. Church while a student at WESTERN MARYLAND COLLEGE, where he completed undergraduate work in 1882. St. John's College, Annapolis, Md., granted him an honorary D.D. degree and ADRIAN COLLEGE awarded him an LL.D. degree.

Elderdice was ordained during the 1885 session of the MARYLAND CONFERENCE of the M. P. Church, and served churches in BALTIMORE and Pocomoke City for twelve years. He organized the first Christian Endeavor Society in the Conference, and secured denominational recognition for the group.

In 1897 Elderdice was called to the presidency of Westminster Theological Seminary (now WESLEY THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY), a position he held until 1932. This was an important period of growth and expansion for the institution, and many campus buildings and faculty residences were built. Upon retirement he continued as professor of homiletics.

Elderdice served as secretary of the conference for five years and as secretary of the denomination's GENERAL CONFERENCE for four years. He was named as a delegate to every General Conference from 1900 until his death.

When the METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH was invited to join the two large Episcopal Methodisms in editing and compiling the Methodist Hymnal of 1934, Elderdice was named one of its Hymnal Commissioners. He served particularly well on the small committee which drew up the responsive readings in The Hymnal.

Elderdice's eminence as a leader of his church was demonstrated when he was named as the representative of the M. P. Church at sessions of the World Council of Faith and Order held in 1927 in Lausanne, Switzerland and in 1937 at Edinburgh, Scotland.

He died May 12, 1938 at his home in Westminster, Md.

Manuscript in Wesley Theological Seminary Library.
The Methodist Protestant Recorder, May 20, 1938.

M. J. SHROYER

EL DORADO, ARKANSAS, U.S.A. First Church is a strong vital church located in the principal city of the oil belt that stretches across southern ARKANSAS.

Methodism was organized in Union County, Ark. in September of 1833, and in that same year First Church was founded under the leadership of Henry Cornelius. He was aided in this endeavor by a group of dedicated laymen, including Mr. and Mrs. John H. Cornish, the first members of the congregation. The first building was erected in 1845 on land purchased from Warner Brown for the sum of $30. The church has continued to occupy this same site until the present time. In 1871 a second building was erected at a cost of $12,000. The present sanctuary was constructed in 1922, and was remodeled in 1957, when a spacious and serviceable education building was added to the facilities.

First Church has 2,528 members (1970) which represents nearly one-tenth of the total population of the city. It maintains an active and intimate fellowship through worship, the preaching ministry, and educational ministry, and the work of several groups and organizations within the congregation. Interest in the local community is evident in that in the middle 1950's this church helped to establish another congregation in El Dorado, making this new church the fourth United Methodist Church in the city.

JAMES H. SEWELL

ELECTION. One of the key controversial issues in the Wesleyan message concerned the meaning of the doctrine of election. This great Biblical word expresses the idea that God chooses those nations and persons whom He wishes to employ as His instruments and agents. In the government and salvation of the human race God in all things exercises a farseeing and wise initiative, and without this divine initiative man can do nothing of religious worth. God has indeed endowed man with morally responsible free choice in certain matters. Nevertheless, man cannot become the servant of God and the child of God simply of his own volition, as and when he will. He must be chosen by God and empowered by God, and must serve according to the calling of God. Thus the notion of election is inseparably connected with the conception of the sovereignty of God, the ruler of all, and of salvation by GRACE. The preaching of the Wesleys was often accompanied by controversy over the doctrine of election, and its implications.

Election in the Old Testament. A major theme of the Old Testament is that God chose, or elected, His people Israel to be the means whereby He would declare His truth and glory to the whole world. This is the subject of many of the early chapters of Genesis. Thus the picturesque story describes how God set aside Cain and his descendants, who symbolize the capable, wealthy, and ambitious in the things of this world, with their pride and aggression (Genesis iv, 1-24), and instead chose Seth and his descendants, who symbolize those who cultivate religion (iv, 25-6). From his family God chose Noah, the type of the pious man, though still a pagan, separating him from the rest of the licentious race (vi). Among the sons of Noah, Ham, symbolically representing the Africans, and Japheth, representing the Indo-Europeans, are set aside, and Shem, the typical ancestor of the Semites, is chosen (ix, 18-27). Among all the various tribes of the Semites God in course of time chose Abraham, the traditional ancestor of the Hebrew race, to be "the Father of the Faithful" (xi, 10; xii, 5; xvii, 1-8). However, not all those tribes which were physically descended from Abraham inherited his faith. Therefore, some races closely akin to the Jews are rejected from the divine election. Such are the Ishmaelites (xvii, 15-21; xxi, 9-21), the Moabites and Ammonites (xix, 30-38), and in particular the hated Edomites (xxvii, 30-41; xxxii, 3). So one is left at last with Jacob, the traditional ancestor of the twelve tribes of Israel (xvi, 1-27). Thus the Hebrews dramatically symbolized to themselves that while on the one hand they were but one nation among many, having many natural kindred, yet on the other hand they were by mysterious divine choice the one and only People of God.

The Hebrews were never greatly tempted to suppose that God had chosen them because they were, humanly speaking, an important nation. The prophetic view was that while God, the Lord of the whole earth, could control the greatest of world-powers (Isaiah x, 5-15), He had deliberately chosen a minor power to be the instrument of His working in history, because this most greatly declared His sovereign glory (Deuteronomy vii, 6-8). Another uncomfortable but profound prophetic insight was that the chosen people were not necessarily more righteous or well-pleasing to God than other nations (Deuteronomy ix, 4-6). Membership of the chosen People was a privilege which brought with it a searching responsibility. Of all sinners, those among the Hebrews were most particularly to be punished (Amos iii, 2). Thus there is no element of divine favoritism in divine election. It is simply God's sovereign choice of the instrument He will use.

As we look back critically at this judgment of the Hebrews upon themselves, we see that the important factor is not that they considered themselves to be a chosen People. Many nations have felt this. The significant thing is that historical experience has shown that the Hebrews were the chosen People. Though they were not necessarily more virtuous than other people, they were endowed with a unique genius for religion. Other nations were indeed endowed with other gifts. Nevertheless, practically everything of imperishable worth which the modern world has inherited from antiquity in the sphere of religion has come from the Hebrews.

Election in the New Testament. In the New Testament this attitude is applied to the Church, which is the New Israel, God's People of the new covenant. At a moment chosen by the divine wisdom Christ was sent to the historically prepared People (Galatians iv, 4). From among the spiritually awakened within Israel, prepared by the preaching of John the Baptist, Christ chose the company of His disciples (Mark i, 16-20, etc.). Within the company of His disciples, the New Israel of God, Christ chose and appointed His twelve Apostles to a position of intimacy with Himself, and of leadership (Mark iii, 13-19); and among them in turn, St. Peter to a position of special leadership (Matthew xvi, 16-19). Though they had a human freedom to turn away from this great destiny (for Judas proved to be an apostate), yet in the last resort the Apostles did not owe their position to the fact that they were meritorious volunteers, but to Christ's election (John xv, 16), and the spiritual power they had was granted to them by the Lord (John xx, 21-3). Throughout Acts the Church is deeply aware that she is going to that part of the mission which God has appointed, and is preaching the faith to those whom God has called to faith. In particular, it is God who has mysteriously summoned the Gentiles into the Church (Acts x; Ephesians iii, 1-9). While the servants of God were ordained to their office by laying on of hands in the Church, it is an essential prerequisite that they be called by God (Acts xiii, 1-3).

Within the body of the Church there are various members and officers who have diverse functions to perform, some purely private and apparently insignificant, others attended with publicity and honor. Yet there is absolutely no place for rivalry and odious comparisons, for all the endowments are the unaccountable and gracious gifts of God in Christ, granted according to His sovereign choice for the benefit of the whole and the accomplishment of the divine purpose in the world (I Corinthians xii; Ephesians iv, 7-13). No servant of God has any ground for self-congratulation, as though by his own merit he had attained to his office. The largest scale example of the outworking of this principle is outlined in Romans ix-xi. The Gentile Christians are certainly not to glory because the apparent disobedience to Christ of the bulk of the Hebrew people is leaving the Church predominantly Gentile. God, who according to the sovereign initiative of an age-long purpose is able to overrule the disobedience of Israel for His greater glory in the calling of the Gentiles, is well able to call Israel again to obedience, to His own greater glory and the further blessing of the world. Here then in the New Testament is the essential prophetic attitude to history and human affairs. It is an attitude of faith, which sees even amidst the perplexities and wrongs of human life a sovereign divine initiative at work to choose God's instruments and the time at which He will employ them. This in the broad Biblical sense is election.

Particular Election. An issue of systematic or speculative theology is the discussion as to the reason why some individuals become Christian believers, and not others. Down the centuries this matter has often troubled the Church with controversy and is of interest to Methodism because some of the most violent opponents of the Wesleys assailed them with the charge of teaching erroneous doctrine.

The New Testament treats this in an empirical or practical manner, rather than a speculative. It is plainly declared on the one hand that the love of God extends to the whole of mankind (John iii, 16, etc.), and accordingly, that He wills the Christian salvation of all men (I Timothy ii 3). On the other hand it is equally plainly stated that saving faith is the gift of God (I Corinthians xii, 3; Ephesians ii, 8), and that it is granted to those to whom God has chosen to grant it (Romans viii 29-30). This forms a basis for a practical preaching of the Gospel, but nothing is said further as to why particular individuals are converted. All the answers given are attended by certain speculative difficulties, because we do not know the secrets of all hearts, or the dealings of God with all individual souls in this life, and the next. It is therefore as well that no General Council of the Church has ever pronounced one single answer to be the only orthodox doctrine.

The most general answer given in the Church, and one that was strongly emphasized by the Wesleys, and their followers after them, is that while no man can be saved unless God elects to save him, and no man can repent and receive faith unless God chooses to exercise His initiative and give him grace to repent, yet God does bring every soul of man in some way and at some time to the place where it can repent and turn to Christ. Thus those who are finally lost are lost not because God has not elected to save them, but because they have freely refused His initiative.

This does justice to God's universal love and grace, but it is clear that there are speculative difficulties. In a world in which so many lived before Christ, and the majority alive today never hear the Christian Gospel, or at least never hear it with any degree of clarity and persuasive force, it is not at all obvious how every soul is brought to the point when the door is truly open for the choice of faith. It has to be assumed that there are many people who do not consciously confess Christian faith, or outwardly appear to be Christians, who are yet in a state of Christian grace, and that they will have opportunity to grow in grace in the life beyond this. Nevertheless, this is a matter of speculation, and not of God's secure revelation in Scripture.

The other most usual answer is the doctrine of Particular Election. This sweepingly extends the general Biblical notion of Election to the doctrine that God has chosen according to His foreseeing purpose those individual souls whom He wills should be the heirs of Christian salvation. These, the Elect, may struggle long and hard against God's convincing grace, but they are bound to yield to it in the end. In this sense, God's grace toward them is irresistible. And these, the Elect, are the only souls which have any hope of salvation. God has elected not to exert His indispensable initiative towards the rest.

To explain the conversion of some and the unbelief of others, which is often strangely unaccountable in human terms as one considers the practical mission of the Church, simply in terms of unlimited divine sovereignty is the sort of speculative answer which appeals to some thinkers who greatly desire a tidy and cohesive intellectual system. Yet it appears to do so at the cost of calling in question the universal love and grace of God, and His reasonableness in dealing with all His children. The doctrine of Particular Election and its theological implications enthrones God as the Sovereign Potentate of the universe, which indeed He is, but it hardly represents Him as the loving Father of mankind. It is as well for Methodists, who in the course of controversy with Calvinism have strongly repudiated this doctrine, to understand the spiritual rationale which lies behind it. The upholder of the doctrines of Particular Election and Predestination will of course affirm that he does so because he believes it to be the doctrine of Scripture. The pertinent question is, however, why some should feel impelled to give this interpretation to Scripture, while others do not.

The Augustinian theology (so called from St. Augustine of Hippo, 354-430, who first articulated it in the Church), and of which the doctrine of Particular Election is the characteristic element, goes back to the conversion-experience. The man who has groaned under a bitter sense of the impotence of his sinful will to choose what he knows to be good, and who then in conversion has come to a wonderful sense of release, and of freedom to do what is right, instinctively ascribes the whole of this saving act to the grace of God, and nothing at all to his own deserving or striving. His deepest awareness is that he was not piously searching for God, but running off in mistaken or even perverse paths, when God unaccountably sought him, confronted him, and laid the hand of His power upon him. God set His love upon him when he did not at all deserve to be loved, and has done for him what he could not hope to do for himself. The existential cry of this man is: "God did it all! I am nothing!"

Men of every religious tradition can agree that so far as it goes this is an authentic account of profound Christian experience. However, some have thought to go further than this in theological speculation. It is at this point that the theological divergence has appeared. The proposition, "God did it all," has been taken as a sufficient canon for the interpretation of Scripture, and as a sufficient account of the whole relation of all human beings to God their governor. Upon this foundation has then been built a complete speculative system. So one has the Augustinian theology of a strong emphasis upon the entire depravity of the natural man, and the complete bondage of his will; the everlasting Decree of Election (and in some teachers, the Decree of Reprobation also); Predestination, Irresistible Grace, and the Final Perseverance of the Saints.

Those who do not accept this system demur not on account of what is said practically and devotionally of the conversion experience, but on account of the speculative structure built upon it. The man who has been wonderfully apprehended by God does rightly give all the glory to the sovereign initiative of God. The New Testament is full of this theme. Yet when one turns from the existential experience of conversion to consideration of God's spiritual government of the whole race, many other complicating factors are to be taken into account as well as the proposition "God did it all!" Such are: God's universal love, His reasonableness in dealing with all his children, man's moral responsibility, and God's promise of the gift of grace to all those who will reverently use the means of grace (see MEANS OF GRACE).

Wesley and Election. The Wesleys found themselves embroiled in controversy, at times very bitter, on these issues with the Calvinist party. Wesley strongly denied unconditional Particular Election, Reprobation, and the Final Perseverance of the Saints, and for this he was assailed as teaching a dangerously compromised, inadequate, and an unscriptural doctrine of salvation by grace. His answers, directed particularly to his friend GEORGE WHITEFIELD and those who worked with him, are characteristically practical and irenic. He seeks to show how far he can go towards the Augustinian emphasis of Calvinism in a Scriptural doctrine of Election without involving himself in making God responsible for the perdition of the finally lost. His plain implication in all this is that the furious controversy is an unnecessary one because the issue is not one of spiritual or moral discipline, nor of the practical evangelistic mission, but a mere matter of theological speculation. His effective plea is that evangelical brethren need not be prevented from harmonious cooperation by predestinarian theories. Wesley's doctrine of Election is therefore a very far-reaching one, giving all possible scope to the divine sovereignty and the divine initiative. Yet it is a severely practical one, dealing with God's providential government of the race, and His work in the heart, yet carefully avoiding any element which would impugn God's universal goodness, or encourage any man to presume upon some supposed unconditional divine purpose of his own salvation.

Wesley's memorandum to Whitefield, recorded in the Journal for August 24, 1743, runs as follows (author's comments in italics): "I believe that God, before the foundation of the world, did unconditionally elect certain persons to do certain works, as Paul to preach the Gospel: [i.e., a preacher does not make himself into a Paul by his superior consecration. When God has a special work to do He sends and equips a special man, who is empowered to do what another cannot do. Nevertheless, this special equipment does not by itself unconditionally elect this outstanding figure to be an heir of salvation.]

"That He has unconditionally elected some nations to receive peculiar privileges; the Jewish nation in particular:

"That He has unconditionally elected some nations to hear the Gospel; as England and Scotland now, and many others in past ages: [i.e. that some nations are Christian, but not others, is not simply of human agency. The Reformation took place in Germany in the 16th century, and not at another time and place, by divine initiative. The Evangelical Revival took place in the 18th century and not in the 17th not simply because John Wesley was more consecrated than his father or grandfather, but because God's time had come.]

"That He has unconditionally elected some persons to many peculiar privileges, both with regard to temporal and spiritual things: [i.e. perhaps, George to be King of England, and Wesley to be ruler of Methodism. Yet they are not unconditionally saved thereby. It is just that they have been appointed a special task.]

"And I do not deny, (though I cannot prove it is so,) that He has unconditionally elected some persons to eternal glory. [However, this is purely a matter of speculation, advanced as an olive-branch to the Calvinists.]

"But I cannot believe that all those who are not thus elected to glory must perish everlastingly; or that there is one soul on earth, who has not ever had a possibility of escaping eternal damnation: [i.e. *the speculative doctrine of Reprobation is particularly to be condemned. In his authoritative Notes on the New Testament, on Acts X, 35, Wesley sheds more light on this. "But in every nation he that feareth him, and worketh righteousness—He that first reverences God as great, wise, good;—and secondly, from this awful regard to Him, not only avoids all known evil, but endeavors, according to the best light he has, to do all things well. Is accepted of him—Through Christ, though he knows him not. The assertion is express, and admits of no exception. He is in the favor of God, whether enjoying His written word and ordinances or not. Nevertheless, the addition of these is an unspeakable blessing to those who were before, in some measure accepted; otherwise, God would never have sent an angel from heaven to direct Cornelius to St. Peter:" i.e., the sincerely God-fearing and righteous man who has had no opportunity of knowing of Christ virtually belongs to Christ, and will be found in Christ at the end. Yet the man who has heard of Christ, and who instead persists in trusting for salvation in his own sincere righteousness is on the path to spiritual loss, because faith in Christ is God's appointed way of salvation. So it is not superfluous to evangelize the righteous pagan, and join him to the Church, though if he remains genuinely ignorant of the higher way we need not consign him to hell. In the matter of salvation the sovereign God is not bound to the means of grace, but man is.]*

"With regard to Irresistible Grace I believe that the grace which brings faith, and thereby salvation, into the soul, is irresistible at that moment:

"That most believers may remember some time when God did irresistibly convince them of sin:

"That most believers at other times find God irresistibly acting upon their souls:

"Yet I believe, that the grace of God, both before and after those moments, may be and hath been resisted; And

"That in general it does not act irresistibly, but we may comply therewith or not:" [i.e. the existential conversion-experience "God did it all" is an authentic impression.

Nevertheless, one must not argue from this a formal theological proposition that the ultimate choice between salvation and perdition does not rest with man, or that the converted man can rest assured of his final salvation simply on the ground that at the present moment he is the object of saving grace. It is possible for him to fall if he does not keep himself in spiritual discipline.]

This then is the nature of the celebrated "hair's breadth" which separates authentic Methodist doctrine from Calvinism (Minutes of Conference, Aug. 2, 1745, Q. 22, cf. Journal, May 14, 1765). Since Wesley's time there is little to report so far as formal theological development is concerned. Methodist scholars and teachers have generally assumed that they followed Wesley's doctrine of salvation by grace, through faith, with his "Arminian" affirmation of universal grace and denial of Reprobation. However, liberal circles which have adopted a more optimistic view of human nature than Wesley's, and a more activist view of the place of Christian organization in the renovation of human society, have in fact tacitly but greatly reduced the place he gave to the sovereign initiative of grace in the conversion of man and the revival of the Church. It has been assumed that the stream of human affairs, and of religious affairs, is much more within the control of responsible human choice than Wesley would have allowed, and less subject therefore to divine election.

C. C. Berkouwer, Divine Election, trans. Bekker. Grand Rapids, 1960. (Detailed restatement of the Calvinist position.)

M. J. Farelly, Predestination, Grace, and Free Will. Westminster, Md., 1964. (Roman Catholic statement.)

J. Jocz, A Theology of Election, Israel, and the Church. New York, 1958.

J. B. Mozley, The Augustinian Doctrine of Predestination. London, New York, 1878. (Detailed discussion of patristic doctrine, critical of Augustine's position.)

W. B. Pope, Compendium of Christian Theology. 1880.

H. H. Rowley, The Biblical Doctrine of Election. London, 1952.

R. Watson, Theological Institutes. 1823-26.

J. Wesley, "A Dialogue between a Predestinarian and His Friend," Works. 1829-31.

—, "Predestination Calmly Considered," Works. 1829-31.

JOHN LAWSON

ELECTORAL CONFERENCE, THE, was an organization of laymen in the former M. E. Church who at first met quadrennially to elect lay delegates to the General Conference of that Church.

The legislation in the 1872 Discipline which established the Electoral Conference provided that a Conference of laymen should assemble on the third day of an Annual Conference at the session immediately preceding a GENERAL CONFERENCE. This Electoral Conference was to be composed of one layman from each circuit or station within the bounds of the Annual Conference; and on assembling the Electoral Conference organized by electing a chairman and secretary of their own number.

The Electoral Conference, while it sat in parallel with the Ministerial Conference at the time of electing delegates, did not enjoy any other right than that of electing laymen to the General Conference. Its members were not members of the Annual Conference, nor were they considered such, though sometimes matters were referred to them by the real conference. The Electoral Conference became known as the Lay Electoral Conference in the Constitution of the M. E. Church in 1900, and was given the right to vote on Constitutional changes as well as to elect lay delegates to the General Conference. The Constitution of 1900 also directed the Lay Electoral Conference to assemble at the seat of the Annual Conference on the first Friday of the session immediately preceding the General Conference unless the General Conference should provide otherwise. It was given the right to elect as many delegates to the General Conference as there were ministerial delegates from that Annual Conference. Other provisions similar to the ones set forth above were also provided. (Discipline, M. E. Church, 1912, paragraph 39.)

Later the Lay Electoral Conference became the Lay Conference (Paragraph 64, Discipline, M. E. Church, 1936) and was then given more power. By this time it was composed of lay members, one from each pastoral charge within the bounds of the Annual Conference, who were to be elected by the lay members of the charge over twenty-one years of age. With the coming of Church Union in 1939, the separate lay conference was eliminated and one layman from each charge was elected a member of the Annual Conference; but all lay and clerical members sat together, voting as an entity, except in cases where ministerial qualifications were involved, at which time only ministers might vote; and when the two respective orders, clergy and laymen, were to elect their delegates to the General Conference, they divided for such balloting. This custom continues today in the United Methodist Church. (See LAY MOVEMENT.)

N. B. Harmon, Organization. 1962.

D. Sherman, Revisions of the Discipline. 1874.

M. Simpson, Cyclopaedia. 1878.

N. B. H.

ELECTRICAL TREATMENT (Wesley's). JOHN WESLEY became interested in electricity from the late 1740's. In his Journal, Oct. 16, 1747, he described a visit to "the electrical experiments" in London. He read a great deal about the subject and came to believe strongly in its healing power, "in particular, that it is the most efficacious medicine in nervous disorders of every kind, which has ever yet been discovered" (Journal, Jan. 4, 1768.) The Journal also refers to its use by him in cases of epilepsy and angina pectoris. The kind of electrical machine that he employed may still be seen in Wesley's House, City Road, LONDON: it consists essentially of a glass cylinder, which can be freely rotated, and a metal arm with a thin rod attached, at the end of which is a small metal ball. The patient held the ball, and received an electric shock as the metal arm made contact with the rotating cylinder. In 1760 Wesley published a book on the subject, The Desideratum, or, Electricity Made Plain and Useful, preface dated Nov. 1, 1759, publication 1760. The Journal, Jan. 4, 1768, records the reading of Joseph Priestley's History and Present State of Electricity, London, 1767. John Wesley used electrical treatment himself as late as 1783. His enthusiasm illustrates his scientific curiosity, his constant interest in methods of healing, and his desire to see them widely applied. There is no substantial connection, however, between these eighteenth century experiments with electrotherapy and twentieth century developments such as the use of electric shock treatment for some types of mental illness, introduced in Italy in 1938.

A. W. Hill, John Wesley. 1958.

M. W. Woodward, Wesley's Chapel. 1966.

JOHN KENT

ELFNER, JAKOB (1890-), German district superintendent and treasurer of the SOUTH GERMANY ANNUAL CONFERENCE, was born Feb. 17, 1890, at Heidelberg. He was trained in the publishing trade, then attended the Frankfurt Theological Seminary (PREDIGERSEMINAR) and was ordained in 1920. He served in various circuits; when at Waiblingen (1925-32), he built a large church. He was district superintendent of the Nuremberg District 1932-41, and chief administering director of Frankfurt deaconess motherhouse, Bethanien, 1941-60. He had charge of the reconstruction of the bombed hospital, and of the enlargement and renovation of the older Frankfurt hospital. His brethren rate him as an excellent administrator. He retired in 1960 to live in Frankfurt. He served as treasurer to the South Germany Annual Conference, 1932-45, and to the GERMANY CENTRAL CONFERENCE, 1930-63. He was a delegate to the General Conference of the M. E. Church in the U.S.A. in 1936. For many years he was a member of the executive committee of the Methodist Church in Germany, and of the board of trustees of the theological seminary.

DIETER SACKMANN

ELGIN, ILLINOIS, U.S.A. First Church, after its construction in 1924, became known as the Church with 101 rooms. With the remodeling of the gymnasium in 1958, the church expanded to 108 rooms. The purpose of the expansion was to provide individual classrooms for every church school class. The architecture further made it necessary for every church school pupil to pass through the narthex of the church before going to his individual department. The building committee of 1924 hoped that this arrangement would strengthen both Christian education and family worship. In recent years a divided chancel with an appropriate rose window has also been installed.

The present edifice is the third one to occupy the downtown location. The first building was constructed in 1839. The architect, a local preacher by the name of Horace Benham, received $3 in cash and $147 in produce and sundries for his services. The structure, 24 x 32 feet, was painted with whitewash and buttermilk. In 1867 a second building was dedicated and became known as "Centenary Church" in recognition of the CENTENNIAL OF AMERICAN METHODISM.

Two well-known names in Methodism have been identified with the church. Bishop W. O. SHEPARD served as pastor in the early days of his ministry, and, David C. Cook, the publisher, was for many years a trustee, church school superintendent and loyal supporter of the work of the church. David C. Cook, II and David C. Cook, III have likewise been active leaders in First Church.

The membership is 2,860 (1970), making it the largest single church in the Fox River Valley, and it has a Church school enrollment of 1,326.

CARLETON C. ROGERS

ELIZABETH, NEW JERSEY, U.S.A., is a city of 111,424, just south of NEWARK, and a part of the great metropolitan area of Northern Jersey itself. It was named for Elisabeth Carteret, the wife of George Carteret, and became the first English-speaking settlement in NEW JERSEY.

The formal beginning of Methodism in Elizabeth was Sept. 6, 1785, when Bishop FRANCIS ASBURY preached the first sermon. It is said he missed the stagecoach and had to walk six miles into town, where he preached in the Presbyterian church. The foundations for a Methodist society were laid by the Jonathan Morrell family. In 1766 Mrs. Morrell was converted under the preaching of PHILIP EMBURY and became a member of his class in NEW YORK CITY. In 1772 she and her family moved from the JOHN STREET CHURCH in New York to Elizabeth, N. J. and, since there was no Methodist society here, she joined the Presbyterians. In October of 1785, JOHN HAGGERTY, from the John Street Church, came to preach to the Methodists assembled in the Morrell home and a Society was formed. THOMAS COKE came with Bishop Asbury to Elizabeth in 1787, and by 1809 Asbury had made at least sixteen visits to Elizabeth.

The son of Jonathan Morrell, THOMAS MORRELL, became the mainstay of the newly formed society and was so beloved as a preacher that the church became known as "Father Morrell's Church." By 1845 a church for 200 members was erected which became the parent organization from which six Methodist churches eventually emerged. In addition the German, the A.M.E., the M.P., and the Italian Methodist churches were begun in 1853, 1860, 1904 and 1919 respectively. Methodism's greatest numerical strength was reached just prior to the second World War with about 2,200 members. There were over 1,900 members in 1970. The A.M.E. Church had the largest congregation.

Of the earlier churches, Elizabeth Avenue and St. Pauls combined in 1876 to form St. James. This is the strongest downtown church in the NORTHERN NEW JERSEY CONFERENCE.

Epworth, founded in 1901, is a solid congregation demonstrating growing social concerns. Calvary Holy Trinity continues the "faith-line" of First German, 1853, First M. P., 1891, and Holy Trinity Italian Mission, 1920. Spanish-speaking members are also coming in, and it is thought that this church may comprise the most successful integration to be found anywhere in the Conference.

Park Church (from St. Pauls in 1875) ministers to the black community. People of several suburbs are drawn into its growing program.

F. Asbury, Journal and Letters. 1958.

Elizabeth Daily Journal, 1889, Feb. 24, 1923; Feb. 16, 1929. V. B. Hampton, Newark Conference. 1957.

HAROLD N. SMITH

ELIZABETH ACADEMY, Methodism's earliest church-supported school for women in America, operated at Washington, Miss., from 1818 to 1845. Bishop CHARLES B. GALLOWAY declared that this was the first chartered school of higher education for women in the world.

Its first session began Nov. 12, 1818, under the leadership of Chilion F. Stiles, a Methodist layman who was president of Elizabeth Academy until his death in 1822. Its charter was officially granted by the MISSISSIPPI legislature Feb. 17, 1819. The school was named in honor of Mrs. Elizabeth Greenfield, whose generous gifts were largely responsible for making the school possible.

Elizabeth Academy's first session had twenty-eight boarding students. Its highest enrollment was in 1828, when sixty-three students registered. There were a number of day students who took advantage of the educational opportunities offered by the Academy. Attendance was always small; only 337 were recorded as having enrolled between 1818 and 1829. The institution had to discontinue operations in 1845, but in its twenty-seven years of service it produced a number of graduates who were to become renowned for their qualities and leadership.

J. B. Cain, Mississippi Conference. 1939.

J. G. Jones, Mississippi Conference, 1887, 1908. J. B. CAIN

CHARLES ELLIOTT

ELLIOTT, CHARLES (1792-1869), American minister, editor, and prominent advocate of abolition, was born May 16, 1792 in Greenconway, County Donegal, Ireland. He united with the Wesleyan Church in IRELAND. He was privately educated and with the aid of several scholars, he completed work equivalent to that required for a degree at the university. He was licensed to preach in 1813, and emigrated to the United States in 1815, settling in western PENNSYLVANIA.

He joined the OHIO CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church in 1818. In 1822 he became Superintendent of Missions among the Wyandotte Indians at Upper Sandusky, Ohio, and for four years he was presiding elder of the Ohio District.

Elliott taught languages at Madison College, Uniontown, Pa. from 1827 to 1831, becoming presiding elder of the Pittsburgh District in 1832.

After thirteen years as editor of the Western Christian Advocate, Elliott returned to the active ministry in 1849 and was presiding elder of the Dayton District. He returned as editor of the Western Christian Advocate in 1852, resigning in 1856 to become professor of Biblical Literature and president of IOWA WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, a position he held until 1860, when he became editor of the Central Christian Advocate in St. Louis, Mo.

As editor of this publication, Elliott gained prominence for his attacks on slavery. His editorials were emotional and unrestrained. He was a member of the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1844 which adopted the PLAN OF SEPARATION resulting in the formation of the M. E. Church, South. He called the split a "violent secession, originating without necessity or adequate cause, carried on by wrong measures, pleaded for by raising fallacious issues, and, when completed, comprising several dangerous elements."

During the War Between the States, Elliott flew the Stars and Stripes from the window of the Methodist Book Concern, asked ministers and laymen to enlist in the Union Army, and according to one Southern critic, "seized every event that could be tortured into an occasion for an inflammatory article against the ministers and members of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South."

A painstaking researcher, Elliott was a prolific author of a number of studies in religion and politics, as well as a History of the Great Secession from the Methodist Episcopal Church (1855).

Elliott died Jan. 8, 1869 in Mount Pleasant, Iowa.

Appleton's Cyclopedia.

J. M. Barker, Ohio Methodism. 1898.

C. Elliott, Great Secession. 1855.

W. W. Sweet, M. E. Church and Civil War. 1912.

T. OTTO NALL

ELLIOTT, GEORGE (1851-1930), American minister and editor, was born Dec. 14, 1851, in Ohio. He graduated from CORNELL COLLEGE, Mt. Vernon, Iowa in 1872. He joined the UPPER IOWA CONFERENCE in 1874, but transferred to the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE in 1884, serving Union Square Church, BALTIMORE, and Foundry Church, WASHINGTON, D. C. From 1894 to 1900 he was pastor at Spring Garden Church, PHILADELPHIA, and was a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1900.

In 1900, Elliott transferred to the DETROIT CONFERENCE, where for six years he occupied the pulpit of Central Church, DETROIT. From 1906 to 1909 he was Field Secretary for the Board of Home Missions (ME), travelling extensively to give addresses. A volume of his sermons, The Beauty of Jesus, was published by the METHODIST PUBLISHING HOUSE. After serving two other churches, he became area Superintendent of Missions for two years.

In 1920, while a delegate to General Conference for the fifth time, he was elected editor of the Methodist Review. In 1924 and 1928 the Detroit Conference again elected him a delegate to General Conference and at each of these Conferences he was reelected editor of this magazine.

Elliott was united in marriage on Nov. 12, 1875 to Annie Corfield. Four children were born to them. He died on Nov. 2, 1930, and was buried in Roseland Park Cemetery, Detroit.

Michigan Christian Advocate, Nov. 1930.

Minutes of the Detroit Conference, 1930.

WILLIAM C. S. PELLOWE

ELLIS, JAMES ELIJAH (1894-1962), American missionary to Brazil and missionary executive, was born in Allendale, S. C., on Sept. 5, 1894. He received his A.B. and A.M. degrees from WOFFORD COLLEGE, and his B.D. from CANDLER SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY in 1922. He was then admitted into the SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE.

Eager to be a missionary, he went with his wife, Frances Watson, to BRAZIL in September 1924. He was at once appointed to teach at Instituto União in the South Brazil Conference, and to serve as general secretary of the Methodist youth societies, the Ligas Epworth, while learning the language. In 1925 he was received into full connection by transfer from the South Carolina Conference.

Ellis worked in Brazil in many capacities. In 1928 he founded the influential young people's magazine, Cruz de Malta. He was its editor for six years, a regular speaker and adviser at district, state, and regional conferences of youth. These activities made him one of the best and most beloved friends of young people in Methodism. He also founded in three regions the Methodist men's societies.

Returning from a furlough in 1934, he was appointed principal of Instituto União. Soon thereafter he was elected general secretary of Christian Education for the Methodist Church of Brazil, a position which took him to São Paulo. In this capacity Ellis worked effectively for sixteen years.

In 1945, Wofford College conferred on him the D.D. degree. In 1950 he was brought back to the States to become the executive secretary for Latin America in the BOARD OF MISSIONS. He continued twelve years in this position, superintending the work in Brazil and other Latin American countries with devotion and efficiency. His help to Brazil, especially in finances, was great, the most important being the securing of funds for the construction of a much needed new publishing house, IMPRENSA METHODISTA, in Sao Bernardo do Campo, near São Paulo. On one of his visits to Brazil, the main building was inaugurated and named in his honor.

The final years of both Ellis and his wife were undermined by serious illness. Both died on July 9, 1962, a few hours apart. There was a double funeral in COLUMBIA, S. C.

Journal of the South Carolina Conference, 1963.

ISNARD ROCHA

PAUL N. ELLIS

ELLIS, PAUL N. (1912-), an ordained elder of the Wabash Conference and a bishop of the FREE METHODIST CHURCH, was born at Birds, Ill. He was a Magna Cum Laude at the University of Illinois where he received the B.A. degree, 1945. GREENVILLE COLLEGE conferred the D.D. degree in 1965. He is a member of Phi Beta Kappa, Gamma and Psi Chi. He was pastor of Free Methodist churches in ILLINOIS, INDIANA and Ontario, CANADA for twenty-nine years. He was superintendent of the Wabash Conference when elected bishop in 1964. Five times he had been a member of the Free Methodist General Conference and had been assistant secretary of the conference since 1947. Bishop and Mrs. Ellis presently reside at Indianapolis, Ind.

BYRON S. LANSON

T. D. ELLIS

ELLIS, THOMAS DAVID (1868-1952), American church extension secretary, and outstanding leader during the last years of the M. E. Church, South, was born at Oakgrove, near Quitman, Ga., on Oct. 6, 1868. His parents were Thomas James and Rebecca Gay Ellis. He was graduated from Emory College, Oxford, Ga., with the A.B. degree in 1893, and in 1910 Emory conferred upon him the honorary D.D. degree.

In 1893 he joined the SOUTH GEORGIA CONFERENCE, serving a number of appointments including Vineville (MACON), Wesley Monumental (SAVANNAH), and Mulberry Street (Macon). Twice he served as a PRESIDING ELDER.

In 1922 he was elected Secretary of the Board of Church Extension of the M. E. Church, South. He was reelected to this important position by every GENERAL CONFERENCE until he retired in 1942. From 1910 to 1942 he was a delegate to every General Conference, including the UNITING CONFERENCE IN KANSAS CITY. He was a delegate three times to the ECUMENICAL CONFERENCE.

His most significant work for the Church was as a leader in the unification of the three branches of Methodism. He wrote the first draft of the PLAN FOR UNION and the first draft of the "Declaration of Union" adopted at the Uniting Conference. He was appointed by the Commission on Church Union of the M. E. Church, South, to be the "floor leader" when the plan for union was before the Southern General Conference at CHATTANOOGA, and again at BIRMINGHAM, where the final plan was approved. He was likewise a vigorous leader for union when the plan was adopted by the three branches of Methodism at the Uniting Conference of 1939. Eight years previously he had received a strong vote for the episcopacy. Ellis had a commanding voice and magnificent appearance. He stood tall, spoke with power and conviction. He was never a spectator, always a vital participant in the life of the church, to which he gave his life in the full measure of devotion. To a friend he said in his late years: "I have never knowingly dodged an issue!" He died in Macon, Ga., on July 7, 1952, and is buried in Riverside Cemetery in that city.

Journal of the South Georgia Conference, 1953.

J. M. Moore, Long Road to Union. 1943.

A. M. Pierce, Georgia. 1956. JAMES FREDERICK WILSON

ELLIS, WILLIAM (1770-1837), was born in Ireland. He was converted in 1796 and was a class leader and local preacher before coming to Newfoundland in 1808. While serving the Bonavista Mission in 1813-14, he preached at Bird Island Cove (later renamed Elliston in his honor), the first sermon ever heard there. He was appointed the first chairman of the Newfoundland district, when it was organized in 1815. He twice narrowly escaped being drowned while travelling on his missions. Injuries received in 1814 when his boat capsized made his work unusually difficult. By the district meeting of 1837 he was made supernumerary.

Ellis died at Harbour Grace, Sept. 21, 1837, and was the first Methodist missionary to be buried in Newfoundland. In the district minutes he was described as "a kind and amiable man of good natural abilities, and very eloquent as a speaker."

"Minutes of the Newfoundland District of the English Wesleyan Conference, 1829-1850" (manuscript).

William Wilson, Newfoundland and Its Missionaries. Cambridge, Mass.: Dakin & Metcalf, 1866. N. WINSOR

ELLOR, JAMES (1819-1899), English and American composer, was born in 1819 at Droylsden, Lancashire, England, and was a hatter by occupation. He had no formal musical education but his natural talent made him a music leader in his village three miles from MANCHESTER. He led the singing in the Wesleyan Chapel of Droylsden.

Young Ellor, then only nineteen years old, was preparing for a Sunday school anniversary in 1838 when he was inspired to write the tune "Diadem" for "All Hail the Power of Jesus' Name." It was enthusiastically received and soon the hymn and tune were being sung over a wide area and ultimately appeared in the Methodist Hymnal.

James Ellor came to America with Andrew Ellor in 1843 and the family joined the M. E. Church of Bloomfield, N. J. They lived in the Watsessing locality, and in 1853 with the help of the Bloomfield Church (now Park Church) founded the Watsessing Church of Bloomfield. James continued to compose new works and led the singing in the new society, while continuing his vocation of hatter. Ultimately he became blind, dying in Bloomfield in 1899.

V. B. Hampton, Newark Conference. 1957.

R. C. McCutchan, Our Hymnody. 1937.

VERNON B. HAMPTON

EL PASO, TEXAS, U.S.A., was settled in 1827 and incorporated in 1873. Its population in 1880 was 736. Bishop GEORGE F. PIERCE (MES) traveled to El Paso by stagecoach in 1859 and met a Roman Catholic judge, Simeon Hart, who gave him $200 to help establish a Methodist church in the town and pay the traveling expenses of a preacher. In November, 1859, the Rio Grande Mission Conference (WEST TEXAS CONFERENCE beginning in 1866) was organized, and it appointed John L. Harper to El Paso. For the next twenty years Methodism made little or no progress in the town. Then in December, 1880, John R. Carter, who had been admitted on trial in the SOUTH GEORGIA CONFERENCE in 1879 and had served a mission in SAVANNAH for a year, was transferred to the West Texas Conference and stationed in El Paso. Preaching in a tent at first, Carter remained three years and was the real founder of organized Methodism in El Paso.

The West Texas Conference appointed Roman V. Palomares to the El Paso Mexican Mission in 1880, the same year it sent John R. Carter to the El Paso (Anglo-Saxon) Mission. In 1885 the Mexican Mission Districts of the conference, which included Mexican churches on both sides of the Rio Grande River, were set off as the Mexican Border Mission Conference, and for the first two years the English-speaking church in El Paso was in that conference. In 1887 the El Paso Anglo-Saxon congregation was transferred back to the West Texas Conference, and in 1888 an El Paso District, which included some churches in NEW MEXICO, was formed. In 1890 the El Paso District became a part of the newly formed NEW MEXICO CONFERENCE. In 1900 the English-speaking church in El Paso, which came to be known as Trinity, had 333 members. By 1906 a second church was started in El Paso and by 1912 a third. At unification in 1939 the denomination had four churches in the city with a total of 3,457 members.

The Mexican work in El Paso grew slowly. In 1890 the Spanish-speaking church had 49 members; in 1900 there were 112. By 1910 there were two Mexican churches in the city. The denomination began educational and social service work among the Mexicans in El Paso as early as 1910. The Effie Eddington School for Mexican girls began and was operated for some time in the basement of the El Mesias Church. The LYDIA PATTERSON INSTITUTE for boys and a Mexican Community Center were established.

The M. E. Church began work in El Paso in 1880 when THOMAS HARWOOD, founder of the HARWOOD SCHOOL for Girls in Albuquerque, N. M., visited El Paso and held a service in the Rohman Hotel. He returned periodically to conduct services. In 1886, C. B. M. Rogers was appointed to El Paso by the New Mexico English Mission, and in that year a church later known as First M. E. Church was organized with sixteen members. A second church was organized about 1912. At unification in 1939 the two churches had a total of 612 members. The WOMAN'S HOME MISSIONARY SOCIETY established three institutions in El Paso—Houchen Settlement House (1893), Freeman Clinic (1920), and Newark Methodist Hospital (1921).

In 1970 The United Methodist Church had one Negro, six Mexican, and fourteen Anglo-Saxon churches in El Paso with a total of 15,052 members and property valued at $6,207,582. In that year the twenty-one churches raised for all purposes $967,729.

Friendship Square is a section of the city where Methodism has developed a school, settlement house, maternity hospital, and church to minister to Spanish-speaking citizens. In 1912 the Woman's Home Missionary Society of the M. E. Church built the Houchen Settlement House, naming it for Rose Gregory Houchen who contributed the first $1,000 to the project. In 1922 a clinic for expectant mothers was opened next door. Nine years later the NEWARK CONFERENCE established a maternity hospital in a nearby adobe tenement building. In 1915 the El Buen Pastor Church was begun in the same block. In 1945 the church moved into its own building, and two years later it became a self-supporting congregation in the RIO GRANDE CONFERENCE. In 1969 the El Buen Pastor Church merged with the El Mesias Church a few blocks away and the old El Buen Pastor property was added to the facilities of the Community Center.

The Houchen Community Center has a director and seven full-time and two part-time workers for kindergarten and club activities. It ministers to some 3,000 persons per month ranging in age from four to ninety. Through the years the kindergarten has been the most constant ministry of the center; it introduces the children to the English language and the ways of Anglo-Americans.

Additions to the Newark Hospital in 1945 and 1957 made it a 35-bed facility which ministers by means of maternity care and female surgery to low income patients on both sides of the border. The hospital recorded 1,102 births during the fiscal year 1967-68. With the help of five doctors the Newark Clinic serves both maternity and pediatric patients. Also, the clinic conducts planned parenthood classes and offers instruction in baby care and nutrition.

Supported by the Board of Missions and the El Paso community, guided by its board of directors, and maintained by the dedicated work of its staff, Friendship Square continues as a symbol of Methodism in South El Paso and ministers effectively to Spanish-speaking people. No one is turned away because of race or creed, and no attempt is made to indoctrinate those who come. The aim of the center is to introduce the Master and to show the way by daily service to the people in the community.

Trinity Church. In 1880, A. H. Sutherland of San Antonio, presiding elder of the Mexican Mission District, West Texas Conference (MES), traveled through west Texas by stagecoach and held religious services. On March 12, 1881, a church with thirteen members was organized in El Paso. In May, 1881, Sutherland asked the Board of Missions to send a preacher to help establish Methodism in El Paso. John R. Carter who was serving a mission in Savannah, Ga., was transferred to the West Texas Conference and appointed to the El Paso Mission. On Nov. 4, 1881, the cornerstone of a 36 by 60 foot church was laid, and on Jan. 29, 1882 the first service was held in the building. Carter served in El Paso three years. The building debt was paid and the church was dedicated Aug. 1, 1884. Trinity Church became a station in 1886, and in that year members who had transferred in from Northern Methodist congregations withdrew and organized the First M. E. Church of El Paso. Trinity Church built a parsonage in 1887. In 1895 the frame church was replaced by a red brick edifice. At that time the church had 244 members. Ten years later the church relocated at Mesa and Yandell, its present site.

Percy R. Knickerbocker, pastor 1916-22, was unique among Trinity's ministers. During prohibition days he conducted a funeral service for John Barleycorn over an open casket filled with whiskey and beer bottles. W. B. Hogg, pastor 1922-24, established the Hogg Orphanage which Trinity operated for some years. In 1923 Trinity Church installed the first radio station in El Paso, and for some years the church broadcast the Men's Bible Class lesson and two Sunday worship services.

In 1937 the sanctuary was renovated and an education building was erected at a total cost of some $125,000. Twenty-five years later another building for educational purposes was added.

W. ANGIE SMITH, pastor 1926-30, was elected bishop in 1944 and presided over the NEW MEXICO CONFERENCE for the following twenty-four years.

Trinity Church grew with El Paso. It had 333 members in 1900, over 1,000 in 1917, and over 2,000 in 1924. In 1970 Trinity Church reported 3,221 members, property valued at $1,570,189, and $218,071 raised for all purposes during the year.

General Minutes, ME, MES, TMC, UMC.

O. W. Nail, Texas. 1961.

JOE B. SCRIMSHIRE
ALBEA GODBOLD
JANICE W. CASTER
MAURINE II. McMAHAN

ELPHICK, ROBERT VALENZUELA (1873-1961), Methodist bishop and well-known pastor and leader of Protestantism in Latin America, was born at Antofagasta, CHILE, in 1873, where his father, Donald Elphick, was an engineer at the nitrate works. He was sent by his father to the SANTIAGO, Chile, College which had been established by a Methodist missionary, IRA LAFETRA. There he received his first instruction in the Bible and attended Sunday school, and a New Testament presented to him by his teacher, a certain Miss Fawcett, who was—he stated later—"the means of his conversion to Christ." The personality of LaFetra, and the character of the teachers in the college, the Bible classes, the Sunday school, and the only Protestant church then in Santiago, all aided in leading to this conversion experience.

He continued his higher studies at the Institute Internacional of the Presbyterian Mission, and passed his examinations for the State University. Then he entered the Missionary Seminary and taught school at the same time. He was ordained a minister of the M. E. Church in 1906 and was superintendent of the Central District of the CHILE ANNUAL CONFERENCE while pastor of First Church in Santiago. He worked for fourteen years doing pioneer work in the north of Chile. After that, he held several charges in the south and central part of the Republic for almost thirty years. He did evangelistic travel throughout Chile and over other South and Central American Republics, and so became well known to the Protestant groups there.

He represented his Conference at the GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church twice (1920 and 1928), and once at the INTERNATIONAL MISSIONARY CONFERENCE held in Jerusalem in 1928. He was elected bishop by the LATIN AMERICA CENTRAL CONFERENCE held in BUENOS AIRES, ARGENTINA, in February, 1936, and from that time until 1941 supervised the work in PANAMA, PERU, and Chile. Bishop Elphick enjoyed telling how Protestantism had established itself during his lifetime and recalled how in the early days of his ministry services were interrupted by "yells, noise produced by empty kerosene cans full of stones, firecrackers, breaking of windows, and attacks by the mob." "At present," he wrote in later years, "our meetings are in perfect order and open air preaching is conducted freely and unmolested in parks, streets and plazas." He had preached for more than sixty-five years when he died in Santiago on May 6, 1961.

The Christian Advocate (TMC), June 22, 1961. N. B. H.

ELTZHOLTZ, ALBERTA (1846-1934), Danish poet and hymn writer, was born at the castle of Brahetrolleborg on Funen, DENMARK. Her parents were the gardener of the castle, Johan Christoffer Eltzholtz, and his wife, Tobia Marie. The Eltzholtz family were among the very first persons on the island of Funen who joined the Methodist Church, and owing to them a small chapel was established in a house not far from the castle of Brahetrolleborg. Here a Sunday school was started with Alberta Eltzholtz as a leader, a task to which she gave much care and zeal.

Alberta Eltzholtz' greatest merit to her church was in her literary work. She wrote five books of poetry, and was Denmark's first and most distinguished hymn writer. Besides writing original hymns and songs, she also translated many of CHARLES WESLEY's hymns into Danish. By her personality and poetry she has been of great significance to the Danish Methodist Church. She died in COPENHAGEN on May 19, 1934. A brother of hers was the founder of the Danish Temperance Society. He was Carl Frederik Eltzholtz, who was a minister and editor in the NORWEGIAN-DANISH CONFERENCE in the United States for some years, and likewise a minister in Denmark for some years.

NIELS MANN

CHAPEL AT EL VERGEL

EL VERGEL AGRICULTURAL INSTITUTE, a Methodist rural institution near ANGOL, CHILE, was established in 1919 as a part of the Centenary Program, under administrative leadership of Bishop WILLIAM F. OLDHAM. The farm of 3,750 acres, called El Vergel (meaning "Beautiful Garden"), is located in the central agricultural valley of Chile, 400 miles south of SANTIAGO and three miles from Angol, a city of nearly 20,000 and capital of Malleco Province.

The aim was to provide, in a Christian environment, practical agricultural training and a place to study the serious problems confronting rural Chile. The El Vergel Practical School of Agriculture opened in 1920 and in 1966 enrolled seventy-five boys. A Vocational School for Girls, started in 1947, became in 1951 the entrance point in Chile of the WOMAN'S DIVISION OF CHRISTIAN SERVICE of the BOARD OF MISSIONS. The girls' school was directed by Semeramis Kutz until her retirement in 1964. In that year it enrolled thirty girls. In 1966 this school's program was changed to that of practical agriculture, and it will provide leaders for rural life.

Rural elementary education was pioneered at El Vergel and is still provided on the farm by two schools with 200 pupils. (Secondary-level training is available in the area in seven government schools, in addition to those at El Vergel.) Along with their school work, El Vergel staff members have assisted in preparing the new government educational program in agriculture.

Original farm enterprises at El Vergel included orcharding, dairying, sheep and cattle raising, various farm crops, and the oldest plant nursery in Chile. Some 700 acres of irrigated river-bottom land are under cultivation. Areas of badly eroded red-hill land—traditionally devoted to small grains and grazing—have become man-made forests with lush pastures. Years of experimentation with new trees, grasses, and legumes—as well as new methods—have controlled erosion and increased productivity. These enterprises provide demonstrations, student-training grounds, and support for the institution and its work force of more than 225.

Employees, laborers and their families, and students make up the El Vergel "family" of around 1,000 persons. They work through two organized Methodist church centers, outgrowth of original simple services held in a warehouse. Emphasized is work with children and young people, who carry a Christian influence into every area of Chilean life.

A large social hall and clinic serve as centers for athletic, cultural, and social activities, as well as fairs to exhibit products of field and home. At the clinic a nurse is in constant attendance with means to make government medical programs effective.

El Vergel attempts to make Christianity effective in individual, institutional, and community life. It seeks to demonstrate the faith in relationships with students, clients, the public, and its own workers.

El Vergel has always been self-sustaining. Outside financing has covered only major educational unit constructions and assistance in reconstruction following earthquake disasters of 1939, 1949, and 1960.

The program is in the hands of a board of directors selected by the presiding bishop and the Chile Annual Conference. In 1966 the general administrator was Walter F. Mason. He succeeded ELBERT E. REED, who arrived in 1920 and was administrator from 1925-63, guiding developments in horticulture, forestry, soil conservation, and farm management.

DILLMAN S. BULLOCK, director of the agricultural school from 1924-47 and director emeritus since, continues at El Vergel as director of the Bullock Museum. His life-long collections of natural history specimens and archaeological materials form an invaluable resource for the schools and are open to the public and educational institutions.

Leon Miller was a staff member from 1931 until 1952, when he was named to establish a Methodist rural center in COSTA RICA. Many other missionaries have devoted up to twelve years of creative labors in the institution. Numerous Chilean men and women have contributed long years of loyal and significant service.

B. H. Lewis, Methodist Overseas Missions. 1960.

ELBERT E. REED

ELYRIA, OHIO, U.S.A. Elyria Methodist Home is a Home for the Aging sponsored by the NORTH-EAST OHIO CONFERENCE of The United Methodist Church. This Home has been serving older Methodists since 1907. Mrs. Mary Lilly was the founder of the Home, which was started in 1896 as a private home, and later given to the Methodist Church. In 1922 the Home relocated on an eleven-acre plot in Elyria, and since that time five buildings and ten cottages have been built. These now serve over 300 older persons.

A branch Home was acquired in Lodi, Ohio, in 1956, as a gift from a private foundation. This Home, located some twenty-five miles south of Elyria, became a part of the Elyria operation, and is presently serving some twenty-five persons.

A homelike atmosphere in a beautiful setting is maintained among congenial persons in their sunset years. Every effort is made to minister to the whole person, and to make life meaningful. Activities of every kind make for full and satisfying days.

The latest addition to the institution is a new nursing wing with 126 beds, enabling services to be offered to the sick aged. Included in this nursing unit is a new dining room and kitchen to serve the needs of the entire Home.

Over the years some 800 persons from all walks of life have found a haven in The Elyria Methodist Home.

First Church has been teaching Christian living at the heart of this county seat of Lorain County since 1823. First, classes met in 1823 in little log meeting houses, the Courthouse, and in school rooms. The first Sunday school was organized in 1832. In 1838 it was decided to erect a temporary church building which cost $700. A paper written by G. A. Reeder, who was minister of First Church 1893-1898, states that it was at a quarterly meeting in 1844 that the presiding elder Thomas Thompson gave John Baldwin the vision of founding BALDWIN UNIVERSITY, Berea, Ohio.

In 1851 a substantial brick structure was built to house the congregation. A church building was erected in 1880 at the location of the present church. A Sunday school building was erected in 1908. The present church was built in 1925. The membership is 2,289 (1970). In 1966 the church laid plans for the building of additional social rooms and administrative offices. The adjoining Elyria City Library building was purchased for further church expansion.

During the years 1965-1966 the First Church sent fifty workers to the northeast area of the growing city to help establish the Community Methodist Church. Through the years First Church has closely cooperated with the Elyria Methodist Home, which is located a few blocks from the church.

CHARLES W. HAMILTON

EMBRY, JAMES CRAWFORD (1834-1897), American bishop of the A.M.E. Church, was born in Knox County, Ind., on Nov. 2, 1834, of Baptist parents. His elementary education was self-acquired. He was converted in 1855, licensed to preach in 1856, admitted to the annual conference in 1864, ordained a DEACON in 1866, and ELDER in 1870. He was pastor from 1870-76; first Secretary of Education, 1876-79; Financial Secretary, 1879-84; manager of the Book Concern, 1884-96, and was elected bishop in 1896.

Bishop Embury's great work was in the field of church publication. He built the Publishing House of the A.M.E. CHURCH at 631 Pine Street, Philadelphia, during the time he was manager of the Book Concern, and he increased the circulation of the Christian Recorder. He encouraged literary endeavors in his church and gathered around the Book Concern some of "the strongest group of literary men in the Church, including Bishops C. T. STAFFER, L. J. COPPIN, B. T. TANNER; Editors H. T. Kealing and H. T. Johnson." He himself wrote Digest of Christian Theology, which for nearly a half century was used in the A.M.E. COURSE OF STUDY for ministers. He purchased the Southern Christian Recorder for the A.M.E. Church from Bishop TURNER, who founded it and at that time owned it. He also published a revised A.M.E. Church hymnal in 1892. It is said that he was elected bishop in recognition of his work in building the new Book Concern.

As bishop he was assigned to the Seventh Episcopal District (South Carolina and Florida).

He died on Aug. 16, 1897.

R. R. Wright, The Bishops. 1963.

GRANT S. SHOCKLEY

EMBURY, PHILIP (1728-1773), founder of JOHN STREET CHURCH, NEW YORK CITY, was born at Ballingrane, Limerick, IRELAND, in the summer of 1728, of an Irish Palatine family. He was converted Christmas Day, 1752, being influenced by JOHN WESLEY's preaching in Limerick earlier that year. A master carpenter, he served as local preacher with Philip Guier, and was "proposed for traveling preacher" at the Limerick Conference, August 1758, being held "in reserve" because of his impending marriage with Margaret (Mary) Switzer, a Methodist of near-by Court-Matrix.

Embury headed a group of Irish Palatine colonists for America, some being Methodists, arriving at New York, Aug. 11, 1760. The Emburys affiliated with Trinity Lutheran Church, whose records attest them as communicants and indicate the baptism of their children. Philip established a small school and worked as a carpenter. At a later date they became communicants at St. Paul's Chapel (Anglican).

Urged by his cousin BARBARA HECK, in September 1766, Embury resumed status as Wesleyan local preacher, holding services in his house on Augustus Street. He promptly organized a Methodist society according to Wesley's methods, later to be known as John Street Church. Assisted by Captain THOMAS WEBB, who had joined Embury in 1767, two lots were purchased on March 30, 1768, on John Street between Nassau and William Streets. On Oct. 3, 1768, Embury dedicated the chapel which he himself designed and built, calling it Wesley Chapel.

In 1770, with the financial aid and administrative skill of Thomas Ashton, a Methodist from Dublin, Ireland, who had brought ROBERT WILLIAMS to America in 1769, Embury led several Palatine families to a tract of 8,000 acres northeast of Albany, N. Y., near Salem and Cambridge.

They established a new center, naming it ASHGROVE, where Embury organized a Methodist society. His sudden death came in summer, 1773, from overexertion and an accident while harvesting. His Ashgrove burial place is a shrine of the TROY CONFERENCE.

In due time his widow married John Lawrence, a founding member in New York, active at Ashgrove. They removed in 1775 to another Palatine enclave near Prescott, Ontario, Canada, where Embury's son Samuel was to become a Methodist class leader. Bishop Asbury visited the Canadian group in July 1811, mentioning Embury in his Journal of July 14.

Philip Embury's Bible, brought by him from Ireland, used constantly in personal devotions, in the services of the New York society, for the dedication of Wesley Chapel on the John Street property, and in the work at Ashgrove, is treasured at John Street Church today. It is the earliest and most significant Bible among the trophies of American Methodism. It bears the imprint of Robert Barker, London, 1611, being of a late printing of the Geneva Translation of the entire Bible into English as prepared in the 1560's by a group of British scholars-in-exile at Geneva, Switzerland.

Upon Embury's death, the Bible was given to his son Samuel, then eight years of age. It came again into public use as Samuel became a class leader in later years. In 1819 Fitch Reed, a young preacher of the NEW YORK CONFERENCE, newly appointed to the Durham Circuit in Canada, came to the farmhouse of Samuel Embury. The host invited Reed to lead in devotions, proffering his father's Bible. Reed was astonished to find Philip Embury's autograph on the New Testament title-page, and to learn that his host was Philip's son. Sensing the significance of the volume, Reed purchased it for the cost of a new copy, retaining it in his library until his appointment to John Street Church in 1833, when he presented it to the church. Reed's signed attestation of the facts has been carefully bound into the historic book.

In addition to the Bible, original portraits of Embury and his wife are displayed at John Street Church. The reading desk he made for Wesley Chapel in 1768 is mounted on the original altar rail in the museum of the church.

F. Asbury, Journal and Letters. 1958.

R. M. Bibbins, How Methodism Came. 1945.

W. Crook, Ireland and American Methodism. 1866.

Records, John Street Church, Vol. I.

Records, Trinity Lutheran Church, New York City.

S. A. Seaman, New York. 1892.

J. B. Wakeley, Lost Chapters. 1858. ARTHUR BRUCE MOSS

EMBURY MONUMENT, Woodbury, New York. (See ASHGROVE AND CAMBRIDGE, NEW YORK.)

EMERSON, JAMES, first class leader and one of the original trustees of ST. GEORGE'S CHURCH, PHILADELPHIA, was converted under the preaching of GEORGE WHITEFIELD in 1741. Being gifted as a preacher with a fluency almost equal to that of Whitefield, himself, Emerson, with the aid of EDWARD EVANS, kept together a group of Methodists meeting in a sail loft near Dock Creek until they were organized into a Society by Captain THOMAS WEBB in 1767. By trade he was a "dealer in orange and lemon shrub . . . also excellent bitters that strengthen the stomach, and are preferred against sea sickness." He had his store at the sign of the Sugar Loaf in High Street (later Market Street) near the wharf.

A. W. Cliffe, Our Methodist Heritage. 1957.
Pennsylvania Gazette, July 14, 1786.
 F. H. Tees, Ancient Landmarks. 1951.

FREDERICK E. MASER

EMERY, PHOEBE ELIZABETH (1884-), retired missionary of the Methodist BOARD OF MISSIONS, was born in Lawrence, Kan., Sept. 8, 1884, in a family of slender means. She was converted in middle teens and became a zealous and faithful member of the Methodist Church. Dedicating herself to God for service, she determined to obtain a college education. She earned her expenses through high school and college, working for an elderly couple for board, room, and four dollars a week. In college and church she became very popular. All her professors commended her warmly. She earned a B.A. degree from BAKER UNIVERSITY, and went to INDIA in 1916. In 1923, on her first furlough, she obtained an M.A. degree from BOSTON UNIVERSITY.

Serving as a district evangelist in India, she supervised schools for children and illiterate adults, conducted worship services, taught homemaking and child care, encouraged the building of churches, and helped generously with their financing. Despite much trouble with health, she was diligent and constant in work. She wrote often for church papers in India and America. She retired in 1948 to Baldwin, Kan.

Minutes of the North India Conference, 1917-48.

J. WASKOM PICKETT

GROVER C. EMMONS

EMMONS, GROVER CARLTON (1886-1944), American minister, executive secretary and founder of the devotional publication, The Upper Room, was born at Walnut Hill, Fla., on Feb. 13, 1886, the son of John Davidson and Martha Jane (Huggins) Emmons.

He studied at Alabama Polytechnic Institute, Auburn, Ala.; the University of New Mexico (A.B.); and VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY. ASBURY COLLEGE conferred upon him the D.D. degree in 1929.

As minister of the M. E. Church, South, he held pastorates at Salem, Ark., 1912-13; San Marcial, N. M., 1913-14; Callup, N. M., 1914-17; Santa Rosa, Calif., 1920-25; San Diego, Calif., 1925-27; Long Beach, Calif., 1927-28; and Fresno, Calif., 1928-30.

In 1918-19 he served as Y.M.C.A. secretary with the A. E. F. in France. Following that experience he was for a time in the War Work Commission of the M. E. Church, South, in Washington, D. C. In 1919-20, he went to the Orient as secretary to Bishop W. R. LAMBUTH where he gained a world perspective and valuable missionary training.

He served the quadrennium, 1930-34, as presiding elder of the Los Angeles district, M. E. Church, South; then became Secretary of the Department of Home Missions, Evangelism, and Hospitals of the Board of Missions of that Church in Nashville, Tenn., in 1934, in which capacity he served until Unification in 1939.

While serving in the BOARD OF MISSIONS office, he conceived the idea of The Upper Room, a daily devotional guide for meditation and prayer, and brought forth the first number, dated April, May, June, 1935.

He was a member of the GENERAL CONFERENCES of his Church in 1930, 1934, and 1938, and of the UNITING CONFERENCE in 1939, and of the first General Conference of The Methodist Church in 1940. He also served on the Joint Commission on Methodist Union, 1934-1939. At the time of his death, he was the editor of The Upper Room, which by that time had become world renowned.

One of Emmons' most notable services was to act as Executive Chairman of what his church called the Week of Dedication both in 1943 and 1944.

Grover Emmons gave himself untiringly to the work his Church entrusted to him. He died unexpectedly on Friday, April 14, 1944, of an acute heart attack.

He was survived by his wife, Mrs. Helen Boulware Emmons, whom he married on Dec. 11, 1920, and three children.

EMORY, JOHN (1789-1835), American bishop, was born in Spaniard's Neck, Queen Anne's Co., Md., on April 11, 1789. His father, Robert Emory, was associated with Judge James Tilghman, although he was not a lawyer. He wanted his son to enter the legal profession. John Emory graduated from Washington College in 1804, and then studied law. He was admitted to the bar at the age of nineteen and opened an office at Centerville.

An enthusiastic CLASS LEADER and LOCAL PREACHER, he decided to enter the ministry. This brought an estrangement between father and son. He joined the PHILADELPHIA CONFERENCE on trial in 1810 and was sent to the Caroline circuit. His other appointments were: Cambridge circuit, Talbot circuit, PHILADELPHIA, WILMINGTON and Union. In 1818, he was transferred to the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE and served successively, Annapolis, Hagerstown and BALTIMORE.

In 1816, the first year his age made him eligible, he was elected a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE, and was a member of all succeeding conferences except that of 1824. In 1820 he was fraternal delegate to the British Conference.

JOHN EMORY

In 1824 John Emory was made assistant BOOK EDITOR under NATHAN BANGS, and in 1828 he became EDITOR with BEVERLY WAUGH (later bishop) as his assistant. He was editor of The Methodist Magazine which became, in 1830, The Methodist Magazine and Quarterly Review, and later The Methodist Quarterly Review. He edited a number of volumes, including the first American edition of the works of JOHN WESLEY.

In 1817, Emory wrote a reply to a pamphlet published by Bishop White of the Protestant Episcopal Church in which Emory defended the doctrine of the WITNESS OF THE SPIRIT. The following year he wrote a paper, "The Divinity of Christ Vindicated from the Cavils and Objections of Mr. John Wright." This last was a reply to a series of articles published in The National Messenger of Georgetown.

As a polemical writer, John Emory was perhaps the leader in defending the CONSTITUTION of the church during the agitation which led to the establishment of the M. P. Church. His chief work was The Defence of our Fathers, which was a reply to Alexander McCaine's work on The History and Mystery of Methodist Episcopacy. At his death he left a manuscript which was published by his son ROBERT in 1838 under the title of The Episcopal Controversy Reviewed.

He was an earnest advocate of education and had a part in establishing WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY and New York University. He received the honorary M.A. and D.D. degrees.

In 1813 he married Caroline Sillers of Hillsborough, Md. She died in 1815 and in 1818 he married Ann Wright of Queen Anne's County.

In 1832 John Emory was elected a bishop. He moved to Baltimore, but two years later he moved to a farm on the Eastern shore of Maryland and then to Reistertown. He died after being thrown from his carriage on Dec. 16, 1835. He was buried by the side of Bishop FRANCIS ASBURY in Eutaw Street Church in Baltimore, but in 1854 both bodies were removed to Mount Olivet Cemetery in Baltimore.

R. Emory, John Emory. 1841.

Encyclopedia of American Biography.

F. D. Leete, Methodist Bishops. 1948.

M. Simpson, Cyclopaedia. 1878.

W. B. Sprague, Annals of the Pulpit. 1861. ELMER T. CLARK

EMORY, ROBERT (1814-1848), American educator, minister, and historian of the Methodist Book of Discipline, was born in PHILADELPHIA, July 29, 1814, the oldest son of Bishop JOHN EMORY. Finishing at Columbia with highest honors in 1831, he studied law but after three years became professor of ancient languages at DICKINSON COLLEGE, 1834-39. He then entered the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE and rose to a presiding eldership before returning to Dickinson as president in 1844.

Awarded a D.D. by Columbia University in 1846, he also went to London as a delegate to the Evangelical Alliance. His Life of Rev. John Emory (1841) remains the standard work on his father. The History of the Discipline (1843) is a painstaking and still valuable collation of Methodist law up to 1840, more usefully arranged and indexed than the original Disciplines which were searched out and used by the author. When but thirty-four, his useful life was snuffed out by tuberculosis. He left a wife, two infants, and a reputation characterized by his Dickinson colleague, JOHN MCCLINTOCK, as "the purest and best of all the men I have yet known on earth."

EDWIN SCHELL

EMORY AND HENRY COLLEGE, Emory, Va., the oldest institution of higher learning in southwest Virginia, was established in 1836 by the HOLSTON CONFERENCE as a manual labor school. It was named for Bishop JOHN EMORY and for Patrick Henry, the colonial patriot and governor of the state. Emory was an earnest advocate of education at a time when there was little interest among early Methodists. He assisted in the organizing of WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY and New York University and also helped the M. E. Church acquire DICKINSON COLLEGE. Emory and Henry became a college in 1845.

Its first president, CHARLES COLLINS of Maine, was a graduate of Wesleyan University of Connecticut, and the college was greatly influenced by the classical curriculum of Wesleyan. During the Civil War the property was utilized by the Confederate government as a hospital. In 1918, Martha Washington College of Abingdon, Va., was consolidated with Emory and Henry, and women students were admitted in 1922. Degrees given are the A.B. and B.S. The governing board has fifty-two members elected by the Holston Conference.

JOHN O. GROSS

EMORY UNIVERSITY, Atlanta, Ga., received its charter in January, 1915. The M. E. Church, South, had in its 1914 GENERAL CONFERENCE severed its connections with VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY. A commission appointed by that conference, with Bishop WARREN A. CANDLER as chairman, voted to maintain two universities, one east and one west of the Mississippi River, and promptly to establish a school of theology on the eastern side. The recently organized SOUTHERN METHODIST UNIVERSITY in Dallas, Texas, was adopted by the M. E. Church, South, as the western institution. Several cities wanted to become the site of the eastern school.

GLENN MEMORIAL, EMORY UNIVERSITY

In Georgia, leading citizens of Atlanta sought the new university. The trustees of Emory College, located near Atlanta, proposed that this Methodist college become the undergraduate division of such a university. ASA G. CANDLER, brother of Bishop Candler, made the initial gift of $1,000,000 to establish the institution. The Educational Commission therefore chose Atlanta as the site and accepted the offer of Emory College to donate itself and move to the new campus. The name Emory University was chosen.

Emory College, located at Oxford, Georgia, some forty miles from Atlanta, had been established by Georgia and Florida Methodists in 1836. The school did well for its day and time, and the college graduated for Georgia and the South many leaders of the church and state. The college closed during the Civil War, and barely managed to reopen in 1866. A succession of strong presidents (some of whom became bishops), including ATTICUS G. HAYGOOD, WARREN A. CANDLER, and JAMES E. DICKEY, made Emory College a pace-setter for the quality of higher education in its area. The alumni became the greatest asset of the new Emory University, giving immediate and complete loyalty.

The School of Theology (see CANDLER SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY) was the first unit to open. This was followed in June, 1915, by the medical division, which had been the Atlanta Medical College; Lamar School of Law in 1916; the School of Business Administration and Graduate School of Arts and Sciences in 1919. Wesley Memorial Hospital, now Emory University Hospital, and the School of Nursing moved to the university campus in 1922. The twenty-year-old Southern Library School became a school of the university in 1925. A junior college, now named OXFORD COLLEGE, was set up in 1929 on the original campus at Oxford. In 1944, the Atlanta-Southern Dental College became Emory University School of Dentistry, and in 1953 Emory assumed control of Crawford W. Long Memorial Hospital in Atlanta.

The governing board is made up of the thirty-three members of the Board of Trustees, thirty elected by the board itself for eight-year terms, three by the alumni for three-year terms. All members of the board must be approved by the Southeastern Jurisdictional Council of The United Methodist Church. Emory's charter specifies that the ownership of the university shall be vested with The United Methodist Church. (See also MANUAL LABOR SCHOOL.)

JOHN O. GROSS

EMPORIA, KANSAS, U.S.A. First Church. The Kansas-Nebraska Annual Conference appropriated $125 on April 16, 1859, toward starting a Mission in Emporia, Kan. The first official meeting was held in the office of a small hotel in June of 1857. Henry Hayes led the class of seven members.

Between 1857 and 1859, the Methodists increased from 34 to 134 members. James Fraker was the first appointed pastor at a salary of $400 for the year.

A building was erected and dedicated on June 24, 1864. It had cost $3,500 and was an impressive building made of stone and seated 250 people. Lightning struck this building the night of June 19, 1868, causing $900 damages. That seemed an almost impossible sum but it was raised by the people who loved the church.

In 1872 the membership had grown to 199. They purchased an organ and new pews for the church in 1879. Inspired to "do The Lord's will" for others as well as for themselves, they purchased an old schoolhouse near the roundhouse of the Santa Fe Railroad and started a Sunday school which later became the Grace Methodist Church of Emporia.

Disaster again struck on Sept. 4, 1901 when the church was destroyed by fire which had first gotten out of control in the Crystal Ice Plant. That was the year a prophecy was found, addressed to "the citizens of Emporia, A.D., 1980," which revealed that the Emporia Church would be a great church "by 1980." It didn't wait that long.

The third building was completed on the original lot after nineteen months at a cost of $30,000. It was dedicated in 1903. The Sunday school had grown as well as the church. The membership had reached 1,498 by 1948 and then increased to 2,200 by 1955.

The Emporia Church observed its Centennial on June 9, 1957, at which time the congregation dressed in Centennial costumes.

The church was again destroyed on Sept. 14, 1957. Church and Sunday school met in the Kansas State Teachers College building, until the membership moved into their new building on May 21, 1961. Thirty-eight ministers have served the church up to 1970. In that year the membership was reported as 2,175, property valued at $1,356,500, and a total of $116,674 raised for all purposes.

WILLIAM A. HUBBARD

ENDICOTT, JAMES (1865-1954), Canadian minister, was born in Chudleigh, Devonshire, England, May 8, 1865. He emigrated to CANADA in 1882, and settled in Lucan, Ontario.

In 1887, he became a probationer in the Guelph Conference, but was soon transferred to the Manitoba and Northwest Conference. With the help of a Presbyterian minister, he was able to attend WESLEY COLLEGE (WINNIPEG), from which he graduated in 1893. He was ordained in 1893 and at once volunteered for foreign missions, the cause to which he would devote the remainder of his life.

Endicott reached the newly founded WEST CHINA MISSION late in 1893. He rapidly gained proficiency in Chinese and became a particularly valuable member of the missionary staff. His arduous work in this most difficult field came to an end with his appointment in 1912 as a field secretary of the Methodist Missionary Society. He retained, however, an abiding interest in and knowledge of Chinese affairs.

As a field secretary, James Endicott was responsible for bringing the mission enterprise broadly to the attention of the church. By 1925, he had become one of the most respected figures in the Methodist Church.

Speaking at the Union inaugural services in 1925, Endicott urged his hearers to remember that "Christianity is a perilous business." Let us "deliberately elect that we will take bold leadership and refuse to follow the timid." Appropriately, he was elected in 1926 as the second moderator of the United Church of Canada. He held this office with distinction and discharged his duties with tolerance and understanding. Above all, he found time to visit the far-flung mission fields and to reassure the missionaries that the new church was determined to assist their work generously.

Endicott returned from his travels with a deeper awareness of the close identification in the eyes of other people between imperialism and foreign missions, and a profound sympathy for the aspirations of Asians and Africans. As secretary of the Board of Foreign Missions of the United Church, he tried to ensure that, in future, missionaries would not rely on their own governments, and he encouraged the establishment of autonomous churches in the foreign fields.

Endicott retired from active duty in 1937, but his interest in the mission cause did not abate. During his last years, he made some noteworthy pronouncements on the church's role in politics, on Chinese and other international problems. In these, he stressed the prophetic role of Christianity and the need to make its message both contemporary and relevant. To his colleague, J. Arnup, James Endicott was "one of the greatest men I ever knew." He died in March, 1954.

G. H. Cornish, Cyclopaedia of Methodism. 1903.

Profiles of the Moderators: James Endicott. United Church Archives. G. S. FRENCH

ENFIELD, NORTH CAROLINA, U.S.A. Eden Church was probably the outgrowth of an Anglican chapel established around 1760 in Edgecombe Parish by clergymen of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts. According to the Mouzon map of NORTH CAROLINA, printed in London in 1775, an Anglican church was situated on Beaver Dam Swamp at the approximate site of present-day Eden Church. In 1964 the church received a citation from the METHODIST PUBLISHING HOUSE in commemoration of over 175 years of continuous service as a Methodist congregation.

Eden Church had completely endorsed Wesleyan evangelism by the closing decades of the eighteenth century, probably the result of the evangelical efforts of ministers from VIRGINIA who had been converted to the reform movement instigated by JOHN WESLEY, and who crossed the border into Halifax County, N. C., to conduct revival meetings. Eden Church was a part of the old Roanoke Circuit, organized in 1778, and a member of the VIRGINIA CONFERENCE. JOHN DICKINS, who later founded the BOOK CONCERN, was pastor of Roanoke Circuit in 1779-81. He married Elizabeth Yancey, who lived near Eden Church, and their home was in that community. The plan for the first Methodist school in America was prepared at Dickins' home. Originally the school was to have been in North Carolina, but later the funds were used for the establishment of COKESBURY COLLEGE.

Another famous minister of this period was WILLIAM BELLAMY, who was assigned to the circuit in 1798-99. He became an active member of the Roanoke District Conference which in those days was composed of local ministers opposed to the attitude of the GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church in exerting dictatorial and authoritative power and withholding ecclesiastical rights from the people. Bellamy had collected material to write a history of the reform movement in the old Roanoke District, but he died in 1846 before it was completed. JOHN PARIS, who was also a pastor at Eden Church (1842), completed the work and had it published in 1849.

Eden Church was one of eight Methodist churches in North Carolina which went practically as entire congregations into the M. P. Church following the establishment of that denomination at its first annual conference which met at WHITAKER'S CHAPEL, six miles east of Enfield, in December 1828.

In 1850 Eden Church became a part of the newly formed Halifax Circuit with JOHN F. SPEIGHT as superintendent. Other distinguished ministers who served the church during the nineteenth century included JAMES HUNTER, HENRY B. BRADFORD, James Riley Ball, and WILLIAM H. WILLS. Wills was pastor of the church and Halifax Circuit in 1866, when he served as president of the General Conference of the M. P. Church.

Among the distinguished ministers who served Eden Church in the twentieth century are: C. H. Whitaker, W. L. Harris, JESSE E. PRICHARD, L. W. Geringer, N. G. BETHEA, and W. M. Howard, Jr.

The present structure, c. 1890, is the third one in the history of Eden Church. In 1966 the North Carolina Department of Archives and History erected a highway marker at the church in commemoration of its history, and in connection with the celebration of the BICENTENNIAL of Methodism in America.

J. Elwood Carroll, History of the North Carolina Annual Conference of the Methodist Protestant Church. N.p., 1939.

Minutes of the Methodist Conferences in America, 1773-1813. Our Church Record. June 23, Sept. 29, 1898.

The Rocky Mount (N. C.) Telegram, July 31, 1960; Nov. 14, 1965.

Stuart H. Smith and C. T. Smith, Jr., The History of Trinity Parish, Edgecombe Parish. Scotland Neck, N. C., 1955.

RALPH HARDEE RIVES

ENID, OKLAHOMA, U.S.A. First Church. The first Methodist circuit rider to arrive in Enid was O. R. Bryant. This courageous minister preached to a small congregation of early settlers on Sunday, Sept. 17, 1893, the day after the great "run" into OKLAHOMA. (The official opening of the territory in that part of the state and race for homestead lands by would-be settlers.) The service was held on the lawn of the courthouse and was the first Protestant sermon delivered in Enid. This was the beginning of the First Methodist Church of Enid.

Early Methodists in Enid were not financially able to build a church until five years after the opening of the Cherokee Strip. Another devout Methodist minister, Marion Porter, was appointed to this charge, and he inspired members to build a church at the corner of Grand and Maple in 1898. The fires of evangelism began to burn, and the membership increased, so that eleven years later another house of worship was erected at the corner of Randolph and Adams. James Wagner, a minister from New England, was pastor during this building project. The congregation moved into the church in March, 1910, and this remained the church home for the next fifty years.

Robert J. Smith was in his second pastorate at First Church when an educational building was erected in 1950.

John R. Webb, district superintendent, officiated at the ground-breaking service for the new sanctuary on Sunday, July 13, 1958. This edifice was completed in the pastorate of Ben Sturdivant and dedicated by Bishop W. ANGE SMITH on Feb. 16, 1964.

John Russell was appointed pastor in May, 1964. In 1965, the site of the old building at Randolph and Adams was cleared and the ground-breaking service for a new education and fellowship building was conducted by Rufus Walder, district superintendent, on October 10. This beautiful and useful structure was occupied on Sunday, Nov. 20, 1966. Present membership of the church is 3,178.

Henry B. and John H. Bass, Methodism in Enid. Oklahoma City: Semco Color Press, 1959.

Clegg and Oden, Oklahoma. 1968.

First Church, Bulletin, Sept. 15, 1968.

HENRY B. BASS
JOHN H. BASS

ENSLEY, FRANCIS GERALD (1907-), American bishop, was born in Morrow Co., Ohio, Aug. 12, 1907. He was educated at OHIO WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY receiving the A.B. degree in 1927. He received his theological education at BOSTON UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY, graduating in 1931. He did graduate work at the University of Berlin, Germany, 1931-32, and received the Ph.D. in 1938 from BOSTON UNIVERSITY. He holds honorary degrees from eleven institutions.

Bishop Ensley married Eunice LeBourveau on July 6, 1935. Their children are Frederick Louis, Philip Chalfant, Elizabeth, and Charlotte. He was pastor of The United Church of Norwood, Mass., from 1935 to 1944. Concurrently he was professor of Homiletics and then of Systematic Theology at Boston University School of Theology upon the retirement of Dean ALBERT C. KNUDSON. He left the chair of Theology in 1944 to assume the pastorate of North Broadway Church of COLUMBUS, OHIO, and served there until 1952, when he was elected bishop by the North Central JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCE. He was assigned to the IOWA Area of The Methodist Church and served there until 1964, when he became the Resident Bishop of the Ohio West Area with episcopal residence in Columbus, Ohio.

Bishop Ensley served as a delegate to the Jurisdictional and GENERAL CONFERENCES of 1948 and 1952. He was a delegate to the ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE in Springfield, Mass., 1947, and gave addresses at the Conferences at Oxford, England, 1951; Lake Junaluska, 1956; Oslo, Norway, 1963, and London, England, 1966. Since its inception, he has been a Methodist representative to the CONSULTATION ON CHURCH UNION.

He was Loud Memorial lecturer, University of Michigan, 1949; Mendenhall lecturer, DEPAUV UNIVERSITY, 1959; Willson lecturer, SCARRITT COLLEGE and VANDERBILT School of Religion, 1959, and Fayetteville, Ark., 1966; and Finch lecturer, Charlotte, N. C., 1968.

He was co-chairman of the first conversation between American Roman Catholics and Methodists, Chicago, 1966; one of four American Methodists chosen to participate in the first meeting for conversations between the Roman Catholic Church and WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL, in Ariccia, Italy, 1967, and the second conversations in London, England, 1968.

He has served as chairman of the Methodist National Board of Christian Social Concerns; chairman of the Commission on Ecumenical Consultation; Vice-President of the Methodist General Board of Education and chairman of the Division of Higher Education; and Vice-President of the Council on World Service and Finance of The United Methodist Church. He was a member of the Executive Committee of the Church Union Commission which effected the merger between the Methodist and EVANGELICAL UNITED BRETHREN churches. He is president of The American Section of the World Methodist Council, has been a member of the Assembly of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES of 1961 and 1967, and a member of the Central Committee of the World Council of Churches.

His writings include John Wesley, Evangelist; Paul's Letter to Local Churches; The Marks of Christian Education; Persons Can Change.

Who's Who in America, Vol. 34.

Who's Who in The Methodist Church, 1966.

N. B. H.

ENTERPRISE, FLORIDA, U.S.A., Florida Methodist Children's Home, was authorized in 1908, by the FLORIDA ANNUAL CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church, South. Children admitted today come mostly from broken homes, with parents divorced, or separated, under treatment for mental illness, in prison, victims of physical illness, or other conditions which make them physically or morally unable to rear children.

Thirty-two staff members presently serve the needs of the children. The campus at Enterprise, Fla., consists of 100 acres located on the north shore of Lake Monroe, a part of the St. Johns River. Trustees for The Florida Methodist Children's Home are elected by the Florida Conference, with seven ministers and eight laymen making up the elected board. In addition, four ex-officio trustees serve with the elected board members.

BASCOM W. CARLTON

ENTHUSIASM. This word regularly occurs in writing of the WESLEY period, but in a sense so different from modern usage that an explanatory note is certainly required. As used by Wesley and his opponents, the word does not answer to the modern sense of "enthusiastic," i.e., posessed of welcome and constructive zeal and energy, but to the old-fashioned word "enthusiastical," i.e., unbalanced, extreme, fanatical. Not a little of the history of evangelical religion in England is compressed into the decline and rising again of this word. By original derivation from the Greek, the word means "possession by the divine." Thus, Plato uses it to denote the direct intuition of the divine, as it occurs in mystics, poets, and philosophers. Used at first in English in this sense, "enthusiastic" soon came to mean "fanatical."

The background to this is doubtless the religious strife of the post-Reformation period, issuing in the Civil War and the Commonwealth, accompanied by an outbreak of a variety of extremist and individualist sects, and the final revulsion of the majority of common-sense Englishmen against anything which looked like extremism or radicalism in religion. In the period of disillusion following this, the man who made bold to claim that he was personally inspired by God was dismissed as a fanatic, very dangerous to the stability of society. So we find that the regular eighteenth century use of the word "enthusiasm" is fanaticism, and as such it was regularly employed by their detractors against the Methodists. In particular, such Methodist teaching as the possibility of instantaneous conversion, of assurance of salvation, and of the gift of perfect love, were all dismissed as "very horrid enthusiasm."

A good and revealing example of the usage occurs in Wesley's Journal for Nov. 25, 1739. "I preached at St. Mary's (Exeter). . . . Dr. W— told me, after sermon, 'Sir, you must not preach in the afternoon. Not, said he, that you preach any false doctrine. I allow all that you have said is true; and it is the doctrine of the Church of England. But it is not guarded; it is dangerous; it may lead people into enthusiasm or despair.'" The not altogether unsympathetic clergyman could, in principle, accept Wesley's theme that Christianity consists not merely in church-going, honesty, and almsgiving, but in a great inner divine work of the heart. But he was accustomed to the measured tones of a placid literary homily, while Wesley with the same matter "preached for conversion." And to tell men with this degree of emphasis that they could not trust in their own good works would drive them to despair while, if they accepted Wesley's message so far as to rejoice in the assurance of salvation, this would be "enthusiasm." Herein was the offense of Methodism and the seed of ecclesiastical separation. So on the celebrated occasion when Wesley visited Epworth, and was repulsed at the parish church by his father's successor, he listened first to an anti-Methodist sermon. "But the sermon on Quench not the spirit was not suitable to the expectation of many of the hearers. Mr. Romley told them, 'One of the most dangerous ways of quenching the spirit was by enthusiasm,' and enlarged on the character of an enthusiast, in a very florid and oratorical manner. After the sermon, John Taylor stood in the churchyard and gave notice as the people were coming out, 'Mr. Wesley, not being permitted to preach in the church, designs to preach here at six o'clock.' Accordingly, at six I came and found such a congregation as I believe Epworth never saw before. I stood near the east end of the Church, upon my father's tombstone." His text was the same as that at Exeter, and one of Wesley's favorites, Romans 14:17. (Journal, June 6, 1741.)

Wesley constantly threw back the charge of "enthusiasm," arguing that the true Methodist preached level-

headed Scriptural doctrine, and that the lunatic fringe of quietists, antinomians, etc., who troubled his Societies, were the real enthusiasts. Thus, his argument in Sermon xxxii in the Standard Sermons, "The Nature of Enthusiasm," runs as follows: those who teach true and earnest religion will always be described as "enthusiasts," fanatics, by the men of this world. The real enthusiasts, however, are those who presume upon the grace of God, those who profess Christian experience, but show an unrighteous life, those who falsely suppose themselves to have prophetic gifts, those who are too quick to see special divine guidance in mundane affairs which the Christian ought to decide by common sense; those who suppose they can understand the Bible, or preach, without due study; and those who, having persuaded themselves that they are under a special divine providence, are lifted up with pride. So likewise the Rules of the Society, written by Wesley (now the General Rules), characteristically single out as "that enthusiastic doctrine of devils," which is to be "trampled underfoot," the notion that "we are not to do good unless our heart be free to it," i.e., that the evangelical Christian is released from a fixed duty of obedience to the moral law of God, and is left to the spontaneity of his heart (Works, viii, 261).

The gradual permeation of so much of religious and social life with the principles of the evangelical revival, and the consequent release of frigid inhibitions regarding the warm "religion of the heart," is doubtless a chief influence in enabling the old word "enthusiasm" gradually to take on again a good and healthy connotation.

JOHN LAWSON

JOSEPH ENTWISLE

ENTWISLE, JOSEPH (1767-1841), British Methodist, was born in Manchester in 1767, and became a Wesleyan itinerant preacher in 1787. In 1802, on his initiative, stricter regulations for the testing of candidates for the ministry, including an oral examination before the DISTRICT MEETING, were adopted. In 1804 he became secretary of the first Missionary Committee appointed by the Wesleyan Methodist connection. He was elected PRESIDENT of the Wesleyan Methodist Conference in 1812, and was largely responsible for bringing RICHARD WATSON, who had resigned in 1801 when doubts were cast on his orthodoxy, into FULL CONNEXION again. Entwisle was again elected president in 1825. As the first house-governor of the Theological Institution (1834-38; see Theological Colleges), he did much by his saintly character and moderation to dispel the suspicion which the proposal for a theological college had awakened in some quarters. He retired in 1838, and died at Tadcaster on Nov. 6, 1841.

J. Entwisle, Joseph Entwisle. 1848.

G. Osborn, Outlines of Wesleyan Bibliography. 1869.

JOHN NEWTON

EPISCOPACY denotes the office of bishop or the general superintendency in the Methodist Churches in America which are Episcopal. The office is distinguished from the traditional ecclesiastical usage of the title bishop by being an integral part of the order of elders, and not, as in the Church of England or Protestant Episcopal Church, a distinct order or class of ministers. Each Methodist bishop presides over an Episcopal Area (one or more annual conferences) within one of the JURISDICTIONS or CENTRAL CONFERENCES of the Church. Before 1940 the bishops traveled at large in the connection and presided over different annual conferences.

The office of general superintendent arose in 1784 as part of JOHN WESLEY'S "plan" for the organization of the Church in America. Three major elements made up this plan: (1) a conference or conferences of the ministers, patterned on the conferences which Wesley had held annually in his British Methodist work; (2) a liturgy derived from the Book of Common Prayer; and (3) the office of General Superintendent. The resulting Church was supposed to resemble the Church of England from which Methodism had been derived. The chief difference between the new superintendency and the old was that it claimed succession not from a line of bishops but from the general presbyterial ministry of the Church through Wesley. Another difference, added by the organizing Christmas Conference, was the election of the new superintendents by the conference.

The first superintendent, THOMAS COKE, was appointed in a formal consecration by Wesley and two other presbyters on Sept. 3, 1784. Coke proceeded immediately to America where he met with FRANCIS ASBURY, Wesley's assistant for America, to arrange for an indigenous organization of the American Methodists. They called a convention, later known as the CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE, which met in BALTIMORE, Dec. 24, 1784, through Jan. 1, 1785. At this convention, Coke and Asbury were elected to the Superintendency, and Asbury was formally ordained into the office. Ecclesiastical precedence for the new office was deduced from primitive usages, particularly the church at Alexandria, which was alleged to have elected and consecrated bishops from and by its college of presbyters.

The Minutes of the Christmas Conference outlined the powers and duties of the superintendent as: "To ordain Superintendents, Elders, and Deacons; to preside as a Moderator in our Conferences; to fix the Appointments of the Preachers for the several Circuits; and in the Intervals of the Conference, to change, receive or suspend Preachers, as Necessity may require; and to receive Appeals from the Preachers and People, and decide them. . . . No Person shall be ordained a Superintendent, Elder or Deacon, without the Consent of a Majority of the Conference and the Consent and Imposition of Hands of a Superintendent." (Discipline, 1785, p. 11)

After the conferences of 1787, Coke and Asbury, in their revision of the Discipline changed the title of their office to Bishop. Approval of this change by the conferences of the next year fixed the new title, although the original title, General Superintendent, continued to be used.

The sporadic conferences of the ministers held after 1784 began to prove inadequate to manage the affairs of the church; consequently in 1792 a general conference was called, primarily to adjudicate a challenge of Asbury's authority by one of the elders, JAMES O'KELLY. O'Kelly's demand was that a preacher should have the right to appeal his appointment to the conference. The conference denied this appeal, but succeeded in seating itself as a quadrennial General Conference with exclusive legislative authority and with the power to review the conduct of the bishops.

The constitution of the General Conference was altered in 1808, when it was superseded by the delegated GENERAL CONFERENCE. One of the constitutional checks on the delegated General Conference was the "third restrictive rule," viz., "the General Conference shall not change or alter any part or rule of our Government, so as to do away Episcopacy, or to destroy the plan of our itinerant General Superintendency."

When the Conference of 1808 met, its only active bishop was Asbury. Coke, with the consent of the Conference, had withdrawn to devote himself to missionary work and RICHARD WHATCOAT, elected in 1800, had died in 1806. The Conference of 1808 thereupon elected WILLIAM MCKENDREE to the office. McKendree traveled with Asbury until the senior bishop died in 1816.

McKendree's conduct of the office was necessarily different from that of Asbury, whose authority was more that of a founding father than an elected official. McKendree became the chief architect of the regular constitutional episcopacy, functioning as the executive arm of the church.

In the decade of 1820, a strong movement challenged the authority of the episcopacy. This resulted in the formulation, in 1830, of the METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH, which embodied lay representation in all church conferences, replaced the episcopacy by an elected term presidency, and put appointments in the hands of a committee. The Methodist Protestants joined in the Unification of 1939, feeling that their basic democratic principles were embodied in the new Church.

The debates of the General Conference of 1844 divided the church on the definition of episcopacy. The M. E. Church, South, saw the episcopacy as an independent succession from Wesley, thus a coordinate arm of the church, functioning parallel to the General Conference. For the M. E. Church, the bishop was an officer of the General Conference, whose episcopal status and executive authority were completely at the disposal of the Conference.

During the years of the divided church the most significant constitutional changes dealt with the formation of effective courts for the review of executive administration and constitutional questions. These were the constitutionally independent JUDICIAL COUNCIL of the M. E. Church, South and the traditionally powerful Judiciary Committee of the General Conference of the M. E. Church. These courts, serving as a check on all authority, tempered the differences and did much to make possible the constitution of the reunited Methodist Church.

The chief duty of a bishop is the executive supervision of the Annual Conferences which comprise his Episcopal Area. Within this responsibility are the specific responsibilities of presiding at the sessions of conferences, ordaining ministers elected by the conferences, and annually appointing the pastors to their churches.

The Methodist itineracy is a unique institution administered by the bishops. Although tenure limitations have been removed, the bishop still makes annual appointments of all pastors. With few exceptions, the changes in pastoral assignments are made at the sessions of the Annual Conferences. The custom of the bishop consulting the district superintendents, begun by McKendree, has become the law of the church. However the sole authority for pastoral assignments rests with the bishop.

A major portion of a bishop's time is committed to the administration of the various programs of his Episcopal Area. Bishops have had a major role in formulating and promoting the quadrennial programs which, since 1944, have expressed the concern of the united church for its national problems.

The bishops of each Jurisdictional and Central Conference are organized into a COLLEGE OF BISHOPS; all bishops of Jurisdictional and Central Conferences together form the COUNCIL OF BISHOPS; bishops of affiliated autonomous churches join bishops of the Council to form the Conference of Methodist Bishops.

Bishops are active as members and officers of general boards and agencies. Each bishop is given a liaison assignment to a particular foreign mission field each quadrennium. Through these general and missionary assignments, the bishops relate the general church programs to the annual conferences and to the local parishes.

Recent ecumenical conversations have raised many problems in church polity. Methodist bishops have taken the lead in these conversations, and the Methodist episcopacy has shown a willingness to change to meet the needs of the future. Basic to Methodist doctrine is the idea that polity should be subordinate to mission. The efficiency of the office has been in no small measure due to its inherent flexibility in meeting the problems of each age; this characteristic will make it adaptable and useful for the church of the future. (See also COUNCIL OF BISHOPS AND MINISTRY.)

J. M. Buckley, Constitutional and Parliamentary History. 1912.

J. Emory, Defence of Our Fathers. 1827.

F. D. Leete, Methodist Bishops. 1948.

G. F. Moede, Office of Bishop. 1964.

T. B. Neely, Evolution of Episcopacy. 1888.

J. J. Tigert, Constitutional History. 1894.

JESSE HAMBY BARTON, JR.

EPISCOPAL ADDRESS, THE, is a quadrennial statement made by the bishops of the church to the members of the GENERAL CONFERENCE at—or very close to—the opening session of that body. The address reviews conditions in the church, especially during the past quadrennium, and points out moves and frequently makes recommendations which the General Conference and the church at large should take under advisement for the advancement of the church.

The first Episcopal Address was made by Bishop WILLIAM MCKENDREE to the first delegated General Conference in 1812. Prior to that time bishops were members of the General Conference and had equal rights with other members to make motions or take part in the debates. Bishop ASBURY would often make motions and then put them. (Journal, General Conference, 1804, 1808.) But when the delegated General Conference first sat in 1812, and since the bishops were restricted to presiding, Bishop McKendree felt it to be his duty to present in stated form to the Conference such matters as he thought were necessary to the well being of the connection. It is said that Asbury was a bit surprised at this and intimated to McKendree in the presence of the Conference that this was a departure from his custom. "But the latter presently replied in substance," states Bishop McTyre, "that he could not expect his sons to be able fully to follow in his footsteps." The value of the suggestions and general outline of procedure made by McKendree was recognized and since then his precedent has been followed and an Episcopal Address is made ready for each General Conference.

The usual address presents a brief summary of the progress of the church during the preceding four years, and outlines the condition of the various departments of its work—such as publishing interests, missionary efforts, Sunday schools, education, and, within recent years, social conditions and national and world-wide moves of import to the Methodist Church and its work. The address sometimes suggests disciplinary changes or legislation which may appear to the bishops as helpful or necessary. The address has been likened to the "State of the Union" address of the President of the United States as each Congress opens; a similar address also usually comes from the governors of the various states of the Union, as they address their newly assembled legislative bodies.

In the United Methodist Church, when a General Conference is approaching, one of the bishops is selected by ballot in the COUNCIL OF BISHOPS to prepare the address, and prior to the meeting of the General Conference he reads a draft of this to the entire Council for criticism and suggestions toward the perfecting of it. This process calls for considerable revision and discussion, but since all the bishops sign the Episcopal Address, each one finds it necessary to see that it does contain material with which he is in agreement. The bishop who writes the address usually reads it at the opening session, or at a formal session set close to the opening of the General Conference; and it is customary for a motion to be made that those portions of the address which deal with specific matters shall be referred to appropriate legislative committees for their consideration and possible action.

Episcopal Addresses through the years have acted as a source of important reference. While the material of such addresses is not legislation, it does give the mind of the leaders of the church upon many matters in which Methodist people are immediately and vitally interested. The address to each General Conference is found in toto in the Journal of that Conference, and also in the Daily Christian Advocate published during each Conference session. The usual address is quite lengthy. While there is always a wish on the part of the bishops themselves to keep it brief, it must cover so broad a scope of work for such a large church and its many activities, that it is almost impossible to keep it within the limits of brevity. The usual address runs well over an hour. The one delivered by Bishop Paul Kern in San Francisco in 1952 took two and a half hours in the reading.

Journals of successive General Conferences. N. B. H.

EPISCOPAL FUND. (See WORLD SERVICE AND FINANCE, COUNCIL ON.)

lationship between the denomination in America and in central Europe during hostilities and reconstruction. He was a regular attendant at the meetings of the COUNCIL OF BISHOPS of the United Methodist Church until his death, which came on May 7, 1970.

PAUL H. ELLER

EPPS, LEILA FLOSSIE (1884-1962), American missionary to BRAZIL, was born on April 16, 1884, in Kingtree, S. C. She studied at Leesville, S. C. and the Meridian, Miss., Female Institute. Desiring to be a missionary to CHINA, she went to SCARRITT BIBLE AND TRAINING SCHOOL in KANSAS CITY, Mo., from which she graduated in 1911. After a short period of home-mission work, she was appointed to Brazil, arriving there in 1911. She served for thirty-seven years, first in educational work, and afterward with the women of the church.

In 1929, the Woman's Missionary Council of the M. E. Church, South in the United States made an analysis of the Women's Societies in Brazil, listed as a priority a program for training the women, and called for the appointment of some person who could travel extensively and give full time to this work. Leila Epps was named, and thus became a pioneer in the development and expansion of Methodist women's work in Brazil.

When the Methodist Church in Brazil became autonomous in 1930, Miss Epps was asked to continue this task. In September, 1930, she invited the presidents and secretaries of the three regional conferences of Woman's Societies to meet with her in São Paulo; and there they planned the launching of the Methodist woman's official organ, to be called the VOZ MISSIONARIA (Missionary Voice). Miss Epps was asked to be its first editor. This has become the Protestant magazine of largest circulation in Brazil. Miss Epps continued as editor until Brazilian law required that all editors of papers published in the country be nationals.

Another concern of Miss Epps was the plight of Brazil's neglected Indians. She got Methodist women interested through the Voz; an interdenominational mission was established among the Cauri Indians of Mato Grosso, and the women helped support a young Brazilian doctor, Neldo de Araujo, a medical missionary. With Lydia Ferguson, Miss Epps risked disease and dangers through the jungle, to visit and report on this mission. She also helped educate one of the young Indians of this tribe.

After retirement in 1950, in SOUTH CAROLINA, Miss Epps worked tirelessly teaching and speaking in behalf of Brazil. She died on June 9, 1962, and was buried in the Williamsburg Cemetery in Kingtree, S. C. Bishop CYRUS B. DAWSEY of Brazil said of her: "Her big heart took in the whole of the Kingdom of God."

N. D. Tatum, Crown of Service. 1960.

Eloise A. Woolever, In Daring Obedience. N.p., n.d.

EULA K. LONG

GEORGE EDWARD EPP

EPP, GEORGE EDWARD (1885-1970), American E.U.B. bishop and administrator who lived to channel his guidance born of wise experience into the United Methodist Church, was born in Sheboygan, Wis., June 15, 1885. He was recommended to the ministry by the congregation in Port Washington, Wis. He received his theological education at EVANGELICAL THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, Naperville, Ill.

Following graduation from the seminary, he was ordained and received into membership in the Wisconsin Conference of The Evangelical Association. In 1921 he was called to serve as Executive Secretary of the Missionary Society of that denomination. He was reelected to that office in 1922, when The United Evangelical Church and the Evangelical Association joined to become The Evangelical Church. In this service he continued until 1930, when he was elected bishop. To this position he was quadrennially reelected until his retirement in 1958.

During his years of leadership, he gave wise episcopal supervision for many programs and auxiliaries of the denomination—educational, publication and philanthropic. He provided strong leadership in preparing for and leading The Evangelical Church into union with the Church of the United Brethren in Christ in 1946. He was an exponent of the missionary outreach of the church. He labored valiantly to maintain strong ties of Christian re-

EPWORTH, England, a small and ancient town of some 2,000 inhabitants, is the capital of the Isle of Axholme rural area in the northeast of Lincolnshire, bounded by four rivers. Originally marshy, it was drained in the seventeenth century to become a richly fertile agricultural district. It is chiefly notable as the birthplace of JOHN and CHARLES WESLEY, whose father SAMUEL WESLEY was rector of the parish for over forty years. The brothers were born, John in 1703 and Charles in 1707, in a rectory which was burned down in February, 1709. The rector had a new rectory built on the same site, completed in that same year. Samuel Wesley died in 1735, and the rectory continued to be the residence of the rectors of the parish until the twentieth century.

EPWORTH RECTORY

When the Anglican Church decided to build a new rectory, the old rectory was secured as the property of the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL. British Methodists contributed the cost of the building and the site of some two acres, and generous contributions from American Methodists met the cost of restoration and furnishing. It was reopened as Methodist property in June, 1957. In addition to being a place of pilgrimage for several thousand visitors every year, the old rectory provides hospitality for resident guests and is used for retreats and conferences. It is maintained with a resident warden by a grant from the World Methodist Council and the gifts of Friends of the Old Rectory.

E. BENSON PERKINS

Wesley Memorial Church. The British Methodist Conference of 1882 warmly approved the building of a church at Epworth as a memorial to the Wesleys. The PRESIDENT OF CONFERENCE that year initiated this enterprise and was appointed to superintend subscriptions from the connection at home and abroad. He, himself, had the joy of preaching at the opening of the church on Sept. 5, 1889, amid great rejoicing. Wesley Memorial, a stately, churchly church, represents the devotion of Methodists everywhere, and of course, has the unique significance of being erected in the town where John and Charles Wesley were born, and where their father was rector of the nearby church of the Establishment.

The building, with the manse, occupies a spacious lot with lawn and flowers between, and naturally it is visited by hundreds of pilgrims to Epworth each year.

WESLEY MEMORIAL CHAPEL, EPWORTH

Within the church there is an oak font which was given in memory of Susanna Wesley—one of the few memorials to her to be found in Methodism. As the wall tablet to the memory of John Wesley and his mother says of her, "By whom he was prayerfully educated in the things of God."

In the chancel arch is a window in stained glass representing Christ saying to his disciples, "Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel." At the head of this window are the profiles of John and Charles Wesley, this being a copy of the J. Adams Plaque in Westminster Abbey. In a clear light the full glory of the window lends force to the enheartening words, "Best of all, God is with us."

The Communion Table is below the window and this came from the parish church from which Samuel Wesley and later John Wesley had administered the Holy Communion. To this table the Wesley family came, with many others, over the years to confess their faith and be strengthened. An oak salver made from the beam to which the former bells of the parish church were attached, is used as an offertory plate.

F. C. Gill has described the entire layout of buildings as "dignified and impressive," and says that they are upon "spacious and well-kept grounds."

N. B. H.

EPWORTH LEAGUE, THE. A former organization within Methodist Churches of America, primarily for young people, exerted enormous influence during its existence. This was during the years between 1890—when it was first formed—and 1928 and 1930 when its work was merged into the general work of the BOARD OF EDUCATION of the two large Episcopal Methodisms. The organization arose because of a recognized need to provide a more definite church life for and with young people: the League was primarily an extension, through an independent organization, of the Sunday school's teaching and training.

The Epworth League seems to have begun within the M. E. Church when, under the auspices of the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1884, what was then called the Oxford League was organized. JOHN H. VINCENT, the originator of the Chautauqua idea, is given credit for the idea of such a society for church youth, and for maturing its plans.

The Oxford League was adopted by the Board of Managers of the Sunday School Union of the M. E. Church and in May 1888, during a session of the General Conference, the bishops having been requested to name a Board of Control, appointed Bishop EDWARD G. ANDREWS, Bishop John H. Vincent, JESSE L. HURLBUT, JAMES M. BUCKLEY, and James M. Freeman to act as such a board. Meanwhile, a number of societies in line with this plan arose, and at a call for a tighter union for this group, representatives of all the general young people's societies of the M. E. Church assembled in Cleveland, Ohio, May 14, 1889, and resolved that "all existing societies be merged into one new society for the entire Church to be called the Epworth League." It was affirmed that "the object of the Epworth League is to promote an earnest, intelligent, practical, and loyal spiritual life in the young people of our church, to aid them in constant growth in grace and in the attainment of purity of heart" (The Epworth League Book, p. 73).

The idea of such a League and its plan was also looked upon with approval by the M. E. Church, South, at its General Conference held in St. Louis in May, 1890. In the enabling legislation there, it was stated that "the League is not a part of the Sunday School, nor is it in any way necessarily connected with the Sunday School. It is intended for the young people of our congregations, whether members of the Sunday Schools or not" (The Epworth League Book, p. 74).

The Methodist Church in Canada pursued the same plan and in 1889 the General Sunday School Board of that Church recommended the organization of Epworth Leagues. The General Conference of the next year adopted a plan for such organization and a constitution for the same. A kindred organization was formed in certain overseas conferences of the M. E. Church, and of the M. E. Church, South, and in other mission lands where Central Conferences had been organized.

The Epworth League acted as a training school for many who later on became leaders in the Church. Its fourfold pattern of spiritual and devotional life, educational activity, missionary outreach, and social activities were put into effect by committees in each local church empowered to carry out congruent plans. The social life of church young people was largely centered in the Epworth League in many places, and as was natural, this social bond held together League groups in the individual church, and even in the larger district and annual conference meetings.

Looked upon with suspicion at first, the officers of the general Church came in time to applaud the work of the League. It was approvingly noted in EPISCOPAL ADDRESSES of the bishops from time to time, and disciplinary regulations having to do with its life, constitution and activities are to be found in the Disciplines of the respective churches during the years of its existence.

The League was specifically placed under the direction of the pastor. Article One of the Constitution of the Epworth League stated "the pastor shall have general supervision of the League" (The Epworth Book, p. 75).

In each of the large Episcopal Methodisms there were publications which were officially adopted as organs of the League. The Epworth Herald was that of the M. E. Church, and the Epworth Era of the M. E. Church, South. The General Conference elected the editor for the Epworth Herald in the M. E. Church, as well as a general secretary and "Board of Controls" whose names were listed in the Discipline of that Church. (Discipline 1912, Paragraph 27).

A similar situation prevailed in the M. E. Church, South, where it was provided that the officers of the Board should be a president, who should be one of the bishops designated by the College of Bishops, and a vice-president elected by the League Board; and a general secretary who should be elected by ballot at the General Conference. (Discipline, M. E. C. S., 1922, Paragraph 407). It was the duty of the general secretary to edit the Epworth Era, and to have general oversight "of the interest of the young people's societies" and recommend study courses for the several classes of young people's societies. (Discipline, M. E. C. S., 1922, Paragraph 410).

Meetings of the League for worship and spiritual development were usually held on Sunday. Quite often this was in the afternoon, or in many places in the early evening before the evening church service. There was some complaint on the part of pastors that the League group was somewhat too independent, and that many who might otherwise have thrown their lot completely in with the local congregation were using the League as a church of its own. With the growth of the Department of Education in the big Episcopal Methodisms, there came a call during the 1920's to correlate the activities of the League with the general plan of the church school and educational institutions of the Church. The General Conference of 1924, M. E. Church, and the General Conference of 1930 of the M. E. Church, South, adopted plans whereby the Board of Education took over the work which had been carried on by the League, and unified its work as a Youth Division in the larger educational program of the church.

Eventually the Methodist Youth Fellowship was created of the youth of the church between the ages of twelve and twenty-one inclusive and young people in the youth division of the church school, and were expected to carry on the same sort of work which the old Epworth League had done (Discipline, TMC, 1964. Para. 244.)

There was also established a Young Adult Fellowship, and various publications published by the editorial division of the Board of Education have been created to act as official representatives of such organizations, and to act as organs for these in the larger affairs of church life and civic life.

The Christian Advocate, "The Epworth League," by Holmes, Sept. 9, 1926.

Disciplines of the several Methodist Churches.

Frank O. Erb, The Development of the Young People's Movement. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1917.

O. P. Fitzgerald, The Epworth League Book. Nashville: Southwestern Publishing House, 1893.

J. B. Robinson, The Epworth League: Its Place in Methodism. Cincinnati: Cranston and Stowe, 1890. N. B. H.

EPWORTH PRESS, the name or trade name adopted in 1918 for materials put out by the Methodist Publishing House or Book Room in London, and designed for the general trade (as ABINGDON PRESS is the trade name for the METHODIST PUBLISHING HOUSE, U.S.A.). There is a permanency involved in a trade name, as Epworth Press, which would not be possible if the names of successive BOOK STEWARDS or Publishing Agents were to be listed as the publisher—as was the case between 1880 and 1918 in England. The Book Steward and director of the Epworth Press and of the Book Room since 1948, and until quite recently when he retired, was FRANK H. CUMBERS. (See also BOOKROOM.)

N. B. H.

EPWORTH PRINTING AND PUBLISHING HOUSE, Sydney, New South Wales, Australia. (See SYDNEY, New South Wales, Australia, Epworth Printing and Publishing House).

EPWORTH SCHOOL, Pietermaritzburg, Natal, SOUTH AFRICA, is the only existing Methodist school for white girls, and comprises a high school of 266 scholars and a junior school of 104. The school was founded as a private venture under the principalship of Miss E. Lowe and Miss E. Mason in 1898, and ownership was transferred to the Methodist Church in 1919 when a Board of Governnors was appointed. During recent years the school has expanded considerably and contains a modern Science Wing with well-equipped laboratories and a lecture theatre, as well as an Art, Music and Housecraft Block. The Chapel, built in 1960, is the focal point of worship in the School. Girls attending Epworth come from all parts of South Africa and there are also many from RHODESIA, ZAMBIA, Tanzania and Portuguese East Africa. The aims are to provide a sound, liberal education, to teach the Christian faith and to prepare girls to make a worthwhile contribution to society.

EPWORTH HIGH SCHOOL

H. F. KIRKBY

EPWORTH-BY-THE-SEA (1905-1917), Corpus Christi, Texas, U.S.A., was an Encampment Association owned and operated by five Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South in the State of TEXAS. It was situated on eighteen acres of land on North Beach, Corpus Christi, deeded to the Association on May 22, 1905, by the city of Corpus Christi. The only permanent buildings were an auditorium, a combination dormitory and dining hall, and a bath house. During the annual ten-day encampment period the beach was a tent city of more than a thousand. Allen K. Ragsdale, General Passenger Agent for the S.A.P. Railroad, was president of the Encampment Association, and through his agency, week-end excursions from all parts of the state swelled the attendance at times to more than 6,000 people.

Established primarily for members of the EPWORTH LEAGUE, the encampment was largely attended by adults, youths and by family groups. In addition to public addresses, study courses were offered in Bible, missions, and in Epworth League and Sunday school work. Partially wrecked by a coastal storm and embarrassed by indebtedness, the property was sold in 1915 and the Encampment was moved to a new 100-acre site at Port O'Connor. In 1917 a tropical hurricane totally wrecked the new improvements and the Encampment Association was dissolved.

Deed Records, Nueces County, Texas. Vol. 55.
Journals, West Texas and Southwest Texas Conferences, 1904-17.

O. W. Nail, Southwest Texas Conference. 1958.

—, Texas Centennial Yearbook. 1934. L. U. SPELLMAN

EPWORTH-BY-THE-SEA, GEORGIA. (See ST. SIMONS ISLAND and Epworth-by-the-Sea, Georgia.)

ERASMUS, an episcopus vagans, supposedly bishop of Arcadia in Crete. JOHN WESLEY befriended him in London in 1763, and shortly afterward, needing helpers to administer the Sacraments within Methodism, persuaded him to ordain John Jones, an otherwise undistinguished itinerant preacher who later joined the Church of England. Before the ordination, Wesley obtained an assurance that the patriarch of Smyrna accepted Erasmus' episcopal standing. Wesley was displeased when others of his lay preachers sought and obtained orders from Erasmus, and forbade them to exercise their thus obtained priestly functions. For a time Jones himself came under this ban in deference to CHARLES WESLEY's strong objection to the ordinations, but was later allowed to officiate in London. AUGUSTUS TOPLADY made these ordinations a subject of controversy as late as 1771, and THOMAS OLIVERS replied on Wesley's behalf.

C. Atmore, Methodist Memorial. 1871.

F. Baker, John Wesley. 1970, pp. 200-1, 380-1, points out that Erasmus' claim was almost certainly false.

J. Wesley, Letters. 1931.

—, Works. 1872.

THOMAS SHAW

ERASMUS, PETER (1833-1931), Canadian lay assistant, was born June 7, 1833, in the Red River Settlement, now Manitoba, Canada, the son of a Danish father and a Métis mother. After studying for the Anglican ministry, he left to join THOMAS WOOLSEY, Methodist missionary in the Edmonton area, now Alberta.

Erasmus joined the Captain John Palliser expedition conducting exploratory surveys for the British government in the Canadian West from 1857 to 1859. He was invited to return to England with Captain Palliser, but decided to remain in the West.

Erasmus became general assistant to HENRY B. STEINHAUER, Methodist missionary at Whitefish Lake, serving as freighter, and when GEORGE M. McDOUGALL took up residence at Victoria Mission, on the North Saskatchewan River, Erasmus assisted him as interpreter. He was official interpreter at the signing of Treaty No. 6 at Forts Carlton and Pitt in 1876, and played an important part in keeping the Saddle Lake Cree Indians from joining the Riel Rebellion in 1885.

During his long life he was also a gold miner, a hunter, a free trader, a farmer, a schoolteacher, and a trader for the Hudson's Bay Company at Whitefish Lake. In 1908 he was appointed assistant issuer on the Blackfoot reservation in south Alberta and served until 1911. Later he was granted a small lifetime pension by the Canadian government in recognition of his work. In his later years he lived a quiet life on the Goodfish Lake reservation.

Peter Erasmus typifies the great number of persons of mixed Indian and white descent who by their loyalty and helpfulness formed a bridge between the aboriginal peoples and the incoming white civilization, greatly facilitating the peaceful settlement of the Canadian West.

He died at Whitefish Lake, Alberta, May 27, 1931.

J. Hunter, Nikumoooina. London, S.P.C.K. 1886.

J. Maclean, H. B. Steinhauer. Toronto: Methodist Forward Movement, n.d.

J. E. Nix

ERB, JACOB (1804-1883), American pioneer circuit rider, editor, and bishop in the Church of the United Brethren in Christ, was born May 25, 1804, near Manheim, Lancaster Co., Pa. His parents and grandparents were United Brethren, with earlier connections in the Mennonite Church. Converted at the age of sixteen, Erb soon launched his ministerial career; at seventeen he was licensed to exhort, and at nineteen he became a member of the Pennsylvania Conference. Ordination followed in 1825. A fluent speaker in both the German and English languages, he was in great demand for a variety of services.

He was a co-compiler of a German hymnal, editor of several German publications of his denomination, a publishing house agent, and a home missionary. In 1825 his conference sent him to northwest New York state and to CANADA to establish churches. His itinerary of over 1,000 miles was made on foot, knapsack on his back, and at his own expense.

Erb's friendship with John Winebrenner, a German Reformed pastor of Harrisburg, Pa., resulted in Winebrenner's request that Erb should baptize him in the Susquehanna River, the ceremony taking place July 4, 1830. A few months later, Winebrenner and several associates organized the General Eldership of the Church of God. Jacob Erb served a total of twelve years in the bishopric of his denomination.

A sociable man, and possessed of considerable means, Erb invited the entire Pennsylvania Conference to be his guests in 1838. He hired a hall for the sessions, "boarded" forty in his farm home, and paid neighbors to board fifty. Mrs. Erb, who was Elizabeth Sherk, entered fully into the life and labors of her zealous husband.

Jacob Erb's longest and most notable pastorate was of the OLD OTTERBEIN CHURCH, in BALTIMORE, 1841-1848. Other pastorates included First Church, York, Pa., and First Church, Harrisburg, Pa. Bishop Erb died April 29, 1883, and is buried at Shiremanstown, Pa.

Koontz and Roush, The Bishops. 1950.

Minutes of the Pennsylvania Conference, UB. 1884.

PAUL E. HOLDCRAFT

ERIE, PENNSYLVANIA, U.S.A., established as a town in 1795, became a city in 1851. The Erie Circuit, one of the first to be organized in northwestern PENNSYLVANIA, was listed in the General Minutes for the first time in 1801. At that time it had thirty-seven members. In 1810 the circuit had twenty-three appointments, was 200 miles in extent, and reported 706 members.

A camp meeting conducted by J. Finley in 1817 some fourteen miles south of Erie, promoted Methodism in the region. Henry Knapp organized the first class in Erie in 1826, and in 1838 he built a frame church costing $300. There were 68 church members in 1835. In 1876, Erie had three churches with 557 members, 346 of them in First Church.

Due to the foresight and planning of the Erie Methodist Alliance which was incorporated in 1889, new Methodist churches established in the city through the years have been well spaced geographically so as to avoid competition. A survey conducted by the Alliance in 1961 resulted in the organization of the South East Erie Parish and the appointment of a Negro minister there, the first to become a member of the ERIE CONFERENCE. The conference board of missions joins the Alliance and the Erie churches in supporting the parish.

Erie has one A.M.E. Church, two A.M.E. Zion missions, two FREE METHODIST churches, and one WESLEYAN METHODIST church.

In 1970 there were thirteen United Methodist churches in Erie. First Church, the oldest, had 1,048 members; while Lakewood, one of the youngest (established in 1945), had 1,038. The aggregate statistics for the thirteen churches in 1970 were: 7,283 members, property valued at $5,819,781, and a total of $638,547 raised for all purposes during the year.

General Minutes, ME, TMC.

A. P. Weaver, The Erie Methodist Alliance. Pamphlet, 1967.

JESSE A. EARL
ALBEA GODBOLD

ERIE CONFERENCE (E.U.B.) was originally formed when the Muskingum Conference, CHURCH OF THE UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST, an OHIO-based organization, gave up the northern part of its territory in 1853. This consisted of the northern half of Mercer County, as well as Crawford, Erie, and Warren Counties, all within the state of PENNSYLVANIA. Permission was granted at that time to enter the unoccupied territory of NEW YORK State.

In 1861 the name Western Reserve was given to the remaining portion of the Muskingum Conference, which included a section of five bordering counties in Pennsylvania. In the year 1877, the Erie Conference was assigned the Pennsylvania territory of the Western Reserve Conference. This action added five circuits and one mission to Erie Conference.

The Erie Conference had a membership of 11,618 in 1967 with 89 churches served by 54 elders and 5 probationers.

In the year 1880, the Erie Conference established a seminary known as the Sugar Grove Seminary, deriving its name from the village of that name in Pennsylvania. It was formally dedicated Sept. 5, 1884, by Bishop JONATHAN DICKSON. Its first principal was R. J. White, who served for fourteen years in this capacity. Within two years the enrollment reached 215. Due to the rapid rise of high schools, the attendance at the seminary began to dwindle; and in 1914 the Conference voted to discontinue the school.

In the year 1836, the Erie Conference purchased a 110-acre farm at Findley Lake, N. Y., for a conference camp ground, which was named "Camp Findley." In 1968, the Conference continued as the Erie Conference of The United Methodist Church.

LEON HOWARD TICKNER

ERIE CONFERENCE (ME) was organized at MEADVILLE, Pa., Aug. 17, 1836, with Bishop JOSHUA SOULE presiding. Taken mainly from the PITTSBURGH CONFERENCE, the territory of the Erie Conference included northwestern PENNSYLVANIA, the southwestern tip of New York, and northeast OHIO. At the outset the conference had four districts: Warren, Ohio; Ravenna; Meadville; and Jamestown, N. Y. There were ninety preachers, fifty appointments, and 16,878 members.

In 1876 the GENERAL CONFERENCE created the EAST OHIO CONFERENCE by detaching the Ohio portions of the Pittsburgh and Erie Conferences. This reduced the Erie Conference's membership from about 35,000 to 26,951.

In 1960 the Northeastern Jurisdictional Conference readjusted a number of conference boundaries to make them conform more nearly to state lines. This was preparatory to merger of the Erie and Pittsburgh Conferences in 1962 to form the WESTERN PENNSYLVANIA CONFERENCE. When all boundary adjustments had been made, the Jamestown District of the Erie Conference was in the WESTERN NEW YORK CONFERENCE and some of the Western New York appointments went to the Western Pennsylvania Conference.

The Erie and Pittsburgh Conferences had much in common throughout their history. They had a common origin in the original Pittsburgh Conference. They had a common publicity organ in the Pittsburgh Christian Advocate from its beginning in 1834 to its demise in 1932. They jointly supported ALLEGHENY COLLEGE, the Methodist school in the region. And beginning in 1916 both were in the same episcopal area.

During its 126-year history the Erie Conference compiled an enviable record of service, especially in the area of EVANGELISM and MISSIONS. In 1962, its last year, the conference had about 209 ministers, four districts—Brookville, Grove City, Jamestown, and Meadville, 214 pastoral charges, 82,236 members, and property valued at $40,316,097.

J. N. Fradenburgh, Erie Conference. 1907.
General Minutes, ME, TMC.

W. C. Smeltzer, Headwaters of the Ohio. 1951.

W. GUY SMELTZER

ERNSBERGER, DAVID OLIVER (1851-1926), was born in Perry County, Ohio, on Aug. 19, 1851. He was ordained in April, 1882, and reached INDIA in July the same year. He pioneered in the work of the church in the Deccan. In the later years, he was called to supervise the same work that as a young man he had started. This was particularly true in the Raichur and Gulbarga districts. This was a hard field, both because of geography and because of cultural conditions. People marveled at his endurance and dedication.

A comrade of his points to three characteristics of his life: (1) He came to India because he believed that God had called him to come and expected him to stay for a lifetime. (2) He loved the people of India, and wholeheartedly believed that the Gospel pointed the way, and the only way, for salvation. (3) He expected the triumph of the Gospel, and to him that meant far more than winning an occasional convert.

In 1922 Ernsberger retired as an invalid, and four years later he died in CALIFORNIA.

B. H. Badley, Indian Missionary Dictionary. 1892.
Minutes of the South India Conference, 1926.

JOHN N. HOLLISTER

ERRINGTON, MATTHEW (1711-1788), early British Methodist, was converted under WESLEY'S preaching at the FOUNDRY, March 4, 1740, became a helper there, and valet to the preachers. He traveled in Cornwall with Thomas Merrick, suffered many persecutions, and accompanied CHARLES WESLEY on his first visit to Newcastle-upon-Tyne. Errington settled at Newcastle in 1749, where he was keeper of Wesley's books at the ORPHAN HOUSE until he died in 1788. A peaceable man, he never became an itinerant preacher, but left £20 to the poor and £20 for the work of God.

Arminian Magazine (1789), 22. London.
J. Wesley, Letters. 1931.

JOHN C. BOWMER

ERSKINE, EBENEZER (1680-1754), was the founder of the Scottish Secession Church in 1740. With his brother, Ralph, he was originally a minister in the Presbyterian Church of Scotland. He objected strongly to its Erastian habits of mind, however, and in 1733 championed the rights of the laity in Church patronage. The ensuing controversy ended with his formal deposition from the ministry in 1740. The Scottish Secession Church claimed to be the true Presbyterian Church in Scotland; ironically, further schism led to Ebenezer's expulsion from its ministry in 1748. He continued as minister of a congregation in Stirling until his death in 1754.

JOHN WESLEY was very interested in the case of the Erskines in 1739-40, no doubt because he was himself at odds with an Established Church in England. See, for example, his letter to CHARLES WESLEY, dated Sept. 21, 1739. There is a less complimentary reference to Ralph Erskine (Journal, iii, p. 539, September 20, 1751.) where John Wesley says that he had read some of Ralph's sermons and was disappointed with them: "I not only found many things odd and unscriptural, but some that were dangerously false, and the leaven of Antinomianism spread from end to end" (Journal, Sept. 20, 1751).

Frank Baker, "The Erskines and the Methodists," London Quarterly Review, clxxxiii (January 1958), pp. 36-45.

J. Ker and J. L. Watson, The Erskines. Edinburgh, 1880.

H. Watt, Fathers of the Kirk, ed. R. S. Wright. Edinburgh, 1960.

J. Wesley, Letters. 1931.

JOHN KENT

ERSKINE, JAMES (Lord Grange) (1679-1754), was a Scotsman, a brother of the Earl of Mar, who was involved in the Jacobite rising of 1715. He was a lawyer, and from 1734 a Member of Parliament. He lived in LONDON and was acquainted with the Wesleys, whom he sometimes heard at the FOUNDRY. He was an enthusiast for evangelical union and in March, 1745, wrote to JOHN WESLEY, recommending to him the work which James Robe (1688-1753) was doing at Kilsyth, in Scotland, where he was minister from 1713 to 1753. Robe was anxious to unite the evangelical world in a "concert of prayer and praise, for the revival of real Christianity." In his reply to Erskine, dated March 16, 1745, John Wesley suggested that it might be possible "to have the concurrence of Mr. Edwards in New England, if not of Mr. Tennent, also, herein?" Edwards and Tennent were both American evangelical preachers. It was Erskine who obtained the release of John Nelson from the Army, into which he had been pressed in July, 1744. He was present at the London Conference held in June, 1748. He died in LONDON, on Jan. 24, 1754.

J. Wesley, Letters. 1931.

JOHN KENT

ERSKINE, RALPH. (See ERSKINE, EBENEZER.)

ERVIN, PAUL REVERE (1908-1970), American layman, lawyer, and president of the JUDICIAL COUNCIL of The Methodist Church (1964-68), was born at Mount Mourne, N. C., April 7, 1908, son of James Osborne and Stella (Conger) Ervin.

He was graduated from DUKE UNIVERSITY, A. B., 1928, LL.B., 1931. HIGH POINT COLLEGE in 1964 awarded him the LL.D. degree.

He was admitted to the NORTH CAROLINA bar in 1930, and following that time practiced law in CHARLOTTE.

As a member of Providence Methodist Church, Charlotte, Paul Ervin served as teacher of the Men's Bible Class, trustee, and chairman of the Official Board. He was a delegate to the GENERAL and JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCES of 1948, 1952, and 1956, and also of the Jurisdictional Conference of 1944. He was elected by the General Conference as a member of the Judicial Council of The Methodist Church, 1956-68; became its vice president, 1960-64; its president, 1964-68.

He was a member of the House of Representatives of North Carolina, 1935-37, a member of the board of trustees of PFEIFFER COLLEGE, 1956-70, and chairman of that board in 1959. He was a member of the American and the North Carolina Bar Associations.

He died Dec. 21, 1970, in Charlotte.

Who's Who in America, Vol. 34.

Who's Who in The Methodist Church, 1966.

J. MARVIN RAST

ESCH, I. LYND (1905-), American minister, college president, and member of the JUDICIAL COUNCIL of The United Methodist Church, was born on Nov. 17, 1905, in Flinton, Pa., the son of Joseph I. and Mary Catherine (Gates) Esch. He was educated for the ministry of the United Brethren Church and was a student at Williams Junior College in Berkeley, Calif., from 1934-36. He received the A.B. from Chapman College in Los Angeles in 1940, the D.D. in 1961, and the Th.M. and Ph.D. from the UNIVERSITY of SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA in 1941, 1942. He has received additional honorary degrees. His wife was Alverda Ruth Weston and they married on Aug. 30, 1924.

Dr. Esch held positions of responsibility in the United Brethren Church, being president of the Board of Christian Education of the California Conference of that Church; and chairman of the Department of Evangelism of the Church Federation in LOS ANGELES, 1941-45. He also held positions of responsibility in INDIANAPOLIS after he moved to that city to become president of INDIANA CENTRAL COLLEGE. He became a member of the Indiana State Board of Public Instruction, 1947-61. Also, he was a member and president of the Indiana Employment Security Board; a member of the Board of the Indianapolis Community Hospital; president of the Church Federation of Greater Indianapolis, 1963-65; of the Board of Directors of the University Heights Hospital. He is a member of the American Guild of Organists, the Association of American Colleges, the National Society of Arts and Letters, and belongs to numerous clubs and fraternal organizations. At the union of his Church and The Methodist Church 1968, he was elected by the Uniting Conference as a member of the Judicial Council of The United Methodist Church. He resides in Indianapolis, where he continues to serve as president of Indiana Central College. (See also JUDICIAL COUNCIL.)

Who's Who in America, Vol. 34.

N. B. H.

ESCHATOLOGY. (See ADVENT, THE SECOND; and ADVENTISM.)

ESHER, JOHN JACOB (1823-1901), American Evangelical Association bishop, was born in Alsatia, France, Dec. 11, 1823. He came to America with his parents in 1830. The family settled near Warren, Pa., where John was converted and became a member of the Evangelical Association. In 1836 they moved to ILLINOIS and became founders of the first Evangelical congregation in the state, in 1837, at DesPlaines and Northfield, north of CHICAGO.

J. J. Esher was licensed to preach in 1845, and for years did heroic pioneer work in Illinois and Iowa. He served as circuit rider and presiding elder for some years and helped establish NORTH CENTRAL COLLEGE and the EVANGELICAL THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY. He also served as editor of the Evangelische Magazin when it was a German theological monthly.

In 1863 he was elected bishop, serving with distinction. He organized the first conference of the Evangelical Association in Europe in 1865; made the first episcopal visit to JAPAN in 1884-85, and visited Japan three times; he also wrote a Systematic Theology in German. He died April 16, 1901.

Bishop Esher was a profound thinker, a great theologian, a convincing, instructive, doctrinal preacher, an able executive, a man of deep convictions. He was also an aggressive, fearless leader, who had many friends—and some enemies, as befits a positive chieftain.

R. W. Albright, Evangelical Church. 1942.

R. M. Veh, Evangelical Bishops. 1939. HOWARD H. MARTY

ESSEX PREACHERS ASSOCIATION, THE, originated in 1848 under the guidance of Methodist ministers in northern NEW JERSEY. It proved to be a dominant factor in developing preachers and preaching, promoting discussion, bringing religious literature to the attention of its members, originating Methodist historical preservation and research in the area, dealing with church government, policy and other matters, engaging in critical Bible studies, demonstrating and evaluating sermon techniques, offering guidance in pastoral work, etc. The valuable program of the Preachers Association continued when the NEWARK CONFERENCE was organized in 1857, embracing northern New Jersey, the locale of the Essex Preachers Association.

Denominational leaders were active in the founding of the Association. It was proposed at a CAMP MEETING near Belleville, N. J. in August 1848, and was formally organized Dec. 11, 1848, at the Clinton Street M. E. Church, NEWARK. The object, stated in the Constitution, was "to promote the intellectual and religious improvement of its members with a view to greater efficiency in the work of the ministry." Meetings were held quarterly in the early years, and every two months thereafter. The Essex Preachers Association, and its successor, "The Central New Jersey Ministerial Association of the Newark Conference," organized in 1872, attracted wide attention and interest. Visiting clergymen of other conferences are noted in the records; also noted were ministers of other denominations.

Shortly after the Newark Conference was organized in 1857 the name of the Essex Preachers Association was changed briefly to the "Newark Conference Preachers Association." However, in December 1858, the former name was again adopted.

The 75th and last session of the Essex Preachers Association was held at Jersey City in 1867, and soon thereafter some of the members of the Essex Association organized its successor, the Central New Jersey Ministerial Association of the Newark Conference, intended to serve the ministers of the western part of the Conference, but ultimately embracing the entire Conference area. Among prominent members of the Essex Preachers Association and/or the Central New Jersey Association were JOHN MCCLINTOCK, J. B. WAKELEY, JOHN ATKINSON, HENRY BOEHM, SAMUEL YORKE MONROE, JOHN H. VINCENT, Aaron E. Ballard, E. H. STOKES, ISAAC W. WILEY, JAMES N. FITZGERALD, HENRY A. BUTTZ, ROBERT L. DASHIEL, JOHN F. HURST, and HENRY SPELLMEYER. These and other well-known churchmen used the medium of the Essex Preachers Association and the Central New Jersey Ministerial Association for the exposition and initiation of proposals to the General Conferences or successive sessions of the Newark Annual Conference on many vital subjects of interest to the Church, including lay representation, licensing of women in the ministry, church extension, need for a theological seminary, division of New Jersey into two Conferences, election of a Negro bishop, promotion of improved Sunday school literature and organization, church architecture, removal of time limitation on pastorates, adequate aid for superannuated preachers, etc. Many of these were adopted while these organizations in which the proposals were advanced, were functioning. Papers on the history of Methodism in various charges were presented throughout the nearly forty-year history of the Preachers Associations, fifteen of which are reported as being given, although others were assigned. Several of the historical papers are extant. This was the first effort at historical preservation. Through the efforts of the Essex Preachers Association, the Newark and New Jersey Conference Historical Societies originated. The Central Ministerial Association terminated in 1885.

Minutes of the Central New Jersey Ministerial Association of the Newark Conference, 1872-1885, 2 vols.

Minutes of the Essex Preachers Association, 1848-1867, 2 vols.

Minutes of the Newark Annual Conference.

VERNON B. HAMPTON

ESTES, LUDWELL HUNTER (1879-1965), American minister and General Conference secretary, was born on Dec. 27, 1879, in Memphis, Tenn. He was the son of Ludwell Hunter and Esther Taylor (Daman) Estes. He married Sarah Lee Powell June 11, 1907. Their daughter was Mrs. Virginia E. Busby, who will be remembered as assisting her father in his secretarial duties at several sessions of the GENERAL CONFERENCE.

Lud Estes, as he was always called, was educated at McTyre Institute at McKenzie, Tenn., and joined the MEMPHIS CONFERENCE at an early age. He became assistant secretary of the MEMPHIS ANNUAL CONFERENCE in 1907, serving in that capacity until 1913, when he was made secretary, and continued as such for his own Conference until 1942. At the General Conference of the M. E. Church, South, in 1922, he was made secretary of that important body and served it for the succeeding quadrenniums of its existence, 1922, '24, '26, '30, '34, '38, and was elected secretary of the UNITING CONFERENCE in 1939. He was elected secretary of the General Conference of The Methodist Church in 1940 and 1944; he became the secretary of the Southeastern JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCE in 1940 and 1944. Lud Estes was proverbially and traditionally the Conference secretary, and he became widely known over the whole Connection for his able and excellent administration in that powerful and helpful office.

Estes also served as district superintendent of the Dyersburg district (Memphis Conference), and was a member of the BOARD OF EDUCATION of the M. E. Church, South, 1930-38, and of the same Board in The Methodist Church from 1940 to 1944.

Lud Estes, by his rare genius, awareness, and passion for carrying on secretarial work, could be depended upon to "float" matters at each General Conference in line with the wishes of that body, and was an almost indispensable help to its presiding officers. He became known over the Connection by his characteristic signing of his name as "your buddy" Lud. He was renominated for secretary of the General Conference of 1944 by FRED D. STONE of the ROCK RIVER CONFERENCE, who called him "Your buddy and my buddy." He worked tirelessly at the various secretarial positions which he held, writing innumerable letters, planning ahead for upcoming conferences, and working after conferences were held to get out their Minutes and Journals in due time. The Methodist Church has had no more loyal or painstaking general officer than Lud Estes.

Clark and Stafford, Who's Who in American Methodism. 1952.
C. T. Howell, Prominent Personalities. 1945. N. B. H.

ESTONIA. (See BALTIC STATES.)

ETHERIDGE, JOHN WESLEY (1804-1866), Wesleyan minister, was born near Newport, Isle of Wight, Feb. 24, 1804, the son of a Wesleyan LOCAL PREACHER. He himself began to preach in 1826, and the following year was sent to HULL to help JOSEPH BEAUMONT, whose health had temporarily broken down. He was received into FULL CONNEXION in 1831, and shortly afterwards married Eliza Middleton, who died nine years later, leaving him with the care of an ailing daughter. After two years in Brighton, in 1833, Etheridge was stationed in CORNWALL, spending two years in the Truro Circuit, followed by two in the Falmouth Circuit, from which in 1837 he was moved to Wednesbury, in the "Black Country." Ill health then compelled him to become a SUPERNUMERARY, technically residing in Axminster, but in fact moving to different areas in the southwest in search of improved health for himself and his family. In 1843 he went to France, where for two years he lived in Paris (unofficially helping WILLIAM TOASE in the mission there), and then in Boulogne, where he became pastor of the English Methodist Church. Much restored in health, in 1846 he returned to the full English work, spending three years in LONDON (Islington), two in BRISTOL, two in LEEDS (Oxford Place), and in 1853 returning to his beloved Cornwall, where he spent the remainder of his ministry in the circuits of Penzance, Truro, Falmouth, St. Austell and Camborne. he died at Camborne, May 24, 1866.

From his youth Etheridge had been a diligent student as well as a devout Christian, and during his many years of ill health found comfort in his books. He became an acknowledged expert in Semitic studies, and five of the ten works listed under his name in the British Museum catalogue are in this field. For his scholarly writings in 1847 the University of Heidelberg awarded him the degree of Ph.D. The works best known to the general Methodist public, however, were two competent biographies of Methodist leaders, which are still of value: The Life of the Rev. Adam Clarke (1858), and The Life of the Rev. Thomas Coke (1860). At the time of his death he was engaged on a life of JOHN FLETCHER.

Thornley Smith, Memoirs of the Rev. John Wesley Etheridge. London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1871. FRANK BAKER

ETHICAL TRADITIONS, American Methodism. Methodism first appeared in Colonial America in the 1760s. The early American Methodists were immigrants from Northern Ireland and England; in the main they were artisans and tradesmen of the lower social and economic strata. However, by 1800, a proportionate number of Methodists belonged to the middle classes. From the start, Methodist congregations were socially and economically diversified, as well as racially mixed.

Methodism in the Eighteenth Century. The first major social issue to be faced by members of the Methodist societies was the American Revolution. In his Calm Address to the American Colonies (1775), JOHN WESLEY condemned the effort of the colonists to gain independence by forcible means. Wesley's stand placed the American Methodists in a serious dilemma: they had to choose between loyalty to Wesley and solidarity with their fellow colonists. Since most Americans strongly supported the Revolution, six of the eight English missionaries sent over by Wesley returned to England in order to avoid mob violence, while one went to the Presbyterian Church, and FRANCIS ASBURY alone continued to work here as a Methodist preacher. As the war progressed, Methodists increasingly supported it. Many were drafted and served in the colonial army, although some, including JESSE LEE and FREEBORN GARRETTSON, were conscientious objectors. Francis Asbury refused to bear arms on the ground that he was a Christian minister. At the end of the war, American Methodists generally accepted its outcome as an expression of the divine will, and they pledged their loyalty to the new Nation.

Another major social issue which began to divide Methodists during this period was slavery. After condemning it as "contrary to the laws of God, man, and nature, and hurtful to society," the conference of 1780 advised laymen to free their slaves and required traveling preachers to promise to do the same. When the Methodist societies in America were organized as an independent church at the CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE in 1784, all members of that body were required to draw up, within a year, an instrument emancipating their slaves at specified ages; those who failed to comply were to be excluded from the church; and no slaveholder was to be admitted thereafter to membership. The only exception to the application of this rule was the existence of laws in some states prohibiting emancipation.

In the years between the Revolution and the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, Methodists gradually shifted from their traditional advocacy of an established church—a position they shared with the Anglicans—to the support of religious liberty and the separation of the church and state.

In general, the social attitudes of the early American Methodists reflected the disciplinary provisions of John Wesley (THE GENERAL RULES) which had been brought to the colonies from England. These attitudes found expression, for example, in prohibitions against superfluity in dress and ornaments, in the requirement that men and women sit apart at meetings, in the injunction against "brother going to law against brother," in the prohibition against marrying an unawakened person, and in the proclamation of a fast day to awaken Methodists to their worldliness. Such regulations are striking evidence of the sectarian character of Methodism in eighteenth century America.

Methodism in the New Nation. While Wesley's General Rules did not appear in the Discipline of the new church until 1789, yet from the beginning it was expected that members of the societies would conform to them under pain of expulsion. The societies were divided into classes, and throughout much of the nineteenth century the class served as one of the major disciplinary bodies in the church, so far as laymen were concerned. While the class meeting did not function as a court, it did exert strong moral pressure upon its members, admonishing offenders and, if necessary, reporting them to the society for reproof and possible trial and sometimes expulsion from the society. Preachers who were charged with moral laxity were examined and on occasion tried by their peers; that is, other preachers.

The General Rules, which Wesley laid down, were three in number: do no harm; do good of every kind and, as far as possible, to all men; and attend upon all the ordinances of the Church. The rest of the Rules were specifications of what these more general requirements included. Among the more specific injunctions were those against profanity, usury, uncharitable conversation, the wearing of costly apparel, and the reading of books which do not contribute to the knowledge or love of God. Of particular interest, from the standpoint of the history of Methodism, was the rule against "drunkenness, buying or selling spirituous liquors, or drinking them (unless in cases of extreme necessity)." Even before the inclusion of this rule in the Discipline of 1789, the conferences adopted a number of regulations prohibiting the distillation, sale, and use of spirituous liquors. Following the incorporation of the General Rules in the Discipline, succeeding conferences modified and applied this particular regulation in a variety of ways; but, in general, from the 1780s onward, the ban upon alcoholic beverages was considered advisory in its application to the lay membership, but mandatory in relation to the clergy.

While the initial leadership of the temperance societies came largely from the Congregationalists, Presbyterians, and Unitarians in the early part of the nineteenth century, interest in temperance began to permeate the Methodist churches in the 1830s. The issue was widely debated; the harmful effects of alcohol on the human body and on society were cited; temperance societies were formed; signatures to total abstinence pledges were collected; and efforts through law were made to control the distribution of alcoholic beverages. Moreover, by the mid-1840s prohibition was being advocated as a goal of the temperance movement.

Slavery continued to be a matter of controversy among Methodists during the entire first part of the nineteenth century. Although the Christmas Conference of 1784 adopted legislation looking toward the abolition of slaveholding among its members, the attempt to enforce such requirements was abandoned within six months. Obviously there was no simple solution to the problem; in taking its stand against the ownership of slaves by church members, the Christmas Conference itself had exempted members living in states which prohibited emancipation. Moreover, though slavery was widely condemned in the post-Revolutionary Period, toward the end of the century, the invention of the cotton gin and the expanding European market for raw cotton, caused a shift of attitudes in the industrial North and in the agricultural South toward slavery. At first slavery was defended on socio-economic grounds as a necessary evil; then, beginning in the 1830's, it was increasingly sanctioned on religious grounds. Four main arguments were adduced in support of slavery, viz., that it is compatible with Scripture; that it is the best state for Negroes; that the lot of the slave is better than that of the free white laborers; and that slavery is the best guarantee of true republican government.

On the other hand, antislavery sentiment continued to grow and it gradually came to be embodied in the abolition movement and antislavery societies. Although the abolition movement arose outside of the denominational organizations and the political power structures, it drew much of its support and momentum from revivalism during the period from 1830 to the Civil War. Throughout the early part of the century, denominational leaders and agencies sought to by-pass the issue of slavery, their primary concerns being growth and unity of the churches. Because of its geographic spread and its connectional system, however, Methodism was unable to avoid confrontation with the issue of slavery.

Throughout this period, the M. E. Church continued its opposition to slavery in principle, but actions of the GENERAL CONFERENCE aimed primarily at the abolition of slavery among the membership were generally ineffective; however, traveling preachers were required to free their slaves where state laws permitted.

The General Rules of 1808 forbade "the buying and selling of men, women, and children, with an intention to enslave them." This rule—a restatement by the General Conference of an earlier one adopted in 1789—remained in force until after the division of the M. E. Church in 1844. Its effectiveness was undercut, however, because the 1808 General Conference gave the annual conferences authority to adopt their own regulations governing the application of the rule. The principle of localism—recognized to some extent in 1804 and extended in 1808—led to great diversity, but this rule remained in force until 1820, when it was rescinded without being replaced by any other provision.

Despite the difficulties involved in administering the rule against traveling ministers holding slaves, the General Conference was reluctant to give up its control in this regard. Although the 1804 General Conference recognized the limited authority of the annual conferences in enforcing the rule, the 1816 General Conference reaffirmed the earlier position of the church and reasserted General Conference control over the matter. The following "compromise law," adopted by the 1816 General Conference, was later quoted in the defense of Bishop JAMES O. ANDREW in 1844:

No slaveholder shall be eligible to any official station in our Church hereafter where the laws of the state in which he lives will admit of emancipation, and permit the liberated slave to enjoy freedom.

In the years that followed, slavery came increasingly to be accepted and antislavery sentiment in the church became muted. The 1832 General Conference took no action on the question of slavery, and the issue seemed to be dead. However, under the impact of the abolition movement and the antislavery societies in the North, the question was revived in 1836. The antislavery forces within the church rapidly gained ground, and by 1844 they were dominant in the General Conference.

The specific issue which brought the slavery question to a head in 1844 was the propriety of Bishop Andrew continuing to exercise his episcopal office so long as he continued to hold two slaves whom he had acquired by legacy upon the death of his wife, and whom he could not legally emancipate under the laws of GEORGIA. Bishop Andrew offered to resign his office in order to keep peace and unity in the church, but the Southern delegates would not let him. After long debate, the General Conference voted that he should desist from the exercise of his office "so long as this impediment remains." As a result, the

Southern delegates withdrew and formed the M. E. Church, South. (See PLAN OF SEPARATION.)

A split over the issue of slavery also occurred in the METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH in the late 1850s. For a number of reasons, however, the resulting cleavage did not run nearly so deep as in the case of the Northern and Southern members of the M. E. Church. The actual division into Northern and Southern branches—the Methodist Church and the Methodist Protestant Church—did not take place until 1866, and the two bodies reunited as the Methodist Protestant Church in 1877.

From the Civil War to the Social Creed. In the period from the 1830s to the Civil War, the debate over slavery had gone on in the churches ostensibly on moral and religious grounds, even though there had been basic underlying economic forces and sectional rivalries involved in the controversy. With the outbreak of the Civil War, however, political considerations became more prominent. In the Church North the conflict was regarded as a holy war, aimed at the preservation of the union and for the freedom of mankind; in the Church South, "states' rights" became a sacred cause. Ministers on both sides assisted in recruitment, and in the churches in each section, the cause of religion was generally identified with the cause of patriotism.

Beginning in 1862, the M. E. Church started to make inroads into the South. The motives for the expansion of the church southward during the Civil War and the period of Reconstruction were mixed and included the following: accompanying and supporting the Union Army; the evangelization and education of the Negroes; the desire to help the poor whites of the South, as well as the Negroes; and denominational expansion. After the war, the Church North provided aid to emancipated slaves through the FREEDMEN'S AID SOCIETY.

The Freedmen's Aid Society, organized in 1866, became an official agency of the M. E. Church in 1872. The Society was engaged primarily in educational work; and before the end of the century it had established large numbers of educational institutions including ten colleges and universities, a theological school, a medical school, and many grammar schools and academies. Although the policy of the Society was to make the schools racially inclusive, by 1895 its institutions began to be differentiated as being "for whites," or "for Negroes."

During the 1870's and 1880's two main questions concerning the status of Negro members in the Northern Church were debated. The first concerned the establishment of separate annual conferences for Negro members. In 1876 the General Conference of the M. E. Church authorized the division of annual conferences along racial lines when a majority of the members of both races requested it. Subsequently, almost all of the Southern annual conferences of the Church North were so divided. The second question concerned the election of Negro bishops. This issue was debated for more than a decade. The General Conference of 1872 affirmed the principle of equality, but no Negro bishop was elected.

The M. E. Church, South, meanwhile, resented the attempt of the Church North to expand into the South. Moreover, it accommodated itself much more readily and completely to the prevailing inequality of the Negro in Southern society after the war. It did not, for example, protest against the disfranchisement of the Negro, the prevailing social segregation, or segregation in public places and conveyances which became complete in the early twentieth century. Although it sanctioned the inferior status of the Negro, the Southern church did speak out against the extra-legal injustice of lynching and for the right of the Negro to a fair trial by jury. In addition, concerned leaders of the Southern body appealed to employers to aid Negro freedmen in finding employment, and not to oppress them because of their color and their lack of skills and education.

Under the system of slavery, Negroes and their masters had attended the same churches, but the former had generally been seated in galleries. Following the war, the great majority of the Negro members of the church South withdrew and joined the independent African Methodist Episcopal churches, the Baptists, and the M. E. Church in order to escape the domination of their former masters. In 1870, most of the remaining Negro members of the Southern Church, with the mutual consent of both races, organized the Colored Methodist Episcopal Church (now the CHRISTIAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH). In 1882, the M. E. Church, South, acting upon a petition from the C. M. E. Church, assisted in the establishment of Paine Institute—now PAINE COLLEGE at Augusta, Georgia—for the education, not only of future ministers, but of Negro young people generally.

In addition to slavery and race, Methodists were involved in many other social issues during the latter half of the nineteenth century. Some of these problems represented areas of concern which continued from the earlier period. Typical of such questions were those dealing with legitimate forms of amusement, sabbath observance, prostitution, divorce, education, and intoxicating beverages. Besides these, a whole range of new issues began to emerge toward the end of the century, reflecting basic changes which were taking place in American society. The passing of the frontier, expanding urbanization, industrialization, and immigration gave rise to such problems as increasing poverty and overcrowding in blighted areas of the cities, the exploitation of labor, conflicts between capital and labor, the alienation of the workers from the churches, and nativism.

In so far as the question of amusements was concerned, Methodism continued to oppose dancing, theatre-going, novel-reading, and card-playing. When professional sports came into vogue, they were also opposed as contributing to worldliness. With the increasing influx of immigrants from Europe, encroachments were made upon the Puritan tradition of observing the Christian sabbath. In order to meet the threat, the Methodists, like other denominations with an English background, adopted long lists of things which should not be done on Sunday, including excursions, bicycle riding for pleasure, buggy riding, letter writing, baseball, football, reading secular papers, and social visiting.

In the area of family relations, both prostitution and divorce were denounced, although divorce on the ground of adultery was generally recognized as permitted by the Scriptures. Near the end of the century, there was protest against the practice of polygamy among the Mormons. During this period, Methodists continued their strong support of education for the laity, which they had begun prior to the Civil War; and they greatly increased their provisions for ministerial education, including seminary training.

Also, during the second half of the century, Methodists intensified their struggle against the sale and use of intoxicating beverages. Indeed, this issue became the primary social concern of all branches of Methodism in the post-Reconstruction era. Increasingly, legal prohibition was regarded as the only viable solution to the problem, and Methodists were active in their support of such groups as the Women's Christian Temperance Union, the Prohibition party, and the Anti-Saloon League. Concentration upon the single issue of alcoholic beverages during this period, it must be noted, caused the Methodist denominations to neglect, and sometimes to lose sight of, other great social evils of the time.

The Spanish-American War came in 1898. While hostilities were mounting, there was some opposition to the United States engaging in armed conflict with Spain, but, once war was declared it was supported by the churches generally, including the Methodists. There was occasional recognition of the evils of war but no vocal conscientious objection to participation in the conflict.

The Social Creed. In the closing years of the century, the M. E. Church began to reflect a growing concern with the mounting problems of industrialization, economic injustice, immigration, and world peace. This concern came to climactic expression with the adoption of a statement on "The Church and Social Problems," later called the Social Creed, by the 1908 M. E. General Conference. Approval was also given at that time to the METHODIST FEDERATION FOR SOCIAL SERVICE, a voluntary, unofficial organization for the promotion of social thought and action in the church. The pronouncement of the M. E. Church on the Church and Social Problems was destined to have a far-reaching influence upon Protestant social thought in America. In December, 1908, the newly organized FEDERAL (now National) COUNCIL OF CHURCHES adopted a social creed modeled after the Methodist statement. In 1914 the M. E. Church, South, adopted the same Social Creed as the Church North, and in 1916 the M. P. Church endorsed it. In 1939 the Uniting Conference of the three branches of Methodism adopted the Social Creed in a revised form.

While the original formulation of the Social Creed has been modified to reflect changing cultural conditions and new ethical insights, the 1908 pronouncement marks a milestone in the development of the social consciousness of Methodism and, indeed, of Protestantism in the United States.

The Twentieth Century. The adoption of the Social Creed and the approval of the Methodist Federation for Social Service signaled the broadening of the social consciousness of Methodism to include the church's responsibility in relation to the deeper social issues of the day, as well as the more traditional and pietistic ones. Nevertheless, the significance of these steps should not be exaggerated and their limitations should be noted. In its earliest form, the Social Creed dealt almost exclusively with economic issues, thereby neglecting such other problems as politics, civil rights, and international peace, although the EPISCOPAL ADDRESS of 1908 included sections on international peace and immigration.

From the time the Social Creed was adopted, there has been wide disagreement among Methodists concerning the goals and principles of social justice as stated in succeeding versions of the document. Moreover, the power of the Social Creed lies in the force of its moral appeal to conscience rather than in the mandatory authority of church law. Similarly, the unofficial Federation for Social Service continued for a time in The Methodist Church. It was not until 1952 that a Board of Social and Economic Relations (later BOARD OF CHRISTIAN SOCIAL CONCERNS) was established to provide official leadership in the socio-economic field; and it was not until 1960 that the General Conference made a Commission of Christian Social Concerns mandatory in every local church, along with the other commissions on membership, missions, evangelism, and finance.

Peace and World Order. During the period prior to the First World War, numerous peace societies were formed, and Methodists joined in the denunciation of war and the advocacy of arbitration for the settlement of international disputes. When hostilities began in Europe in 1914, the church supported President Wilson's policy of neutrality; but, once the United States entered the war, the Methodist churches quickly endorsed it as a holy war to defend both the nation and the Christian faith. As churches they supported patriotic rallies and assisted the war effort in a variety of ways. Conscientious objection was considered as suspect as treason, and pacifists were generally silenced, deprived of their jobs, or imprisoned.

World War I was followed by a general reaction against the evils and futility of war. Methodist churches denounced war as the supreme enemy of mankind and warned of its potential for the destruction of civilization. During that period the movement for world peace gained momentum both in and out of the churches. By the early nineteen thirties, pacifist sentiment was widespread among Methodists, especially among the clergy, and the right of conscientious objection began to be defended. Thus, in 1932 the M. E. Church affirmed the right of conscientious objection to war on Christian grounds, and assured Church support to persons taking such a stand. The same position was adopted by the Church South in 1934. The General Conference of 1940 (after World War II had begun in Europe), following the lead of the Oxford Conference of 1937, asserted the sinfulness of all war and declared its refusal officially to "endorse, support, or participate in war"; however, it pledged the full support of the church both to individual conscientious objectors to war and to those who conscientiously served in the armed forces. When the United States entered the conflict, sentiment in the church shifted to the acceptance of the war as a necessity. In contrast to the crusading spirit manifested in World War I, however, there was a tendency to accept World War II as a tragic evil or, at best, as a just war. Reflecting the changing sentiment in the nation and in the church, the General Conference of 1944, after an epochal debate, affirmed the church's support of the war, but it also continued to support the right of conscientious objection. A total of 941 Methodists served in Civilian Public Service Camps as conscientious objectors during the war.

In 1943-44, while the war was still in progress, The Methodist Church began trying to lay the foundations of peace through a church-wide program of education, worship, and action known as the Crusade for a New World Order. Initiated by Bishop G. BROMLEY OXNAM, the purpose of the program was to mobilize the total resources of the church for peace and world order. Due in part to the Crusade and the continuing work of the Commission on World Peace, each General Conference since 1948 has called for support of the United Nations. Typical of Methodist attitudes and action in this general area since the war are the following: opposition to compulsory military training in peacetime; repeated calls for the support and strengthening of the United Nations and for the reduction and control of armaments; support of international relief and programs of foreign aid and mutual assistance; support of the first nuclear test-ban treaty; and the construction of the new Church Center for the United Nations near the United Nations building in New York.

Temperance and Prohibition. In so far as social issues were concerned, Methodists—north and south—continued to be preoccupied during the first part of the twentieth century with the traditional issue of alcoholic beverages. In 1912, the Church North established the Board of Temperance which worked closely with the Anti-Saloon League in an anti-liquor crusade aimed ultimately at national legal prohibition. In order to secure their desired legislative goals at every political level, the Methodist churches were drawn into political action, a field which they had traditionally shunned and which they continued to avoid where industrial and racial issues were involved. After the enactment of the Eighteenth Amendment to the Constitution, providing for legal prohibition, the churches called for the strict enforcement of the law, and Prohibition tended to become the criterion of social responsibility. Following the repeal of the amendment, the Methodist churches continued their emphasis on total abstinence for the individual and their support of legal prohibition. In recent years the approach of the church to issues in the field of temperance has broadened to include research on alcohol-related problems and the development of what some hold to be a more realistic strategy for dealing with them, such as education, rehabilitation of alcoholics, and the use of various kinds of legal controls. Also, the Methodist Churches have expanded their concern to include such areas of general social welfare as mental health, juvenile delinquency, planned parenthood, population control, medical care, problems of the aging, and the rehabilitation of criminals.

Economic Issues. In 1912, the M. E. Church General Conference called for an eight-hour day, a six-day week, workmen's compensation, and the enactment and enforcement of proper building codes. Both the Northern and the Southern bodies protested against child labor and defended the rights of workers to organize and to bargain collectively. As opposition to unions increased following the First World War, the churches tended to reflect the interests of capital as over against labor, both in the manufacturing centers of the North, and in the textile mill towns and soft-coal fields of the Southeast. As a result, organized labor became largely alienated from the churches.

With the outbreak of the Great Depression there was a growth of sympathy for the victims of economic poverty, economic exploitation, and unemployment together with widespread criticism of the prevailing form of capitalism which had given rise to these evils. Many Methodist leaders began to call for social reform and in general espoused the principles of President F. D. Roosevelt's New Deal. The Methodist Federation for Social Service was influential during this period; in addition, many Methodists participated actively in such nondenominational organizations as the Religion and Labor Foundation, the Fellowship of Reconciliation, and the League for Industrial Democracy.

Because of its liberal social and economic views, the unofficial Methodist Federation for Social Service came under attack during the nineteen thirties. Following the Second World War, the Federation was accused of communism and communist front activities; in addition, a number of important changes were taking place within the Federation itself, including the retirement in 1944 of its two most prominent leaders, Bishop FRANCIS J. MCCONNELL and HARRY F. WARD. The new executive secretary, Jack McMichael, soon became a controversial figure; a number of resignations ensued; and in 1948 the Federation came under attack by the Un-American Activities Committee of the United States Congress. The entire issue surrounding the Federation was brought to a head at the 1952 General Conference. The conference requested the Federation to remove the word "Methodist" from its name and to move its offices from the Methodist Building in New York. Only the latter of these requests was heeded, but the influence of the Federation subsequently declined. More significantly, the same General Conference authorized the establishment of an official Board of Social and Economic Relations, thus reaffirming the church's continued interest in social action. While Methodist opinion was divided during this period concerning the right-to-work laws which were being proposed in many states, the Board of Social and Economic Relations spoke out against them as a threat to freedom, declaring that the question of "union membership as a basis of continued employment should be left to agreement by management and labor through the process of collective bargaining" rather than being determined by the state. In 1960 this board was merged with the Board of World Peace and the Board of Temperance to form the General Board of Christian Social Concerns. That board's Division of Human Relations and Economic Affairs has been given new status in the church. The division has expanded its work and influence in the economic field as well as in a number of other areas including race relations, civil liberties, public education, and church and state relations.

Civil Liberties. The issue of civil liberties has been vital in the present century. World War I was followed by the "Red" scare and a widespread tendency to label all liberals as "subversive" and "un-American." One Methodist bishop joined with other leaders in protesting the refusal of the New York legislature to seat five duly elected socialists. When the Young Women's Christian Association was attacked for adopting the Social Creed, a number of Methodist journals came to its defense. The decade following the First World War was also accompanied by a revival of the Ku Klux Klan, a wave of anti-semitism, and efforts to curb radical thought through legislation. In response to these threats to civil liberties, Methodist leaders such as FRANK MASON NORTH, George Albert Coe, RALPH W. SOCKMAN, F. ERNEST JOINSON, WORTH M. TIPPY, and Harry F. Ward pleaded for free speech, fair trials, due process of law, and open-mindedness.

The Second World War was also followed by a period of anti-communist hysteria, led by the late Senator Joseph McCarthy. Charges of subversion and communist conspiracy were leveled against the churches, educational institutions, and civil liberties groups. Through its policy of collecting and releasing unverified charges of communist-front affiliations and activities, the Congressional Committee on Un-American Activities gave credence to the charges. Through their appeals to fear and the use of innuendoes, half-truths, and lies, the anti-communist extremist groups "smeared" many innocent and loyal citizens and prevented them from giving their best service to the government and to society in general. The atmosphere of suspicion and fear which these groups created also jeopardized the freedom of the churches and the universities. In response to this threat to freedom, the General Conference of The Methodist Church, the COUNCIL OF BISHOPS, and many other Methodist leaders spoke out in defense of the civil liberties of all citizens. Bishop C. Bromley Oxnam's book, I Protest, is a detailed account of his own difficulties with the Committee on Un-American Activities, including his own hearing which he requested before that committee in 1953. Since that time, Methodists have continued to support the cause of civil liberties in the midst of the resurgence of extremist groups of both the right and the left.

Race. In the early part of the present century, Methodism continued its concern for the evangelization, and to some extent for the education, of the Negro; however, segregation itself remained unchallenged in the Southern church and also largely unopposed in the Northern body. Both churches accepted the philosophy of "separate but equal," although the Southern denomination advocated a more complete separation of the races. The idea of a separate jurisdiction of Negro members was advanced in the Southern Church as early as 1914, and it remained one of the provisions in the latter's plan for Methodist unification. The Southern Church generally preferred a united, independent Negro Methodist Church, including the Negro constituency in the Northern Church, the Colored Methodist Episcopal, and the two African Methodist Episcopal Churches; but the Northern Church held that Negro members should not be excluded in any reunification. Thus the groundwork was laid in the second decade of the century for the creation of the Central Jurisdiction when unification took place in 1939.

There was little change in Methodism in the area of race relations during the nineteen twenties. The leadership of the Southern Church expressed its concern over the plight and the alienation of the Negro in American society; in particular, it denounced lynching and other forms of violence and injustice against the Negro. However, the accepted goal in the area of race relations continued to be "separate but equal." While the M. E. Church had long had separate annual conferences composed of Negroes, provision was made after 1920 for the election by the General Conference of Negro bishops to oversee conferences. In 1928 the General Conference passed a resolution that subsequently it would meet only in cities where its Negro delegates could be entertained on the same basis as the white delegates.

During the nineteen thirties, Methodist leadership continued to speak out in support of greater justice for Negroes. In 1939 three separated branches of Methodism—the Methodist Episcopal, Methodist Episcopal South, and Methodist Protestant Churches—merged to form The Methodist Church. The PLAN OF UNION provided for six jurisdictions—five based on geography and one, the Central, on race (see JURISDICTIONS). Thus, the nineteen Negro annual conferences as they then existed in the M. E. Church, together with the Negro Mission Conference and other Negro missions in the United States, were placed in the Central Jurisdiction. This meant that the Negro members and churches were segregated from the jurisdictional level down, although they had full integration and adequate representation in the Council of Bishops, the General Conference, and the general boards and agencies of the denomination. The segregation of the Negro local churches was complete in the South and largely so in the North, although there were some Negro churches in the Western and Northeastern Jurisdictions which remained in the annual conferences of those jurisdictions. While the Central Jurisdiction provided such forms of protection to the Negro membership in The Methodist Church as the election of their own bishops in proportion to membership as the other jurisdictions, along with full representation on the general boards of the church, the majority of the ministers and lay delegates in the Negro annual conferences voted against the 1939 Plan of Union because it called for the jurisdictional system.

In 1944, the General Conference began "to look to the ultimate elimination of racial discrimination within The Methodist Church." Also, it urged the repeal of discriminatory immigration legislation against Orientals, and the restoration of full citizenship rights to the Japanese Americans who had been dislocated during World War II; it deplored the increase of anti-semitism; and it urged equal opportunities in employment and housing, along with full rights of citizenship for the Negro. In the years which followed, the Woman's Division of Christian Service was particularly active in its efforts to secure the passage of civil rights legislation and promote better racial understanding; and, since its formation in 1952, the Board of Social and Economic Relations (subsequently, its Division of Human Relations and Economic Affairs) has also been active in this field. In addition to making a strong statement on civil rights, the 1952 General Conference declared that "there is no place in The Methodist Church for racial discrimination or racial segregation."

Following the May 17, 1954, ruling of the U. S. Supreme Court outlawing racial segregation in the public schools, the Woman's Division of Christian Service (May, 1954) and the Council of Bishops (November, 1954) strongly endorsed the court's stand. The bishops declared that the decision was "in keeping with the attitudes of The Methodist Church." The ruling of the court served as a stimulus for the church to reexamine its own organizational structure and rid itself of any built-in segregation. In response to the mounting pressure to eliminate the Central Jurisdiction, the 1956 General Conference adopted constitutional Amendment IX, designed to make it easier for congregations and annual conferences to transfer from the Central to the geographical jurisdictions of the Church. Although this amendment became law in 1958, only twenty-seven churches changed jurisdictions within the next six years. In 1964, in order to facilitate the transfer of annual conferences out of the Central Jurisdiction, the boundary lines of those conferences were redrawn to coincide with the boundaries of the annual conferences out of the other jurisdictions. In addition, approval was given by the Central Jurisdiction to a three-step process toward inclusiveness-conference transfers, mergers to desegregate annual conferences, and interracial mergers of local churches. Within three months following the 1964 General Conference, three annual conferences transferred out of the Central Jurisdiction, and two of the five Central Jurisdiction bishops were assigned to episcopal areas in the Northeastern and North Central Jurisdictions. By mid-1965 mergers of white and Negro congregations had begun to be effected in WEST VIRGINIA, PENNSYLVANIA, IOWA, and COLORADO.

The transfer of Central Jurisdiction annual conferences encountered special difficulties in the Southeastern states where the majority of the members of that jurisdiction live. The process has been slower in the area covered by the Southeastern and South Central Jurisdictions. However, the movement for the abolition of the Central Jurisdiction on a church-wide basis gained momentum with the progress toward union of The Methodist Church and the Evangelical United Brethren Church. Since the Plan of Union for the two bodies contained no provision for perpetuating the Central Jurisdiction in the new denomination, the approval of that plan of action by the annual conferences in 1967 assured the final elimination of the Central Jurisdiction when the merger should become effective in 1968. The Plan of Union provided for the transfer of any annual conferences remaining in the Central Jurisdiction to the appropriate geographical jurisdiction in the summer of 1968, thus eliminating all racial segregation at that level.

While the Central Jurisdiction was in some ways the most obvious example of segregation in Methodism, the 1964 General Conference declared the goal of The Methodist Church to be "an inclusive church" at every level of its life. In particular, it adopted a resolution requiring candidates for the traveling ministry upon admission on trial in an annual conference be asked the following question: "Are you willing to relate yourself in ministry to all persons without regard to race, color, or national origin, including receiving them into the membership and fellowship of the Church?" Officially, the church is committed to inclusiveness in its own life and to the support of equal civil rights for members of all racial, cultural, and religious groups. However, it should be said that both the General Conference delegates and the membership of the church generally are deeply divided on these matters.

R. M. Cameron, Methodism and Society. 1961.

C. Harkness, Social Thought and Action. 1964.

W. G. Muellder, Methodism and Society. 1961.

A. D. Ward, Social Creed. 1965. E. CLINTON GARDNER

ETHICAL TRADITIONS, British Methodist. The purpose of this article is to describe briefly the British Methodist ethical tradition; i.e., not to consider the whole science of morals, but how a moral system is expressed in particular modes of conduct and generally accepted social practices. This limitation must not be forgotten.

Because Methodism began in the eighteenth century as a religious revival in opposition to both religious and moral laxity, and powerfully stressed both personal salvation and personal responsibility, its moral ethos was that of a society with high standards of behavior. Because the period of most rapid growth coincided with the Industrial Revolution, Methodism became more quickly concerned with the problems of industrialized and urbanized communities than did older denominations whose ethical judgments were largely based on the practices of pre-industrial rural communities.

It was experience, in this setting, of the personal degradation and social misery caused by alcoholic beverages that gave to Methodism one of its most distinctive and best-known ethical emphases. The church does not impose total abstinence from the use of intoxicating liquors as a condition of membership, but leaves its attitude in no doubt. The use of intoxicants on church premises is forbidden. Members are urged to keep themselves free from complicity with a traffic "the results of which are so injurious to the interests of religion, morality, and social life." (Spencer and Finch, p. 333)

Changing social patterns and a movement away from personal austerity have slightly, but only slightly, modified this attitude. By practice and precept Methodists would still generally agree that the code of obligation to our neighbor, which demands that no hindrance should be put in the way of another's welfare; and the call to personal dedication, which means that body and mind should be kept perfectly fit for the Lord's service, fully justify the refusal to compromise with the habit of drinking intoxicants. Intensive scientific analysis of the problem of road safety, and awareness of the growing problem of alcoholism, are now tending to strengthen and sustain this attitude.

Related to it in forthright negation is the attitude to gambling. Gambling of every kind is expressly forbidden on Methodist church premises or for the raising of funds for church purposes. The nineteenth-century condemnation of games of chance, exemplified in the description of a pack of cards as "the Devil's prayer-book," has been modified. Such games, if played for amusement, are permitted—provided that no gambling is attached to them.

Gambling is precisely defined as a determination of the possession of money or value by an appeal to an artificial-ly created chance, where the gains of the winners are made entirely at the expense of the losers, and gain is secured without rendering in service or value an equivalent. The grounds of condemnation are that it runs counter to the Christian motive of service, and that it involves the deliberate and considered willingness to profit at another's inevitable loss.

The "official" code is clearer and more rigid than the social practice. Gambling is so widespread, so often associated with the support of worthy causes, and so generally accepted by other denominations that a considerable number of Methodists tacitly ignore the guidance given. Nevertheless, it remains true that the general external impression that "Methodists are people who are against drink and gambling," though inadequate, is substantially correct as far as it goes.

The most notable change in Methodist ethical judgment concerns the observance of Sunday. During almost the whole of the nineteenth century, it was regarded, and practiced, as a day of worship, rest, and abstinence from every form of secular activity. The official code was less rigid than the social practice. Practice is now catching up with the code.

It is agreed that the question of Sunday observance raises two distinct but closely related subjects: the principles which should guide Christians in their own conduct, and the principles on which they may rightly endeavor to persuade the community to act.

For the Christian, Sunday is a day specially devoted to worship, rest, quiet, practical service, and fellowship, ordained by God, and kept on the first day of the week in honor of the Risen Lord. Whatever is done on Sunday, therefore, must aim at fulfilling these ends, for ourselves, our families, our friends, and the community of which we are members. We cannot lay down hard and fast rules, or say what is right for everyone and what is wrong. The Christian is not set to obey a code of laws, however high the authority which draws it up. But those things which clearly interfere with the spirit and purpose of the day ought definitely to be put into the category of dangerous indulgences.

For society in general, cessation of toil on one day in seven is indispensable for physical health and mental well-being. Legislation should be based on the positive principle that the character of Sunday as a day of rest and recreation and worship shall be preserved. Legislative change should not bring financial profit to interested individuals or groups, or compel others to labor on Sunday. The general public should be protected from undertakings that involve unreasonable noise and disturbance.

So stated, this is not particularly distinctive. It is, in fact, the generally accepted Christian position. The distinction, if any, is that it probably conforms very closely to general Methodist practice.

So, too, there is nothing peculiarly distinctive in the code and practice concerning marriage. The Methodist Church affirms as the norm and standard of Christian marriage the lifelong and exclusive union of one man and one woman. This attitude has been rigorously reexamined because of the acute problems that arise when missionary work advances into regions where polygamy is the accepted custom, but the result has been to confirm the insistence on monogamy. Even where one partner fails to keep the marriage vows, the church enjoins that it is a Christian obligation on the other to do all that is possible for reconciliation.

On the most profoundly important judgment on the nature of marriage, however, and one which is increasingly realized, Methodism has led the way within the churches. Any view which regards sex as inherently evil is condemned. Though surrender to its uncontrolled impulses and persistent cravings has marred and perverted human relations, sex is intended, in the purpose of God, to be a joy and a blessing to mankind. The instincts and impulses of sex are part of the divine order of nature. From them, and the associated parental and filial instincts, arise those sentiments of love, tenderness, and sympathy which inspire and direct so much of the strength of morality.

A further deduction from this biblical and theological interpretation relates to family planning. The Methodist contention, still under debate in some other communions, is that the relational and procreative functions of sex are equally rooted in the creative purpose of God, and neither is subordinated to the other. Careless and improvident begetting of children is to be deprecated as wrongful to them and injurious to the social order. Abstinence from intercourse may frustrate the relational ends of marriage. It is therefore held that conceptional control is permissible, provided that the means employed are acceptable to both husband and wife, and that, on the best evidence available, they do neither physical nor emotional harm.

Abortion as a means of family limitation is condemned on the ground that when successful, it involves the destruction of human life, and when unsuccessful, the risk of grave injury in body and mind to mother and child.

Methodism acknowledges divorce and is prepared, in carefully defined circumstances, to approve the remarriage of divorced persons. Particular emphasis is laid on the binding and lifelong character of marriage vows, and on the obligation of loyalty and faithfulness even to an unworthy partner. Divorce is not to be contemplated lightly. But there are courses of conduct which so violate the pledges and obligations of marriage that, of themselves, and in fact, they destroy it as a union of heart and soul, cause intolerable marital unhappiness, and grievously hurt the children of the marriage. Divorce should therefore be recognized as a remedy for evil, made possible only when a marriage has broken down beyond the power of restoration. In comment on legislative proposals, Methodism has urged that the primary intention of divorce law should be to encourage stable marriage.

Adultery, willful and prolonged desertion, cruelty (real, not imaginary), and incurable insanity are regarded as valid grounds for divorce.

The attitude to leisure was for many years dominated by JOHN WESLEY'S dictum, "Never be triflingly employed." Methodists would now agree that in the proper stewardship of time, which Wesley also stressed, there should be provision for rest from toil and for re-creation of body, mind, and soul. The amount of leisure time available is growing, and is likely to expand rapidly. The emphasis is positive. Amusements which are morally injurious or vulgar are condemned, but, because religion truly understood is concerned with the whole of life, fellowship in music, drama, literature, and sport is encouraged. Methodism makes extensive use of films and television. Leisure is presented as the opportunity for voluntary service in the activities of the church and the community. Passive spectator enjoyment is not frowned on, but the general impression is conveyed that too much of it is unhealthy, weakening individual incentive and producing a standardized and unreflective mass mind. It is useful relaxation, provided always that other time is given to personal self-expression and service.

There is no common Methodist judgment on smoking. Considered in some areas a social evil linked with alcoholic drinks, in others it is held to be an expensive and harmless habit. In the mid-nineteenth century there was a much wider consensus of opinion against it as a "worldly custom." It is probable that the demonstrated connection between cigarette smoking and lung cancer will strengthen the adverse judgment.

Analysis of the institutional organizations which are given responsibility within the church for ethical judgments—such as the BOARD OF CHRISTIAN SOCIAL CONCERNS of The United Methodist Church of the U.S.A., the DEPARTMENT OF CHRISTIAN CITIZENSHIP of the Methodist Church of Great Britain, or the Board of Evangelism and Social Service of the United Church of CANADA—shows that much of their thought, guidance, and activity is given to matters not dealt with in this article. The mind of the church is expressed on general and particular questions of peace, defense, and disarmament, on international relations, on industrial affairs, and on racial issues, to quote a few from many possible examples. But in all these, largely because of ecumenical discussion and cooperation, the ethical judgments are not distinctly Methodist.

There is, in fact, a recognizable Methodist ethos but not a separate Methodist ethic. There is an oscillation between the accepted practices of a strong tradition and an emphasis on the ultimate necessity of personal decision. In short, in this as in all things, Methodism feels the tension, inevitable in its development, between the subtly disparate claims of the closed society and the open church—a tension not to be deplored, for it compels continual and salutary attention to the relationship between the essentially unchanging moral commands of the gospel and the perpetually changing social structures of the world.

Spencer and Finch, Constitutional Practice. 1951. E. ROGERS

ETTINGER, ADAM (1786-1877), an American Evangelical preacher, was the son of a Reformed Church minister. It is thought that he was born Feb. 18, 1786, in York Co., Pa. He and four of his brothers came into the membership of the Evangelical Association at Dover, Pa., in 1811.

One of the most important of all the early annual conferences was convened June 11-13, 1816, in the barn of Abraham Eyer in Dry Valley, Union Co., Pa. The probationer, Adam Ettinger, was there received into the itinerancy of The Evangelical Association.

That Adam Ettinger was esteemed by his peers is indicated by his election to the GENERAL CONFERENCE in October of 1816. The record in this year indicates that he was appointed to serve in York, Pa.

In 1816, a denominational consciousness was developed and there was recognition of the need for a publishing house. Adam Ettinger was one of the ministers appointed to meet annually for consultation in order to secure proper management of the newly established publishing house and to make a correct annual statement of all the publishing interests. In 1834, he was elected the first editor of Der Christliche Botschafter, the denominational paper.

Adam Ettinger left no written accounts of his life and work. He died Oct. 31, 1877.

R. W. Albright, Evangelical Church. 1942.

S. Miller and H. Niebel, Discipline of Evangelical Association (German), New Berlin, Pa., 1817.

R. Yeakel, Evangelical Association. 1894.

ALFRED JOHN THOMAS

EUCHARISTIC DOCTRINE AND DEVOTION. There is, properly speaking, no distinctive Wesley eucharistic doctrine. The Wesleys simply represent the best and most considered mind of the Church of England. The standard of the Church of England is Scripture, as interpreted for this purpose by the Liturgy of the Book of Common Prayer, and by Articles xxv, xxvi, xxviii, xxix, xxx, and xxxi of the Thirty-Nine Articles. (See Articles of Religion.)

Thus in the Prayer of Humble Access the priest prays: "Grant us therefore, gracious Lord, so to eat the flesh of thy dear Son Jesus Christ, and to drink his blood, that our sinful bodies may be made clean by his body, and our souls washed through his most precious blood." The first part of the Words of Administration run: "The Body of our Lord Jesus Christ, which was given for thee, preserve thy body and soul unto everlasting life," etc., which the Thanksgiving after communication states: "Thou dost vouchsafe to feed us, who have duly received these holy mysteries, with the spiritual food of the most precious Body and Blood of thy Son our Saviour Jesus Christ." All this, taken together, indicates that the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper is an operative symbol, and in the fullest sense of the word, a means of grace. To eat of that bread, and to drink of that cup, is the essential climax of a sacramental action whereby the Church receives a veritable share of that which was accomplished by the sacrifice of Christ upon the Cross. This is the thought of I Corinthians 10:16. However, the other part of the Words of Administration runs: "Take and eat this in remembrance that Christ died for thee, and feed on him in thy heart by faith with thanksgiving." If the Greek anamnesis "remembrance" is given its full Biblical content, this phrase does not differ so much in essential intention from the above. Nevertheless, it can be interpreted, and has often been interpreted, in the so-called "Zwinglian" sense: i.e., that the Lord's Supper is simply a presentation to the mind and the imagination of the truths of Calvary by the medium of a solemn, dramatic action, as an alternative to a sermon. Thus the English Churchman is not bound by his standards to any one particular theological theory in exposition of the manner in which the Holy Spirit operates in the sacrament.

The interpretative companion to the Articles in effect espouses the classic Calvinist theology. The Lord's Supper is a real and operative means of grace, whereby the believer sacramentally receives the body and blood of the Lord. Yet any supposition that there is some intangible quality inhering in the actual consecrated bread and wine as such, apart from the sacramental action of the present and worshipping Church, is carefully excluded. Thus, in the case of an English Churchman such as Wesley, the germane question is not, "What precise theological doctrine of the sacrament does he hold?" but rather, "Where does he stand within this comprehension and latitude? With what devotional ethos does he invest the sacrament? What tradition of expressive metaphor comes naturally to his use as he contemplates the Holy Communion?"

So far as formal doctrine is concerned, the Wesleys remain always strictly within the standards of their Church. Thus despite the fervor of their sacramental devotion, and the richness of their "catholic" type of expressive metaphor, there is no trace of sympathy with any transubstantiatory or consubstantiatory type of doctrine (Roman Catechism and Reply, QQ. 62-5, 68, 72; Popey Calmly Considered, iv, 5, 6; Wesley's Works, vol. x). Nevertheless, the Wesley brothers firmly stand at the "catholic" end of the doctrinal spectrum, permitted by the standards of their Church. If in the preaching of the Gospel John Wesley allows so large a scope for the initiative of divine grace that he is "within a hair's-breadth of Calvinism," in his sacramental devotion he is within a hair's-breadth of Roman Catholicism, apart from the doctrine of transubstantiation, and the ritual customs directly connected with this doctrine. In fact, he is a faithful follower of the ancient Catholic Church, if allowance be made for the fact that he uses the diction of the eighteenth century.

Of the doctrinal standards, the Notes on the New Testament say little in detail concerning the Lord's Supper (see Notes on Matthew 26:28, Mark 14:24, Luke 22:19, 20, I Corinthians 10:16, 11:25, 26). In the Standard Sermons there is but one significant passage, that the sacrament is a commemorative sacrifice and an operative symbol, and an institution of perpetual obligation to the Christian disciple, whether or no he has arrived at the full evangelical experience (Sermon xii, The Means of Grace, iii, 11, 12). "Ye do show forth the Lord's death . . . : ye openly exhibit the same, by these visible signs, before God, and angels, and men; ye manifest your solemn remembrance of His death. . . . Is not the eating of that bread and the drinking of that cup, the outward, visible means whereby God conveys into our souls all that spiritual grace . . . which were purchased by the body of Christ once broken, and the blood of Christ once shed for us? Let all, therefore, who truly desire the grace of God, eat of that bread and drink of that cup."

The gravamen of Wesley's careful and emphatic sacramental teaching in his Journal and in the notable Sermon xvi, On the Duty of Constant Communion, is to combat the error of the quietists, who taught that the man who had not yet come to the full evangelical experience was not to communicate, as this was "salvation by works," while he who had come to the experience was not under an express dominical obligation to communicate, because he was "free." Wesley taught that every serious-minded spiritual seeker, in whatever state of grace God had advanced him, was to be a regular, careful, and expectant communicant, so that he might grow in grace according to the promise of the Lord. The salient passage is in the Journal for June 28, 1740, beginning, "I showed at large, 1. That the Lord's Supper was ordained by God, to be a means of conveying to men, either preventing, or justifying, or sanctifying grace, according to their several necessities. 2. That the persons for whom it was ordained are, all those who know and feel that they want the grace of God, either to restrain them from sin, or to show their sins forgiven, or to renew their souls in the image of God. . . ."

The background to this is the dispute which was stirred up in the early Fetter Lane Society by the quietists (Journal, Nov. 4, 7, Dec. 13, 31, 1739; Feb. 26; April 23, 25; June 22, 24, 27, 28, 29; July 16, 18, 1740; Sept. 3, 1741, particularly Wesley's letter cited 6-9; cf. Sermon xii, iv, 1, 2, v, 1).

However, the great monument to the sacramental thought of the Wesleys, and of original Methodism, is fittingly not controversial in character, but devotional. In 1745 John and Charles Wesley jointly published Hymns on the Lord's Supper, with a Preface concerning the Christian Sacrament and Sacrifice: Extracted from Dr. Brevint. This work, often called the "Eucharistic Manual" of the Wesleys, went into many editions and wide circulation in early Methodism, and is determinative for the evangelical Wesley's considered thought on this subject.

Dr. Brevint was an Anglican divine of the tradition later represented by Samuel Wesley and his sons, who suffered exile as a loyalist during the Cromwellian regime, and who returned on the restoration of the monarchy to be Dean of Lincoln in 1661. While in France he wrote his Christian Sacrament and Sacrifice for certain devout Protestant ladies of the Court, as a practical and devotional preparation for Holy Communion. Wesley in his characteristic manner abbreviated this, thus accepting responsibility for what he retained and published. And Charles Wesley versified this matter into 166 Hymns on the Lord's Supper, following the arrangement of Brevint. We may therefore summarize John Wesley's abridgment, and illustrate its main points by selections from his brother's hymns.

Concerning the Sacrament, as it is a Memorial of the Sufferings and Death of Christ. "Because the greatest things are apt to be forgotten when they are gone, therefore He was pleased at His last supper to ordain this, as a holy memorial and representation of what He was then about to suffer."

"The main intention of Christ herein was not the bare remembrance of His passion, but, over and above, to invite us to His sacrifice, not as done and gone many years since, but as to grace and mercy still lasting, still now, still the same as when it was first offered for us. The sacrifice of Christ being appointed by the Father for a propitiation that should continue to all ages; and withal, being everlasting by the privilege of its own order, which is an unchangeable priesthood, and by His worth who offered it, that is, the blessed Son of God, and by the power of the Eternal Spirit, through whom it was offered, it must in all respects stand eternal, the same yesterday, today, and forever." In this passage, packed with Scripture references, we see the doctrine of anamnesis, or remembrance. The sacrifice of Christ upon the cross is an historic saving work, sufficient for all time, to which nothing can be added. Any notion that the Eucharist can add something to the effect of Calvary is entirely excluded. Yet, the remembrance takes the effect of that which God did once for all, for the whole world, in His crucified and risen incarnate Son, and mediates it to us now, and to the end of time; as the Church in her Eucharist makes herself one with her ascended Lord, as the Great High-priest continues His saving work in heaven. Thus the Eucharist, though certainly not "a repetition of Calvary," is the Church's commemorative sacrifice.

O Thou eternal Victim, slain
A sacrifice for guilty man,
By the eternal Spirit made
An offering in the sinner's stead.
Our everlasting Priest art Thou,
And plead'st Thy death for sinners now.
Thy offering still continues new,
Thy vesture keeps its bloody hue,
Thou stand'st the ever-slaughter'd Lamb,
Thy priesthood still remains the same,
Thy years, O God, can never fail,
Thy goodness is unchangeable.

Thus, according to the Wesleys, the essence of the Church's prayer in the Eucharist is that the Holy Spirit will, according to the divine promise, actually perform this wonder, here and now, making the fact of Christ crucified and risen real to the Church in living faith.

Come, Thou everlasting Spirit,
Bring to every thankful mind
All the Saviour's dying merit,
All His sufferings for mankind;
True Recorder of His passion,
Now the living faith impart,
Now reveal His great salvation,
Preach His gospel to our heart.
Come, Thou Witness of His dying,
Come, Remembrancer Divine,
Let us feel Thy power applying
Christ to every soul, and mine.

So at the Lord's Table the Church becomes supremely aware not of agnostic, mythological so-called "death of god" in airy phantasy, but of the real, incarnational, historic death of God in the person of His Son incarnate, which is an objective saving work of grace.

Never love nor sorrow was Like that my Jesus show'd;
See Him stretch'd on yonder cross,
And crushed beneath our load!
Now discern the Deity,
Now His heavenly birth declare;
Faith cries out, 'Tis He, 'tis He,
My God, that suffers there!
Jesus drinks the bitter cup,
The wine-press treads alone,
Tears the graves and mountains up
By His expiring groan:
Lo! the powers of heaven He shakes;
Nature in convulsions lies,
Earth's profoundest centre quakes,
The great Jehovah dies!
O, my God, He dies for me,
I feel the mortal smart!
See Him hanging on the tree—

A sight that breaks my heart!
O that all to Thee might turn!
Sinners, ye may love Him too;
Look on Him ye pierced, and mourn
For One who bled for you.

Concerning the Sacrament, as it is a Sign of present Graces. "As to the present graces that attend the due use of this Sacrament, it is first a figure whereby God represents; and second, an instrument whereby He conveys them. . . . It is the ordinary way of God, when He either promises or bestows on men any considerable blessing, to confirm His word and His gift with the addition of some sign. . . . Christ hath ordained outward visible signs of His inward and spiritual grace to assure every one who believes . . . that he shall be fed with the grace of God as certainly as he feeds on the bread and wine." This is the basic sacramental doctrine of the operative symbol. The remembrance of the Last Supper, and of the sacrifice of divine obedience which proceeded from it, both calls to mind the fact of the sacrifice, and brings to the Church of today the effect of the sacrifice. Thus:

Draw near, ye blood-besprinkled race,
And take what God vouchsafes to give;
The outward sign of inward grace,
Ordain'd by Christ Himself, receive:
The sign transmits the signified,
The grace is by the means applied.

That this should be so is due to the express and wonderful operation of the Holy Spirit. Wesley is fully aware of the significance of the epiclesis, or invocation of the Holy Spirit upon the elements, which was a part of the liturgy of the ancient Church, and still is of the Eastern Church, and which appeared in the first English Prayer-book of 1549. So he can pray:

Come, Holy Ghost, Thine influence shed
And realize the sign;
Thy life infuse into the bread,
Thy power into the wine.
Effectual let the tokens prove,
And made, by heavenly art,
Fit channels to convey Thy love
To every faithful heart.

"There remains yet another life, which is an absolute redemption from death and our miseries. This, as to the right of it, is—purchased by the same Sacrifice; but as to the possession, it is reserved for us in heaven, till Christ become our full and final redemption. Now the Giver of these lives is the Preserver of them too; and to this end He sets up a table by His altar, where He engages to feed our souls with the constant supply of His mercies, as really as He feeds our bodies with this bread and wine."

Author of life Divine,
Who hast a table spread,
Furnish'd with mystic wine
And everlasting bread,
Preserve the life Thyself hast given,
And feed and train us up for heaven.

As befits one who is a poet as well as an accomplished theologian Charles Wesley in this section consistently rises above his source in the somewhat solemn Brevint. There is in him more sense both of eucharistic mystery and of joy. Typically of the prudent doctrine of the Church of England, Charles Wesley repeatedly emphasizes that while the Church rejoices in the fact of the presence of Christ in the eucharist, she does not seek to define in a neat theological theory the manner of that presence. If there is a note of controversy it is not regarding the doctrine of the sacramental Real Presence of the Lord, a subject which has lamentably divided the Church. It is a rebuke aimed at quietists and unsacramental Christians, who would deny that it is the duty of the Church to come to the Lord's Table. To Wesley the Lord's ordinance is alike the Church's perpetual obligation and her perpetual joy.

Ah, tell me no more
The spirit and power
Of Jesus our God
Is not to be found in this life-giving food!
In rapturous bliss
He bids us do this,
The joy it imparts
Hath witness'd His gracious design in our hearts.
Receiving the bread,
On Jesus we feed:
It doth not appear,
His manner of working; but Jesus is here!
O that all men would haste
To the spiritual feast,
At Jesus's word
Do this, and be fed with the love of our Lord!
Bring near the glad day
When all shall obey
Thy dying request,
And eat of Thy supper, and lean on Thy breast.

Concerning the Sacrament, as it is a Pledge of Future Glory. It is a great mistake to suppose that the eschatological element, so prominent in much modern theology, is any new thing. The eschatological theme is familiar in the Prayer-book, to Brevint, and to the Wesleys. Thus the Eucharist, which as a commemoration, an anamnesis, looks into the historic past to bring the effect of the past into the present, looks also to the future. The Church's present eucharistic possession of the presence of Christ and His grace is the sure divine promise of the fulness of possession in the Day of the Lord. "We shall have no need of these sacred figures of Christ, when we see Him face to face; or of these pledges of that glory to be revealed, when we shall actually possess it. But till this day, the holy Sacrament hath that third use, of being a pledge from the Lord that He will give us that glory."

Come, let us join with one accord
Who share the supper of the Lord,
Our Lord and Master's praise to sing;
Nourish'd on earth with living bread,
We now are at His table fed,
But wait to see our heavenly King;
To see the great Invisible
Without a sacramental veil,
With all His robes of glory on,
In rapturous joy and love and praise
Him to behold with open face,
High on His everlasting throne!

"In the purpose of God, His church and heaven go both together, that being the way that leads to this, as the holy place to the holiest, . . . Whosoever, therefore, are admitted to this dinner of the Lamb, unless they be wanting in themselves, need not doubt of being admitted to the marriage supper of Him who was dead, but now liveth for ever more."

Happy the souls to Jesus join'd,
And saved by grace alone;
Walking in all Thy ways we find
Our heaven on earth begun.

The holy to the holiest leads,
From hence our spirits rise,
And he that in Thy statutes treads
Shall meet Thee in the skies.

"He delivers into our hands, by way of instrument and conveyance, the blessed Sacrament of His body and blood: . . . Wherefore as the kingdom of Israel was once made over to David, with the oil that Samuel poured upon his head; so the body and blood of Jesus is, in full value, and heaven with all its glory, in sure title, made over to true Christians by that bread and wine which they receive in the Holy Communion."

Concerning the Sacrament, as it is a Sacrifice. And first, of the Commemorative Sacrifice. "As for the atonement of sin, it is sure the sacrifice of Christ alone was sufficient for it: and that this great sacrifice, being both of an infinite value, to satisfy the most severe justice, and of an infinite virtue, to produce all its effects at once, need never more be repeated. . . . Nevertheless, this sacrifice, which by a real oblation was not to be offered more than once, is by a devout and thankful commemoration to be offered up every day. . . . And thus do we every day offer unto God the meritorious sufferings of our Lord, as the only sure ground whereon God may give, and we obtain, the blessings we pray for. Now there is no ordinance or mystery, that is so blessed an instrument to reach this everlasting sacrifice, and to set it solemnly forth before the eyes of God, as the Holy Communion is. To men it is a sacred table, where God's minister is ordered to represent from God his Master the passion of His dear Son, as still fresh, and still powerful for their eternal salvation. And to God it is an altar, whereon men mystically present to Him the same sacrifice, as still bleeding and suing for mercy."

O God of our forefathers, hear,
And make Thy faithful mercies known;
To Thee through Jesus we draw near,
Thy suffering, well-beloved Son,
In whom Thy smiling face we see,
In whom Thou art well pleased with me.

With solemn faith we offer up,
And spread before Thy glorious eyes
That only ground of all our hope,
That precious bleeding Sacrifice,
Which brings Thy grace on sinners down,
And perfects all our souls in one.

"This is what the apostle calls, to set forth the death of the Lord: to set it forth as well before the eyes of God His Father as before the eyes of men: and what St. Austin (Augustine) explained, when he said the holy flesh of Jesus was offered in three manners; by prefiguring sacrifices under the law before His coming into the world, in real deed upon His cross, and by a commemorative Sacrament after He ascended into heaven."

"The people of Israel, in worshipping, ever turned their eyes and their hearts towards that sacrifice, the blood whereof the high priest was to carry into the sanctuary.

So let us ever turn our eyes and our hearts towards Jesus our eternal High Priest, who is gone up into the true sanctuary, and doth there continually present both His own body and blood before God, and (as Aaron did) all the true Israel of God as a memorial. In the meantime we, beneath in the Church, present to God His body and blood in a memorial, that under this shadow of His cross, and figure of His sacrifice, we may present ourselves in very deed before Him."

Victim Divine, Thy grace we claim
While thus Thy precious death we show;
Once offer'd up, a spotless Lamb,
In Thy great temple here below,
Thou didst for all mankind atone,
And standest now before the throne.
We need not now go up to heaven,
To bring the long-sought Saviour down;
Thou are to all already given,
Thou dost even now Thy banquet crown:
To every faithful soul appear,
And show Thy real presence here!

Concerning the Sacrifice of Ourselves. The Wesleys are very clear that the Eucharist must not end in aspiring doctrines or beautiful sentiments, but in a life of practical moral good. Yet theirs is never that spurious and superficial Christian morality which is content to declare: "Here in Christ you see the ideal. Now you must go and do it." There is always a deep and Christian awareness that man can only make his own sacrifice of moral obedience by joining himself to Christ as He makes His atoning sacrifice of victorious obedience. "As Aaron never came in before the Lord without the whole people of Israel, represented both by the twelve stones on his breast and by the two others on his shoulder, so Jesus Christ does nothing without His church; insomuch that sometimes they are represented as only one Person: seeing Christ acts and suffers for His body, in that manner which becomes the Head, and the church follows all the motions and sufferings of her Head, in such a manner as is possible to its weak members. . . . The truth is, our Lord had neither birth, nor death, nor resurrection on earth, but such as we are to conform to: as He hath neither ascension, nor everlasting life, nor glory in heaven, but such as we may have in common with Him.

See where our great High-Priest
Before the Lord appears,
And on His loving breast
The tribes of Israel bears,
Never without His people seen,
The Head of all believing men!
With Him, the Corner-stone,
The living stones conjoin;
Christ and His church are one,
One body and one vine;
For us He uses all His powers,
And all He has, or is, is ours.
The motions of our Head
The members all pursue,
By His good Spirit led
To act, and suffer too
Whate'er He did on earth sustain,
Till glorious all like Him we reign.

"And since my sacrifice can neither be holy nor accepted, being alone, receive it, O Father, clothed with the righteousness of Thy Son, . . . and grant that He who sanctifies and they who are sanctified may partake of one passion, and enjoy with Thee the same glory!"

God of all-redeeming grace,
By Thy pardoning love compell'd,
Up to Thee our souls we raise,
Up to Thee our bodies yield.
Thou our sacrifice receive,
Acceptable through Thy Son,
While to Thee alone we live,
While we die to Thee alone.
Just it is, and good, and right
That we should be wholly Thine,
In Thy only will delight,
In Thy blessed service join.
O that every thought and word
Might proclaim how good Thou art,
HOLINESS UNTO THE LORD
Still be written on our heart.

Concerning the Sacrifice of our Goods. "Therefore, as our bodies and souls are sacrifices attending the sacrifice of Christ, so must all our goods attend the sacrifice of our persons. In a word, whenever we offer ourselves, we offer by the selfsame act all that we have, all that we can, and do herein engage for all that it shall be dedicated to the glory of God."

Take my soul and body's powers,
Take my memory, mind, and will,
All my goods, and all my hours,
All I know, and all I feel,
All I think, and speak, and do;
Take my heart—but make it new.
Now, O God, Thine own I am,
Now I give Thee back Thy own,
Freedom, friends, and health, and fame
Consecrate to Thee alone;
Thine I live, thrice happy I,
Happier still, for Thine I die.

This, then, is the fitting end of the eucharistic doctrine of the Wesleys—the life of holiness, and of practical service in Christ.

J. C. Bowmer, Sacrament. 1951.

J. E. Rattenbury, Eucharistic Hymns. 1948. JOHN LAWSON

EUFULA, OKLAHOMA, U.S.A. Conference Shrine. Built of original stones of the ASBURY MANUAL LABOR SCHOOL, the most influential school of the early INDIAN MISSION CONFERENCE, a monument has been erected in the city cemetery of Eufaula, Oklahoma, to mark the graves of some fourteen early Methodist leaders. Thomas Berthoff, JOHN HARRELL, T. B. Ruble—all outstanding men—their wives and some members of their families are commemorated there.

OSCAR FONTAINE

EUGENE, OREGON, U.S.A. First Church is one of the strongest and best housed of the Methodist churches of OREGON. Eugene is the second largest city of Oregon and the seat of the University of Oregon. A strong WESLEY FOUNDATION is closely associated with First Church in service to students. Eugene first became a pastoral charge in 1856 when Oregon was in its pioneer stage of development. In 1970, it had a membership of 1,254.

General Minutes, UMC.

T. D. Yarnes, Oregon. 1957.

ROBERT MOULTON CATKE

EUROPEAN METHODIST CHURCHES and British Methodism. For the first century of Methodist history there was little deliberate planning to establish the movement in Europe; links with the continent were personal and casual, rather than strategic. Missionary vision turned to the heathen world, not to territories which had long been committed to the Christian faith. Nevertheless, individual Methodists had a concern for particular European countries.

JOHN W. FLETCHER was born in SWITZERLAND; it was entirely understandable that the time should come when he desired to bring the assurance of the Methodist way to his own people. In 1777 he returned to Nyon where he had been born, and for four years sought to organize CLASS MEETINGS and SUNDAY SCHOOLS in the French-speaking cantons of Switzerland. He had little lasting success, however.

Similarly, there were early contacts with DENMARK. A Danish ambassador in LONDON was much influenced by JOHN WESLEY, and Danish prisoners of war returned to their native land attracted to the Methodism which had cared for them in England. Methodism in SWEDEN began with a class meeting for English workers in a shipyard, soon joined by Swedish workers also. In 1840 a chapel was built, ten years after GEORGE SCOTT had begun his impressive ministry in that country; but two years later, under Lutheran opposition, Scott was expelled from Sweden, and the mission languished. What Lutherans did in Sweden had already been done by Roman Catholics in ITALY; when a London Methodist businessman attempted to distribute Bibles in Florence in 1816, he was arrested. Only in FRANCE was advance made on European soil in John Wesley's lifetime. A number of preaching places were established on the Normandy coast, and in 1791 William Mahy was appointed to lead this work by the Conference. In 1818 CHARLES COOK was appointed to the French mission, and it prospered, especially in the south, achieving conference status of its own in 1852. This was at the time of what the French call Le Reveil (the Revival).

The most enduring of these individual projects is associated with the name of CHRISTOPH GOTTLÖB MUELLER. He arrived in London from GERMANY early in the nineteenth century, a young butcher, anxious to get away from the unrest and fears left in his own country by the Napoleonic Wars. Attracted to Methodism first by its singing, he became a devoted member and an able LOCAL PREACHER. But then came the conviction that he ought to be working his faith in his native land. In 1830 he returned to Winnenden, in South Germany, and began to preach in the open air outside his father's shop. Here he also established a Sunday school. The work developed, and formed the origin of the sturdy and progressive Methodist Church of present-day Germany. His work was done in the south; apart from his efforts, a second Methodist mission took root in the north nineteen years later. After some years of pressure to do so, the American M. E. Church began work at BREMEN, led by LUDWIG S. JACOBY, a converted German Jew who had settled in Germany some years before. Working outward from Bremen, Jacoby also found an eager response to his ministry, and the work grew there as it was doing in the south. In 1897 the north and south missions merged, in association with American Methodism; out of the combined church have come the Methodist missions to HUNGARY and YUGOSLAVIA.

Reference has already been made to Fletcher's abortive attempt to introduce Methodism into the French-speaking cantons of Switzerland. In 1839 British Methodism appointed two missionaries to attempt this again, and in 1841 they set up a society in Lausanne. However, progress was slow, and it was not until the creation of the ZÜRICH Circuit in 1856 by Jacoby and the German Methodists of the north that the church began to advance effectively in Switzerland. Its strength is still almost entirely in the German-speaking cantons.

As for Italy, it was in 1861 that British Methodism appointed RICHARD GREEN and HENRY PICCOTT as missionaries there. This was a time of intense political excitement, and the mission began modestly, its emphasis chiefly on the education of children and on intelligent Bible study. A few years later American Methodism also commenced work in Italy under the leadership of M. LEROY VERNON. Despite much opposition the work in Italy has grown; in 1934 it was unified under the British Conference. Now it is autonomous; but its constitution provides that it shall annually send representatives to the British Conference, and have British representatives at its own Conference.

Methodism in SPAIN began with a group of British dockyard workers, servicing the Mediterranean Fleet at Minorca. They started a class meeting and later built a small chapel. An early convert was a young man named Capo. In later years his three sons all entered the Methodist ministry in Spain, and a son of each of them now serves in the same ministry. Against bitter nationalist and Roman Catholic pressures the work has been difficult; since 1955 it has been merged in the Spanish Evangelical Church.

Yet when everything has been said about British initiative, the fact remains that the bulk of European Methodism grew out of American Methodism. It is explained by the massive wave of emigration from Europe to America throughout the nineteenth century. Hundreds of thousands of those who left Europe discovered when they reached their new home that they were being welcomed and cared for by a church of which they had never heard, the Methodist Church. They attached themselves to it in large numbers, and they wrote back to Europe to tell of what they had found. It has been well said that every letter was a missionary. The way was prepared for Jacoby in Germany and for Vernon in Italy. It was prepared, too, for the one-time sailors who brought Methodism to Scandinavia. If the fact of emigration lies behind American Methodism's impact on nineteenth-century Europe, the plight of refugees lies behind its impact in the twentieth century. The position today is that there are Methodists in every European country except Holland and Greece.

Contacts between those Methodist churches on the continent having a British origin and those having an American origin were for many years almost nonexistent. The same is true of the contact between the churches of American origin and the Methodist Church in Britain itself. The end of the Second World War brought British and German Methodists into much closer contact—more especially as they sought together to bring relief to the homeless and the masses of refugees. The name of HENRY CARTER will always be associated with this ministry. The sense of unity, in spite of the bitterness of war, was symbolized in the generous gift British Methodism made for the rebuilding of the Central Methodist Church in STUTTGART (Auferstehungskirche), destroyed by Allied bombing. Out of this emergency a more permanent and wider relationship has grown.

The British committee, first created to channel Methodist care to the needy of Europe, has changed its purpose with the years, and is now the committee within the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL which links Britain and Europe. Every third year it organizes a European Consultative Conference, and every fifth year a European Methodist Youth Conference. At the same time it encourages a steady interchange of personnel and information at departmental level. There is now also a regular interchange of theological students between the Methodist colleges of Britain and of Europe, while the specialist departments of the churches consult one another as to problems and methods. Most Methodist work in France is now merged in the Reformed Church of that country, but the English work in Paris remains under the jurisdiction of the METHODIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY in London. So does the work in PORTUGAL. Apart from the Italian Conference, all other work in Europe is associated with the American Methodist BOARD OF MISSIONS, and is organized into three episcopal areas—Germany, Scandinavia, the Central and Southern Europe. In 1966 these three areas created their own Council of the Central Conferences of Europe, for consultation and joint action. The secretary of the British Methodist Committee for European Relations has observer status in the council.

Findlay and Holdsworth, Wesleyan Meth. Miss. Soc. 1922.
P. N. Garber, Continental Europe. 1949. WILFRED WADE

EVANGELICAL, THE, official church paper of The UNITED EVANGELICAL CHURCH, was first issued from Cleveland, Ohio as a prospectus, Nov. 14, 1887. Following the General Conference of 1887 of the EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION, a group of those who dissented from several of the major decisions of that General Conference formed the Evangelical Publishing Company, a stock company in Harrisburg, Pa., for the publication of an independent journal. HENRY B. HARTZLER, who had been removed from the editorship of the Evangelical Messenger by the 1887 General Conference, was selected editor of The Evangelical, the independent publication created by this dissenting group.

The second issue of this new paper appeared Jan. 5, 1888 from Harrisburg, Pa., where the Evangelical Publishing Company was established. When The United Evangelical Church was formed in 1894 by those who broke away from the Evangelical Association, The Evangelical was offered to and accepted by the new church as the official church paper. The Evangelical Publishing Company was also purchased as the denominational printing establishment.

The Evangelical appeared as a weekly publication from Harrisburg until The United Evangelical Church was reunited with the Evangelical Association to become The Evangelical-Messenger of The Evangelical Church, as the new church was named.

JOHN H. NESS, JR.

EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION (Evangelische Gemeinschaft). The Evangelical Association was formed during the opening years of the nineteenth century, adding its contribution in alleviating the spiritual vacuum that had existed among the PENNSYLVANIA Germans. JACOB ALBRIGHT (Albrecht), son of German Lutheran immigrants, experienced a pietistic religious rebirth under the preaching of PHILIP WILLIAM OTTERBEIN (founder of the UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST) and Anthony Houtz, a Dutch Reformed pietist. Adam Riegel, a lay preacher under Otterbein's influence and a neighbor of Albright, aided in the transformation with his counsel and prayers. Then Jacob Albright joined a nearby Methodist class which was led by Isaac Davies. Soon he was issued an exhorter's license (lay preacher) by the Methodist class.

About 1796 Albright began to travel throughout central Pennsylvania. He preached to Germans in school-houses, churches, and homes. By 1800 three classes had been organized. In 1803 a small conference of lay persons was convened at which time Albright was formally ordained. The name, Die Albrecht's Leute (The Albright's People), chosen at that time, was changed by the first regular conference in 1807 to the name, Der Neuformirten Methodististen Conferenz (The Newly-Formed Methodist Conference). Albright was elected bishop, a discipline was authorized, and other formal steps were taken by this later body.

Following Albright's death in 1808, GEORGE MILLER completed and published the Discipline (1809), which was identical with major portions of the German edition of the Methodist Episcopal Discipline, published in 1808. JOHN DREIBACH became the first presiding elder and established the first publishing house at New Berlin, Pa., which town became the church's headquarters. The first GENERAL CONFERENCE CONVENED near New Berlin, Oct. 14, 1816. It revised the Discipline, changed the church's name to Evangelische Gemeinschaft (Evangelical Association), approved a hymnbook and other business of a general church nature.

The church spread westward, ministering almost exclusively to German-speaking people. In 1853, it relocated its denominational headquarters at Cleveland, Ohio, to better serve the western constituency. By the 1870's English and German language adherents were nearly equal in membership, requiring literature to be duplicated in both languages. After World War I, the need for German periodicals became minimal so that the last issue in German of any paper appeared in 1946.

In 1850 a mission was begun in GERMANY. Additional fields were added in Japan (1875) and China (1900).

An unfortunate division resulted in 1894 when a third of the membership withdrew to form THE UNITED EVANGELICAL CHURCH. The split was due chiefly to the incompatible nature of a number of the leaders, although issues such as lay representation, limiting episcopal tenure, and congregational ownership of property were likewise involved. Church property was given to the Evangelical Association by the legal courts. In 1922 the two churches were reunited except for a small segment of The United Evangelical Church. This group formed THE EVANGELICAL CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH and has its headquarters today at Myerstown, Pa. The united church adopted the name, THE EVANGELICAL CHURCH.

R. W. Albright, Evangelical Church. 1942.
J. H. Ness, History of Publishing (EUB). 1966.

Raymond M. Veh and Millard J. Miller, My Church Faces Union (church union study book). Joint Commission on Church Federation and Union, Church of the United Brethren in Christ, The Evangelical Church, 1945. JOHN H. NESS, JR.

EVANGELICAL CHURCH, THE. Formed in 1922 by a union of the EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION and THE UNITED EVANGELICAL CHURCH, The Evangelical Church consisted of 259,417 members and 1,856 ministers. It became the first denomination to approve and officially join the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. Headquarters were established in the publishing houses at Cleveland, Ohio and Harrisburg, Pa., although the two printing establishments were eventually merged at the latter location in 1934.

Evangelicals and United Brethren had first discussed union possibilities as early as 1817, but it was not until 1933 that these consultations developed seriously. From that date a Joint Commission on Church Federation and Union was formed by the two denominations. Union was consummated Nov. 16, 1946 with the formation of The EVANGELICAL UNITED BRETHREN CHURCH.

In 1946 The Evangelical Church had a membership of 263,536 persons with 1,967 ordained clergymen. There were 1,939 organized congregations with property valued at $30,472,717. Funds raised for all purposes that year were $7,871,671. There were three colleges, two seminaries, five homes for the aged and orphans. Mission work was being conducted in Germany, Switzerland, France, Japan, China, and Nigeria.

Evangelicals affirmed the supreme authority of the Scriptures, the right of the individual under God to interpret the Word, salvation by faith, and the sanctity of all life. The Church was evangelical in spirit, thoroughly Protestant, with a faith modified by Arminianism. There were two orders of ministry: DEACON and ELDER. Bishops were elected by the General Conference from the elders for a four-year term to administer and supervise the church and they were eligible for reelection indefinitely. They did not belong to a separate order.

R. W. Albright, Evangelical Church. 1942.

P. H. Eller, These EUB. 1957.

J. H. Ness, History of Publishing (EUB). 1966.

Yearbook of the E.U.B. Church, 1947. JOHN H. NESS, JR.

EVANGELICAL CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH, THE, is a denomination of 30,000 members who have a distinct Methodist heritage. Headquarters are in the home of the Bishop at 1005 Barberry Road, Reading, Pa. 19602, and a Church Center is maintained at Myerstown, Pa. 17607, where a publishing house, home for the aging and a school of theology are located.

This is the name voted for the denomination in 1928 as they sought legal means to perpetuate The UNITED EVANGELICAL CHURCH, of which they had been a part since it was organized in 1894. The same Articles of Faith (which were mainly written by Professor Milton S. Terry of GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE) and the same form of government as found in The United Evangelical denomination were perpetuated in the Evangelical Congregational Church.

The United Evangelicals traced their origin to the revival work of JACOB ALBRIGHT, a Methodist local preacher who sought to evangelize his fellow Pennsylvania German people around 1800. When the two branches, THE EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION, and The United Evangelical Church, sought to reunite in 1922, the majority of the East Pennsylvania Conference opposed this merger, because they believed it did not guarantee property rights for local congregations, nor did it sufficiently restrict leadership. They favored limiting presiding elders and bishops to two consecutive terms of four years each.

When the merging General Conference took place in 1922, more than 20,000 members of the East Pennsylvania Conference dissented and continued their organization as United Evangelicals, until legal problems required a change of name.

The name "Evangelical Congregational" is intended to show their historic connection with the Evangelical movement started by Jacob Albright and an emphasis on certain congregational rights. Each congregation holds title to its own property, and can withdraw from the Annual Conference, if they satisfy financial obligations to the conference and provide for members who desire to remain in the denomination. Pastors are assigned by a Stationing Committee each year. The committee consists of the chairman, who is usually a bishop, and the district superintendents, who are elected for limited terms by lay and ministerial members of the annual conference.

When more than a hundred congregations in eastern Pennsylvania perpetuated The United Evangelical Church in 1923, they were joined by congregations from four other annual conferences; they reported (1969) two annual conferences with over 160 congregations. The largest membership is in eastern Pennsylvania where they have eight congregations in Allentown, eight in Reading, and three in Lancaster. In the Midwest they reported five in Akron (Ohio) and three in Chicago.

They have experienced steady growth in the past half century. They support independent missionary work in Tokyo, in Mexico, and in the mountains of Kentucky and more than twenty-five missionaries under independent boards such as Africa Inland Mission and Wycliffe. A missionary office and home is maintained at Shillington, Pa.

A home for aged people was started at Herndon, Pa., and later moved to the church center at Myerstown, Pa., where more than a hundred guests are supported. The buildings used were purchased from ALBRIGHT COLLEGE when that school was moved to Reading, Pa. in 1929. Another college building is used by the Church Center Press, which publishes the bi-weekly United Evangelical, and Sunday school helps for the adult departments.

The old main building of the college was renovated and made available for The Evangelical Congregational School of Theology in 1953. More than a hundred men have graduated. A B.D. degree is offered under state approval. Emphasis on a trained ministry has developed over the years.

The denomination maintains an evangelistic emphasis which continued use of the penitent's altar. CAMP MEETINGS are conducted in eastern Pennsylvania at Allentown, Reading and Herndon. The park at Waldheim was home for an effective summer assembly called "The School of Methods," which was recently moved to the Pocono Mountains and called Twin Pines. Camps for youth are also maintained near Carrolton, Ohio and Dixon, Ill. Catechism instruction is encouraged in the churches.

The church has no set liturgy, and the form varies according to local desires, but in every church the pulpit is located in the center. The ministers are not robed, although most of the choirs are. Infant BAPTISM is practiced, with option as to form of adult baptism usually available. The Lord's Supper is served at the chancel rail.

The conservative emphasis of the church has discouraged cooperation with the ecumenical NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, although local churches cooperate in local community situations. In 1958 steps were taken which led to affiliation with the National Association of Evangelicals.

Those who have served in the office of bishop are: E. S. Woodring (1926-35), C. H. Mengel (1935-43), A. W. Cooper (1943-50), J. A. Smith (1950-59), H. H. Scanlin (1959-67), P. K. Cressman (1967-). Each is restricted to eight consecutive years by the Discipline.

The Creed, Ritual and Discipline of the Evangelical Congregational Church, 1894.

Robert Sherer Wilson, A Brief History of the Evangelical Congregational Church for the Enlightenment of Her Pastors and People. Myerstown, Pa.: Church Center Press, 1953.
Yearbook of American Churches, 1968. ROBERT S. WILSON

EVANGELICAL DEACONESS SOCIETY. A special meeting was called Jan. 18, 1897 by the Evangelical Ministerial Association of Chicago to perfect an organization. Two months later a constitution was drawn up. Then in January 1898, Sister Mary Gametsfelder was accepted as the first DEACONESS and ordained by Bishop WILLIAM HORN during the sessions of the Illinois Conference. The GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1899 appointed a committee to consider this organization and in 1903 the General Conference accepted the Deaconess Society as an official institution of the church.

The first impulse of this organization was to prepare young women for Christian service in local congregations as assistants to the pastor. Early, however, the ministry of healing was introduced. A little hospital was opened in Chicago, as the property originally belonging to the Deaconess Society of Chicago was transferred to the General Society. Conference societies were organized and in turn instituted establishment of homes and hospitals. A training school for deaconesses and nurses was opened in Chicago and prepared a number of girls through the years.

During a decade of expansion hospitals were placed under the control of the General Society in Monroe, Wis.; Freeport, Ill; and Allen Memorial at Waterloo, Iowa, in addition to the Chicago facility. Conferences supported their own units in Bismarck, N. D.; West Side General Hospital, St. Paul, Minn.; Ortonville, Minn.; Lewisburg, Pa.; and Brooklyn Evangelical, Brooklyn, N. Y. Building programs, financial campaigns, and the extension of medical and nursing services took the attention, so that the reception and training of candidates for deaconess service receded and no new recruits were added for several years around the time of the depression.

The depression itself dried up the income through gifts, free services increased, and payments from patients fell off. Financial losses became very heavy. One by one the hospitals went into receivership. In 1933 a meeting of creditors was held whereby there was issued a ten-year income mortgage bond for $323,750, with interest of four percent. The Society was forced to default even in interest payments each year. Finally the General Conference of 1938 laid plans for complete liquidation, which was consummated in 1944.

At its high point the superintendent, J. H. Bauernfeind, reported that in 1928 there were twenty-six hospitals under the supervision of the EVANGELICAL CHURCH, with 1,360 beds, and twenty-three homes with rooms for 688 people. These properties were located across the United States and represented a valuation of $3,650,000.

R. W. Albright, Evangelical Church, 1942.

Deaconess Society Year Book, 1927-28; 1928-29; 1929-30.

The Evangelical-Messenger, Jan. 11, 1936.

Proceedings of General Conference, EC, 1942, 1946.

J. Zipperer, The Deaconess, or a brief survey of the female diaconate. Cleveland, O.: trans. into English by Mrs. J. Zipperer, n.d. JOHN H. NESS, JR.

EVANGELICAL MESSENGER, official English paper of the Evangelische Gemeinschaft (Evangelical Association), was authorized by the GENERAL CONFERENCES of 1843 and 1847, but official publication as a semi-monthly was not to proceed until 800 subscribers had been obtained. The German adherents within the church could have blocked an English paper, for they greatly outnumbered the English membership. However, they showed a genuine willingness to be fair to the English constituency, so that the first issue was printed Jan. 8, 1848. The editor, Nicholas Gehr, was also editor of the official German publication, Der Christliche Botschafter. Later both papers became weekly periodicals.

When the Publishing house was moved from New Berlin, Pa. to Cleveland, Ohio in 1854, the paper was issued from that city. With the strength of the church shifting to the English-speaking membership, in the late nineteenth century, this paper's influence surpassed that of its German counterpart.

Following church union in 1922, when the United Evangelical Church and the Evangelical Association formed The Evangelical Church, the paper was united with The Evangelical of the former church to become The Evangelical Messenger. At that time it was moved to Harrisburg, Pa. and issued from there. In 1947 it was merged with the Religious Telescope of the former United Brethren in Christ to become The Telescope-Messenger of The EVANGELICAL UNITED BRETHREN CHURCH, also issued from Harrisburg.

JOHN H. NESS, JR.

EVANGELICAL METHODIST CHURCH, THE, was formed by former members of The Methodist Church, led by J. H. Hamblen of Abilene, Texas. In 1945, Hamblen began serving an independent congregation in Abilene. Calls from other independent congregations led to the founding of the Evangelical Methodist Church at a Memphis, Tenn. Conference on May 8, 1946. The main cause of dissatisfaction was the "modernism" that had infiltrated the parent body.

At the first Annual Conference at Kansas City, Mo., in November, 1946, Hamblen was elected the first general superintendent. E. B. Vargas, superintendent of the Mexican Evangelical Mission, brought it into the new church as the first mission district. In subsequent sessions, Lucien Smith and Ralph Vanderwood were also elected to the office of general superintendent. In 1952 a schism led to the formation of the Evangelical Methodist Church of America.

The Evangelical Methodist Church is an extremely conservative movement, believing very strongly the ARTICLES OF RELIGION of the former M. E. Church, South, to which it has added an article on "Perfect Love." In describing themselves, they say, "the church is fundamental in belief, premillennial regarding the second coming, missionary in outlook, evangelistic in endeavor, co-operative in spirit, and Wesleyan in doctrine."

Organizationally the church is congregational, yet it is connectional. It is congregational in that each congregation owns its own property and calls its own pastor. It is connectional in that all member churches agree to abide by the Discipline of the Evangelical Methodist Church. The denomination as a whole is governed by the conference system. The General Conference, presided over by the General Superintendents, is the highest lawmaking body. Appended to it is the Board of Publications, which publishes, among other things, the Voice of Evangelical Methodism, a monthly periodical. Other conferences meet on the annual, district, and local church level.

Discipline of the Evangelical Methodist Church, 1968.

J. H. Hamblen, An Historical Sketch of the Founding of the Evangelical Methodist Church. N.d. J. GORDON MELTON

EVANGELICAL METHODIST CHURCH OF AMERICA, THE, was established in 1952 by dissenting members from the Evangelical Methodist Church. The issues that led to withdrawal centered around a longstanding doctrinal and organizational disagreement between J. H. Hamblen and W. W. Beckbill. Beckbill and his followers did not accept the doctrine of holiness proposed by Hamblen. There was also conflict over membership in the National Association of Evangelicals.

The withdrawing body, led by Beckbill, after a court case in which all continuity was given to the parent body, set up an organization similar to the one they left. Membership was established in the ultra-fundamentalist American Council of Christian Churches, and close working relations were set up with the SOUTHERN METHODIST CHURCH, the FUNDAMENTAL METHODIST CHURCH, and the METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH (1939-) as joint members of the Bible Methodist Missions and the International Fellowship of Bible Methodists.

J. H. Hamblen, A Brief Sketch of the Founding of the Evangelical Methodist Church. N.d. J. GORDON MELTON

EVANGELICAL MOVEMENT IN THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND. This movement started in the eighteenth century among Anglican clergy distressed at the low tone of the State Church, unattracted by the High Church tradition, and moved by what often seemed a moderate Calvinist interpretation of the Thirty-Nine ARTICLES. The group had something in common with the Wesleyan movement, but more with the emphasis of GEORGE WHITEFIELD. The Anglican Evangelicals, however, believed in working through the existing parochial system, and in remaining loyal to the diocesan bishops. Their principal disagreement with JOHN WESLEY was over loyalty to the constitution of the Church of England. They did not agree with the use of lay preachers, and they rejected Wesley's doctrine of CHRISTIAN PERFECTION.

Although Wesley made more than one unsuccessful attempt to form an alliance between the two groups (notably in 1764), he had many differences with them, as may be seen from his reaction to the expulsion from St. Edmund's Hall, Oxford, in March, 1768, of six Evangelical students. He disliked the ruthlessness of the action, but he noted in his Journal (Nov. 19, 1768), that one of the principal defenders of the University had said enough to clear "the Church of England from the charge of predestination—a doctrine which he proves to be utterly inconsistent with the Common Prayer, the Communion Service, the Office of Baptism, the Articles, the Homilies, and the other writings of those that compiled them."

The principal figures of the eighteenth century movement were HENRY VENN, WILLIAM ROMAINE, and Charles Simeon (1759-1833). In the nineteenth century the movement prospered, and drew completely apart from the Methodist Churches.

The Church Missionary Society (founded in 1799) was largely Evangelical Anglican. In Britain the movement was extremely active, subordinating everything to evangelistic effort. This has to be borne in mind when assessing its social work, which was always done as a preliminary to evangelism, and not in terms of the Christian Socialist outlook which came to dominate the Anglo-Catholic movement in the Church of England. In the later nineteenth century it sometimes seemed as though the Establishment might be torn apart by the division between Evangelicals and Anglo-Catholics, but after 1914 the tension decreased, though the Evangelicals are still suspicious of Anglo-Catholicism, and of the way the ECUMENICAL MOVEMENT has brought the Church of England closer to the Church of Rome. The group has often identified itself with belief in the verbal inspiration and sole authority of the Scriptures, and in a penal substitutionary doctrine of the Atonement. It takes a strongly Protestant view of the sixteenth century Reformation in England.

F. Baker, John Wesley. 1970.

C. R. Balleine, A History of the Evangelical Party in the Church of England. London, 1908, and subsequent editions. J. I. Packer, ed., The Church of England and the Methodist Church. Marcham, Abingdon, 1963. JOHN KENT

EVANGELICAL PRESS, THE, a publishing house of the E. U. B. Church, was located at Harrisburg, Pa., U.S.A. In 1887 a private company known as the Evangelical Publishing Company of HARRISBURG, was organized with $2,000 capital stock to publish The Evangelical, a periodical for disseminating church information on behalf of a minority within the EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION. When the UNITED EVANGELICAL CHURCH was formed by this minority in 1894, the publishing house was purchased and operated for the church until 1922. Then, with the union of the Evangelical Association and the United Evangelical Church, the property was operated by THE EVANGELICAL CHURCH.

Evangelical publishing was first conducted in a small printery, erected in 1816 in New Berlin, Pa., by the Evangelical Association. With growth and westward expansion of the denomination, the publishing enterprise was moved to CLEVELAND, Ohio, in 1854. A building was erected for $6,000. In 1884, it was replaced by a structure built on the same site and joined to one that had been erected in 1874. In 1928, the publishing house was relocated through the purchase of the Wooltex Building on Superior Avenue and the sale of the Woodland Avenue structure. In 1934, Evangelical publishing was discontinued in Cleveland.

Meanwhile the Evangelical Publishing House building in Harrisburg was outgrown, and a modern structure was erected in 1918. It became known as The Evangelical Press. In August 1967, the net worth of The Evangelical Press amounted to $3,700,000, and there were nearly 250 employees. Sales were listed at $4,800,000. Publishing profits have been designated for ministerial pensions, of which $2,062,000 was paid to the church from 1947 to 1967.

Following union in 1968 with The Methodist Church, The Evangelical Press was sold to a commercial organization.

JOHN H. NESS, JR.

EVANGELICAL SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY, Reading, Pa., U.S.A. (See UNITED THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.)

EVANGELICAL SEMINARY OF PUERTO RICO (Seminarío Evangelico de Puerto Rico), founded in 1919, is situated at Rio Piedras, PUERTO RICO, and is supported by the American Baptists, Christian (Disciples of Christ), Evangelical United Brethren, Methodists, United Presbyterian Churches, and the United Church of Christ. It serves these and other churches in Puerto Rico and the countries of the surrounding Caribbean. The Seminary is attempting to provide for the needs of the Churches in the fields of lay education, and the continuing education of ministers, as well as for strengthening the existing courses in training for the Bachelor's Degree and that of Master in Christian Education. This Seminary is a center for evangelical work in the Caribbean.

N. B. H.

EVANGELICAL THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, Naperville, Illinois, U.S.A., is a seminary for the training of ministers and under the control of The United Methodist Church, although it was formerly E. U. B.

Both the EVANGELICAL and UNITED BRETHREN CHURCHES began and developed on the American frontier where formal theological education was strongly suspected by those of a revivalist bent. It was a far-reaching event, therefore, when the Evangelical GENERAL CONFERENCE in 1867 repealed the disciplinary restrictions disallowing formal theological education. In 1872 the trustees of the college in Naperville voted to "establish a biblical institute." On March 13, 1873, the Secretary of the State of ILLINOIS issued the charter which brought into being Union Biblical Institute.

The first course continued over five quarters, and students were received with little or no college preparation. The language of instruction was chiefly German. Financial, ecclesiastical, and administrative problems beset the new school.

Stability began to appear in the last years of the nineteenth century when S. L. Umbach and S. J. Gamertsfelder joined the faculty, bringing competence and zeal to their tasks. In 1909 Union Biblical Institute became Evangelical Theological Seminary. In 1912 Gamertsfelder became the first president, and the next year Main Building was erected.

The theological course continued a two-year program until 1929, when it was extended to three years. The first degree was issued in 1888, and the degree course was restricted to college graduates. Other students who completed the theological course received the diploma. While for many years separate classes were provided for college graduates and for those without college degree, in 1947 matriculation in the seminary was restricted to college graduates. The B.D. degree was awarded for the basic theological course until 1967, when the Master of Divinity was granted. The Seminary also offers for qualified candidates a two-year course leading to the M.R.E. degree.

A denominational campaign in the 1920's made possible the erection of a dormitory (Seybert Hall) in 1927. A new library building was erected in 1954. A church-wide campaign contributed to the erection of a dormitory for married students (Kimmel Hall) in 1958, and an academic building was erected in 1967.

The faculty of Evangelical Theological Seminary is composed of thirteen teachers, all ordained clergymen holding doctoral degrees. For over thirty years this school has been an accredited member of the American Association of Theological Schools.

In 1966 three foreign countries and fourteen states were represented in the student body by seminarians who had graduated from forty-three different colleges and universities. Of these, twenty-three were public, municipal, or independent institutions.

Since its inception 1,661 have graduated, and these alumni have served in Europe, Africa, South America, Asia, and North America. Graduates are serving in overseas mission stations and in general offices; as chaplains in national or institutional service; as teachers; and in interdenominational service. However, the majority are pastors.

The Seminary owns eight buildings in Naperville. The real estate value of these properties is $1,734,831. In 1970 the value of the Endowment Funds was $1,489,510. Current income was $457,463, and budget expenditures were $449,916. Library accessions numbered 102,390, of EVANGELICAL UNITED BRETHREN CHURCH, THE. At Johnstown, Pa., Nov. 16, 1946, in First United Brethren Church, the Evangelical United Brethren Church was organized. It was formed by the union of the CHURCH OF THE UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST and THE EVANGELICAL CHURCH and followed a modified episcopal form of church government. General church offices were located at DAYTON, Ohio, except for several editorial posts which continued in HARRISBURG, Pa., until about 1963.

PAUL H. ELLER

The work of the church was promoted by means of boards and commissions that were composed of ministerial and lay members elected by the GENERAL CONFERENCE. The executive leadership of each general church agency was vested in an executive secretary who was elected quadrennially by the General Conference.

The Evangelical United Brethren Church recognized the local church as the basic unit. The parity of ministers prevailed through one ordination, that of an ELDER in the church. The pastoral ministry was assigned under the itinerant system. The Local Conference was the highest body within the local church. At the next level of church structure was the Annual Conference, composed of ministers and local church elected lay representatives within a given state or area. These, in turn, elected one or more conference superintendents for a period of four years to supervise the work of the annual conference. Conference boundaries were established by the General Conference. The General Conference was the highest body of the church: legislative, administrative, and judicial. It met every four years and was organized with an equal number of ministers and lay representatives chosen by their annual conferences. The chief administrative office in the church was that of bishop. Seven bishops were elected quadrennially from among the ordained elders and served as the spiritual and temporal overseers of the church. Each was assigned by the General Conference to be the chief administrative officer within an area.

ADMINISTRATIVE OFFICES, DAYTON, OHIO

There were seven colleges and three theological seminaries, one being in GERMANY, to provide higher education. Four publishing houses served the church at home and abroad. Eleven homes cared for children and aged people. The membership of the church in the United States and CANADA in 1968 was 737,762 persons in thirty-two conferences. There were 3,933 organized congregations with 3,683 elders. A total of $61,440,619 was raised for all purposes during the year. Church property was valued at $381,190,795.

The Evangelical United Brethren Church stood for the essential truths of the Christian faith through its revised Confession of Faith (1962). It always believed in social welfare and moral reform and labored to bring all of life into conformity with the will of God. It sought to be "truly reformed and catholic."

After several years of work on a plan, the respective church union commissions of The Methodist Church and The Evangelical United Brethren Church published in April 1966 a proposed basis for uniting the two denominations. This measure was studied, reworked, and finally approved by a special session of The Methodist General Conference and the regular Evangelical United Brethren General Conference, meeting at the same time and place in CHICAGO, Ill. The next year the respective annual conferences of the two denominations ratified the plan with sufficient majorities. In late April 1968, at DALLAS, Texas, the two churches were united to form The United Methodist Church.

P. H. Eller, These EUB. 1957.
General Minutes, UMC, 1968.

J. H. Ness, History of Publishing (EUB). 1966.

JOHN H. NESS, JR.

EVANGELISCHE GEMEINSCHAFT. Church work in GERMANY was begun by the EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION in 1850, when John C. Link of the U. S. West Pennsylvania Conference was assigned "anywhere in Germany except to Bremen where the Methodists had a mission." He arrived in STUTTGART and began his labors soon thereafter. The Germany Conference was organized in 1865, numbering six ministers, three of whom were missionaries from America. In 1900, the conference divided into the North Germany and South Germany Conferences, and by 1932 the East Germany Conference was also formed. Although work had spread into Latvia, Poland, and Estonia, these fields were blotted out following the Second World War.

From simple beginnings the work grew until in 1966 there were 320 congregations with more than 25,000 members in the three German conferences, and an additional 30,000 persons listed as "friends of the church." The names of 217 ministers appeared on the rolls of the conferences. There were also 157 unorganized appointments.

Three institutions, namely, the publishing house, the theological seminary, and the DEACONESS Society, perhaps more than any others, have influenced the life of the Evangelische Gemeinschaft and been responsible for its increased influence.

The publishing business was founded in Nürtingen in 1872, but six years later it was moved to Stuttgart where the denomination owns and operates a modern printing and publishing plant. This has become the center of all editorial and publication work for the German church.

The Evangelische Gemeinschaft Theological Seminary was established by the vote of the conference in Stuttgart, June 16, 1876. At first it was housed in the Ebenezer Chapel in Reutlingen, but in 1904, the increased student enrollment required additional facilities. A building was erected overlooking the city which has continued to serve theological education effectively.

The third important institution has been the Deaconess Society. Authorization for this work was approved at the annual conference in Essen, June, 1886. The actual work was undertaken by one deaconess in a rented attic in Elberfeld. Since then it has expanded and has challenged hundreds of young women to dedicate themselves as nurses or pastors' assistants. These women dress in a uniform similar to the deaconess garb of the Lutheran Churches in the United States today, and upon retirement are cared for by the society. About five hundred women were in the order in 1966 as deaconesses or nurses serving six hospitals which provide one thousand beds. This is one of the largest free-church deaconess societies in Germany.

A deaconess gives her life and service to the church for a modest living. She may leave voluntarily. Her training is that of a registered nurse plus additional education in religious preparation requiring five years' instruction.

The GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1922 provided for a European Central Conference to establish integration of all the work of the European Conferences. Then in 1938, due to specific German problems, a Reich's Conference was formed to encourage unification of effort within the three German annual conferences.

The Evangelische Gemeinschaft has joined with other disestablished churches in Germany to be a participant in the Association of Free Churches in Germany. Quadrennially each annual conference of the Evangelische Gemeinschaft sends representatives to the General Conference of the denomination in America to which it is amenable.

The Church of the United Brethren in Christ began a mission in Germany in 1869, at a time when the success of its SIERRA LEONE mission was almost abandoned. It was constituted a mission district in 1880 and a missionary conference in 1893. Church membership never exceeded one thousand members in nine church houses. The General Conference in 1905 voted to withdraw from this mission field and turned over the property and membership to the Methodist Episcopal Church.

The union of The Methodist Church and of The Evangelical United Brethren Church has greatly increased the power and outreach of Methodism in Germany. Realignment of conference boundaries and many adjustments in administration following the union are now taking place. The formation of the new United Methodist Church was enthusiastically favored by the German ministers and members of both connections, and the Germany Central Conference is correspondingly strengthened.

R. W. Albright, Evangelical Church. 1942.
The Bible Teacher, October 1956.

Buidders, Jan. 1, 1949.

A. W. Drury, History of the UB. 1924.

P. H. Eller, Evangelical Missions. 1942.

The World Evangel, November 1953; January 1954.

Yearbook of the E.U.B. Church, 1967. JOHN H. NESS, JR.

EVANGELISCHE MAGAZIN, DAS, began July, 1869, as an independent Evangelical venture with Bishop J. J. ESHER as editor. Out of the need for a German-language magazine, similar to the Living Epistle which had begun earlier in the year, it supported the holiness movement in the EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION. The GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1871 accepted it officially. It was issued semi-monthly with Sunday school lessons included. It soon lost its holiness and sanctification character, for by 1875 the doctrinal controversy of holiness had pretty well run its course in the church. It continued as a Sunday school paper until 1926, when it was combined with the Christliche Botschafter and four years later, the Evangelische Magazin department was discontinued completely.

R. W. Albright, Evangelical Church. 1942.

J. H. Ness, Jr., One Hundred Fifty Years. 1966

JOHN H. NESS, JR.

EVANGELISM is the proclamation of the gospel, the presentation of the gospel to individuals and groups by preaching, teaching, and personal or family visitation.

Evangelism is the winning of persons to Jesus Christ as Savior and Lord. It is an attitude, a spirit, and a living faith that finds expression in a continuous cooperative effort on the part of the Holy Spirit and man to bring the individual into vital relationships with God and his fellowmen through faith in Jesus Christ, God's Son. It results in a definite personal experience of salvation, a growing sensitivity to the social relevance of the gospel, and a progressive building of Christ-like character. It seeks to bring man into fellowship of the Church, and into involvement in the world to be God's servant of reconciliation. It helps him to grow spiritually through the means of grace and to serve God in daily living. (Discipline, UMC, 1968, Para. 1126.)

The term "EVANGELIST" is usually applied to Protestant ministers who preach personal conversion. "The greatest effort of evangelism was undoubtedly the Great Awakening, and Methodism is essentially evangelistic. JOHN WESLEY and GEORGE WHITEFIELD were the great Methodist Evangelists." (Columbia Encyclopedia.) An evangelist in technical Methodist nomenclature is an itinerant preacher having no fixed pastoral charge.

John Wesley, the founder of Methodism, would not have found the word "evangelism" too familiar. The term did not come into wide use until much later. The word "evangelical" was used earlier somewhat as an epithet against those so described. After being convinced by George Whitefield of the value of open-air preaching, Wesley's work could be classified as evangelism. Early Methodism spread throughout Britain by the formation of disciplined groups—societies and classes—for spiritual discipline and personal evangelism. The movement was marked by the extensive use of lay preachers, local and itinerant, and by field preaching.

The early Methodist preachers who brought Methodism to America were powerful evangelists. This spirit brought FRANCIS ASBURY to the New World and kept him traveling up and down the wilderness land for forty-five years, even as earlier it had brought John and CHARLES WESLEY and George Whitefield to America in an evangelistic effort to convert the Indians. Evangelism was exemplified by PHILIP EMBURY, preaching to his friends, and by Captain THOMAS WEBB, sword on Bible, preaching in the east. Evangelism was a compelling force in all who answered the call to take Christ to the people in need of the message. "Evangelism has always been Methodism's first love. Christian evangelism has always been of the essence and of the spirit and genius of The Methodist Church. The bringing of all men to Christ and Christ to all men is a chief mission of a Methodist."

The Protestant revival of the nineteenth century in America was largely grounded in the movement begun by the Wesleys. The huge crowds for services, including CAMP MEETINGS, appeared when Methodism was in its formative state. Revivalism, with all its excesses and shortcomings, was a specific manifestation of evangelism and a powerful effort to reach people. Bishop GERALD KENNEDY chose "evangelism" as the one single word which can define the whole task of the Church, the mighty enterprise engaging laymen and ministers, and the calling full of adventure and joy. JOHN O. GROSS said that because of John Wesley, Methodism is in a position to recognize the importance of evangelism in preparing man to do God's work.

Every Christian is an evangelist to the degree that he is committed to Christ. The Episcopal Address of 1960 lifted up the cause of evangelism and stated that The Methodist Church was called by Christ to dynamic action in the total evangelistic effort.

Program and method in evangelism in American Methodism have varied from time to time. Program has included pulpit, educational, visitation, and personal evangelism; also ecumenical, public, group, social, stewardship, and prayer evangelism. The first major program was the Home Visitation Movement, followed by rural, industrial, and youth evangelism. The Department of United Evangelistic Missions was established in 1950, and in 1952 alone twenty-seven missions were held, resulting in 105,423 commitments, with 61,346 of these on profession of faith.

Evangelism in the church has been promoted through the General Board of Evangelism in its several departments: devotional literature, such as The Upper Room; evangelistic materials published by Tidings; and through area and conference, district, local church, family, unconventional, and preaching evangelism, and other movements launched from time to time.

Charles M. Laymon, Thy Kingdom Come: Twenty-Five Years of Evangelism. Nashville: General Board of Evangelism, 1964.

BROOKS B. LITTLE

EVANGELISM, BOARD OF, of The United Methodist Church (U.S.A.). Methodism has always been evangelistic. While Methodism includes a great number of Methodist churches over the world, all have evangelistic interests. The Yearbook of American Churches lists twenty-one Methodist groups in the United States alone, and five of these have church-wide organizations for evangelism, under such names as: Director of Evangelism; Department of Evangelism; Board of Evangelism; General Secretary of Evangelism. Each such agency is charged with the promotion, cultivation, planning, and directing of evangelism throughout the denomination. Staff and budgets vary, but all indicate the emphasis on evangelism.

When the three great Methodisms of the United States formed The Methodist Church in 1939, each one had a general agency on evangelism. The M. E. CHURCH had a Commission on Evangelism headed by five bishops, ten preachers, and ten laymen. The bishops might appoint EVANGELISTS at large who were to report to their respective Annual Conferences. In the M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH, the Commission on Evangelism was composed of five bishops, fourteen ministers, and eight laymen. The M. P. CHURCH had a Department of Evangelism with a secretary.

Evangelism was included in the COURSE OF STUDY of each of these churches. Required reading included: E. H. Hughes, Are You An Evangelist? Dimond, Psychology of the Methodist Revival; and F. W. Hannan, Evangelism. No books on evangelism were prescribed during 1940-48, but in 1948-52, the list included: Dawson C. Bryan, A Workable Plan of Evangelism; and 1952-60 listed Bryan also on, Building Church Membership Through Evangelism. Bryan, an enthusiastic evangelistic pastor himself, served as Director of Visitation Evangelism of the General Board of Evangelism—located in Nashville, Tenn.—from October 1948 until March, 1951. For 1960-64, a book by G. F. Sweazey, Effective Evangelism, was required; and 1964-1968 added S. Southard, Pastoral Evangelism; and W. W. Sweet, Revivalism in America. The C. M. E. CHURCH required the study of L. D. Cartwright, Evangelism for Today.

With the plan of unification of the three Methodist Churches, the COUNCIL OF BISHOPS was given the responsibility of promoting evangelistic activities throughout the Church, appointing annually one of their number who would preside over the Commission on Evangelism, and furnish such inspirational leadership as the need and opportunity demanded. The M. E. Church, South, already had a Commission on Evangelism with Dr. HARRY DENMAN as secretary. With unification came a General Commission on Evangelism headed by six bishops, representatives from a number of the other boards and agencies of the church, four representatives from each of the jurisdictions, and ten members elected at large (three of these evangelists). (Discipline, 1939)

The Chairman reported for the Commission to the Council of Bishops. The Commission was charged with promoting evangelism throughout the church (ministers and laymen), and for cooperating in the training of the ministry for leadership in the field. Also it had entrusted to it the production of evangelistic literature, intercession and family worship, and for enlisting the inactive in worship and Christian service. The Commission set standards for approved evangelists and the bishops could appoint conference members as evangelists with the consent of a two-thirds vote of the Annual Conference. Evangelism was also to be organized structurally in the jurisdictional, annual conference, district, and charge levels.

A general church resolution in 1940 specified, "A successful prosecution of evangelism is a foremost responsibility of the new church." It called on every church in Methodism to promote a program of evangelism on an annual basis, stressing personal visitation, public meeting, educational, pastoral, and clinical evangelism. This program was to reach the unreached and inactive people as well as the children. Churches were asked to keep open their doors on Sunday evenings, and Methodism was pledged to take the Gospel of Christ by all means to multitudes outside the church.

The General Conference of 1944 gave a heavier official status to evangelism by changing the "Commission on Evangelism" to the "General Board of Evangelism." New regulations required each local church to consult with the district superintendent before using other than accredited evangelists. The Council of Bishops appointed the chairman of the Board—who has always been a bishop expected to furnish inspirational leadership; and operative administration was under an executive secretary (Harry Denman was the first) and such associate secretaries and editors as the Board saw fit to name. Authority was granted the Board to set standards for "approved evangelists" for use throughout Methodism.

The Discipline in 1952 provided for a Commission on Membership and Evangelism in each local church as an auxiliary to the General Board of Evangelism, Jurisdictional, Annual and District Conference Boards. This Commission was to seek out the unsaved and unchurched and lead them to a saving knowledge of Christ. Its total program covered fifteen points with helpful suggestions for accomplishments. The General Boards of Evangelism and of Education were authorized to create and prepare materials for use in church membership classes.

The program of Evangelism for the quadrennium 1952-56 included a World-Wide Mission of Evangelism, with 1953 a year of evangelism; systematic lay visitations, prayer groups, family worship, youth work, camp evangelism, and full use of radio and television.

In 1956 the General Conference directed that the recommendation of the local Commission on Membership and Evangelism should be required before "lost or inactive members" could be officially removed from the church roll. In 1960 the General Board of Evangelism became the custodian of names lost locally. In 1964 CHAPLAINS in the Armed Services were asked to send the Board the names of people baptized who professed a preference for The Methodist Church, but who gave no local preference.

Beginning at Unification in 1939, the Board of Evangelism grew rapidly to include thirteen departments, and came to be recognized as a major board of the church. In 1966 it was reorganized with five executive secretaries under one General Secretary. The Board of Evangelism has had to date only three General Secretaries: Harry Denman, 1940-65, Kermit Long, 1965-68; and JOSEPH H. YEAKEL, 1968- ; and only five episcopal chairmen: Bishop CHARLES C. SELECMAN, 1940-48; Bishop RALPH S. CUSHMAN, 1948-52; Bishop W. ANGIE SMITH, 1952-64; Bishop GERALD KENNEDY, 1964-68; and Bishop NOAH W. MOORE, 1968-.

With the coming into the larger union of The United Methodist Church in 1968, the Board of Evangelism was of course continued and under that name, as an incorporated body. The present Discipline publishes in toto the constitution of the Board and outlines its present organization and duties. Jurisdictional, annual conference, district, and local church boards and committees are also provided for, and general directions are given with regard to these. Conference evangelists are recognized as a definite class of ministers, though these must conform to standards set up by the general Board.

The E.U.B. Church also brought into The United Methodist Church a Board of Evangelism with comparable goals, regulations and procedures to that of the Methodist Board. It too provided strict standards for official evangelists. There was no difficulty in coalescing these two boards at union into the present General Board of Evangelism.

The Upper Room, world renowned publication of the Board of Evangelism of The Methodist Church, continues to be produced and distributed by the Board of Evangelism of The United Methodist Church, at the express instruction of the General Conference, as originally provided for.

E.U.B. Board of Evangelism. This Board was the agency responsible for the promotion and administration of the work of evangelism throughout the E.U.B. Church, as directed by the General Conference and in conjunction with the Conference Boards of Evangelism and local church Program Councils, as provided in the Discipline.

Evangelism is the winning of the lost to Jesus Christ as Savior and Lord. It is an attitude, a spirit and a living faith which finds expression in a continuous cooperative effort on the part of the Holy Spirit and man to bring the individual into a vital personal relationship with God through faith in Jesus Christ his Son. It results in a definite personal experience of salvation and a progressive building of Christlike character. It brings man into complete harmony with the will of God and into the fellowship of the Church. It helps him to grow spiritually through the means of grace and to serve God in daily living. (Discipline, 1967, Para. 1480.)

The membership of the Board consisted of all active bishops, executive secretaries of various Boards and Divisions of the Church, representation from the Youth Fellowship, pastors, laymen and laywomen, the executive secretary of Evangelism and the assistant secretary or secretaries.

The General Board was charged with the responsibility of creating an intelligent concept of and interest in evangelism among ministers and laymen. The scope of work included the fostering of prayer, private devotions and family worship, regular participation in worship and the life of the congregation. The Board also promoted, in cooperation with the General PROGRAM COUNCIL, all types and phases of evangelism throughout the Church. This included working with other agencies of the church in training ministers and leaders in evangelism, as well as producing a literature of evangelism.

The CHURCH OF THE UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST was organized in 1800, with no design for boards or agencies. The denomination started as an evangelistic movement among the German-speaking people migrating to this country. Circuit riders and pastors of this young denomination were involved in the carrying on of mass evangelism in revivals, which were to become a major method of the pietistic movement on the frontiers of this country. The revival method was used to meet the needs of a pioneer, rural people. The method proved successful as a large percentage of these revivals resulted in the formation of (usually) small congregations.

The Church of the United Brethren in Christ elected a Commission on Evangelism at the General Conference of 1917, and in 1921 elected a General Secretary of Evangelism. In 1925 the work was put under the direction of the Board of Bishops. In 1929 the General Conference established a Bureau of Evangelism under the Board of Administration, with a General Secretary of Evangelism. Due to the severe economic depression, this plan was discontinued and responsibility was returned to the Board of Bishops.

THE EVANGELICAL CHURCH had its origins also in the pietistic movement among German-speaking immigrants, and was officially organized on Nov. 3, 1803, when the first Council met. The first Conference was called in 1807. The early years of the denomination were free of any board or agency development. The infant church considered evangelism to be the heart of all that was done. Later, as the denomination grew in numbers, in organization, and in understanding of its task, boards and agencies were formed. During this time the work of evangelism was lodged in Christian Education and remained there until the time of union in 1946.

The Board in 1967 was an outgrowth of the union of The Evangelical Church and the Church of the United Brethren in Christ. This union was consummated in 1946, and the Board of Evangelism began its task in 1947. There was a great deal of cooperation between the Board of Evangelism and the Board of Christian Education, including joint field work and sharing of staff resources.

This cooperative spirit grew within the Board and found expression in "The Ambassadors," a joint program with Christian Education aimed at reaching youth, in field work with the other boards of the denomination, and through the life of the Program Council.

Concepts of evangelism have grown to the point where they include the traditions of the past and challenge of new forms, but always with the motive of bringing persons into a meaningful relationship with the Living God through Jesus Christ.

Disciplines, TMC, 1939-64; EUB, 1967; UMC, 1968.

Charles M. Laymon, Thy Kingdom Come: Twenty-Five Years of Evangelism. Nashville: General Board of Evangelism, 1964.

BROOKS B. LITTLE

REUBEN P. JOB

EVANGELISTS were a class of religious teachers spoken of in the New Testament and specifically referred to by St. Paul as having been definitely granted powers by the Holy Spirit (Ephesians 4:11). It appears that these early teachers and evangelists were not fixed to any particular charge. Bishop Simpson states, "Their more modern designation, considering the true nature of their office, would be missionaries, and they might operate in the home or foreign field at pleasure." (Simpson's Cyclopaedia, in loc.)

Since every minister was expected to be an evangelist, missionizing and teaching as he preached in carrying on his work, Methodism in America for a long while never employed the title evangelist to distinguish any type of minister until late in the nineteenth century. Then there came to be recognized over the Church world—in other denominations as well as among Methodists—men who specifically gave themselves to special evangelistic missions, holding "protracted meetings," as they were often called, or "revivals," another term commonly used. After a time, certain traveling preachers of the Annual Conferences, wishing to give themselves wholly to evangelistic work, were approved by their respective Conferences for such work, and the bishops were empowered to appoint men as evangelists, with the understanding that these men in carrying on their evangelism would find their own support from the churches and people among whom they held revivals and protracted meetings.

In time there came to be a feeling that such men needed something more than a casual commissioning for what was sometimes rather random work, and there was the demand for a more formal procedure for approving evangelists in many Conferences. Thus "approved evangelists" came to be a class recognized in the Discipline. Late regulations (Discipline, 1968, Para. 1152) gave the Board of Evangelism of each Annual Conference the power to recommend to the Annual Conference and to the bishop in charge "the appointment of certain effective members of the conference as conference evangelists; provided that such persons shall meet the standards set up by the general board and the conference board for conference evangelists."

It is provided that a Conference Secretary of Evangelism shall be elected by each Annual Conference—"to be publicly assigned by the bishop" who is empowered and directed to promote the policies and program of the General, Jurisdictional, and Annual Conference Boards of Evangelism in the Annual Conference, in cooperation with the Conference Program Council (Discipline, 1968, Para. 1150).

The fact that no Methodist minister may hold religious services within the bounds of another minister who does not approve or permit such service brought on some tension in earlier years. This was by reason of the fact that certain evangelists who claimed to be empowered to go anywhere and to evangelize, would sometimes come into another minister's charge and, whether he wanted such a person to preach there or not, would hold meetings. This in time called for more stringent regulations and disciplinary directions regarding evangelists, and brought about the adoption of rules and procedures for Approved Evangelists.

N. B. H.

EVANS, CLEMENT ANSELM (1833-1911), Confederate general, American Methodist minister and author, was born in Stewart County, Ga., on Feb. 25, 1833. He received his LL.B. from William Tracy Gould's Law School in Augusta, Ga., in 1853, and practiced law at Lumpkin, Ga. On Feb. 8, 1854, he married Allie Walton. He was a member of the Georgia Senate, 1859-1861. He was a presidential elector in 1860 and voted for Breckinridge. In the Confederate forces, he served first as colonel of his regiment in Stonewall Jackson's division, and then successively under Early and Gordon. He was brigade commander at Fredericksburg and commanded his regiment at Gettysburg. At Appomattox, he was unaware that negotiations for surrender were in progress, and his division won the last fight of Lee's army, taking several guns and seventy-eight prisoners.

At Fredericksburg, in December, 1862, he was impressed with the carnage and suffering, and resolved if he lived, to devote his life to teaching men to live as brothers. On his thirtieth birthday, Feb. 25, 1863, Evans determined to enter the Methodist ministry, and immediately after the war ended, he was admitted to the GEORGIA CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church, South, in December, 1865.

General Evans was perhaps the only Major-General who has been a member of a Methodist conference. His genuine ability and unquestioned piety, added to his fame as a soldier, put him in the front rank of the preachers. While serving St. John Church, Augusta, Ga., from 1875-1878, he ventured into business and was quite successful. He was the author of the inscriptions on the imposing Confederate Monument in Augusta, and gave the principal address when the cornerstone was laid in 1878.

His first wife having died in 1884, Evans married Mrs. Sarah Avary Howard in 1887. In 1892, after twenty-five years, he retired from the ministry because of a disability resulting from five wounds received in the war. He spent the latter part of his life in Atlanta, where he was active in the United Confederate Veterans, being elected Commander-in-Chief in 1908. He was a trustee of three colleges and a member of the Georgia State Prison Commission.

He was the author of Military History of Georgia and the editor of Confederate Military History. He died in Atlanta, Ga., on July 2, 1911. Evans' son was Lawton B. Evans, distinguished author, historian, and educator.

Dictionary of American Biography.

St. John Methodist Church history, "A Chronicle of Christian Stewardship."

G. C. Smith, Georgia, 1913.

Who Was Who in America.

DONALD J. WEST

EVANS, DAVID TECWYN (1876-1957), Welsh Methodist, was born on Dec. 5, 1876, at Llandecwyn, North Wales. After a period as a pupil-teacher he entered the University College of North Wales, Bangor, in 1895, and was one of the first candidates for the Welsh Methodist ministry to enter the University of North Wales. He spent his whole ministry in the Welsh work. Although his work on Welsh grammar was to a large extent based on the labors of others, he had considerable influence on the writers of his time. In the field of biblical studies he popularized the views of contemporary critics by his popular lectures on Job and Jonah (subsequently published in book form), and by his commentaries and articles. He became the very successful editor of the Welsh Methodist magazine Yr Eurgrawn. He took a leading part in the editing and compilation of the joint Welsh Hymnal of the Calvinistic and Welsh Methodist connections (1927). He served as chairman of the Second North Wales District (1936-41), and was president of the Welsh Assembly (1929). First and foremost he was a preacher, one of the last in the tradition of nineteenth-century Welsh preaching. He was not a dramatic preacher, but biblical and evangelical in emphasis. Retiring from the active ministry in 1941, Evans settled at Rhyl, where he died in October 1957.

GRIFFITH ROBERTS

EVANS, EDWARD, the first native American Methodist itinerant to preach and the first native Methodist preacher to die in the ministry, was converted under the preaching of GEORGE WHITEFIELD in PHILADELPHIA in 1740. He became a Moravian, but withdrew to become an independent evangelist. Together with JAMES EMERSON, he served as a CLASS LEADER for a group of Methodists meeting in a sail loft until 1767, when they were organized by Captain THOMAS WEBB into a Methodist Society which grew into ST. GEORGE'S CHURCH. He became one of the original trustees of St. George's, as well as one of the first Trustees of Whitefield's Academy.

By trade, Evans was a cordwainer or maker of ladies fine shoes. When JOSEPH PILMORE and RICHARD BOARDMAN came to Philadelphia in 1769, they met Evans, and Pilmore wrote of him, "I spent an hour comfortably with Mr. Edward Evans, and old disciple of Jesus who has stood fast in faith for nearly thirty years. He is a man of good understanding and sound experience in the things of God, and his conversation was both entertaining and profitable." Later Pilmore added, "He was savingly converted to God about thirty years ago under that precious man of God, Mr. Whitefield, and has maintained an unspotted character from the beginning. When providence brought Mr. Boardman and me to America, he united with us most heartily, and was made a most useful instrument among us, as he frequently went to the Jerseys to preach. The people were exceedingly fond of him, built a pretty chapel (Grenage or Greenwich, N. J.), and insisted on having him for their minister. After he had been with them a few months, he took fall fever, which soon brought him to his grave. As he lived, so he died—full of faith and full of obedient love."

A. W. Cliffe, Our Methodist Heritage, 1957.

J. F. Hurst, History of Methodism, 1902.

FREDERICK E. MASER

EVANS, ELIZABETH (1776-1849), was born to Methodist parents named Tomlinson in Newbold, Leicestershire. Converted at twenty-one, she began to give exhortations in PRAYER MEETINGS in Derby, and by diligence at her work of lace-mending saved money to finance preaching journeys in the midlands. Samuel Evans—his name is given by Leslie Church as "Seth"—heard her preach in Ashbourne, and they were married at Wirksworth in 1804. Like his wife, he served as both CLASS LEADER and LOCAL PREACHER, and they engaged in joint preaching tours. When the Conference of 1832 objected to female preaching they joined the ARMINIAN METHODISTS for a time, but later returned to the Wesleyan Methodists. Elizabeth died in 1849 and Samuel ten years later. "George Eliot," whose maiden name was Mary Ann Evans, seems to have been the niece of Samuel Evans, and modelled DINAH MORRIS in Adam Bede upon her aunt, whom HUGH BOURNE described as "an extraordinary woman."

Leslie F. Church, More About the Methodist People, pp. 159-163.

Wesley Historical Soc., Proceedings, xxviii, p. 93.

W. L. DOUGHTY

FRANK BAKER

EVANS, EPHRAIM (1803-1892), Canadian minister, was born on June 30, 1803 at Kingston upon HULL, England. His father was a sea captain. At the age of seventeen he emigrated to Lower Canada, and four years later moved to Upper Canada, where he taught until, at the age of twenty-four, he entered the ministry of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Ordained a deacon in 1830, in 1833 he was ordained an elder and in the same year was appointed agent of the Upper Canada Academy. A man of literary ability, he was from 1835 to 1837 the editor of The Christian Guardian. Between 1838 and 1840 he was chairman of the London district.

From 1840 to 1847 Evans was a missionary in Canada West under the Wesleyan Missionary Society. During the years 1848 to 1856 he served in various capacities in the Maritime Provinces. In 1857 he returned to Kingston, Canada West, and became a district chairman.

In October 1858, the Canada Conference decided to send several missionaries to British Columbia. Ephraim Evans led the party which included EBENEZER ROBSON, EDWARD WHITE, and Arthur Browning. For several years Evans remained in the West, helping to establish new churches throughout the Fraser Valley and the lower mainland, often traveling by canoe. He was chairman of the Victoria district from 1859 to 1867.

Upon returning to the East, he was stationed at Hamilton, being chairman of that district, 1868-69, and of the Toronto district, 1870-71. During 1872-74 he was in charge of Mount Elgin Industrial Institute, and following retirement he was for fourteen years permanent secretary of the Western Ontario Bible Society at London, Ontario.

Evans was respected as a man of high intelligence and great native ability. The brother of James Evans, who invented the Cree syllabic system, he was a strong debater in the courts of the church, a sharp writer, and a forceful preacher. He died June 14, 1892.

J. Carroll, Case and His Contemporaries. 1893.

H. W. McKEVILL

EVANS, GARFIELD (1890-), veteran EPWORTH LEAGUE leader and longtime missionary to CUBA, was born in Richland, Fla., on Sept. 19, 1890. He received degrees from FLORIDA SOUTHERN COLLEGE and DUKE UNIVERSITY (A.B., B.D., M.A., and D.D.). He also attended George Peabody College, VANDERBILT, and Columbia University. He taught for a time in the public schools in FLORIDA and then for twelve years at Florida Southern College. He became assistant general secretary of the Epworth League Board of the M. E. Church, South, in 1919, serving until 1924. He was the president and executive secretary of the Florida Epworth League from 1914 to 1919. In 1924, Evans became a full-time missionary in Cuba, teaching for a time at CANDLER COLLEGE, then was president of PINSON COLLEGE; after that he was director for the Holguin Clinic (for the indigent), and president of the Board of Directors of the AGRICULTURAL INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL at Mayari. He served as pastor during this time for three congregations, and was district superintendent in Cuba for seventeen years.

He is the author of Guide to Study of Between the Americas; Behind Iron Doors; Notes on Book of Revelation (in Spanish); and was co-author with Ina Corrine Brown in Choice of a Career. He was co-editor of In Wembo-Nyama's Land.

He has one son, Wallace Evans, who resides in California, and one daughter, Mrs. Patsy Evans Brown, in Orlando, Florida. For forty years he served with the Cuban Mission and Annual Conference. He presently resides in Florida where he keeps in touch with the Cuban workers and Cuban work.

Whos Who in The Methodist Church, 1966. N. B. H.

EVANS, HENRY (?-1810), American local preacher, was "the father of the Methodist Church, white and black, in FAYETTEVILLE [North Carolina], and the best preacher of his time in that quarter," according to Bishop WILLIAM CAPERS, who, as a youthful probationer in the ministry, was appointed to Fayetteville a few months before Evans' death.

Evans was the son of free Negroes from VIRGINIA, a shoemaker by trade, and a licensed Methodist preacher. En route to CHARLESTON, S. C., he stopped in Fayetteville about 1780, was dismayed by the depravity of the slave populace, and decided to stay and preach. When the town authorities forbade such "agitation," he was obliged to go out into the surrounding sandhills to hold services, changing from place to place to escape mob violence. In time, however, white masters began to recognize an improvement in the manners and morals of his listeners, and eventually the leaders of the Fayetteville community were persuaded to allow his preaching in town.

Sometime before 1800 a rough building was put up to house Evans' congregation. Soon white visitors filled the seats reserved for them and began to preempt the Negroes' space, so that after a few years sheds had to be built onto the sides to accommodate the crowds. Indeed, Capers records, Evans "was so remarkable, as to have become the greatest curiosity of the town; inasmuch that distinguished visitors hardly felt that they might pass a Sunday in Fayetteville without hearing him preach."

Evans' church was visited on several occasions by Bishop FRANCIS ASBURY, who called it the "African meeting house" (Journal, Jan. 14, 1805). It was built on the site of the present-day Evans Metropolitan A. M. E. Zion Church. Evans lived in a room at the back of the chancel and continued to stay there after ill health forced him, about 1806, to turn the care of his congregation over to preachers appointed by Asbury. In a unique will, dated Dec. 9, 1809, he bequeathed the part of the building and lot used for church purposes to the M. E. Church, but provided that his residence part and the rest of the lot were to go to the church only at the death of his widow (Cumberland County Index of Wills, June 1811, p. 165).

Capers, in his brief acquaintance with Evans, noted that he was unusually "conversant with Scripture," that his conversation was "instructive as to the things of God," and that he seemed "deeply impressed with the responsibility of his position." Capers gives a moving account of his last words to the congregation, and his funeral:

"On the Sunday before his death . . . the little door between his humble shed and the chancel where I stood was opened, and the dying man entered for a last farewell to his people. He was almost too feeble to stand at all, but supporting himself by the railing of the chancel, he said: 'I have come to say my last word to you. It is this: None but Christ. Three times I have had my life in jeopardy for preaching the gospel to you. Three times I have broken the ice on the edge of the water and swum across the Cape Fear [River] to preach the gospel to you. And now, if in my last hour I could trust to that, or to any thing else but Christ crucified, for my salvation, all should be lost, and my soul perish for ever.' A noble testimony! Worthy, not of Evans only, but St. Paul. His funeral at the church was attended by a greater concourse of persons than had been seen on any funeral occasion before. The whole community appeared to mourn his death, and the universal feeling seemed to be that in honoring the memory of Henry Evans we were paying a tribute to virtue and religion. He was buried under the chancel of the church of which he had been in so remarkable a manner the founder."

F. Asbury, Journal and Letters. 1958.

M. W. Clair, Jr., "Methodism and the Negro," in William K. Anderson, ed., Methodism. Nashville: Methodist Publishing House, 1947.

C. Franklin Grill, Methodism in the Upper Cape Fear Valley. Nashville: Parthenon Press, 1966.

Elizabeth Lamb, Historical Sketch of Hay Street Methodist Episcopal Church, South. 1914.

John A. Oates, The Story of Fayetteville. Fayetteville, 1950.

W. M. Wightman, William Capers. 1858.

RALPH HARDEE RIVES

EVANS, JAMES (1801-1846), Canadian missionary, was born in HULL, England, Jan. 18, 1801, and was educated in Lincolnshire. Evans followed his family to CANADA in 1822, and became a teacher at L'Original, Lower Canada.

While teaching at Rice Lake in Upper Canada, Evans made the acquaintance of WILLIAM CASE, and through his influence became a candidate for the ministry and for the mission to the Indians. He was a probationer in 1830, was ordained in 1832, and in 1834 was sent to the St. Clair mission near Sarnia. Four years later he was appointed to the Lake Superior mission. In this inhospitable area he labored strenuously and often at great peril to his life.

Evans' great opportunity came in 1840 when he was designated by the Wesleyan METHODIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY as general superintendent of a new mission in the northwestern territories, at that date the great empire of the Hudson's Bay Company. Apart from the settlements in what is now southern Manitoba, this vast region was inhabited almost exclusively by Indians and buffalo.

From his station at Norway House, Evans sought to disseminate the gospel as widely as his resources allowed. Above all, however, he was interested in the Indian languages and in devising effective means of communicating with his charges. His major contribution was the invention of a system of syllabic characters through which he was able to reduce the Cree language to written form. Having done this, he devised type from the linings of tea chests, ink from sturgeon oil and soot, and with a fur press produced the first hymns printed in western Canada. Thus he became to the Indians, "the man who taught birch-bark how to talk."

Initially the relationship between Evans and the agents of the Hudson's Bay Company was cordial, but the latter soon became disillusioned. Apart from personal faults on both sides, the fundamental source of conflict was the determination of the missionaries to uphold certain standards, especially in the matter of Sabbath observance, and the equally firm policy of the Company to disregard such regulations. Evans, in particular, incurred the displeasure of the powerful and arbitrary Company Governor George Simpson. This, in combination with the accidental death of an Indian for which he was held responsible, made it impossible for Evans to continue his work. He returned to England and died suddenly on Nov. 23, 1846.

In due time, James Evans was exonerated by his brethren and it is clear in retrospect that he was the victim of the inevitable clash between Christian ideals and commercial paternalism. More important is the fact that he not only opened up a new area of Christian endeavor but introduced new and effective means of spreading the Gospel to the Indians. Lord Dufferin, a later governor-general of Canada, justly noted that Evans was more deserving of a place in Westminster Abbey than many who were buried there. James Evans' monument is in the memories of the Indians and his grave, which was re-established at Norway House in July, 1940.

J. Carroll, Case and His Cotemporaries. 1867-77.

Evans Papers, United Church Archives.

J. H. Riddell, Middle West. 1946.

F. W. ARMSTRONG

J. C. REID

sity and the UNIVERSITY OF DENVER, physician, medical educator and inventor, railroad and real estate builder, orator, religious leader and hospital benefactor, was born in Waynesville, Ohio, U.S.A., March 9, 1814. He began life in a Quaker family originally from Wales and was a mature man when converted to Methodism as a result of his friendship with MATTHEW SIMPSON, later bishop.

He received a primary education at the school on his father's farm; attended an academy at Richmond, Ind.; Clermont Academy in Philadelphia; and earned the M.D. degree at Lynn Medical College in Cincinnati, Ohio.

After a brief apprenticeship in Hennespin, Ill., he launched his medical practice in Attica, Ind. In the fall of 1838, he married Hannah Canby, the daughter of a doctor in Bellefontaine, Ohio. Three of their four children died in infancy and Hannah Evans died in 1850, leaving the doctor with a daughter, Josephine.

In 1845, John Evans recommended to the Indiana legislature a state hospital for the mute, deaf and insane, and when the institution was built at INDIANAPOLIS, he was appointed its first superintendent. He meanwhile (1845) joined the faculty of Rush Medical School in Chicago and, during an eleven-year period there, was professor of obstetrics, editor of the Northwestern and Surgical Journal, benefactor of Illinois General Hospital of the Lakes (Mercy Hospital), a founder of the Chicago and Illinois Medical Societies and the American Medical Society, and inventor of numerous medical instruments for obstetrics. In 1849, he published Observations, a study of Asiatic cholera in the United States. This became the basis of the National Quarantine Law passed by Congress in 1866.

In 1850, John Evans led in the founding of Northwestern University by appealing for aid from the Methodist conferences of the Old Northwest, by drafting the proposed charter, and by using $1,000 of his personal income for the down payment on the property. After Northwestern was opened in 1855, he and other patrons established homes near the first building, and the new community was named Evanston. Evans was chairman of the first board of trustees and a member of the board for forty years.

In the early 1850's, John Evans campaigned for an organized system of public schools for Chicago, and became chairman of the city council's Commission on Schools. In this period, also, he laid the foundation for a personal fortune through activities in Chicago real estate and northwestern railroads. He was one of the first directors of the Fort Wayne and Chicago Railroad and procured the site for its depot—now the location of the Chicago Union depot.

Three years after his wife's death in 1850, Evans married Margaret Patten Gray, daughter of a Bowdoinham, Maine, lawyer. To them were born a son, William G., and a daughter, Ann.

In 1856, John Evans resigned from the Rush faculty and began to abandon medical practice for business and politics. Forced into national politics by his interest in the slavery question, he helped organize the Republican Party of Illinois, and was a prominent speaker in the nomination of Abraham Lincoln for President at both the Illinois State Convention and the National Convention. After the Inauguration, President Lincoln variously offered him the governorships of Washington Territory and of Nebraska. In 1862, Evans accepted the President's offer of the governorship of Colorado Territory, as Lincoln's replacement for William Gilpin.

EVANS, JOHN (1814-1897), second governor of Colorado Territory, chief founder of NORTHWESTERN UNIVER-

He assumed the post on May 18, 1862, at a time when it required ex-officio performance as Superintendent of Indian Affairs, and recruiter-trainer of regiments for the Union Army, as well as development of mineral resources for the nation. In affairs with the Indians, Evans distinguished himself for his policy of conference and conciliation. He furnished Indian families with sheep and cattle and taught them to preserve the animals' lives for long-term produce.

In his first message to the territorial legislature on July 18, 1862, Governor Evans proposed that the Territory begin to develop the kind of educational provisions that would attract families in search of permanent homes. He approached leading citizens and the ROCKY MOUNTAIN CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church for support in establishing a school of higher education. The result was Colorado Seminary, chartered March 5, 1864, and later popularly called the University of Denver. Evans was the first donor to the Seminary's construction and its most consistently substantial supporter during the first thirty years. His service as chairman of the school's first board of trustees began a tradition which has continued in the Evans family for four generations.

On Dec. 18, 1865, John Evans was one of two Coloradans appointed to and assigned a seat in the United States Senate; he and his colleague withdrew, however, when legislation for Colorado's statehood, passed by Congress, was vetoed by the President.

The religious dedication which John Evans showed as a young Quaker pursuing the life of usefulness continued after his conversion to Methodism in Indiana. Evans re-established church fellowship with every change of residence and, for many years in Colorado, he made it a practice to give $100 to each new church in the territory. On the death of his daughter, Josephine Evans Elbert, in 1868, he established for the Rocky Mountain Conference a memorial building for worship. Named Evans Memorial Chapel and completed in 1878 at an approximate cost of $13,000, it was reconstructed in 1960 on the University Park Campus of the University of Denver and is the city's oldest Methodist church building still in use.

John Evans died at his home in Denver on July 2, 1897, while still chairman of the University of Denver board of trustees. He is buried at Riverside cemetery, north of Denver in Adams County, Colo.

Bridenhagen, John Evans: Western Railroad Builder.

Coley, John Evans and Indian Affairs in the Colorado Territory.

Hoxie, Dr. John Evans, An Assessment.

McMechen, Life of Governor Evans.

Rhodes, John Evans: Builder of Two Universities.

CHESTER M. ALTER

EVANS, JOHN (1840-1897), Welsh Methodist, was born in 1840 at Eglywys-bach, Denbighshire, North Wales. He started to preach when he was seventeen, and entered the Welsh Methodist ministry in 1860. His fame rests almost entirely on his gifts as a preacher. After thirty years as a minister in Welsh-speaking circuits, he went to an English circuit, London (Liverpool Road), in 1890, but returned to the Welsh work to superintend the newly formed Pontypridd Mission in 1893. Two years later he became chairman of the South Wales District. He died suddenly at Liverpool on October 23, 1897, the victim of overwork. Apart from a Welsh biography of JOHN WESLEY and some early reminiscences, his literary productions were mainly sermons. In an age when Welsh prose writers inclined to the verbose and pseudo-literary, his prose was natural and unaffected. It is said that he could count his converts by the thousands.

GRIFFITH ROBERTS

JOHN EVANS HOUSE

EVANS, JOHN, HOUSE, located in Carroll County, Md., was built in 1764. It became a regular preaching appointment in 1768 and continued so until 1809. Bishop ASBURY included it in his visitations. This preaching place grew out of the first Methodist class organized in MARYLAND by ROBERT STRAWBRIDGE in 1763 or 1764. Among those who were related to the class by 1768 were: John Evans (not to be confused with Colorado's JOHN EVANS), William Durbin, William Daman, George Havener, Richard Smith, Thomas Leakin, James Crawford, Robert Walker, William Snader, Thomas Donaldson, Daniel Stevenson, Philip Nicodemus, Andrew Poulson, Jacob Cassell, George Logman (with their wives and some children). Afterward were added John Todd, Mrs. Alexander Warfield, Hezekiah Bonham, JOHN and PAUL HAGERTY.

John Evans was born Nov. 30, 1734. He became the first Methodist convert in America in 1763-64, a leader of the class in 1768, and continued for nearly forty years, at which time he was forced to give up his lay work due to ill health. He died Feb. 18, 1827, and was buried in the family cemetery which is located near the John Evans House.

From 1768-1809, sixty-eight different itinerants preached regularly at the John Evans House, and from 1785 these were assigned by episcopal appointment. In 1773 the John Evans Class formed a part of the Baltimore Circuit, and in 1784 it became a part of the Frederick Circuit.

In 1962 this historic house was recognized by the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE Historical Society as being the place where many outstanding first events occurred in American Methodism. A plaque was erected which reads: "John Evans House, 1764, Methodist Landmark. First convert lived here 1764-1827. First class met here 1768-1809. First Preacher, Robert Strawbridge. First Bishop, Francis Asbury, preached here."

The Origin of Methodism in America. Chicago: Methodist Book Concern, 1916.

George C. M. Roberts, Centenary Pictorial Album—Being Contribution of the Early History of Methodism in the State of Maryland. Baltimore: J. W. Woods, 1866.

EDISON M. AMOS

FIRST CHURCH, EVANSTON, ILLINOIS

EVANSTON, ILLINOIS, U.S.A. First Church is literally the city's "first church." It was founded in 1854 in a small log schoolhouse. The present congregation of 2,370 takes pride in four continuing emphases: a devotion to the principle of the "free pulpit"; a pioneering role in the peace and ecumenical movements; and a continuity of distinguished ministerial leadership. Between 1903 and 1966 the church was served by only four senior ministers: TIMOTHY P. FROST (1903-17); ERNEST FREMONT TITTLE (1918-49); HAROLD A. BOSLEY (1950-62); and DOW KIRKPATRICK (1962-).

From the beginning the church has been closely associated with two neighboring Evanston institutions, both Methodist related and both founded within a few years of the church itself—NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY and GARRETT THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY. Countless church members have been drawn from their faculties and student bodies.

The character of the congregation has also been determined by the fact that the headquarters for a number of the denomination's commissions and publications are in the Chicago area. Many of their staff members have participated actively in the life of the church.

In 1856 the congregation of 100 moved into a simple frame building on the site of the present Evanston Public Library. In 1872, when the membership numbered only 384, a large brick church was dedicated at the corner of Church Street and Hinman Avenue. It served only until 1909 when, because of structural flaws, it was demolished to make way two years later for the present Gothic building. Thomas E. Tallmadge was the architect for this new stone church and for extensive additions which followed in 1930. By 1944, under the leadership of E. F. Tittle, the church membership had grown to its present approximate size.

A high point in recent church history came in 1954 when the Second Assembly of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES met in Evanston. First Church served as its religious seat. For the congregation it was a significant coincidence that this historic event took place during the church's Centennial Year.

In the last half century the First Church pulpit has been occupied by ministers distinguished for their prophetic preaching and their courageous and effective statesmanship in the areas of Christian social concerns and missionary education. The congregation has provided leadership in the causes of temperance and social justice, in education, public affairs and the ecumenical movement. Its women have been pioneers in social settlement work and the unification of women's church activities at the local and national level.

ELEANOR DARNALL WALLACE (Mrs. Donald A.)

EVANSVILLE, INDIANA, U.S.A., settled about 1812 and laid out in 1817, became a city in 1847. Methodism first entered the area in 1811 when the Patoka Circuit was established. The first Methodist service in Evansville of which there is record was held in the home of Hugh McGary, Dec. 12, 1819, with John Schrader as the preacher. Robert Parrett, a circuit rider, organized a Methodist society in May, 1825. The first church building was erected on Locust Street in 1838; it was used until 1865 when Trinity Church was built. Trinity served through the years as the parent church for establishing new congregations. By 1876 there were three additional churches as well as one German congregation in the city. The more recently established churches are: Methodist Temple, 1937, which with over 2,200 members is the largest Methodist congregation in the city; Fairlawn, 1956; and Aldersgate, 1964.

In 1854 a college was established in Moores Hill and was named for the town. In 1919 it was relocated in Evansville and called EVANSVILLE COLLEGE. On Feb. 17, 1967 it became the University of Evansville. Related to The United Methodist Church, it reported in 1969 some 4,000 students, a library of 100,000 volumes, an endowment of $3,000,000, and a plant valued at $15,000,000.

The A. M. E., A. M. E. Zion, C. M. E., and Free Methodist Churches have one congregation each in Evansville. In 1969 there were nine congregations of the former Evangelical United Brethren Church in the city with a total of 1,980 members. In the same year the 13 congregations of the former Methodist Church reported a total of 8,880 members, property valued at $5,671,489, and $796,934 raised for all purposes.

General Minutes, ME, TMC, UMC.

John E. Iglehart, "Methodism in Southwestern Indiana," in Indiana Magazine of History, Vol. 17, March and June, 1921. M. Simpson, Cyclopaedia. 1878. ELLIS P. HEKILL, JR.

Old North Church which dates back to 1831, did not begin as a Methodist church. The village, then called Mechanicsville, acquired a lot on which to build a "school and congregation." With two sawmills on Pigeon Creek donating lumber and the able-bodied men of the community donating their labor, the edifice was started in 1832 and was dedicated in 1834. The original structure still stands, and it is recognized as the oldest church building in continuous use in Indiana. The beams are hand-hewn and they are mortised and pinned together with wooden pegs.

In 1832, when the town had a population of 314, the church was organized. In the early years the congregation was made up of Baptists, Congregationalists, Cumberland Presbyterians, Methodists, Catholics, and others, and there was no regular pastor. During the Civil War the church was a station of the "Underground Railroad." About 1880 the basement of the church, which now serves as the church office and the pastor's study, was used to house the first Negro school in the town.

The Methodists purchased the church building Feb. 11, 1921. However, beginning in 1897 when the church had only thirteen members, it was made a point on the Evansville Circuit of the INDIANA CONFERENCE, and thereafter it had only Methodist pastors. When first listed in the conference minutes (1918), the church was called Stringtown (Mechanicsville became Stringtown for a time before it was called Evansville). The church is located at 4201 Stringtown Road. In 1923 when the church had 123 members, an addition was built. In 1924 the name was changed to Old North Church. At that time the original building was remodeled, and thereafter it was used exclusively as a sanctuary. In 1953 when the church had 442 members, a new sanctuary was erected. In 1961 a special bequest and some memorial gifts made possible further remodeling of the original church and the building of a chapel. A few present-day members of the church are sixth generation descendants of original members. In 1970 Old North Church reported 636 members, property valued at $420,000, and $46,657 raised for all purposes.

General Minutes, MEC, and MC.

Historical Sketch of Old North Church (typescript). DePauw University Archives. No date.

"History of Old North Church" in Old North Church Bulletin. Circa 1961.

JESSE A. EARL
ALBEA GODBOLD

EVANSVILLE COLLEGE, Evansville, Ind., was incorporated in 1854 as Moore's Hill College in Moore's Hill, Ind. It was moved to Evansville in 1919 and the name changed to Evansville College. The people of Evansville raised $500,000 to make the move possible. As a college of liberal arts it developed a broad program of service for the community, including the Community College, Center for Advanced Study, and Center for Industrial Relations. Evansville College became the University of Evansville in January, 1967, when the Indiana Legislative Assembly amended the college charter. Degrees granted are the B.A., B.M.E. (Music Education), B.S. in Nursing, B.S. in Business, B.S. in Electrical Engineering, B.S. in Industrial Engineering, B.S. in Mechanical Engineering, B.S. in Medical Technology, and M.A.

The governing board has forty-eight trustees, eighteen elected by the Indiana Conference, three by the Northwest Indiana Conference, three by the North Indiana Conference, nine by the Chamber of Commerce of Evansville, three by alumni, twelve by the board.

In 1970 the enrollment was 3,892, with a faculty of 163.

JOHN O. GROSS

EVELAND, WILLIAM PERRY (1864-1916), American minister, educator, and missionary bishop, was born in Harrisburg, Pa., Feb. 12, 1864, the son of John C. and Mary McAleer Eveland. They said of him: "He was Scotch and he was poor. But what Scotch lad does not laugh at poverty when the academy and the college call?" So he enrolled in Pennington Seminary in 1886. In 1888 he became a student at DICKINSON COLLEGE, and four years later he was valedictorian of his class. In 1896 he received his Ph.D. from Dickinson, and the honorary D.D. in 1906.

He joined the CENTRAL PENNSYLVANIA CONFERENCE in 1891, and served as pastor-preacher until he was elected director of the Jacob Tomb Institute for boys at Port Deposit, Md., in 1903. Two years later he became the president of Williamsport Dickinson Seminary, a position he held for seven years. He served these two institutions in a strong administration that left upon them the imprint of his character.

In 1912 he was a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE at Minneapolis. Here, on the third ballot, he was elected bishop of Southern Asia (a missionary bishop), with residence at MANILA, PHILIPPINES. It was a difficult assignment which he accepted with confident assurance and humble devotion. His administration was marked as "just and fair," and "full of thoughtfulness born of love."

Bishop Eveland's life came to a tragic and premature end on July 25, 1916, when his steel fishing rod came into contact with a heavily charged electric wire as he followed the stream that flows through Mt. Holly Springs, Pa. He was buried in the cemetery at Mt. Holly Springs. This small town was the home of his wife, the former Rosalie C. Mullin.

Journal of the Central Pennsylvania Conference, 1917.

F. D. Leete, Methodist Bishops. 1948.

Northern Christian Advocate, Aug. 3, 1916.

D. FREDERICK WERTZ

EVELEIGH, WILLIAM (1882-1945), South African minister and journalist, was born in England on March 23, 1882, and came to SOUTH AFRICA as a candidate for the ministry in 1903. After serving several circuits, he was in 1920 appointed Book Steward in charge of the Methodist Book Room and Publishing Office in Cape Town, and editor of The Methodist Churchman, the weekly journal of South African Methodism. He continued in this work until his death, and also served the Church in many connectational affairs, including negotiations for the union of the Transvaal District with the South African Conference in 1931. He was Chairman of the Cape of Good Hope District from 1937 to 1944, and President of the Conference in 1940. He made the Book Room in Cape Town a center of hospitality to Methodist visitors from all over the world, and especially during the war of 1939-1945 welcomed chaplains, missionaries, soldiers and others passing through Cape Town. He contributed widely to the secular as well as the religious press. Among his publications were South West Africa, a sketch of the history of the territory under German rule; and The Settlers and Methodism, dealing with the British settlers in the Cape in 1820. He died in Cape Town on Dec. 7, 1945.

Minutes of South African Conference 1946.

E. LYNN CRAGG

EVERETT, JAMES (1784-1872), British preacher, was born at Alnwick, Northumberland, May 16, 1784. He entered the Wesleyan Methodist ministry in 1807, but superannuated in 1821 on account of bronchitis. A period in the Wesleyan Book Room in LONDON seems to have confirmed him in what became a lifelong hatred of JABEZ BUNTING. Everett withdrew to SHEFFIELD, and then to MANCHESTER from 1825, where he kept a bookshop and turned more and more to writing. He wrote histories of Methodism in both places, as well as a popular account of SAMMY HICK, The Village Blacksmith (1830?), which went through numerous reprints in both England and America. In 1834, however, the Conference compelled him to return to the stations; in the same year he wrote his first important anonymous work, The Disputants, a pamphlet about the SAMUEL WARREN controversy, in which he attacked Bunting. His own hero was ADAM CLARKE, of whom he published a biography (1843). He also wrote The Polemic Divine, a life of DANIEL ISAAC (1839). Another anonymous work was Wesleyan Takings, pen portraits of a hundred Wesleyan ministers, begun in 1834 and finished in 1840 in connection with the Centenary of Methodism. When asked by the Conference of 1841 to affirm or deny authorship, Everett simply refused to answer the question at all. He published a biography of WILLIAM DAWSON (1841).

He superannuated again in 1842, on the grounds of ill health, and went to live at York. The FLY SHEETS now began to appear; Everett was suspected of being the author, but as in the case of Wesleyan Takings refused to commit himself either way. There is no absolute proof that he wrote the sheets; he did finally admit authorship of The Disputants and the Takings. Everett was expelled by the Wesleyan Conference of 1849 on the ground of contumacy; he was one of the principal leaders of the struggle which followed, and which ended in the formation of the UNITED METHODIST FREE CHURCHES in 1857. He, and not ROBERT ECKETT, was chosen first president of the new body; he edited its hymnbook. In 1861 Everett wrote The Allens of Shiny Row, largely about coal miners. From 1863-66 he published Methodism As It Is, an account of Wesleyan Methodism between 1849-57. Everett saw himself as one who had fought to liberate Wesleyanism from the tyranny of Bunting; but his ideas of reform were chiefly negative. He was deeply influenced by personal admiration for Adam Clarke and rancor against Bunting. Everett died on May 10, 1872.

R. Chew, James Everett. 1875.

J. H. S. Kent, Jabez Bunting. 1955.

JOHN KENT

EVERETT, JOSEPH (1732-1809), preacher and presiding elder, was born in Queen Anne County, Md., June 17, 1732. His parents were Anglicans. Moved by the preaching of GEORGE WHITEFIELD, he joined the Presbyterian Church in 1763, but in Methodist terminology he was soon in a backslidden state. As a soldier in the Revolutionary War, he developed antipathy toward the Methodists, calling them false prophets and deceivers. However, after hearing FRANCIS ASBURY at the home of EDWARD WHITE in 1778, and after reading the writings of Wesley and Fletcher supplied him by White, he became a zealous Methodist and in 1780 joined the itineracy. A member of the PHILADELPHIA CONFERENCE, his appointments took him into MARYLAND, part of VIRGINIA, DELAWARE, PENNSYLVANIA, and NEW JERSEY. He was a member of the CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE in 1784. Ordained DEACON in 1786 and ELDER in 1788, he was appointed a presiding elder in 1789 and continued in the office until 1804. In 1788 Everett wrote an account of his life which was published in the Arminian Magazine. In the 1792 GENERAL CONFERENCE he opposed JAMES O'KELLY's motion to permit a preacher to appeal to the conference if he felt injured in his appointment. Armstrong reports him to have been "the roughest spoken preacher that ever stood in the itinerant ranks." Strong in his own commitment, evangelistic in his preaching, and efficient as a presiding elder, Everett was a useful minister. He superannuated in 1805 and died Oct. 16, 1809.

J.E. Armstrong, The Old Baltimore Conference. General Minutes, MEC.

M. Simpson, Cyclopaedia. 1878.

JESSE A. EARL
ALBEA GODBOLD

EWAH WOMANS UNIVERSITY, Seoul, Korea. KOREA's first, and the world's largest university for women, has had an average enrollment of 8,000 students since 1963.

EWAH UNIVERSITY

In addition to the ten colleges of the university proper, the related institutions are: hospital; International Night College; demonstration school (covering all work from kindergarten through high school); and a Korean Cultural Research Center.

The University is related to the Board of MISSIONS of The United Methodist Church and the Board of World Missions of the United Church of CANADA.

The name Ewha (Pear Blossom) dates back to 1886, when it was given by Queen Min to the first school for girls in Korea started by Mrs. Mary F. Scranton. A high school department was added in 1904, and this became Ewha High School, a separate institution in 1929.

The vision and perseverance of Lula E. Frey (1906-20) led to the addition of a college department, enrolling Korea's first college girls in 1910. Under Alice R. Appenzeller (1922-39; see HENRY G. APPENZELLER), a new campus was developed outside the city, and the cooperation of the M. E. Church, South, and of the United Church of Canada was secured. Under Dr. HELEN KIM (1939-61) Ewha became a university in 1945 and added a graduate school in 1952.

The University has been noted for its Christian emphasis. A Sunday school as well as a church has been maintained on the campus for those who wish to worship there. Dr. HARRY DENMAN, Secretary of the Board of EVANGELISM of The Methodist Church (1940-64), led annual tours for several years to the campus with meetings and interviews which resulted in mass baptisms of as many as 1,200 students. As a result of the 1961 tour, a team of twelve ministers baptized a total of 854 Ewha University women and 453 girls from Methodist high schools in Ewha's Ryang-Welch Auditorium. In 1960, three Ewha graduates were commissioned and sent by Ewha as Korea's first foreign missionaries, serving in PAKISTAN.

Dr. Okgill Kim became President in 1961.

Marion Lane Crow, Our Ewha: A Historical Sketch of E.W.U., 1886-1956. Seoul: Ewha Woman's University Press, 1956.

CHARLES A. SAUER

EWING, BETSY KENDRICK (1923-), American mission executive, was born April 15, 1923 in LOUISVILLE, Ky. She received her A.B. degree from the University of Louisville (1944), M.A. from SCARRITT COLLEGE (1948), and M.A. from Peabody College (1958).

Upon completion of college Miss Ewing served 1944-46 as an enlisted non-commissioned officer, WAVES. She served with Scarritt College, 1949-65, as alumni secretary with responsibilities for a time as Coordinator of Public Relations and another period as Dean of Students. From 1965-68 she served the National Division, Methodist Board of MISSIONS, as executive secretary, Committee on Deaconess Services. Then followed three years as Assistant General Secretary for Program Administration. At present she is Associate General Secretary (Interim), National Division.

Miss Ewing was commissioned as a DEACONESS in The Methodist Church, May 1954, in the Woman's Division Assembly, Milwaukee, Wis. The NORTHERN NEW JERSEY CONFERENCE, 1970, consecrated her as a Lay Worker.

She has been trustee of Sue Bennett College and Scarritt College, a member of American Association of University

Women and National Association of Women Deans and Counselors. She resides presently in Fort Lee, N. J.

JOHN H. NESS, JR.

EXCOMMUNICATION, or the cutting off from religious privileges, especially that of receiving the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, has never been in use among Methodists. This was partly because, even when a person was removed from membership of one of the early Methodist societies, this did not prevent him from communicating at the Sacrament in the Church itself to which he may have belonged. Even when Methodist societies came to be organized into churches and began to administer the Sacraments, the exclusion of a member under disciplinary procedure was never called "excommunication."

Exclusion from the Sacrament, however, was practiced by the early Methodists in America after the M. E. Church had become organized and began administering the Sacraments. This matter was evidently debated at the CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE, for the 1784 Minutes contained this direction: "Let no person not a member of the society be admitted to the communion without a sacrament ticket, which ticket must be changed every quarter. And we empower the elder or assistant, and no others, to deliver these tickets." In 1789 the "ticket" is not mentioned, but this time the direction is: "Let no person not a member of our society be admitted to the communion without examination, and some token given by an elder or deacon." ASBURY and COXE cautioned their preachers against admitting outsiders to the communion unless they too had been carefully examined. This, of course, had to do with administering the Sacraments to outsiders, for Methodist themselves were under strict discipline through their class leaders. "Communion tickets" preserved from this era are today greatly prized antiques.

Behind all this and in line with the rubrics of the Church of England was the ancient church practice which firmly denied Church communion to members who had been guilty of serious faults. "If any of those be an open and notorious evilviver, or have don any wrong to his Neighbours by word or Deed . . . ye Curate . . . shall call him and advertise him, that in any wise he presume not to come to the Lords Table . . ." (First Rubric in the Order for the Administration of the Lord's Supper . . . in the 1662 Prayer Book.)

During the Middle Ages excommunication could become a terrible penalty, especially when Church connection with the State meant that excommunication involved civil penalties, as well as a religious outlawry. There were varying degrees of excommunication in the mediaeval Catholic Church. "Major excommunication" meant an effective and complete exclusion from the community of the faithful; "minor excommunication" was deprivation of certain of the Church's benefits, e.g. Reception of the Sacraments and Public Prayer. (Conde B. Fallen and John J. Wynne, comp. and ed., Catholic Dictionary. New York: Universal Knowledge Foundation, 1929.)

As Bishop HOLLAND N. MCTEYRE explained, excommunication is admittedly "a power necessary for the protection of religious societies, and being confined to separation from its membership and privileges, has in it no element of punishment." This authority held that "anciently among the Jews excommunication deprived the person of many social enjoyments, and sometimes brought with it severe penalties." The same writer held that this was authorized by our Savior when he said: "If thy brother trespass against thee, go and tell him his fault, between him and thee alone; but if he shall hear thee, thou has gained thy brother. But if he will not hear thee, and take with thee one or two more, that in the mouth of two or three witnesses every word may be established. And if he shall neglect to hear them, tell it unto the Church: if he neglect to hear the Church, let him be unto thee as a heathen man and a publican" (Matthew 18:15-17).

In harmony with this direction, the Apostles exercised their authority in the churches, and St. Paul directed "that if any man obey not our word by this epistle note that man and have no company with him, that he may be ashamed. Yet, count him not as an enemy, but admonish him as a brother" (II Thessalonians 3:14-15). The church withdraws its association from persons who either teach contrary to its doctrines, or who violate the moral code or its order of government.

In the life of American Methodism "turning people out of the Church" was once reported, and sometimes particular ministers were greatly blamed for such disciplinary action. However, by the Discipline of the M. E., M. P., and M. E. South Churches, no one could be expelled from the church until there had been a trial before a jury of that person's peers, and after the privilege of appeal to a higher court. (See Restrictive Rule IV (UMC) forbidding the GENERAL CONFERENCE to abolish this privilege either of church members or ministers. See also CHURCH TRIALS and TRIAL LAW.) It is very rare to hear today of any person being formally excluded from the American Methodist Church by official disciplinary action. It happens occasionally in the case of ministers who have been tried, but lay persons—if a formal trial seems to be threatened—usually withdraw on their own initiative. It should be added also that those who have been formally excluded from the church may return after certifying penitence and reformation. Numbers of persons, of course, are dropped from the church rolls when they cannot be located or when they show no interest whatever in its life or proceedings. This "dropping from the roll" is done by charge conference action, and does not carry with it the same stigma as would a formal pronouncement of expulsion.

In British Methodism a member guilty of some serious fault bringing discredit upon the Church may properly as a matter of discipline be removed from membership, by the action of a duly constituted LEADERS' MEETING. These proceedings, however, are private and confidential business and, as such, the subject of legal privilege. There is no public "excommunication," and this word is not used of disciplinary expulsion from Methodist membership. No attempt would be made to prevent such a person from worshipping in the congregation, but it would clearly not be proper to admit to the Holy Communion a manifestly impenitent offender in some serious fault.

N. B. H.

EXHORTATION is a form of direct appeal urging upon an individual, or group of individuals, the performance of some duty, or perhaps even the avoidance of some course of action considered detrimental or harmful. It differs from persuasion in that it is addressed more to the affections than to the intellect. In Methodist life and practice in earlier days, exhortation was considered a branch of preaching, and usually meant an urging toward a practical course of conduct which had been preached or told of in the more formal presentation of the Word.

Among the early Methodist preachers, exhortation was important as a branch of their work. It was quite often the case that when two ministers were present and one preached, at the close of the sermon the other would get up and "exhort." The Methodist Churches for many years officially set apart a class of persons as "EXHORTERS," but exhortation was by no means confined to members of this group. Today, in all good preaching, whether admittedly or not there is a hortatory element. Someone has wisely said that after every good sermon there ought to be a "so what?"—and that gives the chance for practical exhortation.

N. B. H.

EXHORTER. This was a term in American Methodism applied to a lay officer or speaker in Methodist Churches who was licensed "to exhort," and constituted as such by a formal commissioning. The office of exhorter existed in the Methodist Church almost from the beginning of Methodism. In the British Conference of 1746—two years after JOHN WESLEY held his first Conference—the following direction was given: "Let none exhort in any of our Societies without a note of recommendation from the Assistant. Let every Exhorter see that this is renewed yearly. Let every Assistant rigorously insist upon this." Then, in 1770, we find this record—"That each Assistant may know the Exhorters in his circuit, let each give his successor a list of them."

The truth is, Wesley, who undoubtedly wrote these instructions, was very chary of allowing laymen any ministerial prerogatives unless they proved worthy of them. He did let his assistants preach, but he continued to guard the Sacrament and Ordinances of the Church, and kept them beyond the reach of any but ordained men until his very last years—and then only under special circumstances. The clergy of the Church—and Wesley was one of them—had an instinctive aversion to allowing any lay person to speak in public concerning the things of God, or for any unordained person to interpret in public the Scriptures. It may be recalled how SAMUEL WESLEY reproved his wife, Susanna, because she undertook to teach the Bible to a rather large group within her own parsonage. Such an assumption of public scriptural interpretation was not allowed lay people; and while John Wesley did from an early date let his lay preachers preach, he guarded even that grade of the ministry by a preliminary grade or status composed of exhorters, each of whom had to have a note of recommendation, which had to be renewed yearly, from the "assistant" over him.

The class or status of exhorter came across the ocean with Wesley's appointees and became a part of early Methodism on American shores. Licensing of exhorters was a feature of many early Quarterly Conferences. As late as 1938, in the Discipline of the M. E. Church, South, there was a direction that the QUARTERLY CONFERENCE should "take cognizance of all the exhorters in the circuit, station, or mission, and inquire annually into the gifts, labors, usefulness of each by name" (paragraph 102, answer three—Discipline 1938). The same Discipline also provided that the Quarterly Conference should have authority to "license proper persons to exhort and to renew their licenses annually, when, in its judgment, their gifts, grace, and usefulness warrant" (paragraph 215, answer one—Discipline 1938). Much the same regulations existed in the M. E. Church at its last GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1936, when the disciplinary direction was given that "exhorters shall be constituted by the recommendation of the Class of which they are members, or of the leaders' and stewards' meetings of the charge, and a license signed by the pastor."

The duties of an exhorter were: "to hold meetings for prayer and exhortation wherever opportunities afforded, subject to the direction of the pastor. To attend all the sessions of the district and quarterly Conferences and to present a written report to the same. An exhorter shall be subject to annual examination of character in the Quarterly Conference and a renewal of license to be signed by the President thereof" (paragraphs 128-129, Discipline, M. E. Church, 1936).

However, at the union of American Methodism in 1939, the office and duties of the exhorter ceased to appear in the Discipline.

All during the twentieth century, less and less emphasis has been placed upon the office of the exhorter, since those desiring to preach usually sought the license to preach with no preliminary effort to get approval as an exhorter. Indeed, if anyone wished to exhort (or expound the Scripture for that matter), it was not out of keeping with the freedom of the usual Methodist Church, for him—or her—to do so, none gainsaying and many applauding. Thus the exhorter as such was in time bypassed. The Board of Lay Activities within recent years supported a move to have lay speakers formally set apart for public work in the church, and to a certain extent the presently established lay speakers may be said to have taken over the work formerly entrusted to the exhorter. The exhorter is found no longer in the Methodist Discipline.

Disciplines, from 1792 on to 1936.
M. Simpson, Cyclopaedia. 1878.

N. B. H.

EXPERIENCE, CHRISTIAN. Experience, in the Methodist movement from the Wesleys onward, has denoted the primary and decisive inner feeling and awareness that the Spirit of God is actively present within the individual life, and in the midst of the fellowship. The Living Spirit imparts a direct and unmistakable certainty within the soul. The experiencing person has an immediate consciousness of God and of his own relationship with the Divine.

The experience is Christian when the content of the awareness centers upon Christ. Christ's sacrifice is seen as atonement accomplished for man's sin; forgiveness is offered to all; God's saving love embraces every child of the race; justification waits only upon man's response of faith. When man accepts this proffered gift of grace, he receives it. In that moment, he may know with assurance that he is a child of God.

JOHN WESLEY'S personal experience, as revealed in his Journal, tracts, and letters, bears witness to his reliance upon such a divine work in his own heart. His sermons such as "Justification by Faith" and "The Witness of the Spirit" have been normative for the proclamation of experiential salvation in the evangelistic mission of Methodism to the world. A favorite Wesleyan text was, "The spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God" (Romans 8:16). Wesley says: "By 'the testimony of the Spirit' I mean an inward impression on the soul, whereby the Spirit of God immediately and directly witnesses to my spirit that I am a child of God; that 'Jesus Christ hath loved me and given himself for me'; that all my sins are blotted out, and I, even I, am reconciled to God." (Wesley, Standard Sermons, I, 207 f.)

The emphasis upon experience has been basic to Methodist epistemology. Experience is viewed as an essential part of the ground of knowing and knowledge. The primary source of the divine revelation for Wesley was the Bible. He often wrote of himself as homo unius libri (a man of one book). (Standard Sermons, Preface 5.) Yet he insisted that all revelation, being given to men of rational minds, must be received in consciousness and come under the review of reason. "All irrational religion is false religion." Along with scripture and reason, Wesley appealed to experience for verification. Experience he held to be internal evidence directly from God: "An inward impression on the soul whereby the spirit of God immediately and directly witnesses to my spirit." (Cf. "The Witness of the Spirit." Works I, 115, 124-26, 132.) Thus scripture, reason, and experience have been the grounds of authority for Methodism's empirical theology.

Experience is held to be both objective and subjective in content and reference. It does not beget the basic doctrines of incarnation, atonement, the mediatorial work of Christ, and eternal life. These are given as objective fact, the primary and sole work of God. But some doctrines such as conversion, the new birth, assurance, and sanctification arise out of the soul's experiential encounter with God. In the emergence of these insights, both the divine act and man's response are essential. These latter doctrines require experience for their development.

Experience is both individual and social. To the individual, experience brings self-understanding. Man is aware of his being lost from God in sin, and in need of forgiveness. The mighty work of God, which brings release from sin, is found in experience to be efficacious in the individual's own life, and the newness of life which is given brings into awareness the assurance (certainty) that the individual himself is newly alive. However, experience has also its disclosure that the fellowship of faith, the Christian community, is a reality and a responsibility. This awareness serves as a safeguard against a merely individualistic view of salvation. In small groups in the bands and classes, as well as in the larger societies and in the church, experience in the fellowship has brought self-awareness and also clarifying and creative social understanding.

Growth in the Christian life is guided by experience. Experience is instrumental to the Christian's being fruitful in works suitably expressive of the new life which he has received. Wesley recognized the danger of "laying too much stress on outward works which satisfy the Romanists full as well as lustrations did the heathen." But after extensive investigation of quietism and mysticism, he confessed that "alas it was nothing like that religion which Christ lived and taught." The holiness which Wesley sought and insisted upon was neither "works" as a way to heaven without holiness, nor a freedom from the responsibility for being "zealous of good works," which was "the Menace of Antinomianism." Rather he insisted that faith is the handmaid of love. "Love is the end of all the commandments of God." The fruits of love will appear in the Christian's relation to his fellowmen, in generosity, gentleness, courtesy, prudence, frankness, in freedom from jealousy, and in justice, mercy, and compassion. "It constrains him to do all possible good, of every possible kind, to all men." The full scope of responsible discipleship is seen as emerging from the experience of love as the demands of Christian conscience in relation to the Christian's responsible citizenship in the world.

The central emphasis upon experience in the Methodist movement has been maintained in the writings of FLETCHER, WATSON, W. B. POPE, D. D. WHEDON, MINER RAYMOND, T. O. SUMMERS, Bishop RANDOLPH S. FOSTER, JOHN MILEY, Milton S. Terry, H. B. WORKMAN, GEORGE CROFT CELL, JOHN SCOTT LIDGETT, HARRIS FRANKLIN RALL, ALBERT S. KNUDSON, and many others.

In the twentieth century the influence of William James, Rudolph Otto, Henri Bergson, and Nicolai Berdyaev has resulted in studies relating religious experience variously to the volitional, non-rational, and the subliminal elements in man's existence. Recent studies in personality and the dynamics of consciousness have explored the psychological factors which shape personal experience. There are evidences in both psychology and philosophy of interest in the radical primariness of experience, that is the pre-conceptual and pre-symbolical ground out of which consciousness creates meaning.

The Methodist understanding of experience, both in its source and its implications, has emphasized both feeling and conceptualization, and thus points to a middle way between empty conceptualization ungrounded in feeling, and blind emotionalism which refuses rational review.

John Scott Lidgett stated that in Methodism "Emphasis is everywhere laid on the importance of experiential religion, and therefore on conversion, on the possibility of the direct witness of the Spirit of adoption giving the assurance of present salvation, and on the calling to the life of entire sanctification which is brought about by the reign of perfect love in the heart." (Townsend, Workman and Eayrs, II, 421.) This continuing emphasis upon experiential religion has been a major factor in the essential unity of the Methodist movement and the vitality of its evangelistic mission in the world.

A. Raymond George, Communion with God in the New Testament. London: Epworth Press, 1953.

A. C. Outler, John Wesley. 1964.

R. H. Strachan, The Authority of Christian Experience. Nashville: Cokesbury Press, 1931. (This book was officially put in the Course of Study for ministers in the M. E. Church, South.) Milton S. Terry, The New and Living Way. New York: Eaton and Mains, 1902.

Townsend, Workman and Eayrs, New History. 1909.

J. Wesley, Standard Sermons. 1921.

—, Works. 1829-31.

GERALD P. MCCULLOH

F

FACULDADE DE TEOLOGIA, São Paulo, Brazil. The third General Conference of the Methodist Church of Brazil, in February, 1938, created a Theological Seminary, elected its first president (reitor), and chose the city of SÃO PAULO as its location because it was the geographical center of Brazilian Methodism. The first elected president resigned before his inauguration and PAUL E. BUYERS was chosen and served until 1946.

In 1940 the Seminary opened in a rented building; and in the same year, a good property was purchased in Rudge Ramos, a suburb fourteen kilometers from São Paulo. The land measures 630,000 square feet and is on

SEMINARY, RUDGE RAMOS

Via Anchieta, the main highway which connects São Paulo with the seaport of Santos. The early installations consisted of four houses for professors, and part of a two-story building for classes, administration, and library.

A general plan for building was approved in 1956, modern architecture was adopted, and the buildings were designed to serve 350 students. Included were two general dormitories, two for married students, chapel, administration building, library, classroom hall and auditorium, and an apartment to be rented to help in the maintenance of the Seminary.

The Seminary uses admission examinations and other tests for enrollment, and is on the level of a Brazilian university. The Methodist Church of Brazil carries seventy-five percent of the Seminary budget.

The institution succeeded two small local seminaries which were closed in 1938 as it was desired to concentrate support and standards on this Seminary. The presidents (reitores) since Paul E. Buyers in 1946 have been: WALTER H. MOORE, 1946-50; Afonso Romano, 1950-55; NATHANAEI I. DO NASCIMENTO, 1955-63; Isnard Rocha, 1963-66; and Otto Gustavo, 1965-68. The present reitor is Reinhard Brose, a German Methodist (1969).

ALMIR DOS SANTOS

SEMINARY MAIN BUILDING, BUENOS AIRES

FACULTAD EVANGELICA DE TEOLOGIA, Buenos Aires, Argentina, recently merged with the Lutheran Theological Seminary, was a school whose name was usually given in English as Union Theological Seminary. It was an interdenominational school, serving Protestants of the River Plate region and, to an extent, all Latin America.

While the school was interdenominational in its earliest origins, its history embraces the story of Methodist theological education in the River Plate region.

The training of national ministers was a major concern of the first Methodist missionaries to ARGENTINA. As early as 1880 THOMAS B. WOOD wrote about the need for a theological school. Bishop CHARLES H. FOWLER, who visited Argentina in 1885, charged Wood with establishing a school. Wood learned that a Waldensian pastor, Daniel Armand Ugon, had already begun to teach theology (among other subjects) to young people of his church at Colonia, URUGUAY. The Methodist mission then paid a part of Ugon's salary so he could give lessons to Methodist students also. This arrangement worked until Ugon found himself devoting most of his attention to secular subjects for secondary students. This resulted eventually in the first secondary school in the interior of Uruguay.

Wood took up theological instruction in BUENOS AIRES until 1890, when the Board of Missions sent him to PERU to open Methodist work there. By that time the school had fourteen students and was called the Methodist Seminary. C. W. DREES took charge, assisted by W. F. Robinson, who later became director. It became an "itinerant" seminary, as when Robinson was appointed to Mercedes, seventy-five miles away, he took the students with him. Frank D. Tubbs then was director until he returned to the United States in 1897. Then the school was closed, partly for lack of personnel and partly because of controversy over the teaching of "higher criticism."

Then in 1902 Bishop CHARLES C. McCABE assigned S. W. Siberts to reorganize the seminary. He brought it from Mercedes back to Buenos Aires in 1905. Besides instructing regular students, the seminary gave correspondence courses to young pastors. Bishop T. B. NEELY, resident in Buenos Aires, wrote books for use by the students. Siberts died in 1909, and Samuel P. Craver became director. He was succeeded by ERNEST N. BAUMAN, 1911-12, but took charge again and transferred the seminary to MONTEVIDEO, Uruguay, in connection with the American Academy. The seminary came back to Buenos Aires in 1916. Craver died in 1919, being succeeded by C. L. Yoder (1919-21) and C. A. Vannoy of the Disciples of Christ (1922-23)—as cooperation by the Disciples had begun in 1917.

Through the inspiration of Bishop WILLIAM F. OLDHAM, the institution was transformed into what was called "Seminary of Theology and Preparatory School for Christian Workers." Along with ministers, it prepared lay preachers, Sunday school teachers, and deaconesses. This aspect of the work later was assumed by the Instituto Modelo de Obreras Cristianas (Model Institute for Women Christian Workers), an interdenominational school that merged back into the seminary in 1942.

In 1925 the seminary's name was changed to Seminario de Teología Unión Evangélica (Union Evangelical Theological Seminary) under direction of OTTO LIEBNER. About this time (1928) the Waldensian Church had begun to join in both the faculty and student body. The United Presbyterian Church came in in 1947.

In 1927 a new era began with the arrival of B. FOSTER STOCKWELL, who gave strong leadership to theological education throughout South America and raised standards at the seminary. Since 1929 the students have graduated as bachelors and licentiates in theology. The American Association of Theological Schools recognized the Facultad as a graduate school. (Facultad is the Spanish designation of a school at university level.)

One of Stockwell's major concerns was leadership training. In 1939 he called SANTE UBERTO BARBIERI from BRAZIL to teach, and when Stockwell resigned in 1947, Barbieri became director. Within a few months however Barbieri was made a bishop, and Stockwell was recalled, continuing as director until 1960, when he was elected bishop by the LATIN AMERICAN CENTRAL CONFERENCE. Then JOSE MIGUEZ BONINO, one of his former students, became director.

A School of Sacred Music was started in 1962. A former student, Pablo D. Sosa, a graduate of the Westminster Choir School in Princeton, New Jersey, U.S.A., was made head.

The Facultad had the most important Protestant theological library in all the Spanish-speaking world. It included the richest collection to be found in all Latin America of books of the sixteenth century Spanish Reformation. Some of the most distinguished theologians of Europe and North America visited the Facultad to present the annual Carnahan Lectures.

An epochal move came about on Jan. 1, 1971, when the Lutheran Theological Seminary and the Union Theological Seminary, as the Facultad was called, united to become the Instituto Superior Evangélico de Estudios Teológicos (Evangelical Institute of Higher Theological Studies). All academic work since that time has become centered in the buildings of the former Union Theological Seminary, and the ex-Lutheran campus in suburban José C. Paz has been used to provide housing for certain of the professors and certain study sessions. In the combined seminary, Methodists, two Lutheran denominations, the Disciples of Christ, Waldensians, Presbyterians, Anglicans, and the Argentine Reformed Church (Dutch Reformed), all participate.

Facultad Evangelica de Teologia, Prospecto y Plan de Estudio. (Buenos Aires: 1965).

Methodist Overseas Missions, Gazetteer and Statistics. ed., Barbara H. Lewis, p. 254. N. Y.: Board of Missions of The Methodist Church, 1960.

Pampa Breezes, Vol. XXXIX, No. 1, February, 1971. Buenos Aires: Methopress. ADAM F. SOSA

C. V. FAIRBAIRN

FAIRBAIRN, CHARLES V. (1890-), ordained elder of the Kansas Conference and bishop-emeritus of the FREE METHODIST CHURCH, attended the public schools of Ontario. Houghton College in New York conferred upon him the D.D. degree. He was a pastor in the Methodist Church of CANADA, 1913-18, and joined the Free Methodist Church in 1918. He served as a pastor and district superintendent in East Ontario and in Kansas, and was a general conference evangelist when elected bishop in 1939. He is the author of several books, including God's Plan for World Evangelism, What We Believe, and I Call to Remembrance. Bishop and Mrs. Fairbairn live in McPherson, Kan.

BYRON S. LAMSON

FAIRBANKS, CHARLES WARREN (1852-1918), churchman, senator, and vice-president of the United States, was born near Unionville Center, Ohio, May 11, 1852, the son of Loriston M. and Mary A. (Smith) Fairbanks. His parents were Methodists and abolitionists. Educated at OHIO WESLEYAN (A.B., 1872; A.M., 1875), he was later awarded the LL.D. degree by Ohio Wesleyan, BAKER, and NORTHWESTERN. Also, he served as a trustee of Ohio Wesleyan, DEPAUW, and AMERICAN UNIVERSITIES. He married Cornelia Cole. They had four sons and one daughter.

After working for the Associated Press, he studied law at night and was admitted to the bar in OHIO but began his practice in INDIANAPOLIS, Ind., in 1874. A successful railway attorney, his clients were able to pay large fees for his services and in a comparatively short time he became wealthy and famous. Maintaining his office in Indianapolis, his practice reached out over the state and into Ohio and ILLINOIS.

As a Republican he entered local political affairs and at age thirty-six managed the unsuccessful campaign of W. G. Gresham for President. Later he supported Benjamin Harrison, his rival, who in time became President.

A friend of WILLIAM MCKINLEY, Fairbanks was an advocate of the single "gold standard" and was the "key-note" speaker of the Convention that nominated McKinley in 1896. He was elected U.S. Senator from Indiana from 1897 to 1909, but resigned when elected to the Vice-Presidency of the United States in 1904. In the Senate, he was the spokesman of and faithful supporter of President McKinley before and during the Spanish-American War.

Fairbanks and President Theodore Roosevelt, a Progressive-liberal, always had cordial relations. On his trip around the world, 1909-10, the Pope denied Fairbanks an audience when he purposed to address the students of Methodist schools at the American Church in Rome.

He was not cold as some affirmed, but never lost his composure. Bishop E. H. HUGHES wrote: "Fairbanks was kindly, hospitable, companionable and at times finely emotional. As a fraternal delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church, South, he became a persuasive promoter of union." When Senator and Vice-President, he and his wife entered wholeheartedly into the social life of Washington. She was President-general of the Daughters of the American Revolution.

Mrs. Fairbanks died on October 24, 1913, and the Vice-President died on June 4, 1918.

Dictionary of American Biography.

E. H. Hughes, I Was Made A Minister, 1943.
Who's Who in America.

JESSE A. EARL
ALBEA GOBOLD

FAIRCLOUGH, PAUL WYNYARD (1852-1917), New Zealand minister, was born in South AUSTRALIA and came to the West Coast of the South Island in the gold-rush days of the late 1860's. He was converted through a local preacher in Staffordtown, in the Hokitika Circuit, and was accepted for the ministry at 1871 Conference. After theological training, first in NEW ZEALAND and later at Newington College, SYDNEY, he began a ministry which took him into the leading pulpits in the Canterbury and Otago Synodal Districts, including two terms (1899-1904 and 1909-14) at historic Trinity Church, Dunedin.

He was a man of brilliant preaching gifts and wide interests. He gained fame as an astronomer, and was granted a fellowship of the Royal Astronomical Society. For six years he was connexional editor and was an effective advocate of the temperance cause. He was elected president of Conference in 1897, while chairman of the Otago District. He died in active work at Christchurch on April 17, 1917, in the forty-third year of his ministry.

New Zealand Methodist Times, May 12, 1917.

L. R. M. GILMORE

FAIRFAX, VIRGINIA, U.S.A., independent city and county seat of Fairfax County, with a population of 13,585, is located fifteen miles west of WASHINGTON, D. C.

The red brick courthouse, built in 1800, contains the wills of George Washington and his wife, Martha.

Incorporated in 1892, the city had been until the middle of the nineteenth century known as PROVIDENCE. The County of Fairfax is the largest in VIRGINIA, with 401,000 people in 1967. The entire county is an urban or suburban area.

In 1770, after preaching in Georgetown, Maryland (now District of Columbia) ROBERT STRAWBRIDGE and RICHARD OWINGS planted societies in Fairfax County. In 1774 Fairfax Chapel, located ten miles east in the city of Falls Church, was on the Frederick (Maryland) Circuit. Fairfax was one of four circuits listed in the Minutes in Virginia in 1777. That year the Fairfax Circuit, centering on the present Falls Church, Va., and covering all of Northern Virginia, had 330 members.

In the 1790's EZEKIEL COOPER lists the Moss home near the present city of Fairfax as a preaching place.

Around 1822 the Methodists erected their first structure in Providence. Tradition says it was built of logs. A second building, erected around 1843, was destroyed during the Civil War, and was replaced by a structure called Ryland Chapel, named after J. H. Ryland, pastor there in 1840-52. This congregation, affiliated with the M. E. Church, was discontinued in 1902.

The present Fairfax Methodist Church dates from the 1850's, when persons of southern sympathies began a congregation of the M. E. Church, South. A church, which still stands just south of the courthouse, was erected in 1876-79, and was named for Confederate Army Chaplain (later bishop) WILLIAM W. DUNCAN. One of Duncan Chapel's most famous members was the Confederate spy, Antonia Ford. Its best known pastor was COLLINS DENNY, later bishop of the M. E. Church, South.

The Duncan Chapel congregation sold the old frame building in 1956, and moved to its present site, changing the name to Fairfax Church.

In 1970, Fairfax had four Methodist Churches. Fairfax, with property valued at $776,000 and 2,738 members, and St. George's with 315 members and $217,794 worth of property were in the Alexandria District, while Pender, with 469 members and buildings appraised at $272,167 and Bruen Chapel, with $253,000 worth of property and 538 members, were in the Arlington District.

In 1966, Payne Street Church, a Negro congregation of the Central Jurisdiction, merged with St. George's church.

General Minutes, UMC.

Methodist Historyland: A Tour Guide to Methodist Historical Sites in Northern Virginia. Methodist Historical Society of Northern Virginia, 1966.

RAYMOND F. WRENN

FAIRMONT, WEST VIRGINIA, U.S.A., began with the organization of the M. P. Church as a denomination in the year 1829. Eight members formed a class under the leadership of Thomas A. Barns at Barns Mills, now Fairmont.

In 1835 a frame church was built at Middletown, now Fairmont, on a lot donated by Francis Pierpont, the father of Governor F. H. Pierpont. This building was replaced by a two-story brick building in 1851 on the same lot on Quincy Street, and for many years was known as "The Church on the Hill."

In 1897 the congregation entered a new and beautiful church structure on Monroe Street, built during the pastorate of A. E. Fletcher, and until 1939 known as The Methodist Temple. This building was enlarged and beautified in 1925 during the ministry of Thomas LeRoy Hooper, and for many years was known as the most beautiful church structure within the bounds of the M. P. Church. Forty-three ministers served the church as pastor in the first 100 years of its history. A full record of their time and work is in the book, Sketches and Reminiscences of the Methodist Protestant Church in Fairmont, by Thomas C. Miller, state superintendent of schools, 1901-09, and a member of this church.

The new church was, from 1829-1832, a member of the OHIO CONFERENCE, placed on the Monongahela Circuit which embraced territory from Hacker's Creek to Lewis County, W. Va.; but from 1833-42 it was on the Middletown Circuit of the PITTSBURGH CONFERENCE. Membership in the Pittsburgh Conference was continued until 1855, with the charge becoming a station in 1850.

From 1855-62 this church was placed in the Western Virginia Conference. During the troubled years of the Civil War it severed relationship with this conference, and assumed an independent attitude under the title of "The Methodist Church." This independence continued until the Reunion Convention at BALTIMORE, May 1877, when it again entered into full membership of the Pittsburgh Conference.

Since Methodist Union, 1939, this church has been a member of the WEST VIRGINIA CONFERENCE and is known as "The Fairmont Temple Methodist Church." A merger of the Market Street Church with The Temple was effected in 1943. Bishop JOHN CALVIN BROOMFIELD was twice pastor of this church, 1905-1924 and 1937-1939.

In 1970 Fairmont Temple reported 518 members, property valued at $383,600, and $21,067 raised for all purposes.

L. A. Barnes, M. P. Church in West Virginia. 1926.

T. H. Colhouer, Sketches of the Founders. 1880.

Thomas C. Miller, Sketches and Reminiscences of the Methodist Protestant Church in Fairmont. N.p., n.d.

W. G. Smeltzer, Headwaters of the Ohio. 1951.

THOMAS LEROY HOOPER

FAIRPLAY, COLORADO, U.S.A. The Methodist Church in Fairplay, a small community in the COLORADO Rocky Mountains owing its genesis to the early gold mines, is connected with JOHN L. "Father" DYER, the famed "Snowshoe Itinerant." The building was originally a hotel in Montgomery, Colo. In 1867 it was purchased by Dyer, who numbered the logs and with the help of W. F. Warren, dismantled the building, moved the logs to Fairplay, and reassembled them to form a combination church and parsonage. The back room and loft were used for living quarters; the front room became a sanctuary.

The log church was used for only a few years, and was then sold and moved again. In the late 1950's the building was rediscovered by Dr. Lowell B. Swan, who with the aid of Dr. Martin Rist, established its authenticity and was instrumental in having the structure returned to Fairplay and reassembled. There it stands today as a historical site of the Rocky Mountain Annual Conference. Visitors may find it on the edge of "South Park City," a pioneer village maintained by the city of Fairplay. Though no regular worship services are held there, it is the site of pilgrimages and vesper services held occasionally by various groups.

J. L. Dyer, Autobiography. 1890.

Journal of the Rocky Mountain Conference, 1961.

Lowell B. Swan, "A History of Methodism in Colorado, 1863-1876." Unpublished dissertation, Iliff School of Theology, 1951. Together, Denver Area News, October 1960.

WALTER J. BOICEGRAIN

FAITH. One of the characteristic emphases of the Wesleyan message was rediscovery of the nature of true saving faith.

The central theme of our Lord's message was that in His own coming into the world God had brought in the long-promised Kingdom of God, at least in the beginnings of its operation. Therefore man was now to put his whole trust for God's blessing in this wonderful and gracious work, and in Jesus the Christ, the Bringer of it. The divine blessing of forgiveness, acceptance with God, and the operation of the Kingdom are granted to those who, heartbroken and penitent, are aware that they have no ground of standing before God, and who are completely prepared in loving and obedient trust to accept what God will freely give and do. To compress all this Gospel into a single formula, salvation is by faith.

As a background to what Methodism has had to say on this important subject it is necessary to trace in outline the position in the Church between the times of our Lord and the rise of the Evangelical Revival.

Faith in the New Testament Church. A large part of the New Testament is overshadowed to a great or less extent by "the circumcision question," and the accompanying doctrinal issue regarding "justification by faith." The question which faced the great Gentile mission of the Church was a severely practical one. "Was it necessary for Gentile Christians to be circumcised, and to observe the whole Law of Moses as Jewish proselytes? In fact, must Christianity keep to its original position as a spiritually and morally renewed group within Judaism, which looked upon the crucified and risen Jesus of Nazareth as the Messiah?" However, the Pauline party passionately felt that a conservative attitude to this issue dangerously compromised the essential gospel of faith in Christ. It implied that man still had to put himself right with God by conscientious obedience to rules, though the Christian held to a more inward and spiritual interpretation of religion of the Law. On the other hand, real Christianity taught that the sole hope of man was trust in an objective and historic divine saving work, performed by God in His incarnate Son, crucified and risen. And the rule of Christian morality was to be indwelt with the Spirit of the Risen Christ, and to follow His leading. This position was crystallized in a practical formula: "Justification by faith in Christ, and not by the works of the Law" (Galatians ii, 16, etc.). This represents our Lord's message of "free forgiveness of the penitent sinner" rendered into legal phraseology, for "to justify" means "to bring in a verdict of not guilty," "to acquit." When sinful man appears before God's tribunal he is put right with God by faith in Christ.

The effect of this was to affirm that the Christian religion was new as well as old. The Gentile Christians were indeed to look upon the heritage of historic Hebrew religion as their heritage, and the worthies of Jewish faith as their spiritual forefathers. Yet it was not necessary for non-Jews to keep the Jewish ceremonial law. In consequence, the Church slipped away from corporate and institutional union with the Jewish nation. The devotional and ethical spirit of Judaism lived on in a new and free form. However, it is highly significant for what was to happen in the Church of later times that from the beginning there were many Christians who were uneasy about the novel formula "justification by faith and not by the works of the Law," because it seemed to cut the vital link between faith in Christ and the necessary discipline of morality. "Justification by faith and not by works" seemed dangerously to imply that a man could become acceptable to God by professing an experience of union with Christ, but without necessarily living a righteous and disciplined life. This was contrary both to elementary right feeling, and to the words of Christ Himself (Matthew vii:2-13).

It is to be observed that the controversy turns upon what is meant by faith. To St. Paul faith is "the faith that works by love" (Galatians v:6). It is a personal union with Christ in loving and trustful obedience which is the most powerful incentive for moral obedience, from the heart. Yet if faith is interpreted simply as sincere acceptance of the Christian creed "Jesus is Lord," and acknowledgment of Him as Messiah, then those who tremble for the claims of morality and ecclesiastical discipline have some right on their side. This is the position as it occurs in James ii:19. Here it is assumed that "devils," who do not love and obey, can have "faith," i.e. understanding of the truth regarding God, and His Christ. And if faith is in the last resort acknowledgment of an article of belief, then of course it is essential to emphasize that faith by itself is worthless. It must bring forth "good works" (ii:14-17).

Faith in the Ancient Church. The position of early Christianity was that the primitive faith had been transplanted out from behind the shelter of "the hedge of the Law" into the exposed spaces of the Gentile world. The venture was both necessary and perilous. The Hebrew conception of a sovereign personal God is a natural background for the Christian Gospel. If notions about the nature of God are brought in from pagan religion, or from Greek philosophy, the Christian faith may easily be denatured. There was need for a new "hedge" to be built for the Church, of authoritative teaching. Pagan morality could creep in too, and there was need to develop in the Church institutions to enforce moral discipline. Furthermore, disputes about faith and morals endangered the unity of the Church. Therefore authoritative institutional officers were needed also, to keep the faithful together. The development of this new "hedge of the law," of authoritative Scripture-canon and creed, of ruling bishop as father-in-God, and of penitential discipline, was essential. Without it Christianity would have disintegrated. Yet with it, it was easy for Christianity to be represented as a new religion of Law. Faith can become less and less personal trust in, and union with, a personal Saviour. More and more it is obedience to the Christian creed, to moral rules, and even to the Church and her officers.

So by the end of the second century a great and representative Christian teacher like St. Irenaeus can show himself aware of the principles of salvation by the atoning death of Christ, and of union in loving trust with Christ. Yet he more usually speaks of "The Faith" (that is, the Rule of Faith, or body of orthodox doctrine) than of "faith" (Lawson, Biblical Theology of S. Irenaeus, pp. 235-243). Thus throughout the Middle Ages, though there was much personal devotion to Christ among enlightened souls, and much sense that sinful man must trust for his salvation in the grace of God made available in the means of grace, "true faith" is prevailingly "reverent acceptance of the doctrine of the Catholic Church."

And if this be Christian faith, the note of the Epistle of James has constantly to be struck. The Christian, who has first received God's free gift in the grace of Baptism, and who has been brought up to profess the body of sound doctrine, must "work out his own salvation" by using his grace and faith to bring forth the good works of pious Churchmanship and a moral life. To these good works God will graciously attribute religious merit, and finally take the redeemed soul to heaven. There is a constant danger in this system that the Gospel of salvation by faith in Christ will sink to the religion of law: at its best, to upright and high-minded Christianized pharisaism; at its worst, to superstitious trust in ceremonies.

Faith at the Reformation. The renewed emphasis on faith characteristic of this period was set in train by the formative religious experience of Luther. The young monk Luther craved to come to an assurance that God forgave him, looked with favor upon him, and accepted him. He also had enough knowledge of the Christian way to realize that he ought to be obeying God in all things not out of the sense of duty, the fear of punishment, or the hope of reward, but because his heart was filled with the love of God. Yet he was painfully aware that it was not. He therefore applied himself with the most unsparing diligence to the traditional mediaeval discipline of the monastic life, and under the instruction of his monastic superiors also to the study of Scripture, in hope that by using God's gift of grace in these good works he would acquire sufficient religious merit, so that in the end God would bestow this blessing. When he had worked himself into complete frustration God suddenly did for him what he could not do for himself, and brought him to a great experience of spiritual release.

Most significantly, this experience came to him in the reading of Romans i: 17,18. "The just shall live by faith." On account of this experience this text became for him the criterion for the interpretation of all Scripture (see his Preface to the Epistle to the Romans; cf. R. E. Davies, Problem of Authority in the Continental Reformers, London, 1946, pp. 17, 35, 39, 56-7). It was with some justice that Luther regarded himself, as he faced the conventional merit-earning religion of his time, to be in a situation spiritually analogous to that of St. Paul as he faced those who would have enforced the claims of the Jewish Law in the Church. So he extended Paul's concrete proposition, directed to a practical situation, into a general theological principle. In this way "justification by faith and not by the works of the Law" gave rise to "justification by faith alone." And this Luther proclaimed to be the talisman of true Christianity, "the article by which the Church stands or falls."

However, the age-long difficulty in maintaining a clear, balanced, and health-giving conception of saving faith did not cease in the Churches of the Reformation. So in a while circles could be found in which "justification by faith" was interpreted very nearly as "justification by acceptance of Reformation orthodoxy," which is another variety of the error against which the Reformers had protested, namely, that faith is obedience to Roman orthodoxy. And some of those who, in excessive reaction against this error, sought to emphasize Luther's witness that saving faith is not doctrinal orthodoxy or obedience to moral rules, but loving trust in a personal Savior, fell into the opposite error of treating faith as though it were chiefly emotional. So the essential evangelical experience of "finding a gracious God" has been interpreted in some quarters as a matter of interior, individual, subjective feeling.

The Methodist Conception of Faith. The Evangelical Revival was accompanied by a reapprehension of the nature of true saving faith. It is not too much to claim that the teaching of Wesley is a singularly clear and balanced guide in this important matter, though Methodist Churches are not more immune than others from the laws of spiritual deterioration and not all Methodists have succeeded in treading in the steps of the leader whose doctrine they have professed.

In the first place, Wesley came out of a background which gave him a great advantage in coming to a balanced appreciation of the nature of faith. The Church of his upbringing was a Church of the Reformation, committed by her doctrinal standards to the doctrine of "justification by faith." It was to him a familiar and accepted truth, long before he fully appropriated it in personal experience. Yet with this the Church of his upbringing and in particular his own High Church branch of it, was a Christian tradition which most firmly held to the claims of doctrinal orthodoxy, and to the institutional majesty of the historic Church with her continuous and authoritative sacramental ministry. And together with this attachment to the ideals of devotional and ecclesiastical loyalty, he inherited the Puritan tradition of austere personal morality.

Here was a coming together of spiritual qualities which too often have been held apart, the religion of inward renewal by personal trust in Christ, the religion of the Church and sacraments, and the religion of moral duty. To this synthesis was added a clearer personal apprehension of "the faith that works by love" through contact with the Moravians, who in the matter of the necessity and effects of saving faith followed a tradition essentially similar to that of Luther. So when through his religious experience Wesley came to a clear evangelical understanding of faith, he remained throughout splendidly free of any tendency to sit light upon the claims of obedience to moral rules, of fidelity in church going, and of historic doctrinal orthodoxy.

It is significant that Wesley came to "the experience of the heart strangely warmed" when Luther's aforementioned Preface to the Epistle to the Romans was being read, and presumably in the moving passage where Luther is describing the nature of saving faith. In this passage Luther rises above any tendency to play down the claims of the moral law, for faith is described as personal trust in Christ of such a character that it works in the heart of the believer the power of spontaneous morality. "O, it is a living, busy, active, mighty thing, this faith! and so it is impossible for it not to do good works incessantly. It does not ask whether there are good works to do, but before the question rises it has already done them, and is always at the doing of them. He who does not these works is a faithless man."

This inward power of spontaneous morality was exactly what Wesley was looking for. It is indeed true, in so far as we may judge from what Wesley writes, that "the experience of the heart strangely warmed" belongs chiefly and in the last resort to the sphere of emotional release.

Yet it was emphatically not the emotional release of an introspective individualist as he examined the subjective feelings of the heart. Wesley was considering the Church's historic witness to the objective saving work of God in Christ. Nor was it a release into sentimentality, or into an exuberant outburst. The immediate temptation of the man with the heart "strangely warmed" was, "This cannot be faith; for where is the joy?" What came to him was not happiness, but power to pray for his enemies and to overcome his temptations. The change was essentially a moral one. (Journal, May 24, 1738.)

Nothing is more characteristic of the whole of Wesley's writing than the trouble he takes to define saving faith. Always he carries on "a war on two fronts." The first of these campaigns is against the "error of excess" which may dog the steps of ecclesiastical and moral religion. Saving faith is not orthodoxy. It is not fidelity to the Church, or diligence in the devotional life. It is not strict morality, no matter how sincere. Faith is nothing less than personal union with Christ in penitent loving trust. And the second of Wesley's campaigns is against the parallel "error of excess" which may all too easily contaminate evangelical religion. One false emphasis is Quietism, or "stillness": that is, the notion that those who wish to be granted the experience of evangelical faith are not to give themselves diligently to the discipline of the means of grace because this is "salvation by works." They are to desist from church-going, the sacrament, and regular prayer, and wait quietly for God to grant His gift. And the other error is antinomianism, or the notion that the evangelical man is not subject still to the duty of obedience to the moral law. Both these are to Wesley plainly aberrations into excess of the essential evangelical principle, and they are "Satan's masterpieces."

Wesley's master-definition of evangelical saving faith may fittingly be quoted. "It is not barely a speculative, rational thing, a cold, lifeless assent, a train of ideas in the head; but also a disposition of the heart. . . . Christian faith is then, not only an assent to the whole gospel of Christ, but also a full reliance on the blood of Christ; a trust in the merits of His life, death, and resurrection; a recumbency upon Him as our atonement and our life." (Sermon I, Salvation by Faith, i:4.5.)

It is to be noticed that in stating the evangelical position that faith is not merely orthodoxy, or acceptance of the Church's reliable Scriptural witness to the facts regarding God's objective saving work in Christ, Wesley does not go to the extreme of declaring, as some in effect have done: "Faith is not a train of ideas in the head, it is a disposition of the heart." His word always is: "Not barely—but also." To Wesley the indispensable foundation of faith is apprehension of objective fact, a reasoned conviction regarding God's historic saving act performed upon the plane of history, in the incarnation of the divine Son, His life, wonderful works, death, resurrection, and ascension. Thus to Wesley the natural substratum of evangelical faith is Catholic orthodoxy. Nevertheless, this is the substratum only. To become a true believer one must advance from sincere objective assent to full personal subjective response, in affections and moral will as well as intellect. It is necessary not only to acknowledge God's condemnation of sin, but also to repent; not only to see the love of God in Christ, but also to love; not only to be convinced of the sufficiency of His saving work, but also to trust. And this final and vital stage is what man cannot accomplish for himself by trying. This gift of faith is the mysterious work of the Holy Spirit, but a gift which will normally be granted to those who wait upon God for it in diligent prayer and righteousness of life.

This then is Wesley's counsel regarding the way of faith. Regarding the fidelity with which Methodism at large has followed it from that day to this, it may be said that the official doctrinal standards of the Methodist Churches have held firm to Wesley's teaching. Some who have had a superficial grasp only of the call for practical Christian citizenship in the cause of social betterment have been inclined to slur over the necessity of salvation by divine grace, and to represent "the Kingdom of God" as something which man is to construct by social reform. If this happens, the religion of moral law has once again crept in.

However, perhaps a more common failing in apprehension of faith has been in some types of popular evangelical teaching which have shown a tendency for the necessary historical, theological, and ecclesiastical substratum of faith to slip away. "The experience of the heart strangely warmed" has sometimes been preached without sufficient grasp of God's historic revelation and objective work, and the devotional discipline of the Church. One can then be left with the impression that evangelical faith is essentially a state of feeling. The evangelist's appeal then ceases to be the holding up of the historic Christ, so that He may make His appeal to the heart. It too much savours of the approach: "I feel very deeply in my heart, and so I invite you to feel deeply too." One is then in danger of mass-suggestion taking over from Christian worship. Here is another deterioration of the conception of faith, another way in which human "works" can slip in. Folk are left looking not at Christ but at themselves, and trying to stir up their own natural powers to feel in a certain way.

Present Controversy About Faith. The above misrepresentations of faith are still with us, but in the modern theological scene they have sometimes taken on new forms. Thus some have emphasized that the essence of Christian discipleship is loving, sympathetic, and constructive "involvement" in all the affairs of secular society. If it be clearly understood that the purpose of this sympathetic involvement is to win a hearing among those outside the Church for the Gospel of salvation by divine grace in Christ, and to bring men and women to a life of personal and corporate communion with God in Christ, then this approach may be admirable. Yet if it be assumed that the business of the Christian is simply to seek to spread kindness and justice in the world by being kind and just, then clearly here is not more than another variant of the delusive and man-centered religion of law.

Alternatively, some scholars have argued that it does not matter to Christian faith whether the supposed historical facts regarding the saving work of God in Jesus Christ are known, or even that it can be supposed that they did not occur as historical events. All that is necessary is that it should be known that an impression of faith was printed upon the mind of the first Church. "Jesus of History" can be discounted in critical scholarship upon the New Testament, so long as there remains the witness to a "Christ of faith." The leading case in point, though not the only or the isolated case, of this is the argument that the Church received a vivid subjective mental impression that her Lord was triumphant over death, but that there was not necessarily any objective event to accord with or account for this conviction. The narratives in the Gospels concerning Christ's resurrection are stories constructed by the imagination of the early Church to provide vivid symbolism wherewith to express and communicate their "existential" conviction.

It is to be noted that this is another form of the denial of salvation by faith. It is an example of the historic error of self-salvation by human effort creeping in again, for there is no objective saving work of God in Christ in which man can put his trust. There is only an invitation to psychological stimulation through pious autosuggestion. Clearly as is already recognized in the New Testament, evidence for the historical event of the resurrection does not of itself suffice to constrain a man to have faith in the Risen Christ (Luke xvi 31). It is possible to have some degree of knowledge of God's historic saving work without possessing "the faith that works by love." Yet the converse is not true. The faith of personal commitment to Christ, and of union in love with Him, cannot be maintained if the objective historical facts out of which that faith grew can be shown not to be facts. The latter view makes Christian faith to be an inspiring and lovely but subjective figment of the human imagination. It is then within a hair-breadth of being dismissed as a pious superstition.

D. M. Baillie, Faith in God and Its Christian Consummation. Edinburgh, 1927.

M. C. D'Arcy, The Nature of Belief. Dublin, 1931.

F. Gogarten, The Reality of Faith. Philadelphia, 1959.

James Hastings, ed., The Christian Doctrine of Faith. Edinburgh, 1919.

W. H. P. Hatch, The Idea of Faith in Christian Literature. Strasbourg, 1925.

———, The Pauline Idea of Faith. Harvard, 1917.

W. R. Inge, Faith and Its Psychology. London, 1910.

H. R. Mackintosh, The Christian Experience of Forgiveness. London, 1927.

E. D. O'Connor, Faith in the Synoptic Gospels. Notre Dame, 1961.

W. B. Pope, Compendium of Christian Theology. 2nd ed. London, 1880.

O. C. Quick, The Ground of Faith and the Chaos of Thought. London, 1931.

F. R. Tennant, The Nature of Belief. London, 1943.

P. S. Watson, Let God Be God. London, 1947.

R. Watson, Theological Institutes. London, 1832.

J. Wesley, Standard Sermons. 1921.

JOHN LAWSON

FALL RIVER, MASSACHUSETTS, U.S.A., is an industrial city in which a very active Methodism was begun in 1827. The source of Fall River Methodism was in the nearby church at South Somerset. In 1824 Ebenezer Blake, pastor of that church, began to "preach lectures" once a fortnight on week evenings in the village of Troy, as Fall River was then called. His successor continued the services. In June 1826 Charles Virgin and Nathan B. Spaulding were appointed to Somerset. They inaugurated a fortnightly Sunday service at a schoolhouse in Fall River. At the Conference of June 1827, Fall River appeared in the appointments. The First Church was dedicated on Christmas Day of 1827. Subsequently numerous churches were established, including the Brayton Church in 1850, St. Paul's in 1851, North Church in 1852, Quarry Street Church in 1870 and Summerfield Church, now Park United Church in 1875. In 1927 First Church and St. Paul's united to form the present Union Church on Highland Avenue. There are now two Methodist churches in Fall River—Brayton and Union—with a total membership (1970) of 768. Among the outstanding ministers who have served Fall River churches was RALPH S. CUSHMAN, 1911-15, later bishop. When the Union Church was constructed in 1927, Ralph A. Colpitts was minister. RALPH STOODY, later in charge of METHODIST INFORMATION, also served as minister at the Union Church.

R. C. Miller, New England Southern Conference. 1898.

MABEL E. WARING

FARGO, NORTH DAKOTA, U.S.A. First Church is the oldest Methodist congregation in NORTH DAKOTA. It was established in 1874. Early inspiration came from James Gurley, known as Father Gurley, who was stationed at Brainerd, Minn. and covered all of the territory from DULUTH to the eastern MONTANA boundary. In 1873, John Webb was assigned to the North Dakota portion of the Dakota territory, and a Methodist SUNDAY SCHOOL of about twenty members was organized in Fargo. Legal organization as a church was effected on July 20, 1874, and a small frame building was erected on the present site at a cost of $1,200. John Webb became the first pastor.

By 1880 a larger building was needed. This second building was partially destroyed by fire in 1894. Services were then held in the Cass County courtroom until the first unit of the present building was completed in 1897. In 1912 an addition was built, and in 1927 a three-story addition and basement was completed for church school facilities.

John C. Irwin served the Church from 1938-44, during the trying war years. He went from the pulpit of First Church to become Professor of Preaching at GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE. In 1950, under the leadership of C. Maxwell Brown, the building was completely renovated in order to house its present membership of 1,789. One of the oldest church buildings in North Dakota in continuous use, it stands as a stately witness, with beautiful stained glass windows that tell the story of the Christian Faith, and of Methodism.

DAVID F. KNECHT

FARLEY, MINDURT, American layman, who lived in Germantown (now Oldwick), Hunterdon County, N. J. His home is considered to be the first visited by FRANCIS ASBURY in that area. He may have heard Asbury on the latter's tour of the "upper part of the Jersey's," April 17-22, 1773, when he decided to send ABRAHAM WHITWORTH and JOHN KING there. Asbury preached at Farley's in 1782 during the Revolutionary War. In subsequent years, the Farley home was open to the Methodist itinerants, as were others in the region. Asbury stayed at the homes of Tunis Mellick, Major Godfrey Rinehart and Nicholas Egbert, and preached in Mellick's and Farley's barns, as well as in homes, and established a circuit. In fact, a crisis developed in the Reformed Dutch Church over this circumstance, with "Major Rynehart," Mellick and others speaking out in defense of the Methodists.

On Sunday, July 6, 1806, Bishop Asbury preached at Farley's and paid a tribute in his Journal to the family. Asbury also recorded his need for preachers who could preach a foreign language. The next year, HENRY BOEHM'S Discipline of the Methodist Episcopal Church was published in German. Several preachers of German origin from the East Jersey area were soon added.

The Farley family promoted societies in several localities, including New Hermantown (Oldwick), Cokesbury and Fairmount. Mindurt Farley, Jr. had a son, Dr. Francis Asbury Farley, a physician of Hunterdon County.

V. B. Hampton, Newark Conference. 1957.

VERNON B. HAMPTON

FARMER, AARON (1799-1839), American United Brethren preacher and journalist, was born in 1799. Nothing is known of his parentage, birthplace and early history. Apparently converted in 1823, he began the life of a preacher almost at once. He became a member of the Miami Conference, UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST, in 1824. His first charge, "Orange Circuit," covered five sparsely settled counties in INDIANA. Through the fifteen years of his ministry he served as circuit rider and preacher in OHIO, INDIANA, ILLINOIS, TENNESSEE, and MISSOURI. He gave himself heart, soul, mind and strength to the ministry. He was a man of rare power in the pulpit.

Farmer was probably best known as a pioneer journalist. In 1829, under the approval of the Miami Conference, he began the publication at Salem, Ind., of Zion's Advocate. This bimonthly paper was the earliest known periodical published within the United Brethren in Christ. Because of lack of support the paper was discontinued in less than two years.

During the closing years of his life, Farmer was presiding elder over the Indianapolis District in his conference.

He was married and the father of seven children, at least one of whom became a minister. He died on March 1, 1839.

Weekley and Fout, Our Heroes. 1911. ROY D. MILLER

FARMER, THOMAS (1790-1861), British Wesleyan Methodist, manufacturer and merchant, was born at Kennington Common, Surrey, on June 7, 1790. At first intended for a legal career, he abandoned it and entered his father's chemical works. Converted on Sept. 6, 1809, he began to live by rule and became one of the outstanding laymen in Methodism, serving as a Sunday school teacher, class leader, and in many other ways. A lifelong interest in overseas missions began from his friendship with THOMAS COKE. He became a member of the Wesleyan Missionary Society Committee in 1818, and from 1825-60 was its lay treasurer. He was also lay treasurer of the Wesleyan Theological Institution. But his activities were not confined to Methodism. He was, for instance, vice-president of the British and Foreign Bible Society, and a treasurer of the Evangelical Alliance. He died on May 11, 1861.

J. Hannah, The Path of the Just. 1861.

G. J. Stevenson, Methodist Worthies. 1885.

H. MORLEY RATTENBURY

FARMER, WILLIAM BURTON (1872-1938), American preacher and general church executive, was born Nov. 28, 1872, at Bloomington, Ind. He was educated at Indiana University (A.B., 1899) and GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE (B.D., 1901). Later he was awarded the D.D. by both DEPAUW UNIVERSITY and Garrett. On May 1, 1902 he was married to Mary Elizabeth Brown of Bloomington. In 1896 he was admitted to the INDIANA CONFERENCE. He was appointed Executive Secretary of the Preachers Aid Society of the Indiana Conference in 1924, and at the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1928 he was elected Executive Secretary of the Board of Pensions and Relief of the M. E. Church, in which position he remained until the time of his death. He was a delegate to all the General Conferences of the M. E. Church from 1924 to 1936, and served twice as chairman of the Committee on Temporal Economy. He died at Evanston, Ill., on Jan. 12, 1938.

C. F. Price, Who's Who in American Methodism. 1916.

ROBERT S. CHAFFEE

FARNDALE, WILLIAM EDWARD (1881-1966), British Methodist, was born at York in 1881, and entered the PRIMITIVE METHODIST ministry in 1904, training at Hartley College. He served on CIRCUITS in London, Oldham, Chester-le-Street, Birkenhead, and Grimsby, becoming chairman of the Grimsby District in 1933. He was always interested in rural Methodism, and when he was elected president of the Methodist Conference in 1947 he launched a "Back to the Soil Campaign" to restore Methodism in the English countryside. This campaign, however, had to contend with many difficulties, and was not successful. He was Moderator of the FREE CHURCH FEDERAL COUNCIL from 1949 to 1951, and as such was a strong upholder of the Nonconformist tradition. He received an honorary D.D. from the University of Toronto in 1947. He superannuated in 1952, after which he lectured for some years on the staff of CLIFF COLLEGE. He died near Bath on Feb. 4, 1966.

JOHN KENT

FARRAR, DOROTHY HINCKSMAN (1899-), British deaconess, was born in Halifax, April 18, 1899; and educated at the Bedford College for Women, where she graduated in 1925 with a degree from the University of London, earning a Ph.D. degree in 1932. She became a LOCAL PREACHER of the Wesleyan Methodist Church in 1927, and was the president of the Girls' League from 1931-35. Dr. Farrar was appointed vice-president of the Wesley Deaconess College at Ilkley in 1940, and served there until her retirement in 1962. In 1952 she became the second woman appointed vice-president of the Methodist Conference. She has been very active in the work of the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL, especially as vice-president of the associated WORLD FEDERATION OF METHODIST WOMEN from 1956 onward.

FRANK BAKER

FARRAR, JOHN (1802-1884), British Methodist biblical and classical scholar, was born at Alnwick, Northumberland, on July 29, 1802, the son of a Methodist minister. He was educated at WOODHOUSE GROVE SCHOOL and became a Wesleyan itinerant in 1822. He was appointed governor of the Abney House branch of the Theological Institution (see THEOLOGICAL COLLEGES) in 1839, classical tutor at Richmond College in 1842, governor of Woodhouse Grove School in 1858, and governor of Headingley in 1868. He was fourteen times secretary of the CONFERENCE, and PRESIDENT in 1854 and 1870. He compiled A Biblical and Theological Dictionary and An Ecclesiastical Dictionary. He died on November 19, 1884.

F. Cumbers, Richmond College. 1944.
Minutes of Conference, 1885.

G. ERNEST LONG

FARRAR, VERDA NORRENE (1899-), American missionary to BRAZIL, was born at Advance, Mo., on Sept. 20, 1899. She studied at Southeast Missouri State Teachers' College, taught five years, then graduated from SCARRITT COLLEGE in 1926 with an A.B. degree and from Peabody in 1945 with an M.A.

Miss Farrar sailed for Brazil in October 1926, taught three years at the Methodist School at Ribeirão Preto, São Paulo, and was then appointed to COLEGIO IZABELA HENDRIX, in BELO HORIZONTE, Minas Gerais, where she served as teacher and then as principal (reitorã) for ten years. Her administration was one of rapid growth for the institution, several new courses were introduced—commercial, normal, and nursery school. Verda Farrar worked actively in the Methodist Women's Society, and was at various times on the Conference Board of Education. In 1961, near the close of her years in Brazil, a beautiful chapel was built on the campus and named in her honor. This has become a favorite place for weddings, and also serves the English-speaking residents of the city and the community in general.

After retiring in 1961, Miss Farrar returned to the States and served two years at the state college in Cape Girardeau, Mo., and one year at the Mary Elizabeth Inn in SAN FRANCISCO. She was officially retired in January, 1965, and now lives at Cape Girardeau.

EULA K. LONG

FASTING was an important ingredient in early Methodist discipline.

British Methodism. Fasting was practiced weekly by the Oxford Methodists, and from the first it was observed every Friday by the Methodist societies. John Wesley records in his Journal, Aug. 17, 1739, that it was "agreed that all the members of our Society should obey the Church to which we belong by observing all Fridays in the year as days of fasting or abstinence." It is enjoined in the Rules of the United Societies, 1743, and is urged frequently by the Conference, e.g., 1744, 1767, as a means of promoting revival and determining the will of God before making important decisions. The early Methodists observed all the general or national fast days and often had their own special fast days, e.g., for revival at Bristol, Nov. 27, 1757. Wesley deals with the subject in his standard Sermon XXII. In the nineteenth century, quarterly fast days were announced in CIRCUIT PLANS. Wesley always associated prayer with fasting, though there is no evidence that he particularly associated fasting with the Lord's Supper or the season of Lent.

American Methodism. Fasting was similarly enjoined in the Discipline of the M. E. Church as a practice to be repeatedly observed. The Discipline of the M. E. Church, South as late as 1930 continued to contain a direction that a fast was to be observed on the evening before each QUARTERLY CONFERENCE. The directions for receiving ministers into full connection in The Methodist Church in 1964 yet provided: "After solemn fasting and prayer each minister shall be asked before the Conference the following questions"—then came the regular questions originally propounded by Wesley one of which concerns fasting.

However, fasting as a regular discipline has fallen greatly into disuse and the American churches in time dropped from their Disciplines any directions which indicate that fasting is compulsory. They do continue to enjoin and approve fasting in the General Rules, which are now part of the constitutional matter of The United Methodist Church. The word fasting does not appear in the index of the present Discipline.

J. C. BOWMER
N. B. H.

FAULKNER, JOHN ALFRED (1851-1931), American theologian and church historian, was born on July 14, 1851, at Grand Pré, Nova Scotia. He was educated at Acadia College (A.B., 1878; A.M., 1890); DREW THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY (B.D., 1881); Andover Theological Seminary, 1881-82; WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, 1897; the University of Leipzig, 1902-03, and the University of Bonn, 1904. Honorary degrees of D.D. were awarded by Wesleyan University, 1897, and by Acadia College, 1902, and the LL.D. by Pennsylvania College, 1919.

He joined the WYOMING CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church in 1883, and was ordained ELDER in 1887. After filling several pastoral appointments he was named professor of historical theology at Drew Seminary in 1897. He was the first alumnus of that institution to be elected to a professorial chair and this was on the nomination of the bishops of the M. E. Church. In 1916 he became Professor of Church History and held that post until his death.

While a student at Drew, Faulkner contributed several important articles to the tenth and two supplementary volumes of McClintock and Strong's notable Cyclopaedia of Biblical, Theological and Ecclesiastical Literature. Writing for The Christian Advocate (New York), his many contributions were published in every department for forty-seven years. He collaborated with JOHN FLETCHER HURST in the Short History of the Christian Church (1893) and wrote large sections of volume two of Hurst's History of the Christian Church (1897-1900).

In time Faulkner gained a reputation for his contributions to theological and historical studies. He became well known for his work on the Church Fathers, on WESLEY and the evangelical revival, but his most creative efforts were devoted to Reformation figures, particularly Melancthon and Luther. It was the latter who formed the subject of the Levi P. Stone lectures which he delivered at Princeton Theological Seminary in 1923.

Faulkner lived and worked during a period of profound theological change. Early in his career he was grouped among the theological radicals and there was some opposition to his appointment to Drew because of it. Initially he admired and appropriated much of contemporary German theological scholarship. But by the time the results of the higher criticism began seriously to disturb the church and incite attacks on the historic faith, he was to be found more and more among the unmovable defenders and at his death was regarded as theologically ultra-conservative.

Two great purposes dominated Faulkner's ministry—service to the church and search for truth. He wrote for the scholar and specialist, but also for the churchman and layman. Fact and not supposition was what he dealt in, and he said, "Out of history itself there is beheld the great face of God, and the best apology of Christianity is always the language of facts." His style was plain (almost informal), direct, incisive, epigrammatic, and accurate, and pleased editors and readers alike.

Faulkner is best remembered for the following works: The Methodists (1903); Cyprian: the Churchman (1906, 1929); Erasmus: the Scholar (1907, 1933); Wesley as Sociologist, Theologian, Churchman (1918); On the Value of Church History (1920); Modernism and the Christian Faith (1921); Crises in the Early Church (1912, 1922); Miraculous Birth of Our Lord (1924); and Burning Questions in Historic Christianity (1930). He prepared an extensive article on "Methodism" for The New International Encyclopedia (1903), two sections of A New History of Methodism (1909), a definitive article on "Justification" for The International Standard Bible Encyclopedia (1915), and several addresses for the American Society of Church History which were published in the Society's Papers. This work was supplemented by scores of articles and reviews which appeared in various scholarly journals and reviews.

Faulkner died in his home on the Drew campus Sept. 6, 1931.

LAWRENCE O. KLINE

FAYETTEVILLE, ARKANSAS, U.S.A. Central Church began in 1832, three years after the town itself was established, with the meeting of some six or seven families in the home of Lodowick Brodie. Thus, "there are few parishes in the state of Arkansas that are older in continuous service than the Fayetteville Church."

The church was, at first, a charge on the Washington circuit of the MISSOURI CONFERENCE; then in succession the Arkansas Conference was established, in 1836; the Fayetteville circuit was designated in 1842; and the Fayetteville church became a Station Charge in 1857. The church survived the split that separated the Northern and Southern groups, and later the struggle between Union and Confederate forces, when the church building was burned.

The first log and frame church building was put up in 1838 and served until about 1863. Then a brick building was erected in 1872. The third building was constructed in 1899 and, with additions, served for more than fifty years. A complete new plant was begun with a new sanctuary in 1953 and finished with an education building in 1961, the total valuation being $1,250,000.

Central Church supported the establishment of the WESLEY FOUNDATION and student center at the University of Arkansas, and the WESTERN METHODIST ASSEMBLY on Mt. Sequoyah at Fayetteville. It sponsored other churches locally as follows: Parksdale in 1905, Wiggins Memorial in 1941, Trinity in 1959, and Sequoyah in 1966. The church has grown in size and service to a membership in 1970 of 2,114 and an annual budget of more than $180,000.

Robert E. L. Bearden, "The Romance of Arkansas Methodism," Flashback, quarterly publication of the Washington County Historical Society, Vol. VII, No. 2 (March, 1957).

P. C. Fletcher, Seventy-five Years of Fayetteville Methodism. Fayetteville: Review Publishing Co., 1907.

DEANE G. CARTER

FAYETTEVILLE, NORTH CAROLINA, U.S.A. Methodism first appeared in Fayetteville and Cumberland County around 1780 through the evangelistic endeavors of HENRY EVANS, a Negro shoemaker from VIRGINIA and a Methodist local preacher. After some years of persecution, during which he had to preach in outlying areas, the town council recognized his good influence on the slaves; before 1800 he was permitted to put up a crude building to contain his congregation. Increased attendance of white and Negro hearers required an enlarged structure.

Bishop FRANCIS ASBURY first entered Cumberland County in 1783. He visited Fayetteville a number of times beginning in 1788. JAMES JENKINS and NICHOLAS SNETHEN accompanied him on Feb. 6, 1803, and Asbury noted in his Journal the existence of "our own meeting house," though he says that they spoke in the "Presbyterian meeting house"—not a church but the "State house"—the building which had served for a time as the North Carolina Capitol (1789-93). Bishop RICHARD WHATCOAT was with Asbury on Jan. 14, 1805, and they preached in the "African meeting house." On Jan. 10, 1806, he and Joseph Crawford reached Fayetteville and stayed with John Lumsden "near the African church," and the next evening Crawford preached to the "Africans."

A small scattering of Quakers who had been meeting in nearby Bladen County were organized into the Bladen Circuit under the SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church, and Evans' congregation was added to this circuit when his health began to fail about 1806. In 1808 the Fayetteville work was made a separate charge under the supervision of Moses Matthews as presiding elder. Asbury appointed as the first pastor Thomas Mason, later to become denominational BOOK AGENT (1816-24, 1832-40). On Jan. 7, 1810, Asbury "preached in our enlarged house" in Fayetteville. That year 197 Methodists were reported there, and he appointed as pastor WILLIAM CAPERS, later bishop. A few months later Capers had to preach the funeral of Henry Evans. Capers' success in Fayetteville is indicated by Asbury's judgment on a visit there in February 1811, that "our house is too small: . . . we must enlarge our house."

Just when the Negro and white congregations separated is unknown, but the men named as trustees in Evans' will, which left his meeting house to the M. E. Church, were white men later recorded as members of the congregation that came to be known as the Hay Street Church. A building was erected on Hay Street in 1834. It was replaced with the present structure in 1908, and an annex was added to the educational building in 1920.

Asbury and WILLIAM MCKENDREE attended the South Carolina Conference in Fayetteville in January 1814—the first session held in NORTH CAROLINA. Again in 1845 the conference met in Fayetteville, at which the resolution was adopted to unite the conference with the newly formed M. E. Church, South. In 1850 Fayetteville District was transferred to the NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church, South. This conference held its annual sessions in Fayetteville in 1866, 1872, 1887, 1901, 1912, 1925, and November 1939—its last session. This conference met again in Fayetteville, at Hay Street, in 1955. The North Carolina Conference of the Central Jurisdiction met in Fayetteville in 1959. The first session of the North Carolina Conference of The United Methodist Church met on the campus of METHODIST COLLEGE near Fayetteville in 1968.

During the middle of the nineteenth century some Methodist missionary work was done in the communities near Fayetteville, but the Civil War wrought havoc throughout this area. Much church property was destroyed during the invasion led by General W. T. Sherman.

At present, in addition to Hay Street, there are some twenty other United Methodist churches in Fayetteville and its environs, with more than 6,000 members. Hay Street, with 1,474 (1970), is the largest. Both it and the Haymount Church, organized in 1945, have plants valued at over $500,000. The total value of the Fayetteville United Methodist churches is over $2,250,000, with parsonages worth in excess of $480,000. Among the other churches in the area are: Cokesbury, dating from 1830-40; Salem and Bethany, about 1848; Camp Ground, about 1862; Tabor, before 1878; Person Street and Marvin, 1880; Bethabara, 1893-94; Hope Mills, 1902; Calvary, 1904; Gardner's Chapel, 1920; John Wesley, 1923; Johnson Memorial, 1939-40; Dowling's Chapel, 1940; Victory, 1943; Wesley Heights, 1946. Four outstanding missionaries have come from Hay Street Church: Elizabeth Lamb, Seavy Carroll, Linwood Blackburn, and Edward Smith.

Methodist College, founded in 1960, owned and operated by the North Carolina Annual Conference, is located five and one half miles north of Fayetteville; it has over 800 students and property is valued at over $6,000,000.

F. Asbury, Journal and Letters. 1958.

C. Franklin Grill, Methodism in the Upper Cape Fear Valley. Author, 1966.

Journal of the North Carolina Conference.

Elizabeth Lamb, Historical Sketch of Hay Street M. E. Church, South. 1914.

John A. Oates, The Story of Fayetteville. Fayetteville, 1950.

W. M. Wightman, William Capers. 1858.

RALPH HARDEE RIVES

Evans Metropolitan A.M.E. Zion Church is named for HENRY EVANS, the remarkably talented Negro local preacher who brought Methodism to Fayetteville and the surrounding region of North Carolina; and its building stands on the site where about 1796 he put up the first church edifice in this area. The location is in Cross Creek on the west side of Cool Spring Street. From a sawmill across the creek Evans carried timber on his shoulders to construct a weatherboarded, unplastered meetinghouse some fifty feet long by thirty feet wide on a lot he had leased for seven years. The power of his preaching was such that the seats set apart for the white people became inadequate for them, and with the cooperation of both races he was enabled to buy the lot and enlarge the building.

Evans bequeathed the property to the M. E. Church in his will, and after his death in 1810, separate white and black services were held in the building. Eventually the congregations separated entirely; the white group built a church on Hay Street in 1834, while the Negroes continued to use the original meetinghouse. When the Hay Street Church celebrated its centennial in 1934, members of Evans Metropolitan Church participated in a pageant, presented in the city's white high school, to portray the common origin of the two churches in the work of Father Henry Evans.

Toward the end of the Civil War JAMES WALKER HOOD was sent into North Carolina following the advancing Union army as a missionary to the Negroes being freed from slavery. He revived the church in Fayetteville and brought it into the A.M.E. Zion connection. After his election as bishop in 1872 he placed his episcopal residence in Fayetteville and attended services at Evans Chapel, as it was then known, whenever his duties permitted.

Three other A.M.E. Zion churches have grown out of Evans Metropolitan Church: St. John's, Hood's Temple, and Mattocks Memorial.

DAVID H. BRADLEY

FEDERAL COUNCIL OF THE CHURCHES OF CHRIST IN AMERICA, THE, was an organization which from 1908 until its absorption in 1950 in the NATIONAL COUNCIL OF THE CHURCHES OF CHRIST IN THE U.S.A., represented the voice of the major Protestant bodies and some Eastern Orthodox Churches in the United States. In 1949 there were twenty-seven constituent bodies in this Federation, which included the larger Methodist bodies. In fact, its first president was Bishop E. R. HENDRIX of the M. E. Church, South. Other Methodist leaders also served as president. The Council had no authority over the churches to limit their own autonomy. The Federal Council superseded the Evangelical Alliance, organized in America in 1867, influenced by S. S. Schmucker's "Appeal to the American Churches" in 1838 for such a union of denominations. Notable among the official personnel of the Federal Council was the long and efficient service of its general secretary, Samuel McCrea Cavert, 1921-50.

Presidents of the Federal Council were as follows: Bishop E. R. Hendrix, 1908-12; Dean Shailer Matthews, 1912-16; FRANK MASON NORTH, 1916-20; Robert E. Speer, 1920-24; S. PARKES CADMAN, 1924-28; Bishop FRANCIS J. MCCONNELL, 1928-32; Albert W. Beavan, 1932-34; Bishop IVAN LEE HOLT, 1934-36; Edgar DeWitt Jones, 1936-38; George A. Buttrick, 1938-40; Dean Luther A. Weigle, 1940-42; Rt. Henry St. George Tucker, 1942-44; Bishop G. BROMLEY OXNAM, 1944-46; Charles P. Taft, 1946-48; Bishop John S. Stamm, 1948-50.

Vergilius Fern, A Protestant Dictionary. New York: Philosophical Library, 1951.

J. MARVIN RAST

FEEMAN, HARLAN LUTHER (1873-1957), American M. P. minister and educator, was born Jan. 22, 1873, in Champaign, Ill. He completed his high school work in the Preparatory Department of ADRIAN COLLEGE. He taught school for two years and then earned the B.A. degree from Adrian in 1900. Later he attended Oberlin College and DREW UNIVERSITY.

In 1904 Feeman joined the faculty of Adrian College as head of the Department of History and Economics. He also served as president of Adrian Theological Seminary. In 1911 the Seminary was merged with WESTMINSTER THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY and moved to Westminster, Md. Feeman was Chairman of the Biblical and Practical Theology Department of Westminster Theological Seminary until 1917.

Feeman was president of Adrian College, 1917-40. He was named a delegate to the 1928, 1932, and 1936 M. P. General Conferences, and was present at the ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE held in Atlanta in 1931. He represented his church on the joint Hymnal Commission, which produced The Methodist Hymnal of 1934.

For eleven years Feeman was secretary of the College Presidents Association of Michigan Church-Related Colleges, and was president of the Association for two years.

His published writings included: The Kingdom and the Farm, The Nurture of Vitality, The Story of a Noble Devotion, and Francis Asbury's Silver Trumpet.

Harlan Luther Feeman died Nov. 3, 1957, with burial in Oakwood Cemetery, Adrian, Mich.

Journal of the Pittsburgh Conference, 1958.

FRANK W. STEPHENSON

FELDER'S CAMPGROUND, a camp meeting site with tabernacle and "tents" or cottages, located twelve miles northeast of McComb on Topisaw Creek, Pike County, Miss., is one of the oldest camp meetings in the MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE, and one of the few at which services are still held annually. The name and location of the campground varied in the early years. Beginning one mile east of what is now Magnolia in 1810 or 1811, it was moved about 1822 to the east bank of the Bogue Chitto River seven miles from McComb. John Felder (1793-1875), a local preacher and native South Carolinian, was converted at the 1811 camp meeting, and moved to a farm on Topisaw Creek in 1839. The campground was established on his place in 1845, and he later deeded the site to the church. Early names for the campground were: Otoposa (the Indian tribe from which Topisaw Creek took its name), Gatlin, and Topisaw. Since 1940 the official name has been Felder's Campground.

During and after the Civil War camp meetings were held at different times near Magnolia, McComb, and Brookhaven. In 1881 the tabernacle and "tents" were rebuilt on Topisaw Creek, and since that time camp meetings have been conducted there every year in August.

The exact number of the descendants of John Felder and others influential in founding and perpetuating Felder's Campground who have entered the ministry is not known, but certainly the figure runs well into two digits.

The Felder Church adjoining the campground, a station since 1951, is one of the strongest rural congregations in the Mississippi Conference.

J. B. Cain, Tents and Tabernacles, Methodist Camp Meetings in the Mississippi Conference. N.d., n. p. ALBEA GODBOLD

FELLOWS, STEPHEN NORRIS (1830-1908), American minister, educator and historian, was born on May 30, 1830, in North Sandwich, N. H., but he grew up in Dixon, Ill. He was graduated from Indiana Asbury University (DEPAUW) with a B.A. in 1854, and was professor of mathematics and natural science at CORNELL COLLEGE, 1854-1860. He gave strength to the life of this young college. He joined the UPPER IOWA CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church in 1856 and served charges from 1860-67 at Dyersville, Tipton, Lyons, Manchester, Waterloo, Marshalltown, Toledo, Fayette and Grundy Center. In 1867 he was elected professor of didactics at the State University of Iowa, remaining for twenty years. Fellows was a delegate to the ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE in 1891.

He was president of the Iowa State Temperance Alliance and president of the Iowa Anti-Saloon League. He worked in the interest of the Sac and Fox Indians in Iowa and procured federal support for a school for the Indian reservation.

Fellows devoted much time and study to Iowa Methodist history. He was president of the Upper Iowa Conference Historical Society, and in 1907 published History of the Upper Iowa Conference 1856-1906, the fullest account of this conference ever written. He also did historical studies on Cornell College, and published an essay on the decade 1853-1863 in the fiftieth anniversary book. Cornell College awarded him an honorary D.D. in 1871. He died in Iowa City on June 2, 1908.

S. N. Fellows, Upper Iowa Conference. 1907.
Minutes of the Upper Iowa Conference, 1856-1908.

LOUIS A. HASELMAYER

FELLOWSHIP OF THE KINGDOM is an informal but important movement embracing the majority of ministers in the Methodist Church in Great Britain. It began in the period of the First World War and was formally launched in 1919. The dual concern of the members was to explore together more fully the riches of our Christian inheritance (Quest) and to unite in new evangelistic ventures (Crusade). The Fellowship's main continuing activities are local groups throughout British Methodism, studying at each session a specially planned paper or questionnaire, a quarterly Bulletin of news and views, and an annual conference at Swanwick in Derbyshire. The total membership is approximately 3,000, which includes 2,500 ministers in Great Britain, 400 overseas, and 100 students in ministerial training colleges.

DAVID FRANCIS

FELLOWSHIP OF UNITED METHODIST MUSICIANS.
 (See MUSICIANS, FELLOWSHIP OF UNITED METHODIST.)

FENG YU-HSIANG (1880-1948), the "Christian General," was born in Anhui province, CHINA. After schooling in the Peiyang Military School, he entered the army in 1898 and served in it during the imperial, the warlord and the Nationalist periods. As military ruler (warlord) of Shensi and Honan in 1921-22, he gave an excellent administration. In 1925, The North China Herald said of him, "His army is unquestionably the best disciplined and best behaved in China." In national politics, however, he was vacillating and unpredictable. After the Nationalist regime began, he was several times a member of the Kuomintang and as many times expelled from it. In 1948, on a visit to Russia, he was killed in a fire of mysterious origin on a ship in the Black Sea.

He was converted and joined the Methodist Church in 1913, and especially in the '20's was eager to evangelize all the troops under his command. Missionary George Davis and a group of Christian workers visited his camp in 1923 and held special meetings for the soldiers. Davis reports that at the end 3,719 men were baptized and taken into the church. Such mass baptisms occurred several times, leading Time magazine in its obituary of him to suggest that he baptized his troops with a garden hose!

In 1926 he married Li Te-ch'uan, a YWCA secretary who has stayed on in China and is now an official in the Communist government.

After 1927, he never had the free hand he enjoyed in the warlord days, but in those days his administration was marked by an emphasis on universal education, on raising the living conditions of women, and on the development of China's resources.

International Who's Who, 1945-46.

W. N. Lacy, China, 1948.

Webster's Biographical Dictionary, 1960. FRANCIS P. JONES

FERENS, THOMAS ROBINSON (1847-1930), British Wesleyan Methodist industrialist, was born at New Shildon, County Durham, on May 4, 1847, but moved to HULL, Yorkshire, early in his life and became a leading citizen. He made many gifts to the city, and the foundation of the University College of Hull was largely due to his munificence. From 1906-18 he was Liberal M.P. for East Hull, and in 1912 was made a privy councillor. A keen temperance and Sunday school worker, he was for many years a member of the CONFERENCE, and served as treasurer of the HOME MISSION DEPARTMENT and the WESLEY DEACONESS Institute. The endowment of a chair at Wesley College, Leeds (see Theological Colleges), and many large gifts to Methodist schools showed his lifelong interest in education. He died on May 9, 1930.

H. MORLEY RATTENBURY

FERGUSON, GEORGE (1786-1851), Canadian minister, was born in Caraloon, Londonderry County, Ireland, April 1, 1786. At an early age he was virtually deserted by his family. He enlisted in 1809. As many other soldiers, he was converted and, when his duties permitted, preached to Methodist congregations in England and Ireland.

In 1812, Ferguson came to America with the army and took part in the campaigns of the War of 1812-14. Meanwhile, he developed new Methodist contacts, especially with HENRY RYAN, who induced him to resume preaching. Fortunately, in 1816, Ferguson was discharged from the army and in the same year was taken on trial by the GENESEE CONFERENCE.

From 1816 until he became fully superannuated in 1843, he labored unremittently and sacrificially at his task. He deserves to be remembered as one who epitomized the characteristic qualities of the early Canadian itinerancy. Always poor and burdened with heavy responsibilities, he sought to improve his mind, and thus to become a more useful minister. His preaching was characterized by great simplicity and enthusiasm, and he was careful to nurture the spiritual and moral growth of the societies under his care. The essence of his message was the attainment of holiness and the avoidance of worldly extremes. His journal ends: "I am much humbled in retracing God's mercy and grace to me, an unworthy worm."

Ferguson died in peace in Trafalgar township, Canada West, Jan. 1, 1851.

J. Carroll, Case and His Cotemporaries. 1867-77.

Journal of the Rev. George Ferguson, ms. copy, United Church Archives.

G. S. FRENCH

FERGUSON, J. K. (1901-), E.U.B. minister in SIERRA LEONE, West Africa, was born March 8, 1901. He married Sarah Elizabeth Cole on Nov. 29, 1928. She died April 23, 1967.

Mr. Ferguson received his first license from the Sierra Leone Conference, CHURCH OF THE UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST, in January, 1923, and was ordained by the same conference, Jan. 13, 1929.

He has served pastorates in Roruks, Yonibana, and Moyamba, covering more than forty years. Part of this time he served as district superintendent and senior conference superintendent. Since 1955, he has been the conference treasurer.

JOHN H. NESS, JR.

FERGUSON, JOHN CALVIN (1866-1945), China missionary, scholar and statesman, was born in Ontario. He studied in BOSTON UNIVERSITY, where he received his B.A. degree in 1886, Ph.D. in 1902, and LL.D. in 1939. The UNIVERSITY OF SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA also granted him an LL.D.

He went to CHINA under the Methodist Missionary Society in 1887, and at the age of twenty-two was appointed by Bishop FOWLER to be president of non-existent Nanking University. He was able to begin classes in his own residence the following year, and by 1897 when he resigned, a modern university had come into being.

By this time Ferguson's administrative talents had become known, and he was called to organize and develop Nanyang University in Shanghai, an institution which has since achieved a notable career under the name of Chiao'ung University. In 1902, he left the academic world to enter political life, and became the trusted advisor of the Imperial government, then after 1915 of the Peking government in the warlord days, and after 1927 of CHIANG KAI-SHEK and the Nanking government. He headed the Red Cross in China, and raised nearly a million dollars for famine relief in 1910-11. The Chinese government sent him to Washington at least seven times as its representative. He managed a Chinese daily the Sing Wan Pao, for thirty years (1899-1929), and was the editor, first of the Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society (1902-11) and then of The China Journal of Science and Art (1923-30). His talents were also recognized at home, and he was a member of the board of trustees of Boston University from 1918.

His special field of interest was Chinese art. He gathered an immensely valuable collection, which he gave to the University of Nanking in 1936. Most of his writings are in this field and include: Outlines of Chinese Art; Chinese Mythology; Chinese Paintings; Survey of Chinese Art; Catalogue of Recorded Paintings (in Chinese); Porcelains of Successive Dynasties; Catalogue of Recorded Bronze.

In 1945, he died in Clifton Springs, N. Y., twenty-six months after repatriation from a Japanese internment camp in Peking.

W. N. Lacy, China, 1948.

MacGillivray, Century of Protestant Missions in China. Shanghai, 1907.

Who Was Who in America.

FRANCIS P. JONES

FERNANDEZ, SARA ESTELLE (1909-1972), American missionary to CUBA and COSTA RICA, was born in Tampa, Fla., Jan. 10, 1909. She attended WESLEYAN COLLEGE, Macon, Ga., 1927-29 and went to Cuba as contract teacher in COLEGIO PINSON, 1929. Returning to the States, she completed her education at George Peabody College and SCARBITT COLLEGE, Nashville, Tenn.

After serving for several years in kindergarten work under the M. E. South Board of Missions, she returned to Cuba, 1940-63. The Board of Missions would not permit her return to Cuba for health reasons, and she accepted appointment in pastoral work in Hatillo, Costa Rica.

Her work in Cuba was of a very unique nature. Appointed to only one congregation, in Omaja, Oriente, when she left that land she was serving twenty-two different congregations, and was the last of all the American missionaries to leave Cuba. Having had training as a nurse, she organized a clinic for the poor and when medical aid was unavailable locally she would take her patients forty miles away to Holguin. When and if revolution in Cuba made automobile travel impossible, she would ride horseback this distance by back roads to get medicines.

She died in Miami, Fla., in May 1972.

GARFIELD EVANS

FERNANDO PO is a small island, twenty miles off the Cameroon coast in central west Africa. It is rugged and mountainous, the highest peak reaching 9,500 feet. It has an area of 800 square miles and population of 47,000, consisting of the indigenous Bubi, the Fernandinos, descendants of liberated slaves, and many immigrants from the mainland, chiefly Ibo, but also Efik and people from Rio Muni.

Fernando Po's first contact with European influence came with a Portuguese explorer. Portugal ceded it to Spain in 1778, and the British had control from 1827 to 1844. Spain held sovereignty from 1844 to 1968, administering it with several nearby smaller islands and the mainland enclave, Rio Muni, directly south of Cameroon, which now form the independent republic of Equatorial Guinea.

In 1870, Primitive Methodist British seamen discovered a leaderless Protestant community of 200. A British Baptist missionary, Alfred Saker, had been forced to leave in 1858 because of Catholic government pressure. British Methodism took charge and has maintained the Protestant foothold. Governmental restrictions circumscribe the work, but a strong element is established. In 1968 the circuit had 500 members, conducted several preaching places, and is part of the Calabar District of the Methodist Church, NIGERIA.

G. Bell, Our Fernandian Field. London: Primitive Methodist Missionary Society, n.d.

N. Boocock, Our Fernandian Missions. London, W. A. Hammond, n.d.

C. Fernandez, Misiones y misioneros en la Guinea Espanola, 1883-1912. Madrid: Cocusa, 1962.

Findlay and Holdsworth, Wesleyan Meth. Miss. Soc. 1921.

H. Roe, Fernando Po Mission. London: Stock, 1882.

ARTHUR BRUCE MOSS

FERNLEY-HARTLEY LECTURE is delivered at the British Methodist Conference each July, the lecturer being selected by the trustees. The present foundation combines the former Fernley and Hartley Lecture Trusts. John D. Fernley, a Wesleyan Methodist businessman in Manchester, founded his lecture in 1869, with the design that a theological lecture should be delivered by a student who had so far had no chance of making his work public. Sir WILLIAM P. HARTLEY, Primitive Methodist, founded his lecture in 1896, and was concerned with either sociological or theological questions. The two trusts were combined at the time of Methodist Union. Outstanding Fernley Lectures include: The Person of Christ, W. B. POPE; The Spiritual Principle of the Atonement, J. SCOTT LIDGETT; and The Christian Conscience, W. T. DAVISON. Leading Hartley Lectures include WILLIAM YOUNGER'S International Value of Christian Ethics and E. W. SMITH'S Golden Stool. Among Fernley-Hartley Lectures, R. NEWTON FLEW'S Jesus and His Church; and The Atonement in

New Testament Teaching, by VINCENT TAYLOR, would be accounted the most valuable.

FRANK H. CUMBERS

FERREIRA, ALVARO DE MORAS (1878-1942), Brazilian lay preacher, was born on Jan. 28, 1878, on the São Lourenço plantation, Cantagalo, state of RIO DE JANEIRO. In 1903 he married Elvira Ribeiro, by whom he had fourteen children. He was converted in 1904 and baptized in December of that year by John M. Kyle in the Presbyterian Church of Nova Friburgo.

In April, 1929, after moving with his family to JUIZ DE FORA, state of Minas Gerais, he transferred to the Methodist Church, working faithfully until moving to his plantation in Ourinhos in the interior of the state of SÃO PAULO. For two years (1930-32), for reasons not given, he became inactive and very cool toward the church. But in May, 1933, during a revival held by George Ridout of the United States, Ferreira had a new and glorious spiritual experience of God's grace and love. He decided to dedicate himself, body and soul, to the Lord's work, turning over his earthly business interests to his oldest son. He accepted responsibilities in the local church at Ourinhos, became superintendent of the Sunday school, president of the board of stewards, and occupied the pulpit. He was called on frequently to hold services in other churches.

Ferreira often had Catholic priests as guests in his plantation home. One such, Giacomo Milazzo, was invited to share in family worship after the evening meal. He did so and became deeply interested in the evangelical faith, abandoned the priesthood, and later became a Methodist preacher.

In September, 1942, Ferreira was called to Londrina, state of Paraná, to help solve a serious problem that had arisen in the Methodist church there. On his return, he became very ill, and died at his plantation on Sept. 12, 1942.

JENNY MORAES FERREIRA DE SÁ

FERRER, CORNELIO M. (1908-), bishop of the United Methodist Church in the PHILIPPINES, was born Sept. 16, 1908, in Lingayen, Penguasinan, Philippines. He was educated at Union College, MANILA (B.A., 1937), and DREW UNIVERSITY (M.A., 1948), and Union Theological Seminary, Philippines (B.D., 1951). He married Emilia V. Rosario.

Ferrer began his career as a rural pastor in 1930. He served as district superintendent, 1940-46, and was a delegate to GENERAL CONFERENCE in 1946. He was Dean of Instruction and Professor of Sociology at Dagupan Memorial College, Philippines, 1948-50, and following that time served as director of the Department of Rural Life and Community Development, Philippine Federation of Christian Churches, and executive director of the Commission on Social Welfare and Social Education, National Council of Churches in the Philippines, 1960-68. He was also correspondent of The Christian Century in the Philippines, and executive editor of the Philippine Christian Advocate.

During the early years of technical assistance, he was consultant to the International Cooperation Administration, Philippines; helped to found the Philippine Sociological Society; a member of the Philippine National Social

CORNELIO FERRER

Science Council; taught on the faculty of Union Theological Seminary, 1957-61; received the Golden Award of that institution as its most distinguished alumnus in rural life and public welfare, 1961; and received the Certificate of Recognition for Distinguished Service from the Agricultural Missions, Inc., in recognition of thirty-three years of Christian leadership in rural life movement of the Philippines.

Ferrer became a member of the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL in 1956. He was also a member of the Board of Missions, Philippine Central Conference; the Board of Trustees, Mary Johnston Hospital, Manila, 1950-53; Board of Directors of the Economic Security Division, Philippine Youth Welfare Coordinating Council since 1962; chief of Protestant Chaplains during the Tenth World Boy Scout Jamboree in the Philippines in 1959, and received a Certificate of Merit from President Carlos P. Garcia of the Philippines for his work then.

He is considered an authority on the history and development of rural church work in both the Philippines and the United States.

The Philippine Central Conference elected him bishop on Nov. 28, 1968, and he was assigned to the Manila Area.

N. B. H.

FERRERI, CARLO MARIA (1878-1942), an Italian Methodist leader, was born in Milan, ITALY, on Sept. 26, 1878. He was the son of a ministerial family, and began to study at the age of eighteen for the ministry. However, his first Christian service was with the Young Men's Christian Association. As National Secretary (1902-09) he had wide ecumenical, administrative, linguistic and travel experiences in the best years of the movement. In 1909 he joined the ministry of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Italy, and until 1914 directed their publishing house, "La Speranza." Appointed superintendent of the Southern District in 1914, he served also as a military chaplain. Pastor at Rome (1920-22), he then was superintendent of the Central District. When the single Italy District was created in 1926, he became the first Superintendent, and remained directing the work until his death. These were years of exceptional difficulty due to Fascism, the withdrawal of the British Foreign Missionary work from the Italian field, and then the second World War. After 1936 the Chiesa Metodista Episcopale d'Italia had to begin to organize itself in complete independence. The new church elected him as its superintendent, but he died following a street accident on Sept. 22, 1942. He is remembered for his courage and undaunted leadership, and for high qualities of heart and mind.

CARLO MARIA FERRERI

ALFREDO SCORSONELLI

FERRUM JUNIOR COLLEGE, Ferrum, Virginia, was founded in 1913 by the Woman's Missionary Society and the Board of Missions of the VIRGINIA ANNUAL CONFERENCE to serve as an elementary and high school for southwestern VIRGINIA. As public educational facilities became available, the elementary division was closed, and in 1955 the high school department was discontinued, so that the educational program could be concentrated in the junior college work started in 1928.

In 1953 the college enrolled 118 students; 10 years later the enrollment exceeded 1,000. The institution continues its emphasis on the missionary aspect of its work and provides educational opportunities through a comprehensive program of financial aid including self-help. The governing board has forty-three members, nominated by the Board of Education, Board of Missions, and Women's Society of Christian Service of the Virginia Annual Conference and by the board itself. Nominations are approved by the Virginia Conference.

JOHN E. GROSS

FETTER LANE SOCIETY. The religious society founded by JOHN WESLEY and PETER BÖHLER in the London home of JAMES HUTTON, May 1, 1738, which later moved to Fetter Lane. After Wesley's withdrawal to the FOUNDERY, this became Moravian. (See LONDON, Fetter Lane.)

FRANK BAKER

FEW, IGNATIUS ALPHONSO (1791-1845), American scholar, lawyer, church leader and first president of Emory College (now EMORY UNIVERSITY) in GEORGIA, was born at Columbia County, Ga., in April, 1791. His father was a soldier in the Revolutionary War and at its close became judge and senator in Congress, and was a delegate to the convention which framed the Constitution of the United States. Ignatius Few was educated at Bergen, N. J., Princeton, and in New York. Then returning to Georgia he studied law. When the War of 1812 broke out, he was appointed colonel of a regiment; subsequently he engaged in the practice of law, but was attacked with a severe hemorrhage of the lungs. In 1827 he was converted and joined the M. E. Church. Feeling called to preach, he entered the SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE in 1828 and filled appointments there for two years, when he transferred to Georgia. In a short time he was superannuated, but became greatly interested in projecting a college for the Methodists of his state, to offset somewhat the appeal of the RANDOLPH-MACON COLLEGE president in VIRGINIA who was soliciting support for his institution.

Few gathered support for his idea of a Georgia college. He obtained a charter and the consent of the Conference, and a college town was laid out in the woods near Covington and named Oxford, for the university of the founder of Methodism. The college was named for Bishop JOHN EMORY.

Few served as the first president of Emory College, giving way in 1840 to AUGUSTUS BALDWIN LONGSTREET. Few was a member of the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1840 and sponsored a resolution which was passed by a large majority holding that in a church trial it was "inexpedient and unjustifiable for any preacher . . . to permit colored persons to give testimony against white persons, in any State where they are denied that privilege in trials at law" (History of American Methodism, Vol. III, p. 18). Few does not seem to have been a member of the 1844 General Conference, which divided the Church, but his last public act was drawing up a report on the division of the M. E. Church which had just taken place, and this report was adopted by the GEORGIA CONFERENCE in 1845. The excitement connected with his work brought on a severe hemorrhage from which he never fully recovered. He died at Athens, Ga., on Nov. 21, 1845.

Ignatius Few was a man of brilliant intellect, extensive culture and deep piety and is remembered gratefully in the traditions of the college which he founded.

Atlanta Journal, March 27, 1967.

E. S. Bucke, History of American Methodism. 1964.

T. H. English, Emory University. 1966.

M. Simpson, Cyclopaedia. 1878.

N. B. H.

FEW, WILLIAM PRESTON (1867-1940), American educator, was born at Sandy Flat, S. C., on Dec. 29, 1867 and died at Durham, N. C., on Oct. 16, 1940. On Aug. 17, 1911 he was married to Miss Mary Reamey Thomas of Martinsville, Va. Five sons were born into this home.

Few graduated from WOFFORD COLLEGE in 1889. After several years of preparatory teaching in SOUTH CAROLINA, he entered Harvard University and was awarded the Ph.D. degree in 1896.

Few was a professor at Trinity College (now DUKE UNIVERSITY), 1896-1940, holding the following positions: professor of English, 1896-1910; dean, 1902-1910; president of Trinity College, 1910-1924; president of Duke University, 1924-1940.

W. P. FEW

At Trinity College and Duke University Few upheld high academic standards and championed academic freedom. He was the author of the Charter of Academic Freedom adopted by the Board of Trustees in 1903. He believed in the union of religion and education, holding as he said, that religion and education were "not two but one and inseparable: religion that comprehends the whole of life, and education that seeks to liberate all the powers and develop all the capacities of our human nature."

Few guided the transformation of Trinity College, a small southern college, into Duke University, an international university. From 1924 to 1940, Few brought together the forces loyal to a comparatively small church school, and the men and agencies necessary for the proper support and functioning of a university devoted to the search for the truth both in the spiritual and in the intellectual realm.

Few was a loyal Methodist, a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCES (MES) from 1914 to 1940, and a member of the Board of Lay Activities and of the Sunday School Board. He served on the Unification Commission that prepared the PLAN OF UNION of the three branches of American Methodism in 1939. He was for many years the lay leader of the NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE.

PAUL N. GARBER

FIELD BIBLE is a Bible printed by John Field of London. In 1766 JOHN WESLEY acquired a pocket-size (24 mo) Field Bible dated 1653 and is said to have used it when preaching in the open air. In 1788 he gave it to HENRY MOORE, who bequeathed it to "the President for the time being." Since then (1844) it has been the insignia of office of the president of the British Methodist Conference, to whom it is handed by the retiring president at the opening session of the Conference.

In his Journal for Sept. 8, 1782, Wesley notes, not quite accurately, how one may "distinguish a genuine small Field's Bible from a spurious one." The genuine, he says, reads, "Ye can serve God and Mammon." In the Bible itself a flyleaf notation in Wesley's hand gives the correct information, that it is the word "God" rather than "not" which Field has omitted.

Proceedings of Wesley Historical Society, xiii, 121; xxiv, 13, 126; xxv, 15, 46.

J. C. BOWMER

FIELD PREACHING. (See PREACHING AND ITS IMPORT; also WESLEY, JOHN; and WHITEFIELD, GEORGE.)

FIELDBRAVE, JOSEPH (c.1825-1868) and ISAAC (1848-c.1908), father and son, were early Indian ministers in the M. E. Church, NORTH INDIA CONFERENCE. Joseph was born in Sardhana, and during the Sepoy Rebellion he was employed in the police force. Earlier he had worked with another mission which had been discontinued. WILLIAM BUTLER employed him and appointed him assistant to JAMES L. HUMPHREY at Bareilly. Joseph Fieldbrave and Humphrey engaged frequently in street preaching. He died on July 20, 1868 at LUCKNOW, the first death among Indian ministers of the North India Conference. His associates described him as a powerful preacher, a man of child-like simplicity and love, always ready and one who loved to preach.

Isaac was the first son of a Methodist preacher to join the ministry. Born in Delhi in 1848, he was nine years old when his father joined the Methodists. He was admitted to the North India Annual Conference on trial in 1874, and served as pastor successively in Lucknow, Moradabad, and Kanpur. He wrote many hymns, some translations from English and some originals, some on the pattern of Western hymns, some on the order of Moslem ghazals, some like Hindu bhajans. In the Git-ki-kitab (Urdu-Hindi hymnbook), there are more hymns written or translated by Isaac Fieldbrave than by any other person. Of him it was said, "His language was choice; his style pleasing, his voice musical, and his numerous illustrations well-chosen." In 1888 Isaac transferred to the American Presbyterian Mission to promote their Christian literature program. In 1881 he was elected as the first Indian member of the CENTRAL CONFERENCE OF SOUTHERN ASIA.

B. H. Badley, Unpublished Biographies of Indian Preachers. J. L. Humphrey, Twenty-one Years in India. pp. 106-7. N. Y.: Eaton & Mains, 1905.

Minutes of the India Mission Conference, 1869, p. 52.

J. WASKOM PICKETT

FIFER, ORIENT WESLEY (1868-1947), American preacher and editor, was born May 4, 1868 in Mendon, Ill. Later he moved with his family to LINCOLN, Neb., where he became a railroad clerk and a newspaper reporter. He was graduated from the University of Nebraska and attended GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE. After a term as Superintendent of the Indianapolis District of the INDIANA CONFERENCE and thirty-six years in pastorates, he was made editor of the Western Christian Advocate at CINCINNATI, 1932-40. He was a delegate to several GENERAL CONFERENCES, first in 1912, and was the chairman of the powerful Committee on Episcopacy more than once. He died on Sept. 18, 1947 at the Methodist Hospital in INDIANAPOLIS.

C. F. Price, Who's Who in American Methodism. 1916.

ROBERT S. CHAFEE

THEOLOGICAL SCHOOL CHAPEL, SUVA

FIJI. The colony of Fiji in reality has something like 500 islands situated in the southwestern Pacific Ocean about 1,960 miles from SYDNEY, AUSTRALIA. Viti Levu with 4,109 square miles, and Vanua Levu with 2,242 square miles are the largest of the islands. Rotuma, eighteen square miles and about 400 miles to the north, is a dependency of Fiji.

In 1874 the Fijian chiefs offered to cede their land to the British, and Fiji was proclaimed a possession and dependency of the British Crown. When Indians came in to work the sugar plantations, this led to important social and economic changes. During the Second World War, these islands were of importance as air and naval stations between the U.S.A. and Hawaii to Australia and NEW ZEALAND.

Australian Methodism has long considered Fiji an important part of its overseas missions. In 1835 pioneer missionaries, WILLIAM CROSS and DAVID CARGILL, then working in TONGA under the British METHODIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY, went across to take the Christian message to the people of Fiji. They were helped by several Fijian Christians living in Tonga, one of whom returned to Fiji with them. Three years later Cross and Cargill were joined by JOHN HUNT, and through the work and witness of these men the church in Fiji was established.

Responsibility for the work in Fiji was accepted by the Australasian Wesleyan Methodist Connexion when it was established in 1854, and this continued until July 11, 1964, when the independent Fijian Conference was inaugurated under the leadership of Setareki Tuilovoni. This is an autonomous conference within the Methodist Church of Australasia and has combined the Fijian and Indian work which was previously entirely separated.

The Christian Gospel brought to an end many of the cruel customs of Fijian life and today we find a Christian community in almost every village of Fiji. The church has many well-trained Fijian ministers and is a real force in Fijian life. As early as 1875 this young church sent its first missionary teachers to help establish the church in NEW GUINEA. Eight of the first nine volunteers to go to New Guinea died there.

Between 1879 and 1919, by agreement with the British Government, indentured laborers were brought into the Colony to work on the sugar plantations. The number of laborers brought in under this system, together with a large number of Indian migrants, has meant that today Indians outnumber Fijians. In 1879 missionary work was begun among the Indian community by Miss Hannah Dudley, and today there is a strong Indian church with good indigenous leadership.

There have been many instances of racial tension in the colony during recent years, and the Christian church is conscious of her responsibility for reconciliation of the two communities. The amalgamation of Fijian and Indian work in the new Fijian Conference is helping the two communities to think and act together.

Teacher training and indeed almost all educational work in Fiji was pioneered by the Methodist Church, but control was taken over by the Government around 1946. The church still maintains and administers many good integrated primary and secondary schools.

Institutions include: Ba Hospital for Indian Women, a small hut good hospital with a training school for nurses on the western side of the island of Viti Levu; Davuilevu Theological Institution for the training of ministers, mainly Fijian, although several Indian ministers began their training here; Dilkusha Girls' Home established during the influenza epidemic in 1919 has been a real home for many orphaned and deserted Indian girls; and Navuso Agricultural College, which was commenced in 1924 and is now the largest of its kind in the South Pacific. It provides a four-year course for some 250 students from many South Pacific countries as well as Fiji. The advanced course is fully financed by funds from Britain.

G. C. Henderson, Journal of Thomas Williams, Missionary in Fiji, 1840-1853. Sydney: Angus and Robertson, 1931.

MRS. ALLEN LOY

FINCH, SUPERIAN B. (d. 1945), was a highly respected Indian minister, versatile and effective in service, humble in spirit and much loved by members and colleagues. Of his early life nothing is known except that God lifted him from the lowest level of society and gave him the high honor of being a Methodist minister.

He was a student in the Lodhipur Boys' School, and after completing the seventh or eight grade, he was employed to teach there. He obtained a local preacher's license; and after finishing the course of study, he was appointed preacher-in-charge of the Faridpur Circuit in the BAREILLY District. He served as pastor in three central churches and then as superintendent of two districts, Hardoi in North India and Rae Bareli in LUCKNOW. Then he went to the pastorate of the Lucknow Central Church.

Despite his limited education, he served effectively the exacting membership of that church, with many university graduates and students from two colleges. One son, a man of high academic qualifications with degrees from schools in INDIA and America, is principal of the Baldwin Boys High School in Bangalore.

Kaukab-i-Hind, various issues.

Minutes of the North India and Lucknow Conferences.

J. WASKOM PICKETT

FINDLAY, GEORGE GILLANDERS (1849-1919), British Methodist scholar, was born at Welshpool on Jan. 3, 1849. He was a pupil at Wesley College, SHEFFIELD, 1865-67; he entered the Wesleyan ministry in 1870, serving as assistant tutor at Headingley College, Leeds, 1870-74. (See THEOLOGICAL COLLEGES.) He became classical tutor at Richmond in 1874, moving from there to Headingley College as New Testament tutor in 1881. He wrote widely on biblical subjects. Notable were: The Books of the Prophets in their Historical Succession (1896-1907) and The Things Above (1902). The missionary study to which he had devoted his final years was completed by W. W. HOLDSWORTH as the five-volume History of the Wesleyan Methodist Missionary Society (1921-24). He died on Nov. 2, 1919.

FRANK H. CUMBERS

FINDLAY, JAMES ALEXANDER (1880-1961), British Methodist, son of G. G. FINDLEY, was born at Richmond College, Surrey, in 1880 (see THEOLOGICAL COLLEGES). He graduated from Magdalene College, Cambridge, entering the Wesleyan ministry in 1903. He was assistant tutor at Handsworth College, 1904-07. After serving in several circuits he became New Testament tutor at Didsbury College in 1930. His FERNLEY-HARTLEY LECTURE, Jesus and His Parables, was published in 1950. He received the honorary degree of D.D. from St. Andrews University. He died in Manchester on Oct. 11, 1961.

FRANK CUMBERS

FINDLAY, OHIO, U.S.A. First Church, one of the largest churches in Ohio, dates its origin from the early 1820's when ADAM POE, then the pastor in Delaware, Ohio, visited Findlay and preached and helped develop plans for the church. When the congregation organized, a parsonage was built first, and services were conducted in it until the church was erected a few years later. The present edifice which stands in the midst of downtown Findlay, is the fourth structure to serve the local congregation. The third was destroyed by fire in 1901, and the present building which replaced it was greatly enlarged in the 1950's in a $400,000 expansion campaign.

This church has the distinction of acting as home church for Brand Whitlock, American ambassador to BELGIUM during the First World War; and of Norman Vincent Peale, noted New York minister. E. D. Whitlock and Charles C. Peale, fathers of these men, were pastors of the Findlay Church during the past century. F. Bringle McIntosh, pastor for a time, later became president of OHIO NORTHERN UNIVERSITY at Ada, Ohio. ALBERT EDWIN DAY spent his early days in Findlay, and came back to give the 100th anniversary sermon in the early 1930's. The church currently has a membership of 2,219.

E. LOWELL HEMINGER

FINGER, HOMER ELLIS, JR. (1916-), American bishop, was born at Ripley, Miss., Oct. 8, 1916, the son of Homer Ellis and Bertha (Rogers) Finger. He was licensed to preach in 1938, and admitted on trial to the NORTH MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE, in 1941, being ordained an ELDER in 1943. He attended MILLSAPS COLLEGE (A.B., 1937) and Yale Divinity School (B.D., 1941). He also holds a number of honorary degrees. He married Mamie

H. ELLIS FINGER

Lee Ratliff of Sherard, Miss., on Oct. 6, 1942, and they have three children.

His appointments have been: Coldwater, Miss., 1941-43; Chaplain, USNR, 1943-46; pastor, Oxford-University Methodist Church, Oxford, Miss., 1946-52; president of Millsaps College, 1952-64. He served on the Executive Council of Commission on Colleges, Southern Association of Schools and Colleges, 1960-62; and the Executive Committee of the Independent Colleges Fund of America, Inc.; when president of Millsaps was elected president of the Mississippi Association of Colleges, and of the Board of Directors of the Jackson, Miss. Chamber of Commerce. He was a member Andrew Jackson Council, Boy Scouts of America; Rotary Club; elected member of the General Board of Education of The Methodist Church, 1956; UNIVERSITY SENATE of the Church in 1960; member of the Southeastern Jurisdictional Council; delegate to GENERAL CONFERENCE of The Methodist Church, 1952, 1956, 1960, 1964, being the leader of his delegation in 1960, and 1964. He was a delegate to the WORLD METHODIST CONFERENCE in 1951, 1956, 1961, and a member of the World Methodist Council beginning in 1961.

At the JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCE held at LAKE JUNALUSKA in 1964, he was elected bishop and was assigned to the NASHVILLE area, where he supervises the MEMPHIS and TENNESSEE CONFERENCES.

Who's Who in America, Vol. 34.

Who's Who in The Methodist Church, 1966.

N. B. H.

FINLAND. The Republic of Finland was for six hundred years a part of the kingdom of Sweden-Finland, and many towns still have alternate Swedish names. In 1809 it became a grand duchy incorporated in the Russian Empire, then in 1917 an independent state with 4,700,000 inhabitants in 1965, including 330,000 Swedish-speaking citizens. The Lutheran State Church dominates the religious life, and most of the nineteenth-century revivals stayed within that church. Several free churches are represented today, but are numerically not so strong. Their influence, however, has been noteworthy.

The first Methodist in Finland, so far as is known, was Miss Maria Charlotta Hyden in TAMPERE. She had been a member of George Scott's Methodist congregation in STOCKHOLM (see SWEDEN) about 1840. But the cradle of Finnish Methodism—as for the other Scandinavian countries—was the BETHEL SHIP, "John Wesley," in New York harbor. In it seamen and immigrants were converted and, returning to their homeland, brought with them the evangel about a personal Savior. Gustaf and Wilhelm Bärmlund from Kristiina (Kristinestad) gathered a group of friends in an early Methodist society, gave their own house to be the first Methodist chapel in Finland, and asked both America and Sweden for ordained Methodist ministers. This was in the 1860's.

A Swedish local preacher, Karl J. Lindborg (1854-1926), went on his personal initiative in 1880 to western Finland and preached in Vaasa, Kakkola (Gamla Karleby), and several other places. He published a church magazine, and then was called before the Archbishop's Council in Turku (Åbo) and denied the right to preach. In 1883 Gustaf Wagnsson (1857-1929) got the first formal appointment in the Sweden Conference: "Finland, Gustaf Wagnsson, one to be supplied."

Wagnsson worked in many places and organized several congregations. In 1884 B. A. CARLSON was sent to the capital, HELSINKI. There he worked for several years, formed a society, started the Methodist magazine, Nya Budbäraren (New Messenger), traveled in many parts, even to St. Petersburg (now Leningrad), RUSSIA.

Another Swede, Gustav A. Hiden (1863- ?), tried to learn Finnish in order to reach the vast majority of the people. In Pori (Björneborg) he met JONAS WILHELM HÄGGMAN, a chemist, who became the recognized leader of Finnish-speaking Methodism. Hiden, however, started the Finnish Methodist periodical Rauhan Sanomia (The Message of Peace), and a Sunday school periodical, Lasten Ystävä (Children's Friend). He also arranged for the translation of the Discipline and a Finnish hymnal. He went to the United States in 1901, and later on joined the Lutheran Augustana Synod.

Until 1892 the work in Finland was organized as a district of the Sweden Conference, but that year the Finland and St. Petersburg Mission was formed, with Johannes Roth (1850-1909) as its superintendent. In 1907 GEORGE A. SIMONS from the United States was sent to take care of the work in the Russian capital, and at the same time he was named superintendent for both Finland and Russia.

In 1904 KARL JAKOB HURTIG came from Sweden to take care of the Swedish-speaking work in Helsinki, and he stayed there for the rest of his life. For thirty-nine years he was pastor in charge of the same church, and during a period (1924-31) he was also superintendent for the Finland Swedish Mission Conference. He had remarkable success, built several churches, preached to crowded congregations, and did extensive social work, all to the credit of the Methodist Church.

The Finland Annual Conference was organized in 1911, with the work in Russia being made a separate mission. The conference was bilingual until the two groups separated in 1923, the Finnish-speaking work keeping the rights of a legal annual conference while the work among the Swedish-speaking Finlanders became Finland Swedish Mission Conference, and in 1931 Finland Swedish Annual Conference. That year the two conferences had a total membership of 2,275 (1,586 Finnish plus 1,189 Swedish), and 3,844 Sunday school scholars (1,888 plus 1,956).

A preachers' seminary was started in Tampere in 1897, with J. W. Häggman for many years its leader. It moved to Helsinki in 1907, where it still is. But Swedish-speaking candidates for the Methodist ministry almost always went to UPPSALA, Sweden, and from 1924 have been educated at Överås, Gothenburg, the UNION SCANDINAVIAN THEOLOGICAL SCHOOL.

Social work has had an important part in Methodism in Finland. Already in 1886 a Swedish-speaking Methodist woman in Kristiina, Christina Svanström, started a home for destitute children. A Finnish-speaking home was instituted in 1909 at Epilä, near Tampere. In 1912 Karl Hurtig in Helsinki started a children's home in nearby Kauniainen (Grankulla), still in operation, where over a thousand children have been brought up.

Statutes were published in 1910 allowing for a Bethany Deaconess Institution in Finland and Russia. A Finnish-speaking institution was set up in Viipuri, but this was later moved to and enlarged in Helsinki. The Swedish-speaking institution in Helsinki was named Konkordia, and lasted from 1928 to 1964. When it was closed all its equipment and fixtures were sent to a missionary hospital in Africa.

An international seamen's mission, established in Kotka in 1881, was entrusted to the Methodist Church in 1901, and there work was carried on until 1964. V. K. Aulanko (1883-1960) was its leader for many years.

Finland, and therefore also all the Methodists of Finland, have been through many crises. In connection with the First World War, the war of liberty turned into a devastating civil war, which entailed much hatred. In 1918 the Methodist Episcopal Church in America greatly helped the local Methodist work, paying all debts on churches and chapels. An almost breathtaking scheme for new churches to be built in Karelia and other great enterprises gave much promise, but came however to nothing. In 1928-29 two great new churches were built in Helsinki, but the world-wide depression brought them into financial straits. The church in the United States saved the building of Finnish-speaking Central Church in Helsinki; but the building of the Swedish-speaking Christ Church (dedicated in 1928 by Bishop R. J. WADE) was saved only by the offering up of the old Emanuel Church building (1907-38), which had been a great center for a very influential religious and social work under the leadership of Karl Hurtig.

The Second World War and its implications, and involvements in the wars with Russia (1939-40 and 1941-45), brought new sufferings on Finland. One tenth of the Finnish territory was taken by the Russians; 400,000 refugees from the Karelian Isthmus had to be resettled in the main part of Finland. Two Swedish-speaking and three Finnish-speaking Methodist churches were lost, among the latter the remarkable Vuoksenlaakso (the Valley of Vuoksen), the largest Finnish-speaking Methodist church, numbering about five to seven hundred people. These were scattered throughout the land. They have a new center at Vesivehmaa near Lahti, but the pastor in charge has to travel in thirty communities to attend to the members of his church.

The Finnish-speaking conference especially has also suffered from several disruptions. Pentecostals caused trouble in 1912-13; Baptist influence was not helpful in 1931-32. Some pastors left the Methodist Church—regrettably, some of the most able men.

The relation to the Lutheran State Church has not always been without conflicts. The state itself has been more favorable. In 1892 the Methodist Church was legally recognized by the state, and the Methodist Church is now constituted according to the law of religious freedom of 1922. The church is represented before the state by a common Finnish-Swedish Church Board, organized with two separate sections.

Finnish Methodists have worked among Finnish-speaking tribesmen in the Ingria (Ingermanland) district west of Leningrad and in Karelia. Lately missionaries from Finland have gone to Africa (Swedish nurses and doctors) and to Pakistan (one very talented Finnish couple, Markku Lehto and wife now transferred to north Africa).

The Swedish-speaking work was for many years carried on by preachers from Sweden. Seventy-five Swedish Methodist ministers gave some years in the work in the former Swedish country—some stayed there for the rest of their lives. But now men and women from Finland itself take care of the work.

Worth a special mention is the extensive youth work in Kauniainen (Grankulla), and the youth yard at Jumijärvi.

The Finland (Finnish-speaking) Provisional Conference reported in 1965, 17 preachers, 1,286 members, 251 Sunday school scholars; the Finland Swedish Provisional Conference, 12 preachers, 1,143 members and 336 Sunday school scholars. The influence of Methodism in Finland has been much greater than these figures indicate. There have always everywhere been a great number of friends, who regularly attend services and are willing to cooperate and sustain the work, without listing themselves as members in full connection.

Bengt A. Carlson, "The Rising and Extension of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Finland and St. Petersburg." Manuscript, Stockholm, Jan. 18, 1909.

_____, Självbiografi (Autobiography). Stockholm, 1921. Odd Hagen, Methodism in Northern Europe. 1961.

K. J. Hurtig, Methodismen i Finland. 1925.

_____, with Mansfield Hurtig, Helsingfors Svenska Metodistförsamling. 1934.

Nya Budbäraren (New Messenger), 1886-1966.

Minutes of the Finland Swedish Conference, 1903-66.

Minutes of the Finland Conference, from 1924.

Toivo Rajalinna, "Suomen Metodistikirkon alkuvaiheista." Manuscript, 1936.

MANSFIELD HURTIG

FINLEY, JAMES BRADLEY (1781-1856), American minister, was born in NORTH CAROLINA, July 1, 1781, and became one of the most distinguished leaders of the Methodist Church in the early days in the midwest. His father, Robert W. Finley, was a Presbyterian minister who turned Methodist; he educated his sons, three of whom became Methodist preachers. The family moved to Cane Ridge, Ky. in 1790; and to Ohio near Chillicothe in 1796.

James Finley experienced the hardships and dangers of the frontier in his youth. He studied medicine but had little inclination to it. Then he spent seven years as a backwoods farmer.

JAMES B. FINLEY

Converted in the Cane Ridge Revival in 1801, he joined the WESTERN CONFERENCE on trial in 1809. He served large pioneer circuits in OHIO for seven years. From 1816 to 1845 he served much of his time as presiding elder of districts. One of the frontier districts stretched from the Ohio River to southeastern Michigan. In 1821 he went to the DETROIT area, the first presiding elder to come in from Ohio past the Black Swamp. He so impressed the leading citizens of Detroit that they vainly petitioned the bishops asking that Finley be appointed there.

A successful mission work had started with the Wyandott Indians at Upper Sandusky in 1816. Finley served notably as a missionary among them for six years, 1821-27, and thereafter he wrote much about the Mission, pleading the cause of the Indians. He later served more than three years as CHAPLAIN of the Ohio penitentiary.

A delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1844, he was the author of the famous Finley resolution which called for the deposition of Bishop J. O. ANDREW. The adoption of this resolution led to the great division of the Church. In the PLAN OF SEPARATION which was immediately thereafter adopted by that General Conference, J. B. Finley was named with NATHAN BANGS and GEORGE PECK to be commissioners to act in concert with the same number of commissioners appointed by the Southerners and to estimate the equity the South might have in the BOOK CONCERN should the Plan of Separation be finally adopted.

Finley was a man of untiring energy, a born leader, with burning zeal and devotion. In quarterly meetings and camp meetings, he had great power; crowds were often moved by his eloquence. He wrote several books on frontier Methodist conditions in the Ohio area and among the Indians. These included Autobiography . . . or Pioneer Life in the West; Wyandott Mission; Sketches of Western Methodism; Life among the Indians; and Memorials of Prison Life; books which have preserved invaluable information. Finley died Sept. 6, 1856, at Eaton, Ohio.

J. B. Finley, Autobiography. 1853.

_____, Wyandott Mission. 1840.

E. H. Pilcher, Michigan. 1878.

M. Simpson, Cyclopaedia. 1878.

RONALD A. BRUNGER

FINNEY, THOMAS MONROE (1827-1900), American preacher and author, was born in St. Louis, Mo., July 13, 1827. His parents, William and Jane Finney, were among the first members of the first Methodist church in the city. William Finney joined in 1822 and Jane Lee Finney in 1823. Thomas was educated in private schools, St. Charles College, St. Louis University and Yale University, graduating in 1844. He married Lucinda Edmonston in 1844; she died June 4, 1918.

Upon his return to St. Louis from Yale, Finney studied law in the office of Hamilton Gamble and Edward Bates. The former became the Civil War time Governor of Missouri and the latter became Attorney General of the United States in the Cabinet of Abraham Lincoln. Finney was admitted to the bar in 1849.

Called to the ministry, he turned away from a promising career in law. He was admitted to the St. Louis CONFERENCE, M. E. Church, South, in 1850. For six years he served appointments in "out-state" Missouri, principally in Lexington and Jefferson City, the state capital. In 1857 he was stationed in St. Louis, where he spent the balance of his life and ministry in various churches, the presiding eldership, and in social and religious activities.

He was one of the founders of CENTRAL METHODIST COLLEGE and a life-long curator; a founder of the St. Louis Christian Advocate and its editor, 1869-1872; established the Southwestern Book and Publishing Company; a trustee of Bellevue Institute for seventeen years and its president, 1878-1880; the biographer of Bishop ENOCH MATHER MARVIN; a founder of the St. Louis City Mission and Church Extension Society and led in the establishment of eight churches between 1867 and 1904; a member and Director of the St. Louis Provident Society; one of five members of the CAPE MAY COMMISSION from the M. E. Church, South; and an influential member of the GENERAL CONFERENCES from 1874 to 1898.

Minutes of the St. Louis Conference, MES, 1901.

FRANK C. TUCKER

FIRING, THORALF OTMANN (1890-), Norwegian American pastor and educator, was born at Horten, Norway, on Dec. 16, 1890, the son of Martinius O. and Maren Firing. He was an apprentice seaman on the wind-jammer Lancing, when he sailed into New York Harbor in December, 1908. He was converted a short while after in the famous BETHEL SHIP, and after a time decided to go into the ministry. He was received on trial as a DEACON in the NORWEGIAN-DANISH CONFERENCE in 1916, then made an ELDER and went into full connection in 1918. He attended NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY (B.S., 1921) and GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE (B.D., 1921; D.D., 1942).

On June 12, 1917, he married Evelyn Thorsen; and to them were born two sons and four daughters.

Firing went into the ROCK RIVER CONFERENCE in 1943. His pastoral record was as follows: Halsted, Minn., 1916; Norway, Ill., 1916-19; Portage Park, CHICAGO, 1919-20; instructor, Norwegian-Danish Theological Seminary, Evanston, 1916-19; acting principal, 1919-20; principal, 1920-24. It was during this period he did his work at Northwestern and Garrett. He was the founder and president of the Evanston Collegiate Institute (now KENDALL COLLEGE), 1934-54.

He was a delegate to the M. E. GENERAL CONFERENCE in 1936; is a member and past president of the Rock River Conference Historical Society; past president of the Rock River Conference Retired Ministers Association; president of the Norwegian-Danish Methodist Historical Society, and the Norwegian-American Historical Society; and a member of the International Society of Norsemen. He edits the Fellowship News Bulletin and lives in Evanston, Ill., since his formal retirement.

N. B. H.

FIRST CONGREGATIONAL METHODIST CHURCH OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA was formed by members of the CONGREGATIONAL METHODIST CHURCH who withdrew from that body in 1941. Disagreement had arisen about the addition in 1933 of Articles of Religion on regeneration and sanctification, and paragraphs on the duty of pastors' collecting superannuate funds, ladies work, youth work, trial of ministers. They were also divided over allowing called sessions of the General Conference the power to reverse the action of a regular session. Following eight years of conflict, J. A. Cook, then president of the General Conference, led a segment of the church in withdrawing immediately after the 1941 General Conference, by a two-thirds majority, had supported the action of former conferences.

The new body adopted the pre-1933 Discipline of their church following essentially the polity and doctrine of the parent body. In 1954 they reported 7,500 members in 100 churches. No statistics are given in the 1970 Yearbook of American Churches.

Constitution and Government of the First Congregational Methodist Church of the U.S.A., 1964.

Minutes of the General Conference of the Congregational Methodist Church, 1869-1945. Tehuacana, Texas, 1960.

J. GORDON MELTON

FIRTH, THOMAS (1821-1860), British layman, was born in SHEFFIELD on June 21, 1821. With his brother Mark he founded the important steel manufacturing business that bears his name. He gave a title of his income to many charities but especially to the work of the METHODIST NEW CONNEXION. In his will he left £4,500 toward the support of a theological institution. Consequently the foundation stone of Ranmoor College was laid by his brother Mark shortly after Thomas Firth's death in Sheffield on March 20, 1860. An almshouse in Sheffield, of which the CHAPLAIN must be a Methodist minister, still bears his name.

FISHER, ELLIOTT LEE (1903-1965), American pastor and church administrator, was born in Alameda, Calif., and educated in that state. He joined the CALIFORNIA CONFERENCE in 1929. After seventeen years as pastor and district superintendent, he became secretary of the Department of Town and Country Work of the Board of National Missions, and then executive secretary of the Section of Home Missions, with offices in the General Board in New York.

From 1955 to 1961, Fisher was superintendent of the San Jose District of the CALIFORNIA-NEVADA CONFERENCE. From 1961 until his death he was General Secretary of the Commission on Cultivation and Promotion, again in the General BOARD OF MISSIONS. He died in the Kennedy Airport, New York City, while waiting for a plane for San Francisco.

A careful observer of churches and of men, his ability in adjusting places and persons made him notably successful as an administrator. It was in this work that he spent most of his working life.

Clark and Stafford, Who's Who in Methodism. 1952.

LEON L. LOOFBOUROW

FISHER, FREDERICK BOHN (1882-1938), American missionary, preacher, and bishop, was born at Greencastle, Pa., Feb. 14, 1882, the son of James E. and Josephine (Bohn-Shirey) Fisher. He was educated at ASBURY COLLEGE and Harvard and BOSTON UNIVERSITIES, holding the S.T.B. and Ph.D. degrees from the latter. In addition, he received honorary doctorates in divinity, laws and humane letters. He married Edith Jackson, Feb. 4, 1903, and after her death in 1921, he married on June 18, 1924, WELTHY HONSINGER, a talented author and lecturer.

Fisher joined the NORTH INDIANA CONFERENCE in 1903 and was appointed to Kokomo. One year later, after hearing and visiting Bishop J. M. THORBURN, he went to INDIA as a missionary. In 1907 he returned to America and devoted three years to graduate study. As a member of the NEW ENGLAND CONFERENCE, he became in 1910 secretary of the Laymen's Missionary Movement, holding the post ten years. In 1910 he was a delegate to the World Missionary Conference at Edinburgh, and in 1927 to the World Conference on Faith and Order at Lausanne. In 1914 he transferred his membership back to the North Indiana Conference. Active in the CENTENARY movement, he served as national executive secretary of the campaign committee. In 1919 he was director of the industrial relations department of the Interchurch World Movement, and in that capacity was the first to suggest that the church should investigate the steel strike.

The North Indiana Conference sent Fisher as a delegate to the 1920 GENERAL CONFERENCE, and there at the age of thirty-eight he was elected bishop, and was immediately assigned to Calcutta, India, where he served ten years. He knew intimately M. K. Gandhi, the great Indian leader, often sitting on the floor with him to discuss India's problems. Fisher's one-hour lecture on Gandhi, delivered before many church groups, was authoritative and impressive. As an outspoken foreigner in India, Fisher was kept under surveillance by the British authorities. Suddenly in 1930, he created a sensation in the church by resigning from the episcopacy and returning to the United States. In the history of the M. E. Church only one other bishop, L. L. HAMLINE (for reasons of health), had resigned from the office. Fisher explained that America offered a great evangelistic opportunity. In other words, he wished to be where the action was, where he had been from 1910 to 1920. He added that "technical obligations, incessant travel, judicial trials, ecclesiastical umpiring, responsibility for the actual destiny of fellow ministers, financial and temporal management, with other kindred burdens, brought distress, grief, and slavery." Like many in the evangelistic and prophetic succession, Fisher may have had neither the genius nor the liking for administrative work.

Nevertheless, Fisher, a big man physically and mentally, was a dynamic personality, an inspiring preacher, and an able leader. It was he who inspired E. STANLEY JONES to go as a missionary to India. Bishop FRANCIS J. MCCONNELL regarded Fisher as "alertly intelligent and altogether courageous," one of the unique personalities in the board of bishops. Fisher was a wide reader, spending more for books than groceries. He gave one-fifth of his income to the church and some fifty-five percent of it to all causes. He left a deep impress on all who knew him.

On resigning from the episcopacy, Fisher served four years as pastor at First Church, ANN ARBOR, Mich., and then went to Central Church, DETROIT. He was in great demand as a preacher and lecturer, and over a period of a few years he delivered the Fondren, Earl, Cole, Beemer, Adams, and other series of lectures. He was the author of some ten books, including That Strange Little Brown Man Gandhi, Can I Know God? Building the Indian Church, Garments of Power, and The Way to Win. He died in Detroit, April 5, 1938.

Christian Century, July 2, 1930.

F. J. McConnell, By the Way. Nashville: Abingdon-Cokesbury Press, 1952.

Who's Who in the Clergy. 1936.

Who Was Who in America, 1897-1942.

JESSE A. EARL

ALBEA GODBOLD

FISHER, GEORGE W. (? -1864), American lay preacher, conducted the first preaching service in DENVER, Colo.; performed the first marriage ceremony; and helped to organize the first Protestant church in this early mining area.

Fisher was credited with each of these exploits by General William Larimer who came to COLORADO and Denver before these events happened (1858). Fisher was a wagon-maker by trade. He served as lay preacher, conducting services fairly regularly during the winter of 1858 and the spring of 1859.

Little is known of his background before this period but it is thought that he may have been a circuit rider in KANSAS. He was employed by WILLIAM H. GOODE, early missionary superintendent assigned to this area, as first supply pastor of the Rocky Mountain Mission on July 10, 1859, being listed in the records as a local ELDER. He was called in to minister to the first man hanged in the territory (1859). Fisher returned to MISSOURI and his family in 1863 and is believed to have died there in 1864. (Letter of dismissal from Central City Mission—April 14, 1864.) He was a worthy example of the lay preacher of this rugged mining area who brought the gospel here and caused it to flourish.

I. H. Beardsley, Echoes from Peak and Plain. 1898.

W. H. Goode, Outposts of Zion. 1863. LOWELL B. SWAN

FISHER, ORCENETH (1803-1880), American preacher, author, and editor, was born in Chester, Vt., Nov. 5, 1803. He is credited with having helped to plant Methodism on three American frontiers: the old Northwest, in TEXAS, and on the Pacific Coast.

His family moved to INDIANA Territory before 1821. He left the Baptist Church and was converted to Methodism. Convinced that he should preach, he joined the Missouri Annual Conference in 1823. He was a member of the ILLINOIS CONFERENCE in 1824, and was ordained ELDER in 1825 at Charleston, Ind., by Bishop WILLIAM MCKENDREE.

Orceneth Fisher was one of the most dynamic, persuasive evangelists of his era. He is credited with having made 700 conversions during his service in OHIO, 1,000 in TEXAS, and 800 in OREGON.

He first visited Texas in 1839-40, settling there in 1841 and joining the newly organized TEXAS CONFERENCE. He was the last CHAPLAIN appointed by the Senate of the Republic of Texas, which met in his church at HOUSTON in 1846. He also edited the Texas Christian Advocate in 1847-48.

In 1855, Fisher transferred to the PACIFIC CONFERENCE, leaving a lasting impression there. He successfully formed the Linden Circuit in CALIFORNIA, and led in Oregon and Los Angeles Conferences of the M. E. Church, South. For his work in the West, Pacific Methodist College awarded him a D.D. degree. He was president of the Pacific Conference in 1863, and was elected a delegate to three GENERAL CONFERENCES.

Superannuated in 1869, Fisher returned to Texas and continued his activity in the ministry until 1879.

Orceneth Fisher's works indicate that he was a serious scholar of church matters. He published Baptismal Catechism, 1849; The Christian Sacraments, 1851; History of Immersion as a Religious Rite, 1852; and in 1858 Christian Sacraments, enlarged edition, perhaps his major work. He also wrote Lectures on Prophecies, Sketches of Texas, and prepared a collection of 100 hymns. Fisher died Aug. 28, 1880, and was buried in Austin, Texas.

Margaret Waldraven Johnson, Our Methodist Pioneers. Berkeley: California Advertising Service, 1938.

O. W. Nail, Texas Centennial Yearbook. 1934.

M. Phelan, Texas. 1924.

J. C. Simmons, Pacific Coast. 1886.

The Texas Methodist Historical Quarterly, Vol. 1.

PEARL S. SWEET

FISHER, WELTHY HONSINGER (1880-), missionary in CHINA, was educated in the Free Academy of Rome, N. Y. and at SYRACUSE UNIVERSITY. She began training for a career as a grand opera singer while teaching in a co-educational school in a New York City suburb. Attending a missionary meeting in Carnegie Hall one night, she heard Robert E. Speer call for well-educated missionary replacements for service in Asia, and her entire outlook on life was changed. Less than a year later she was in China as a Methodist missionary. She was principal of the Baldwin Girls' School at Nanchang, and became a prominent educator, influential in the church and community of Nanchang.

On June 18, 1924, she married FREDERICK BOHN FISHER, M. E. bishop assigned to the Calcutta Area. She participated in Methodist, interdenominational, and intercreedal activities in CALCUTTA and many other parts of INDIA. When her husband resigned from the episcopacy and became pastor in ANN ARBOR and then DETROIT, Mich., she made her home a center for the study of India and for promoting interracial and international understanding.

After her husband's death, Mrs. Fisher returned to India and founded Literacy Village, near LUCKNOW. She has enjoyed the confidence and appreciation of the state government and by their help secured the land on which both the school buildings and the residential quarters have been built. About 8,000 sons and daughters of India have been trained to promote literacy in a fellowship of service that transcends all differences of caste, creed and color.

Mrs. Fisher's extraordinary personal influence and remarkable energy have enabled her to obtain support from World Literacy, the Ford Foundation, and the U.S. State Department's Cultural Unit, as well as from many individuals. She has received the Magsaysay award from the Philippines and the Nehru award from India. On her ninetieth birthday she received tributes from India's Prime Minister Indira Gandhi, President Nixon, and others for her work in combatting illiteracy in India.

Her books include: To Light a Candle (an autobiography); A Handbook for Ministers' Wives; Beyond the Moongate; A String of Chinese Pearls; Twin Travelogues—Korea, Japan, India, China; Top of the World; Freedom; and World Citizen, Fred B. Fisher.

Welthy H. Fisher, To Light a Candle. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1962.

J. WASKOM PICKETT

FISK, CLINTON BOWEN (1828-1890), American businessman, soldier, and churchman, was born Dec. 8, 1828, in Livingston County, N. Y., the son of Benjamin B. and Lydia (Aldrich) Fisk. He was educated at ALBION SEMINARY in Michigan. In 1850 he married Jeannette Crippen and prospered as a small banker only to lose everything in the panic of 1857. Acquainted with both Lincoln and Grant, he was in the insurance business in St. Louis when the Civil War began, and he immediately volunteered for military service on the Union side. He recruited a regiment, began as a colonel and rose to the rank of major-general. He drove Confederate General Sterling Price and his army of 20,000 out of MISSOURI in 1864.

In 1865 Fisk was appointed assistant commissioner in the Freedmen's Bureau in charge of refugees, freedmen, and abandoned lands in KENTUCKY and TENNESSEE. He saw in the freedmen an opportunity for social and spiritual service. In 1866 he opened a school for Negroes in an abandoned army barrack in Nashville. The next year it was chartered as Fisk University. As a prosperous banker in New York, Fisk continued to support the school and served as president of its trustees.

An ardent Methodist, Fisk was prominent in the organization of Union M. E. Church at St. Louis in 1862, the church which during the war required converts to stand under the flag and swear allegiance to the United States as they assumed the vows of church membership. Fisk was a fraternal delegate to the 1874 GENERAL CONFERENCE (MES), and a delegate to the 1876 General Conference (ME), and to the ECUMENICAL CONFERENCE in 1881. He was a commissioner from the M. E. Church to the important CAPE MAY meeting in 1876. Beginning in 1876, he served ably on the governing committee of the Methodist Book Concern. He delivered the address on missions at the Methodist CENTENNIAL Celebration in 1884. As an abstainer, Fisk was interested in the prohibition movement, and in 1888 he was the candidate of the prohibition party for president of the United States. He died in New York City, July 9, 1890.

John M. Moore, The Long Road to Methodist Union. 1943.

National Cyclopaedia of American Biography.

M. Simpson, Cyclopaedia. 1878.

JESSE A. EARL
ALBEA GODBOLD

FISK, WILBUR (1792-1839), American minister and educator, son of Isaiah and Hannah Bacon Fisk, was born in Brattleboro, Vt., Aug. 31, 1792. He had little formal education in his early years, but home study and a year at the University of Vermont prepared him to enter the junior class at Brown University, Providence, R. I., and to graduate in 1815.

WILBUR FISK

He first studied law, but soon turned to the ministry. His mother had been active in the early Methodist CLASS MEETINGS and Fisk found Methodist Arminianism more acceptable than current Calvinism. Licensed to preach on March 14, 1818, he joined the NEW ENGLAND CONFERENCE in June (full member, 1820; ELDER, 1822). He served the Craftsbury Circuit in VERMONT for one year and the church in Charlestown, Mass., for two. He married Ruth Peck June 6, 1823.

In 1825 he was elected principal of the newly founded Wesleyan Academy in Wilbraham, Mass., but had to complete the year as PRESIDING ELDER of the Vermont District. He raised funds, built a fine faculty, and developed a strong Academy. In 1831 he became first president of WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY. Here again he built a new institution—the first Methodist college in New England.

Fisk had great influence as the first Methodist minister in the eastern states who was a college graduate. In Vermont he was one of the rare Methodists chosen to give an election sermon. He was a vocal exponent of temperance. His slavery sentiments caused controversy.

Fisk was a member of the GENERAL CONFERENCES of 1824, 1828, and 1832. He was elected bishop in 1828 and again in 1836, but declined for health reasons. He died Feb. 22, 1839, and was buried in the College Cemetery, Middletown, Conn.

Dictionary of American Biography.

J. Holdich, Wilbur Fisk. 1842.

G. Prentice, Wilbur Fisk. 1890.

JANNETTE E. NEWHALL

FISKE, LEWIS RANSOM (1825-1901), American minister and noted college president, was born in Penfield, Monroe Co., N. Y., on Dec. 24, 1825. His parents brought him to Coldwater, Mich. in 1835, and he was converted in June 1842, at a CAMP MEETING on the Coldwater Circuit. He studied at Wesleyan Seminary, Albion, Mich., graduating in 1846. He received his B.A. degree at the University of Michigan in 1850, and that institution gave him a D.D. in 1873.

Leaving the study of law, he accepted a position as professor of natural science at Wesleyan Seminary in 1850. In 1853 he was named professor of natural science at State Normal School, Ypsilanti, Mich. It was there that Fiske received his license to preach and was admitted to the MICHIGAN CONFERENCE in 1855. He became professor of chemistry at Michigan Agricultural College, East Lansing, in 1856, and was chosen as acting president.

In 1863, he entered the pastorate, and from then to 1877 he served churches in Jackson and Detroit, and was co-editor and then editor of the Michigan Christian Advocate. He was a delegate to the M. E. GENERAL CONFERENCES in 1872 and 1876.

Fiske became ALBION COLLEGE'S fifth president in 1877, and served in that capacity until 1898. He did much to enhance the prestige of the college, placing great emphasis on attracting outstanding teachers, enlarging and modernizing facilities, and raising admission and academic standards.

He died in DENVER, Colo., at the home of his son.

Gildart, Albion College, 1835-1960.

E. H. Pilcher, Michigan. 1878.

ROBERT GILDART

FITCHETT, WILLIAM HENRY (1841-1928), Australian leader and historian of world-wide Methodist renown, came from Lancashire, England, in 1849, with his family to live in AUSTRALIA. The family first settled at Barrabool Hills, but within a year the father died and the mother opened a shop in Ceres, near Geelong. William Henry Fitchett left school early and went to work in a local stone quarry, but having a consuming thirst for knowledge, he learned Latin from an Eton Primer as he pushed his truck along the rails. He was converted at the age of sixteen when William Hill (later murdered in Pentridge Gaol) was conducting services in the Yara Street, Geelong Church.

A partnership with four others to raise sheep failed. Under the influence of Samuel Knight, he felt moved to enter the ministry and in 1866 he was received as a probationer. He began his ministry at Mortlake, and there met and married Clara Shaw.

In 1868 he was at Echuca, and then went to Punt Road Church, South Yarra. Three years later he went to North Melbourne Church, and while there enrolled at the Melbourne University and graduated in Arts with honors. In 1876 he went to Eaglehawk and after two years became superintendent of the Forest Street Circuit. He made a name for himself as a gifted preacher, an inspiring organizer and a fruitful evangelist.

Fitchett saw clearly the need for a girl's college. Four years later three acres of Kelly's Paddock in Hawthorn were purchased and upon this the METHODIST LADIES COLLEGE was erected. For forty-five years W. H. Fitchett presided over the college so that it enjoyed an international reputation. It stands today as his memorial.

Fitchett revealed a marked talent for writing. He wrote for the Wesleyan Chronicle and was a leading writer for the Argus. He won international renown with his volume on Wesley and His Century, which still enjoys high repute over the Methodist world. He also wrote The Unrealized Logic of Religion, and some very popular studies in patriotic history, including Deeds that Won the Empire, Fights for the Flag, Nelson and His Captains. He was also the editor of Life in Melbourne, The Southern Cross, and was a special contributor and reviewer for many periodicals. His work in journalism would have been a meritorious performance for any one lifetime, but for Fitchett it was a recreation added to his main task.

He was twice elected President of the Wesleyan Conference and of the first (United) Conference in Melbourne. He was elected the first President-General of the Australian Methodist Conference in 1904.

The first step towards the exploration of the possibilities of a union of the Presbyterian, Methodist and Congregational Churches sprang from a meeting held in his study.

His great speeches at successive British Conferences and at the Ecumenical Methodist Conference in Toronto in 1911 made tremendous impressions. Victoria University (in Toronto) gave him an LL.D. He did nearly half his life's work while suffering ill-health and threat of sudden death. He was a dynamo of energy, yet working with unruffled calm, and possessed a superlative memory, a strange blend of the ideal and the practical. He was a ready wit, and loved to have friends around him.

He died at the college on May 25, 1928.

AUSTRALIAN EDITORIAL COMMITTEE

FITZ GERALD, JAMES NEWBURY (1837-1907), bishop, was born at Newark, N. J., July 27, 1837, the son of John D. and Osee M. (Boylan) Fitz Gerald. After a public school education, he won a law degree at Princeton University, and in 1858 was admitted to the New Jersey bar. In January, 1864 he married Mary E. Annin, and they had five children. In 1862 he joined the NEWARK (NORTHERN NEW JERSEY) CONFERENCE, and was ordained DEACON in 1864 and ELDER in 1866. His appointments were: East Newark, 1862; Elizabeth, Mechanic Street, 1863; Hudson City, Second Church, 1864-66; Newton, 1867-69; Pater-son, Grace Church, 1870-71; Elizabeth, St. Paul's, 1872-74; Jersey City, Centenary, 1875-77; Newton District, 1878-79; and Newark District, 1880. A few weeks after going to the Newark District, the GENERAL CONFERENCE elected him recording secretary of the Missionary Society, where he served for eight years.

Fitz Gerald was a delegate to the General Conference four times, 1876-88, and to the 1891 ECUMENICAL CONFERENCE. He was elected bishop at the 1888 General Conference. During that year he presided over the M. E. annual conferences in TENNESSEE and NORTH CAROLINA. His legal training was helpful to him in the episcopacy. While on an episcopal assignment in the Orient, he died at Hong Kong, April 4, 1907. He was later interred at Linden, N. J.

F. D. Leete, Methodist Bishops. 1948.
National Cyclopaedia of American Biography.
Who Was Who in America, 1897-1942.

JESSE A. EARL
 ALBEA GOBOLD

FITZGERALD, OSCAR PENN (1829-1911), American pioneer minister, educator, writer, and bishop, was born in Caswell County, N. C., Aug. 24, 1829. His parents came from Virginia's pioneer families.

After graduating from Oak Grove Academy, Rockingham Co., N. C., he moved to VIRGINIA, where he worked for two newspapers, The Lynchburg Republican and The Richmond Examiner. For a time he was a writer of textbooks for a firm in Macon, Ga. Then he joined the GEORGIA CONFERENCE, M. E. Church, South in 1854. He received two honorary D.D. degrees.

Because he wanted to assist ministers struggling to further Methodism on the West Coast, he and his wife moved to CALIFORNIA in 1855. A member of the PACIFIC

CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church, South, he preached in SONORA, Columbia, Rockville, San Jose, San Francisco, Stockton, and Oakland. He was closely identified with that Church's work in California for twenty-five years.

Fitzgerald had a deep and sincere interest in education. In 1867 he was elected to a four-year term as California's superintendent of public instruction, and he worked for the creation of the University of California at Berkeley. He persuaded one of the nineteenth century's outstanding physicists, Joseph Le Conte, to join the faculty there. In 1870, he obtained a number of important advantages for Californians: free schools; eight-month school terms; uniform textbooks; relocation and reorganization of the state's normal school; and teacher institutes for public school teachers.

In 1862, he obtained from the Legislature the charter for Pacific Methodist College, which served well until its close in 1903. He was its agent for three years, 1872-75, and a professor of theology in 1874.

From 1857 to 1862 he was editor of The Pacific Methodist. He edited The Christian Spectator from 1865 to 1870, doubling for a time as editor of the California Teacher, which he edited from 1867 to 1872. He was editor of The Christian Advocate (Nashville) from 1878 until 1890.

Following his election to the episcopacy in 1890, Bishop Fitzgerald presided over the work of the Church primarily in the far West and South. He was resident bishop of the Pacific Conference in 1890 and 1893-94. He also presided over the TEXAS, WEST TEXAS, and EAST TEXAS CONFERENCE in 1891; the ALABAMA, LOUISVILLE, NORTH GEORGIA, and SOUTH GEORGIA in 1892; NORTH MISSISSIPPI in 1895; ILLINOIS in 1895 and 1899; VIRGINIA CONFERENCE in 1897; and the LOUISIANA CONFERENCE in 1901. He was superannuated in 1902.

Fitzgerald wrote a number of important biographies of eminent churchmen, historical sketches, philosophical works, and many articles for church publications.

A man of great courage and determination, he withstood criticism and violence as he continued to serve the Church, South, during the Civil War years. On the Easter Sunday following the assassination of President Lincoln, he preached as usual despite the ever-present threat of mob violence.

During his retirement, he lived in Monteagle, Tenn., where he died Aug. 5, 1911.

H. M. DuBose, History. 1916.
 Margaret Waldraven Johnson, Our Methodist Pioneers. Berkeley: California Advertising Service, 1938.
Journals, Pacific Conference, 1855-1894.
 L. L. Looibourow, In Search of God's Gold. 1950.
Minutes, Los Angeles Conference, MES, 1911.
Pacific Methodist College Bulletin, June, 1900.
 J. C. Simmons, Pacific Coast. 1886.
The Spectator, Oct. 27, 1870.
Who's Who in America, 1906-07.

PEARL S. SWEET

FITZGERALD, WILLIAM BLACKBURN (1856-1931), British Wesleyan Methodist, was founder of the WESLEY GUILD. He was born on May 22, 1856, at Barnard Castle, County Durham, and entered the Wesleyan ministry in 1877. Having examined methods in England and America, he devised the Wesley Guild to bridge the gap between Sunday school and church. The scheme was adopted by the Conference in 1896, and Fitzgerald was soon separated to be secretary, which he remained till his retirement in 1920. He edited the Guild Magazine, established the first Guild holiday home, and inaugurated Guild support for medical missions. He died at Cheam, Surrey, on Feb. 18, 1931.

H. MORLEY RATTENBURY

FIVE POINTS MISSION in New York City—site of the "Old Brewery"—was one of the first definite city missions established in American Methodism. It was organized in 1844 under the auspices of the Ladies' Home Missionary Society of the M. E. Church in New York City. The first officers of this missionary society were Mrs. E. S. JANES, called first Directress; Mrs. J. A. Wright, second Directress; and the noted PHEBE PALMER, the third such officer.

For a while the organization occupied a small room on the corner of Cross and Little Water Streets, but in a short while these quarters were outgrown. It was then suggested that the ladies interested in the mission should buy the old brewery which stood opposite Paradise Square, upon the corner of Park and Cross Streets. This is said to have been a dilapidated building which had for forty years served for a brewery, but which according to Bishop Simpson's account, "during the last twenty years had been the haunt of murderers and robbers, who within the shades of its dark and winding passages concealed their stolen goods and forever hid from sight their victims."

The missionary society went to the public in an appeal to rid the city of this "pest-house of sin, and to transform it into a school of virtue." Large meetings were held to gain public interest, one addressed by the famous Henry Ward Beecher and the other by John Gough, at that time nationally known as a temperance lecturer. These appeals enabled the ladies to raise $8,000 and they bought the ground, tore down the old brewery, and erected their mission house in 1853. Not wishing to lose the drama of their action, they issued a monthly periodical entitled Voice From the Old Brewery. A large Sunday school was thereafter conducted there, a small paid staff was employed, and the policy of the Five Points Mission was to help the children in their own homes and teach and guide them when they attended the various classes of the Mission.

This project by Methodist women in New York was later emulated by similar organizations in large cities over the country, for as they grew in numbers there came the pressing problem of the Church reaching the underprivileged and those in slum neighborhoods and inner city situations.

M. Simpson, Cyclopaedia, 1881.

N. B. H.

FLAT ROCK CHILDREN'S HOME (EUB). In the early 1860's the EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION faced the problem of caring for children made orphans by the Civil War. Other neglected children were also of vital concern. In 1865 the Ohio Conference of the Evangelical Association took the initial step toward the establishment of an institution for children. A building was procured in Tiffin, Ohio, and opened in July 1866, with eight children.

With the rapid increase of orphans, the building in Tiffin no longer provided adequate space. Feeling that the city was not suited for a children's institution, it was apparent a farm would be helpful in providing food and training for the children. In 1867, a farm of 170 acres was purchased near Flat Rock, Ohio, twenty miles from Tiffin.

A two-story brick building was built in 1868, costing $12,000. The new home was dedicated in May, 1868, with the new superintendent, CHARLES HAMMER, conducting the dedication.

Later the "Main Building" was inadequate to house the 150 children and workers. In May 1912, the girl's cottage was constructed. In 1921, two new boys' cottages and the school building were erected. Land was added making a 500-acre farm. A large herd of registered Holstein cattle is maintained. The farm is completely self-supporting and contributes milk, meat, and vegetables to the Home.

Today, the Home is certified by the State of Ohio to care for seventy school-age youngsters. Referrals come from churches, individuals, and welfare agencies of the surrounding counties.

LEWIS A. JOHNSON

FLEMING, BETHEL HARRIS (1901-), is a physician and missionary, who with her husband, Dr. ROBERT L. FLEMING, founded in 1954 the United Christian Medical Mission in Katmandu, NEPAL, of which there are now five branches throughout the country. This was the first and is the only medical ministry to the Nepalese people and was worked out with the permission and cooperation of the King. (See NEPAL—United Medical Mission.)

Mrs. Fleming was born in Elysburg, Pa., Dec. 13, 1901. She received her B.A. degree from Wilson College, Chambersburg, Pa., in 1924 and her M.D. from Woman's Medical College of Pennsylvania in 1931. Wilson College conferred upon her the Sc.D. degree in 1965. She and Dr. Fleming were married in 1936. They have two children.

Who's Who in The Methodist Church, 1966.

LEE F. TUTTLE

FLEMING, ELI MARIS HURFORD (1822-1898), American preacher, prominent in the founding of SIMPSON COLLEGE, Indianola, Iowa, was born in Chester County, Pa., March 1, 1822. He was baptized in the Presbyterian Church but later became a Methodist in Kingston, Ohio. By 1850 he was an itinerant preacher in the INDIANA CONFERENCE, in 1852 was ordained deacon by Bishop THOMAS A. MORRIS and in 1854 elder by Bishop MATTHEW SIMPSON. He was identified with the IOWA CONFERENCE by 1854 and in 1856 was appointed or elected to a variety of Conference responsibilities.

He held important pastorates. In 1859 he was appointed a member of the committee for dividing the Iowa Conference, following which he was secretary for three years of the newly organized Western Iowa Conference.

In 1860 he was influential in founding the Indianola Male and Female Seminary, which soon after was named the Des Moines Conference Seminary, and in 1867 was designated by the annual conference to be a four-year college, named for Bishop Simpson. He was the first president of the board of trustees of Simpson College (1860-1862), and was one of its official Conference visitors.

He served as presiding elder of the Chariton District

(1863-1865), Council Bluffs District (1865-1868), Atlantic District (1872-1876); and was a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE in Baltimore in 1876.

E. M. H. Fleming married three times. Sarah J. died April 21, 1860. Kate W. (1840-1885) bore six sons and three daughters, all of whom survived their father. In 1888 he married Mrs. Lydia House Jones (1837-c.1912). He died July 16, 1898, at Woodbine, Iowa.

WILLIAM E. KERSTETTER

FLEMING, ROBERT L. (1905-), missionary to India, was born in Ludington, Mich., March 22, 1905. He received his B.A. degree from ALBION COLLEGE in 1927, his M.A. from DREW UNIVERSITY in 1928, and his Ph.D. from the University of Chicago. He was married to Bethel Harris, March 25, 1936, and they are the parents of two children, Robert Fleming II and Sarah Elizabeth (Mrs. Vern Ernest Beiler).

Dr. Fleming's Ph.D. is in the field of ornithology, and he is a member of a number of ornithological and zoological societies. He is the author of India: Past and Present, 1948; Birds from Nepal, 1957; Notes on Birds from Nepal, 1961, and Further Notes on Birds from Nepal, 1964.

It was while studying bird life in NEPAL that he became concerned about the desperate medical needs of the Nepalese people. He sought and received from the King permission and assistance to found, with his wife, the United Christian Medical Mission in 1954, whose basic unit is still housed in a former palace in Katmandu.

In 1956 the Flemings were joined by another husband and wife team, both medical doctors, Edgar and Elizabeth Miller, who gave up their practice in Wilmington, Del. for service in Nepal.

LEE F. TUTTLE

FLEMING, THORNTON (1764-1846), American preacher, and leader of the M. E. Church in western PENNSYLVANIA during the first quarter of the nineteenth century, was admitted to trial in 1787. His first appointment to the western frontier was to the Randolph Circuit in western VIRGINIA in 1792. From 1801, his entire ministry was in the western Pennsylvania region, then in the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE, where he served as presiding elder for fourteen years, 1801-1805, 1806-1810, 1819-1823, and from 1826 to 1828 in the PITTSBURGH CONFERENCE after it was organized in 1825. Fleming was married in 1801 and fixed his home in Uniontown, Pa. He is buried in the old Methodist cemetery in Uniontown. In the excitement in western Pennsylvania over the excise law in 1793, which precipitated the Whiskey Rebellion, three Methodist preachers—Fleming on the Randolph Circuit, VALENTINE COOK on the Pittsburgh Circuit, and William McLenahan on the Redstone Circuit—jointly addressed a letter to President George Washington asserting the loyalty of the Methodists to keeping the law. President Washington's reply of thanks and commendation was preserved by Fleming and published in the Pittsburgh Conference Journal, Feb. 22, 1834. Several letters between Fleming and Bishop FRANCIS ASBURY are extant.

Joshua Monroe, "Memoir of Thornton Fleming," Pittsburgh Christian Advocate, Sept. 20, 1848.

W. G. Smeltzer, Headwaters of the Ohio. 1951.

W. GUY SMELTZER

FLEMING, ARTHUR SHERWOOD (1905-), American educator, was born in Kingston, N. Y. June 12, 1905, son of Harry H. and Harriet (Sherwood) Fleming. He was educated at OHIO WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY (A.B., 1927), AMERICAN UNIVERSITY (A.M., 1928), and George Washington University (LL.B., 1933). He has been the recipient of numerous honorary degrees. On Dec. 14, 1934 he was married to Bernice Virginia Moler, and they had five children.

Dr. Fleming's career as an educator began as a member of the faculty of American University. He was a member of the editorial staff of U.S. News and World Report, 1930-34, and edited Uncle Sam's Diary, a weekly current events paper for high school students, 1932-35. He served as a member of the U.S. Civil Service Commission, 1929-48, and was president of Ohio Wesleyan University, 1948-53 and 1957-58.

He has had a varied public service career also, serving as Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare in the U.S. Government, 1958-61, and as a member of various governmental boards and commissions, national and state.

He was recipient of the Medal of Freedom from President Eisenhower in 1957, and the Alumni Award of George Washington University in 1961. As an ecumenical leader he has served as president of the NATIONAL COUNCIL OF THE CHURCHES OF CHRIST IN THE U.S.A., 1967-69.

In 1961 he became president of the University of Oregon, and in August 1968, he was named president of Macalester College in St. Paul, Minnesota.

Who's Who in America, Vol. 34.

Who's Who in The Methodist Church, 1966.

J. MARVIN RAST

FLESHER, JOHN (1803-1875), British PRIMITIVE METHODIST itinerant preacher, was born at Otley, Yorkshire, Dec. 3, 1803. His father was the village schoolmaster; and when but a LOCAL PREACHER the son took the unorthodox line of preaching from his father's doorstep. When Primitive Methodism came to Silsden, he joined the cause; and his father's barn became the preaching place. John Flesher became an itinerant preacher in 1822 at Tadcaster, and the area of his ministry was the North of England. In 1842 he was appointed CONNEXIONAL EDITOR, and was responsible for the removal of the Book Room from Bemersley to London on grounds of economy and efficiency.

A man of legal mind, he compiled The Consolidated Minutes (1849), and developed the idea of a General Missionary Committee for the denomination. Of great skill in adjusting delicate problems, Flesher was often chosen to deal with difficult situations, particularly at Edinburgh in 1830 and in London in 1835. In 1851 he was made responsible for the preparation of a new hymnbook, which was published in 1853. He was an outspoken orator and a man of catholic mind. He died July 16, 1875, at Harrogate.

Anon., Silsden Primitive Methodism. Silsden, 1910.

Primitive Methodist Magazine, 1875. JOHN T. WILKINSON

FLETCHER, FRANK PEARL (1882-), American clergyman, author and poet, was born April 4, 1882, at Croton, N. H., son of Orrin W. and Etta J. (Barnard) Fletcher. He was educated at WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY (A.B., 1904; A.M., 1906) and at BOSTON UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF THE-

LOGY (S.T.B., 1912). He married Susan E. McLaughlin of Salem, N. H., on April 15, 1914.

Fletcher joined the NEW HAMPSHIRE CONFERENCE in 1910, and his appointments have been: Alexander, 1908; Ellsworth, 1909; Chichester, 1910; Salem, First, and Ayer's Village, Mass., 1911-12; Sunapee, 1913-18; Lebanon, 1919-28; Littleton, 1929-39; Laconia, First, Trinity and Gilford, 1940-41; Laconia, First and Trinity, 1942-51; retired, 1952.

He was the first president of the New Hampshire Conference Methodist Historical Society. He was a member of the Appalachian Mountain Club, climbing some 150 different mountain peaks, and a member of the Hymn Society of America. He was a delegate to the General Conference in 1928. He has served as a trustee of Wesleyan University; secretary of the New Hampshire Conference Board of Trustees; member of the Committee on Conference Relations; president of the Orlando (Fla.) Poetry Society; and he and Mrs. Fletcher established the New Hampshire Conference Fletcher Scholarship Fund of $15,000.

He is the author of a number of books, including both sermons and poetry. He presently lives in Laconia, N. H.

Journal of the New Hampshire Conference.

WILLIAM J. DAVIS

JOHN FLETCHER

FLETCHER, JOHN WILLIAM (1729-1785), was Wesley's designated successor as moderator-elect of British Methodism, although Fletcher's death preceded that of JOHN WESLEY by some six years. Born of a distinguished family at NYON, SWITZERLAND, Sept. 12, 1729, he was christened Jean Guillaume de la Flechere. At GENEVA, in preparation for the reformed ministry, he achieved outstanding academic success. However, because of his unwillingness to subscribe to certain dogmas of Calvinism, he declined ordination and made plans for a military career. Circumstances hindering his plan, in 1752 he went to England and found employment as a private tutor.

He was strongly attracted to the Methodist movement and soon joined a society. After consultation with Wesley, he took orders in 1757 in the Church of England, being ordained deacon on Sunday, March 6, and priest the following Sunday. Declining a more lucrative living, he became vicar of Madeley, Shropshire, in 1760, and continued an effective ministry there, with only a brief interruption for a return visit to Switzerland, until his death in 1785. During his ministry he presided for a time (1768-71) over the COUNTESS OF HUNTINGDON's college at Trevecka, serving as president in absentia.

Lady Huntingdon's dismissal of JOSEPH BENSON, because of his failure to subscribe to Calvinistic doctrines, prompted the resignation of Fletcher. The events surrounding this conflict developed into the "Calvinistic Controversy." Fletcher was drawn into the controversy, and he defended the polemic attacks made upon Wesley as well as extensively developing Wesley's Arminianism. Fletcher's activity resulted in his celebrated Checks to Antinomianism (1771-75), which display the essential theological position of the early Methodist movement in its formative years.

In developing Wesley's position, Fletcher is at one with his Calvinist opponents in emphasizing original sin, but he parts company with them by insisting that the gift of GRACE has come upon all men. He further agrees that God's grace is responsible for man's salvation, but he insists that it does not follow that man is to do nothing. Fletcher builds his arguments upon what he styles the "two Gospel axioms." These are: (1) Every obedient believer's salvation is originally of God's free grace. (2) Every unbeliever's damnation is originally of his own personal free will. He rejects both the "Decrees" (of unconditional election and reprobation) and Pelagianism. For him, God's grace is the sole source of man's salvation, and man's sin is the sole source of his condemnation. He seeks to take into account both God's grace and man's responsibility. Fletcher received the full blessing and approval of Wesley in his work. In addition to his abilities as a theologian, Fletcher is distinguished for his piety. Wesley declared that he had never, in his life of fourscore years, known anyone equal in piety to him. He died Aug. 14, 1785, and his body is entombed in the churchyard at Madeley.

J. Benson, John William de la Flechere. 1804.

John Fletcher, Works. 9 vols., 1806-16.

G. Lawton, Shropshire Saint. 1960.

F. W. Macdonald, Fletcher of Madeley. London: Epworth Press, 1885.

L. Tyerman, Wesley's Designated Successor. 1882.

KENNETH CAIN KINGHORN

FLETCHER, MARY BOSANQUET (1739-1815), British philanthropist, class leader, preacher and diarist, and wife of JOHN FLETCHER, was born in Essex on Sept. 1, 1739. She came from a wealthy family, but moved in London Methodist circles from an early age. She was on intimate terms with SARAH RYAN, who went to live with her in 1762, and the two women organized an orphanage. In his Journal, Dec. 1, 1764 JOHN WESLEY noted: "M.B. gave me a further account of their affairs at Leytonstone. It is exactly Pietas Hallensis in miniature. What it will be, does not yet appear." This "further account" supplemented the pamphlet that Mary Bosanquet published: A Letter to Mr. John Wesley, by "A Gentlewoman," Nov. 8, 1764, which was sold at the FOUNDERY. It described the conduct of the orphanage. In June, 1768, Miss Bosanquet moved the orphanage to Yorkshire, where Sarah Ryan died soon afterwards. Miss Bosanquet settled at Cross Hall, about two miles from Batley, near to Leeds. John Wesley visited her there frequently, and there are many references to her in his Journal, and a number of letters to her from Wesley have survived.

MARY FLETCHER

On Nov. 12, 1781, she married John Fletcher at Batley Church, and after living for a short time at Cross Hall, moved to Madeley in Shropshire in 1782. John Wesley had been consulted about their marriage, and warmly approved of it. After her husband's death in 1785, she remained in the vicarage until her own death and carried on religious work in the neighborhood; it is said that for a long time before her end she had from seventy to a hundred members in her classes. She died at Madeley on Sept. 9, 1815.

H. Moore, Mrs. Mary Fletcher. 1817.

A. Stevens, Women of Methodism. 1866.

JOHN KENT

FLETCHER, WILLIAM GREGORY (1875-1952), American pastor, missionary and YMCA secretary, was born in Gadsen County, Fla., and educated first in a log school-house and later at FLORIDA SOUTHERN COLLEGE, when this was located at Leesburg, Fla. In 1902 he was married to Faye Miller and went as a missionary to CUBA, where he was appointed to Santiago de Cuba. Later he became superintendent of the Eastern (Oriente) District. It was a pioneer country and travel was difficult. Opening work in Mayari, he often slept at night on the ground under a laurel tree. In 1909 he returned to FLORIDA, where he served three pastoral churches.

In 1917, during World War I, he volunteered for YMCA service overseas and served with the British Army in Persia and Mesopotamia. Later he was sent to lecture in INDIA for six months. Following the war, until his retirement in 1944, he served pastorates in CALIFORNIA and TEXAS. In five of the cities he served, he left each one with a circuit of several churches, and later most of the new churches became station charges.

W. G. FLETCHER

He served the following charges: In Florida: Silver Palm, Homestead, Hyde Park (Tampa), and St. Augustine. In Texas: Stamford, Texarkana, Navasota, Athens, and Roseberg. In California: Long Beach, Hollister, Oakland, and Fresno.

After retirement he was appointed pastor of the American Congregation in Havana, Cuba. Because of cataracts it was difficult for him to travel to and from the church. In order to save money for the founding of the UNION SEMINARY, he slept on the benches in the church at noon every day. From 1947 to his death in 1952 he served as professor of Comparative Religions at Florida Southern College.

After leaving Cuba the first time his dream was to raise enough money to establish a Union Seminary for the training of religious leaders in Cuba. The fund was to be in honor of a son, Dale Gregory, who died in infancy on the mission field. He confided to a friend his plan to raise $50,000 for this purpose and to this end invested in property and annuities. Being eloquent and having traveled widely he was in demand as a speaker. When traveling he never went Pullman but slept in day coaches to save for the seminary fund. He had the pleasure of seeing the first graduating class in 1949.

His interest in helping young people began when he was young. He sent at one time, nearly a dozen students from Cuba to schools in the U.S.A. This spirit characterized his ministry everywhere.

Minutes of the Texas Conference, 1953.

GARFIELD EVANS

FLEW, ROBERT NEWTON (1886-1962), British scholar and ecumenical statesman, was born at Holsworthy on May 25, 1886. From Christ's Hospital he went to Merton College, Oxford, where he was four times a University Prizeman. After further study in GERMANY he entered the Wesleyan ministry in 1910. He was assistant tutor at Handsworth, 1910-13; an army chaplain in the Near East, 1918-20; New Testament professor in the United Theological College, Bangalore, 1920-21. After serving in English circuits, he became tutor at Wesley House, Cambridge, 1927-37, and principal from 1937 to 1955 (see THEOLOGICAL COLLEGES). He was president of the Methodist Conference in 1946. He published in 1934, The Idea of Perfection; and in 1938 his FERNLEY-HARTLEY LECTURE, Jesus and His Church—this being an attempt to produce a Methodist doctrine of the Church. He received an Oxford D.D. in 1930. In his later years Flew played a vital role in the development of the ecumenical movement in Britain and in the growth of the Faith and Order movement. He had a passionate belief in the ecumenical ideal, which he communicated to many of his students. He died on Sept. 10, 1962.

JOHN KENT

D. K. FLICKINGER

FLICKINGER, DANIEL KUMLER (1824-1911), American United Brethren preacher and missionary bishop, was born May 25, 1824 in Butler County, Ohio. Although he had a deep-seated desire for a college education, circumstances were to prevent his obtaining even a public school training. Largely self-taught he would hold the plow with one hand and a book in the other. In this way he memorized verses from the New Testament or words from a homemade dictionary. Beginning in 1846, he taught several short terms in a rural school.

He was married to Mary Lintner, Feb. 25, 1847, and they lived on a good farm of 300 acres. Serious illness of his wife caused Daniel to return to teaching, and sell the farm. His pastor recommended him for a quarterly conference license to preach, which was granted in April, 1849. He tried preaching several times during the next year and a half before being licensed by the Miami Conference, UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST, in 1850. After serving as a junior preacher for a year, he resigned to enter Miami University. His wife died, leaving three small children and he never had the opportunity to return to the university.

Daniel Flickinger accepted an appointment in 1851, but his poor health kept him from taking an assignment in 1852. Instead he accompanied Bishop J. J. GLOSSBRENNER on his travels to the west. The following winter he lived in the Glossbrenner home in VIRGINIA and married the bishop's daughter Catherine, Jan. 9, 1853. He was ordained at the 1853 session of the Miami Conference, and assigned to the Dayton Circuit. His wife died in August, 1854.

Offering himself to go to Africa to establish a mission, he was one of three chosen that winter. Departing Jan. 4, 1855, Flickinger remained in Africa nearly a year after his two companions returned to the U.S.A. While in SIERRA LEONE, he married Susan Woolsey, Oct. 30, 1855, a missionary for the Congregationalists. He and his wife returned to America in 1856 but Flickinger made a return trip to Africa in 1857 to help in the settlement of two missionaries. Upon his return he was elected secretary of missionary work for his denomination, resigning within months due to poor health, and then was re-elected in 1858. He accepted and continued in office until 1885 when he was chosen the first missionary bishop of the church. This office was discontinued after one quadrennium.

Following the church division in 1889, Flickinger was dissatisfied with the Liberal section of the church and spent three years preaching for the Congregationalists. Then in 1892 he took assignments again in the Miami Conference. In his unsettled state he continued until December, 1895, when he joined the CHURCH OF THE UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST (OLD CONSTITUTION). He served in the office of secretary of the missionary work for that group until 1905, when he returned to the Liberal group again. Death came Aug. 29, 1911, at Columbus, Ohio, with burial in the cemetery at Oxford, Ohio.

OTTERBEIN COLLEGE gave him a D.D. in 1880. While serving as missionary secretary in 1865, he commenced a magazine, the Missionary Visitor, which he edited for twenty years. He wrote several books including Ethiopia, or Twenty-six Years of Missionary Life in Western Africa (1882); Our Missionary Work from 1853-89 (1889); and Fifty-five Years in the Gospel Ministry (1907). He also collaborated with other authors to produce several books.

D. K. Flickinger, Fifty-five Years. 1907.
Roush and Kootz, The Bishops. 1950.
H. Thompson, Our Bishops. 1889.

JOHN H. NESS, JR.

FLINT, CHARLES WESLEY (1878-1964), educator and bishop, was born at Stouffville, Ontario, Canada, Nov. 14, 1878, the son of George and Eliza (Barnes) Flint. His father and grandfather were Wesleyan local preachers. He was educated at VICTORIA (Toronto) UNIVERSITY (A.B., 1900), DREW (B.D., 1906), and Columbia (A.M., 1908). He held several honorary degrees, including the D.D. from WESLEYAN and the LL.D. from SYRACUSE. He married Clara J. Yetter, Sept. 3, 1901, and they had a daughter and a son. He joined the NORTHWEST IOWA CONFERENCE in 1900 and was ordained DEACON there in 1902 and ELDER in 1904. He served two years as pastor at Pocahontas, Iowa, and two at Marathon. Transferring to the NEW YORK EAST CONFERENCE, he was appointed to Bayville, Long Island, 1904-06; St. James, Brooklyn, 1906-08; First Church, Middletown, Connecticut, 1908-13; and New York Avenue, Brooklyn, 1913-15. In 1915 he became president of CORNELL COLLEGE, Mt. Vernon, Iowa, and in 1916 transferred his membership to the UPPER IOWA CONFERENCE. In 1922 he transferred to the CENTRAL NEW YORK CONFERENCE and was made chancellor of SYRACUSE UNIVERSITY where he served ably for 14 years. According to WILLIAM P. TOLLEY, at Syracuse Flint leveled mountains of debt, strengthened the faculty, lifted the standards of the college of liberal arts, founded the graduate school of citizenship and public affairs, made over the school of education, organized the school of journalism, and built Hendricks Chapel and the new medical college.

CHARLES W. FLINT

In 1928, '30, and '31 Flint served as chairman of the Federal Board of Arbitration under the Railway Labor Act. He served as a trustee of ten educational institutions. He was a delegate to the 1920, '32, and '36 GENERAL CONFERENCES and to the 1921 and 1931 ECUMENICAL CONFERENCES. Elected bishop in 1936, he was assigned to the ATLANTA Area, 1936-39; the SYRACUSE Area, 1939-44; and the WASHINGTON Area, 1944-52. After his retirement in 1952, he published two books: Charles Wesley and His Colleagues (1957), and On the Trail of Truth (1959). He died Dec. 12, 1964, and was buried in Syracuse.

F. D. Leete, Methodist Bishops. 1948.

New York Times, December 13, 1964.

Together, Syracuse Area News Edition, March, 1965.

JESSE A. EARL
ALBEA GODBOLD

FLINT, MICHIGAN, U.S.A., the seat of Genesee County, was founded in 1830 and incorporated in 1835. Methodism began in Flint in 1832 when Bradford Frazee was appointed by the OHIO CONFERENCE to the Saginaw Mission. Frazee preached the first sermon in the Flint River community to about six families. In 1835 the Saginaw Mission was revived, and WILLIAM H. BROCKWAY conducted services once every three weeks in Flint. In July, 1836 he organized a class at Flint. One member of the class, Daniel S. Freeman, was a cousin of the Daniel Freeman who preached the first Methodist sermon in MICHIGAN at DETROIT in the spring of 1804. A local preacher who served briefly in the itineracy, the younger Freeman served as the class leader and the first Sunday school superintendent at Flint.

The Flint River Mission, a large circuit, appeared first in the MICHIGAN CONFERENCE appointments in 1837; it reported 185 members in 1838. A frame church costing $3,000 was erected at Flint in 1842. There were then thirty-four members. Originally known as First Church, the name was later changed to Court Street Church. Garland Street Church was organized in 1861. The cornerstone for its building and for a new Court Street edifice were laid on the same day, July 9, 1861.

The M. P. Church began work in Flint in 1845 and brought two congregations with a total of 221 members into The Methodist Church at unification in 1939.

The M. E. Church did not organize a third congregation in Flint until 1905, but thereafter growth was rapid. By 1910 the denomination had four churches in Flint and by 1920 there were eight.

In 1946 William H. Morford led in establishing in Flint a radio station called the Methodist Radio Parish, Incorporated. The station is sponsored by the DETROIT CONFERENCE and that body appoints the full-time program director each year. Affiliated with the Mutual Broadcasting System, the station normally reaches half a million people. Its primary broadcasts are religious. In 1963 it became an FM as well as an AM station. The last three of the station's identifying letters, WMRP, stand for its corporate name.

Par-Mor Manor House, a home for the aged on the outskirts of Flint which is sponsored by the Detroit Conference and local Methodist leaders, accommodates 150 residents.

In 1969 the nineteen churches in Flint reported 8,405 members, property valued at $7,127,120, and $973,901 raised for all purposes during the year.

General Minutes, MEC and MC.

Porter, Methodists in the Vehicle City, 1966.

M. Simpson, Cyclopaedia. 1878.

FRANK W. STEPHENSON

Court Street Church is the historic downtown congregation in Flint. It began in July, 1836 when WILLIAM H. BROCKWAY organized a society of nine members. Through the years the church has remained at the same location. The first building, erected in 1842, was destroyed in 1861 by fire believed to be of incendiary origin. The Methodists had been zealous on behalf of temperance. A new brick church costing $12,000 was erected at once. The congregation grew steadily. In 1890, with 722 members, it was the fourth largest church in the conference. A third sanctuary was built in 1891, but unfortunately it was heavily damaged by fire in 1893, and the fourth and present church was completed in 1894. A parish house was erected in 1929 at a cost of $150,000. Between 1864 and 1959 the DETROIT CONFERENCE held nine of its annual sessions in Court Street Church. Following William Brockway, strong leaders in MICHIGAN Methodism have served as pastors of Court Street Church, including Francis Bangs, David Burns, JOHN ARNOLD, George Taylor, John Russell, LUTHER LEE, T. C. Gardner, William H. Shier, James Jacklin, C. E. Allen, and HAROLD CARR.

Court Street Church had a Woman's Foreign MISSIONARY SOCIETY as early as 1870, and a Woman's Home Missionary Society in 1884. Through the years the church has emphasized missions; in 1947 the congregation assumed support of a medical missionary in Nadiad, INDIA. The church had a large EPWORTH LEAGUE soon after the national organization was established. In recent years a strong choir program has been maintained. As the mother church in Flint, Court Street has assisted with the organization of several other congregations through the years.

In 1970 Court Street Church reported 2,144 members, property valued at $1,400,000, and $223,731 raised for all purposes.

Court Street Church Commemorative Booklets.

General Minutes, MEC, and MC.

E. H. Pilcher, Michigan. 1878.

RONALD A. BRUNGER

FLIPPER, JOSEPH SIMEON (1856-1944), American bishop of the A.M.E. Church, was born in Atlanta, Ga., on Feb. 22, 1856. His parents were Festus and Isabella Flipper. He was educated at Atlanta University. He was converted in 1877, licensed in 1879, admitted into the Georgia Conference in 1880, ordained DEACON in 1882 and ELDER in 1884. His pastorates were in GEORGIA, where he was also an elder, dean of TURNER THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY and president of MORRIS BROWN COLLEGE. He was elected bishop in 1908 and assigned to the Ninth District, Oklahoma and Arkansas (1908-1912), the Sixth District, Georgia (1912-1928), the Eleventh District, Florida (1928-1936), the Thirteenth District, Kentucky and Tennessee (1936) and also the Seventh District, South Carolina (1936-1944).

Bishop Wright describes him as being "6 feet, 2 inches, of 'light' complexion, and weighed around 225 pounds. He did not believe in preachers wearing robes in the pulpit, nor in the use of individual communion service cups. He did not permit women to function prominently in the church, and was against licensing them to preach or ordaining them. He was an ardent supporter of laymen."

In Atlanta, he was highly respected and greatly beloved. He was an ardent supporter of Ira T. Bryant in building the new Sunday School Union building in Nashville, Tenn. He advocated a "supreme" court of the A.M.E. Church, and by virtue of the legal mind which he had, favored spelling out the Constitution of the A.M.E. Church in the Discipline.

He died Oct. 10, 1944, and left a valuable library for the Turner Theological Seminary.

C. F. Price, Who's Who in American Methodism. 1916.

R. R. Wright, The Bishops. 1963.

GRANT S. SHOCKLEY

FLORENCE, ALABAMA, U.S.A. First Church was for many years the largest Methodist church in the Tennessee River valley of north Alabama. Organized in October, 1822, it was one of more than twenty preaching places served by Nathaniel R. Jarratt.

Throughout the life of this church it has led in church extension in its area. From its membership and its financial support, five Methodist churches have been organized.

An unusually large number of the stewards died of battle wounds during the Civil War, seriously depleting the leadership of the church for a decade.

In the great Depression of the 1930's, a bonding company repossessed the church for a large indebtedness. Many families made enormous sacrifices in order to reclaim the building and did so in the space of a few weeks.

Many Methodist preachers and several missionaries have come from the church over the years, including Miss Martha Almon, presently serving in Aldersgate Methodist Church, Honolulu, HAWAII.

Twice during its history fires have completely destroyed the church edifice. Each time it has been rebuilt on its present site. The present building was completed in 1922. Additions to the educational facilities have been added as growth demanded expansion. The last addition was a children's building and chapel costing $200,000, in 1964.

First Church is the largest congregation of any church among nearly 100 churches of many denominations in Florence. Its 1970 membership is 1,796. It is served by a multiple ministry.

FLORENCE, SOUTH CAROLINA, U.S.A. Just when Methodism entered the immediate Florence area is not certain, but from old records we take 1867 as the date it made its definite appearance through the labors of a Methodist circuit rider, A. J. Stafford, who was located at Darlington. In 1869 three gentlemen of Florence (John McSweeney, J. J. Ellis, and P. A. Brunson) met in John Husband's old shop on Evans Street. Here they began to plan for the organization of a Methodist Church in Florence. On April 4, 1870, the first church meeting was held in the home of Capt. M. C. Henry on Cheves Street.

Central Church established itself in downtown Florence despite fire and tornado. The first building was blown away by a tornado before it was quite finished. The second building was burned to the ground twelve years after being built. Its third building was abandoned in 1913 for the present massive structure a block from the first site.

Located in the stategic Pee Dee area of SOUTH CAROLINA, Central has furnished a unique leadership to a growing section of the state. Her early gifts to Advanced Mission Specials and to COLUMBIA and WOFFORD COLLEGES spearheaded the later liberality of other South Carolina churches to missions and higher education.

Central pioneered in adding a minister to her staff for pastoral counseling, a service begun in 1954 during the ministry of E. E. Glenn, and under the direction of Larry Jackson. Central began what appears to be another "first" in the summer of 1966, by investing $7,500 in a six-weeks day camp for disadvantaged children in the community. By gifts of money and leadership the church has watched the development of two additional congregations in the city, St. Paul and Highland Park.

In 1970 Central reported a membership of 2,037. The church through the years has been served by ministers of prominence in the conference, and has had some notable laymen among its membership.

FLORIDA, U.S.A., a peninsula which divides the Gulf of Mexico from the Atlantic Ocean, extends farther south and southeast than any other state of the United States. The population in 1970 was 6,671,162. It was admitted into the Union in 1845. Florida was the first part of the present United States to be discovered and the first to have a permanent settlement of Caucasians. St. Augustine was founded by the Spanish in 1565.

Florida was ceded to England in 1763, and England gave it back to Spain in 1783. Spain sold it to the United States in 1819, for $5,000,000.

Florida leads the nation in the production of citrus fruit, stands second as a cattle state, is a leader in phosphate mining, and is now the location from which flights into outer space are launched. The equable climate makes the state a favorite winter vacation area, and it encourages retired people to live there.

Except during the twenty-year period of British rule, the Protestant religion was forbidden in Florida until it became a part of the United States. However, there is some evidence that Protestant settlers from the United States who pushed across the border into Florida between 1783 and 1819 practiced their religion more or less openly, particularly in the last decade of that period.

JOHN SLADE is called the father of Florida Methodism. He was one of a group who signed a petition in 1814 requesting that a so-called short-lived Republic of East Florida be admitted to the United States. Officially Methodism began in Florida in 1821-22. In December, 1821 the MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE appointed Alexander Talley to Pensacola and the adjoining country. In February, 1822, the SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE formed the St. Mary's and Amelia Island Circuit, which included territory on both sides of the Georgia-Florida line, and appointed Elijah Sinclair to the work.

In 1823, the South Carolina Conference sent Joshua N. Glenn as a missionary to St. Augustine, while John Slade and John I. Triggs were appointed to the Chatahoochee Mission. Two years later the conference formed the Tallahassee District in Florida, and in succeeding years that district added new circuits across northern Florida. In 1830, the GEORGIA CONFERENCE was organized and the Tallahassee District became a part of it. Despite Indian troubles, during the ten decade the Methodist work spread as far south as TAMPA.

In 1844, the GENERAL CONFERENCE formed the FLORIDA CONFERENCE. It included southern Georgia and all of Florida except the part west of the Appalachian River which has nearly always been linked with south ALABAMA. When organized the conference had thirty appointments and 6,816 members, some 2,653 of them colored. The conference adhered to the newly organized M. E. Church, South, at its first meeting on Feb. 8, 1845. The 1866 General Conference of that church organized the SOUTH GEORGIA CONFERENCE, and thereafter the boundaries of the Florida Conference were limited to the state of Florida east of the Appalachian River.

Interested in education from the beginning, the Florida Conference started Fletcher Institute at Thomasville, Georgia, in 1848 and supported it for three decades before transferring it to the South Georgia Conference. In 1852, a second school called East Florida Seminary was established at Micanopy; it closed at the beginning of the Civil War. In 1883, the conference started the South Florida Institute at Orlando, but, due to financial difficulties, turned it over to the city three years later, and then immediately opened another school at Leesburg. This school moved several times and finally became permanently located at Lakeland in 1922. After 1906 it was called Southern College and after 1935 FLORIDA SOUTHERN COLLEGE. It became one of the strong church related colleges in the nation.

The Florida Christian Advocate began publication at Lakeland in 1886. Except for a few years, it appeared regularly until the end of 1940. It was succeeded by a monthly called the Florida Methodist, discontinued in 1968.

The Florida Conference has four retirement homes with a total capacity of 710 persons, located at Bradenton, JACKSONVILLE, MIAMI, and ST. PETERSBURG. The conference supports two homes for children—the Florida Methodist Children's Home at ENTERPRISE, and the Sarah Hunt Methodist Children's Home at Daytona Beach.

In the last quarter of the nineteenth century, some dedicated Southern Methodist preachers began a ministry to Cuban and Italian immigrants in south Florida. For some years there was a Latin District in the Florida Conference. In 1930, the Latin Mission was organized. It continued until 1943 when it was absorbed by the Florida Conference.

In 1873, the M. E. Church reentered Florida and organized a new Florida Conference composed of both white and Negro churches and ministers. In 1886, the conference was divided on racial lines, and the white group became the ST. JOHNS RIVER CONFERENCE. This body merged with the Florida Conference (MES) in 1939 to form the Florida Conference, Southeastern Jurisdiction, The Methodist Church.

The Florida Conference (ME) was divided again in 1905 to form the South Florida Mission. The latter grew into a mission conference in 1921 and into the South Florida Conference in 1925. This body continued until 1952 when it was absorbed by the Florida Conference of the then Central Jurisdiction. In 1966, the Florida Conference had 58 ministers, 66 pastoral charges, 9,432 members, and property valued at $3,242,587.

On the dissolution of the Central Jurisdiction with the formation of The United Methodist Church in 1968, the Florida Conference was received temporarily as a conference in the Southeastern Jurisdiction. It voted to merge with the Florida Conference, Southeastern Jurisdiction, in 1969, and this was accomplished on schedule with Bishop JAMES HENLEY presiding.

The METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH was active in Florida after 1846. Though the Discipline lists a Florida Conference beginning in 1846, the earliest churches of the denomination in the state were practically independent congregations rather than a part of a connectional system. Thomas J. Lyle, a minister, who had helped to establish several M. P. churches, led in organizing the Florida Mission Conference at Madison in March, 1889. Starting with four preachers, four circuits, and 99 members, the work grew to 400 members in a few years but dropped back to less than 150 members by 1900. In 1936, the conference journal reported ten ministers, five pastoral charges, 404 church members, and seven churches and one parsonage valued at $34,150. In 1939, at Methodist Union, the Methodist Protestants brought seven ministers and 350 members into the Florida Conference, Southeastern Jurisdiction.

At Methodist unification 1939, the Florida Conference of the Southeastern Jurisdiction was fifty-first in numerical strength. In 1970, it was the third largest conference in the connection, reporting 953 ministers, 699 churches, 315,785 church members, and churches, parsonages, and other property valued at $141,298,877.

W. E. Brooks, Florida. 1965.

General Minutes, ME, MES, TMC, UMC.

Journals of the Florida Conference.

C. T. Thrift, Florida. 1944.

WILLIAM E. BROOKS

FLORIDA CONFERENCE. The original conference was organized in Tallahassee, Feb. 6, 1845, with Bishop JOSHUA SOULE presiding. Technically at the time of organization it was a conference of the M. E. Church, but it immediately voted to adhere south as the denomination had divided, and thereafter it was a conference of the M. E. Church, South. The conference boundaries included south GEORGIA and all of the state of FLORIDA east of the Appalachian River.

Officially Methodist work began in Florida in 1821-22 when the Mississippi and South Carolina conferences appointed preachers to work in the territory (see FLORIDA). The GEORGIA CONFERENCE was formed in 1830, and Florida, except the west part, was included in that conference. Then in 1845, as indicated above, the Florida Conference was organized, and south Georgia was a part of it. The SOUTH GEORGIA CONFERENCE was created in 1866, and after that date the Florida Conference was limited to the state of Florida east of the Appalachian River.

The Florida Conference began with 6,816 members, about forty percent of whom were colored. The conference started with four districts. At the first session thirty-six preachers received appointments to circuits and stations scattered from Albany, Ga. to Key West, Fla. By 1861 there were 82 preachers and some 19,000 members in the conference.

The Florida Conference lost members during and immediately following the Civil War. Within a few years after the war most of the Negro members had joined the M. E., A. M. E., and A. M. E. Zion churches; few were left to be transferred to the C. M. E. Church when it was organized under the auspices of the M. E. Church, South in 1870. The white membership of the Florida Conference declined about seventeen percent between 1861 and 1866. It was not until 1886 that the conference recouped the losses in membership sustained by the war and its aftermath. Moreover, though the population of the state grew one-third larger between 1890 and 1900, the conference showed little or no increase in membership between 1886 and 1900.

Like some other conferences, Florida has had long and able service from one family of preachers. Thomas R. Barnett joined the Florida Conference in 1854. In succeeding years two of his sons and two grandsons became preachers in the conference. One of the grandsons who entered the conference in 1903 was still a member in 1970. The family's aggregate years of service exceeds 200.

The population of Florida east of Appalachian River increased 290 percent between 1900 and 1940. During that period the conference matched the growth of the state, going from 19,760 members in 1900 to 70,409 in 1939.

The Florida Conference, Southeastern Jurisdiction, The Methodist Church, was launched at TAMPA on June 9, 1939, when the ST. JOHNS RIVER CONFERENCE (ME), the Florida Mission Conference (MP), and the Florida

Conference (MES) merged. The new conference began with 84,686 members. In the three decades following, the Florida Conference may have exceeded the growth of any other conference in the denomination. In 1939, the Florida Conference ranked fifty-first in membership. The Florida Conference of the former Central Jurisdiction which had 8,521 members in 1967, voted to merge with the Florida Conference, Southeastern Jurisdiction, in June 1969. This was accomplished, and the conferences merged under the administration of Bishop JAMES W. HENLEY. In 1970 it was the third largest conference in the church, reporting 953 ministers, 699 churches, 315,785 church members, and churches, parsonages and other property valued at $141,298,877.

W. E. Brooks, Florida Methodism. 1965.

General Minutes, ME, MES, TMC, and UMC.

Journals of the Florida Conference.

C. T. Thrift, Florida. 1944.

WILLIAM E. BROOKS

FLORIDA CONFERENCE (EUB) began by action of the Missouri Conference of the United Brethren in Christ at Trenton, Mo., in September, 1894. At his own request, I. W. Bearss was appointed to work as a home missionary in FLORIDA. Bearss, his family, and a small group of friends immediately formed a caravan of six farm wagons and travelled 1,400 miles over a period of eleven weeks. In December, 1894, they arrived at Lake Magdalene, Fla., in what is now the north TAMPA area.

The first church organization was formed in May, 1895, in a small schoolhouse on the shores of Lake Carroll, with nine charter members, two of whom, W. O. Bearss and B. E. Stall, were still living in Lake Magdalene in 1961. In 1897, the first church building was erected about four miles west at the Lynn Gant neighborhood, where more people were living at that time. The building materials and furnishings were of native woods; and some of the hand-planed pine benches are still being used. In 1907, this building was moved on log rollers four miles through the woods to the present church site just west of North Armenia Avenue in the Lake Magdalene community. This original frame building served the congregation until 1925, when it was replaced by a brick structure; in March, 1960, an additional fine new sanctuary was dedicated.

At the time when Bearss began his work in Florida, a Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor, which is the oldest continuous Christian Endeavor Society in the state, was organized. During the years that Christian Endeavor was flourishing, Florida Conference furnished several state and district leaders, and by this means the denomination became known throughout the state. About 1900, several churches were started in GEORGIA, among them were ATLANTA, Waycross, and Fitzgerald; but after about twelve years, they had disbanded, leaving only the churches in Florida. Quite early the work in Florida was put under the Tennessee Conference. In 1902, a Georgia Conference was organized which included the Florida churches. The name was changed to Georgia-Florida Conference in 1913, and then to the Florida Conference in 1917.

The Florida Conference had approximately 3,600 members (1968) with twelve well-established churches. In the Ybor City section of Tampa the Board of Missions organized one of the finest mission schools and kindergartens in the city with grade school classes through the sixth grade.

In the Limona-Brandon community, about eight miles east of Tampa, Florida Conference established a ten-acre lakeside camp ground known as "Camp Florida."

Soon after the formation of The United Methodist Church in 1968, the Florida Conference united with the Florida Conference of the former Methodist Church.

E. V. CAVANAGH

FLORIDA CONFERENCE (ME) was organized in 1873 following the work of the FREEDMEN'S AID SOCIETY in the state. At first both white and Negro ministers and members were included, but in 1886 the conference divided on racial lines. The 1884 General Conference authorized such divisions when a majority of both races in a conference should so vote. When the question of division was raised on the Florida Conference floor, the white members voted eighteen to two for it and the Negro members opposed it eighteen to six. Two days later, after several visiting preachers had spoken favorably of division, a majority of both groups voted for it. The white members then organized the ST. JOHNS RIVER CONFERENCE, and the Florida Conference went forward as an all Negro body.

In 1905, the Florida Conference divided again to form the South Florida Mission. This grew into the South Florida Mission Conference in 1921, and in 1925 into the South Florida Conference with two districts, 39 appointments, and 3,385 members. By 1939 the membership had risen to 4,337, but in 1952 the number had dropped to 2,391, and in that year the conference was absorbed by the Florida Conference, Central Jurisdiction.

In 1874, the Freedmen's Aid Society started Cookman Institute for men at JACKSONVILLE, and the conference gave support. Cookman was merged with an institute for Negro girls at Daytona Beach in 1922 to become BETHUNE-COOKMAN COLLEGE. The conference also contributed to the Sarah Hunt Methodist Children's Home at Daytona Beach.

The Florida Conference continued in the Central Jurisdiction of The Methodist Church in 1939. In 1968, it became a conference in the Southeastern Jurisdiction of The United Methodist Church. At a called session on Sept. 21, 1968, the conference voted to merge with the Florida Conference, Southeastern Jurisdiction, in June, 1969.

In 1967, the Florida Conference had three districts, 66 pastoral charges, 8,521 members, and churches, parsonages and other property valued at approximately $3,660,000.

W. E. Brooks, Florida Methodism. 1965.
General Minutes, ME, TMC.
 C. T. Thrift, Florida. 1944.

N. B. H.

FLORIDA SOUTHERN COLLEGE, Lakeland, Florida, was chartered as Florida Conference College in 1885 and the name changed to Southern College in 1906. Until 1921, when it was moved to Lakeland, the institution had been located at Leesburg and Palm Harbor.

The development of the college as it is now known came during the administration of LUD M. SPIVEY (1924-57). The west campus of the college was designed by the late Frank Lloyd Wright and contains the largest number of buildings the famed architect ever placed in one grouping. The Branscomb Auditorium was erected in 1963 by the Florida Conference memorializing Bishop JOHN W. BRANSCOMB.

ANNIE PFEIFFER CHAPEL, FLORIDA SOUTHERN

In 1965, the will of a trustee of the college, Mrs. Loca Lee Buckner, provided for a bequest of more than $7,000,000. This is the largest gift made to the college and one of the largest to any liberal arts college in the South. It grants the B.A. and B.S. degrees. The governing board has twenty-seven trustees elected by the FLORIDA ANNUAL CONFERENCE.

JOHN O. CROSS

FLY SHEETS were anonymous pamphlets circulated in the 1840's in an effort to break the grip of JABEZ BENTING on Wesleyan Methodism in England. The order of the sheets was: No. 1 in 1844; No. 2 in 1846; No. 1 and No. 3 were sent out together in 1847; No. 4 in 1848; the fifth and final sheet in 1849. The Fly Sheets were originally sent only to Wesleyan ministers, but once counter Papers on Wesleyan Matters began to appear in the Book Room windows there were several public editions: e.g., A Faithful Verbatim Report of the Fly Sheets, by a Wesleyan Minister Not Yet Expelled (Birmingham, 1849). Authorship of the sheets was one of the grounds on which SAMUEL DUNN, WILLIAM GRIFFITH, and JAMES EVERETT were arraigned before the Wesleyan Conference of 1849 and expelled. What evidence exists suggests that Everett was the principal author. The sheets were conservative in attitude, relying chiefly on personalities; they did not advocate the rights of the laity.

O. A. Beckerlegge, United Methodist Free Churches. 1957.
 B. Gregory, Side Lights. 1898.
 J. H. S. Kent, Age of Disunity. 1966.
 E. C. Urwin, Significance of 1849. 1949.

JOHN KENT

FOGGIE, CHARLES HERBERT (1912-), American bishop of the A.M.E. Zion Church, was born in Sumter, S. C., on Aug. 12, 1912, and was brought up in Boston, Mass. He received the A.B. from LIVINGSTONE COLLEGE in 1936; the A.M. from BOSTON UNIVERSITY in 1938 and the S.T.M. in 1942. Livingstone College awarded him the D.D. degree in 1949.

He served as pastor of Wadsworth Street A.M.E. Zion Church, PROVIDENCE, R. I., 1936-39; Rush Church, CAMBRIDGE, Mass., 1939-44; Wesley Center Church, PITTSBURGH, Pa., 1944-68. He was elected bishop on May 13, 1968, and assigned to preside over the Twelfth Episcopal District which comprises OKLAHOMA, TEXAS, ARKANSAS, and GEORGIA Conferences.

Bishop Foggie has served as chairman of the Department of Cultural and Racial Relations in the Council of Churches of the Pittsburgh Area; chairman of the Board of Directors of the Housing Authority, City of Pittsburgh; Life Member, National Association for Advancement of Colored People, and president of the Pittsburgh Branch; member, Board of Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra; and a member of the Mayor's Advisory Committee on the Poverty Program of that city.

DAVID H. BRADLEY

FOLSOM, WILLIS F. (1825-1897), a native American Choctaw Indian preacher, was born in MISSISSIPPI in 1825. Coming with his parents to the new Choctaw nation during the migration of 1832, he attended a mission school where he was "soundly" converted. He himself writes, "I did not know what the preacher was talking about, for I did not know the language. But my heart hurt for something. For days I waited and struggled and prayed, not knowing just what I was saying; when suddenly my whole soul was filled with light and joy. Immediately I felt that I must learn what was in the Bible, that I might tell it to my people."

At the INDIAN MISSION CONFERENCE of 1858, Folsom was ordained a local DEACON by Bishop JOHN EARLY. One historian says of him, "During the days of the Civil War, almost alone at times, he held the remnant of the Church together." He was admitted into full connection late in life. He died in 1897, and lies buried in LeFlore County of Eastern Oklahoma.

OSCAR FONTAINE

FOLSOM TRAINING SCHOOL in Kiamichi Mountains (1919-1933) of Oklahoma, U.S.A., was located at Smithville, McCurtain Co., Okla. It was established by the Board of Missions of the M. E. Church, South, in 1918. The school was designed to give educational opportunities to underprivileged Indian and white children of OKLAHOMA and ARKANSAS.

E. A. Townsend became superintendent in 1919. He taught local children. No buildings were erected and his service was discontinued after one year.

William Bertram Hubbell became superintendent in 1920. He supervised building the school, chose a faculty acceptable to State accreditation, and in September, 1921, class work began with the sixth grade and continued through the twelfth grade. The school enrolled from 150 to 200 children per year.

The Folsom Training School (sometimes spelled Fulson before 1927) was an educational institution, a social center, a demonstration agency, a welfare organization, and an industrial center. It sought to help every person by training "the heart, head and hand."

The economic depression came in 1933 and the school was closed. The campus and other properties were sold. All buildings were moved away except Sealy Chapel, which was transferred to the local Methodist Church and continues in use.

The Chronicles of Oklahoma, Vol. XLII, No. 1.
Journals of the Oklahoma Conference, 1919-32.

CLARENCE ELMER NISBETT

FONDREN, WALTER WILLIAM (1877-1939) and ELLA COCHRUM FONDREN (1880-), American church leaders and philanthropists, of TEXAS. Fondren was born in Union City, Tenn. on June 6, 1877, the son of a farmer, who in 1883 moved his family to ARKANSAS in a covered wagon. Orphaned at age ten, the son worked on farms and in sawmills until, when seventeen, he set out for Texas "with nothing but a pair of overalls and thirty cents." In 1897 he left the job as a farm hand, at fifty dollars a year and board, to "roughneck" or to serve as a helper on an oil drilling rig. When oil was discovered at the famous Spindletop field in 1901, he was prepared to enter the boom as a skilled rotary driller, moved from field to field, gradually acquired oil interests himself and became one of the nine founders of Humble Oil and Refining Company. Fondren "was in his day regarded as the outstanding driller on the Gulf Coast," he "made an indispensable contribution to Humble's early success . . . He was intelligent, open-minded, and progressive," and had "strength of character." He retired in 1933, partly to join with Mrs. Fondren in giving more attention to their philanthropic interests. He and Mrs. Fondren had been active church members for many years.

W. W. FONDREN

Ella Cochrum was born in Kentucky on June 1, 1880; and married Fondren in 1903. She and Fondren created the Fondren Foundation and have made immeasurable gifts to hospitals, schools, and various church causes, many of them Methodist. Among the most significant individual gifts have been Fondren Library, Memorial Health Center, and Fondren Science Building at SOUTHERN METHODIST UNIVERSITY, Dallas, Texas; Fondren Science Building at SOUTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY, Georgetown, Texas; Fondren Library, Rice University, Houston, Texas; Fondren Hall, SCARRITT COLLEGE, Nashville, Tenn.; and large gifts to such causes in HOUSTON as The Methodist Hospital, The Institute of Religion at Texas Medical Center, Baylor University College of Medicine, St. Luke's Episcopal Hospital, Texas Children's Hospital, Center for Retarded Children, Center for Negro Children, Center for Mexican Children, and the Methodist Home, Waco, Texas. The Fondrens were on many boards of trustees of such institutions as those listed above, and since his death (Jan.

5, 1939) Mrs. Fondren has continued and expanded these interests. She has served on several national boards of the church, is a member of the National Hall of Fame in Philanthropy of The United Methodist Church, Honorary Fellow of the American College of Hospital Administrators, and has been given the LL.D. degree by Southern Methodist University; and L.H.D. by Southwestern University. Mrs. Fondren has been a lay delegate to the GENERAL and JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCES since 1940.

Henrietta M. Larson, History of the Humble Oil and Refining Company. New York: Harper and Brothers, 1959.

WALTER N. VERNON

FOOT, HUGH MACKINTOSH (1907-), British statesman, was born on Oct. 8, 1907. His father, ISAAC FOOT, was a staunch Methodist and Liberal, becoming Secretary for Mines in the 1931 coalition government, and in 1937, vice-president of the Methodist Conference. Hugh Foot was educated at Leighton Park and at St. John's College, Cambridge; in 1929 he became president of the Cambridge Union. From Cambridge he went to Jerusalem as a member of the British administration, the beginning of a long and liberal career in the colonial service. In 1939 he was made assistant British resident in Jordan. In 1947, after being colonial secretary in Cyprus and JAMAICA, he was appointed chief secretary in NIGERIA. In 1951 he became captain-general and governor-in-chief of Jamaica, helping the country toward independence in many ways. In 1957 he went back to Cyprus as governor and commander-in-chief; his mission was to bring peace between Greek and Turkish Cypriots. From the first he tried to do this by establishing personal contact with the leaders, even offering to meet the Greek guerrilla leader, Colonel Grivas, in secret. After long negotiations, Cyprus became independent in 1960. In 1961 Foot joined the United Kingdom delegation to the United Nations as ambassador and principal adviser on emergent and newly emerged countries, and as representative on the Trusteeship Council. In the following year, however, he resigned because of disagreement with the British government's policy on Rhodesia, a matter which he considered to be of fundamental importance. He then worked for the United Nations until Harold Wilson became British Prime Minister in 1964; Foot was then appointed as permanent British representative to the United Nations, made a member of the government, and given a life peerage. He took the title of Lord Caradon. In 1951 he had been made a K.C.M.G. (Knight Commander of the Order of St. Michael and St. George) and in 1953 a K.C.V.O. (Knight Commander of the [Royal] Victorian Order).

PETER STEPHENS

FOOT, ISAAC (1880-1960), British Methodist solicitor and politician, was born in Plymouth, Devonshire, of which he became a leading citizen, mayor in 1921, and lord mayor in 1945. From 1922-24 and from 1929-35, he was Liberal M. P. for Bodmin, Cornwall. He was a member of the Round Table Conference on INDIA and BURMA from 1930-31; and secretary for mines from 1931-32. He was made a privy councillor in 1937. A LOCAL PREACHER, temperance advocate, and Sunday school worker, he was a regular member of the Conference, and served on the Committee for METHODIST UNION from 1913-32, the Hymnbook Committee, and was elected vice-president in 1937. A convinced Free Churchman, he was also chairman of the Cromwell Association. His son, HUGH FOOT, is Lord Caradon, 1966 representative of the United Kingdom in the United Nations. Isaac Foot died on Dec. 13, 1960. His valuable library of Bibles, Civil War tracts, and Wesleyana was bought by the University of California.

H. MORLEY RATTENBURY

FOOTE, GASTON (1902-), American minister and author, was born in Comanche County, Texas, Sept. 6, 1902, the son of Charles and Ola (Smith) Foote. He received the M.A. and B.D. degrees at SOUTHERN METHODIST UNIVERSITY and Th.D. at LIFF SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY. He holds an honorary D.D. degree from Miami University in Ohio; LL.D. from WILBERFORCE; and Litt.D. from TEXAS WESLEYAN. He married Lucy Lee Young in 1927 and they have a son.

Foote was admitted to NORTHWEST TEXAS CONFERENCE in 1924, serving in Amarillo and Pampa, Texas; he was at Winfield Church, LITTLE ROCK, 1936-41; First Church, MONTGOMERY, Ala., 1941-45; Grace Church, DAYTON, Ohio, 1945-52; and First Church, Ft. Worth, since 1952.

Publications include Keys to Conquest, Lamps Without Oil, The Words of Jesus From the Cross, Communion Meditations, Living in Four Dimensions, Footnotes, The Transformation of the Twelve, and How God Helps.

Dr. Foote has been for twenty years the religious editorial writer for the Ft. Worth Star Telegram. He has been a delegate to the JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCES of the Church since 1948, and to the GENERAL CONFERENCE in 1952, 1964, 1968 and 1970. He is a member of the General Board of Social Concerns of the church; has been a member of the Executive Committee of the Board of Trustees of Texas Wesleyan College since 1952; is former president of the Ft. Worth Area Council of Churches; and former president of the Central Conference Board of Missions.

Clark and Stafford, Who's Who in Methodism. 1952.

N. B. II.

FOOTE, HERBERT JOHN (1876-1957). American clergyman, who became widely known as an authority on penology, was born at Little Bay, Newfoundland. As a youth he came to MASSACHUSETTS and attended school in Woburn and TILTON SCHOOL, Tilton, N. H., where he heard the call to the ministry. He then entered BOSTON UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY.

After serving as supply pastor in Wilmot and Brookline for two years each, he was admitted on trial into the NEW HAMPSHIRE CONFERENCE, 1901, and into full connection, 1903. On June 2, 1903, he married Grace Sawyer of Haverhill, Mass. His other appointments were Enfield and West Canaan, 1902-03; Nashua, Arlington Street, 1904-05; Sunapee, 1906-10; Suncook, 1911-15; Littleton, 1916-20; Lincoln, 1921-26; Marlboro, 1927-37; Field Agent for the Preachers' Aid Society, 1935-48. He achieved much for the Conference Pension Program. He died Feb. 15, 1957; memorial services were conducted at the Enfield Methodist Church, Enfield, N. H. Burial was in Hillside Cemetery, Haverhill, Mass.

H. J. Foote served the State of New Hampshire as trustee of the state prison for twenty-five years, and as a member of the Prison Parole Board for four years, during which time he became widely known as an authority on prison affairs. For years he was a trustee of the Daniel Webster Home for children.

Journal of the New Hampshire Conference, 1957.

WILLIAM J. DAVIS

FORCE, MANNING (1789-1862), American minister, was born in New York City in 1789. He was apprenticed to a hatter in Denville, N. J., at sixteen years of age and was converted in a class meeting at Parsippany. He was licensed to preach on Oct. 14, 1809, and received on trial in the PHILADELPHIA CONFERENCE in 1811. His first appointment was Flanders on the Asbury Circuit, where Bishop ASBURY had preached to a thousand people in 1787.

Force then served in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Newark, Asbury Circuit, Trenton, Bristol, Bergen, the East Jersey and Newark Districts, Morristown and other circuits. He was elected a delegate to all the GENERAL CONFERENCES from 1824 to 1848.

In 1857, Force took the supernumerary relation in the NEWARK CONFERENCE and made his home at Flanders, where he aided in the erection of a new church for which he gave $1,000. He died in Sussex County, N. J., on Feb. 22, 1862, and was buried in the Flanders Methodist Cemetery.

New Jersey Conference Memorial, 1865.

Newark Conference Minutes, 1862. VERNON B. HAMPTON

FORD, JOHN (1767-1826), American pioneer, was born in SOUTH CAROLINA on Feb. 27, 1767, a son of James and Celia (Levis) Ford. John Ford in 1791 married Catherine Ard, who was born in South Carolina, Nov. 23, 1773. They became the parents of twelve children. John Ford served in the legislature of South Carolina and after moving to MISSISSIPPI about 1807, he became a member of the Constitutional Convention of 1817 that wrote the first constitution of Mississippi. After living for a time in Jefferson County, he later built a home that is still standing near Pearl River in Marion County, and in this he entertained the MISSISSIPPI ANNUAL CONFERENCE in 1818, over which Bishop MCKENDREE presided. Mississippi had just the previous year been admitted to the Union.

At some unknown time, John Ford became a local Methodist preacher and exercised his gifts as such though he never sought admission into the conference nor served as supply pastor of any charge. Three of his sons became Methodist preachers, John Ford, Jr., Thomas Ford, and Washington Ford, and two of his daughters married Methodist ministers. Ann married Thomas Griffin and has numerous descendants in the state, and Samantha married Miles Harper and likewise has many grandchildren and great-grandchildren in most of the southern states. All of the Ford children have descendants scattered throughout the United States, many of them holding places of authority and responsibility in the economic life of the nation as well as in its political affairs.

John Ford died at the old home in Marion County in 1826 and was buried in the family cemetery nearby in an unmarked grave. His wife, Catherine Ard Ford, lived many years after the death of her husband and was buried in the Eppes cemetery in northwest LOUISIANA by her son, John Ford, Jr.

The family home in Marion County still stands, a somewhat melancholy reminder of days that are gone. The hospitality of the founder, who entertained bishops, annual conferences, and generals, has continued through the years.

J. B. CAIN

FOREKNOWLEDGE OF GOD, THE. This is an attribute of the Divine nature which is included in His omniscience. The Scriptures everywhere affirm God's divine prescience. The Christian faith has ever held to the conviction that God "knows all things simply and absolutely." "In God there is no succession of acts, all is present to Him always, the past as well as the future; everything is as if it were happening now, nor is there anything in all the world which is not present to Him always." (Pohlepreuss, "God; His Knowability, Essence, and Attributes." Catholic Dictionary, St. Louis, 1921.)

In common with the mainstream of Christian thought, Methodist theology has affirmed that a true measure of responsible moral choice in man is not inconsistent with the divine foreknowledge, and that divine foreknowledge can be upheld apart from the doctrines of Particular Election and Predestination associated chiefly with Calvinist theology. God foreknows what man will freely do. Admittedly the common sense of the plain man will find an element of mystery remaining in this difficult speculative issue. Nevertheless, as Bishop SIMPSON puts it: God's prescience is "knowledge and not influence. Simple knowledge is no cause of action, nor can it be conceived to be causally connected with exerted power or mere knowledge; therefore, an action remains free or necessitated, as the case may be. A necessitated action is not made a voluntary one by its being made foreknown, nor is a free action made a necessary one." It may indeed be argued that we men have a limited degree of power to foresee the probable actions of other men, though this does not take away their power of choice. Therefore it is imaginable that the infinite mind of God should have the power of foresight to an unlimited degree, so that to Him foreknowledge of what man will freely do is more than a mere probability.

Thus it is in the established tradition of Christian philosophy that John Wesley writes: "With God nothing is past or future, but all things are equally present. He has therefore, if we speak according to the truth of things, no foreknowledge, no afterknowledge. Yet when he speaks to us, knowing whereof we are made, knowing the scantiness of our understanding, he lets himself down to our capacity, and speaks of himself after the manner of men. Thus, in condescension to our weakness, he speaks of his own purpose, counsel, plan, foreknowledge."

Some have expressed this in the proposition that "God reads history and the future just as we are able to read it in the past." Certain philosophers, among them John Stuart Mill, have held that God does not foreknow, and that it is not necessary for Him to have foreknowledge. John C. Roper, of South Carolina, was a protagonist of this view. Others have held that if God can see in advance, and has all power, he is directly responsible either for the salvation or the loss of human souls. Thus some have brought forward the doctrine of the divine foreknowledge as an argument in favor of the doctrine of Particular Election, though an informed Calvinist theologian would not agree that the two propositions are necessarily connected. So when Wesley speaks of foreknowledge and human freedom he is clearly aiming his argument against Calvinist exegesis. However, following Augustine it can also be maintained that God who is outside time, and who made time when he made the world, is in an entirely different category from anything humanity can comprehend.

Bishop Simpson observed that foreknowledge is affirmed in the Scriptures in the sense also of the fore-approval of God. Thus it is written of believers that they were fore-known. "God hath not cast away his people which he foreknew" (Romans xi 2), "For whom he did foreknow, them he also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his Son" (Romans viii 29). This can be taken to mean that foreknowledge of faith and obedience among men is made the ground of their predestination until eternal life. Or it can mean that the government of the whole human race is in the hand of a God who has a foreseeing purpose, and whose wisdom is never taken unawares by the current of events.

Olin A. Curtis, The Christian Faith. New York: Eaton and Mains, 1905.

M. Simpson, Cyclopaedia. 1878.

N. B. H.

FOREST METHODISTS. JAMES CRAWFOOT, a LOCAL PREACHER in the Northwich Circuit, in Cheshire, was removed in 1807 from the Wesleyan preachers' plan because in an emergency he had preached for the INDEPENDENT METHODISTS of Warrington. He was accustomed to hold monthly meetings at his house in the Forest of Delamere and this group became known as the Forest Methodists. The services were marked by exhortation, varied with singing and prayer, and sometimes there were those who fell into trance conditions and had visions, they themselves remaining unaware of what was happening in the meeting itself. These effects suggested to some people that Crawfoot and his friends were under evil influence and hence the name of Magic Methodists.

G. Herod, Biographical Sketches. 1855.

JOHN T. WILKINSON

FORK CHURCH, formerly one of five churches in the Long Green Circuit, located in Baltimore County, Md., U.S.A., is one of the oldest churches in Methodism. It was organized in 1773, in his Majesty's colony of MARYLAND which was named for Queen Henrietta Maria, wife of Charles I. The original Fork Church sanctuary was a log structure on land donated by a local artisan, James J. Baker.

The community was named Fork because it was located at the juncture of the Joppa and Baltimore-Philadelphia Roads. Over the latter Francis Asbury rode on horseback regularly and is reputed to have preached in the old church while on journeys to BALTIMORE, some fifteen miles to the South.

In 1850 the log church was replaced on the same site by a brick structure. While attending Sunday school there in the latter part of the nineteenth century, the writer remembers well the small balcony in the rear, still in use, which was reserved for the Negro slaves until 1863, and which from habit some of their descendants used in his time.

In later years a fine church school building has been constructed, extending perpendicularly to the west of the old brick church which is still standing on a hillock, with a magnificent view of the country for many miles round about.

The current membership is over 250, with comparative increases in membership in church school, and the Women's Society of Christian Service.

GUY E. SNAVELY

FORLINES, CHARLES EDWARD (1868-1944), American M. P. minister, theologian, scholar and president of WESTMINSTER THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, was born in Clarks-ville, Va., on Aug. 2, 1868, and was reared by his grandmother in Alamance Co., N. C. Denied formal education during his early years, he was limited to such study as he could accomplish by himself while working in a cotton mill. According to tradition, he was able to keep his threads perfect and read at the same time. Later he drove his buggy filled with books and read as he went from place to place. Admitted to YADKIN COLLEGE, he became an outstanding student under the guidance of President George W. Holmes. Later, he won a scholarship to WESTERN MARYLAND COLLEGE where he graduated in 1897. He attended student conferences at Northfield where he met Dwight L. Moody. Licensed to preach in the M. P. Church, he joined the NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE in 1897. He finished Westminster Theological Seminary in 1901, and then was pastor of LaGrange and Albermarle Circuits in NORTH CAROLINA. His intellectual attainments attracted the attention of President THOMAS HAMILTON LEWIS of ADRIAN COLLEGE, and Forlines taught philosophy and theology there, 1903-05. He was appointed to the chair of Systematic Theology and Church History in Westminster Theological Seminary, 1905-35; became acting president of the Seminary in 1934, and president from 1936-43.

Forlines' interests and extensive knowledge covered the entire field of theology and church history and related Biblical studies. His hobbies were nature and astronomy. Children and adults alike enthusiastically responded to his rare ability to tell the famous Joel Chandler Harris 'Br'er Rabbit Stories.' He organized the first Boy Scout Troop in Westminster, Md. It was said of him, "Dr. Forlines, as a great teacher, during a third of a century (did) . . . as much as any single living man to shape the pattern and destiny of ministers of the Methodist Protestant Church."

At the union of American Methodism, Forlines was appointed by the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1940 on the Commission on Rituals and Orders of Worship. In the debate over whether to use "Holy Ghost" or "Holy Spirit" in the Apostles' Creed, Forlines made a motion that the Creed be published so as to make either one of these names available. Forlines combined an unusually incisive intellect with a practical understanding of all matters having to do with people and the Church.

J. Elwood Carroll, History of the North Carolina Conference of the Methodist Protestant Church. Greensboro, 1939.

Journal of the North Carolina Conference, MP.

Richard Larkin Shipley, ed., Finding God Through Christ. Articles by C. E. Forlines. Nashville: Abingdon-Cokesbury, 1947.

Who's Who in the Clergy, 1935-36.

RALPH HARDEE RIVES
M. J. SHROYER

FORMOSA. (See TAIWAN.)

FORT COLLINS, COLORADO, U.S.A. First Church was organized in 1869 when Fort Collins had been founded only five years. Methodists were living in the area when the military fort on the banks of the Cache la Poudre River was abandoned, and traders, trappers, and settlers who had arrived at the place where mountains and plains met, decided to make this their home. The town which they laid out was given the name of the military fort which had previously occupied this site.

As early as 1867, religious services were held occasionally in homes by O. P. McMain, a circuit rider, but it was not until 1869 that a minister, G. W. Swift, was appointed to a circuit which gave Fort Collins regular service. In 1880 the church became a station.

During its first 100 years the church occupied four sites as it attempted to minister to a growing community. The first building, dedicated in 1876, was a small frame building costing $1,000. Due to swampy conditions, and the running of the Colorado and Southern railroad tracks adjacent to the building, the church was moved to a second location and enlarged. But by 1896 the congregation had outgrown this structure. A third site was secured and a building erected in downtown Fort Collins. This building, enlarged and improved on four different occasions, housed the congregation for the next sixty-six years. During that time the church ministered to a growing community, and to increasing numbers of students from Colorado Agricultural and Mechanical College (later Colorado State University).

The church in 1964 consecrated a new million dollar building, the first step in a community plan which would ultimately bring into being a second Methodist church. In the new structure the church drew upon the creative imagination and skills of this present age to give form and shape to its faith in God and his designs for men. Its complex of buildings provide space for worship, education, and fellowship for a congregation with 2,765 members and a constituency equal to its membership. Membership has increased during the past ten years by forty-eight percent, attendance at worship services by ninety percent, and the budget by 250 percent. The church now employs a staff of four ministers. The church begins its second century of ministry to the community by seeking to develop its program as a response to the needs of Fort Collins and the world. It continues to occupy a position of unique importance in its impact upon students and the many young families moving into the area because of the educational, economic and recreational advantages provided in northern COLORADO.

Fort Collins Coloradoan, June 28, 1939; Aug. 14, 1964.

HENRY H. BAKER

FORT LAUDERDALE, FLORIDA, U.S.A. Park Temple Church was organized as First Methodist Church in the summer of 1911 with twenty-nine charter members. J. A. Kahl was the first pastor and R. A. Carmine was the district superintendent. In January, 1912, L. S. Rader, a retired Methodist minister living in Miami, was appointed by the ST. JOHNS RIVER CONFERENCE to serve the new church. During the next two years the church grew rapidly under his leadership. After meeting in several temporary locations, the church began its first building in 1912. It was completed at a cost of $4,000 and dedicated on March 30, 1913, as Trinity Methodist Church.

The church prospered and soon became one of the leading churches of the conference. In 1924 a larger building was erected at the present site at a cost of $36,627, with a $5,000 pipe organ. The building was dedicated March 1, 1925, named Park Street. In 1927 it became Park Temple Methodist Church.

Pastors who have served Park Temple are J. A. Kahl, 1911; L. S. Rader, 1912-14; O. T. Uselman, 1914-16; J. R. Werrick, 1916; J. G. Morrison, 1917; A. C. Adams, 1918; C. C. Nelson, 1918-20; J. T. Williams (supply); William Thompson, 1920-22; S. E. Lavhon, 1922-24; Alfred Evenden, 1924-26; George B. Thomas, 1926-29; Jesse L. Murrell, 1929-33; James W. Marlin, 1933-40; John H. Hanger, 1940-53; George A. Foster, 1953-61; Lewis N. Head, 1961-66; Gaylon L. Howe, 1966-68; M. C. Cleveland, 1968—.

Four men have entered the ministry from Park Temple. Through the program of church extension in the district, five new churches have been sponsored: Melrose, Christ, Wesley Chapel, Aldersgate and Plantation. Each of these churches is now serving a vital need in the community.

Park Temple is now one of the strong churches of Florida Methodism with a membership of 2,506 and a vigorous program in all phases of its mission.

GAYLON L. HOWE

FORT SMITH, ARKANSAS, U.S.A. First Church, the mother church of Methodism of this city, was a pastoral appointment first in 1840. Prior to that time JOHN HARBELL, pioneer circuit rider and missionary to the Indians, had preached here as early as 1833. Under his leadership the first church structure was erected in 1853.

Two congregations were organized from First Church in 1886, and continued their separate existence until they united in 1916 and erected the present sanctuary in 1919. Since then First Church has helped to organize seven other churches in Fort Smith, and its present membership is 3,746, with a church school enrollment of 1,815. It is the largest church in the NORTH ARKANSAS CONFERENCE.

Among those who have served as pastor of First Church are F. S. H. Johnston (father of Warren Johnston), O. E. GODDARD, Marion Nelson Waldrif, E. R. Steel (father of Marshall T. Steel), Bishop DANA DAWSON, and for twenty-one years Fred G. Roebuck. Bishop PAUL V. GALLOWAY was at one time assistant pastor.

The benevolent giving during a recent year was $55,000. Its missions projects include the full support of one missionary and major support of another, and there has been a gift of $25,000 for a new hospital in Mathura, INDIA, the support of a community center in Fort Smith and numerous other newer churches of the city. Its members were among the founders of the Methodist Nursing Home of Fort Smith.

J. A. Anderson, Arkansas Methodism. 1935.

Mrs. J. C. Billingsley, The Story of a Church Across One Hundred Years. 1942.

JOHN A. BAYLISS

FORT WAYNE, INDIANA, U.S.A., population 175,000, is the seat of Allen County. Fort Wayne became an important city for transportation, first by canal and then by railroads. Hence light and heavy industry has grown in many types.

Almost from the beginning, Protestantism in the OHIO valley was characterized by revivals and CAMP MEETINGS.

Fort Wayne was in the heart of this movement. In 1830 the Maumee Mission was established. In 1840 the old Berry Street Chapel was constructed, and four years later the first session of the NORTH INDIANA CONFERENCE was held in this church, presided over by Bishop BEVERLY WAUGH, Sept. 24, 1844.

In 1846 the Fort Wayne Female College was founded. About the turn of the century, this institution was moved to Upland, Ind., and is known as Taylor University.

In 1970 there are eighteen Methodist churches in Fort Wayne with a membership of 15,449.

L. LYLE CASE

FORTH WORTH, TEXAS, U.S.A., was settled in 1843 and incorporated in 1873. John W. Chalk claimed that he preached the first Methodist sermon in Fort Worth. Since the EAST TEXAS CONFERENCE (MES) appointed Chalk to the Bonham Circuit in December, 1854, since that circuit lay next to Fort Worth which was then in the TEXAS CONFERENCE, and since that conference's appointments for that year say that Fort Worth was "to be supplied," it is likely that Chalk preached in Fort Worth early in 1855.

Fort Worth does not appear by name in the appointments of either of the Texas conferences in 1855 or 1856, but in December, 1857, the Texas Conference created the Fort Worth District with James G. Johnson as presiding elder. At the same time Walter S. South was appointed to the Fort Worth Mission. The next year the mission reported 107 members. In 1873 a lot for a parsonage was purchased, and in 1874 the first building for what was to become First Church was erected. Prior to 1874, worship services were held in the homes of the people and in a Masonic hall. In 1875 Fort Worth became a station, and in 1876 it reported 172 members. A second church was established in the town in 1888 and a third one in 1889. By 1910 when the CENTRAL TEXAS CONFERENCE was formed, there were eight churches in the city, and at unification in 1939 the M. E. Church, South had some 23 churches in Fort Worth with more than 16,000 members.

The M. E. Church reentered Texas in 1867, and for the first ten years its conferences included both white and Negro ministers and churches. The Texas Conference (ME) appointed T. Wilson to the Fort Worth Mission in 1873. The minutes do not indicate whether Wilson was white or colored. In 1877 the white ministers and churches were set off as the Austin Conference, and its minutes for that year show that Fort Worth was to be supplied. In 1880 the Fort Worth Church, which came to be known as St. Paul's, reported 98 members. By 1900 it had nearly 400 members, a level of strength which it maintained for twenty-five years or more. However, by the time of unification in 1939, its membership had dropped to 182.

The appointments of the WEST TEXAS (Negro) CONFERENCE for 1877 do not include Fort Worth. However, beginning in 1878, that body regularly appointed a preacher to the city, though in some years it was linked with Dallas or some other nearby place to make a two-point work. In 1900 the Negro church in Fort Worth reported 87 members. By the time of unification in 1939, the West Texas Conference had four churches in Fort Worth with a total of some 2,300 members. The West Texas Conference continued in the Central Jurisdiction, and in 1969 it had five churches in Fort Worth with a total of 2,326 members.

There are seven A.M.E. and six C.M.E. churches in Fort Worth, and the EVANGELICAL METHODIST, the FREE METHODIST, and CONGREGATIONAL METHODIST CHURCHES are represented by one congregation each in the city.

The United Methodist Church has several strong institutions in Fort Worth. Polytechnic College, founded in 1891, became Texas Woman's College in 1914, and on becoming coeducational in 1934 the name was again changed to TEXAS WESLEYAN COLLEGE. It now has about 2,000 students, an endowment of $6,000,000, and a plant valued at $7,500,000. Harris Methodist Hospital, which now has over 600 beds and property valued at more than $15,000,000, was established in 1930. The church maintains a Bethlehem Center, a Negro Community Center, and a Wesley House which ministers to Mexican Americans.

In 1965 Fort Worth Methodism was divided into two districts—Fort Worth East and Fort Worth West. Each district has thirty-one charges. A metropolitan board of missions was then created to pool financial resources and direct the building of new churches when and where needed in the metropolitan area.

In 1969 the Central Texas and West Texas Conferences of The United Methodist Church reported a total of forty-two churches in Fort Worth, with 41,632 members, property valued at $26,625,405, and $1,920,922 raised for all purposes. In 1970 the West Texas Conference merged with the overlying conferences of the South Central Jurisdiction.

JESSE A. EARL
ALBEA GODBOLD

Arlington Heights Church is an urban church located in the Arlington Heights sector of the city and on the former site of Camp Bowie, where the now famous World War I 36th Division of the Army was based. Founded in 1922 by E. H. Lightfoot, the first building was an old wooden barracks. Now it is one of the strongest congregations in the city and in the Central Texas Conference. It was the first location in Texas (1951) to install the Mass-Rowe Symphonic Carillon Bells, and thus became known as "the church of the bells." Its recently completed (1967) educational facilities are considered by many as the most modern and efficient in the area. Its 2,000 members are proud that the church is located in one of the largest cultural and fine arts centers in the southwest. In walking distance are museums of many different kinds of fine art, theaters, the famous Will Rogers Coliseum, Fort Worth Children's Museum, Nobel Planetarium and Observatory. Each Sunday many out of city and state visitors find their way to its worship services.

LEWIS SOMMERMEYER

First Church. The first Methodist sermon in Fort Worth was probably delivered by John W. Chalk in 1855. In 1874 a frame church was erected at Fourth and Jones Streets. It was replaced by a brick structure "with imposing steeples" in 1887. First Church's third edifice, costing more than $100,000, was built at Seventh and Taylor Streets in 1908. In 1929 when the church had 3,000 members, a million dollar cathedral arose at Fifth and Florence Streets, and for years the congregation carried a debt of more than $300,000. In 1945 the obligation was discharged and the edifice was dedicated.

In 1955 First Church built Epworth Hall, a $350,000 activities and recreational building, which serves as the center of a ministry to people who live in a large housing project nearby. The church maintains a full-time director of activities who works in cooperation with welfare agencies and the area council of churches. Lyle Lodge, a camp twenty-five miles from Fort Worth, which is considered a part of First Church's worship and service program, is also used in connection with the ministry that centers in Epworth Hall.

Two men who served as pastors of First Church, EDWIN D. MOUZON and HOYT M. DOBBS, were elected to the episcopacy in 1910 and 1922, respectively.

In 1969 First Church reported 5,253 members, property valued at $3,130,000, and $216,814 raised for all purposes.

JULIA MORRIS
ALBEA GODBOLD

Matthews Memorial Church began as Hemphill Heights with twenty charter members in the summer of 1912. That fall W. S. P. McCullough was appointed as pastor of Highland Park and Hemphill Heights. In 1914 Hemphill Heights became a station with R. A. Langston as pastor, and the next year the church reported 201 members. The first building was erected at Lipscomb and Shaw Streets at a cost of $25,000. In 1932, due to an unsuspected defect in the foundation, the church building was condemned and the congregation had to move into an old warehouse. In 1935 the present location at 2416 West Berry Street was acquired, and in 1937 the first floor of a spacious and modern church was completed. The church was then named for W. H. Matthews, who had been a leading layman and whose family had assisted with the building project. In 1939 there were 660 members, and over 1,000 by 1950. In the latter year the building was valued at nearly $300,000. In 1960 the church had 2,315 members and a plant valued at nearly $1,000,000. The church has a paid staff of sixteen, and it supports a full-time missionary in South Africa.

In 1969 Matthews Memorial Church reported 2,623 members, property valued at $1,112,010, and $117,537 raised for all purposes.

N. H. KUPFERLE, JR.

Meadowbrook Church was formed in 1928 by merging two congregations in eastern Fort Worth, Sagamore and Sycamore. At the time Sagamore had 402 members and Sycamore 255. Sagamore appeared in the conference appointments as early as 1913 and Sycamore by 1916. At one time they constituted a two-point work, and then they became station appointments before merging to form Meadowbrook. In 1929 Meadowbrook reported 735 members. Its membership passed the 1,000 mark in 1948, and it exceeded 2,000 in 1962. The church projected one building program in the late 1950's, and it completed another in 1968. In 1970 Meadowbrook Church reported 2,065 members, property valued at $1,313,123, and $167,117 raised for all purposes.

H. BROWN LOYD

Polytechnic Church was established in 1892 in what was then Polytechnic, Texas. Beginning with thirty-six members, the congregation worshipped in the old Polytechnic College until a brick building was erected on the southwest corner of the campus. C. A. Evans was the first pastor. The congregation now worships in its third building which is located on the southeast corner of the campus. The site was deeded to the church by TEXAS WESLEYAN COLLEGE (successor of Polytechnic). The two institutions have cordial relations; some college classes are conducted in the education wing of the church.

Endeavoring to meet the needs of the community, Polytechnic Church conducts a tutoring program in southeast Fort Worth where a Methodist church closed because of a change in population. Some students and some staff members from Texas Wesleyan College are involved in the tutoring program. The church building which had closed is now used for worship and as a community center.

Among well-known ministers who have served Polytechnic Church are CLOVIS G. CHAPPELL (1914-15), EUGENE B. HAWK (1916-19), and Hayden Edwards (1947-55). Three lay members of the church have served as mayor of Fort Worth.

In 1970 Polytechnic Church reported 2,806 members, property valued at $1,072,200, and $179,811 raised for all purposes.

C. C. SESSIONS

Westcliff Church was organized Oct. 12, 1952. K. O. Scott was the first pastor. In 1953 the church reported 101 members. Fourteen years later Westcliff, with 2,077 names on the roll, had the distinction of being the most recently organized church in the Central Texas Conference to grow to 2,000 members. In 1969 the church reported 2,279 members, property valued at $748,176, and $197,025 raised for all purposes.

General Minutes, ME, MES, TMC, UMC.
M. Phelan, Texas, 1924.

Lyle K. Williams, History of Meadowbrook Church. 1862.
ALBEA GODBOLD

FORTY FORT MEETING HOUSE

FORTY FORT MEETING HOUSE, near Wilkes-Barre, Pa., is still standing in that borough on the edge of one of the most beautiful rural cemeteries in the country. It is said that more Methodist clergymen are buried there than in any other cemetery in the WYOMING CONFERENCE territory. It is the oldest and most historic church edifice in northeastern Pennsylvania. Stepping inside the building, 50 x 42 feet, is to enter another age. There are box-shape pews with perpendicular backs and wooden doors, two winding stairways leading to the high square galleries on three sides, and a twelve-foot high pulpit which dominates the scene. Built as a community worship center by Congregational Church settlers from CONNECTICUT, the building was used more by Methodists than any other religious group.

The people of Kingston Township set aside two lots for religious purposes in 1799, and funds were finally available to build a meeting house in 1807. The building was erected in 1807-08, and in June 1808, the first services were held. Bishop ASBURY's second visit to the Wyoming Valley was made in July 1807. He wrote, "I went to the woods and preached." The woods he referred to was the grove where the new church was being built.

In 1809, the Methodists held their first QUARTERLY CONFERENCE in the church. In 1811, Bishop Asbury came to the Valley again, and noted in his journal for Sunday, August 4, "Preached in the Methodistico-Presbyterian (sic) Church at Kingston."

GEORGE PECK began his ministry as a full member of the GENESEE CONFERENCE on the Wyoming Circuit in 1818. He noted, "I preached my first sermon on the circuit in the old church at Forty Fort, Sunday morning, August 9, the day after my 21st birthday." Through the years, many other famous Methodists occupied the pulpit, such as LORENZO DOW in 1833. Great revival meetings were held there. Those who were converted, and their families, later became the leading citizens in the Wyoming Valley.

No changes have been made to the original building, except that there are more modern shutters on the second story windows. The church is still used regularly for Sunday worship services, but limited to the summer months, as no heating system has been installed to replace the original stoves. After 160 years, it is one of the very few churches having an interior that remains unchanged.

The battleground of the Wyoming massacre, nearby, lends additional interest to the old church. The name "Forty Fort" originated from its proximity to the old fort, 40 x 40 feet, which was used by families about 200 years ago as a refuge from the hostile Tories and Indians.

Wilkes-Barre Record, Aug. 7, 1968. RALPH NEWING

FORWARD MOVEMENT was a phrase current in late-nineteenth-century British Wesleyan Methodism: it expressed the recognition by men like HENRY POPE and HUGH PRICE HUGHES that Wesleyan Methodism must try to cross the gap which was operating between it and the urban working class. Hence the "Central Halls," of which about forty were opened between 1880 and 1900. The Central Hall made a virtue of not looking like a church, inside or out; it had a band, instead of an organ; usually had no Communion rail; provided hymnsheets, instead of hymnbooks, etc. Much welfare work was done, and the usual hall provided sober amusements on the premises.

The Wesleyan halls were very successful in the first generation, but had ceased to innovate by 1914. The real weakness of the Forward Movement was its philosophy. As J. SCOTT LIDCETT said later: "I could not be content with appeals that sought rather to palliate existing evils by charitable help than radically to reconstruct the existing organization of society on the basis of righteousness and the comradeship of brotherly love." On the one hand, Wesleyan thinkers like SAMUEL E. KEEBLE moved on to varieties of Christian socialism; on the other the development of the welfare state took over and secularized much of the social work which the Central Hall had set out to do.

H. P. Hughes, Social Christianity. London, 1889.

———, The Philanthropy of God. London, 1890.

K. S. Inglis, Churches and the Working-class in Victorian England. London, 1963. JOHN KENT

FOSS, CYRUS DAVID (1834-1910), American bishop, was born at Kingston, N. Y., Jan. 17, 1834, the son of Cyrus and Jane (Campbell) Foss. His father was a Methodist preacher, and two of his brothers joined him in the itineracy. He was educated at Amenia Seminary and WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, graduating from the latter in 1854 at the head of his class. He served as an instructor and later as principal at Amenia. He held the D.D. degree from Wesleyan (1870), and the LL.D. from CORNELL COLLEGE, Iowa (1879) and the University of Pennsylvania (1889). He married Mary E. Bradley, March 20, 1856, and after her death in 1863, he married Amelia Robertson, May 10, 1865.

Foss joined the NEW YORK CONFERENCE in 1857 and served two years at Chester. Transferred to the NEW YORK EAST CONFERENCE, he served the following appointments in BROOKLYN: Fleet Street, 1859-61; HANSON PLACE, 1861-63; and South Fifth Street, 1863-65. Transferred back to the New York Conference in 1865, he had the following appointments in NEW YORK CITY: St. Paul's, 1865-68; Trinity, 1868-71; St. Paul's, 1871-74; and St. James, 1874-75. In 1875 he became president of Wesleyan University and in the next five years paid off its debts and gave it financial stability.

Foss was a delegate to the 1872, '76, and '80 GENERAL CONFERENCES, and to the 1891 ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE. He served as fraternal delegate to the 1878 General Conference of the M. E. Church, South, and to the British Wesleyan and Irish Wesleyan Conferences in 1886. A man of recognized ability, Foss was elected bishop in 1880. He officially visited Methodist missions in Europe, 1886; in MEXICO, 1893; in INDIA and MALAYSIA, 1897-98; and made a tour of missionary observation around the world, 1906-07. His official residence was in MINNEAPOLIS, 1880-88, and thereafter in PHILADELPHIA. A number of his addresses were published. He was the author of two books: From the Himalayas to the Equator (1899), and a volume of sermons, Religious Certainties (1905). After his presidency at Wesleyan University, he served on its board of trustees. He was president of the Board of Church Extension of his church, 1888-1906. He died in Philadelphia, Jan. 29, 1910, and was buried at Pawling, N. Y.

General Minutes, ME.

Cyrus David Foss, 1834-1910. Philadelphia, 1911 (privately printed).

F. D. Leete, Methodist Bishops. 1948.

Who Was Who in America, 1897-1942. JESSE A. EARL ALBEA COBOLD

FOSTER, RANDOLPH SINKS (1820-1903), American bishop, was born Feb. 22, 1820, at Williamsburg, Clermont Co., Ohio, the son of Israel and Polly (Kain) Foster. The family moved to KENTUCKY, and the youth attended AUGUSTA COLLEGE. A gifted boy preacher, friends unwisely advised him to quit college while a sophomore and enter the itineracy. In September 1837, he joined the OHIO CONFERENCE and was appointed junior preacher on the Charleston, W. Va. Circuit. He was ordained DEACON in 1839 and ELDER in 1841. In July, 1840, he married Sarah A. Miley of CINCINNATI; she died in 1871. While serving successive pastorates in Ohio, he acquired an enviable reputation as a preacher. At Wesley Chapel, Cincinnati, 1848-50, he became famous because he ably defended the doctrines of Arminian Methodism against the attack of N. L. Rice, a noted Presbyterian preacher and controversialist. Foster's defense was published as a book, Objections to Calvinism, in 1849.

RANDOLPH S. FOSTER

In 1850 Foster transferred to Mulberry Street Church, New York, and except for three years (1857-60) as president of NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY, he spent the next eighteen years as a pastor in and about New York, serving such churches as Greene Street, Eighteenth Street, Washington Square, Trinity, Sing Sing, and Pacific Street (Brooklyn). He did not stay at Northwestern because at the time it was an infant institution with limited resources and because he had no liking for the responsibilities and duties which devolved upon him as president. In 1868 he became professor of systematic theology at DREW THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY and served as president, 1870-72. Later he declared that no part of his career was more gratifying to him than the years at Drew when he worked with young men preparing for the ministry.

A delegate to the 1864, '68, and '72 GENERAL CONFERENCES, Foster was elected bishop in 1872. He accepted the office with reluctance, declaring that he preferred the theological chair to the wearying cares of the episcopal office. He was an effective bishop twenty-four years, retiring in 1896. At times he was accused of harshness and arbitrariness in the exercise of episcopal power. As a bishop he visited all the mission fields of the church in Europe, Asia, and South America.

Foster was a voluminous writer. His books included: The Nature and Blessedness of Christian Purity (1851), Philosophy of Christian Experience (1890), and Studies in Theology (in six volumes) published between 1889 and 1899. In addition, he produced a number of essays and lectures. Foster was noted as a pulpit preacher, combining keenness of intellect with eloquence. As a boy EDWIN H. HUGHES was impressed with the length of one of Foster's sermons. Later Hughes said of it, "When the sermon began, I was twelve years old; when it ended, I was two hours and twenty minutes older!" Bishop F. J. McCONNELL declared that Foster "was a combination of exalted mental and intense emotional power." Foster died at Newton Center, Mass. May 1, 1903.

Dictionary of American Biography, Vol. 6.
F. D. Leete, Methodist Bishops. Nashville: Parthenon, 1948.
Methodist Review, Vol. 20, January, 1904.
F. J. McConnell, By the Way. 1952.

JESSE A. EARL
ALBEA GODBOLD

FOUKE, WILLIAM HARGRAVE (1851-1923), American bishop of The UNITED EVANGELICAL CHURCH, was born Oct. 30, 1851, at Shepherdstown, Va. In early childhood he moved with his family to Shannon, Ill., where he joined the EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION and was licensed to preach by its Illinois Conference in 1876. He married Mary Tobias in 1877, and they had four children. For the next twenty years he served in ILLINOIS. When denominational division occurred, he cast his lot with the United Evangelical Church, serving it as presiding elder (1896-1902), editor of Sunday school literature (1902-10), bishop (1910-18), and Associate Editor of The Evangelical (1918-22). In 1922 his unitive labors bore fruit when The United Evangelical Church and the Evangelical Association united to create THE EVANGELICAL CHURCH. Another of his lasting contributions was the Keystone League of Christian Endeavor, the denominational youth organization created in 1891. A man of irenic, devout spirit, Fouke served his denomination as a selfless and gentle shepherd. He died in Ottawa, Ill., on Feb. 6, 1923.

R. W. Albright, Evangelical Church. 1942.
The Evangelical-Messenger, Feb. 19 and 26, 1923.
David Koss, "Bishops of the Evangelical Association, United Evangelical Church, and Evangelical Church." Manuscript.

K. JAMES STEIN

FOUNDERY, the first solely Methodist society organized in LONDON by JOHN WESLEY (1739), to which he later withdrew with his supporters from the FETTER LANE SOCIETY. (See LONDON: Foundery.)

FOUNTAIN, WILLIAM ALFRED (1870-1955), American bishop of the A.M.E. Church, was born in Elberton, Ga. He was educated at MORRIS BROWN COLLEGE (A.B., 1900), TURNER THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY (B.D., 1902) and NORTHWESTERN (M.A., 1919). He held honorary degrees from four different institutions including Morris Brown and WILBERFORCE. He was licensed to preach in 1892, and admitted to the Georgia Annual Conference (AME) in 1892. He served pastorates in GEORGIA and NORTH CAROLINA and was a presiding elder in Georgia, elected bishop in 1920, and died in 1955. He was a member of every General Conference from 1900 to 1952.

During his administration in Georgia, the membership reached 114,000, the largest of any district in the connection, and the support of this district for Morris Brown College was of great help in making this by 1948 the largest A.M.E. college. Bishop Fountain organized an A.M.E. church in Vancouver, Canada, the Fountain High School in British Guiana, and took in 1,000 members in St. Croix in the Virgin Islands. He was retired by the General Conference of 1952 as he had gone completely blind during 1950-51, after serving thirty-two years as an active bishop. Fountain Drive was named for him in southwest ATLANTA, on which his episcopal residence was located. There is a Fountain High School in Georgetown, British Guiana, and one in San Juan, Trinidad; also A.M.E. churches are named for him in Atlanta and MACON, Ga.; Alexandria, La.; Tallahassee and JACKSONVILLE, Fla.

R. R. Wright, The Bishops. 1963. GRANT S. SHOCKLEY

FOUT, HENRY HARNES (1861-1947), American U.B. bishop, was born at Maysville, W. Va., Oct. 18, 1861. He graduated from SHENANDOAH COLLEGE, Dayton, Va., 1886, and was ordained in the CHURCH OF THE UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST (later to be the Evangelical United Brethren Church), 1887. He served a circuit and was graduated from the Union Biblical Seminary (now UNITED THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY) in 1890. He was pastor of the Oak Street Church, DAYTON, Ohio, nine years. In 1899, he was elected presiding elder of the Miami Conference. He was married to Adah Catherine Pierson, and they had one daughter.

From 1901-13 he was editor of Sunday school literature. In 1913, he was elected bishop and served twenty-eight years, supervising the Northwest Area, in the states of INDIANA, ILLINOIS, MICHIGAN, WISCONSIN, and MINNESOTA, with residence at INDIANAPOLIS, Ind.

Bishop Fout traveled widely, once covering Palestine on horseback, and, by appointment of President Woodrow Wilson, served on the Near East Relief Commission. In 1936, he was delegate to the World Sunday School Convention held in OSLO, NORWAY.

He was a pulpit orator of rare type. Few churchmen had interviews with the presidents, senators, judges, as did he. He was a scholar, author, statesman, warm friend. His book Nineteen Hundred Pilgrimages was published in 1900.

Bishop Fout died from an accident, Dec. 5, 1947, while walking across the street to his church in Indianapolis, Ind. Burial was at Dayton, Ohio.

Koontz and Roush, The Bishops. 1950. GALE L. BARKALOW

FOWLER, CHARLES HENRY (1837-1908), American bishop, was born in Burford, Ontario, Canada, Aug. 11, 1837, the son of Horatio and Harriet (Ryan) Fowler. His maternal grandfather, HENRY RYAN, an Irish preacher, was one of the founders of Methodism in Upper CANADA. The family moved to ILLINOIS in 1841, where Charles spent his early years on a farm. He was educated at Genesee Wesleyan College, Lima, N. Y., graduating with honors in 1859. He entered law school, but after his conversion on Christmas evening, 1859, he went to GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE, graduating there in 1861. Later he received the first D.D. degree awarded by that institution. WESLEYAN and SYRACUSE UNIVERSITIES conferred on him the LL.D. degree. He married Myra A. Hitchcock in 1868, and they had a son, Charles Hitchcock Fowler, who became a distinguished layman in NEW YORK.

Fowler joined the ROCK RIVER CONFERENCE in 1861 and in the next eleven years served Jefferson Street, Clark Street, Centenary, and Wabash Avenue churches in Chicago. Called "Whirlwind Fowler," his dramatic lectures on the great Chicago fire of 1871 raised $40,000 to help rebuild churches and schools. His reputation made, his friends believed he could do anything. In 1872 he was elected president of NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY, not because of his educational equipment but because a big job was to be done and he seemed the most resourceful man in sight to do it. In four years he enlisted the support of powerful Chicago businessmen and made Northwestern a strong school. Fowler served as editor of the Christian Advocate, 1876-80, and increased its circulation to the highest point ever up to that time. He was corresponding secretary of the Missionary Society, 1880-84, and his business ability and inspiring oratory altered the whole missionary outlook of the church.

In 1874 Fowler was one of the fraternal delegates to the GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church, South, and his address to that Conference was said to have been the "first olive branch extended to that church since 1844." The governor of Illinois appointed him to deliver an oration at the Centennial Exposition in PHILADELPHIA in 1876. In 1898 he was fraternal delegate to the Wesleyan Conference in Great Britain. Four times a delegate to the General Conference, 1872-84, he was elevated to the episcopacy in 1884. His successive official residences were: SAN FRANCISCO, 1884-92; MINNEAPOLIS, 1892-96; BUFFALO, 1896-1904; and New York, 1904-08. An able leader, he presided over conferences in every part of the United States, visited all the mission fields of his church, started the Twentieth Century Forward Movement which raised $20,000,000, organized Peking and Nanking Universities in CHINA, launched the first Methodist church in St. Petersburg (Leningrad), RUSSIA, established Maclay College of Theology in southern CALIFORNIA, and assisted in founding NEBRASKA WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY. Fowler's knowledge of men and his executive skill enabled him to select the right men for important posts. He was a popular and appealing preacher, combining the humorous and majestic. He published Fallacies of Colenso Reviewed (1861), Wines of the Bible (1878). His addresses were published under the following titles: Missions and World Movements (1903), Missionary Addresses (1906), Addresses on Notable Occasions (1908), and Patriotic Orations (1910). He died in New York, March 20, 1908, and was buried in Woodlawn Cemetery.

Dictionary of American Biography.

M. Simpson, Cyclopaedia. 1878.

Who Was Who in America, 1897-1942.

JESSE A. EARL
ALBEA COBOLD

FOWLER, HENRY HARTLEY, First Viscount Wolverhampton (1830-1911), British Wesleyan Methodist and statesman. Son of JOSEPH FOWLER, he was born at Sunderland on May 16, 1830, and was educated at WOODHOUSE GROVE. He became a solicitor in 1852, moving to Wolverhampton in 1855. He was mayor of Wolverhampton in 1863, was first chairman of the town's school board, and sat as Member of Parliament there from 1880-1908. He began his ministerial career as undersecretary at the Home office 1884-85; he was president of the Local Government Board with cabinet rank in 1892. He became secretary of state of India in 1894-95. In the years after Gladstone's retirement he was often mentioned as a possible leader of the Liberal Party; he was chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster 1905-08, and lord president of the Council 1905-10. He received his viscounty in 1908. From 1876 he had been associated in a legal partnership with another prominent Wesleyan layman, ROBERT PERKS. Fowler died on February 25, 1911.

E. H. Fowler. Life of H. H. Fowler. London, 1912.

H. M. RATTENBURY

FOWLER, JOSEPH (1791-1851), British Methodist, father of the first Methodist peer, Viscount Wolverhampton (HENRY H. FOWLER), was born at Bradford, Yorkshire, in 1791. He entered the Wesleyan ministry in 1811, and was secretary of the Conference in 1848. He was regarded as one of the leaders of the Conference opposition to the dominance of JABEZ BUNTING, and between 1827 and 1849 kept a private journal of the Conference debates. This has since disappeared, but from it BENJAMIN GREGORY gave many extracts in Side Lights on the Conflicts of Methodism (1898), our chief source of information about Fowler himself. He died in London on March 17, 1851.

C. E. LONG

FOWLER, LITTLETON (1802-1846), American minister, evangelist, and financial agent for two colleges, was born on Sept. 12, 1802, in Smith City, Tenn. Responding to CAMP MEETING appeal in Caldwell County, Ky., he joined the M. E. Church in 1819. In 1826 he was licensed to preach by the KENTUCKY CONFERENCE. In 1829 he was assigned to LOUISVILLE, where his success is indicated by his receiving 250 new members into the church. He joined the TENNESSEE CONFERENCE in 1832, and for four years, 1833-37, he served LA GRANGE COLLEGE as financial agent. This institution, located ten miles from Florence, Ala., was founded in 1830 by the Tennessee and MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCES. La Grange College, the first college to operate in ALABAMA, closed for lack of sufficient funds and then turned over its buildings and records to the present State College at Florence, Ala.

In 1837 Fowler went as a missionary to the Republic of Texas. There he organized and served as PRESIDING ELDER of six different districts. In 1842 Fowler became the financial agent for Ruterville College, which had been named, as was Ruterville, for MARTIN RUTER, Fowler's colleague in Texas. Later this college amalgamated with three other colleges, prematurely organized, to become SOUTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY in Georgetown, Texas.

Littleton Fowler was a delegate to the memorable GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1844, and the next year was a delegate to the convention held in Louisville, Ky., where was organized the M. E. Church, South. He was a man of fair education, strong intellect, and a powerful pulpiteer. He died Jan. 19, 1846.

Appleton's Encyclopedia.

M. Simpson, Cyclopaedia. 1882.

Guy E. Snavely, The Church and the Four-Year College. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1955.

GUY E. SNAVELY

FOX, DANIEL ORMSBY (1835-1909), was born in Canajoharie, N. Y., January, 1835, and was educated at NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY (M.A.) and GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE (B.D.). He was ordained in 1862, and on Dec. 1, 1872, arrived in BOMBAY, INDIA. He was one sent by the missionary society in response to WILLIAM TAYLOR'S urgent request for workers in Bombay. The enlarged staff made more bazaar preaching possible there, and also in Poona.

The church in Poona grew under Fox. Among the converts was WILLIAM F. OLDHAM, later bishop, who pays tribute to Fox and his influence. Oldham, with two others, lived in bachelor quarters in Poona and gave little thought to religion. Hearing that an American was holding service in a hall, they went, expecting to see and hear William Taylor. Instead, "Behind the table was seated a grave man, bearded, but not of the striking appearance we had been led to expect. It was not William Taylor, but one of his lieutenants, Daniel O. Fox."

Oldham did not find the beginning of that service attractive except for the singing. But when Fox preached, he seemed to have Jesus immediately at his side. Because of this testimony, and that of many others of the group, William F. Oldham became a Christian and gave a lifetime of exceptional service to the church.

The work started in Poona spread to Karachi when the 56th Regiment, with thirty-six Christian converts, was transferred in 1873. Fox went with them, and in January he organized a church there. He appointed Sergeant Seale, a convert and a very earnest local preacher, as his pastor, and in a short time as many as 115 had joined the church. On May 27, 1876 a beautiful house for the worship of God, together with a small parsonage, were dedicated by Fox free of debt.

For three years, Fox served the church as pastor. His later service was in Bombay, where he was presiding elder, and again in Poona in charge of English and Marathi work. He died in Poona in November, 1909.

B. H. Badley, Indian Missionary Directory. 1892.

The Christian Century, April, 1937.

J. N. Hollister, Southern Asia. 1956.

JOHN N. HOLLISTER

FOX, THOMAS (1809-1889), served as a schoolteacher and LOCAL PREACHER in NEWFOUNDLAND for sixteen years prior to 1845, when he was asked by the district meeting to supply Hant's Harbour mission, for which no missionary was available. In 1847 he was sent to the Grand Bank Mission where, under his ministry, a revival began. The effect of this was felt in other communities in the area. In 1856 he was received as a candidate for the ministry by the Eastern British America Conference, on recommendation of the Newfoundland district. He was ordained in 1860 and served several charges in Newfoundland until his retirement in 1876.

Minutes of the Eastern British America Conference, 1856.

"Minutes of the Newfoundland District of the English Wesleyan Methodist Conference, 1829-1850" (manuscript).

H. M. Mosdell, When Was That? St. John's: Trade Printers, 1923.

T. W. Smith, Eastern British America. 1890.

N. WINNOR

FOXALL, HENRY (1758-1823), foundryman, friend of FRANCIS ASBURY and Methodist layman, was born at Monmouthshire, England, May 24, 1758. His parents, followers of WESLEY, moved to West Bromwich, near Birmingham, England, where Henry learned to be an iron founder. In 1794 he went to Ireland as foreman of iron foundries in Dublin and Carrick-on-Shannon.

Foxall moved to PHILADELPHIA, Pa., U.S.A. in 1797 and started the Eagle Iron Works in partnership with Robert Morris, Jr. When the United States government moved to WASHINGTON, D. C., Foxall established a foundry dry at Georgetown in 1800. He manufactured guns and other ordnance for the government until 1816.

Converted by his first wife, Ann Hayward, and an itinerant Methodist preacher, Foxall began to preach as an exhorter, and then as a lay minister. He was the principal contributor to the Georgetown, D. C. Methodist Church. He gave generously to Mt. Zion Church, Georgetown, to Ebenezer Church in Washington, and the Methodist Church in NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA. He was elected to elder's orders by the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE in 1814.

Bishop Asbury, who had served as an apprentice at the forge of Foxall's father in Birmingham, England, frequently stayed with him in Philadelphia and Georgetown.

Following the British invasion of Washington in 1814, Foxall, in a spirit of thanksgiving that his establishment had not been destroyed in the burning of the city, provided a new church for Washington Methodists. He built historic Foundry church and deeded it and the land to the trustees in 1816.

He was trustee of the Georgetown Lancaster School Society, president of the Georgetown Bible Society in 1818, mayor of Georgetown, 1819 and 1820, and a manager of the American Colonization Society from 1819 to 1823. Foxall died at Handsworth, near Birmingham, England, on Dec. 11, 1823, and was buried in the churchyard at West Bromwich, England.

Madison Davis, The Old Cannon Factory Above Georgetown, D. C., and Its First Owner, Henry Foxall. N.p., n.d. Records of the Columbia Historical Society. 1908.

Mollie Somerville, "Henry Foxall: Distinguished Early American Foundryman," The Iron Worker. 1960-61.

HOMER L. CALKIN

FOY, CAPTAIN, British Methodist, sea captain of Bristol, who on Feb. 15, 1742, suggested that the members of the society should each give a penny a week to pay off the debt on the preaching house in the Horsefair, Bristol, with the further proposal that the richer members should also make themselves responsible for the contributions of those unable to afford them. This introduced a principle which was to govern the whole system of Methodist finance. It was further decided that the society should be divided into little companies or classes, one person being appointed to collect the money each week. From this developed the pastoral office of CLASS LEADER. The identity of Foy is doubtful, the family being a large one in the city at that time.

J. Wesley, Journal, ii, 528; Works, xiii, 259.
Wesley Historical Soc. Proceedings, xix, 64-65.

N. P. GOLDHAWK

FRANCE is a republic (the most westerly state) of Central Europe, whose record is written large in universal history. A strong agricultural country of 213,000 square miles and a population of over 50,000,000, France has seventy-five percent of its population in urban areas, and this proportion is growing. Paris and its district have approximately 8,500,000 people.

Roman rule and roads helped Christianity to be well planted in France by the second century, A.D.

In the struggle of the Reformation, from about 1530 onwards, French Protestantism gave to the world John Calvin (1509-64), the greatest architect of non-Catholic Christianity. Though driven underground, French Protestants had an influence out of all proportion to their numbers. However, it is estimated that from being fifty percent of the population in 1550, Protestants were down to twenty percent by 1600 (St. Bartholomew's Day Massacre intervening in 1572), twelve percent by 1800, two percent by 1900, and 1.7 percent in 1964.

It was scarcely likely that French Protestants would welcome apparently highly emotional Methodist lay-preachers who might be expected to worsen their precarious existence. Yet Methodist coastal traders from Guernsey left their mark in France, and in 1791, the year of Wesley's death, the British Conference officially appointed a preacher, William Mahy of Guernsey.

The work had been started (like so many Methodist overseas missions) by a layman, Jean Angel, a Guernsey trader, who finding himself storm-stranded at Courseulles-sur-Mer (a fishing port near Caen) on a Sunday afternoon, attended a Protestant gathering. It was a congregation of women; they asked Angel if he would read and expound the Scriptures. Angel chose the story of Jesus and the Samaritan woman. One said afterwards, "For forty years I have been persecuted for my religion but not until today have I understood real religion."

Angel's report inspired THOMAS COKE to visit the same area in France and later Paris in the hope that the Fall of the Bastille might open France to the Gospel. It was not to be. Coke had earlier determined to master French and to lead a mission to France. When JOHN WESLEY asked him to go to America in 1784, Coke agreed if he could "be assured that the door to France remains open."

Coke's dream was to be fulfilled by CHARLES COOK, and it was by his wisdom and zeal that French Methodism became an independent growth. Cook modelled his life on that of John Wesley. The complete itinerant, he preached in and out of doors. France had its own Conference by 1852. Cook was its first president and remained so until his death in Paris in 1858, having "traveled" in France (and elsewhere on her behalf) forty years.

By the time of Charles Cook's death, French Methodism had 180 churches, 30 ministers, 100 lay preachers, and 1,500 full members. Sharing the persecution meted out to all Protestants, it grew slowly but well. Its organization was truly Wesleyan—disciplined and connexional. It was able to resist alike the temptation to accept state-aid, and the fashion to exalt reason above revelation, to both of which many Protestants were attracted.

In 1862 a church was built in rue Roquepine, Paris. In a period in which the Roman Catholics were the state Church, it would not be recognized as a "church"; it was first registered as commercial property owned by a "ton-tine" of seven pastures and laymen, English and French. Later it became a "societe civile," and in 1906 with most other Protestant "churches" became an "association culturelle" which it still remains in French Law. Its first minister was WILLIAM GIBSON, seconded from the British Conference.

Believing that French Methodism had become too rural, Gibson founded the "Mission Methodiste Populaire" and built or rented centers in Paris, Rouen, Le Havre, and elsewhere, for aggressive evangelism. This Mission, together with several English congregations, was incorporated in the French Methodist connexion in 1895.

French Methodists, together with ministers and evangelists from DAHOMEY and TOGO, and missionaries of the French Reformed Church, helped from 1923 in the care of thousands of converts made in the IVORY COAST (then part of French West Africa) by the Liberian "Prophet" Harris.

CHAPELLE METHODISTE DE COURBEVOIE (SEINE)

West African students go to Paris to study and the (London) METHODIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY makes arrangements for their pastoral care. Part of the church premises have been transformed into a hostel for students; there are also regular services in English. Here also the training of English-speaking missionary candidates in French language and institutions is arranged. An English minister is appointed to superintend the work.

In 1939, the French Methodist Conference officially united with the French Reformed Church. A minority of French Methodist circuits felt obliged to remain separate. These continuing French Methodists had in 1969 eight circuits and twenty places of worship.

The Swiss Methodist conference maintains a minister in Strasbourg, with three churches, and the British Conference supports two churches in Brittany administered by the Société d'Évangélisation de Bretagne.

Eglise Réformée de France: The majority of the French Methodist churches joined the Presbyterians and the Congregationalists in 1939, and constituted a new Church known as Eglise Réformée de France. There were eight of these churches, and most of them were in the south of France.

In that section of France, Methodists had suffered in the past because of the treatment by them of ministers in the old Reformed churches. These ministers were state nominated and state paid, and as has been the case in other lands, they were often hostile to Methodism and especially to the preaching of conversion as done by Methodists everywhere. In 1905, in France, the State and the churches were separated, and no longer was a minister to be nominated by the State. As it turned out, the new generation of ministers in the Reformed churches were generally men with a real vocation who were not afraid of poverty for the sake of their calling. It was, however, difficult for the Methodists in the south of France to believe or to understand the change, and they would not enter the 1939 Union. They have, therefore, stayed as Methodists, and while not numerically strong, have refused to enter the Eglise Réformée Union.

The present president of the Synod (Conference), as this has remained, is M. le pasteur Samouélian, 1 rue Saint Dominique, Nîmes, Gard, France.

He is also in charge of the Book Room.

Emile C. Leonard, Histoire Générale du Protestantisme. Paris: Presses Universitaires de France, n.d.

R. D. Moore, Channel Islands. 1952.

Theophile Roux, Le Methodisme en France. Paris, 1941.

Raoul Stephan, Histoire du Protestantisme Français. Paris: Fayard, 1961.

ERRIS C. H. TRIBBECK

FRANCIS, WILLIAM CHARLES (1889-1963), Australian minister, military chaplain and Conference president, was accepted for the ministry in New South Wales in 1913. On the outbreak of World War I in 1914, he enlisted in the Australian Infantry Forces. In the Gallipoli campaign he was awarded the Distinguished Conduct Medal. Wounded in action, he returned to Ryde, Australia, and after a few months was appointed as a Chaplain to the Forces, serving in Palestine.

Returning to New South Wales, he was appointed by Conference to Samoa for two years. From 1921 to 1934 he served in Newcastle and country appointments, and from 1934 he was in SYDNEY. He was appointed Commissioner of the Victory Thanksgiving Fund after serving as Senior Chaplain in New South Wales Lines of Communication and Eastern Command.

He was appointed president of the NEW SOUTH WALES CONFERENCE in 1953.

AUSTRALIAN EDITORIAL COMMITTEE

FRANCO, THEODORICO JOSÉ TEIXEIRA (1883-1944), Brazilian lay preacher and musician, was born in the state of Baía. There he lived until a young man, and married Joanna Teixeira by whom he had four children. Later he moved to Santa Rita de Passa Quatro, in the state of São Paulo. He was a man of talent and culture, a band director and a musician.

Franco decided to dedicate himself to pastoral work and was ordained deacon by Bishop CESAR DACOROS in 1936, becoming a supply preacher. His pastorates included several stations in the city of São Paulo. Franco was diligent, especially gifted in personal evangelism and effective with young people. Franco served in the Brazilian Army, retiring as captain. During a revolution, he served as military chaplain with the São Paulo forces.

During his last years, he devoted himself to the composition of religious music and produced almost 200 pieces. He was preparing some of his poems and prose for publication, setting them to music, when he died in 1944. He was actually on his deathbed when he wrote the last of his musical compositions.

ISNARD ROCHA

FRANK, EUGENE MAXWELL (1907-), American bishop, was born in Cherryvale, Kan., Dec. 11, 1907, the son of Ade W. and Emma W. (Maxwell) Frank. He was educated at Kansas State College (B.S., 1930), GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE (B.D., 1932); and has received honorary degrees from BAKER UNIVERSITY (D.D., 1948), CENTRAL METHODIST COLLEGE (LL.D., 1957), and ST. PAUL SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY (D.D., 1962). In 1930 he married Wilma Alice Sedoris of Pittsburg, Kan., and they have four children.

Eugene Frank joined the KANSAS CONFERENCE in 1930, and served Tonganoxie, 1932-33; Americus, 1933-36; Olathe, 1936-42; Washington Avenue, KANSAS CITY, 1942-48; and First Church, TOPEKA, 1948-56.

Elected a bishop of The Methodist Church at the South Central JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCE in 1956, he was assigned to the MISSOURI Area, comprised of the MISSOURI

EUGENE M. FRANK

EAST and MISSOURI WEST CONFERENCES. He has served as president of the Metropolitan Church Federation of Greater St. Louis; member of the Board of Education of The Methodist Church; a member of the Executive Committee of the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL; a member of the General Committee on Family Life of the Church; chairman of the Commission on Methodist Information and Public Relations; and president of the Board of Trustees at the St. Paul School of Theology.

Bishop Frank has made several trips abroad and has been called upon by the COUNCIL OF BISHOPS to speak upon conditions which he found in the overseas work of The Methodist Church. He was a delegate to the World Methodist Conference in OSLO, NORWAY, 1961 and in LONDON, 1966, and the World Family Life Conference, Birmingham, England, 1965. During 1968-69 he served as president of the Council of Bishops.

Who's Who in America, Vol. 34.

Who's Who in the Methodist Church, 1966. N. B. H.

FRANKFURT AM MAIN, Germany, population 667,000, is an industrial and commercial center. It is the birthplace of PETER BÖHLER, the Moravian, who influenced JOHN and CHARLES WESLEY. The first Methodist meetings were held there by ENGELHARDT RIEMENSCHNEIDER in 1851. After hard beginnings, Frankfurt became one of the chief centers of Episcopal Methodism in Germany.

The First Methodist Church in Frankfurt is the mother church of about seven circuits in and around the city. The E.U.B. pioneer in Frankfurt was Wilhelm Weischedel, who founded the first circuit in 1903. Now The United Methodist Church (Evangelisch-methodistische Kirche) here has four circuits: Ebenezergemeinde (235 members), Erlösergemeinde (110), Rufergemeinde (250), Zionsgemeinde (440). These four circuits have a good chance of building up new congregations in the new housing areas and suburbs of the expanding city. In 1868 the theological seminary (Predigerseminar der Methodisten Kirche) moved from Bremen to Frankfurt. In 1968 it united with the E. U. B. seminary (Predigerseminar der Evangelischen Gemeinschaft) formerly in Reutlingen. The first Methodist Deaconess Order was founded here in 1876. Today the Frankfurt deaconess motherhouse, "Bethanien," owns two hospitals (350 beds).

After the Second World War the bishop's residence and publishing house moved to Frankfurt. The work in Frankfurt, as in all Germany, has been greatly strengthened by the Methodist-Evangelical United Brethren union.

L. ROTT/A. ELS

MARVIN A. FRANKLIN

FRANKLIN, MARVIN AUGUSTUS (1894-1972), American bishop, was born in White County, Ga., near Cleveland, on Jan. 19, 1894. He was the son of Charles Leonard and Eliza (Ledford) Franklin. He was educated at YOUNG HARRIS COLLEGE in his native state; at EMORY UNIVERSITY; and received an A.B. from the University of Georgia in 1915. He was awarded honorary degrees from BIRMINGHAM-SOUTHERN COLLEGE (D.D., 1937); MILLSAPS COLLEGE (LL.D., 1952); Emory University (D.D., 1957), and LAMBUTH COLLEGE (L.H.D., 1962).

He was licensed to preach in October 1910, and ordained a minister of the M. E. Church, South in 1917. He joined the NORTH GEORGIA CONFERENCE in 1913 and served at Center Mission as pastor, 1911-13; at Princeton Mission, 1914-15; Danielsville Circuit, 1916-19; Rockmart, 1920-22; Lawrenceville, 1923-24; Barnesville, 1925-26; Park Street, ATLANTA 1927-30. He then was transferred to the large Riverside Park Church in JACKSONVILLE, Fla., where he served four years. He then was transferred to the NORTH ALABAMA CONFERENCE and the Highlands Church, BIRMINGHAM, Ala., where he served as pastor from 1934 until he was elected bishop in July 1948, by the Southeastern JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCE.

On Nov. 24, 1915, he married Ruth Tuck of Athens, Ga., and to them were born two sons and two daughters. After the death of his first wife, he married Mrs. William Henry Lane of Jackson, Miss. on Dec. 2, 1953.

Bishop Franklin was elected president of the COUNCIL OF BISHOPS 1959-60, and was president of the Southeastern Jurisdictional College of Bishops two terms—once in 1961 to complete the one-year term of Bishop BACHMAN G. HODGE, deceased. Bishop Franklin was vice-president of the Methodist TELEVISION, RADIO AND FILM COMMISSION, 1952-64.

He was a member of the Board of Education, 1948-64; Methodist Commission on Promotion and Cultivation, 1956-64; Methodist Board of Evangelism, 1960-64; a consultant to Commission on Worship for revision of the Methodist Hymnal, 1960-64; he was a member of the Methodist Board of Publication, 1944-48; of Lay Activities, 1948-52; Board of Missions, 1948-52; and acted as president of the Board of Trustees, Millsaps College. He was also trustee at Emory University, of RUST COLLEGE, and of the LAKE JUNALUSKA ASSEMBLY. Bishop Franklin was a member of the GENERAL CONFERENCES of 1938, 1940, 1944, 1948, when he was elected bishop and presided over the General Conference of 1956 and 1960. In 1962 he received a University of Mississippi award as man of the year.

Bishop Franklin presided over the Jackson Area of The Methodist Church, which included the MISSISSIPPI, NORTH MISSISSIPPI, and MEMPHIS CONFERENCE of the Southeastern Jurisdiction. Upon retirement in 1964 from the Jurisdictional Conference, he continued to reside in Jackson, Miss., until his death Aug. 23, 1972.

Who's Who in The Methodist Church, 1966. N. B. H.

FRANKLIN, INDIANA U.S.A. The Methodist Home for Aged is non-profit, religious and charitable in its operation. The first unit was opened in 1957. The Home is located on a forty-acre site which was given to the INDIANA CONFERENCE of The Methodist Church by Grace Church, the Franklin Chamber of Commerce and other organizations and individuals. Franklin is a college town of about 10,000 people, twenty miles south of INDIANAPOLIS.

A second unit was completed in 1960, and the third unit was completed in 1965, when an employees' dining room was provided and the entire building air conditioned. Regular chapel services are conducted in a chapel seating 250. The balcony provides for those in wheel chairs. There is a state-approved Health Center, to serve fifty, with nursing staff on duty around the clock. Home members and cottagers together number about 330.

In addition to the main building there are cottages on a paved drive around three sides of the building, and the forty acres is beautifully landscaped. Total value of the Home is nearly six million dollars with only a small indebtedness in 1966.

W. D. KOEHNLEIN

FRANKS, SAMUEL, British Methodist, was JOHN WESLEY's book steward at the FOUNDRY from November 1759 to 1773. He was a pious and upright man, but of a sensitive disposition. A discrepancy in the accounts led him to take his own life at the Foundry.

N. P. GOLDHAWK

FRAZIER, JACOB TYLER (1840-1932), American minister, Confederate chaplain and leader of the HOLSTON CONFERENCE (MES), was born in Giles County, Va.,

Nov. 22, 1840. He was able to receive only three months formal schooling, but he became well read and was considered by many to be an extremely able preacher because of his great insight into scriptural truth. His constant reading of the King James Version of the Bible gave him a purified and enriched vocabulary, and was basic to his telling power of expression.

He enlisted in the Confederate army at the outbreak of the War Between the States and was with General Lee at the surrender. At the age of twenty he was a chaplain in the Confederate army, and was much beloved by the men, who fondly called him "the barefooted preacher." While with the Confederate army Frazier organized the first Young Men's Club of America in the South, composed of soldiers from five regiments. Although not affiliated with the parent group, its purpose of fellowship was the same, and it was called the Y.M.C.A. of Kemper's Brigade.

At the close of the war he went into the itinerant ministry. He was admitted to the Holston Conference (MES) in 1865, and was a powerful preacher for fifty-four years, serving in every capacity of the ministry on missions, circuits, stations, and districts. He was often called "the most widely known and admired preacher in the Conference." Great numbers of people were converted under his ministry.

Frazier was a simple man of compelling personality. He always gave the impression of tremendous physical power, and it is said that he could spring flat-footed, without using his hands, onto the back of a horse sixteen hands high.

This great vitality lasted throughout his life, as evidenced by his having preached to his neighbors at Chilhowie, Va. on his ninety-first birthday. He died Feb. 22, 1932, and was buried in Chilhowie.

I. P. Martin, Holston, 1945.

Minutes of the Holston Conference, 1932. L. W. PIERCE

FREDERICK, MARYLAND, U.S.A., the seat of Frederick County, was laid out in 1745 and incorporated in 1817. George Washington joined Braddock's staff here on his way to defeat at Fort Duquesne in 1755. Francis Scott Key lived here and is buried in Mt. Olivet Cemetery. Whittier's famed poem, Barbara Fritchie, begins: "Up from the meadows rich with corn, clear in the cool September morn, the clustered spires of Frederick stand, green-walled by the hills of Maryland." The town is situated forty-five miles north of WASHINGTON, D. C.

Methodism began in the county in 1770 under the preaching of ROBERT STRAWBRIDGE. Also, JOHN KING, one of the first Methodist preachers from England to come to America, preached in the county that year. EDWARD DROMGOOLE organized a Methodist society in the county in 1772, with JOHN HAGERTY, who later became a distinguished preacher, as the most active member. Frederick Circuit was organized in 1774, and it was one of the three (Baltimore and Annapolis were the other two) which existed in 1777. While traveling the Frederick Circuit in 1775, PHILIP GATCH was tarred by a mob which was led by a man enraged because his wife had been converted to Methodism. After meeting in private homes for twenty years, the society at Frederick secured a house of worship; it was 20 by 30 feet and had rude benches but no floor. In 1806 the building was enlarged and galleries were constructed. In 1828 it was enlarged again. In 1841 the church was incorporated. In 1842 a new church which had both galleries and a basement was erected. In 1866 that building was replaced by another which had galleries and lecture and Sunday school rooms. In 1929 the cornerstone for the present Gothic stone Calvary Church was laid, and the edifice was dedicated the next year. Calvary Church had 1,876 members in 1970.

Asbury M. E. Church was constructed in 1818 and additions were built in 1850 and 1870. It had 329 members in 1876, 215 in 1939, and 284 in 1970. Trinity M.E. Church, South was organized during the Civil War. It had 102 members in 1876, 253 in 1939, and 308 in 1970. The M. P. CHURCH had fifty members in 1876 and 233 in 1939. There is one A.M.E. CHURCH in Frederick.

UNITED BRETHREN work began in Frederick County before the denomination was formed. Francis Scott Key, author of the Star Spangled Banner, raised tunes in U.B. classes of Frederick County prior to the War of 1812. In 1800 the Church of the United Brethren in Christ was formed at the PETER KEMP HOME, then about one mile west of the city. It was not until 1871 that a class was formed in Frederick. In 1901 when the GENERAL CONFERENCE met in the city, offerings were received to purchase a memorial window in the new church building. The name Centennial Memorial Church was taken by the congregation at that time. In 1970 this church numbered 402 members.

In 1970 The United Methodist Church had five churches—Asbury, Brookhill, Calvary, Centennial Memorial, and Trinity—in Frederick, and they reported a total of 3,121 members, property valued at $1,920,500 and $237,623 raised for all purposes during the year.

E. S. Bucke, History of American Methodism. 1964.

Collier's Encyclopedia. 1965.

General Minutes, ME, TMC, UMC.

Historical Sketch of Calvary M. E. Church (pamphlet). 1930.

M. Simpson, Cyclopaedia. 1882. ALBEE GODBOLD

FREDERICKSBURG, VIRGINIA, U.S.A., population 15,000, located halfway between WASHINGTON, D. C. and RICHMOND, Va., often claims to be "America's Most Historic City." John Smith explored the area in 1608, the Virginia House of Burgesses recognized its strategic importance in 1676, and by 1700 a settlement had begun. The boyhood home of George Washington is located nearby and he was made a Mason in Fredericksburg. In 1862, the most important of the several "Battles of Fredericksburg" of the Civil War was fought. The economy of the region today involves farming, the largest cellophane plant in the world, and several large U.S. government installations.

Methodism had a difficult time in Fredericksburg prior to 1800. Bishop FRANCIS ASBURY travelled through this area often but could only write in his Journal in 1796 of "awful Fredericksburg." He did preach here several times later, and in 1816, while on the way from Richmond to BALTIMORE, Md., he died a few miles west of Fredericksburg in Spotsylvania County.

The Stafford Circuit of the M. E. Church had been established prior to 1800, and in 1802 the first minister, John Pitts, was assigned to Fredericksburg. By the 1820's the congregation had erected its second frame building, later used briefly by a Negro Methodist group, which for a few years constituted the only known congregation of Negro Methodists in Fredericksburg history. In the early 1840's a brick building was erected on the present site of the church. This was used by the M. E. Church, as it was then, until it was heavily damaged during the Civil War. In about 1845 Methodism in Fredericksburg split and the M. E. Church, South was established and erected a building. The two congregations worshiped separately until the 1870's when they united as the Fredericksburg M. E. Church, South, and became an appointment of the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE.

In 1882 the present sanctuary of the church was built and the Baltimore Conference of the M. E. Church, South was held here that year. In 1882 the membership numbered 267. It reached 500 in 1910, 1,000 in 1952 and peaked at 1,433 in 1963. In 1963, during the pastorate of J. William Ilough, the Fredericksburg Church became the first church of the VIRGINIA CONFERENCE to admit Negro members, two joining that year. This resulted in a loss of about 150 members. Some of this loss has since been recovered and the membership in 1970 is 1,331.

Any record of Methodism in Fredericksburg must include the name of JOHN KOBLER, affectionately known as "Father Kobler." John Kobler had been a Methodist minister but he located and had settled in Fredericksburg by 1817. He travelled widely raising money to build a church there. His home was bequeathed to the church as a parsonage. In 1966 this house, added to and remodeled several times, continued to serve as the parsonage. Several items of furniture made by John Kobler, notably a sideboard, a rocking chair, a chest of drawers and a kitchen table, remain in the parsonage. "Father Kobler" and his wife, Mary, are buried under the present church building.

A History of the Fredericksburg Methodist Church says: "From a most humble beginning, the Fredericksburg Methodist Church has grown to be a respected factor in the moral and spiritual life of the community . . ."

Besides the church whose history is outlined above there are six other United Methodist Churches in Fredericksburg community, namely: Eastland, Fletcher's Chapel, Hillcrest, New Hope, St. Mathias, and Tabernacle. These all belong in the Alexandria District of the Virginia Conference.

J. E. Armstrong, Old Baltimore Conference. 1907.

John J. Johnson, A History of the Fredericksburg Methodist Church. 1966. JOHN J. JOHNSON

FREE CHRISTIAN ZION CHURCH OF CHRIST was formed on July 10, 1905, at Redemption, Ark., by E. D. Brown, a conference missionary of the A.M.E. ZION CHURCH. He and ministers from other Methodist churches objected to what they considered a taxing of the churches for support of an ecclesiastical system and believed that the primary concern of the church should be the care of the poor and needy.

The doctrine and polity are Methodist with several minor alterations. The bishop, called the chief pastor, presides over the work and appoints the ministers and church officers. Pastors and deacons are the local church officers. There are district evangelists to care for the unevangelized communities.

A periodical, Zion Trumpet, is published in Nashville, Ark., where the headquarters of the church are located. There were at last report (1966) 22,260 members of 742 churches, with 340 ministers.

Yearbook of American Churches, 1971. J. GORDON MELTON

FREE CHURCH FEDERAL COUNCIL. The movement leading to the formation of a Free Church Council in Great Britain began in a congress in Manchester in 1892, and resulted in its organization in 1896. This council was composed of representatives appointed by local councils of the Free Churches, which rapidly spread and were later federated in county areas. The demand for a more authoritative body led to the formation in 1919 of the Federal Council of the Evangelical Free Churches, which was composed of members appointed by the authoritative assemblies of the various Free Churches. In 1940 the two councils were combined in the formation of the Free Church Federal Council, with a national council consisting of representatives appointed by the several Free Church denominations and an annual congress comprising mainly delegates appointed by the local councils. The Free Church Federal Council represents the interests of the Free Churches over against the Church of England, the Roman Catholic Church, and the Church of Scotland; promotes fellowship and coordination locally and nationally; and secures united action by the Free Churches when necessary. Its continuing activities relate to education, hospital chaplaincies, the British lessons council, and vigilance on legislative matters. There is an affiliated National Free Church Women's Council.

E. BENSON PERKINS

FREE METHODIST CHURCH HEADQUARTERS, WINONA LAKE, INDIANA

FREE METHODIST CHURCH, THE, is one of the Methodist bodies that unwillingly developed out of a reform movement in the GENESSEE CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church in the mid-nineteenth century. The reformers were called Nazarites. Their platform called for a return to the Wesleyan teaching of "scriptural holiness" and the more strict observance of Methodist rules on attendance at CLASS MEETINGS, family prayers, singing by the congregation, plainness of dress, simplicity and spirituality in worship, freedom for the slaves, freedom from oath-bound secret societies, and free seats in the churches. The conference leaders advocated a spirit of moderation and compromise. Ministers were not to speak on the slavery question on Sundays nor use the press to attack brother ministers holding divergent views. This group, centered in the Buffalo area, was called the Regency. B. T. ROBERTS, an honors graduate of WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, had joined the divided conference in 1848—which was a year of special tension.

Roberts had studied law, taught school, and, after a remarkable conversion, was active in church work and interested in social reform, especially freedom of the slaves. At the university he had been influenced by such spiritual leaders as STEPHEN OLIN and his classmate Daniel Steele, later a well-known theologian and author. Roberts' wife had lived in the home of her uncle, George Lane, Publishing Agent of the BOOK CONCERN. She was acquainted with Methodist leaders; four bishops attended her wedding. Roberts was a successful pastor. His churches enjoyed revivals resulting in membership gains. His sympathies were with the Nazarites. In time he became their leader and spokesman.

In spite of the conference warning on the use of the press, the Regency group used the Buffalo Advocate to belittle the Nazarites. To set the record straight, Roberts analyzed the writings of the Regency men and exposed their non-Methodistic position in an article, "New School Methodism." At the next conference, in a test of strength, Roberts' election as secretary failed by three votes. Immediately his character was arrested, and he was charged with "immoral" conduct in the publishing of the "New School" article. He was reprimanded and appointed to another church. Without his knowledge or consent, the offensive article was republished in pamphlet form. Roberts and a few sympathizers were expelled from the conference in 1858. Roberts appealed his case to the GENERAL CONFERENCE, rejoined the church, and continued to evangelize in Methodist churches.

The 1860 General Conference, submerged in slavery debate and the problems of the border conferences, by a narrow vote refused to consider the appeal on a technicality. Roberts and a few like-minded ministers were out of the church. Meantime, several hundred sympathizing laymen who had given Roberts financial support had been expelled from their churches.

A delegated convention composed largely of laymen met at Pekin, N. Y. Roberts approved the establishment of independent "free churches" in the cities but did not favor the organization of another denomination. Impatient delegates, however, felt different, and Roberts finally agreed. On Aug. 23, 1860, at Pekin, N. Y., the Free Methodist Church was organized, the name indicating approval of the "free churches" movement and opposition to pew renting, then prevalent. Roberts was named the first superintendent. Fifty years later, the Genessee Conference restored Roberts' parchments to his son, who was a minister in the church his father founded. Referring to these unhappy events, Ray Allen, then conference secretary, stated that the earlier action was "unjust, and therefore exceedingly unwise."

Roberts' love for essential Methodism, his refusal to capitalize on the conference division, and the high membership standards adopted, explain in part the slow growth of the new church. However, the Genessee Conference of the M. E. Church lost almost half of its members to the new movement. The truth of Roberts' statements was not challenged. In response to this crisis, Methodist bishops now strongly exhorted the preachers to "hearty prayers and responses, of praising God aloud" and to the preaching of holiness using the biblical and Wesleyan terms. On the other hand, the Free Methodist movement, now numbering over 130,000 members, was able to reach some who were being overlooked by the mother church.

Granted that in some areas there was excessive emphasis on dress regulations, on physical demonstration, and an overdeveloped spiritual introversion, in the main Free Methodists have insisted that the Christian gospel expresses itself in both orthodoxy and "orthopraxy." Christians, they believe, must witness to their faith by life and deed in spite of the ever present danger of pharisaism. Free Methodist lay witness has been unusual. Simplicity in all manner of living with a strong sense of mission and sacrifice for the sake of the cause has been characteristic of the movement. The "free seat" emphasis so that all persons might hear the gospel has inspired the church to an unusual overseas mission program. There has been a continuing social reform emphasis. Schools were established for liberated slaves after the Civil War. The church has opposed whatever hurts the bodies and souls of men. It prohibits its members from using, manufacturing, or selling tobacco, alcoholic beverages, and habit-forming drugs. Membership in secret societies, extremes in personal adornment, and worldly amusements out of character with Christian piety are disapproved. On the positive side, Free Methodists are now stressing evangelistic outreach and church extension by both personal witness and mass endeavor. They cooperate in social reform efforts and in evangelistic crusades with those of like faith. They continue to preach the doctrine of assurance and Christian holiness as "love in action." To save their own young people and to prepare them for the service professions and for the full-time ministry of the church, they maintain several fully accredited colleges and are affiliated with an accredited theological seminary. One instance of the emphasis on youth ministry is the Sunday school attendance which is two times the total adult church membership.

There are thirty-six conferences on the North American continent with approximately 1,300 local church organizations. A denominational radio broadcast has been released worldwide for over twenty years. The overseas churches on some twenty fields are organized into conferences and general conferences and coordinate with the parent organization. A "double in a decade" program was launched in 1960. Some churches have (1970) reached the goal.

Doctrine and Polity. Free Methodist doctrine is historic Methodist-Arminian teaching. However, in its Book of Discipline a new article on entire sanctification was added.

The government is a modified episcopacy. There are four bishops who are elected to four-year terms, reelection allowed. They preside over the annual conferences in North America and overseas. Each annual conference is superintended by one or more elders elected by the conference. The polity follows the Methodist pattern. Since the organization in 1860, laymen have had an equal voice with the clergy in the general and annual conference and their committees.

Each conference elects one or more of its elders to serve as district or conference superintendents. Each church receives periodic visits of the superintendent intended to advance both the temporal and spiritual interests of the society. Superintendents may be elected for a three-year term. There is no time limit. A stationing committee consisting of the bishop, the superintendents and an equal number of laymen elected by the annual conference, appoints annually each conference member to his field of service. There is no time limit on pastoral appointments.

Denominational headquarters are located on a beautiful fifteen-acre campus at Winona Lake, Ind. Departmental offices and the Free Methodist Publishing House, Light and Life Press, are housed in separate but adjoining buildings. There are approximately 200 persons employed at the headquarters complex. The publishing business exceeds one million dollars annually. Free Methodists contribute over $19,000,000 each year to the various programs of the denomination. The hospitals, orphanages and retirement homes are described in separate articles.

Administration. The General Conference is the highest "law-making and governing" body of the Free Methodist Church. It is composed of delegates elected by the annual conferences, proportionate to their membership, equally divided between ministerial and lay members. The bishops are members ex officio, and are responsible for the respective areas of the church over which they preside. Each bishop is also chairman of a commission of the Board of Administration.

The Board of Administration is the highest authority of the church in the interim of the general conferences. It is composed of two representatives (one ministerial and one lay) from each of the eighteen administrative districts, together with the bishops and the secretary of the general conference. The Board has four commissions of seven members each (including a bishop who is chairman): Administrative, Missions, Education, and Evangelistic Outreach. The Commission on Missions has two additional members appointed by the Woman's Missionary Society. Likewise, the Commission on Evangelistic Outreach has one additional member representing the Light and Life Men's Fellowship.

The work of the church is directed by the Board of Administration through the several commissions and inter-commission Boards. The Executive Committee of the Board coordinates the work of the four commissions.

1. The Administrative Commission supervises the general church budget, is the Publishing House Board of Control, and the Court of Appeals in the interim of general conferences. The Church and Parsonage Aid, Benevolent Institutions, and Retirement Programs come under this Commission.

2. The Commission on Christian Education has five departments: Sunday schools, educational institutions, young people, intermediate youth, and service training.

3. The Commission on Missions supervises the overseas missions program, the foreign-speaking groups in North America, and others as may be assigned by the Board of Administration.

4. Evangelistic Outreach promotes evangelism throughout the church, advises and assists in organizing new churches or relocating established congregations, and offers both architectural advice and financial assistance in building programs. The radio program and Men's Fellowship programs are under this Commission.

Inter-commission committees and boards handle investments, and the seminary and ministerial training programs.

The Canadian Executive Board is the Free Methodist corporation for CANADA. In all essentials, the Canadian churches are served by the several commissions on the same basis as in the States.

The Free Methodist World Fellowship, organized in January 1962, is an instrument for cooperative planning and action by the Free Methodist Churches of the world. Two overseas general conferences have been established, one in Egypt and one in Japan. Each general conference elects representatives to a Constitutional Council which reviews the constitutional legislation of its constituent members. The Constitutional Council serves as an instrument of coordination for the general conferences of the entire church, including North America. It will be understood of course that the organizational pattern described above is subject to change, and may be changed from time to time by the sovereign power of the church, viz., the general conferences through the Constitutional Council.

Christian Youth Crusaders is an organization for the elementary age group. It is promoted by the Director of Children's ministries of the Department of Christian Education. It began in 1939 as an outgrowth of special concern for the junior high ages. It was promoted by the Department of Sunday Schools until 1953. In 1955 Cadets, a junior age division, was added and in 1959 Heralds for primaries was organized. The goal is "winning early youth to God and church" through a variety of programs including evangelism, hand crafts, study, worship, and Christian nurture. Seven thousand attended summer camps in 1966. In 1969 Christian Youth Crusaders had 25,000 members.

Educational institutions in North America are: GREENVILLE COLLEGE, Illinois; ROBERTS WESLEYAN, New York; SPRING ARBOR COLLEGE, Michigan, and SEATTLE PACIFIC, Washington—all accredited liberal arts and degree granting colleges. Junior colleges are at Moose Jaw, Saskatchewan and McPherson, Kansas. Schools affiliated with the Free Methodist Church are Azusa Pacific College, California; ASBURY SEMINARY, Wilmore, Kentucky; and Western Evangelical Seminary, Portland, Oregon.

Evangelistic Outreach. The work of evangelism was administered by the General Missionary Board until 1919, when a separate Board of Aggressive Evangelism was organized. The 1955 General Conference approved the aims of the Commission on Evangelistic Outreach as follows: "The evangelization of the North American Continent (with the exception of Mexico) and such English-speaking areas as shall be assigned to it by the Board of Administration." This Commission has opened several new church extension areas, makes grants for the construction of new churches, supervises the activities of evangelists, promotes crusades, lay evangelism, conducts surveys, administers the inter-racial churches. Recently a Church Extension area has been established in the British Isles.

Home Missions is the arm of the church serving isolated and neglected frontier areas, the share-croppers and migrant workers. Island population groups in particular are the special concern of Home Missions. Since 1868 Free Methodists have sponsored work among the Freedmen (slaves) in VIRGINIA and KANSAS, the poor of CHICAGO, Germans in NEW YORK CITY, the French in Quebec, Canada (1889) and LOS ANGELES (1890), Swedish work in Chicago (1891), the Negroes in ST. LOUIS (1890), Indians in NEW YORK, NEW MEXICO (1925) CALIFORNIA (1905), and Canada (1952). There was river boat evangelism in OREGON (1886) and on the OHIO (1889). Work in ALASKA was reported in 1912. For many years there was the ministry to the Italians (1911), the Latin-speaking peoples in FLORIDA (1941), TEXAS, New York and California (1911), and the Japanese on the Pacific Coast (1913). At present Home Missions is confined to the Latins in New York, ARIZONA, and California, and the Indians in Saskatchewan. Most of these projects started as private ventures. Many served a temporary need while others have come under local conference sponsorship or, like the Pacific Coast Japanese, have become regular conferences.

John Wesley Seminary Foundation. Affiliation with Asbury Theological Seminary, Wilmore, Kentucky, was inaugurated in 1947. W. C. MAVIS served as dean of the Foundation, while teaching at the seminary. In 1960 a long-term affiliation with the Seminary was arranged. A new Foundation Center building was erected and a full-time director-chaplain appointed. The Foundation provides denominational guidance and orientation, scholarship assistance, personal counsel, Christian service and worship opportunities for approximately sixty-five Free Methodist students attending the seminary. Nearly 300 alumni now serve the Free Methodist Church as pastors, missionaries, Christian educators, and denominational leaders.

Light and Life Hour is said to be the first nationwide broadcast to be sponsored by a denomination. It was launched by L. M. LOWELL from Detroit, Mich., over twenty-eight stations on Oct. 1, 1944. Production was moved to Seattle, Wash., in 1945. Presently produced in eight languages, the Light and Life Hour is heard around the world by AM-FM and shortwave more than 200 times each week. Currently the program is produced at the denomination's headquarters, Winona Lake, Ind.

LIGHT AND LIFE PRESS, FREE METHODIST CHURCH

Literature. From its organization the Free Methodist Church has emphasized the production and distribution of Christian literature. At first this was by private venture. The founder, B. T. Roberts, edited and published his own monthly journal, The Earnest Christian, from 1860 until 1893. The Free Methodist was launched in 1867 by Levi Wood. It was published as a private operation with church support until 1886, when the Free Methodist Publishing House was incorporated and the church became responsible for its publications. B. T. Roberts was the first editor under this arrangement.

Sunday school literature, developed and published by T. B. Arnold, was taken over by the church, first the story papers in 1896 and ultimately Arnold's Commentary in 1902. To Arnold, pioneer literature missionary, the church owes a great debt of gratitude.

The present operation at the Winona Lake publishing house exceeds one million dollars per year. The following circulation summary indicates the extent of the program:

1. Sunday-school literature
Four story papers	134,537
Uniform lesson publications	104,090
Graded Series lesson publications	111,814
Arnold's Commentary (1966)	14,900
2. General church and departmental periodicals
The Free Methodist (bi-weekly)	35,000
Youth in Action (monthly)	11,000
Missionary Tidings (monthly)	22,500
Transmitter (monthly)	41,500
3. Annual and quadrennial publications
Yearbook of the Free Methodist Church of North America	6,200
Doctrines and Discipline of the Free Methodist Church of North America	7,500
4. Brethren Missionary Herald , a periodical printed for an outside agency	18,600

Concerning the purpose of the denomination's literature program, Publisher LLOYD H. KNOX says: "Familiarity with the contemporary situation in publishing among the denominations strengthens the conviction that a strong denominational publishing program is imperative in perpetuating Free Methodist distinctives and our essential message, and in promoting a wholesome denominational unity. Many publishers and denominational leaders have confided their distress and alarm at their own lack of a strong, centralized program of communication through printing. Especially is this true in the area of growing curriculum needs. Our friends congratulate our publishing program at its present level as, by comparison, outstanding, and the horizon of a new century presents almost limitless vistas."

Overseas Churches. The first Free Methodist missionaries went to India on a self-supporting basis in 1881. Four years later the newly-established missionary board appointed missionaries to Africa with authority to select their field. Some entered South Africa while the main body opened work in Portuguese East Africa, adjacent to the American Board field. From these humble beginnings the overseas missions have developed into conferences and general conferences. Free Methodist missionaries are now working on twenty-four fields, and the work is written up under the name of each of the countries: Africa—EGYPT, CONGO, RWANDA, BURUNDI, RHODESIA, SOUTH AFRICA, and MOZAMBIQUE; Asia—INDIA, JAPAN, HONG KONG, TAIWAN, and PHILIPPINES; Latin America—MEXICO, DOMINICAN REPUBLIC, HAITI, BRAZIL, PARAGUAY. There are 215 missionaries. The annual budget exceeds one million dollars, and the overseas membership in 1969 was 62,000.

Service Training. This department provides a plan for systematically training personnel on the local church level. Sunday school and youth leaders, for example, may qualify for assignment upon completing specified courses. A comprehensive training course has been established with approved textbooks, teacher's guides, and a record keeping system for the denomination. Appropriate recognition is given those who complete the course. The general director is responsible for coordinating the curricula, for maintaining a permanent record of credits earned and implementing such projects as the commission may authorize.

Servicemen's Department. After the outbreak of World War II, a church council for men in service was organized (1943) to provide a ministry to those in military service. In 1950 the council became the Servicemen's Department of Free Methodist Youth. Since its inception the Department has ministered to 40,000 men and women and earned for the denomination the slogan, "The Church that Cares." It provides Christian literature, birthday and seasonal greetings, personal counsel, and where possible, visits by the director to military installations. The Department also serves the denomination's chaplains.

Sunday School Department. The first full-time Sunday school secretary was elected in 1907. The Secretary promotes interest in Sunday schools through the departmental services. The Sunday School Department provides program and promotion aids for 1,300 schools in the United States and Canada. Total enrollment is 153,000 and the average weekly attendance is 97,000 (which is more than the church membership). The magazine Current, a 32-page monthly publication, is designed especially for Sunday school teachers and administrators as well as other church workers. The aim of the department is to provide ideas and tools for church growth and to challenge Sunday schools to offer notable service in Christian education and warm fellowship for entire families.

Woman's Missionary Society. The first local Woman's Missionary Society was organized in 1889 at Verona, Pa. A new member, Mrs. Sarah Mays, a transfer from the M. E. Church, asked why there was no missionary society. Soon one was organized which became the pattern for other local societies. In 1894 the General Conference approved a general Woman's Missionary Society as auxiliary to the General Missionary Board. The Missionary Secretary was instructed to assist in organizing conference and local chapters.

The stated objective of the Society is "to promote missionary intelligence, deepen interest in world evangelization and to secure systematic contributions to missions." There are departments of Promotion and Program, Outreach, Stewardship, Missions Education, Junior Missionary Society, and Finance. The recently established Outreach department promotes coffee-cup evangelism and small-group Bible study. It is also concerned with the international students on North American campuses.

The Missionary Tidings, official publication, has a circulation of over 23,000. There are 1,535 prayer circles, 25,722 prayer partners, and over 153,000 books were reported read in one year. Almost 20,000 missionary boxes are packed and shipped annually to the missionaries. Since the 1964 general conference, WMS receipts total $3,800,406 (1969). Two members of the Executive hold membership on the General Missionary Board where all mission funds are pooled and appropriated in one unified program.

There are 1,136 local societies in the home church, with a membership in North America of 27,548. Over 400 such groups are reported overseas, with a membership of 7,607.

Youth. Originally the Young People's Missionary Society, the denomination's youth organization, established in 1919, was an auxiliary of the Woman's Missionary Society. The Y.P.M.S. was made the official youth organization of the church in 1931, with its interests broadened beyond that of missionary education and activity. In 1955 the name was changed to Free Methodist Youth in harmony with the broadened objective, as stated in the Constitution, "to promote the Spiritual welfare of the young people connected with the Free Methodist Church, to provide direction for their Christian activities, and to help them in their contribution to the church and the world."

In 1964 the Volunteers in Service Abroad (VISA) was organized to channel young people into overseas mission opportunities. VISA teams have cooperated in crusades in Latin America and Africa. More than 100 young people have been appointed for two-year terms of service on various mission fields. Some of these have already completed necessary training and are now regularly appointed missionaries under the General Missionary Board. Others, still in school, have applied for appointment. Over 300 young people have participated in VISA Crusades in 19 countries. VISA is sponsored jointly by FMY and the General Missionary Board.

More recently, Teen Action Service Corps (TASC) was established to recruit young people for practical service to needy churches in North America. TASC groups have repaired and painted church property, assisted in Youth Camps, engaged in Youth Evangelism programs in some of the smaller churches and conferences.

The organization ministers principally to teen-agers. There is also a Young Adult Fellowship. Reported membership in the United States and Canada is 14,000 in 850 registered societies. In addition there are organized societies in ten other countries. Youth in Action, a monthly publication is the official organ of FMY. North American activities include local church worship, study and service activities. Conventions, rallies and camps are organized on the district and conference levels. Bible Quiz contests have become popular in recent years.

Membership of the World Free Methodist Church (1969)

North America General Conference
United States Conferences
Lay Members	62,623
Preachers	1,771
Subtotal	64,394
Canadian Conferences
Lay Members	4,924
Preachers	202
Subtotal	5,126
North America Total	69,520
Egypt General Conference	4,250
Japan General Conference	4,029
Conferences of Mission Origin
Burundi	6,915
Dominican Republic	3,991
Formosa	1,899
India	1,415
Mexico	879
Mozambique-Transvaal	7,498
Natal-Cape	1,856
Brazil (1965)	1,795
Philippines	927
Rhodesia	2,303
Rwanda	7,500
Provisional Conferences
Hong Kong-Macau	1,060
Pacific Coast Latin America	806
Paraguay	225

Mission
Congo	11,110
Haiti	963
Preachers in overseas, provisional, and mission relation	395
Grand Total	129,953

BYRON S. LAMSON

FREE WILL. Throughout its first century, a continuing feature of Methodist theology was its opposition to Calvinist predestination. Calvinist doctrine did not deny that man has a measure of free will, and of morally responsible choice, in natural matters (Westminster Confession, iii). However, he has no freedom to turn to the way of salvation, for he "hath lost all ability of will to any spiritual good" (ibid., ix). Wesleyan evangelical preaching presupposed man's capacity to respond to the offer of grace. This conviction prompted it to deny that the sinner is merely passive in the hands of an all-determining God.

The dispute between Methodists and Calvinists raged during WESLEY's lifetime and through most of the nineteenth century. It even occurred within the Methodist community, where a group of Calvinist Methodists, led by GEORGE WHITEFIELD, opposed the Wesleyans.

The fact that it rejected Calvinist bondage of the will does not, however, adequately define Methodism's position on free will. The intensity of the argument between the two makes it evident that they had basic differences that received vigorous defense. It also suggests that they possessed basic similarities that required careful distinction. Otherwise both feared the assumption of an unwarranted identity between them.

A common commitment to the classical Christian tradition accounts for broad areas of agreement between Methodism and Calvinism. Both acknowledged man's helplessness in sin and God's gracious act in Christ as the sole means of man's salvation.

The thought of John Wesley on man's moral bondage started with the Genesis story of creation and fall. Adam was created in the image of God, including the freedom of the will. He was capable of "knowing, loving and obeying" God. (Works, 3rd ed. London, 1829, VI, 244.) He did not remain in the state of perfection however. Through unbelief, pride and the desire of the flesh he succumbed to temptation and transgressed the law of God. In consequence of his rebellion, he lost God's favor. The image of God was defaced and he "commenced unholy, foolish, and unhappy." (ibid., VI, 233.) His posterity since has been afflicted by the ravages of ORIGINAL SIN. This is the traditional line of Christian theology. Man is totally corrupt. Prior to any act of his own, he shares the depravity and guilt of Adam's sin.

Further, through the fall man has lost his freedom. His will is now in bondage, free by inclination only to do evil. "Since the fall no child of man has a natural power to choose anything that is truly good." (ibid., X, 350.) In things of "an indifferent nature," Wesley upholds human freedom. (ibid., X, 350.) Man can control his body and mind. But his remaining freedom does not enable him to choose the good. This he can do only as he is assisted by God's grace. Left in bondage, he cannot take the first step to gain release from his fate.

But God has not left man alone in his sin. The Wesleyan Revival found life in a renewed proclamation of the "Good News" that God has entered human history for the salvation of helpless men. It viewed Christ as the "second Adam" whose healing grace strives to overcome the devastation of the original sin of the first Adam.

All men may receive the benefits of Christ's atonement: it defers the penalty of death for sin; it cancels the guilt of original sin in infants; it is the source of virtue in pre-Christians and heathens; it is the basis of man's response to the offer of salvation. Nor is any man without some measure of general or prevenient GRACE (that which precedes or goes before the specific experience of saving grace). No conditions need be met to receive it. As an initial gift to all men it is irresistible.

The original bestowal of prevenient grace restores some of the freedom lacking in the bondage of Adamic sin. "There is a measure of free-will supernaturally restored to every man." (Works, 3rd ed., X, 229.) This restored freedom becomes the foundation for man's response to the offer of saving grace. Man's present freedom is, therefore, a gracious restoration through the atonement of Christ. It is not created or natural capacity. It is not sufficient unto salvation. It only affords the possibility of responding to the offer of salvation by grace through faith.

It is likely that, in Wesley's view, prevenient grace does not even enable man to believe or to take the decisive step toward salvation. The role of prevenient grace is more limited. It does not enable man to give his will to God. Rather it produces a radical self-knowledge, a conviction of sin and helplessness, that drives him to despair of his own efforts to secure salvation. Then God can have full course in his life. After prevenient grace has produced the despair that neutralizes man's perverse volition, God gives the gift of faith. From faith comes man's justification (pardon or acceptance) before God despite his guilt. Further, the gift of faith opens man's life to the power of sanctifying grace, which overcomes his depravity and leads him toward full salvation.

Wesley and the early Methodists supported free will but in the wider context of free grace. They took sin seriously and refused to ignore its restrictive consequences for human freedom. They acknowledged the limited character of the freedom restored by prevenient grace. They certainly were neither Calvinist nor Pelagian in their understanding of free will. They were not even Arminian in its historic definition, despite a widespread Methodist tendency to claim relationship to JACOBUS ARMINIUS and his sixteenth century Dutch movement of modified Calvinism.

In his view of free will, Wesley related the bondage of sin and the freedom of grace in a distinctive way peculiarly well-suited to Methodist evangelicalism.

1790-1840. John Wesley received his most important theological assistance from JOHN FLETCHER. Fletcher's apologetic skill came to the fore in the Calvinist controversies of the 1770's, in his Checks to Antinomianism. He upheld Wesley on the dialectical relation between free grace and free will, and graphically brought their apparent contradictions into balance in a section entitled "The Scripture Scales." ADAM CLARKE and RICHARD WATSON were the most important second generation defenders of Wesleyan free will. Subtle modifications of Wesley's position may be detected in their work, however. These modifications are evident first in their description of the restrictions sin places on man's original freedom. While Wesley generally affirmed the reality of original guilt as a consequence of the fall, Watson and Clarke deny it on the basis of man's responsible agency. They endorse Wesley's view of man's depravity, but account for it as a deprivation resulting from a deprivation of the Holy Spirit.

Since they do not stress the depth of sin as forcibly as did Wesley, they do not press as urgently the need for the restoration of freedom by grace. They underscore the importance of prevenient grace, at times in Wesleyan terms. But its appearances are less frequent, and its imperative necessity for man's response to the evangelical proclamation is less emphasized. Throughout their discussions a distinctive concern for man's voluntary agency is evident.

The American scene produced little independent theology during this time. The frontier context called for a plain, simple theology of fundamentals that was confirmed by the revival tradition. NATHAN BANGS and WILBUR FISK led the Methodists in their controversy with the Calvinists over man's role in salvation. Both stressed the gracious origin of man's responsible participation. On this basis they disputed both the determinism of the Old School Calvinists and the freedomism (natural ability) of the New School Calvinists. Through their efforts, Methodist theology gained some recognition of the public mind.

1840-1890. During the middle half of the nineteenth century strong influences led to decisive changes in the American Methodist conception of free will. The dominant philosophy of this period was Common Sense or Scottish philosophy. It emphasized the importance and validity of universal moral intuitions about man's freedom and responsibility. It was widely influential in American Methodism. The single most important figure in the formulation of a philosophical doctrine of moral responsibility was DANIEL D. WHEDON. His book Freedom of the Will (1864) had an enormous impact on Methodism, and on its leading theologians, MINER RAYMOND, T. O. SUMMERS, and JOHN MILEY.

Whedon maintained the essential freedom of the will, including the power of contrary choice. This freedom must derive from man, not from grace. Grace, he asserts, is the source of motives to the good. But man chooses or rejects the motives supplied by grace as an intrinsically free agent. Whedon's philosophical doctrine of moral responsibility resulted in a rejection of original guilt, a devaluation of original depravity, a reduction in the role of prevenient grace, and a magnification of man's inherent freedom.

Toward the end of the nineteenth century, Whedon's views were widely accepted. They were most fully and consistently expressed by John Miley. Miley was dedicated to the "Maxim of Responsibility." He insists that responsibility must rest on man's inherent freedom, not on a restoration of freedom by grace. He denies all guilt apart from free personal action. He accepts original depravity but denies that it leaves the will impaired. He introduces the "rational suspension of choice" into man's exercise of his free agency. In effect, thereby, he gives man ultimate rational power over his motives and inner states. Some traditionalist American theologians of this period (D. STEELE, D. CURRY, E. M. MARVIN) protested against the substitution of a philosophical doctrine of responsibility for the evangelical realities of sin and grace, but with little effect.

In Britain Methodism kept more closely to Wesley. WILLIAM B. POPE produced a notable three-volume theology (1877) in which he authentically recapitulated the Wesleyan themes on free will and free grace, and arrested the trend in British Methodism toward the adoption of a philosophical doctrine of freedom. (Compendium of Christian Theology, 2nd ed., London, 1880, Vol. II, 15-55, 359-367, 386-390, III, 131-147.) His influence in American Methodism was less pronounced, and failed to deflect currents carrying it away from its historical doctrine of free will.

1890-1935. By 1890 the "liberal evangelicalism" of Whedon, Raymond, Summers, Warren and Miley largely gave way to the "evangelical liberalism" of Terry, TILLET, CURTIS and SHELDON. No longer did American Methodists attempt to square their doctrine of freedom with Wesley's. They proposed rather to orient the doctrine within a scientific world view, to make it logically consistent and philosophically respectable.

The philosophies of Schleiermacher, Ritschl, and Hegel exerted powerful influence. Methodist theologians were shaped by study abroad under Ritschlian teachers. Hegelianism affected American Methodism through the personal idealism of BORDEN PARKER BOWNE, who based his philosophy on the ultimate significance of personality as intrinsically active and free. He invested the philosophical doctrine of freedom with metaphysical significance making it indispensable for philosophy, science, and religion. The theological implications of his work are seen most clearly in the writings of ALBERT C. KNUDSON.

Knudson defends the worth, reality, and freedom of the soul or self. He calls original sin a fiction, and locates the origin of sin in man's personal freedom. He denies the reality of inherited guilt and depravity. He derives all moral qualities, including guilt, from the free activity of the will. He contends that man's freedom is essentially unimpaired by sin and that he is capable of moral existence.

As a free agent, man is the cause of his own actions. He is guided by motives from his own nature to which he imparts worth and in response to which he chooses. The whole man is free, not just his will. Different courses of action are open to him and he can decide which he will take. This power of contrary choice is the essence of metaphysical freedom without which man is not man. Grace is not required to enable man to choose the good. Rather grace assists the actualization of his free choice once it is made.

Knudson presents perhaps the most uncompromising statement on free will in Methodism. But the essential features of his position are supported by the liberal theologians of the period, HARRIS FRANKLIN RALL, EDWIN LEWIS and others. For confirmation, their doctrine appeals primarily to philosophical, moral, and pragmatic criteria. Throughout this development, however, many conservative Methodists continued to hold to the old "biblical" line.

1935—. European crisis theology affected Methodism somewhat belatedly. Edwin Lewis, who supported liberalism in his early career, published A Christian Manifesto in 1934. It pointed to man's helplessness in sin, and to his restoration by grace in a manner strikingly at variance with twentieth century Methodist liberalism. GEORGE C. CELL in The Rediscovery of John Wesley (1935) argued for the essential unity of Wesleyan and Reformation theology, and vigorously protested against the confident belief in man's natural powers into which Methodism had fallen. In England books by SMON, RATTENBURY and many others redirected Methodism to Wesley and the formative years of the Revival. In general, the inability of man to reform himself by his own effort, and the necessity of grace for salvation, were insisted on.

An increasing volume of studies of the original Wesleyan theology followed in the next twenty years. Methodism's involvement in the ecumenical movement promoted serious reexamination of its views on sin and grace and man's role in salvation.

Characteristic Transitions. For 150 years, down to 1935, Wesley's doctrine of freedom-in-grace was reinterpreted by Methodist theologians. The end of their work in liberal circles, though by no means universally, was a significantly different doctrine of metaphysical freedom. This transition from free grace to free will has several characteristics.

1. The context of the debate about free will and free grace gradually shifted. In Wesley, the debate was placed within the context of salvation, and freedom was made to depend on grace. By the middle of the nineteenth century, freedom became part of a broader philosophical discussion of the nature of man. The doctrine of freedom was formulated on the basis of psychological and philosophical analysis, and then fitted into the theology of salvation.

2. The basis of man's freedom was changed. Eventually it was grounded in man's intrinsic nature. The loss of freedom through the fall was denied, and in consequence, its restoration by prevenient grace. Freedom was assigned to the order of nature rather than redemption.

3. The limits of freedom were gradually expanded. For Wesley, man's freedom as restored by grace could not attain to God. It could only assist man to cease his efforts to save himself and to submit to God's further grace. By the close of the nineteenth century, some Methodists held that man's unimpaired agency enabled him to choose God and to cooperate with the further grace that fulfills salvation.

4. The definition of freedom was made to depend upon genuine responsibility based upon the power of contrary choice. Free personal agency became the sole ground of guilt. It required a rejection of all the elements of original guilt. It made man's exercise of freedom accountable and even meritorious.

5. Freedom became the critical and constructive principle of much later Methodist theology. Rather than the Reformation insistence on salvation by grace, much popular Methodist teaching gave a decisive place to the maxim of responsibility and the doctrine of metaphysical freedom in its elaboration of theology.

The last thirty years have seen significant reversals of most of these characteristic tendencies. In this time sympathy has grown for the essentials of Wesley's doctrine.

W. R. Cannon, Theology of John Wesley. 1946.

G. C. Cell, Rediscovery of John Wesley. 1935.

R. E. Chiles, Theological Transition. 1965.

F. Hildebrandt, Luther to Wesley. 1951.

W. B. Pope, Compendium of Christian Theology. 1880.

L. M. Starke, Work of the Holy Spirit. 1962.

R. Watson, Theological Institutes. 1832. ROBERT E. CHILES

FREEDMEN'S AID SOCIETY. An American organization and agency of the M. E. Church created after the Civil War in the United States for the purpose of "establishing and maintaining institutions of learning in the Southern states among Freedmen and others who have special claims upon the people of America for help in the work of Christian education." (Discipline, 1880, Para. 403.) Prior to 1866 Bishop SIMPSON states that the M. E. Church had cooperated with the different Freedmen's Aid Commissions in the common work of "elevating the Freedmen"—Negroes who had up until the Civil War been slaves in the South. At that time the different denominations were each endeavoring to do their own part in educating and elevating the Freedmen.

The M. E. Church held a convention in CINCINNATI and organized the Freedmen's Aid Society and obtained for it a charter under the laws of OHIO. The annual conferences of the church approved the organization, and the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1868 passed resolutions sanctioning the Society. All annual conferences were requested to take collections in its behalf, and the bishops were authorized to appoint a traveling preacher as corresponding secretary. Pursuant to this action, R. S. Rust was chosen corresponding secretary, and subsequently was reelected to this position by the General Conferences of 1872 and 1876.

The General Conference of 1872 fully adopted the Freedmen's Aid Society and wrote into the Discipline the regulation pertaining to it, stressing especially the matter and importance of locating "institutions of learning"—which, of course, meant in the South. It was also the design of the Society to establish a seminary of a high grade within the bounds of each conference in the South, but this could only be done gradually. A great part of the work of the Society was in supporting teachers in various institutions begun by or connected with the Freedmen's Aid, and in preparing young men for the ministry.

The Discipline provided for a Board of Managers for the Freedmen's Aid Society to be elected by the General Conference, and also called upon its Conferences to support generously the work of the Society. Regulations in successive Disciplines continued to outline the duties and responsibilities of the Freedmen's Aid Society as an agency of the Church up to and in the Discipline of 1916.

Moving into the South during the Reconstruction period when Federal troops were occupying the Southern states' territory, and when the aggressive moves of the M. E. Church into the South were considered an invasion of the territory which properly belonged to the M. E. Church, South, naturally there was tension for several years over the work of the Freedmen's Aid. However, it founded numerous colleges whose histories will be told under their own name in this Encyclopedia and whose work has been helpful in the extreme.

The Board of Education for Negroes created by the General Conference of the M. E. Church in 1920 was specifically charged to take over the work which had until then been conducted by the Freedmen's Aid Society. By that time the institutions founded by the Freedmen's Aid were making excellent progress, and as the tensions of earlier years had disappeared it seemed that a Board of Education for Negroes could in a better way carry on this major work for the Church. At unification in 1939 the Board of Education for Negroes and its work were largely correlated with and absorbed into the work of the Board of Education of The Methodist Church.

Disciplines, ME, 1872, 1890-1916.
M. Simpson, Cyclopaedia. 1882.

N. B. H.

FREEMAN, LESLIE ARTHUR (1907-), Canadian public school administrator and officer of the FREE METHODIST CHURCH of North America, was born at Hamilton, Ontario. He attended public schools there and at Collegiate Institute, Calt and Teachers College in Hamilton, Ontario. He received the B.A. from McMaster University, and B.Ped. from Toronto University. He married Annie Elma Humphrey in 1928.

L. A. Freeman has served in Hamilton, Ontario public schools as teacher, elementary school principal and elementary school inspector. He is presently superintendent of public elementary schools, Board of Education in Hamilton. His community activities have included: president, The Family Service Association of America; president, Hamilton Teacher Council; president, Men Teachers' Federation (Hamilton local); member of Mt. St. Joseph Children's Center; Big Brothers' Association; United Appeal Promotion. He has belonged to the following professional organizations: Canadian Education Association; Canadian Association of School Superintendents and Inspectors; American Association of School Administrators; Ontario Association of Education Officials. He has been Sunday school superintendent for thirty-nine years; a lay (local) preacher; chairman, Conference Finance Committee; member, Board of Trustees, West Ontario Conference; president, Camp Ground Association; president, Board of Trustees, Lorne Park College Foundation; member West Ontario Conference Board of Administration, Board of Ministerial Training, Stationing Committee, and Superintendent's Advisory Board. He is treasurer of the Executive Board of the Free Methodist Church in Canada; a member of The Board of Trustees, Roberts Wesleyan College, North Chili, N. Y., and is also a member of the denominational Board of Administration and its Commission on Christian Education. He has written numerous articles in the field of educational philosophy. He resides in Hamilton, Ontario.

BYRON S. LAMSON

THOMAS BIRCH FREEMAN

FREEMAN, THOMAS BIRCH (1809-1890), British Wesleyan missionary pioneer, was the son of an English mother and an African father. He was born at Twyford, England, on Dec. 6, 1809. He worked as a botanist and maintained this interest throughout his life. JOSEPH DUNWELL had begun to work at Cape Coast, West Africa in 1835; but Freeman, who arrived there in 1838, was the true founder of Methodist missions in GHANA and Western NIGERIA. His personal grace and piety won the friendship of African people and chiefs everywhere, many of the coastal people responding to his message. With great faith and courage he pioneered to Kumasi in Ashanti (1839) and Dahomey (1843), notoriously violent kingdoms where human sacrifice was normal, and won freedom to preach in both territories. In 1842 he landed at Badagry and trekked inland to Abeokuta, thus laying foundations for Methodist work in Western Nigeria. At a time when opportunities were without limit, his overspending in the cause of advance work resulted in missionary grants being sharply reduced, and in 1857 he resigned from the ministry to become civil commandant of Accra. He never severed his Methodist connections, and returned to the ministry in 1873. He married three times; his first two wives died within a few weeks of arriving in Africa. He died at Accra on Aug. 12, 1890.

A. Birtwhistle, Thomas Birch Freeman. 1950.

J. Milum, Life of Thomas Birch Freeman. London, 1893.
CYRIL J. DAVEY

FRENCH, ERNEST ALDOM (1868-1962), British Methodist, was born at Taunton, and educated at Queen's College, Taunton. He entered the Wesleyan Methodist ministry in 1893, and served largely in central mission churches in London and the provinces. In a notable ministry at Brighton (1904-10), he founded the Dome Mission, and he served at the Tooting Mission in London from 1910 to 1926. From 1928 to 1932 he acted as secretary of the METHODIST UNION Committee, and toured the country presenting the case for Methodist Union, of which he was indeed one of the principal architects. The Uniting Conference of 1932 appointed him as secretary of the Commemoration Fund, which was to "carry forward the plans to secure the unification of Methodism, the establishment of its finances on a sound basis, and a definite commencement in the use of its new resources for evangelistic developments to reach outsiders and to advance the whole work." But an article which he wrote for the Methodist Recorder in 1938, the year in which he retired, reflected his disappointment at the results of Methodist union in terms of evangelistic mission and renewal: he had genuinely believed that union would release energies bottled up in the old denominations, and make possible a new wave of Methodist expansion. He died at Thornton Heath in August 1962.

JOHN NEWTON

FRENCH, JOHN (1772-1839), American medical doctor and M. P. preacher, was a leader in denominational activities in the VIRGINIA CONFERENCE and was considered "one of the ablest and most self-sacrificing of the early Methodist Protestant ministers." He was born in Goochland County, Va., in 1772 and later removed to Lynchburg, Va., to study medicine under S. K. JENNINGS. He united with the M. E. Church in 1800 and later, upon completion of his medical studies, became a local preacher. For a while he practiced medicine in Salem, Va. He married a Miss Cox who only lived a short time, and in 1818 he married Mrs. John E. Marsden. To this union was born one son, Colonel S. Bassett French. His third marriage was to a Mrs. Peebles of Brunswick County, Va.

In 1812 French accompanied the American troops to Norfolk to fight against the British in the war then being waged. He practiced medicine in Norfolk until 1828, when he gave up general practice to spend more time preaching. As early as 1820 he had urged the GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church to institute reform measures in its government, and on May 21, 1824, was a member of the Reform Convention which met in BALTIMORE. He was appointed to serve as a member of the editorial committee of The Mutual Rights, a reform publication that was instituted at this convention. He served as a member of the conventions of 1827-1828 and 1830 and took a leading part in the construction of the "Constitution and Discipline" of the METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH. He served as president at the convention of 1830 in the absence of the presiding officer.

French helped to organize the Virginia Conference of the M. P. Church at Lynchburg in June, 1829, and in September, 1830, organized a M. P. church of thirty-two members at BOSTON, Mass. He labored as pastor of this church for six months. He became one of the outstanding leaders in the Virginia Conference and often served as president of its annual sessions. He moved to Nansemond County, Va., in 1836, organized a number of M. P. societies, and built a church in Norfolk with a large membership. This church eventually failed because of its location in an old theatre and the prejudice held against such a building. Chief Justice John Marshall, who heard French in a series of religious meetings held in Richmond in 1832, declared that "he was one of the ablest preachers he had ever heard in America."

French died at Holladay's Point, Nansemond County, near Norfolk, on Oct. 13, 1839. He was buried in Norfolk.

T. H. Colhouer, Sketches of the Founders. 1880.

E. J. Drinkhouse, History of Methodist Reform. 1899.

RALPH HARDEE RIVES

FRENCH, JOHN STEWART (1872-1952), American pastor and leader in Southern Methodism in its later years, was born at Jonesboro, Tenn., Dec. 31, 1872, the son of J. L. M. French and grandson of George Stewart, both ministers. He joined the HOLSTON CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church, South, in 1893, and served the Mount Airy and Liberty Hill circuits, Pocahontas, Tazewell, Abingdon, and Centenary Church in Chattanooga, all in TENNESSEE. He then went to GEORGIA and served First Church in ATLANTA and then transferred to the TENNESSEE CONFERENCE and was appointed to McKendree Church in NASHVILLE. Returning to the Holston Conference he served Church Street in KNOXVILLE, as president of EMORY AND HENRY COLLEGE, presiding elder of the Knoxville District, and State Street Church in Bristol. He again left Holston and was pastor of First Church in MEMPHIS, Highlands Church in BIRMINGHAM, Ala., and Riverside Park Church in JACKSONVILLE, Fla. He then was again sent to State Street Church in Bristol for the third time. For two years he was regional director of the Y.M.C.A. in World War I.

In 1895 he married Janie Preston Collup and they had two children.

French was honored with the D. D. degree by VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY. He was president of the Conference

Boards of Education and Missions, a member of the General Board of Education for twenty-five years, and was a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCES of 1918, 1922, 1926, and 1930, and of the Uniting Conference in 1939. He was put in strong nomination for the episcopacy at the 1922 and 1926 General Conferences of his church.

Stewart French, as he was usually called, was co-author of the legislation which created the JUDICIAL COUNCIL of the M. E. Church, South in 1926, which was finally approved in 1934. He became secretary of the Judicial Council. When the General Conference of 1938 approved the PLAN OF UNION of the three major branches of American Methodism, its legality was at once challenged and French wrote the decision which sustained it. He was a member of the Judicial Council of The Methodist Church until his retirement in 1945.

French gave fifty-two years to the effective ministry. He had an unusually incisive mind and was at his best on the floor of a General Conference. He died on April 17, 1952, in Bristol, Tenn., and was buried in the Greenwood Cemetery there.

Minutes of the Holston Conference, 1952.

L. W. PIERCE

FRESNO, CALIFORNIA, U.S.A., is a city of 162,000 inhabitants, located in the heart of the San Joaquin Valley about midway between SAN FRANCISCO and LOS ANGELES. It is a very important center of agro-business in the United States, producing cotton, grapes, olives, and many fruits. Fresno State College (13,000 students) is located here.

It is uncertain exactly when early Methodists came to Fresno, but in December, 1881, the first M. E. Church was organized in Fresno with a membership of twenty-nine. Martin Miller was appointed preacher-in-charge. The first meetings were held in the old Hawthorne School which was located in the block where the Fresno Auditorium now stands. The next Sunday after the church organized, WILLIAM TAYLOR arrived and preached to the congregation. He had been sent by the Board of Missions to look after matters in CALIFORNIA, and no doubt largely through his own leadership the Fresno congregation was organized.

Martin Miller seems to have founded not only First Methodist Church in Fresno, but also organized six other churches and preached all over the San Joaquin Valley. Two score years later, his son, GEORGE MILLER, came as a pastor to First Church in Fresno, and some time after that George Miller was elected bishop of the M. E. Church. Both Millers—father and son—were connected with the founding of nearly all the Methodist churches in Fresno County, with the exception of Coalinga and Caruthers—which were organized later.

Bishop Miller has given a vivid picture of early days in a letter to Kenneth W. Adams in 1953: "I saw Fresno first in September, 1881. There were 1,200 to 1,500 people then, a school, a water tank and a court house. They called it Fresno City. It had wooden sidewalks at various levels, plain dirt streets and stores on Mariposa Street."

Today there are twelve Methodist churches, an A.M.E. CHURCH and a FREE METHODIST CHURCH in Fresno and its immediate vicinity, with approximately 6,000 members.

HEBERT W. NEALE

FRIENDLY ISLANDS. (See TONGA.)

FROGGATT, GEORGE (1839-1912), NEW ZEALAND layman, was born in Shropshire, England on Sept. 14, 1839. He came to New Zealand in the ship "Adjimere" in 1864 and settled in Invercargill. Through his initiative and generosity, a PRIMITIVE METHODIST church was erected, on a site in Don Street that he helped secure. He was a man of broad outlook and connectional spirit. He was a Sunday school superintendent for twenty years and became president of the Primitive Methodist Conference in 1888. He died suddenly on board ship at Queenstown on Lake Wakatipu on July 24, 1912.

ARCHER O. HARRIS

FROGGE, TIMOTHY CARPENTER (1821-1899), American preacher and debater, was born on Wolf River, Fentress Co., Tenn., April 21, 1821, the son of Cornelius and Deborah (Carpenter) Frogge. Converted in 1837, he joined the KENTUCKY CONFERENCE in 1843. In 1845 he adhered South, and on the formation of the LOUISVILLE CONFERENCE in 1846, he became a member of that body. He married Harriet Wilson in 1847, and after her death in 1855, he married Mary C. Pillow in 1856. By the first marriage there were four children, two of whom died in infancy, and by the second marriage two children, one of whom died early. Frogge had only three months of formal schooling, but as a student all his life he acquired a working knowledge of Greek and he had a good command of the English language. Frogge itinerated fifty-one years before retiring in 1894. He served thirty-six years on nineteen circuits and stations and fifteen years on four districts. The districts were Bowling Green, Hopkinsville, Henderson, and Columbia. He was a delegate to the 1874 GENERAL CONFERENCE.

Frogge was an acceptable though not a popular preacher. He delighted in and was unusually adept and successful at religious debate with members of other denominations. During his career he had what his biographer called seventeen "pitched battles" with the immersionists and three with the universalists, and won them all. His strong points in debate were: (1) His Christian spirit; he was always kind, courteous and polite. (2) His self-mastery; he never lost his temper and never became excited. (3) His knowledge of the subject; he knew the strong and weak points in his opponent's position and he knew the Methodist teaching on the subject. (4) His knowledge and expert use of the Scriptures. (5) His uncanny ability to sum up the error of his opponent in a few pungent words. (6) His remarkable capacity at repartee.

Greatly beloved by his brethren in the Louisville Conference, Frogge died at his son's home near Russellville, Nov. 28, 1899, and was buried in Duncan Cemetery not far from the grave of the famous pioneer preacher, VALENTINE COOK.

General Minutes, ME, MES.

JESSE A. EARL
ALBEA GOBOLD

FROST, TIMOTHY PRESCOTT (1850-1937), American clergyman, was born on June 26, 1850 in Mt. Holly, Vt. He was educated at Montpelier Seminary and WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY in CONNECTICUT, where he graduated in 1876. This institution awarded him a M.A. degree in 1890 and the D.D. degree in 1895. NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY conferred on him the LL.D. degree in 1911. On Jan. 2, 1876 he married Carrie Maria Holt.

He was ordained in 1877 by the VERMONT CONFERENCE. He served as pastor of several churches in Vermont from 1875 to 1889. He preached at Summerfield Church in BROOKLYN, 1889-1893; First Church in BALTIMORE (now Lovely Lane), 1893-1898; St. Paul's Church, NEWARK, N. J., 1898-1903. He then moved to the ROCK RIVER CONFERENCE in Illinois, appointed to First Church, EVANSTON, 1903-1917. The following year he was a lecturer on Christian Ethics at the GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE. He was a member of two M. E. GENERAL CONFERENCES, 1888 and 1912. He was the author of Tragedy and Triumph. After serving as president of the Frost Family Association from 1922 to 1926, he retired to Bradford, Vt., where he died July 5, 1937.

C. F. Price, Who's Who in American Methodism. 1916.

GUY E. SNAVELY

FRY, BENJAMIN ST. JAMES (1824-1892), American author and editor of The Central Christian Advocate of the M. E. Church, was born in Rutledge, Tenn., June 16, 1824. His collegiate education was obtained in Woodward College, CINCINNATI, Ohio. In 1846 Fry joined the OHIO CONFERENCE, and, after three brief pastorates, was elected president of Worthington (Ohio) Female College. Upon the outbreak of the Civil War he became chaplain of the 63rd Ohio Infantry with which he served until the War ended.

In 1865 Fry was placed in charge of the Book Depository in St. Louis, Mo., connected with the Central Christian Advocate. His successful operation of the Depository brought him to the attention of leaders in the church. As a result he was elected editor of the Advocate, to which publication he had been a frequent contributor. Each quadrennium after 1872 he was reelected editor by the GENERAL CONFERENCE and served with widely recognized ability until his death Feb. 5, 1892. He was buried in Bellefontaine Cemetery, St. Louis.

Fry's contributions to Methodism were many, among them the founding of a church in St. Louis which was named Fry Memorial. He was the author of biographies of three bishops—WHATCOAT, MCKENDREE and ROBERTS.

Conard, Encyclopedia of the History of Missouri, Vol. II. National Cyclopaedia of American Biography.

FRANK C. TUCKER

FRY, JOHN A. B. (1870-1954), American minister, scholar, and leader in church educational activities, was born near Carthage, N. C., Oct. 23, 1870. He completed preparatory work at Carthage Academy and went on to study at Trinity College (now DUKE UNIVERSITY), VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY, and Pacific School of Religion, where he earned the M.S.T. degree in 1918. His achievements in the ministry won him an honorary D.D. degree from ASBURY COLLEGE in 1937.

He was granted a license to preach in 1893 by the M. E. Church, South, and was ordained a deacon in 1896 and an elder in 1898.

After eight years service to churches in the WESTERN NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE, Fry transferred to the LITTLE ROCK CONFERENCE in 1902. In 1906 he went to the PACIFIC CONFERENCE where he was assigned first to the Berkeley Mission, then to the church which was closely associated with his name for many years—Epworth University Church. He served as pastor there from 1910-

14, 1915-18, 1929-34, and 1938-43. Fry was presiding elder of the Los Angeles District from 1934-39.

His exceptional work in development and guidance of young people began in 1918, when he worked with the Army Y.M.C.A. in OREGON. He held positions with Y.M.C.A. organizations in Stockton (1919), Long Beach (1923) and Hollywood (1926). He continued his interest in church educational matters through work on the church's General Board of Sunday Schools from 1914-22 and the General Board of Education from 1922-26. His conference sent him to the GENERAL CONFERENCES of 1914, 1918, and 1926.

Fry retired in 1943, but continued to be active in the ministry, serving churches in Isleton (1948), San Mateo (1949), and Knight's Landing (1953). In 1948 he helped establish a much needed Methodist archives, the Fry Research Library, at the UNIVERSITY OF THE PACIFIC.

He died in Stockton, Calif. on March 30, 1954.

Directory, Epworth University Church, Berkeley, California. Journals, Pacific, California, and California-Nevada Conferences, 1903-1954.

Who's Who in America, 1948-49.

PEARL S. SWEET

FRYE, CHRISTOPHER (1778-1835), American pioneer minister and farmer, was born on Feb. 13, 1778, in Winchester, Va. In 1796 he joined the M. E. Church and in 1802 was admitted to the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE. Over a period of thirty years he filled important assignments in this Conference, including service as presiding elder of the Baltimore, Greenbrier, Monongahela, and Potomac Districts. These names indicate that the Baltimore Conference at that time included sections of WEST VIRGINIA and southern PENNSYLVANIA. His was a tragic end, for after his superannuation he settled on a farm near Leesburg, Va. While operating a threshing machine he had a leg severely crushed when this was caught accidentally in the machinery. He is said to have exhibited the utmost calm and self-possession when he realized his end was rapidly approaching. He died on Sept. 18, 1835.

M. Simpson, Cyclopaedia. 1878.

GUY E. SNAVELY

FULKERSON, JOHN WILLIAM (1822-1910), American United Brethren missionary to MINNESOTA, was born in Frederick County, Va., Jan. 16, 1822. The family name was formerly Fulker. His grandfather was from Holland, and his grandmother was born in Prussia. His education included a course of study in the Pine Creek Academy in VIRGINIA. Bishop GLOSSBRENNER ordained him in 1843. In 1848 he married Delilah S. Snook, and they had nine children. From 1843 to 1854 he preached in Virginia and MARYLAND. Nine months after moving to IOWA in 1855, the missionary board sent him to Minnesota. From Muscatine, Iowa, in 1856, he moved his goods and family on a steamer up the Mississippi to Dakota, Winona County, where Edmund Clow, preacher on the Pine Creek Mission, met him with two wagons. He proceeded to Olmsted County and settled in Marion, where the first settlers had come in 1854. In March 1857, he reports having organized three classes.

John Fulkerson became the presiding elder of the MINNESOTA CONFERENCE, organized Aug. 6, 1857, and held that office several times for a total of seven years. The record of his service as a full-time pastor is not clear.

His own words in 1898 were, "I have been in the ministry and the work of the Church except when penury compelled me to seek means and aid from other honorable employment."

Places he served include Marion, Elmira, Spring Valley, Eyota, and Alma City. In 1866 he had settled on a farm. About 1873 he served two terms as Judge of Probate Court in Olmsted County. His reports to the Religious Telescope during the first year in Minnesota reveal an enthusiasm for the Minnesota Mission in spite of hardship, and also a masked talent for writing. His presiding elder report for 1897-99: "Traveled 4,378 miles; sermons delivered, 288; families visited, 697; read and prayed with 1,144; baptized, 36." At his death Jan. 19, 1910, his home was "the home that was open for so many years to feed and shelter the ministers of this church and Conference."

Fulkerson, Biographical Sketch. 1898.

Leonard, History of Olmsted County. 1910.

Minutes of the Minnesota Conference, UB. 1898.

ROY S. HEITKE

FULL CONNEXION. (See CONNEXION, FULL.)

FULTON, CREED (1802-1861), American minister and educational leader, was born Nov. 28, 1802, on Elk Creek, Grayson Co., Va. He attended the schools of his home county and was converted in 1820 at Cripple Creek Camp Ground in Wythe County, Va. He was licensed to preach that same year, and in 1823 entered the traveling ministry when he was admitted to the TENNESSEE CONFERENCE. His first circuit was Carter's Valley, Hawkins County, Tenn., as a helper to John Kelley. In 1824 the HOLSTON CONFERENCE was formed from division of the Tennessee Conference, and Fulton was appointed to the Blountville Circuit. Until he located in 1829, he served as preacher in charge of Kingston, Maryville, Abingdon (Va.), and Tellico circuits.

In 1834 Fulton was readmitted to the Holston Conference, and was appointed agent for Holston Seminary, New Market, Tenn. This was the beginning of his great interest in furthering educational opportunities for the people of this area.

The conference met in 1835 in Abingdon, Va., and appointed a committee to study location of a college and manual labor school. Fulton was named general agent to solicit subscriptions for the proposed college. On his way home from the session of the conference he visited Tobias Smyth, who lived about ten miles northeast of Abingdon. Upon hearing of the plan to start a new college, Smyth suggested that it be located on a nearby farm that was up for sale, and he pledged to make a substantial contribution. Fulton found the people of the area in whole-hearted support of the idea. On Dec. 31, 1835, Fulton presented the plan to the conference committee, and the next day the proposed site was approved and the location of the first building designated. Such was the foundation of EMORY AND HENRY COLLEGE.

Fulton was agent for the college until 1839, when he was appointed presiding elder of the Knoxville District, a post he held until 1845. He returned to school work in 1846, serving as president and agent of Holston College, as it was then called, until 1848, when he became superintendent of the new Strawberry Plains, Tenn., high school, which later became a college. In 1851 he returned to Emory and Henry College as agent, serving until 1852, when he located and went to GEORGIA to take charge of a girls' school.

Fulton was married twice, first to Elizabeth Wier, and later to Mary Smith Taylor, of Smyth County, Va. He died Sept. 16, 1861, and was buried on the property of Emory and Henry College.

R. N. Price, Holston Methodism, 1908.

C. J. Stevenson, Increase in Excellence: A History of Emory and Henry College. New York: Appleton-Century-Crofts, 1963.

L. W. PIERCE

FULWOOD, CHARLES A. (1829-1905), American preacher and the organizer of the first mission in CUBA, was born in Houston County, Ga. Converted at an early age, he preached his first sermon on his seventeenth birthday. During the War between the States he was a chaplain in the Confederate army. In 1873 he was transferred from Georgia to the FLORIDA CONFERENCE and stationed at Stone Church, Key West; later he was appointed presiding elder of the Tampa District which extended at that time from Ocala to Key West.

While in charge of the Tampa District, the War with Spain over Cuba heightened his interest in the Cuban refugees, and congregations for the Cubans were organized in Key West and TAMPA. The bishop in charge of FLORIDA asked him to include in his District also the work of establishing missions in Cuba. At the close of the Spanish-American War he traveled with W. R. LAMBUTH and Bishop WARREN A. CANDLER through the island and continued to be its superintendent until the first Annual Conference in Cuba Jan. 30, 1900. On March 28, 1899, he held the first QUARTERLY CONFERENCE in Cuba.

Under his leadership he had as his first helpers in Cuba, HUBERT W. BAKER, H. B. SOMEILLAN and later MANUEL DEULOFEU, all of whom had come under his influence in the Spanish missions in Tampa and Key West.

His first wife was a Miss Godfrey and his second wife, Mary Stanly. They were a tower of strength to him in his arduous tasks in a pioneer land. It was said that he never missed a roll call at annual conference for the sixty years during which he was a member. For nine years he traveled circuits, twenty-two years served stations, and was a presiding elder for twenty-one years. He often said that his desire was to cease at once to labor and to live—to preach his last sermon and at once report to his Master. This was prophetic, for at the 1905 Florida Annual Conference, after his name had been referred to the Committee for retirement, he stated to the Conference, "I do not want your sympathy . . . but rather your congratulations that I am so near home." As he started to his seat the hands of his brethren were extended to grasp his hand, but his body gently fell into their arms.

Journal of the Florida Conference, 1905.

S. A. Neblett, Methodism in Cuba. 1966. GARFIELD EVANS

FUNDAMENTAL METHODIST CHURCH, INC. was formed by former members of the M. P. Church who withdrew from any connection with The Methodist Church following union in 1939. The schism began with John's Chapel Church in MISSOURI on Aug. 27, 1942, under the leadership of Roy Keith. Two years later, after having been joined by other congregations, they established an organization.

The church is congregational-connectional in polity. The local congregations freely associate with the denomination and retain power to hold property and call pastors. An annual conference, composed of one lay and one ministerial delegate from each church, is the highest law-making body.

The Fundamental Methodists are extremely conservative in theological stance. They are members of the American Council of Christian Churches, the Bible Methodist Mission, and the International Fellowship of Bible Methodists. They are one of the few Methodist groups to retain the CLASS MEETING structure.

They reported 758 members in twelve churches and fourteen ordained ministers in 1970. Mission work is supported in Matamoros, MEXICO.

History and Discipline of the Faith and Practice of the Fundamental Methodist Church, 1964.

Minutes of the Fundamental Methodist Church, 1957.

J. GORDON MELTON

FUNDS. The British Methodist Church has a Department of Connexional Funds which has a General Secretary and a Secretary, both of whom are ministers. The work of this Department is (a) the accountability of such Connexional Funds as the respective committees may determine; and (b) the collection of the General Assessment. This General Assessment is levied on the CIRCUITS of the Methodist Church of Great Britain by the authority of the Conference, which decides how much shall be paid. The General Assessment maintains or contributes to the maintenance of the Ministers' Children's Fund, the Ministerial Training Fund, the General Sustentation Fund, the General Purposes Fund, the Education Fund, the Rural Travel Fund, the Manse Furnishing Fund, the Press and Information Service, the CHRISTIAN CITIZENSHIP DEPARTMENT, the LOCAL PREACHERS Department, the WESLEY DEACONESS ORDER, the Church Membership Committee, the Archives Centre, and the District Chairmen's Fund. There is also a Board of Trustees for Connexional Funds, consisting of three ministers and three laymen appointed by Conference, which acts as custodian trustee for the funds of the HOME MISSION DEPARTMENT, together with those of any other Connexional Committee anxious to use its services. The Common Cash is a small committee of ministers and laymen which administers a fund into which the Connexional Funds may place floating balances, and from which they may obtain temporary loans on current account. In effect, the balances standing to the debit or credit of the Funds sharing in the scheme are summarized daily by the bank, and interest on the net difference (after adjusting an "amount at rest") debited or credited, as the case may be, to the account of Common Cash.

The Ministers' Children's Fund is for the maintenance and education of the children of Methodist ministers; it is now principally a charge on the General Assessment (see also Kingswood School). An allowance is paid for each child under the age of eighteen. The custom of paying these allowances began in John Wesley's lifetime (about 1770), when it was usual for a circuit to provide for all the children of the preachers stationed therein; but this led to some preachers being objected to on the ground that they had large families, and so the Children's Fund was set up in 1819, the idea being to spread the cost of the children fairly over the whole Connexion, and this principle has been applied ever since.

The General Sustentation Fund is also a charge on the General Assessment: its resources are available for assisting circuits to meet the minimum stipends of their ministers when they themselves are unable to do so.

The Methodist Ministers' Retirement Fund, as it is now called, can be traced back to the Wesleyan Conference of 1763, when the preachers decided to make annual contributions to a fund which would be used to provide pensions for superannuated ministers, their widows and children. John Wesley did not at first encourage this, and he further complicated the situation when, between 1781 and 1790 he used some of the money from this Fund to support the preachers' wives. The Fund, often known as the Worn-Out Preachers' Fund, and also (1804) as the Methodist Ministers Merciful Fund, was reorganized in 1796 and 1799, and the general principle emerged that the contributions of the preachers should be separated to become the basis of an Annuitant Society, and that the laity should be encouraged to contribute to what was commonly called the Auxiliary Fund. A similar method was followed in the other Methodist bodies, and at the time of METHODIST UNION in 1932 there existed the Wesleyan Methodist Preachers Annuitant Society, the Primitive Methodist Itinerant Preachers Friendly Society and the United Methodist Ministers' Annuitant Society, to which the ministers contributed, and equivalent lay funds, such as the Wesleyan Methodist Worn-Out Ministers and Ministers' Widows Auxiliary Fund. After Methodist Union these Societies sank into the background, and a new Methodist Ministers' Retirement Fund, dating effectively from 1948, was organized. There is still a Connexional Auxiliary Fund to the Retirement Fund, whose object is to provide additional assistance at the discretion of the Committee to supernumeraries and ministers' widows who are in need.

Another aspect of this whole question of connexional funds is the Methodist Stewardship Organization, which is charged with furthering the conception of Christian stewardship in the circuits of British Methodism, and when requested, promoting and directing campaigns. This organization is an integral part of the Department of Connexional Funds and is directed by one of the secretaries of the Department.

Spencer and Finch, Constitutional Practice. 1951.

A. K. LLOYD

FUNDS OF THE UNITED METHODIST CHURCH, GENERAL. (See WORLD SERVICE AND FINANCE, COUNCIL ON.)

FUNERAL RITES. (See BURIAL OF THE DEAD.)

FUNK, WILLIAM ROSS (1861-1935), American United Brethren minister and publisher, was born at West Newton, Pa., Aug. 1, 1861. He married Lottie M. Hamlin, and they had three children. He served four pastorates in western PENNSYLVANIA marked by many confessions of faith, many new members increased church attendance, and remarkable building activity.

His ability to promote and conduct great material interests placed him before his denomination and at age thirty-five he was elected Publishing Agent. He held this office for thirty-two years, being in charge of the United Brethren Publishing House, later known as the OTTERBEIN

PRESS, DAYTON, OHIO. Under his leadership the U. B. Office Building was built at the corner of Fourth and Main Streets in downtown Dayton. It was the highest reinforced concrete building in the world owned and operated by a church. The Otterbein Press building was also erected under his administration, and the printing business increased constantly and consistently.

W. R. Funk was a leader in Sunday school and young people's work and his business and church activities were almost as numerous outside as inside his church. As Publishing Agent he was responsible for the production and circulation of church literature and the oversight of all publishing activities. He was a leader in educational and missionary phases of his church's work, one of the founders of the Otterbein Home, for children and the aged. Death came Nov. 3, 1935 at the Otterbein Home where he was residing.

Religious Telescope, Nov. 16 and 23, 1935.

HAROLD H. HAZENFIELD

FUNKHOUSER, GEORGE ABSALOM (1841-1927), American United Brethren theological professor and seminary president, was born to Andrew and Elisabeth Funkhouser on June 7, 1841, near Mount Jackson, Shenandoah Co., Va. He attended the preparatory department of OTTERBEIN UNIVERSITY in 1860, and after an interruption, 1862-65, to enlist in the Union Army, he graduated in 1868. Theological studies were taken at Western (Presbyterian) Theological Seminary at Pittsburgh (B.D., 1871). Allegheny Conference, Church of the United Brethren in Christ, granted him a license to preach in 1870, and he was ordained the next year. On Oct. 26, 1871, he married Susan Margaret Kumlér.

Union Biblical Seminary was founded at Dayton, Ohio, in 1871, and George Funkhouser was one of the first two professors. For forty-one years he was an active teacher, devoted to theological education. He was professor of Greek exegesis and homiletics, 1871-1912, and 1885-1907, he was senior professor or president. Failing health caused him to assume a lighter teaching load, 1907-12. However, 1913-21, he functioned as Director of Seminary Extension. The General Conference of 1893 elected him bishop, but he declined the honor in order to continue his ministry in seminary education. For many years he served in leadership roles on the Boards of Education and Missions of the denomination, and as a member of the Dayton Board of Education. He died July 30, 1927, in Dayton.

A. W. Drury, History of the UB. 1953.

Religious Telescope, Aug. 13, 1927. DONALD K. CORRELL

FURZ, JOHN (1707-1800), British Methodist, was born at Wilton, near Salisbury. Before becoming a regular itinerant, he had contacts with JOHN HAIME. FURZ traveled for many years, but retired from the active work in 1782. Toward the end of his life he is said to have suffered from mental decay, although remaining strong in faith.

T. Jackson, Lives of Early Methodist Preachers. 1837-38.

N. P. GOLDHAWK

FUSTER, ANGEL EUGENIO (1912-1967), minister, educator, and Methodist leader in CUBA, and elected bishop post mortem, was born at Cienfuegos, Cuba, Oct. 9, 1912, the son of Sebastian and Maria Teresa (Pineda) Fuster. He was a student at the Methodist Seminary in 1937, and of SCARRITT COLLEGE in 1941-42. He received an Educational Degree at the University of Havana in 1940. He married Hilda Rodriguez on July 6, 1936, and their children were Hilda (Mrs. Emilio Chaviano), and Angel Williams. He served in Cuba as a minister in Santiago de las Vegas, 1937-39; Matanzas, 1940-41; Santa Clara, 1942-67; District Superintendent, 1944-50, 1957-67; principal of the Methodist School at Santa Clara, 1951-61; president and treasurer of the Cuba Council of Evangelical Churches; and a member of the General Board of Christian Social Concerns of The Methodist Church, 1960-64.

ANGEL FUSTER

He became administrative assistant to Bishop JAMES W. HENLEY, under whose supervision Cuba was placed in 1960. Following difficulties connected with the Castro regime and the withdrawal of many missionaries from Cuba, Angel Fuster, who stayed at his post, was elected president of the Cuba Conference, 1962-65. He was also president of the Board of Trustees of Union Theological Seminary, Matanzas, elected in 1964.

Fuster was well known to FLORIDA Methodists and the Southeastern Jurisdiction. One who knew him well said perhaps the crowning achievement of his ministry was the manner in which, during the Castro regime, he managed to keep Cuban Methodism together without allowing it to become a mere tool of the government. He died Jan. 5, 1967, in Clewiston, Fla. from a tragic automobile accident the day before.

Angel Fuster was posthumously elected the first bishop of the autonomous Cuban Conference when it was organized Feb. 2, 1968. The Methodist Church mourned his death as the loss of a sincere, devoted and talented leader.

The Florida Methodist, Feb. 1967.

Who's Who in The Methodist Church, 1966.

N. B. H.

GABRIEL, DEVATHALA (1903-), was born in Nalgonda, Hyderabad State, INDIA, and was educated at the Methodist school at Vikarabad, the Methodist high school in HYDERABAD, and LEONARD THEOLOGICAL COLLEGE. While serving as pastor of the Nursamma Memorial Church at Kohir, he prepared liturgical worship services in the Telugu language and set them to music. These services were approved by the annual conference and widely adopted.

He also was a leader in introducing volleyball to village congregations and through them to other groups in the villages. (Because of its small cost and the number who are involved in playing, it is an ideal game for poor villagers in India.) Indian adults in cities and villages alike have generally been in urgent need of some recreation other than litigation, which has been a popular avenue of escape from boredom. Gabriel helped the church and the wider community in this service. The Christians, mainly from the outcastes, were helped socially and psychologically in being pitted in games against their Hindu upper-caste neighbors.

Gabriel served as district superintendent in two districts and later as principal of the Village Lay Workers Training School in Vikarabad, Andhra State. He retired from conference membership in 1968, but remains active as associate pastor and a teacher in the Training School.

J. WASKOM PICKETT

GABRIELSEN, WINNIE (1877-1949), American missionary of Swedish ancestry, was born in a Methodist parsonage in Keokuk, Iowa, Nov. 5, 1877, and was educated in the Collegiate Institute at Geneseo, N. Y.; the Academy of Denver University; NEBRASKA WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY; and the Chicago Training School. She was ordained a DEACON by Bishop CHARLES MEAD in 1927 and an ELDER by Bishop ERNEST RICHARDSON in 1929.

Miss Gabrielsen first went to India in 1908, and on her way visited SWEDEN and organized several auxiliaries of the WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY. In her first term in the Northwest India Woman's Conference, she proved to be a zealous evangelist. She early acquired a good working knowledge of Urdu and Hindi. She had a warm friendly spirit and was a delightful hostess; she was musical; she sang and played the organ. Her enthusiasm for her work proved contagious and spread to many of her associates.

Miss Gabrielsen was a firm believer in the power of the printed page. She was convinced that the Gospels, when made available in the language of the people, would speak both to their hearts and minds. She led groups of Christian men and women to trade and religious fairs and festivals. There she sold Scripture portions and distributed tracts free. In 1922, returning home from her second term in India, she stopped again in Sweden and toured extensively, telling of what was happening in India. She went to NORWAY, FINLAND, and DENMARK, and generated immense interest in Methodist missions in India.

Health and family interests prevented her return to India at the close of her second furlough, and she became pastor of a church in LINCOLN, Neb., of which her father had been pastor. In 1935 she returned to India, being supported this time by the Women's Societies of the Scandinavian countries. She became the recognized leader in organizing societies for Methodist women and in preparing programs for their study and work.

She died in Lincoln, Neb., on March 24, 1949.

H. N. Hollister, Southern Asia. 1956. J. WASKOM PICKETT

GABY, FRANCES (1900-), American missionary to CUBA, was born Feb. 27, 1900, in Mt. Washington, Mo. She was educated in the public schools of Texas and at Texas Woman's College, Ft. Worth. During the Centenary Movement of 1918-23, she volunteered for missionary work and was accepted as a contract teacher at COLEGIO PINSON, CAMAGUEY, in 1925. Later she became a full time missionary under the Woman's Division and served as a teacher for eight years at Eliza Bowman School in Cienfuegos.

In her forty-one years of service, her longest periods as an ordained pastor were ten years at Omaja and seven years at Herradura, all of which was in rural pioneer work. She had the distinction of having served as a director of all of the schools under the Woman's Division of the BOARD OF MISSIONS in Cuba, either as a full time or part-time director; and also of having worked in every one of the six provinces.

Having to leave Cuba because of communist revolution, she was assigned to work among the Cuban refugees in Mexico City for two years and for four years in Miami.

Finally retiring, she continues to work part-time in supplying Spanish-speaking congregations, teaching English classes and study courses, while making her home in Miami.

Anuario Cubano de la Iglesia Metodista. GARFIELD EVANS

GADDIS, BIRNEY H. (1884-), FREE METHODIST layman, was born at Comstock, Neb. He was a student at GREENVILLE COLLEGE and at the Universities of Illinois and Wisconsin, where he received the A.B. and Litt.D. degrees. He was vice-president of Greenville College and served as publisher in charge of Light and Life Press from 1933 until 1954. He was a general officer of the Light and Life Men's Fellowship. Gaddis supervised the transfer of the publishing house and denominational headquarters from Chicago to Winona Lake, Ind., in 1934.

He is retired but continues an active interest in the Men's Fellowship and in writing, and resides at Spring Arbor, Mich.

BYRON S. LAMSON

GADSDEN, ALABAMA, U.S.A. First Church. In 1850-52, General and Mrs. D. C. Turrentine moved into the vicinity of what is now Gadsden, a city of 53,000. Lazenby states, "He organized the first Methodist Sunday school in Etowah County and built the first house in Gadsden." West says that Turrentine continued to be superintendent of this school for thirty-four years. The enrollment of First Church Sunday school in 1970 was 871, with a church membership of 1,527.

As an organized church, Gadsden was at first a part of the Cedar Bluff Circuit. A history of the church says that James W. Ellis, Jr. was its first pastor, and EBENEZER HEARN was presiding elder. It became a station in 1868. James Christman erected the first small building with lumber furnished by Joseph Wilson, and it was located near where the present church stands. A second building was erected in 1869-70. The lot was given by Gabriel Hughes, and additional property was later donated by Colonel R. B. Kyle. A new church was erected in 1891-93, under the pastorate of S. L. Dobbs, father of Bishop HOYT DOBBS. The first sermon was preached in the new building by W. E. Mabry. A new Sunday school annex was erected in 1916, while Frank W. Brandon was pastor.

In 1936 the whole structure was remodeled and enlarged while CLARE PURCELL was pastor. The church was cleared of indebtedness during the pastorate of W. A. Shelton, 1941-47. Its value now is $440,000.

Bishop ROBERT PAINE organized the NORTH ALABAMA CONFERENCE in the Gadsden Church in 1870. The host pastor was R. A. Timmons. C. D. Oliver was presiding elder, and John G. Wilson, president of the Huntsville Female College, was secretary of the conference. This church has been one of the outstanding churches of the conference for many years.

M. E. Lazenby, Alabama and West Florida, 1960.

A. West, Alabama, 1893. GEORGE FREDERICK COOPER

GAETZ, LEONARD (1841-1907), Canadian minister, was born at Musquodoboit Harbor, Nova Scotia. He was received on trial in 1861 and ordained in 1865. His probationary years as a student were spent at Sackville and Maitland, Nova Scotia, and at Kingston, New Brunswick. Following ordination he served as pastor at Musquodoboit and Pictou, Nova Scotia, Fredericton, and Yarmouth. During the time at Fredericton he served as finance secretary of the district, and attended the first General Conference of the Methodist Church of CANADA, held in Toronto in 1874.

After holding several pastorates in Ontario and Quebec, he suffered a nervous collapse, and to repair his health and fortunes, he was superannuated from the church and went with his family to the Northwest Territories of Canada. The Gaetz family arrived in Calgary on April 8, 1884, and secured land where the city of Red Deer, Alberta, now stands. The family prospered as the land opened. In 1888 Gaetz was offered a senatorship by John A. Macdonald, but he declined.

By 1890, Leonard Gaetz had achieved sufficient success as a grain farmer to be called to testify before a federal agriculture committee in Ottawa about the agricultural potential of the area, and his testimony was later issued by the government as a pamphlet to encourage settlers.

Gaetz took a leading part in community affairs, including the establishment of the first school, the Gaetz progeny being the majority of the first class. In 1895 he returned to the active pastorate, and in 1899 became president of the Manitoba Conference. Gaetz Memorial United Church of Red Deer recalls the "founder of his community."

G. H. Cornish, Cyclopaedia of Methodism in Canada, 1881. Leonard Gaetz, Report of Six Years' Experience as a Farmer in the Red Deer District. Ottawa: Dawson, 1892.

A. O. MacRae, History of the Province of Alberta. Calgary: Western Canada Printing Co., 1912. J. E. NIX

GAINES, ABRAHAM LINCOLN (1866-1931), American bishop of the A.M.E. Church, was born in Washington, Ga. He was educated at Knox Institute in Georgia, Atlanta University (A.B.), and GANIMON THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY (B.D.). He was converted in 1882, united with Bethel A.M.E. Church, Atlanta, in 1883, joined the Georgia Annual Conference of his church in 1887, was ordained DEACON in 1887 and ELDER in 1889. He served as pastor and presiding elder in GEORGIA, VIRGINIA, and MARYLAND. Elected to the episcopacy in 1924, he was assigned successively to the Eighteenth (LOUISIANA and Latin America), Fourth (Midwestern U.S.A.), and Second Episcopal Districts (Southeastern U.S.A.). The nephew of another A.M.E. bishop, WESLEY JOHN GAINES, who ordained him, he was married to Minnie Lillian Plant in 1890. They had four children.

Bishop Gaines is said to have been an excellent executive. Gaines A.M.E. Church in Kingston, Jamaica, is named for him.

R. R. Wright, Bishops (AME), 1963. GRANT S. SHOCKLEY

GAINES, WESLEY JOHN (1840-1912), American bishop of the A.M.E. Church, was born in Wilkes County, Ga., on Oct. 4, 1840, the youngest of fourteen children of slave parents. He was converted in 1849. He acquired his own education surreptitiously, and married Julia A. Comper while still living on a plantation. He was licensed to preach by the M. E. Church in 1865. In 1866 he was admitted to the A.M.E. South Carolina Conference following ordination as deacon. He was ordained elder in 1867. He held pastorates and was a presiding elder in GEORGIA from 1867 until his election to the episcopacy in 1888, and he was then assigned to Georgia until 1892. A founder of MORRIS BROWN COLLEGE in ATLANTA, he later served as bishop in the east. He was the organizer of several annual conferences in the south, and the author of History of Methodism in the South (1890).

Like many others who were born in slavery, he had little formal education. He turned out, however, to be a forceful and fluent speaker. He was a big man, six feet two inches in height, and weighed over 300 pounds. He said he was sold for $1,000 when he was a slave. He built Bethel A.M.E. Church during his pastorate in Atlanta, and this church has remained a notably strong one in his denomination. Churches are named for him in Augusta, Waycross, and Douglass, Ga.; in Phenixville, Pa.; Birmingham and Anniston, Ala., and others in Texas and one in Grenada, Miss.

Bishop Gaines died quite suddenly in his home in Atlanta on Jan. 12, 1912, and is buried in that city.

GRANT S. SHOCKLEY

GAINESVILLE, FLORIDA, U.S.A. First Church, according to old newspaper clippings, was organized with four women members in 1854 by W. K. Turner, who was appointed that year by the FLORIDA CONFERENCE to the St. John's Mission. In 1857 the Alachua County Commission deeded a lot to the Methodist Church in Gainesville for $5. A small church was built in 1859, and that year Gainesville appears for the first time in the Florida Conference appointments. In 1860 the Gainesville Circuit reported 354 white and 370 colored members including probationers. In 1867 the circuit reported 118 white and no colored members. The Gainesville church, known for a time as Kavanaugh Memorial and later as First Church, erected a new building in 1874, and in January 1876, it became a station appointment. The next year it reported forty-seven members. The cornerstone for a new brick church was laid in December 1886, at which time there were 183 members. The church grew steadily; in 1900 it had about 300 members and in 1910 about 600. In 1911 the church bought the East Florida Seminary building and used it for Church school and youth meetings. In the mid-1920's a professional fund raiser was employed to secure cash and pledges to build a large church with a dome, but the project was abandoned when the real estate boom burst. A new parsonage was built in the 1930's.

On Sept. 25, 1941, the cornerstone for the present Gothic church was laid. On the same day at different hours cornerstones were laid for a WESLEY FOUNDATION building and for Wesley Community Church, which were sponsored by First Church. First Church constructed a chapel in 1951 and an education building in 1956. In 1950 First Church sponsored the establishment of Centenary Church. First Church had more than 1,000 members at unification in 1939 and it continued to grow. In 1970 the church reported 2,126 members, property valued at $743,600, and $86,404 raised for all purposes.

General Minutes, MES, TMC, UMC.

A Century of Methodism in Gainesville (pamphlet). 1957.

JESSE A. EARL
ALBEA GODBOLD

GAITHERSBURG, MARYLAND, U.S.A. Asbury Methodist Home for the Aged, Inc. is located at Rolling Acres, one block east of Route 355, in Gaithersburg, Montgomery Co., Md. It is a retirement residence owned by the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE of The United Methodist Church and is affiliated with the General Board of HEALTH AND WELFARE MINISTRIES.

Beginning with a debt of $125,000, the Home is now debt free and has developed into a multi-million dollar institution. It is recognized as a friendly and helpful Home for older people. Other groups throughout the country have sent delegations to Gaithersburg to study this Home with the hope of establishing like homes in their own areas. The Home is operated by a trained and educated staff, under policies established by the board of trustees, whose goal has always been to make Asbury Home the best, and with an emphasis on concern for the happiness and well being of those who dwell therein. It houses at present 175 persons.

RONALD H. WILSON

GALBREATH, GEORGE (1799-1853), American A.M.E. Zion minister, who according to the most authentic record, was born in Lancaster County, Pa., March 4, 1799. His parents, named Adam and Eve, were apparently slaves of a Dr. Galbreath. George was reared in the family of Moses Wilson in Hanover Township, Pa., learning the carpenter's trade from a John Miller in Lancaster County. He first joined the M. E. Church and then later under J. D. Richardson, he joined the A.M.E. Zion. He was admitted to the Philadelphia Conference in June 1830, was ordained a DEACON in 1832, and ELDER in 1835. His conversion had taken place in a Winsbrennarian meeting in 1826. He was consecrated bishop on May 27, 1848. He served in this office a little less than five years, plagued with hardships and poverty. He died in 1853 from an attack of asthma after a trip across the Alleghenies.

DAVID H. BRADLEY

GALESBURG, ILLINOIS, U.S.A. H. Hadley, who was appointed by the ROCK RIVER CONFERENCE to the KNOXVILLE Circuit in August 1847, organized a Methodist society in Galesburg during that year. Galesburg continued as a point on that circuit until it was made a station appointment in 1855. Meantime, a Swedish Methodist society was organized in Galesburg in 1851, and in 1853 the two groups agreed to pool resources and build a 36 by 50-foot frame church. PETER CARTWRIGHT dedicated the building in November 1853. By that time the two groups had agreed to separate, and the American Methodists had sole possession of the property. In 1860 the building was elevated eight feet to make room for a basement, and at the same time it was lengthened sixteen feet. In 1872 this building was sold and a Gothic brick church with stone trimmings was started. It was completed and dedicated in 1876. The cost was $40,000. In 1895 an organ was installed. Fire destroyed the building in 1909. For the next three years the congregation worshiped in Beecher Chapel at Knox College. Then on Jan. 19, 1913, Bishop WILLIAM A. QUAYLE dedicated the present First Church on a central downtown site. That year the church reported 1,080 members and its building was valued at $120,000. At unification in 1939 there were 1,556 active members. In 1970 First Church reported 2,242 members, property valued at $987,708, and $115,972 raised for all purposes.

General Minutes, ME, TMC, UMC.

M. Simpson, Cyclopaedia. 1878.

E. L. Thompson, ed., One Hundred Years of Methodism in Galesburg. Galesburg: Wagoner Printing Co., 1947.

JESSE A. EARL
ALBEA GODBOLD

GALLAGHER, ROBERT DAVID ERIC (1913-), Irish minister and son of ROBERT H. GALLAGHER, entered the ministry in 1938, and after circuit work in BELFAST, became resident chaplain of the METHODIST COLLEGE, Belfast, in 1942. He was for a time senior resident master of the boys' boarding department. He returned to circuit work in 1950, and in 1955 was called to the Conference Secretariat. Three years later he became Secretary of the Irish Conference and of the Methodist Church in Ireland, a position he presently holds, as well as that of Superintendent Minister of the Belfast Central Mission. During his term as Dean of Residence for Methodist students at Queen's University, Belfast, he guided the project for the erection of Aldersgate House as a center for Methodist student work. He represents Irish Methodism on many bodies, including the BRITISH COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. He has for long been a member of the Belfast City Education Committee. His advice is much sought in social welfare projects. In 1966 the Irish Conference designated him as President of the Methodist Church in IRELAND for 1967-68.

FREDERICK JEFFERY

R. H. GALLAGHER

GALLAGHER, ROBERT HENRY (1881-1965), Irish minister and historian, was born near Moy, County Tyrone, and exercised most of his ministry in the north of IRELAND. His administrative gifts led to valuable work as secretary and chairman of District Synods, as secretary and treasurer of the Methodist Orphan Society, and as President of the Church in 1946. A considerable number of men came into the full ministry of the Methodist Church through his pastoral work. He was deeply interested in the WESLEY HISTORICAL SOCIETY, led its activities in Northern Ireland, and was elected President of the Irish Branch on the death of R. LEE COLE. He wrote biographies of many early preachers, including one of ADAM CLARKE. His great work in retirement was to equip and arrange the Wesley Historical Room in Aldersgate House, BELFAST, and this room remains as a memorial to him.

R. L. Cole, Methodism in Ireland. 1960.
F. Jeffery, Irish Methodism. 1964.

FREDERICK JEFFERY

GALLAND, THOMAS (1791-1843), British preacher, was born at HULL, Yorkshire, England, in 1794. Intended by his father for the Anglican ministry, he graduated as M.A. of Cambridge University but, having been converted under the influence of a Methodist preacher, William Miller, he became a Wesleyan itinerant in 1816. At a time when official Methodism was Tory, Galland was a Whig, and this brought him on occasions into conflict with the policies of JABEZ BUNTING. Galland died at Hull on May 12, 1843.

B. Gregory, Side Lights. 1898.
Minutes of the Wesleyan Methodist Conference, 1843.
C. Smith, Wesleyan Methodism. 1857-61. C. ERNEST LONG

C. B. GALLOWAY

GALLOWAY, CHARLES BETTS (1849-1909), American bishop, noted for his oratorical ability and princely presence, was born in Kosciusko, Miss., Sept. 1, 1849. His father was a physician. After private tutoring for several years, at fourteen young Galloway entered a school for boys in Canton, Miss., and at sixteen he was admitted to the sophomore class in the University of Mississippi where he graduated in 1868. That institution conferred on him the D.D. degree in 1882, and later NORTHWESTERN and Tulane Universities honored him with the LL.D.

Converted during a revival at the university, Galloway felt called to preach, and was admitted to the MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE in 1868. He rose rapidly, being appointed to Port Gibson, an important station, after only two years as an itinerant. At twenty-four he was pastor in JACKSON, the most strategic charge in the conference. During four years there he earned a reputation as an impressive pulpit orator and an able community leader.

In 1877, Galloway began a four-year pastorate at VICKSBURG, then the strongest congregation in the conference. During a yellow fever epidemic in 1878, Galloway and his wife remained in the city and daily served the sick and the dying. Contracting the disease, both became desperately ill, and the physician, believing that Galloway was near death, permitted friends to bring his wife on a mattress to his side for their last words together. When the kindly neighbors returned to the room, Galloway said, "I am willing and ready to go, but I cannot think I will go at this time. I have much work yet to do." And so the event proved.

In 1881, Galloway was reappointed to the church in Jackson where he soon projected a building program and launched a second congregation (now Capitol Street Church) in the city. In June, 1882, he was elected editor of the New Orleans Christian Advocate, an influential paper in MISSISSIPPI and LOUISIANA Methodism. Since three editors of that publication—H. N. McTYEIRE, JOHN

C. KEENER, and LINUS PARKER—had been elected bishops during the preceding sixteen years, Galloway was from that day a marked man; it was assumed that he was in the line of succession for the episcopacy. For the first two and one-half years as editor, he commuted by train every week from Jackson to NEW ORLEANS and continued as a pastor, though during most of that time he had an associate to assist with the two churches. In 1884, while still commuting as editor, Galloway was appointed to Brookhaven, a town some fifty miles nearer New Orleans.

Galloway was a member of the 1882 and 1886 GENERAL CONFERENCES, leading his delegation to the latter gathering, where, on the second ballot, though only thirty-six years of age, he was elected a bishop. He was the youngest man ever elevated to the episcopacy in American Methodism. During the next twenty-three years he filled the high office with distinction and rendered notable service to the church. He visited all the mission fields of his church and traveled to every part of the world. He delivered the Cole Lectures at VANDERBILT, using the theme, "Modern Missions: Their Evidential Value," and at EMORY COLLEGE he gave the Quillian Lectures entitled, "Christianity and the Nation." A frequent fraternal messenger to Methodist gatherings in Britain and CANADA, he delivered the opening address at the third ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE in LONDON in 1901. He forcefully championed the causes of Methodist unification, temperance, and Christian higher education. One of the founders of MILLSAPS COLLEGE in his native state, he also served for many years as president of the General BOARD OF EDUCATION of his denomination, and as president of the board of trustees of VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY, and of Soochow University in CHINA. Galloway College in ARKANSAS, and Galloway Memorial Church in Jackson, Miss., bear his name.

Galloway was a writer of great force and clarity, and a preacher without a peer in his day. In DALLAS, Texas, a young newspaper reporter, sent to cover an address by Bishop Galloway, was so enthralled by the speaker's eloquence that at the end he discovered to his amazement he had not made a single note! In printed form Galloway's addresses still reveal his remarkable skill as a writer and his overwhelming power as an orator.

Friends were convinced that Bishop Galloway, a prodigious and conscientious worker from his youth up, literally wore himself out before his time. He became ill at the 1906 General Conference and was never fully well again. J. S. French declared that he was with the bishop when his doctor told him he would probably die in six months if he kept going but might live four years if he would cease work and rest. As they walked solemnly away from the physician's office, Galloway lifted his head and said calmly to his friend, "I am going to take my six months!" On May 12, 1909, less than six months later, the premier pulpit preacher of American Methodism was dead at his home in Jackson.

Warren A. Candler, Charles Betts Galloway, A Prince of Preachers and Christian Statesman. Nashville: Cokesbury Press, 1927.

W. L. Duren, Charles Betts Galloway. Atlanta: Banner Press, 1932.

H. M. Dubose, History. 1916.

J. B. CAIN

PAUL V. GALLOWAY

the son of James Jesse and Ella (Burkhead) Galloway. He was educated at Henderson-Brown and HENDRIX Colleges, A.B., 1926; PERKINS SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY, SOUTHERN METHODIST UNIVERSITY, 1926-27; the Yale Divinity School, B.D., 1929; Arkansas A. M. & N. College, LL.D., 1947; Hendrix College, D.D., 1951; OKLAHOMA CITY UNIVERSITY, L.H.D., 1960; McMURRY COLLEGE, Litt.D., 1961; Southern Methodist University, LL.D., 1964. On June 14, 1932, he married Elizabeth L. Boney, and they have a son, Paul, Jr.

Dr. Galloway joined the LITTLE ROCK CONFERENCE in 1925 and for the next twenty-three years served in both of the Arkansas Conferences: assistant pastor for the First Church, FORT SMITH, 1925-26; the Arkadelphia Circuit, 1928; the Manila-Dell Circuit in 1929; Swifton-Alicia 1929-30; the Joiner-Keiser Circuit, 1930-33; Clarendon, 1933-38; Osceola, 1938-40; Forrest City, 1940-43; Central Church, FAYETTEVILLE, 1943-48; Winfield Church, LITTLE ROCK, 1948-50. From that church he went to the Boston Avenue Church in TULSA, Okla., in 1950, serving there for ten years until he was elected bishop by the South Central JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCE of 1960 and assigned to the San Antonio—Northwest Texas Area.

He was chairman of the Program Committee for the Commission on Entertainment of the GENERAL CONFERENCE for the quadrenniums 1952-56 and 1956-60. He was elected chairman of the Commission on Entertainment for the 1964 General Conference, but resigned when he later was elected bishop. Member of the U.S.A. section of the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL since 1947. Delegate to WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL since 1947. Delegate to WORLD METHODIST CONFERENCES of 1947, 1951, 1961, and 1966. Delegate to General and Jurisdictional Conferences of 1956 and 1960. From 1960-1964 he was vice-president of the National Division of the BOARD OF MISSIONS. In 1968 he was elected vice-chairman of the Commission on CHAPLAINS and chairman of the General

GALLOWAY, PAUL VERNON (1904-), American bishop, was born April 5, 1904, in Mountain Home, Ark.,

BOARD OF HEALTH AND WELFARE MINISTRIES. He has served as trustee of Arkansas A. M. & N. College, Pine Bluff, Ark.; SOUTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY, Georgetown, Texas; McMurry College, Abilene, Texas; and HUSTON-TILLOTSON COLLEGE, Austin, Texas. He now serves as a trustee of Southern Methodist University and Hendrix College, and for eight years has been vice-chairman of the Board of Trustees of LYDIA PATTERSON INSTITUTE, El Paso. He serves as a member of the Board of CHRISTIAN SOCIAL CONCERNS and is on the Committee of Fifty for Quadrennial Emphasis. He has traveled abroad numbers of times for the Church and for the Commission on Chaplains and the Chaplains Office of the Armed Services of the United States.

He was reassigned to the Little Rock Area at the Jurisdictional Conference of 1968.

Who's Who in America, 1966-67.

Who's Who in The Methodist Church, 1966. N. B. H.

GALVESTON, TEXAS, U.S.A., located on the east end of Galveston Island, was a Karankawa Indian site when it was first explored by Europeans. The earliest settlement at the present city was that of the Jean Laffite commune of 1817 which centered around Laffite's fort. In 1830 or 1831 a garrison of Mexican soldiers was sent to guard the customhouse. By 1832 there was a community of some 300 persons.

Methodism began officially in Galveston as early as 1838 when ABEL STEVENS was appointed to HOUSTON and Galveston, and he was succeeded, in 1839, by THOMAS O. SUMMERS, when both cities reported only sixty-eight members. In 1842 Summers succeeded in erecting the first church building, which was named Ryland Chapel. It was also the first Protestant church building. Its name came from WILLIAM RYLAND, chaplain of the United States Senate, who gave $1,800 for the construction of this building.

In the story of Galveston Methodism, the names of ROBERT ALEXANDER, MARTIN RUTER, LITTLETON FOWLER, and DAVID AYERS come into the picture. These were giants of pioneer Methodism whose names are prominent on every page of history as the church, with her institutions, was planted in the virgin soil of east and southeast TEXAS.

As early as 1854, following the annexation of Texas to the Union in 1845, Galveston became the unofficial headquarters of Texas Methodism.

For four years during the Civil War, Galveston Island was virtually deserted and church activity seems to have almost ceased. But in 1865 church life resumed, and in 1869 St. John's Church was organized, replacing Ryland Chapel. St. John's had a prosperous but a very brief history. The beautiful building was destroyed by the great storm of 1900. Earlier, in 1872, David Ayers, prominent layman from New Jersey, led a movement that established St. James Church.

In 1876, according to Bishop Simpson, the Southern Church had three congregations with members as follows: St. John's, 421; St. James, 182; and Bay Mission, 93. The Northern Church had four congregations: East Church, 378; Wesley Chapel, 140; Edwards Chapel, 42; and German Church, 6. The A. M. E. Church consisted of Ready's Chapel, 190; and St. Paul's Chapel, 116.

In the early 1880's a Scandinavian M. E. Church was established; it was renamed St. James some time after 1900. In 1888 a new Southern church named West End was organized.

The 1900 storm wrecked both St. John's and St. James, and many of the members in each of these churches perished in the storm (altogether, between six and eight thousand persons drowned). Following the storm these two congregations were combined and renamed Central M. E. Church, South. In 1906 the name was changed to First Methodist Church.

In 1914 the West End Church was relocated in a tabernacle and renamed Thirty-third Street Church. In 1927 the name was changed again to Central Church. In 1929 a new church was started, named Crockett Place. In 1946 the St. James M. E. Church was disbanded, the members joining the other churches in the city.

In 1964 a great new "cathedral" building was occupied by the First Church congregation, renamed Moody Memorial First Church in honor of Mrs. Libby Shearn Moody, who with her husband provided most of the funds. Total cost of land, buildings, and furnishings was $2,500,000. The new buildings were erected on a new location, and their architecture is described as an international style, an outgrowth of the traditional Gothic, Romanesque, and Georgian styles. Materials used in the buildings include marble and gold tile from Italy, Kostata stone from Minnesota, and windows from Chartres, France.

In 1959 the district board of missions purchased a former Lutheran church building and helped organize Zion (Latin American) Methodist Church, a part of the RIO GRANDE CONFERENCE. Services for Spanish-speaking congregations in Galveston had been conducted, however, as early as 1925 by pastors from the Rio Grande Conference.

The membership of the Galveston Methodist churches in 1970 totaled altogether approximately 7,000. Largest was Moody Memorial First Church with nearly 1,200; followed by Central with nearly 800, and Crockett Place, 184. Two Negro congregations each had almost 650; Wesley United Methodist Tabernacle and Shiloh A.M.E. Church had over 250 members. Figures were not available for Carter Temple C. M. E. Church and for Ready's Chapel A. M. E. congregation.

Galveston and Houston constitute the hub of the great Gulf basin. Blessed with phenomenal growth in population and ever increasing productivity, the entire region looks to a bright future.

C. A. WEST

GAMBIA is a state in West Africa, stretching both sides of the Gambia River for 300 miles. The capital, Bathurst, stands at the estuary; on all other sides the state is surrounded by the republic of Senegal. The area is about 4,132 square miles, the population (1968 estimate) 350,000. There are five main ethnic groups: Wolof, Mandinka, Fula (all overwhelmingly Muslim), Jola and Serer, as well as Krio people with links with SIERRA LEONE. European contacts began in the mid-fifteenth century; a British presence, usually in the form of a Charter Company and frequently challenged by France, was maintained at the mouth of the river throughout the eighteenth century. A Crown Colony was declared in 1821, and Bathurst became, like Sierra Leone, a repository for slaves freed at sea—often the Muslim or other intractable elements were sent there. The boundaries were extended several times in the nineteenth century. Gambia became independent within the Commonwealth in 1965.

The early colony was under the Governor of Sierra Leone, who suggested that the Wesleyan Methodists should undertake work there. JOHN MORGAN arrived in 1821, found the work among Muslims unrewarding, but built up a small church of the more responsive recaptives on St. Mary's Island. His successors, British and Sierra Leonean, maintained the work despite small resources and heavy casualties through sickness, but there was little progress outside the Krio community and little growth in the nineteenth century. Methodist membership in 1968 was 1,302, and there have been some recent signs of response among nomadic peoples.

Hannah Kilham, widow of ALEXANDER KILHAM of the METHODIST NEW CONNEXION, participated in an abortive Friends' Mission to the Gambia in 1823, and made plans, advanced for their time, for vernacular literacy, especially in Wolof.

Findlay and Holdsworth, Wesleyan Meth. Miss. Soc. 1921-24. H. A. GALEY, A History of the Gambia. London: Routledge, 1964.

J. O. GREENWOOD, "Hannah Kilham's Plan." Sierra Leone Bulletin of Religion, Vol. 4, No. 1 (1962); Vol. 4, No. 2 (1962). C. P. GROVES, The Planting of Christianity in Africa. London: Lutterworth, 1946-54. A. F. WALLS

GAMBLE, FOSTER KIRK (1880-), American minister, missionary, educator, editor, was born in Jasper, Ala., Feb. 2, 1880, the son of Franklin Asbury and Mary Amanda (Owen) Gamble. He was educated at Southern University (now BIRMINGHAM-SOUTHERN COLLEGE), A.B., 1900; M.A., 1902; D.D., 1927; and VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY, B.D., 1907.

Following graduation in 1900, he was in business for a year, but later accepted a call to preach, was licensed July 22, 1902, and was admitted on trial in the NORTH ALABAMA CONFERENCE.

Gamble's first appointment was to Brilliant Circuit—six churches—in the Jasper District. After two years there, he went to Vanderbilt University. He then served as assistant editor of the Alabama Christian Advocate, and as pastor of Trinity Church, BIRMINGHAM, 1907-08. On Sept. 16, 1908, he married Beatrice Jenkins, and they went immediately to KOREA as missionaries. Following her death, Jan. 13, 1927, he found it necessary for the sake of their five children to return to the States. He had been missionary to Korea, 1908-15; pastor and missionary secretary, 1915-21; presiding elder of the Seoul District and professor in Union Theological Seminary, Seoul, 1921-27.

On Nov. 5, 1928, he married Mabel Stokes. He was missionary secretary, 1927-35, during which time he was also pastor at Fairfield, Ala., and then presiding elder of the Roanoke (Ala.) District. He was editor and business manager of the Alabama Christian Advocate, 1935-41, when a strong desire for a pastoral ministry led him to resign that post. He was assigned to Avondale Church, Birmingham, and after one year was made district superintendent of the Decatur District, 1942-46. He was pastor at Talladega, First Church, 1946-49; Hueytown, 1949-50, when he superannuated and became associate pastor of East Lake Church, serving in that capacity for eight years.

From 1942-52, he was secretary of the North Alabama Conference. He served on the GENERAL CONFERENCE COMMISSION ON THE STRUCTURE OF METHODISM OVERSEAS, 1940-52. For thirty years he was trustee of HUNTINGDON COLLEGE. From 1948-61, he and his wife jointly wrote a weekly column of interpretation of the International Sunday School Lessons for the Alabama Christian Advocate.

Foster K. Gamble's has been a varied ministry—not always by choice—but as his friends say, because he was willing to serve when his services have been most needed. He continues to reside in Birmingham.

N. B. H.

GAMBLE, THOMAS J. (1870-1958), Canadian preacher and missionary to POLAND, was born in Dundas, Kent County, Province of New Brunswick, CANADA, July 25, 1870. He received little formal education but early became an avid reader of good books and a student of the Bible. In his youth he was apprenticed for four years to a harness maker. He had been reared a Baptist but joined the Methodist Church while working at his trade. Shortly thereafter, he moved to Providence, R. I., became a member and an outstanding lay leader of the Madison Street Methodist Church there. During the First World War he served as a Y.M.C.A. secretary with American troops in ITALY. At the end of the war, he was transferred by the Y.M.C.A. to Poland.

In 1919 he accepted a position in the relief program in Poland of the M. E. Church, South. When this activity was liquidated, Gamble entered the Methodist ministry. He was ordained DEACON, July 10, 1924, and ELDER, Sept. 10, 1925. During his thirty years as pastor, he served churches in Lwow, Grudziazd, Odylanow, and Gdynia. During two appointments he acted also as director of a small orphanage. He married Sister Frieda Lenz, a deaconess of the church, in 1926.

Thomas Gamble served the church in Poland until 1949, when all foreign church workers were forced to leave the country. As a citizen of Canada, he returned to the Province of New Brunswick, where he resided until his death on Jan. 3, 1958. Although he always used an interpreter for his Polish and German sermons, his preaching in these languages was impressive and unforgettable. His strong personality and deep loyalty to Christ made him an effective pioneer in missionary service.

GATHER P. WARFIELD

GAMBLING. (See ETHICAL TRADITIONS, Am. and Br.)

GAMBOLD, JOHN (1711-1771), British MORAVIAN, was born on April 10, 1711, at Puncteston, Pembrokeshire, where his father was vicar. At Oxford, he was a member of the HOLY CLUB and afterward became vicar of Stanton Harcourt. He was much impressed by PETER BÖHLER, the Moravian, whose sermons to Oxford students he translated. In 1742 he joined the Moravians, and two years later became minister of their London congregation, afterward being appointed the first English Moravian bishop. Some of his hymns were included in Wesley's Hymns and Sacred Poems (1739), and he compiled the Moravian Hymn Book of 1754. He is regarded as the statesman of the Moravian Church in England. He died at Haverford-west on Sept. 13, 1771.

JOHN GAMBOLD

D. Benham, Life of Bishop Gambold. London, 1865.

J. E. Hutton, History of the Moravian Church. London: Moravian Publication Office, 1909.

L. Tyerman, Oxford Methodists. 1873.

G. A. Wauer, The Beginnings of the Brethren's Church in England. London, 1901. C. W. TOWLSON

GAMERTSFELDER, EMMA DRUSILLA SPRENG (1859-1952), American editor and leader of church women, was born Dec. 15, 1859. Much could be said of Mrs. Gamertsfelder as the wife of an Evangelical theologian, for her husband, S. J. Gamertsfelder, was president of EVANGELICAL THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, and she, like her husband, felt the need for a trained ministry. She was a mother and home maker and an active member of her local church, but her deep interest was in missions. This concern found many avenues of expression through the Woman's Missionary Society, as president of the Ohio Branch, later the Illinois Branch, and as an editor.

In the General Woman's Missionary Society, Mrs. Gamertsfelder served as editor of the Missionary Messenger, the official publication of the Society, from 1890-1922. She also wrote the history of the Woman's Missionary Society of the EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION, 1891-1922. On the frontispiece of this history she had inscribed, "The Valley of Vision," and followed with the words of Habakkuk, "Write the vision, and make it plain . . ." (Habakkuk 2:2, 3). Her writings reflected her philosophy of life.

Mrs. Gamertsfelder was a woman not only of vision but of action and of a great faith. Her pastor said of her, "She kept her actions close to her vision and her vision close to the actual." She once said, "I did not have the advantage of college training, but the Woman's Missionary Society has been to me a liberal education"—a fine tribute to an organization.

She died July 6, 1952.

The World Evangel, October 1952. RUTH GAMERTSFELDER

GAMEWELL, FRANK DUNLAP (1857-1950), American missionary to CHINA and hero of the siege of Peking during the Boxer Rebellion of 1900, was born in Camden,

S. C., on Aug. 31, 1857. He studied civil engineering at Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute and Cornell University, and held A.B., A.M., and Ph.D. degrees from DICKINSON COLLEGE. He later received honorary degrees from Columbia, SYRACUSE, and NORTHWESTERN.

In 1881, Gamewell was appointed a missionary and assigned to Peking, China, where he was principal of a small school that later developed into Peking University and Yenching University. He was professor of physics and acting president at Peking when the Boxer Rebellion broke out in 1900. While parts of the city were under siege, he was in charge of the fortifications of the British legation—fighting fire, hunger, Boxer attacks, and lack of water, until relief came. He was officially cited for saving the lives of some 3,500 people inside the barricades.

Gamewell remained in active missionary service until his retirement in 1930. He was for fifteen years superintendent of education for the Methodist Church in all China; executive of the China Educational Association for twelve years; an associate secretary of the BOARD OF MISSIONS in NEW YORK for six years.

He died in Clifton Springs, N. Y., on Aug. 7, 1950.

W. W. REID

GAMMON THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY in Atlanta, Georgia, began in 1875 as the theological department of CLARK UNIVERSITY. After a generous gift by Elijah Gammon, a charter was obtained in 1883 for a theological school bearing his name. This school, under the auspices of the M. E. Church, soon became the principal center for the training of Negro ministers. In 1944, the CRUSADE FOR CHRIST movement planned improvements in ministerial training for Negroes. For ten years, this was studied; the GENERAL BOARD OF EDUCATION became interested. A survey pointed to the possibility of an interdenominational theological center. When the Sealantic Fund was launched in 1957, this project was approved, and the Interdenominational Theological Center was organized with Gammon at the center and three other denominations participating. The Gammon building continues in this center with a building that serves as administrative quarters and student residence. The Gammon corporation continues with fifteen members elected by the Board of Education of The United Methodist Church.

JOHN O. GROSS

GARBER, PAUL NEFF (1899-1972), American bishop and historian, was born at New Market, Va., July 27, 1899, the son of Samuel and Ida (Neff) Garber. He received his education at Bridgewater College (B.A., 1919), and the University of Pennsylvania (M.A., 1921; Ph.D., 1923). He did additional study at the Crozer Theological Seminary in Pennsylvania, 1919-21. Honorary degrees awarded were the L.H.D. by SIMPSON COLLEGE, 1948; D.D., DUKE UNIVERSITY, 1953; LL.D., RANDOLPH-MACON COLLEGE, 1954, and Bridgewater College, 1955; D.D., EMORY UNIVERSITY, 1956, and Washington and Lee University, 1963. He was ordained a DEACON and ELDER and went into full connection in the WESTERN NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church, South in 1926.

Paul Garber married first Orina Winifred Kidd of Fall River, Mass., on Aug. 21, 1927, and after her death on July 18, 1959, he married Nina Fontana in Geneva, Switzerland, in 1963.

PAUL N. GARBER

He served as an instructor in history at the University of Pennsylvania, 1921-22, and the same position in Brown University, 1923-24. He was assistant professor in history at Duke University, 1924-26, at that time being made a full professor of church history at Duke, where he served as Head of his department until 1944, when he was elected bishop. He was made Dean of the Duke University Divinity School in 1941.

His election to the episcopacy came at the end of a long and tense deadlock in the balloting between W. A. Smart of the VIRGINIA CONFERENCE and R. Z. Tyler of FLORIDA. When it was seen that neither of these men could be elected, the Conference turned to Garber and he was elected on the fourteenth ballot. He was assigned to the GENEVA (Switzerland) Area, because the GENERAL CONFERENCE of the church had at its session in May 1944, directed the SOUTHEASTERN JURISDICTION to provide episcopal leadership for the European work of the church which had formerly been connected with the M. E. Church, South. The Geneva Area at that time embraced the work in nine European countries and in North Africa. It was just as the second World War was coming to an end, and Bishop Garber had much to do in visiting, organizing, and practically reconstituting Methodist work in certain of the war-torn lands. His ministry in POLAND and supervisory work there was much noticed by the church.

Upon the illness of Bishop W. W. PEALE in 1952, Bishop Garber was assigned to the RICHMOND Area of the church, then comprising the large Virginia Conference and the NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE. He served as episcopal leader of this area from 1952 to 1964, at which time the North Carolina Conference was made an episcopal area and Bishop Garber was stationed in RALEIGH as its president.

Paul N. Garber was president of the COUNCIL OF BISHOPS, 1963-64. He was on the Commission on Promotion and Cultivation, 1960-68; Chairman of the Commission on Higher Education, 1956-60; and on the BOARD OF EDUCATION for many years beginning in 1952, and serving as president of the Board, 1960-64. He was a member of the Methodist Corporation, which holds property in the District of Columbia; of the Commission on CHAPLAINS, 1952-64; Commission on Camp Activity, 1952-64; Commission on Interdenominational Relations, 1948-52; on the World Executive Committee, WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL, 1961-66; Board of Publication of The Methodist Church, 1940-44 and 1964-68; and on the Commission on the Course of Study, 1940-44. He was a member of the American Society of Church History and of the American Historical Association.

As an author he wrote the following books: The Gadsden Treaty, 1924; That Fighting Spirit of Methodism, 1928; The Romance of American Methodism, 1931; John Carlisle Kilgo—President of Trinity College, 1894-1910 1937; The Legal and Historical Aspects of the Plan of Union, 1938; The Methodists Are One People, 1939; The Methodist Meeting House, 1941; The Methodists of Continental Europe, 1949.

Bishop Garber was the Thirkield Lecturer at CAMMON THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY in 1941; delivered the Southwestern Lectures at SOUTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY, Georgetown, Texas, 1948; the Jarrell Lectures at Emory University, 1952; the Brown Lectures at Randolph-Macon College, 1955; and the Lamar Lectures at WESLEYAN COLLEGE, Macon, Ga., 1962. He was a delegate to the General Conference of the M. E. Church, South in 1938; the UNITING CONFERENCE in 1939; and to the subsequent General Conferences of 1940 and 1944. He served as a trustee of Randolph-Macon College; Randolph-Macon Woman's College; Randolph-Macon Academy; Ferrum Junior College; LOUISBURG COLLEGE; WESLEY THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY; HIGH POINT COLLEGE; AMERICAN UNIVERSITY; PFEIFFER COLLEGE; and VIRGINIA WESLEYAN COLLEGE.

He retired at the Jurisdictional Conference of 1968, and resided in Geneva, Switzerland, until his death on Dec. 18, 1972.

Who's Who in America, Vol. 34.

Who's Who in The Methodist Church, 1966.

N. B. H.

GARCIA, GUMERSINDO, SR. (1895-1964), Filipino physician-surgeon and administrator of Mary Johnston Hospital, was born in Kabankalan, Negros Occidental, on July 16, 1895. He was educated at the University of the Philippines (B.A. in 1918 and M.D. in 1920) and received honorary degrees from Silliman University (Ph.D. in 1957) and Central Philippines University (Ph.D. in 1962). He married Concepcion Yulo on Dec. 24, 1923 and they had five children—Gumersindo, Jr., Ernesto, Roberto, Zenaida, and Eduardo. Garcia was director of Mary Chiles Hospital from 1925-1928. He served as chairman of the Board of Medical Examiners from 1932-1935. He was a member of the following medical groups and served as president of each of them: Manila Medical Society (1933); Philippine Medical Association (1934); Philippine College of Surgeons (1955); and Philippine Chapter, International College of Surgeons (1957). He was also president of the Philippine Mental Health Association (1961-1964) and vice president of the Philippine Hospital Association. He was a pre-war trustee of Silliman University and a member of the Board of Regents of the University of the Philippines from 1945-1964. He was a member of Central Methodist Church in MANILA and the president of the Philippine Federation of Christian Churches from 1946 to 1963. Garcia was very active in a great number of civic and religious organizations in addition to his work as administrator of Mary Johnston Hospital.

BYRON W. CLARK

GARDEN, GEORGE BYERS (1897-), and ELSIE SIMESTER (1897-), are a missionary couple who have worked as a team in the Methodist Church in Southern Asia. They are second-generation missionaries. George's parents were Joseph Henry and Frances Edith Garden, pioneer Methodist missionaries in South India. Elsie's parents were also pioneer Methodist missionaries, but their field was Foochow, CHINA. George was born May 9, 1897, in Ootacamund, South India. Elsie was born July 12, 1897, in Foochow. Both graduated from OHIO WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY. They were married and appointed as missionaries to India in 1923. For forty-three years they served in two schools, the Methodist Boys' High School in HYDERABAD and the Methodist Co-educational Rural High School in Zahirabad.

After three years as principal of the Hyderabad School, George nominated an Indian colleague as principal and became vice-principal and hostel warden. He held these positions for fourteen years. Mrs. Garden held no appointment that recognized her as an executive or a leader, but she acquired a reputation through her own and other churches as a progressive educator, completely devoted to her own and her husband's tasks as missionaries.

In 1945 they were asked to undertake the development of a new type of rural high school. For twenty-one years they worked amid conditions that contrast sharply with those in which they served in Hyderabad. They did much to make the Hyderabad school, only a furlong or two from the Nizam Palace in the heart of the metropolis, the great multipurpose high school it now is. But they repeatedly represented to their colleagues in the annual conference, and especially to those who shared with them responsibility as members of the conference board of education, the need for a high school in rural surroundings. Eventually, when it was possible to start the new school, the Gardens were put in charge.

A tradition of rural simplicity has been maintained there. Expenses have been kept at a level making it possible for many boys and girls from extremely poor families to get an education. Enough land was obtained to make it possible for the school to grow much of the food the students consumed. The farm demonstrated improved methods of plowing, seed selection, rotation of crops, irrigation, and use of fertilizers and insecticides. In addition, the school under their leadership introduced improved leather technology and took an active part in training adults for their responsibilities as church members and Christian citizens.

Garden served several years as district superintendent in the HYDERABAD CONFERENCE without being relieved of school duties.

B. T. Badley, Southern Asia. 1931.

J. N. Hollister, Southern Asia. 1956. J. WASKOM PICKETT

GARDEN GROVE, CALIFORNIA, U.S.A., is located in the heart of Orange County. The church was founded in 1875 when the city was truly an area of gardens and groves. For a time the congregation met in the home of A. C. Cook, until 1876 when a small building was erected to meet the needs of the group. In 1894, an addition increased the size of the building to accommodate the increasing membership. In 1922, under the leadership of William Harkness, a stucco Spanish-type building was erected at the corner of Euclid and Stanford Avenues. Under the guidance of various ministers, this church served the needs of the people of Garden Grove, and provided a vital and important role in the life of the city. In 1952 the membership was 400 and the population of Garden Grove was 13,000. In 1970 the population of the city stands at 121,500, and the membership of the Methodist church at 1,692. A building program, begun in 1955 and completed in 1966, saw the completion of modern educational buildings, nursery school facilities, church lounge, fellowship hall, administration building, sanctuary, and chapel.

ROBERT R. WASHER

GARHWAL, India, is a large area in the Indian Himalayas. It is part of the territory ceded to British INDIA by the treaty of 1816. The chief center of the government, and of the Methodist Church in the area, is Pauri. The great Christian statesman of North India in the middle of the nineteenth century, Henry Ramsey, urged Bishop EDWARD THOMSON, whom the Board of Bishops had sent to India in 1864, to organize the India Mission and to open work at Pauri. Ramsey offered $1,500 to help on initial expenses and $25 monthly for maintenance of the work. Bishop Thomson and the conference accepted the offers and appointed JAMES MILLS THORBURN to Garhwal. He chose Pauri as his place of residence.

Many of Indian Methodism's ablest missionaries from abroad have labored in Garhwal, and their work has contributed to the development of many of the most noble leaders both ministerial and lay.

An unsuccessful effort was made to establish a tea estate in the area. But some side effects of tea planting have been good for the kingdom. Many Chinese who were brought into the area married Indian women and they or their children became Christians. Their descendants have strengthened the church in many sections of India.

The Messmore Intermediate College at Pauri was the first high school in the area and was likewise the first intermediate college. The girls' school, located less than two miles from Messmore, has junior-high rank. Above that level Messmore is coeducational. Plans are now in hand for increasing the school's facilities for young women students.

J. N. Hollister, Southern Asia. 1956.

J. E. Scott, Southern Asia. 1906. J. WASKOM PICKETT

GARLAND, CHARLES HUGHLINGS (1856-1918), NEW ZEALAND minister, was born in London, the son of a missionary in the Wesleyan Seamen's Mission in that city. He grew up to share in his father's work. While a teacher he heard the call to the ministry, and when twenty years old, was accepted as a candidate. After college days he was chosen with two others to go to New Zealand, where he arrived in 1882. After serving a probationary period he was ordained and served leading pulpits. In 1901 he was president of Conference.

His ministry was marked by rare intellectual power, spiritual influence, and exceptional pastoral efficiency. In 1912 he was appointed principal of Dunholme Theological College, Auckland, a position he occupied until his death. He was an original thinker, a skillful teacher, a most trustworthy guide, an eager evangelist who won many converts. Possessed also of administrative gifts, he occupied some of the most important connectional positions and left behind him a cherished memory. He died in Auckland on Nov. 4, 1918.

New Zealand Methodist Times, November 23, 1918.

WILLIAM T. BLIGHT

GARLAND, LONDON CABELL (1810-1895), American educator and the first chancellor of VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY, was born in Nelson County, Va., March 21, 1810, son of Spotswood and Lucinda (Rose) Garland.

He was graduated from Hampden-Sydney College in 1829. In December 1835, he was married to Louise Garland.

Upon graduation from college, Garland launched upon a distinguished career as an educator. He was professor of natural science at Washington College (now Washington and Lee University), 1829-32; professor of natural philosophy at RANDOLPH-MACON COLLEGE, 1832-36; president, 1836-46. He became a professor in the University of Alabama in 1847 and president, 1855-65. Thence he went to the University of Mississippi as professor of physics and astronomy, 1866.

He wrote a series of articles for the Christian Advocate, Nashville, Tenn., which resulted in a plan for a section-wide university to be established at NASHVILLE. He was the first chancellor of Vanderbilt University, 1875-93. He was the author of Trigonometry, Plane and Spherical, 1841. He died in Nashville, Feb. 12, 1895.

Who Was Who in America, 1607-1896.

J. MARVIN RAST

GARLAND, TEXAS, U.S.A. First Church is the oldest of four Methodist churches serving the city of approximately 81,000 people and is located in the central part of the city.

The original Methodist church in the Garland area was organized in 1855, with eighteen members, with services held in a log schoolhouse. Much information about early Methodism in the area is found in Morrison's biography of Newton A. Keen, one of the early ministers.

First records of a Methodist church building in Garland, a suburb of the City of DALLAS, show that in 1871 a lot was purchased and church erected. The church was destroyed by a tornado soon afterwards, but members immediately rebuilt the one-room frame building and in 1892 the church was valued at $800 with a seating capacity of 250.

In 1894, using lumber from the one-room frame church, Garland First Methodists chose another site and erected a $4,000 sanctuary. In 1904 a lot was purchased and the 1894 sanctuary moved to what is the present location of First Church.

With a church membership of 250 in 1924, it was decided to build a larger sanctuary. At that time Garland had a population of 1,435.

The new sanctuary was completed in June 1925, and dedication services were held the first Sunday the church was used. Church members had paid for the church as they built it. Bishops H. A. BOAZ and JOHN M. MOORE took part in the dedication ceremonies. The 1925 sanctuary was valued at $30,000, with twenty-two separate classrooms and a main auditorium with a seating capacity for 1,000 or more.

Following the completion of the 1925 sanctuary, no major church construction took place at Garland First until 1951. In that year funds were raised and construction began towards a three-story $150,000 educational building. In 1955 Garland First Church built a fellowship hall and additional classroom space, costing approximately $200,000.

First Church took the biggest step in its three-phase building program with the launching of a $400,000 bond campaign in October of 1961. This money was to be used to build and furnish a new sanctuary. But before all the bonds could be sold disaster struck in the form of fire. The 1925 sanctuary burned on the night of May 5, 1962, and was considered a total loss. Practically all the furnishings as well as hymnals, choir music and robes, communion equipment, etc., were either burned or were ruined by smoke and water.

Despite terrific handicaps, morning worship services were held the next morning in the Fellowship Hall. Following the fire, enough additional bonds were sold to enable the building committee to order the beginning of construction of the new sanctuary. Participating in the groundbreaking ceremonies was Bishop W. C. MARTIN.

The new sanctuary has a seating capacity of 850, with a sixty-seat chapel. Two outstanding features are the pipe organ and prized stained glass windows. The first services were held on Nov. 17, 1963.

From a church membership of eighteen in 1855, First Church has grown to a membership of 2,395 in 1970.

I. S. Ashburn, A History of the Old Trinity Circuit. N. d.

Garland Daily News, Garland, Texas.

History of Garland First Methodist, compiled by Church History Committee.

T. L. Morrison, A History of Newton Asbury Keen's Life. N. d.

ANITA HILL

CHARLES GARRETT

GARRETT, CHARLES (1823-1900), British minister, was born at Shaftesbury, Dorset, Nov. 30, 1823. He entered the Wesleyan Methodist ministry in 1846. He had become a teetotaler in 1840, and he led the group which brought the Wesleyan Church into the teetotal camp. This was achieved at the Conferences of 1875-77, which said that bands of hope (for children) and temperance societies should be set up throughout Wesleyanism. It was significant of the opposition that Garrett overcame that in the temperance societies room was left for non-abstaining members, who only promised to work for the suppression of intemperance. Garrett became the first superintendent of the Liverpool Mission, an offshoot of the FORWARD MOVEMENT, in 1882, the year in which he was president of the Wesleyan Methodist Conference. He remained at Liverpool until his death on Oct. 21, 1900.

JOHN KENT

MRS. ELIZA GARRETT

GARRETT, ELIZA (1805-1855), American philanthropist and founder of Garrett Biblical Institute at EVANSTON, Ill., was born near Newburg, N. Y., on March 5, 1805. In 1825 she was married to Augustus Garrett. After living in the east several years and later in the Mississippi valley, in 1834 they moved to CHICAGO. In 1839 they both joined the M. E. Church. Subsequently Garrett became mayor of the city. After his death in 1848, Mrs. Garrett gave most of her large estate to found the Garrett Biblical Institute (now GARRETT THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY). She died Nov. 23, 1855.

M. Simpson, Cyclopaedia. 1878.

ELMER T. CLARK

GARRETT, LEWIS, JR. (1793-1869), pioneer American minister, was born in Mercer County, Ky., April 11, 1793. He was received on trial in the TENNESSEE CONFERENCE in 1815 and was appointed to the Stone's River Circuit where he served one year, then to the Dickson Circuit in 1816, the Cumberland Circuit in 1818, and to the Duck River Circuit in 1819. In 1820 he was appointed as missionary to that portion of the Jackson Purchase lying in KENTUCKY and TENNESSEE. He worked industriously during 1821 and organized several societies, ministry to which required six weeks on each round. He continued this good work through 1822, and in November of that year he was appointed PRESIDING ELDER of the newly organized Duck River District, which extended from near Pulaski, Tenn. to the Mississippi River. In 1824 he was appointed presiding elder of the Forked Deer District which embraced all the territory between the Tennessee and Mississippi Rivers. The work continued to expand until the MEMPHIS CONFERENCE was organized in 1840.

In 1820 Garrett was married to Elizabeth McDonald of Pulaski. In 1824 he located for reasons of health and retired to a farm in Giles County, Tenn.

In the evening of his life he moved to ARKANSAS, re-entered the ministry, and was readmitted to the LITTLE ROCK CONFERENCE in 1859. He served Abum Circuit, Jefferson Circuit, and Hemstead African Mission, superannuated 1863-64, was reactivated in 1865, served Clarke Circuit, Mount Holly Circuit and Lehi Circuit, dying there in 1869.

J. B. McFerrin, Tennessee, 1869-73.Journals of the Memphis and Little Rock Conferences.

F. H. PEEPLES

GARRETT THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY

GARRETT THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, Evanston, Ill., was founded in 1855 as Garrett Biblical Institute, honoring Mrs. ELIZA GARRETT, wife of a former mayor of CHICAGO. She had bequeathed $300,000.

The first building had been erected on the campus of NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY in 1854. The next year, when the school was chartered, operations were begun with three instructors and four students. John Dempster was the senior professor and the others were DANIEL P. KIDDER and HENRY BANNISTER.

In two years the original Dempster building was doubled in size. Ten years later it gave way to Heck Hall, named for BARBARA HECK of early Methodist fame. By 1885, still larger quarters were needed and Memorial Hall was erected. Eventually the site was exchanged with Northwestern University for a location farther north, and Memorial Hall was sold to the university. In 1918, the campus was improved by additional dormitories, and in 1924 a new administration building was erected. Other buildings included a chapel, library, and dormitory.

Through the years the seminary experienced two disastrous fires. These and three financial panics, assessments which took a considerable part of the income-producing property, rising budgets, deficits, and construction resulted in an indebtedness of over three million dollars by 1932, but this was eventually liquidated.

In 1934, the Chicago Training School, founded in 1885, was merged with Garrett. This school specialized in the training of deaconesses and others for missionary and social work.

Garrett grants the B.D. and M.R.E. (Religious Education) degrees. Garrett's campus joins Northwestern University, and the schools have a cooperative plan of study which enables Garrett students to earn the M.A., the M.S.M. (Sacred Music), and the Ph.D. degrees at Northwestern.

The governing board is made up of six charter trustees elected by the ROCK RIVER CONFERENCE of The United Methodist Church, and up to twenty-five counsel trustees elected by the charter trustees.

JOHN O. GROSS

GARRETTSON, CATHERINE. (See GARRETTSON, FREEBORN.)

FREEBORN GARRETTSON

GARRETTSON, FREEBORN (1752-1827), pioneer preacher and leader, was born Aug. 15, 1752, near the mouth of the Susquehanna River in MARYLAND. As loyal communicants of the Anglican Church, his well-to-do parents taught him the Lord's Prayer, the Apostles' Creed, and the Ten Commandments. A visit of ROBERT STRAWBRIDGE to the community made Garrettson aware of Methodism. A sermon by FRANCIS ASBURY and association with local Methodists stirred his conscience. In 1775, feeling called to preach, Garrettson did some work as an assistant on a circuit, and on May 21, 1776, he was admitted on trial in the conference at BALTIMORE. In the next six years he served circuits in Maryland, DELAWARE, and VIRGINIA.

During the Revolution Garrettson suffered more persecution than any other American Methodist preacher. The reason was his refusal to take the oath to bear arms as required by Maryland law. He declared that as a Christian minister it was contrary to his mind and grievous to his conscience to participate in war. In a letter to JOHN WESLEY after the war, Garrettson summarized the trials to which he had been subjected. He was imprisoned once, beaten twice and after one of the drubbings was left speechless and senseless on the highway, was shot at once, had guns and pistols pointed at his breast, was often surrounded by mobs, was stoned frequently, and was once delivered from an armed mob by a flash of lightning at night.

Garrettson's native honesty, sincerity, friendliness, and loyalty soon won and maintained for him throughout his life the respect and admiration of his fellow preachers. In 1784 THOMAS COKE found him "an excellent young man . . . all meekness and love, and yet all activity," and he and Asbury sent him off "like an arrow" to notify the preachers north and south of the coming CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE. Through Coke, Wesley asked the American Methodists to furnish ordained men for the work in Nova Scotia and Antigua. Garrettson and JAMES O. CROMWELL volunteered and were sent to Nova Scotia. Garrettson remained three years and in spite of hardships greatly strengthened the work in the province.

Favorably impressed by Garrettson, Wesley urged him several times to send his journal to England for publication. Unfortunately the document was lost at sea. In 1787 WESLEY sent Coke to America with instructions to convene a GENERAL CONFERENCE which among other things would ordain Garrettson as a General Superintendent for Nova Scotia and Antigua. When informed of the plan, Garrettson said he would act as superintendent for a year and if it turned out well he would return and accept ordination for the office. As is generally known, the conference did not follow Wesley's directive, and Garrettson, to his surprise and disappointment, was appointed as PRESIDING ELDER in the Peninsula. Years afterward Garrettson wrote, "I had intended, as soon as conference rose, to pursue my voyage to the West India Islands, to visit Newfoundland and Nova Scotia, and in the spring return. What transpired in the conference during my absence, I know not." Though disappointed, Garrettson did not allow the experience to sour him; he was loyal as always.

Students have speculated as to why the 1787 conference did not elevate Garrettson to the general superintendency. ABEL STEVENS thought it was because the preachers did not regard the gathering as a General Conference, but E. S. TITTLE is nearer the mark when he says it was probably due to hostility toward Coke and Wesley. That conference also refused to elect RICHARD WHATCOAT a General Superintendent as directed by Wesley.

In 1788 Garrettson was appointed presiding elder in new territory, an area from Westchester, N. Y., northward along the Hudson River to the Canadian border, and westward up the Mohawk Valley. It was a strategic assignment. Always a good administrator, Garrettson sent twelve young men to different places in the region and told them when he would meet with them for quarterly sessions. Within two years twelve circuits were in operation and there were over 2,500 church members. Garrettson thus helped Methodism to turn the flank of the almost impassable Appalachian Mountains and opened the trail to the west.

In 1793 Garrettson did something unusual for an early American Methodist preacher; he married Catherine Livingston, a member of a powerful and aristocratic family. Her father, Robert Livingston, was one of the wealthiest and most influential men in New York State. Her elder brother Robert signed the Declaration of Independence and administered the oath to George Washington when he became president in 1789. Her younger brother Edward was mayor of New York and secretary of state under Andrew Jackson. Catherine was a Methodist before she met Garrettson; a servant in her father's home at Rhinebeck, N. Y., was instrumental in her conversion.

MRS. CATHERINE GARRETTSEN

Catherine Garrettsen was as devoted to Methodism as her husband, and together they wove a thread of warm hospitality into the fabric of the movement. In 1799 they built a fine home at Rhinebeck which was always open to every passing Methodist preacher. Asbury often visited the place, calling it "Travelers' Rest." One room in the house was reserved for preachers. The beneficence of both Garrettsens was immeasurable. According to NATHAN BANGS, "during the course of his whole ministry of upward of 50 years, Garrettsen received no pecuniary recompense."

After his marriage Garrettsen continued in the itineracy, but for the rest of his life he and his wife maintained the home at Rhinebeck. From 1793 to 1803 he was presiding elder at different times in New York and New Jersey and in the cities of New York and PHILADELPHIA. In the next seven years he served two years as pastor at Rhinebeck, three as district or conference missionary, and two as pastor in New York City. He was presiding elder in New York City, 1811-14. He was left without appointment in 1815 at his own request, and in 1816 was missionary in the New York District. Because he was showing signs of infirmity, the conference made Garrettsen supernumerary in 1817. He was not pleased, believing he could still do effective work. In 1819 he was appointed conference missionary and continued in that relationship until his death. During the last decade of his life he did considerable traveling and preaching, making tours to the north and east and as far south as Maryland.

Garrettsen stands high as a man, minister, and leader in early American Methodism. On the grounds of conscience he freed his slaves when he entered the itineracy and ever afterward opposed slavery. Though not eloquent, he was an effective preacher, winning thousands of converts. He gave financial support to missions, and was one of the founders and promoters of the Missionary Society of the M. E. Church in 1819. Whether presiding elder in New York City, or directing circuit riders in that capacity in rural areas, he was an able administrator. A wise and constructive counselor, he was usually present whenever the church leaders assembled. Asbury made him a member of his famous COUNCIL, and conferred with him often at his home in Rhinebeck. Garrettsen was a good team worker; he contended for his views on the conference floor but graciously submitted to the will of the majority. He supported JAMES O'KELLY in 1792, but would not leave the church with him. He favored the election of presiding elders and thought there should be a bishop for each annual conference, but knowing he was in the minority he never pouted and was always intensely loyal to Methodist polity as it was. He was the best peace-maker in Methodism in his day. Asbury found him helpful in dealing with the difficult problem of unordained preachers administering the sacraments in 1779-80, and he served on the committee which tried to persuade James O'Kelly to remain in the church. After the delegated General Conference was established in 1808, Garrettsen led the NEW YORK CONFERENCE delegation to the quadrennial gathering the rest of his life, except in 1820, an indication of both his leadership and the esteem in which he was held by his brethren.

It is generally agreed that Freeborn Garrettsen stands second only to Francis Asbury among the leaders in the first half century of American Methodism, and as Tipple says, if one knows how great Asbury was, one realizes that "to be ranked next to him is no insignificant or meager distinction." Garrettsen died in New York City, Sept. 26, 1827, and after a funeral service conducted by Nathan Bangs and Thomas Burch, was buried at Rhinebeck.

- F. Asbury, Journal and Letters. 1958.
 N. Bangs, Freeborn Garrettsen. 1829.
 E. S. Bucke, History of American Methodism. 1964.
Christian Advocate and Journal, Oct. 5, 1827.
 F. Garrettsen, Experiences and Travels. 1791.
General Minutes, ME.
 W. W. Sweet, Men of Zeal. 1935.
 Ezra S. Tipple, Freeborn Garrettsen. New York: Eaton and Mains, 1910.

ARTHUR B. MOSS
 C. WESLEY CHRISTMAN, JR.

GARRISON, EDWIN RONALD (1897-), American bishop, was born in Clinton County, Ind., on Dec. 26, 1897, the son of R. Elliot and Susie (Enright) Garrison. He received his B.A. degree from DEPAUW UNIVERSITY in 1921, and an honorary D.D. from the same university in 1944; a B.D. from DREW THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY in 1925; and the LL.D. from DAKOTA WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY in 1964.

Edwin Garrison married Edith Heritage on Jan. 20, 1922, and to them were born Helen Carolyn (Mrs. Lewis Kauffmann) and Marion Ann (Mrs. James H. LoPrete).

He was ordained to the ministry of the M. E. Church in 1927. His pastorates include: Sheridan, Elkhart, Bluffton and Fort Wayne, Ind., 1928-50. He was superintendent of the Wabash District, 1942-47; administrative assistant to the bishop of the INDIANA AREA, 1950-60; and in 1960 was elected bishop by the North Central JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCE and assigned to the Dakotas Area. He was the second episcopal leader to serve this Area.

Bishop Garrison served as a member of the Commission on Interjurisdictional Relations, as a member of the BOARD OF MISSIONS, and chairman of the COORDINATING COUNCIL OF The Methodist Church. He was also on the Committee on the Study of the Ministry, and in his own state was chairman of the South Dakota Advisory Committee of the U. S. Commission on Civil Rights.

His episcopal visitation took him to missions in JAPAN, KOREA, ALASKA, HAWAII, GERMANY, South America, Europe, RUSSIA, and North Africa. He retired at the North Central Jurisdictional Conference of 1968 and presently resides in Kalamazoo, Mich.

Who's Who in America, Vol. 34.

Who's Who in The Methodist Church, 1966.

N. B. H.

SCHUYLER E. GARTH

GARTH, SCHUYLER EDWARD (1898-1947), American bishop, was born at Saffordville, Kan., Sept. 1, 1898, the son of Christian and Lura Mabel (Ream) Garth. His grandfather came to Kansas from Norway. Educated at BAKER UNIVERSITY (B.A., 1922) and GARRETT (B.D., 1924), he received the honorary D.D. degree from Baker, Garrett, and OHIO WESLEYAN in 1933, '35, and '41 respectively. He married Lola Mabel Stroud, June 20, 1922, and they had one son and two daughters.

Garth served as supply preacher at Welda, Kan., 1920-22, and was admitted on trial in the KANSAS CONFERENCE in March of the latter year. On entering Garrett Biblical Institute in 1922, he became pastor at Henning, Ill., and in September, 1923, was received by transfer in the ILLINOIS CONFERENCE, ordained DEACON, and reappointed to Henning. Sometime in 1924, Garth became associate pastor at Miami Parish, later called White Temple, MIAMI, Fla. In April, 1925 he was received by transfer in the ST. JOHNS RIVER CONFERENCE (Florida), ordained ELDER, and continued at Miami Parish. In 1926, according to the conference minutes, he was appointed to Little River in the Miami District. Thereafter his appointments were: Miami District, 1927-30; First Avenue, ST. PETERSBURG, 1930-33; Christ Church, PITTSBURGH, Pa., 1933-36; and Trinity Church, YOUNGSTOWN, Ohio, 1936-44.

Garth served as a member of the BOARD OF MISSIONS (ME), and as a trustee of Mount Zion (Georgia) Seminary. He was a delegate to the 1931 ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE and to the 1936 and 1944 GENERAL CONFERENCES. Elected bishop in 1944, he was assigned to the WISCONSIN Area. While on an episcopal visit in CHINA, he and his wife were killed Jan. 28, 1947, in an airplane accident near Hankow, and they were temporarily buried in that city. The Methodist churches in Wisconsin observed Sunday, Feb. 16, 1947, as a memorial day for the Garths. Speaking at a memorial service in the chapel of the Methodist building in NEW YORK, Bishop C. BROMLEY OXNAM said that Bishop Garth was essentially a human personality, that he loved human beings and they responded to him. He declared that any work assigned to Bishop Garth was taken seriously and raised in significance.

General Minutes, ME.

C. T. Howell, Prominent Personalities. 1945.

F. D. Leete, Methodist Bishops. 1948.

Who's Who in America.

World Outlook, March and June, 1947.

JESSE A. EARL
ALBEE GODBOLD

GARY, GEORGE (1793-1855), American minister, was born in Middlefield, Otsego Co., N. Y., Dec. 8, 1793. He was converted at the age of nine or twelve at a family worship service in his home. He was admitted on trial into the NEW ENGLAND CONFERENCE in 1809, at the age of fifteen and one-half years. At this time he had never studied grammar, but through observation and practice became a flawless speaker. He was ordained by Bishop FRANCIS ASBURY.

Gary's first appointment was at Barre, Vt. The following four years he traveled as one of the preachers on a circuit in MAINE. In 1814 he was transferred to the Genesee Conference in NEW YORK and assigned to the Herkimer charge in the Mohawk Valley. In 1815 he became the third preacher on the Otsego Circuit. In succession he served the Sandy Creek Charge near Watertown, Utica, and was presiding elder on the Oneida District, beginning in 1818. Almost all the remaining years of his life Gary was a presiding elder.

In 1843 the Board of Missions of the M. E. Church sent him to supersede JASON LEE as superintendent of the OREGON MISSION. He arrived at his new post in May 1844. Having been given plenipotentiary powers, he wasted little time in disposing of most of the Mission property except that of the churches at SALEM and Oregon City. His acts changed the entire direction of the Mission and put an end to activities among the Indians in OREGON. The building of the Indian Manual Training School, costing $10,000, and one square mile of land at the center of the present Salem, was sold to the trustees of the Oregon Institute for $4,000.

Gary left Oregon upon the arrival of WILLIAM ROBERTS, his successor, in 1847. He arrived at his New York home in 1848, and resumed his work in the BLACK RIVER CONFERENCE. He died March 25, 1855.

Oregon Historical Quarterly, Vol. 24, 1923.

Oregon Native Son, Vol. 1, p. 452.

Thomas Hall Peame, Sixty-one Years of Itinerant Christian Life in Church and State. Cincinnati: Curtis and Jennings, 1898.

ERLE HOWELL

GARY, INDIANA, U.S.A., population 174,132, is an industrial city and the heart of a great steel complex. It was founded in 1906 by Judge Gary, who was then president of U.S. Steel. He selected the sand dunes at the south end of Lake Michigan so the Great Lakes could be used for shipping, in addition to the many railroads and highways that converged there as they entered CHICAGO from the east.

The First Methodist Church (now City Church) was started that year over a saloon. In 1907 the membership divided between Congregational and Methodist. The present City Church was built with the aid of U.S. Steel and the Centenary Fund Drive. It is a Gothic structure with seventy-three rooms, and cost $1,000,000 in 1925.

Grace Church was started in 1911. Marquette Park and Ambridge Churches were started in 1950. Delaney, formerly of the Central Jurisdiction, was started in 1917. Marshalltown was started by the NORTHWEST INDIANA CONFERENCE and the LEXINGTON CONFERENCE to serve a Negro population in 1957.

There are four A.M.E. churches, one C.M.E., and one A.M.E. Zion in Gary. Half the population of Gary is Negro. The other half is made up of eighty-one ethnic groups from all over the world. Forty years ago more than fifty foreign languages were heard regularly on the streets of Gary. Fifteen or more are heard regularly today.

Methodism has developed the following institutions in Gary: Campbell Friendship House, 1912; Stewart Settlement House, 1921; Methodist Hospital, 1923; Goodwill Industries, 1935. All of the Methodist agencies are strong and thriving. The hospital has 360 beds and is building 150 more. In a few years a satellite hospital will be built in the suburbs. The Catholic Church is the strongest in Gary, but the Methodists make a great impact upon the city and county. The county population is nearly 700,000. Many new Methodist churches are developing in the suburbs.

People of all races and ethnic groups and former religious now are active members in Methodist congregations. Some come by way of intermarriage and some because the descendants of immigrants prefer the Methodist Church.

However, even now large sections of people like to live as close neighbors to others who are from the same country. There are several "Cultural Centers" in Gary, one for each of the major ethnic groups. The Methodist Church does all it can to weld the people together into a productive society, with Christian ideals and practices. The Methodists in Gary feel that it is one of the most challenging opportunities in the world.

S. WALTON COLE

GASTONIA, NORTH CAROLINA, U.S.A. First Church, forerunner of the public school system in the City of Gastonia, is the largest congregation of any denomination in Gaston County. This congregation was born out of a Wesleyan heritage that records the visit of FRANCIS ASBURY to Gaston County in the early 1800's, and includes the organization in 1870 of the first congregation of Methodists, known as Shiloh. Fourteen years later, in 1884, Shiloh united with the congregation at Lowell and moved to the village of Gastonia, and then took the name of Main Street Church. When this move was made, the membership was 110. Main Street was a part of the Lowell

Circuit until 1895, when it became a station with a membership of 228.

Located at Main Avenue and Oakland Street, Main Street Church attracted leaders in business and the professions, and soon took the lead in local educational circles by building and operating a high school, under the supervision of B. E. Atkins, the first principal. He was succeeded by J. H. Separk, who was principal when the school was sold to the city of Gastonia in the summer of 1901, and became the first unit of the public school system of the city.

Various periods of construction have been known in this congregation: the first permanent sanctuary, 1884; larger educational facilities and new sanctuary, 1900; elaborate expansion, particularly for Christian education, 1920; and a completely new sanctuary and educational facilities for children located on Franklin Avenue, 1956. Properties which include an excellent organ, splendid parking facilities, one of the largest and most worshipful sanctuaries in the area, and extensive educational equipment and space are valued at more than $2,000,000.

Thirty-two pastors have served the congregation, which now numbers 2,014 (1970). With a multiple staff, including three ministers and ten full-time employees, First Church makes its contribution to the total life of the community. The nursery and kindergarten has attracted state-wide attention and employs eleven teachers; the music program involves five choirs and approximately 200 persons; the laity of the congregation give generous support to educational and benevolent causes; and programs of fellowship and activity within the church attract persons from across the city.

R. F. Cope and M. W. Wellman, The County of Gaston. Heritage Printers, 1961.

J. H. Separk, Gastonia and Gaston County, North Carolina, 1846-1949. Gastonia, 1949. CHARLES E. SHANNON

GATCH, PHILIP (1751-1835), pioneer American preacher, was the son of Conduce and Priscilla Gatch, and was born on their farm about six miles northeast of BALTIMORE, on March 2, 1751. He was converted in January 1772, under the preaching of Nathan Perigau (or Perigo), who was one of ROBERT STRAWBRIDGE's energetic local preachers. Gatch had a fair education for that day, and after his conversion came to feel that he ought to become a Methodist itinerant. He attended the first American Conference held (in PHILADELPHIA in 1773), and GEORGE RANKIN, who was there presiding, sent him to NEW JERSEY to test his powers. His later service on Kent Circuit, Del., is said to have been remarkable, and he established a sub-circuit in PENNSYLVANIA across the MARYLAND border.

Bishop Simpson in his Cyclopaedia says that Gatch was the means of adding hundreds, probably thousands, to the church. He did, however, suffer great opposition, and was the subject of severe persecution as the Methodists then during the American Revolution were greatly suspect. Traveling between Bladensburg and Baltimore, he was arrested by a mob, who severely abused him, covered him with tar, and applying to one of his naked eyeballs, produced severe pain, from which he never entirely recovered. After describing the scene, he says, "If I ever felt for the souls of men, I did for theirs; when I got to my appointment the Spirit of the Lord so overpowered me that I fell prostrate in prayer before Him for my enemies. The Lord no doubt granted my request, for the man who put on the tar and several others of the party, were afterwards converted."

The very next morning another mob waylaid him on his way to another appointment, but by turning out of the road he avoided them. On another occasion he was seized by two stout men, and he says, "They caught hold of my arms and turned them in opposite directions with such violence that I thought my shoulders were dislocated, and it caused me the severest pain I ever felt. My shoulders were so bruised that they turned black, and it was a considerable time before I recovered the use of them."

Notwithstanding this opposition Gatch continued in his ministry for a number of years. He was, however, not in robust health, possibly because of the persecutions, and stayed in the traveling ministry only until 1778—which was of course late in the Revolutionary War. He then located in Buckingham County, Va., having married Elizabeth Smith of Powhatan County. He prospered as a planter, and continued as a local preacher. He got into the ordination controversy after the Revolution, as he proved to be the leader of the rebel preachers of VIRGINIA and NORTH CAROLINA in asking for the right to ordain each other, and to administer the ordinances before the CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE was held. Gatch was in the presbytery of four created at the meeting at Broken Back Church in Fluvanna County, Va., who were set up and empowered to ordain each other, and then to ordain as many of the preachers as wished to administer the Sacraments for the benefit of Methodists. Asbury got this whole plan nullified in a brief while.

Philip Gatch emancipated his slaves in 1780, and strongly insisted that this be done everywhere. After his location, he continued to travel as he could, and in 1798 went into the Northwest Territory of OHIO. He supplied the Miami Circuit in Ohio for eighteen months about the turn of the century, and seems to have spent the latter years of his life in Ohio. His life was written up by Judge (later Justice) JOHN McLEAN, one of the great jurists of that day, and an Ohio Methodist who went upon the Supreme Court of the United States in 1829. Philip Gatch died on Dec. 28, 1835. He is honored as one who helped lay the foundations of Methodism in the then West.

John McLean, Sketch of Rev. Philip Gatch. Cincinnati, Swormstedt and Poe, 1854.

M. Simpson, Cyclopaedia. 1878.

N. B. H.

GATESVILLE, TEXAS, U.S.A. First Church was organized by Robert B. Wells early in November 1854. His wife, Mary, daughter of ORCENETH FISHER, who came as a pioneer Methodist preacher to TEXAS in 1839, organized the first Sunday school with twenty "scholars" enrolled. Here, the first sermon west of the Brazos River was preached by Robert Wells, who, although retired because of health, served the small group until a regular circuit preacher could be supplied. In a log cabin church Mrs. Wells taught the first school for the children of the community. When the membership of the church outgrew the small log cabin, services were held in the local court house, which was a rude structure built of "raw hide lumber." Several other temporary buildings were used until suitable land was obtained and a rock church-schoolhouse was erected in 1860. Civil war conditions prevented the immediate completion of this building, and for a time a roof of brush had to be used. Sunday school and day school functioned normally, but church services were held once a month.

The church has been relocated or rebuilt four different times, beginning in 1854. At present plans are under way to build a larger and more modern church. The wife of a great-grandson of Wells has been the church secretary for eight years, and various descendants of Rev. and Mrs. Wells have at times served on the official board and worked loyally in the church, as also have many descendants of the charter members.

In 1954 the church celebrated its centenary with an elaborate program of thanksgiving.

M. Phelan, Texas. 1924.

R. B. Wells, "Diary," MS. Owned by Mrs. A. C. Schloeman of Gatesville, Texas.

MARY SUE BROWN

GATTINONI, CARLOS T. (1907-), Argentine bishop, pastor and author, was born in Junin, Province of Buenos Aires. He was eldest of ten children born to Bishop and Mrs. JUAN E. GATTINONI. He prepared for the ministry at the FACULTAD EVANGELICA DE TEOLOGIA in BUENOS AIRES and later did postgraduate study at Hartford Seminary Foundation, Hartford, Conn., U.S.A. He was married to Emmy Präg, and they have two daughters.

Beginning in 1930, he held a series of pastoral charges in URUGUAY and ARGENTINA. He was secretary of Christian education for his annual conference, 1940-44. For the years 1947-56, he was pastor of Central Methodist Church, MONTEVIDEO, Uruguay, and since 1957 he has been pastor of Central Church, Buenos Aires. In addition to his pastorates, he has been district superintendent on several occasions.

Gattinoni was a delegate to the 1952 GENERAL CONFERENCE. He attended the ecumenical conferences in Oxford and Edinburgh, 1937; the Consultation on Missionary Work in Africa in Katanga, 1960; the Buenos Aires Consultation on Latin America, 1962; the WORLD METHODIST CONFERENCES, 1961, and 1966; the World Methodist Conference on Family Life, BIRMINGHAM, England, 1966; and the Theological Conference, GOTHENBURG, Sweden, 1961, 1967.

At the Constituting Conference which created the Argentine Evangelical Methodist Church at Rosario, Argentina, in October, 1969, Carlos Gattinoni was elected bishop of that Church on the first ballot with the requisite two-thirds majority. He presides over the Argentine Conference and the Patagonia Provisional with headquarters in Buenos Aires.

Bishop Gattinoni is one of the vice-presidents of the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL.

He is author of several books, among them: El Hombre, un problema para si mismo (Man, His Own Problem); El poder que necesitamos (The Power We Need); En verdes prados (In Green Pastures); and El sentido de la felicidad (The Sense of Happiness).

Who's Who in The Methodist Church, 1966.

EDWIN MAYNARD

GATTINONI, EDUARDO JOSE (1913-), editor and publisher in Latin America. Born in MONTEVIDEO, URUGUAY, he was one of the ten children of the Bishop and Mrs. JUAN E. GATTINONI. He studied at Colegio Ward in BUENOS AIRES, ARGENTINA. He was married to Lotty Präg in 1938 and they have three children.

For a time he was director of Rosenbusch Institute in Buenos Aires. Then he became director of Editorial METHIOPRESS (the Methodist Publishing House in Buenos Aires). While continuing to direct the publishing enterprise, he serves also as attorney for the Methodist Church in Argentina; chairman of the board of directors of the Union Theological Seminary, in Buenos Aires (FACULTAD EVANGELICA DE TEOLOGIA); vice-chairman of the board of directors of Colegio Ward, and a trustee of Armadoro Naraniera.

Who's Who in The Methodist Church, 1966.

EDWIN H. MAYNARD

JUAN E. GATTINONI

GATTINONI, JUAN E. (1878-1970), a bishop of the Methodist Church in ARGENTINA, was born to a Roman Catholic family in ITALY on June 24, 1878. His parents brought him with them to Argentina when they established themselves in the interior of that country. There he went through the primary school. Later he worked in his father's carpenter shop. Then, in order to be of more help to his family, he tried his hand as a butcher boy, as blacksmith, as a tram conductor and later on as an office employee. He studied by night. When he was about fifteen years old, he went into a Methodist meeting and was converted to Christ as a living reality. He brought his brother to the church, and they both began to win their two sisters, then their mother and finally their father (who, however, never joined the church). His grandmother was so upset that she refused to talk to him again. He decided to work as a Bible colporteur, and did so for some time, but he talked too much and sold too little; so he returned to secular business. Some months later a pastor convinced him that he should train himself for the ministry. So he entered the Methodist Seminary, then in Mercedes, BUENOS AIRES, where he completed his theological studies. There he met Minnie E. Rayson, an English lady whose parents had brought her with them from England, when the father had come to work in what was then a British railway.

On finishing his seminary studies, Juan Gattinoni received his first appointment to the church in Mercedes (Uruguay). A year later he married Miss Rayson. Then, after two short pastorates in Junin and Chacabuco, two neighboring towns in the province of Buenos Aires, he was assigned to the Central Church in MONTEVIDEO (Uruguay), 1911, where he remained for ten years, until he was transferred to the Central Church in Buenos Aires (Argentina), 1921. While pastor of this church, he was elected the first national bishop by the LATIN AMERICAN CENTRAL CONFERENCE of 1932. He retired in 1944 and continued to teach for several years at his alma mater, now Union Theological Seminary (FACULTAD EVANGELICA DE TEOLOGIA) in Buenos Aires. He was the father of a large family, most of whom are active in the work of the Methodist Church. His eldest son, CARLOS, after serving for a number of years as pastor in Buenos Aires, was himself elected a bishop when Argentina Methodism became an autonomous church. Another son, EDUARDO, is manager of METHIOPRESS, the Methodist Publishing House in Buenos Aires. Bishop Juan Gattinoni died on Jan. 7, 1970, in Buenos Aires. Bishop SANTE BARBIERI, who read his memoir to the COUNCIL OF BISHOPS, concluded by saying: "We thank you God for the life of such a man of Christ."

N. B. H.

GEBUZA, THOMAS (dates uncertain), was a native of Tongaland, sometimes called Maputaland, which lies on the South African coast to the east of the highlands of Zululand. He was converted while a laborer on the Transvaal gold mines and on his return began to travel on foot and preach among his people. His success was such that the nearest Wesleyan missionary was approached for assistance. Investigation revealed that there were sixteen churches (some seating two to three hundred people), seven exhorters or evangelists, and about four hundred persons meeting regularly in class. The work came under the control of the Rev. D. T. Fraser in 1904.

E. H. Hurcombe, Pioneer Missionary Work Among the Natives in Zululand and Maputaland. N.p., n.d. G. MEARS

GEDEN, ALFRED SHENNINGTON (1857-1936), British Methodist, was born at Didsbury, MANCHESTER, in 1857. He entered the Wesleyan ministry in 1881, and after serving as assistant tutor at Didsbury College, was appointed to INDIA, where he was principal of Royapettah College, Madras, from 1886 to 1889. Ill health forced a return home, where he became professor of Old Testament languages and literature at Richmond College, Surrey (see THEOLOGICAL COLLEGES), from 1891 to 1915. A notable scholar, he is best known for his collaboration with WILLIAM FIDDIAN MOULTON on the Concordance of the Greek New Testament (1897); but Geden also wrote books on comparative religion and Outlines of an Introduction to the Hebrew Bible (1909), as well as making several contributions to the Encyclopaedia of Religion and Ethics. He died at Harpenden, Hertfordshire, Aug. 3, 1936.

Minutes of the Methodist Conference, 1937.

H. MORLEY RATTENBURY

GEDNEY CASE. In England, dissenters' burials and dissenters' baptisms caused many minor and petty struggles between "church" and "chapel" in the nineteenth century. So long did legislative settlement tarry that August tine Birrell was heard laboriously explaining to A. J. Balfour, the famous Conservative statesman, that a non-conformist was not "a person trying to thrust someone else's corpse into a churchyard that did not belong to him." The legal position in 1800 was that any baptized person dying within a parish could be buried in the parish churchyard, the religious ceremony at the graveside being conducted by the parish priest or another Anglican clergyman only. This at once raised the question of what constitutes a valid baptism, since the unbaptized could be refused burial.

In 1808-09 a test case was fought on this issue concerning John Wight Wickes, rector of Belton in Rutland, who had refused to bury the infant child of a man whom he considered the "deluded, infatuated and ignorant disciple of the lowest description of Methodists." Wickes was suspended for three months, legal opinion being that as long as a person had been baptized (by Anglican, Roman, or Dissenter), Canon 68 of the Church of England compelled the incumbent to inter any corpse brought into the churchyard.

A similar case was fought in 1840 and 1841. T. S. Escott, vicar of Gedney, not only refused to bury a child baptized by a Wesleyan minister but described the itinerant preachers as "beings who pretend to be ministers of the Gospel and really are ministers of hell and dissenting mountebanks." An appeal was made by the Wesleyans to the bishop of Lincoln (John Kaye); and the case was fought by the Connexional COMMITTEE OF PRIVILEGES in the Anglican Court of Arches, which ruled that baptism by Wesleyan Methodists was valid by Canon Law and Civil Law. Escott appealed to the Privy Council, then the final court of appeal from the ecclesiastical courts, and the council confirmed the judgment of the inferior court. The decision was important, in the sense that a decision against the Wesleyan Methodists would have created a quite impossible situation. Certainly, the favorable decision increased the church consciousness of the Wesleyans.

JOHN BOWMER

GEETING, GEORGE A. (1741-1812), German-born American itinerant preacher of the UNITED BRETHREN CHURCH, was born in Nieder-Schelden, Prussia, on Feb. 6, 1741. He was reared in the Reformed Church and received a moderate education. Early years were spent as a miner, but when eighteen years of age he migrated to the U. S. A., and settled in the community of Antietam, Maryland, where he made his home for the remainder of his life. In 1760 Geeting met and heard PHILIP WILLIAM OTTERBEIN and was converted into a faithful disciple. Being of Reformed background, Geeting applied to that church for ordination in 1786 and was formally ordained in 1788. His persuasion in the revivalistic movement and his attraction to Otterbein soon brought him into disfavor with the Reformed Synod. He was expelled from the Synod in 1804, after which he devoted his total energies to the Church of the United Brethren in Christ. He was one of the foremost pastors of the young church and was known as a splendid orator. FRANCIS ASBURY knew him well and highly praised him.

Geeting's last sermon was delivered in Otterbein's pulpit in BALTIMORE, Md. Taken ill, he decided to return home, but died in his seventy-second year before reaching his home on June 28, 1812, and was buried in the Mt. Hebron Cemetery near Keedysville, Md.

A. W. Drury, History of the U.B. 1924.

Eberly, Albright and Brane, History of the U.B. 1911.

C. DAVID WRIGHT

GEETING MEETING HOUSE. (See KEEDYSVILLE, MARYLAND.)

GEIGER, LEROY (1891-1957), American E.U.B. minister, was born in 1891 near Milford, Ind. He taught school a few years following graduation from Hanover College, then he enrolled in the EVANGELICAL THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, Naperville, Ill. After obtaining the B.D. degree from that school he took graduate work at GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE, Evanston, Ill. Leroy Geiger was licensed in 1922 by the Indiana Conference of The Evangelical Church; received DEACON'S orders in 1924 and was ordained ELDER in 1926 by the same conference.

In 1934, Geiger was married to Violet Rush in Evansville, Ind. He served the following pastorates in Indiana: Pershing, South Bend, Ewing Avenue; Evansville, First; Porter; Fort Wayne, Crescent; and Elkhart, First. In 1948, he was elected superintendent by the former Indiana Conference of The Evangelical Church and at the time of his death was superintendent of the West District of Indiana Conference North. He was trustee of the annual conference, Haven Hubbard Home, Indiana Central College, and Evangelical Theological Seminary and a member of the General Council of Administration at the time of his death.

Geiger was seriously injured in an automobile accident near Walkerton, Ind., and died June 18, 1957. He was buried at Leesburg, Ind.

HARRY O. HUFFMAN

GEIGERTOWN, PENNSYLVANIA, U.S.A. St. Paul's Church is the successor church to Old Forrest Church, one of the first buildings maintained by the Methodists of PENNSYLVANIA outside of PHILADELPHIA. Erected in 1773, at what later became Geigertown on Route 82 between Birdsboro and Elverson, it was a plain stone building one story high, named Old Forrest because of its location. Trees for the building were secured from the immediate forest and sandstone from the nearby hills. A stone wall built in 1818 by Paul Geiger and David Hoffman enclosed a small burial ground. The church was built for a William Demour on the land of Mounce Jones. Demour, who was an adherent to the New Light Doctrine, later became a Methodist and persuaded his followers to deed the building to JOHN WESLEY.

The church was on a high hill and helped the early settlers in the nearby town of Geigers Mills (changed to Geigertown in 1929) to keep a sharp lookout for unfriendly Indians. In the grave yard, some soldiers from the Revolutionary War as well as every American War since then have been buried.

FRANCIS ASBURY visited Old Forrest on July 25, 1799, and noted in his Journal, "Visited 'Old Forrest' to-day and found the people there much engaged in religion." The present structure was built in 1858 within fifty feet of the original building which was taken down, although the cornerstone was preserved and used in the new edifice. The building has been modernized and refurbished several times since 1858.

A Sunday school was organized as early as 1832, but extant records date back only as far as 1850.

FREDERICK E. MASER

GENERAL ASSISTANT, the name given by JOHN WESLEY to his chief assistant as superintendent of American Methodist preachers before the organization of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1784. (See ASSISTANT.)

GENERAL BOARD OF LAY ACTIVITIES. (See LAY MOVEMENT IN AMERICAN METHODISM.)

GENERAL CONFERENCE is the supreme governing body of The United Methodist Church, U.S.A., and an assembly whose quadrennial sessions dominate and direct in every way the life and activities of the Church. It meets in the month of April or May once each four years, but can fix for itself an adjourned session when it so decides.

It is composed of ministers and laymen in equal numbers, all of whom are elected by the respective Annual Conferences or provisional Annual Conferences of the Church on an equitable ratio of representation. This, before 1968, was based upon the total ministerial membership in each Annual Conference. Since 1968, the number of church members in each Annual Conference as well as the ministerial membership provide a formula for determining this. (Discipline, 1968, paragraph 14.) Each Annual Conference—no matter how small—is entitled to have at least one ministerial and one lay delegate in the General Conference.

The ministerial—"clerical"—delegates of each Annual Conference are elected by the clerical members of that Conference, and by them alone; and the lay delegates are elected by the lay members of each Annual Conference, and by them alone. An equal number of laymen are elected to match the number of ministers allowed under the formula of representation outlined above. At present, one ministerial delegate is allowed for every 140 ministerial members in full connection; and one ministerial delegate for the first 44,000 resident church members and one for every additional 44,000 church members or major fraction thereof in any Conference. "An equal number of laymen" are to be elected to match the clerical delegates.

The General Conference usually fixes its place of meeting through a committee. A bishop presides at each of its official sessions, the said presiding bishop being selected for each session by a committee which has full power to make such selection, without being directed by either the bishops or the General Conference. An exception is that the opening session of each General Conference is called to order and presided over by a bishop whom the bishops themselves select—usually the then president of the COUNCIL OF BISHOPS.

When the General Conference is in session, it requires the presence of a majority of the whole number of delegates to constitute a quorum; but a smaller number may take a recess or adjourn from day to day in order to secure a quorum, and/or at the final session may approve the Journal and order the record of the roll call and adjourn sine die. The General Conference of 1970 is the only one during recent times which has adjourned for lack of a quorum.

The ministerial and lay members deliberate in one body and vote as one body, but a separate vote (vote by orders) may be taken on any question when requested by one third of either order of delegates present and voting. When a "vote by orders" is called for, it requires the concurrence of a majority of both orders to adopt the proposed measure.

The General Conference is bound by the limitations of the Constitution of the Church, which specifies that it shall have control of "all connective matters" and outlines in fifteen specific items what these connective matters are. Item No. 15 declares that it "shall enact such other legislation as may be necessary, subject to the limitations and restrictions of the Constitution of the Church." This is a sweeping empowerment.

History. The General Conference of the M. E. Church, as it was in the beginning, came about during its formative years, as an outgrowth of the annual meetings of such ministers as could come together, and stemmed from the great growth of the newly organized Church after the CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE of 1784. The Christmas Conference itself is not usually referred to as a "general conference," though it was composed of all the traveling preachers who could then be called together, and assumed full authority for organizing and creating a new church—namely, the Methodist Episcopal Church in America. Subsequently there were other meetings called of all preachers who could attend, especially one in 1787, which JOHN WESLEY asked THOMAS COKE to call, and to "have the brethren elect RICHARD WHATCOAT a bishop." Wesley himself never intended to found an American General Conference, and when one was founded, he apparently was not aware of its completely independent spirit. The 1787 Conference refused to elect Whatcoat a bishop and rescinded the statement made in the minutes of the Christmas Conference that "during the life of the Rev. Mr. Wesley, we acknowledge ourselves his sons in the gospel, ready in matters belonging to church government to obey his commands." This action, commonly known as "leaving Wesley's name off the Minutes," was quite a blow to the aged Wesley. The sovereignty, however, had by this time come to reside in the ministerial members of the Methodist connection in the American States.

Bishop ASBURY was not greatly in favor of establishing a regular General Conference since it would call together all the preachers, entail much time and expense, take them from their work, and he was not sure what they might do. As a substitute, and in order to direct the church as he thought advantageously, Asbury arranged an ill-fated scheme known as THE COUNCIL, which lasted only a year or two. Others, Coke included, felt that a formal general conference should be established to meet at regular intervals. The first one of these was held in 1792—at least Asbury himself calls this "the first General Conference"; and such a Conference has been held in American Methodism every four years since that date.

The growth and development of the General Conference may be outlined through three successive periods. The first was from 1792 to 1808, at which time a delegated General Conference came into being. The second period was from 1808 to 1940, during which time there was a division of the Church in 1828-30 when the M. P. Church organized; and in 1844 when the M. E. Church, South, organized. But delegated General Conferences were held in these separate bodies, and these General Conferences had separate power except for the few powers forbidden to them. The third period began in 1939-40, when under the PLAN OF UNION and Constitution of The Methodist Church, General Conference powers became slightly circumscribed in comparison with the powers it had held up to that time.

The First Period: From 1792 to 1808, all preachers in full connection who could come to the seat of the General Conference, were allowed to vote, and did vote, with their majority actions completely final in every way regarding anything and everything having to do with the M. E. Church. They had full power to change any ARTICLE OF RELIGION, or alter any plan or pattern of their government, including episcopacy or itinerancy, had they so chosen. Indeed, numerous efforts were made in each early General Conference to alter the plan of supervision which Asbury was carrying out, but none of these succeeded. It became manifest, however, that with the Church growing more and more, it would be increasingly difficult if not impossible to gather together into one place all the ministers, and it was noted that those who lived near wherever the General Conference was held could come in large numbers and thus exercise the full sovereignty for the whole Church. The plan of a delegated General Conference therefore was advanced and, after much debate, adopted in 1808 in a momentous action which has had enormous influence on all subsequent events.

The Second Period: By this time Annual Conferences in clearly defined geographic regions had come to be definite entities in their own right. There was a NEW YORK CONFERENCE, a VIRGINIA CONFERENCE, a BALTIMORE CONFERENCE—seven or eight such Conferences by 1808. In that year it was decided that there should be a delegated General Conference whose members should be elected by the separate Annual Conferences on a numerically proportional basis; and that this General Conference should have full power to exercise the total sovereignty over the entire Church in every respect except in six specific instances forbidden to it by what came to be called the RESTRICTIVE RULES. These Restrictive Rules in 1808 were as follows:

1. The General Conference shall not revoke, alter, or change our Articles of Religion, nor establish any new standards or rules of doctrine contrary to our present existing and established standards of doctrine.

2. They shall not allow of more than one ministerial representative for every five members of the Annual Conference, nor allow of a less number than one for every seven.

3. They shall not change or alter any part or rule of our government, so as to do away episcopacy, or destroy the plan of our itinerant general superintendency.

4. They shall not revoke or change the General Rules of the United Societies.

5. They shall not do away the privileges of our ministers or preachers, of trial by a committee, and of an appeal; neither shall they do away the privileges of our members, of trial before the society, or by a committee, and of an appeal.

6. They shall not appropriate the produce of the Book Concern, nor of the Chartered Fund, to any purpose other than for the benefit of the traveling, supernumerary, superannuated, and worn-out preachers, their wives, widows, and children. Provided, nevertheless, that upon the joint recommendation of all the Annual Conferences, then a majority of two-thirds of the General Conference succeeding shall suffice to alter any of the above restrictions.

Such were the Restrictive Rules in 1808. One or two were altered in minor particulars through the years. The second Rule, that regarding the proportion of representation, became especially worrisome as the great growth of the Church forced a change from one representative for every five, to be one for fourteen; and then to a larger and larger number. As each enlargement for such representation entailed a constitutional vote, it was at length decided, when the PLAN OF UNION was adopted, to do away with Rule Two altogether and simply allow the General Conference itself to fix whatever proportion of representation should seem desirable. At the time of Church Union in 1940, it was made one clerical delegate for every seventy—and “an equal number of laymen.”

The Restrictive Rules, however, as they were constitutionally modified in minor particulars during the entire period from 1808 to 1940, represented the only brake upon the actions of the well-nigh all-powerful General Conference.

During this second period of General Conference life, there came to a test in 1844 of the power of the General Conference to depose a bishop, namely Bishop JAMES O. ANDREW, who was a slave owner. The southern delegates took the position that the third Restrictive Rule forbade a General Conference to depose a bishop, as episcopacy was a coordinate part of church government, and the “plan of itinerant general superintendency” was put by Rule Three beyond the reach of a General Conference. The northern delegates took the position that it did not alter the plan of itinerant general superintendency to take out one bishop or put another in, and that the General Conference had the power to depose a bishop if it so desired. The southern contention was that episcopacy was coordinate with the General Conference itself and “once a bishop always a bishop.”

The difficulty lay in the fact that the General Conference, while restrained by the third Restrictive Rule, was itself the judge as to when and how this rule—or any rule—might apply. The body itself was able to say what was constitutional and what was not, and that by a simple majority vote. In time the General Conference of the M. E. Church created a highly respected Committee on Judiciary of its own members, and this committee would then pass upon matters asserted to be constitutional or unconstitutional, and present its report to the General Conference for final determination. It is noteworthy that while the General Conference might have refused to adopt the report of its Committee on Judiciary, the ability and judicial preeminence of the men who usually composed this committee were such that the General Conference scarcely ever reversed any constitutional decision of this its own Committee.

In the M. E. Church, South, the dangerous power of the General Conference to act as the judge of the constitutionality of its own actions—as the M. E. majority had done in 1844—was curtailed and taken away by a constitutional move granting to the COLLEGE OF BISHOPS of the M. E. Church, South, the right to declare any act of the General Conference unconstitutional when they so deemed it to be. The bishops were thus a final court in determining constitutionality.

Neither one of the above plans was considered safe and satisfactory and when the two Episcopal Methodisms agreed to unite, a JUDICIAL COUNCIL was set up and adopted as part of the Plan of Union. Since 1940, therefore, the General Conference of The Methodist Church (now The United Methodist Church) must have its acts passed upon by a Judicial Council. This is a constitutional entity in its own right, and sits in judgment upon any act of the General Conference considered to contravene one of the Restrictive Rules.

The third or present period of General Conference existence began with the adoption of the Plan of Union at the UNITING CONFERENCE of 1939 when the two episcopal Methodisms and the M. P. Church united. The Plan of Union as a whole did take from the General Conference something of its former overwhelming power. This was done in part by the creation of the Judicial Council, which is able to check by declaring null and void any act of the General Conference which it decides to be unconstitutional. Also the power of the Judicial Council to utter declaratory decisions concerning situations which have not yet arisen likewise gives a certain legislative power to the Judicial Council, and in effect takes something of legislation out of the hands of the General Conference. Furthermore, the adoption of the Jurisdictional system in 1939 placed the election of bishops in the JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCES rather than in the General Conference; and allowed boards and executive agencies to elect their own particular officers, which also robs the General Conference of much of its former great electoral powers. It does, however, have the right and duty now to elect the members of the Judicial Council.

The General Conference in The United Methodist Church is declared to be in full command of all those things which are deemed "connectional," but the Jurisdictional Conferences, and the Annual Conferences, are assumed to have reserved rights which are not as far reaching as connectional matters are. Indeed, the Annual Conference in The Methodist Church was held to be "the basic body in the Church and had reserved to it all rights which had not been given to the General Conference"—a sweeping reservation of power. The Constitution of The United Methodist Church likewise calls Annual Conferences "the fundamental bodies of the Church" (Discipline 1968, paragraph 10). All of this indicates a transition from that earlier day when the General Conference was not told what it could do, but told only what it could not do. From 1808 to 1940 it had full power to do everything not forbidden to it; today it may do only those things which have been entrusted to it by constitutional warrant, though these indeed are far reaching and of great import. However, even with these curtailments of its former enormous power, the General Conference remains the sovereign body for the worldwide United Methodist Church.

Practical Operation. The General Conference requires great preparation for its quadrennial meetings, not only in the election of delegates by all the Conferences of the whole Church, but in finding a proper auditorium where its sessions may be held, and in providing all the necessary housing facilities for the coming together of a great body. In its actual sessions, it works through a system of committees, each of which is expected to look after all matters of legislation and enactments having to do with the special interests of the Church. For instance, there is a Committee on Missions, one on Education, one of Publishing Interests, and so forth. To these huge committees there come in from all over the Methodist world suggestions for legislation or for proposed action, and these suggestions (formerly called "memorials" but in the recent Discipline called "petitions") may be advanced in writing, properly worded, by any Methodist in good standing anywhere. Such petitions are given to the respective committees, and the committees, sometimes through subcommittees, work through the multitudinous suggestions and bring back to the General Conference itself their recommendations of concurrence or nonconcurrence, for or against, the memorials or petitions assigned them.

General Conference committees by present rules have no right to inaugurate any legislation on their own account, though they may, upon the basis of memorials which have to do with a common theme, correlate such proposals in due form for desired action.

The General Conference adopts a set of rules for its own procedure and these rules must be rigidly enforced by each presiding officer. As a large deliberative body it must follow approved parliamentary practice, and its adopted rules are largely in parallel with those of the Congress and other responsible legislative bodies. Annual Conferences quite often adopt for their own rules of procedure, "the rules of the last General Conference insofar as they apply."

In its sessions, the General Conference is free to adopt any legislative move, or to repeal or modify any disciplinary provision formerly adopted, with no regard whatever to the Discipline as it has been written up to that point—except of course that it may not contravene the constitutional provisions of the Discipline. It is bound only by (1) its own rules of order, which it may modify under procedures outlined by those very rules; and (2) by the constitution of The United Methodist Church. It may reverse its presiding officer upon a matter of parliamentary procedure if it feels that he has ruled incorrectly. The Conference itself will have its legislation declared invalid by the Judicial Council if it enacts a measure which the Judicial Council considers unconstitutional, the Judicial Council being present at all sessions of the General Conference.

It is a truism that "one General Conference cannot bind another," though it may request future General Conferences to carry through certain procedures which it feels to be wise. An exception to the rule that one Conference may not bind another, is where it is clear that a trust has been established in the nature of a contract which other interests take at face value, or a promise to a third party is made by an action of the Conference, which said party takes in good faith. In such instances a succeeding General Conference will feel bound by the trust or promise which has been created by a preceding session. Otherwise a General Conference may reverse completely the statutory enactments of its previous session.

Beside legislating and revising the Discipline, each General Conference adopts a general budget for the Church, and establishes ways and means of putting into effect the whole program of the Church for the ensuing four years. It creates boards and agencies for the carrying forward of the work of the Church, such as the BOARD OF MISSIONS, or the BOARD OF EDUCATION. The list of General Agencies is a large one, and all are responsible to the Conference itself, and through it, to the Church for the way in which its work is done.

Delegates whose certificates of election are carefully checked, come from the ends of the earth, representing Annual Conferences at home and abroad, and sit in this vast body at its quadrennial sessions. "What it [the General Conference] has lost in relation to its past supremacy in the three uniting churches, it has gained by becoming dominant over their combined might; and, although shorn of some of its former strength by the Plan of Union, the General Conference of The [United] Methodist Church is today, as it always has been, the most powerful organization in that church, and one of the most potent ecclesiastical organizations of the whole world."

Discipline, successive issues.

N. B. Harmon, Organization. 1962.

Journals of successive General Conferences.

H. N. M'Feyre, Manual of the Discipline. 1920.

T. B. Neely, Governing Conference. 1892.

J. J. Tigert, Constitutional History. 1894. N. B. H.

(Editor's Note: The following are brief extracts from the accounts of succeeding General Conferences. The accounts until 1872 are taken from David Sherman's History of the Discipline of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and represent an abridgment and revision of his abridgment. Accounts for those following 1872 are from the officially published Journals and in later years the respective Daily Advocates. Accounts for 1876-1936 were done by Gordon Pratt Baker. Those of the M. E. Church, South, 1846-1936, were prepared by Ronald L. Grimes, J. Marvin Rast, and the Editor. Those of the M. P. Church were done by the Editor. The accounts for the E.U.B. General Conferences and its antecedents were prepared by Bruce Souders.)

GENERAL CONFERENCES OF THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, 1792-1936

1792. The first regular General Conference met in BALTIMORE, MD., NOV. 1, 1792, BISHOPS COKE and ASBURY presiding. The leading topics were the establishment of the General Conference as a mode of unifying the Church, and the impending schism of JAMES O'KELLY.

The work was spreading, so that it was no longer possible for the preachers to meet together every year, and they naturally wished to devise some means to secure the future unity of the movement. To obviate the difficulty and avoid calling all the preachers together repeatedly, a COUNCIL, composed of the presiding elders and the bishops, was devised and introduced; but the concentration of such vast power in so few hands aroused suspicions, and elicited criticisms so severe that the plan fell dead at birth.

The only other eligible plan seemed to be to call the whole body of traveling preachers together at stated intervals to consider and settle the business of the Connection. This was the first question of the hour. To settle it a large part of the traveling preachers had convened, and they united in adopting a plan for a General Conference, to be held quadrennially, and to be composed of all the traveling preachers.

James O'Kelly desired the power to be retained in local bodies. In his view the bishops should possess less power, their appointments being subject to revision by the Conference. These correlated questions were hotly debated for a week, but the Conference decided that the only method of maintaining a consolidated Church with an itinerant ministry was the creation of a central body and the election of Superintendents with extensive powers, duly checked by the General Conference. O'Kelly left the Conference, and very soon seceded from the church.

The Rules of the Conference required a two-thirds vote to form new regulations for the Church, though a majority sufficed to change the old ones.

The Bishop was now to be elected by, and to be amenable to, the General Conference.

The elders now took the name of presiding elders, to be appointed by the bishops, with defined duties, and dependent on the people for support, the tenure of office being restricted to four years. This restriction was suggested by the troubles with O'Kelly, who had remained in the same section ever since the Church had been organized, and who was thus able to use his influence to distract the Church. This restriction, introduced at an earlier day, might have prevented the separation of this year.

The section on traveling elders was introduced, and their duties defined, while that on deacons received the epithet "traveling." The Lord's Supper, it was allowed in the Ritual, could be received "standing or sitting"; a section on Public Worship was introduced; and the people were urged not to employ "fugue tunes"; and the names of those received or excluded were to be read every quarter in class; the term "unawakened" was defined to be one not eligible to membership.

The Ritual was now incorporated in the Discipline with some slight changes, and the allowance for a preacher's salary was made sixty-four dollars. The number of members, 65,980; preachers, 266.

1796. The second General Conference assembled in Baltimore, Oct. 20, 1796 with 120 members. Bishops Coke and Asbury presided. Number of members, 56,664, a decrease of 9,316; preachers 313, an increase of 47. This decrease was the result of the O'Kelly troubles. The minutes of this Conference were printed separately, and sometimes bound with the Discipline of 1792.

The Discipline was slightly revised.

Instead of what were called District Conferences, organized four years before, and found to be too restricted for the free circulation of the preachers, several of these Districts were combined to form a yearly Conference, and the bounds were fixed. The Annual Conferences thus named were six: NEW ENGLAND, PHILADELPHIA, BALTIMORE, VIRGINIA, SOUTH CAROLINA, and the WESTERN. Those in full connection and those to be received were to attend Conference.

A traveling deacon was made eligible to the office of an elder after two years; the Preacher in Charge was required to execute "our rules against all frauds"; had to be recommended for their license by the "society" (local church) and Quarterly Conference. Marriage with those of other Churches was not forbidden. To relieve "the distressed Preachers" the Chartered Fund was devised; and a form of deed to secure our Church property. The Book Establishment was to be supervised by a committee of the Philadelphia Conference; books were to be sold by the preachers on commission; Agents to print by the advice of the bishop and Philadelphia Conference. The section on slavery was restored, and ample notes on all parts of the Discipline were appended by Coke and Asbury.

The Rule on Slavery had been suspended since 1785.

1800. Yellow fever in Baltimore occasioned the change of time of the Conference of 1800 to the spring, when the epidemic was less dangerous. Bishops Coke and Asbury presided.

Members of the Church, 64,894; preachers, 287; an increase of 3,543 members, and of 15 preachers.

As Bishop Coke spent most of his time in England, and the health of Asbury was greatly impaired, the episcopacy was strengthened by the election of RICHARD WHATCOAT. JESSE LEE thought they "had never had so good a Conference"; Whatcoat estimates 200 conversions during the session.

Leading topics: Slavery, ministerial support, and changes in the Discipline.

Revision of the Discipline. The Discipline was read by Coke section by section, and changes made in order. A preacher could now be a member of the General Conference only after having "traveled four years."

The Annual Conference was required to elect a secretary who should send his record to the General Conference; to take collections for contingent expenses, and to make up the allowance of the preachers; to pay its proportionable part of the salary of the Bishops.

The Preacher in Charge was to transmit to the Annual Conference a record of deaths, and to expel those convicted of non-payment of debt. The definition of "unawakened" was omitted; "accused" instead of "suspected" persons might be tried; and the duties of preachers to the Book Room were defined. The meager compensation of the preachers caused many to leave the traveling ministry.

Preachers who held slaves were required to emancipate, and the Conferences to petition the Legislatures for emancipation. There were now seven Conferences. NEW YORK was added.

The Conference refused to sanction a delegated General Conference; or a council to aid the bishop in making the appointments; or the ordination of local elders; or the election of presiding elders; or the exclusion of slaveholders.

1804. General Conference met in Baltimore, May 7-23, the three bishops being present. John Wilson was chosen secretary, and a list of the members, amounting to 112, is for the first time given. "Five are 'excepted,' as not entitled to vote, not having traveled four years."

The addresses of the British and Irish Conferences were read and replies prepared. At the request of the Wesleyans, Thomas Coke was allowed to return to Europe, subject to recall by three Conferences, and to return by the next General Conference.

Slavery and the Book Room were the chief topics of debate.

The Discipline was revised item by item as read by Coke. The form was considerably changed by distributing the matter into two parts.

In the twenty-third Article, at the instance of EZEKIEL COOPER, "the Constitution" is substituted for the "Articles of Confederation," and the States are declared to be "a sovereign and independent nation." JOHN WESLEY had sent over the twenty-four ARTICLES OF RELIGION in 1784, when the newly freed colonies were acting under Articles of Confederation. This was now 1804 and there was a United States which Cooper wanted written in place of Articles of Confederation. The probation of a preacher was to date from "the time he was received on trial in an Annual Conference." The boundaries were slightly modified.

The presiding elder was authorized to call a Quarterly Conference, composed of official members, "and none else"; forbidden to employ a preacher rejected by the Conference; and required to have a record of the Quarterly Conference kept.

The section on the Trial of a Bishop was so modified that complaints must be in writing. In making appointments he might allow a preacher to remain but two years, except "Presiding Elders, the General Book Stewards, the supernumerary, superannuated, and worn-out Preachers."

The Rules of a Preacher were so changed as to require him to conduct himself "prudently and cautiously with women"; marriage with the unawakened was to be "discouraged" instead of "put a stop to," and those who violate the rules are "to be put back on trial" in place of being "expelled." The section on Slavery was retouched. The slaveholder was still urged to emancipate, but a failure to do so would not exclude him.

The Book Business was removed to New York, and Ezekiel Cooper and Daniel Wilson elected Agents. The New York instead of the Philadelphia Conference was authorized to fill vacancies in the Trustee Board of the Chartered Fund. The preachers were forbidden to publish any book without submitting the manuscripts to their Conferences, and the paragraph requiring them to give an account of marriage fees was omitted.

The salary of the Book Steward was to be $600, and that of the preachers was not to be made up if they had other resources. The children whose mothers were deceased were to receive pay for board. The clause requiring the preachers to pay two dollars on admission to the Conference was omitted.

At this Conference strenuous efforts were made, but in vain, to locate the Book Room at Baltimore; to allow Local Preachers to be ordained Elders; to abolish the Presiding Eldership and, on the failure of this measure, to make it elective.

1808. The Conference met at Baltimore, May 6-26, with 129 members. Asbury presided. Bishop Whatcoat had died, and Coke was in Europe, where he desired to remain. The Conference complied with his request, allowing his name to stand on the Minutes, with a note stating that he resided in Europe. WILLIAM M'KENDREE was elected to the episcopal office.

The leading questions related to the Book Concern, the Constitution of the General Conference, and Slavery. On a memorial from the New York Conference, seconded by New England, the Western and South Carolina Conferences, the General Conference became a delegated body with limited powers, as provided in the new chapter on that subject.

The chapter on the Circulation of Books underwent some changes. Daniel Wilson was elected Agent, with a salary of $750, his name to be placed in the Minutes, and not in the Discipline as heretofore. In sending books to presiding elders the Agents were to pay freight. Book Agents could hold office but eight years. The new Hymn Book prepared by DANIEL HITT was adopted.

The subject of Slavery excited much interest. All relating to the buying and selling of slaves was omitted, and the Annual Conferences were allowed to make their own regulations on the subject. The section on Slavery was ordered to be stricken from the Disciplines printed for the South.

The term "allowance" was ordered to be substituted for salary in the Discipline; the Conferences were permitted to adopt methods to raise the allowances of the preachers, but in case they fail to do so the Church was not to be held responsible. The efforts to elect presiding elders; to farm the book business; and to omit all relating to slavery, failed.

Deacons were to be ordained on the recommendation of the Conference instead of the elders; the form of the question on admitting strangers to class, changed; lawsuits allowed when the case "requires or justifies it"; an appeal denied to those who absent themselves from the trial after due notice, and the consultation of the pastor with the stewards in cases of dispute between members was dispensed with.

1812. The first delegated General Conference met at New York, May 1-22, and was composed of ninety members. Asbury and M'Kendree presided, and Daniel Hitt was secretary. The Episcopal Address was read by M'Kendree and filed, and subsequently referred to a select committee.

There were nine Conferences; the bounds were considerably modified; three new ones added, namely, the OHIO, TENNESSEE, and GENESÉE, and one, the Western, omitted. The bishops were allowed to organize another in the Mississippi Valley, but not to take territory from other Conferences without their consent. The Conferences were authorized to raise a fund for the support of the superannuated and supernumerary preachers.

The Conference authorized the election of two Book Agents, Daniel Hitt and THOMAS WARE were chosen. The Doctrinal Tracts were ordered to be omitted from the Discipline and published in a separate volume. An address was issued to the Church. A clause excluding members for giving treats was ordered, but not inserted in the Discipline. The effort to call for the election of presiding elders again failed, as did the motion to establish a Book Room in the West.

The Changes in Discipline were few. Local deacons were allowed, after holding a license four years, to be ordained elders.

The stewards, who had hitherto been appointed by the preacher, were to be nominated by him and chosen by the Quarterly Conference.

1816. Assembled in Baltimore, May 1-24, with 106 members. Bishop M'Kendree presided, and Louis R. Fechtig was chosen Secretary. Asbury had died, and his remains were, by order of the Conference, transferred for reinterment to Baltimore, and a funeral service held by the Conference.

The chief questions that agitated the Conference related to Slavery, the Local Preachers, and the Episcopacy.

The Episcopacy was strengthened by the election of ENOCH GEORGE and ROBERT R. ROBERTS. The bishops were ordered "to point out a course of study" for the younger preachers preparatory to orders. Their salaries were to be estimated by the Book Agents and Book Committee at New York, and they were allowed in the interval of General Conference to form new Conferences.

The Stewards were made amenable to the Quarterly Conference.

Salary. The inadequacy of ministerial support had greatly interfered with the work by obliging some of the most efficient men to locate, while others were embarrassed with debt or want. To remedy the evil the Conference urged the Societies to secure parsonages; raised the allowance from $80 to $100, and ordered the appointment of Estimating Committees and meetings of District Stewards. The clause in the Discipline requiring that "surplus" be reported to Conference was omitted.

Local Preachers. The questions relating to local preachers were thoroughly canvassed, and the section on that subject revised. On removal to another charge a local preacher was to procure a certificate from the presiding elder or the preacher. He was forbidden to manufacture or retail spirituous liquors, and an allowance to the local preacher could be made only when appointed by the presiding elder.

The section on Preachers in Charge was so changed as to take from him the power to license and renew the license of a local preacher, and to give him the sole power to license exhorters.

The Book Interest was fully considered. The Agents and Editors were to be preachers, and, by virtue of their appointments, members of the New York Conference, to which they were amenable for official conduct. Expenses of delegates were $1,419.75; collections, $731.39; the deficiency ordered to be paid by the Book Room.

Slavery. The paragraph giving to Conferences the right to regulate the subject was omitted, and slaveholders were made ineligible to office where the laws of the State will allow "emancipation, and permit the liberated slave to enjoy freedom."

The Conferences were now eleven. The MISSOURI and MISSISSIPPI were new, the others slightly modified. The term "Connection" was in all places in the Discipline substituted by "Church," "community," or "itinerancy," as the case might require.

An effort was made to elect the presiding elders by giving the bishops the right to nominate; to give the veto power in a Quarterly Conference on license to the presiding elder; to obtain for local preachers representation in the General Conference; a right to stipulate for salary, and govern in the local church; and to relinquish our hold on Canada. These movements all failed.

The next General Conference was to be composed of one member of every "seven," instead of "five," members of the Annual Conferences.

1820. Met at Baltimore, May 1-27, Bishops M'Kendree, George, and Roberts presiding. ALEXANDER M'CAINE and Thomas Mason, Secretaries.

The Election of Presiding Elders and the Status of the Local Preachers were the leading questions.

The Bishops were mildly censured for allowing presiding elders to retain preachers more than two years in the same charge. They were associated with the Book Agents and Editors to issue the Discipline. JOSHUA SOULE was elected to the episcopal office, but refused to be ordained because they had voted to elect presiding elders. The Episcopal Address refers to the episcopacy, local preachers, training of children, slaves, missions, and spirituous liquors, with notices of churches and conference boundaries.

The local preachers, hitherto excluded, were now admitted as spectators of the General Conference, and provisions were made for a District Conference.

The Conferences now numbered twelve, KENTUCKY being new. Canada was retained, and a note appended to the Twenty-third Article of Religion defining views of civil authority. The Conference encouraged education, and recommended the establishment of an academy in each conference, the first utterance of the General Conference on the subject since the burning of COKEBURY. The Conferences were urged to petition the General Conference to give the veto power to the bishops in case of unconstitutional action.

Preachers in Charge were "to renew tickets to regulate the Bands"; the number of stewards to be seven instead of five.

JOHN EMORY was elected a delegate to the Wesleyan

Conference to renew the fraternal relations suspended since the departure of Thomas Coke. He was cordially received, and the sentiments of the American Conferences reciprocated.

The Missionary Society, just organized, was adopted, and the Constitution revised.

The Publishing House was still in debt, but authorized to build; a new Hymn Book was authorized, and the House to be incorporated. The book list was enlarged, as the Agents were now allowed to issue any new work by vote of the Book Committee. NATHAN BANGS and Thomas Mason were chosen Agents for New York, and MARTIN RUTER for Cincinnati.

The Conference ordered the election of presiding elders, and then at a later date suspended the rule in deference to Joshua Soule. The bishop was to nominate three times the number needed, and from these the Conference was to select, and those chosen were to have a voice in the Cabinet. The Conference refused to allow the location of a preacher without his consent.

1824. Met at Baltimore, May 1-28, Bishops M'Kendree, George, and Roberts presiding; John Emory, Secretary. Members, 125. Richard Reece and John Hannah came as fraternal delegates from England.

The Episcopal Address notices the dearth of revivals, the poor health of the bishops, the boundaries of conferences, the Book Room, and the District Conferences. The causes of missions and education were warmly commended.

The Committee on Itinerancy noticed the neglect of class, inadequate salaries, and want of uniformity in public worship.

Slavery. Those holding slaves were urged to teach them to read the Bible; to allow colored preachers the privileges of the Quarterly Conferences, and the Annual Conferences allowed to employ them to travel.

The Publishing House. The Agents were not allowed to issue books on their own account; were to reduce the debt, which was $48,000. Expenses of delegates, $4,816-50; deficiency $2,408, which was ordered to be paid by the Book Agents despite the vote of four years ago. Agents were Nathan Bangs and John Emory at New York; Martin Ruter in the West.

Changes of Discipline. The instruction of the young was commended, and the preachers required to instruct the children; Sunday schools to be formed, and the Catechism to be employed.

The conferences had increased to seventeen in place of twelve, HOLSTON, MAINE, MEMPHIS, ILLINOIS, and PITTSBURGH being new. The bounds of others modified.

The Conference refused to sit with open doors; to grant lay delegation, though it issued an address to the people containing arguments against it; to relinquish Canada; and to endorse colonization.

Joshua Soule and ELIJAH HEDDING were elected to the episcopal office, and the suspension of the vote in regard to electing presiding elders was continued.

1828. Met at Pittsburgh, May 1-24, Bishops M'Kendree, George, Roberts, Soule, and Hedding presiding. Members, 160. Martin Ruter, Secretary. Members of the Church, 381,997; ministers, 1,576.

The leading topic was Lay Delegation.

The Episcopal Address alludes to extensive revivals, missions and Sunday schools, the right to appeal, and the failure to send a delegate to England four years before.

Appeals. Joshua Randall, of New England, expelled for false doctrine, conference decision was affirmed; William Houston, of Baltimore, reversed; D. B. Dorsey, of Baltimore, expelled for agitating on the lay question, decision affirmed; Joseph Crawford, of New York, expelled, affirmed; and that of William Cunningham was not admitted.

The Canada Conference was relinquished by mutual consent of the parties.

The Publishing Interests. Canada was to have books at fifty percent discount until 1852. Agents were John Emory, BEVERLY WAUGH; Agent at Cincinnati, Charles Holliday; Editor of the Advocate, Nathan Bangs. Expenses of delegates, $7,671.36; deficiency, $3,741.50, ordered to be paid by the Book Agents.

The vote of 1820 in favor of electing presiding elders was rescinded; the character of Bishop Hedding, aspersed in The Mutual Rights, was vindicated; the cause of temperance was sanctioned, and our people urged to aid it in the use of all proper measures; and the Colonization Society endorsed. Methodist Bible and Tract Societies were formed.

WILLIAM CAPERS was sent as a Fraternal Delegate to England.

Changes in the Discipline. The boundaries of the conferences were slightly changed. The Bishop might appoint for more than two years the Editor of the Christian Advocate and the preacher at NEW ORLEANS; a majority in a District Conference was made a quorum, and a recommendation from the Society required before the District Conference can give a license; to "receive a present" was changed to "make a charge"; "may remain on trial" changed to "may be borne with"; trustees were required to report to Quarterly Conference; the orphans of preachers were allowed the same as the children of living preachers; the stewards were required to provide houses for the preachers; Conference Missionary Societies recommended, and the duty of the bishop in regard to missions defined; the old system of selling books on commission was abolished, and all clauses relating to it omitted and others inserted in the section on books.

The Conference refused to elect presiding elders; to investigate the treatment of slaves; to condemn Masonry; to censure the views of Bishop Soule contained in his sermon before the South Carolina Conference, and to allow lay delegation. The last topic was debated at length, and the main arguments in favor answered in an able report by John Emory. The reports of the General Conferences, 1820-40, are not published in the Journals. They will be found in Bangs's History and the Christian Advocate.

1832. Met in Philadelphia, May 1-28, Bishops M'Kendree, Soule, and Hedding presiding. Bishop George had died. Members, 197. Members of the Church, 513,114; ministers, 2,010; an increase of members in the four years, 131,117; of ministers, 434.

The Episcopal Address notices extended revivals; the allaying of "the reform" agitation; the general satisfaction of our people with the government of the Church; the benevolent causes; conferences formed by the bishops; our literary institutions, and disciplinary changes needed. The Episcopal Board was reinforced by the election of John Emory and J. O. ANDREW.

The cause of missions was receiving a new impetus from the opening fields in Africa and Spanish America, and among the Indians and people of color, and the bishops were asked as soon as able to send laborers.

Six new Conferences were organized, namely: TROY, NEW HAMPSHIRE, ONEIDA, ALABAMA, GEORGIA, and INDIANA, and the bounds of others modified.

The Canada brethren asked for a division of the Book Concern. The resolutions of 1828 were reaffirmed.

The cause of temperance was also commended.

The Publishing Interests. The expenses of delegates were $12,713.56; the deficiency of $5,222.17 was ordered to be paid by the Book Agents. Thomas Mason and Beverly Waugh, Agents at New York, and Charles Holliday at Cincinnati; TIMOTHY MERRITT, Editor of the Advocate, and Nathan Bangs, of the Quarterly Review. Depository established at New Orleans.

Changes in the Discipline. The bishops were allowed to appoint agents for our literary institutions and colonization when asked by an annual conference, and the bishops' salaries were to be estimated by a committee appointed by the conference within whose bounds they may reside. They could appoint for more than two years the Editor of the Advocate, "preachers to people of color and of foreign station," and to a seminary of learning "not under our care." Annual conferences were authorized to devise measures to raise money for superannuated preachers. The Book Committee was newly organized; Agents were not allowed to publish books for themselves; the Agents were to secure the premises in Mulberry-street, and to open a Depository at New Orleans.

The Conference refused to change the proviso of the Restrictive Rule; to sanction the leaving a preacher without an appointment; and to examine the question of secret societies.

1836. Met at Cincinnati, May 1-27, Bishops Roberts, Soule, Hedding, and Andrew presiding. M'Kendree and Emory had deceased; WAUGH, MORRIS and FISK elected, though Fisk did not accept. Members of Conference, 147. Members of the church, 652,528; preachers, 2,758; gain of members during the quadrennium, 139,414; of preachers, 748.

William Lord was a representative from the Wesleyans, and WILLIAM CASE from Canada. Wilbur Fisk was appointed to visit England.

Publishing Interests. Expenses of delegates $10,359; deficiency of $1,282 ordered to be paid by the Book Agents. Agents at New York, Lane & Mason; at Cincinnati, Wright & Swormstedt. C. Elliott, Editor Western Advocate; S. Luckey, Editor Advocate; and N. Bangs, Missionary Secretary.

The mission spirit was rekindled. The Constitution of the Society was recast; a conference established in Africa; provision made to enter China; and some changes in the Discipline on the subject were effected.

Conferences were to divide their property when divided. Number of conferences, twenty-nine; the new ones were BLACK RIVER, ERIE, LIBERIA, MICHIGAN, NEW JERSEY, NORTH CAROLINA, and ARKANSAS; and some modifications were made in the bounds of others.

The Canada brethren still claimed a part of the proceeds of the book sales. The last General Conference, holding a constitutional change necessary to allow it, referred the question to the annual conferences, which voted adversely, 758 to 599. The Conference now agreed to give them a discount of fifty percent on the General Catalogue, and eighteen percent on the Sabbath-school list, to continue till 1852. Thus ended a long struggle.

The leading topic was slavery. Many petitions were received. Those from Westmoreland complained of the Baltimore Conference for excluding the petitioners from office and ordination on the ground of their being slaveholders. The General Conference decided that such complaints were not well founded, as the granting or withholding of these favors was optional, and the motives of members of conferences could not be alleged as ground of action against them.

During the sitting of the Conference two New England members lectured on slavery, which elicited a vote of censure against them, and of the condemnation of abolitionism. The Conference "disclaims any right, wish, or intention to interfere in the civil and political relations between master and slave." The leading participants in this debate were ORANGE SCOTT and WILLIAM WINANS.

Changes in the Discipline. The ratio of representation was changed to twenty-one, and to allow this the Second Restrictive Rule was changed. The bishop was allowed to continue more than two years in the same charge, the Editors and Agents at Cincinnati, the Missionary Secretary and Sunday-school Agents.

The annual conference was to supervise domestic missions; missionaries were to take collections in mission, and candidates for admission to state whether willing to become missionaries.

The section on local preachers was modified by omitting all relating to District Conferences, and in the trial of local preachers a distinction was made in the offense as a crime or improper conduct.

The regulation in regard to allowance of those married under four years was omitted, and the clauses on "allowance" condensed. The stewards were required to apportion the moneys to be raised, and the annual conference to appoint an Estimating Committee for the bishops.

The Book Committee was rearranged; provision was made for erecting a building in Cincinnati; the Depository at New Orleans was discontinued, and arrangements made for the Editors and Publishing Committees of the several papers. No more depositories were to be opened, and the salaries of Editors and Agents were to be estimated by the Book Committee.

After some debate the Conference refused to elect a bishop for Africa; to change the section on slavery; or to give any countenance to the agitation on the slavery question.

1840. Met in Baltimore, May 1-June 3, Bishops Soule, Roberts, Hedding, Waugh, and Morris presiding. John A. Collins was chosen Secretary. Members, 128; members of the Church, 795,445; preachers, 3,687; increase, 32,917 members and 927 preachers.

The topics of chief interest were slavery and those questions relating to Church authority growing out of it.

Fraternal Delegates. From the Wesleyans in England, ROBERT NEWTON; from the Wesleyans in Canada, JOSEPH STINSON, JOHN and Egerton RYERSON, John Howard, and MATTHEW RICHEY. Bishop Soule was sent to England and Bishop Hedding to Canada as delegates.

The Episcopal Address was lengthy, and treated of current topics. After alluding to the rise and progress of Methodism, it refers to the divine call to the ministry; the duty of the General Conference to devise measures of progress; deprecates the agitation on the subject of slavery; defines the constitutional powers of the General Conference; commends our educational interests, but not the establishment of theological schools; invites attention to need of a course of study; to the cause of mission, and to some needed changes in the Discipline.

There were thirty-three conferences, with four new ones—PROVIDENCE, MEMPHIS, TEXAS, and NORTH OHIO; while the boundaries of some others were modified.

Appeals. D. Dorchester, of New England, censured by his Conference for refusing to put motions not constitutional or germane, and for adjourning a Quarterly Conference without vote of the members, reversed; J. V. Potts, of Philadelphia, location, reversed, then reconsidered and remanded; Job Wilson, of Pittsburgh, reversed; James Smith, of Philadelphia, remanded; James Scott, of New Hampshire, location, reversed; Silas Comfort, of Missouri, condemned for admitting colored testimony against a white member, was sustained, but on reconsideration the case was not entertained. In this connection a resolution was offered by IGNATIUS A. FEW "that it is inexpedient and unjustifiable" to permit a colored person "to give testimony against white persons in any State where they are denied that privilege in trials at law," and adopted. As this caused great uneasiness, a series of resolutions were passed, stating that by this resolution it was not designed to declare that it is inexpedient for colored persons to give testimony in States where the courts allow it, or that it is expedient in the slave States, or to express any distrust of our colored members. These last were offered by Bishop Soule. The complaint of local preachers from Westmoreland that the Baltimore Conference refused ordination on the sole ground of slaveholding was not entertained, and yet the Committee, unlike the one four years before, thought the alleged obstacle ought to be no bar to ordination. The Colonization Society was also highly commended.

Book Concern. Agents at New York, T. Mason, G. Lane; at Cincinnati, J. F. Wright, L. Swormstedt. Editors—Quarterly Review, G. Peck; Christian Advocate, Thomas E. Bond; Western Advocate, C. Elliott; Christian Apologist, W. Nast; Ladies' Repository, L. L. Hamline; Southern Christian Advocate, W. M. Wightman; Richmond Advocate, L. M. Lee; and Southwestern, C. A. Davis. Missionary Secretary, Nathan Bangs. Depositories were opened at Charleston, Pittsburgh, and Boston. Moneys obtained from the Book Room can only be appropriated to the support of the preachers.

An annual conference cannot withhold connectional moneys from a superannuated preacher, or refuse a location to a member in good standing, and in examination of character the elders should retire.

Expenses of delegates, $9,170.20; deficiency, $1,061.72, and Book Concern ordered to pay it.

Changes in Discipline. The chief changes were as follows: The insertion of a section on receiving ministers from other denominations; the bishop was allowed to appoint for more than two years to literary institutions, "military posts," etc.; to unite two or more circuits or stations for Quarterly Conference purposes; to decide all questions of law in an annual conference; and to adjourn a conference when the legitimate business is transacted, as also to refuse to put a motion which he may regard as unconstitutional or not germane to the business. The same privilege was also allowed a presiding elder in a quarterly conference. A preacher can be received into full connection only after he has been on trial two years "in the regular itinerant work."

Some other topics were discussed, but did not prevail, such as the extension of the pastoral term to three years; the right of a conference to locate a preacher without his consent; the limit of the bishop's power of transfer; the giving an accused member a voice in the selection of a committee; the allowance of the president of a conference to refer a case to a higher body for adjudication; lay delegation; moderate episcopacy and the election of presiding elders; a bishop for Africa, and the restoration of Wesley's rule on temperance to the General Rules.

1844. Met in New York, May 1-June 10, Bishops Soule, Hedding, Andrew, Waugh, and Morris being present. Bishop Roberts had died. Members of the Church, 1,171,356; preachers, 4,621; increase of members, 475,911; of preachers, 934.

The leading topic was slaveholding in the ministry.

Fraternal relations were maintained with the Wesleyans of England and Canada and the Evangelical Associations.

The Episcopal Address notices the death of Bishop Roberts; the itinerant system as related to bishops, presiding elders, pastors, circuits, the local tendencies, and the term of ministerial service; education in schools and by the press; and Romanism.

Appeals. The subject of slavery came before the Conference in the appeal of Francis A. Harding, of the Baltimore Conference, expelled for holding slaves through his wife, the decision of the annual conference being affirmed, 117 to 56; Bradford Frazee, of Michigan, for location, reversed; Luman H. Allen, of North Ohio, suspended, affirmed; William Houston, of Baltimore, for location, reversed; J. S. Lent, of Genesee, for location, affirmed.

The question of slavery overshadowed every other. Petitions flooded the Conference in favor of rescinding the resolutions of 1840 on the testimony of colored persons, of excluding slavery from the episcopacy, and from the Church itself. The obnoxious resolutions were rescinded. In the meantime it was found that Bishop Andrew held two slaves by inheritance, and had obtained others through marriage. A resolution was offered by A. Griffith that he be requested to resign, but a substitute finally passed requesting him "to desist from the exercise of his office so long as this impediment remains." A postponement was proposed to the next General Conference by the bishops, which failed, when William Capers proposed to organize two General Conferences, for the North and South, which also failed.

The Southern delegates entered their protest, and a new statement of the case was prepared by a committee appointed for the purpose; but all efforts at pacification were in vain; the storm so long lowering in the distance had burst in violence on the Church, and all the issues were to be met. A committee of nine was appointed, which drew the scheme or PLAN OF SEPARATION that resulted in the division of the Church.

The mission cause received a due share of attention. The bishops were allowed to form German Districts; WILLIAM NAST was sent to GERMANY; the constitution of the Society modified, and a plan devised for raising money by encouraging the organization of auxiliary societies.

The observance of the Sabbath was urged, and the preachers required to preach on it.

The Publishing Interests were reviewed. The periodicals were continued, and the Northern Advocate was adopted. The Book Agents were allowed to select their conferences for membership; were required to build in Cincinnati; to reduce the prices of books as far as possible; to abbreviate obituary notices.

The Sunday-School Department was to be managed by an Editor; the constitution was changed, and schools asked to contribute.

The conferences now numbered forty. VERMONT, NORTH INDIANA, INDIAN MISSION, WEST TEXAS, and FLORIDA were new; a few of the old ones modified.

Changes in the Discipline. The bishop was not allowed to continue a preacher in the same charge more than two years in six, nor in the same city more than four years in succession, nor return him until he had been absent six years; nor to reappoint a presiding elder to a district until he had been absent six years. The presiding elder was required to report to the conference the names of preachers who refused to obey the rules. The course of study was extended to four years, and to be prescribed by the bishops only; the preacher was to secure contributions in the schools; and the estimate of the salary of a bishop was to be submitted to the Conference. The section on mission was recast, and that on books modified in regard to Editors and Agents. A change in the Sixth Restrictive Rule was recommended to the conferences.

Elections. Bishops: E. S. JAMES and L. L. HAMLIN. Book Agents at New York: G. Lane and C. B. Tippet; at Cincinnati, Swormstedt and Mitchell. Editors: Quarterly Review, George Peck; Advocate, Thomas E. Bond; Missionary Secretary, Charles Pitman; Ladies' Repository, Edward Thomson; Western Advocate, C. Elliott; Apologist, W. Nast; Richmond Advocate, L. M. Lee; Southern Advocate, W. M. Wightman; South-western, J. B. McFerrer; Northern, N. Rounds; Sunday-School Advocate and Books, D. P. Kidder.

Editors of the Discipline, G. Peck, N. Bangs, T. E. Bond.

1848. Met at Pittsburgh, May 1 to June 1, composed of 152 members, Bishops Hedding, Waugh, Morris, James, and Hamlin presiding. Members of the Church, 639,066; preachers, 3,841; decrease of members, 532,290; of preachers, 780 (due to withdrawal of the Southern Conferences).

The leading topics relate to the issues with the Church South, and the enlargement of the work.

The Episcopal address notices the improvement of the Church; admonishes the people to maintain her purity by discipline; observance of the Sabbath, education of our children, temperance; and touches on the troubles growing out of the separation.

The administration of the bishops was approved in the case of J. N. Maffitt, as also that of the preacher at Centenary Church, Brooklyn, B. Griffen, who maintained his right to the pulpit against the trustees.

Fraternal relations were maintained with the Wesleysans of England and Canada.

The $500 due the Missionary Society from the Wyandottes was relinquished; the separation of the domestic and foreign work disapproved, but an annual conference allowed to maintain a domestic society by a two-thirds vote.

The resolution of 1840 on the Westmoreland case, maintaining that slaveholding is no bar to orders or office in the Church, was rescinded.

Publishing Interests. The Editors were forbidden to take extra pay for literary productions, as they were expected to devote their whole time to their work. Their traveling expenses were to include only those of moving to their places and those incident to visiting the conference. The Book Committee was formerly composed of Editors and six ministers chosen by several annual conferences; it was now to consist of seven traveling ministers chosen by the General Conference; that at the West also of seven chosen in the same way. The depositories in the South were closed up, and the interchange of books and plates between New York and Cincinnati was regulated.

A committee of seven was raised to revise the Hymn Book and publish with approval of the bishops. The Agents were authorized to issue German books; the German work was commended to the Sunday-School Union, and the Canada brethren were to have books for the next four years at cost.

Relations with the Church, South were inharmonious. It demanded the division of the property of the Church, and sent a visitor and commissioners, neither of whom was received. The Plan of Separation of 1844 was declared to be "null," as the Conference nonconcurred, and as the South had not awaited the "contingency" contemplated in the Plan, and had moreover committed sundry "infractions of the Plan." But as the Conference was desirous of amicably adjusting the matter, the Book Agents were authorized to refer the whole question to arbitration; and in case, on taking legal counsel, they found they had not authority to do so, the bishops were requested to submit to the conference a change of the Sixth Restrictive Rule allowing it.

Resolutions. The Conference declared, in reference to "the Plan of Separation," that the General Conference has no authority to divide the Church; that each member may remain in the Church until convicted of guilt; that he can then be excluded only by regular trial; and hence that those members in the South still remain in the Church. The Conference also resolved that a presiding elder has no right to employ a local preacher without the recommendation of a quarterly conference; that a certificate is valid until the member has a reasonable opportunity to present it; that the member holding it is amenable to the Church receiving his letter.

The Conference also held that an annual conference can investigate the case of a member only by the Rules for Trial; can refer a case to a presiding elder; that a superannuated minister, living out of the bounds of his conference, is not a member of the quarterly conference where he resides, has no rights in the society, but may attend class; that a preacher whose case is remanded stands as an accused member; that the documents employed by the General Conference may be used in the new trial; and that a Conference may take testimony by a commission.

Elections. Book Agents at New York, Lane and Scott; at Cincinnati, Swormstedt and Power. Editors: Advocate, A. Stevens, who resigned, and G. Peck was chosen; Western, M. Simpson; Apologist, W. Nast; Pittsburgh (Advocate understood), W. Hunter; Northern, W. Hosmer; Sunday-School Advocate and Sunday School Books, D. P. Kidder; Quarterly Review, John M'Clintock; Missionary Secretary, C. Pitman.

To write a History of the Quadrennium, C. Elliott.

Changes in the Discipline. The bishops were allowed to appoint for more than two years the Missionary Secretary, Editors and Agents at Auburn and Pittsburgh, missionaries to the Welsh, Swedes, and Norwegians, and naval stations. They were permitted to appoint an Agent for the German Publishing Fund, to form the districts, and to prepare a Course of Study.

Presiding elders were to direct candidates to the Course of Study, and explain to them that no wrong is done them if not admitted.

The trial of bishops was made a separate section; that of traveling ministers distinguishes between trial at Conference and in the interval, adding a provision for the latter, and also for failure in business; and that on location for "unacceptability" changed so as to allow the one located to defend himself before the conference.

Local and located preachers were made amenable to the Quarterly Conference; were not excused from meeting in class by "distance"; and the requirement on spirituous liquors omitted. A provision was made to try a local preacher who fails in business.

The clause in the section of the Lord's Supper excluding a non-member with "a token" was omitted. The General Rules were changed by restoring Wesley's original rule on the sale and use of spirituous liquors.

The Conferences now number thirty-one, a loss of nine in the South. The new ones are NEW YORK EAST, EAST MAINE, WEST VIRGINIA, CALIFORNIA, and OREGON. The bounds of others were little changed. The section on Books was modified in what relates to the South and Book Committee. The bishops were allowed to employ colored preachers.

The Conference after debate refused to fraternize with the South; to pronounce a member withdrawn simply by his saying he is; to separate the domestic and foreign mission work; to organize a delegated annual conference as a court of appeals, as advised by the bishop; to organize colored conferences; to extend the probation of preachers to four years; to change the form of the Advocate to quarto; and to adopt Zion's Herald.

1852. Met at Boston May 1-June 1, composed of 178 delegates. Bishops Waugh, Morris, and Janes were present. Bishop Hedding had died, and Hamline, in consequence of ill health, resigned. The Board was reinforced by the election of LEVI SCOTT, MATTHEW SIMPSON, EDWARD R. AMES, and OSMON C. BAKER.

The Episcopal Address notes the death of Bishop Hedding, the general prosperity of the Church, the condition and prospects of Methodism, the itinerancy, revisions, education in schools and by the press, and the reduced episcopal force.

The Publishing Interests. The claims of the Book Room on various parties were referred to the Agents. The agents might import German books, and sell ours to our agents in Germany at the lowest rate, extending a credit of $500. Depositories and papers established in Chicago, San Francisco, and St. Louis. The management of the suit against the Book Room begun by the Church, South, was committed to a commission with full powers. The Agents were to send the Advocate gratis to preachers' widows; to issue the Sunday-School Advocate weekly on good paper; to start the National Magazine, and issue the revised Catechisms. Expenses of delegates, $7,533.65; deficiency, $2,258.15, to be paid by the Agents.

The mission cause was thoroughly reviewed. The bishops were to call together the colored preachers for consultation; to visit Liberia; to establish a mission in Italy; and to ordain a missionary bishop when the Restrictive Rule should be changed.

The Conference ordered the publication of the Journals of the General Conferences from the beginning; that L. M. Lee be allowed to copy those of 1844. The enterprise of erecting a Metropolitan Church in Washington was sanctioned; a day of prayer recommended for the raising up of more ministers. The censure of a member by an annual conference for uniting with a secret society was determined not to be allowable, without the society is known to be opposed to the Discipline.

Revisals. The arrangement was further changed. The Second Restrictive Rule changed and referred to the conferences for concurrence. The bishop was made president of the annual conference; probationers in conference named as members.

The superintendent of the Sunday school and the mission committee were allowed seats in the quarterly conference. The preacher in charge was to examine leaders; to catechise the children; form Bible classes, and give Sabbath employment to local preachers; the local preacher was made amenable to the quarterly conference for "his Christian character and ministerial office"; the paragraph in relation to pews was omitted, and free churches were to be only "wherever practicable"; and each annual conference was allowed to determine which of the superannuates should be claimants on the funds. The section on missions was entirely recast by JOHN PRICE DURBIN.

The conferences are thirty-nine, eight being new, namely, WYOMING, CINCINNATI, S. E. INDIANA, N. W. INDIANA, SOUTHERN ILLINOIS, CALIFORNIA, ARKANSAS, and N. INDIANA.

The revival of the mission spirit and the extension of the work at home and abroad were leading themes.

Elections. Book Agents at New York, Carlton and Phillips; at Cincinnati, Swormstedt and Poe. Editors: Quarterly Review, John McClinton; Christian Advocate, Thomas E. Bond; Sunday-School Advocate, D. P. Kidder; Quarterly Review, A. Stevens; Ladies' Repository, W. C. Larrabee; Western Advocate, C. Elliott; Apologist, W. Nast; Northern, W. Hosmer, North-western, J. O. Watson; Pittsburgh, H. J. Clark; California Advocate, S. D. Simonds; Missionary Secretary, J. P. Durbin.

The Conference considered but refused to sanction the following: To extend the term of ministerial probation to four years; to separate the missionary work into home and foreign departments; to organize a new court of appeals for local preachers; to sanction the leaving a preacher without an appointment for trial by the presiding elder, as had been done with Orrin Pier; to collect and arrange the episcopal decisions; and to sanction lay delegation, the argument against being embodied in a report by Bishop Simpson, which was adopted almost unanimously.

1856. Met at Indianapolis, May 1-June 4, composed of 217 members. Bishops as before.

There was an interchange of fraternal greetings with the Wesleyan bodies of England, Ireland, Canada, and France, and the Congregational Union of England and Wales. JOHN HANNAH and F. J. JOHNSON came as delegates from England, and Matthew Simpson and JOHN M'CLINTOCK were sent in return.

Slavery and various reforms in our economy, as lay delegation, the election and stationing of the presiding elder, and the term of ministerial service, were the leading questions of the Conference.

The Episcopal Address notices the general prosperity of the Church; some needed changes in the Discipline; education; our publishing, Sunday school, and missionary interests, and the vexing question of slavery on the border. The tail of the serpent was still vital, and it was desired to extinguish it by excluding all slaveholders from the Church by changing the General Rule.

Education was considered, and the various institutions commended to the favor of the people, especially an institution for people of color, and the theological seminaries. Aid was asked for Ireland. The Conference asked for statistics of the institutions, and deprecated any further multiplication of them at present.

The cause of missions was reviewed. Liberia was allowed to choose a bishop by vote of two-thirds, with jurisdiction confined to Africa, and to have the usual discount on our books. A conference was ordered for Germany, and the Board allowed to extend our publishing interests there, as also to corresponding Wesleyan bodies.

The Book Agents were allowed to give local preachers the benefit of the clerical discount; recommended to publish a cheap commentary and antislavery tracts; to print blanks for preachers; to purchase land and build in Chicago; to commence a paper in Oregon, and to make a larger outlay on the Christian Advocate. Expenses, $10,693.02; deficiency, $3,426.10, paid by the Book Agents.

The Metropolitan Church in Washington was commended to the liberal consideration of the people, and the bishops were invited to supply the pulpit from the different sections of the Church.

Revisals. A new section was introduced on "Baptized Children"; the ratio of representation in the General Conference was changed from "twenty-one" to "twenty-seven," and the Second Restrictive Rule from "thirty" to "forty-five." The change was referred to the conferences. Provision was made for calling an extra General Conference. The male superintendent, approved, was made a member of quarterly conference; the preacher was no longer required to have men and women sit apart, but to report to the quarterly meeting the names of those received and excluded; and to embrace in his report to the quarterly conference the Sunday schools.

The section on the instruction of children was recast; also that on singing; ministers might be tried by committee; the General Conference might try appeals in the same way; and a superannuated preacher residing out of the bounds of his conference "shall have a seat in the quarterly conference, and all the privileges of membership in the Church where he may reside."

The conferences were now forty-seven; DELAWARE, DETROIT, PEORIA, WEST WISCONSIN, UPPER IOWA, KANSAS AND NEBRASKA, NEWARK, and GERMAN MISSION being new. Some changes in the boundaries of others. The German work was divided into nine districts attached to various English conferences.

Elections. Book Agents at New York, Carlton and Porter; Cincinnati, Swormstedt and Poe. Editors: Quarterly (Review), D. D. Weldon; Advocate, A. Stevens; Sunday-School Advocate, D. Wise; Magazine and Tracts, J. Floy; Western, C. Kingsley; Apologist, W. Nast; Ladies' Repository, D. W. Clark; Northern, F. G. Hibbard; Pittsburgh, I. N. Baird; North-western, J. V. Watson.

Delegates to England, Bishop Simpson and J. M'Clinck; to Canada, Raymond, Hamilton, and Berry.

The Conference considered but refused to sanction the extension of the pastoral term; the division of the mission work into home and foreign; the modification of the presiding eldership, either by electing or stationing the incumbents; a court of appeals, but ordered in its stead a committee; the exclusion of slavery from the Church, and the insertion of the laws of evidence in the Discipline.

1860. Assembled in Buffalo, May 1-June 4, composed of 221 delegates. The bishops remain the same as four years ago, save Waugh, who had died.

Slavery and lay delegation were leading topics.

The Episcopal Address notices the death of Bishop Waugh and members of the former Conference; a missionary bishop; education, tracts, our publishing interests, and missions; the pastoral work; changes in the Discipline, and their administration.

The mission cause was prosperous. The work in Germany was enlarging, and the Board was authorized to establish a theological institute there; the field to be visited by the bishops. The doings of the Missionary Board were approved; a mission conference authorized in India, and the presiding elders were requested to furnish the Missionary Committee with a written statement of the home work in their districts.

The Publishing Interests were in good condition. The Agents were ordered to issue a Teachers' Journal and graduated textbooks for Sunday schools; to discontinue the magazine, and to purchase property in New York, Boston, and Pittsburgh. They were allowed also to open a depository in California; to issue the Central Advocate, and to settle with all who are indebted to the House, whose cases have come to the General Conference.

Expenses of the Delegates, $10,352.53; deficiency, $3,717.19, to be paid by the Agents.

The Conference favored total abstinence and prohibition of the sale of liquor; ordered the reports, majority and minority, to be published with the Journals of the Conference, and determined to celebrate the Centenary of American Methodism, and appointed a Committee of Correspondence on that subject.

Resolutions. The President of a quarterly or annual conference may refuse to put a motion when deemed unconstitutional, irrelevant, or one that contravenes his decisions of law questions. A case remanded by a quarterly conference leaves the member "accused"; one restored by the conference, for mal-action of the pastor, is restored to membership, not to good character; and notice given by a traveling preacher in the interval of conference that he withdraws bars his appeal.

When a member has forfeited his right to appeal the quarterly conference cannot restore it; a member not formally received into the Church cannot plead that non-reception as a bar to trial in case of alleged crime; the president of a trial cannot give a charge; transfers date from the time they are given unless the bishop specify otherwise, and they should not be made for special cases, nor as the result of negotiations. Each administrator of discipline is responsible for his acts, and cannot plead episcopal decisions; the complaints against bishops in the General Conference should not be made without due notice.

Revisals. The Discipline was modified greatly in its arrangement. The ratio of representation in the General Conference was changed from twenty-seven to thirty. The annual conference was required to report to the Sunday School Union; the supernumerary relation was struck out; an order of business inserted in the section on quarterly conferences; and the bishop was allowed to appoint for more than two years to the "Five Points" and "Paris," as also required to prescribe a Course of Study for candidates for admission to conference, and allowed to unite two or more charges "for Quarterly Conference purposes."

The elder or deacon was to "solemnize" instead of "perform" matrimony; a preacher was to be received only on giving satisfaction in regard to his studies. The preacher, when not traveling, was to read and study

"whenever practicable"; an accused presiding elder was to be arraigned by "three senior Preachers"; the appeal of a local preacher to be tried by Committee; the Committee allowed to expel a member when "tried and found guilty"; and the member to have the right of challenge for cause.

The paragraph refusing orders to local preachers who were slaveholders was omitted, and Mission Conferences were not allowed to vote on constitutional questions. The original Rule was placed in the chapter on Slavery.

Conferences, fifty-one; four, namely, NEBRASKA, NORTH-WEST WISCONSIN, CENTRAL OHIO, EAST MAINE, were new. Peoria changed to Central Illinois. There were now eleven German Districts.

Elections. Book Agents at New York, Carlton and Porter; Cincinnati, Poe and Hitchcock. Editors: Quarterly Review, D. D. Whedon; Advocate, E. Thomson; Sunday-School Advocate, D. Wise; Ladies' Repository, D. W. Clark; Western Advocate, C. Kingsley; North-western, T. M. Eddy; Central, C. Elliott; Pittsburgh, S. H. Nesbit; Northern, I. S. Bingham; California, E. Thomas; Pacific, T. H. Pearne; Missionary Secretaries, Durbin, Harris.

The Conference considered but did not approve of a modification of the presiding eldership, colored conferences, and lay delegation. The latter was long debated, and then referred to the Conferences and the people.

1864. Assembled at Philadelphia, May 1-27, composed of 216 members. Bishops Morris, Janes, Scott, Simpson, Baker, and Ames were present. Bishop Burns had died.

The Episcopal Address notices the death of Bishop Burns, the rebellion and war, the decrease of 50,000 in membership, but the increase in nearly all benevolent collections, education, and the press.

Three additional bishops—CLARK, THOMSON, and KINGSLEY—were elected.

Slavery in the Border States, the change of the General Rule, so as to exclude slaveholding, and lay representation, were the leading topics.

Fraternal relations were maintained with the Wesleys in England, Ireland, and Canada. Deputations were also received from the M. E. Church of Canada and the Evangelical Association.

A plan for Centenary Celebrations was arranged, and a Church Extension Society organized and a constitution adopted.

The Conference approved of the measures of the Government in prosecuting the war against the rebellion; sent a letter and deputation to Mr. Lincoln; commended the National FREEDMEN'S AID SOCIETY, and recommended a recognition of the Divine Being in the Constitution of the United States.

The Book Agents were commended for making our Publishing Interest a "great financial success"; asked to open depositories in Philadelphia, Detroit, and St. Paul; to aid the Pacific Advocate; to procure buildings, at discretion, in Pittsburgh and New York; and to issue a Manual of Methodism and the German Hymn Book. Expense of delegates $14,373.08; deficiency, to be paid by Book Room, $6,228.91.

Resolutions. In the interim of Conference the bishops have the legal right to arrange the districts and change the presiding elders; a superannuated member residing out of his Conference cannot receive a certificate of withdrawal from the presiding elder; a committee of trial at conference may not sit after the conference closes. The case of Bishop Morris in "striking off" Union Chapel in Cincinnati, and that of Baker in ruling in regard to Joseph Caunts were approved. The administration of the bishops was censured for allowing preachers to continue more than two years over the same churches by taking different names. The bishops were requested to distribute their residences; the elders in examination of character not to retire; and a chairman in the committee at conference was not to dismiss a complainant.

The constitution of the Missionary Society was changed, the territory of the Church divided into mission districts, and the Liberia Conference was authorized to elect a missionary bishop in place of Burns.

Changes in the Discipline. A better arrangement of Discipline was prepared by Bishop Baker. The General Rule was so changed as to exclude "slaveholding," and referred to the annual conferences for ratification. The supernumerary relation was restored and defined; in the absence of a bishop any "member," instead of "a Presiding Elder," was allowed to preside in annual conference; the quarterly conferences were modified by admitting trustees; by making it the duty of the recording steward to make the record of the doings.

The bishop was authorized to "consecrate" bishops; to continue preachers "three" years, and longer as Editors of Zion's Herald, chaplains of "Hospitals," as missionaries "to neglected portions of our cities." The presiding elder was forbidden to appoint a preacher where "he could not legally be appointed by the Bishop," and was ordered to report to the Conference our literary institutions in his district. A preacher appointed in "the army, navy, or to prisons," as well as to a mission, was allowed to be ordained before his probation ends; and arrangement was made to receive preachers from the Methodist Episcopal Church in Canada, and from the Church, South. The morning preaching "at five" was struck out; the section on instruction of children was recast, and baptized children were to be gathered in classes and be received into Church by consent of parents.

A local preacher in charge holds his relation in his charge; a located preacher is amenable in his last charge; and not allowed to preach without a license. The section on public worship was modified by changing the lessons, inserting evening, enjoining the use of the benediction, and omitting the afternoon service, and the question and answer on "a great indecency . . . talking."

Trustees were to be chosen annually by the quarterly conference, and a majority of them to be members of the Church; stewards were no longer required to "register marriages and baptisms," or to "be subject to the Bishop," etc., but to quarterly conference; and their number could be "nine" instead of "seven."

The salaries of bishops, editors, and agents were to be estimated by the Book Committee.

Conferences. Fifty-nine instead of fifty-one in 1860. Of the eight new ones, two, COLORADO and NEVADA, were white English-speaking; two, Delaware and Washington, colored; three, Central, North-west, and South-west German; and one, India, a mission conference. The boundary lines of a few others were changed; the small ones allowed to send but one delegate to the General Conference, and to locate a superannuated preacher who does not send a certificate to his conference.

Elections. Book Agents at New York, Carlton and Porter; Cincinnati, Hitchcock and Walden. Editors: Advocate, D. Curry; Quarterly, D. D. Whedon; Sunday-School Advocate, D. Wise; Ladies' Repository, I. W. Wiley;

Western, J. M. Reid; Northern, D. D. Lore; Central, B. F. Crary; North-western, T. M. Eddy; Pittsburgh, S. H. Nesbit; California, E. Thomas; Pacific, H. C. Benson.

The Conference considered but refused to pass the following: To elect Missionary Bishops, to district the episcopacy, and to make the presiding elders the legal advisers of the bishops in making the appointments.

1868. Assembled in Chicago, May 1-June 2, composed of 231 members.

The leading topic was lay delegation.

The bishops notice the death of Bishop Hamline; the usual prosperity of the Church, showing an increase of 222,687 members, with a corresponding advance in all the benevolent enterprises of the Church: the press, education, missions, and conference boundaries.

The usual fraternal greetings were interchanged with the various branches of the Methodist family. Bishop Janes had visited England, Ireland, and our missions in Europe; Bishop Thomson those of Asia. The bishops were desired to visit our mission fields in the ensuing quadrennium; a missionary jubilee was authorized, and a change in the corporate act of the Missionary Society.

Education flourished, especially theological. D. Drew had transferred DREW SEMINARY to the Church.

Lay Delegation was approved, and referred for ratification to the conferences and members, male and female.

The Book Agents were authorized to open depositories at such places as they should deem advisable; the New York House had been incorporated, and a similar act was asked for the Western House; and a magazine for children was recommended. Expenses of delegates, $14,461.93; deficiency, $4,341.35, ordered to be paid by the Book Agents.

Revisals. The sections on exhorters and church extension were introduced; the Second Restrictive Rule was referred to the conferences for a change to admit laymen to General Conference.

The bishops were allowed to appoint for more than three years temperance agents and chaplains to reformatory, sanitary, and charitable institutions; the section on the reception of ministers from the Wesleyans was extended to all evangelical sects; the preacher in charge was to preside in the quarterly conference in the absence of the appointee of the presiding elder.

The duties of district stewards were defined; and when two circuits unite, both boards hold until a new election. There was to be a single Book Committee appointed by the General Conference, and the salaries of the bishops and the editors and book agents were to be estimated by it. The preacher was "required" to attend to the collections for missions. The Ritual was retouched in a few places. In the definition of a supernumerary "some other disability" was omitted, and he, when residing out of the conference, amenable, as in case of superannuates.

There were seventy-two Conferences, a gain of thirteen, as follows: CENTRAL NEW YORK, CENTRAL PENNSYLVANIA, EAST GERMAN, GEORGIA, HOLSTON, LOUISIANA, MISSISSIPPI, NORTH CAROLINA, ST. LOUIS, TENNESSEE, TEXAS, VIRGINIA and WILMINGTON. The lines of a few were modified. The great change was the admission of the mission conferences to full rights. (The new Conferences in the South—Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, etc.—were largely of Negro members, newly freed, as there were of course annual conferences in these states adhering to the M. E. Church, South.)

The Conference refused to elect missionary bishops, to increase the number of bishops; to authorize biennial sessions of the General Conference, and to change the year of holding the General Conference.

1872. Assembled in Brooklyn, May 1-June 4, composed of 292 clerical and 129 lay delegates. Bishops Morris, Janes, Scott, Simpson, and Ames were present. Baker, Clark, Thomson, and Kingsley had died. Eight new ones—BOWMAN, HARRIS, FOSTER, WILEY, MERRILL, ANDREWS, HAVEN, and PECK—were elected.

The leading topic was the Book Room troubles.

The Plan of Lay Delegation was ratified by a nearly unanimous vote, and laymen, for the first time, were admitted as members of the General Conference.

The usual fraternal greetings were interchanged with the various Methodist brotherhoods, the Presbyterian, Congregational, and Baptist bodies.

The Book Room was the apple of discord. Near the beginning of the quadrennium the junior agent professed to have discovered great frauds; the senior agent denied the allegation. The Book Committee, after protracted investigations by experts, were not able to agree whether or not any fraud existed. The Church and the Conference were divided on the question; but after mature deliberation and examination of documents, the Special Committee on the Book Concern prepared a conciliatory report, which harmonized the discordant elements. The purchase of the building on Broadway was approved.

Expenses of delegates $26,667.88; and a surplus from the collections of $1,080.05 ordered to be placed in the Permanent Fund. The General Mission Committee was reorganized, the WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY approved, and the Church divided into "twelve" Mission or General Conference Districts.

Changes in the Discipline. The arrangement was modified by placing the Ritual at the close; the form of question and answer was dispensed with, and consecutive numbers adopted. New sections were introduced on Freedmen's Aid, the Permanent Fund, and District Conferences; the General Conference was to be composed of clerical and lay delegates, and only one clerical delegate to "forty-five" instead of "thirty" members of the annual conferences.

The conferences now numbered seventy-six, a gain of five. Black River, Genesee, and East Genesee were merged in the new Conferences, Northern and Western New York; other new ones were ARKANSAS, CHICAGO GERMAN, FLORIDA, LEXINGTON, NORTH-WEST IOWA, ROCKY MOUNTAIN.

The bishops were to be classed as "effective and non-effective"; their support was referred to the people; they were to decide all questions of law "involved in the proceedings"; and allowed to continue for more than three years a preacher as editor at Atlanta. Complaints against their administration were not to be allowed "without due notice"; the presiding officer in a trial was not to deliver a charge; and the clauses allowing a bishop to refuse to put a motion and to adjourn a conference were omitted.

The presiding elders were ordered to renew licenses authorized by quarterly conferences; to furnish information to the Mission Committee of the mission work in their districts; to try preachers who refuse to attend to their work; to try cases referred to them by the annual conference; to apply to the superannuated and local preachers in charge the limitation of term of service to three years; but their own time "in heathen lands" may extend beyond four years.

Quarterly conferences were to have a new order of business; to renew licenses annually; and to approve superintendents and trustees "not elected by the Quarterly Conference."

Local preachers could be ordained only after holding a license four "consecutive" years; these years could count for orders in conference.

The preacher in charge was made amenable to conference for maladministration; ordered to give letters or try the parties who demand them; allowed to give a recommendation to a member wishing to unite with another denomination; required to try a case remanded by the quarterly conference; and to refrain from re-baptism. A preacher on trial was made amenable to the quarterly conference; but now was held to be under the jurisdiction of the conference "as to his authority to preach," and his continuance on trial was to be a virtual removal of license. The people were invited to participate in public worship. Judicial Conferences were instituted for the trial of appeals of traveling ministers.

The Conference located the residences of the bishops; ordered them to appoint a committee of legal gentlemen to prepare "a Code of Ecclesiastical Procedure"; and accepted the trust of the "Minard Home."

The Conference refused to revise the Hymn Book; to sanction a system of insurance by the Church; to elect colored bishops; to change the tenure of the episcopal office; and to separate the home and foreign mission work.

1876. The General Conference met in Baltimore, Md., at the Academy of Music, May 1-31, with 222 clerical and 133 lay delegates in attendance. Bishops present were Edmund S. Janes, Levi Scott, Matthew Simpson, Edward R. Ames, Thomas Bowman, William L. Harris, Randolph S. Foster, Stephen M. Merrill, Edward C. Andrews, Gilbert Haven, and Jesse T. Peck.

Bishop Andrews read a Centennial Address prepared by the bishops "at the request of the last General Conference." The Conference then took notice of the "ensuing Centennial" and authorized a committee of nine on Centennial observances.

Issuing a strong pronouncement against the use of tobacco, the Conference likewise declared that the Church was "unalterably opposed to the importation, manufacture, and sale of distilled, fermented and vinous liquors." It drew up a form of organization for Sunday schools and considered—but rejected—a strong measure to change the presiding eldership by making this an elective office. It sent down two major proposals for constitutional vote by the Annual Conferences. One was a measure to change the ratio of delegation to the General Conference. The other was a proposition to suspend the third Restrictive Rule so as to allow the number of districts to be determined by the Annual Conferences. (The Conferences did not adopt.)

Adopting special regulations clarifying the status of the layman, the Conference requested the bishops to appoint a commission of five ministers and five laymen to study the matter of lay delegation to Annual Conferences and, if this appeared expedient, to bring a plan for it to the next General Conference. It also decided that, where an Annual Conference of mixed racial bodies was constituted of a majority of white members, a majority of the colored members should be able to make a division if they so desired and become a separate conference.

The Conference voted to change the Ladies' Repository to a periodical of higher literary merit. Editors elected were Daniel D. Whedon, for the Quarterly Review; Charles H. Fowler, for the Christian Advocate at New York; Alfred Wheeler, for the Pittsburgh Christian Advocate; and O. H. Warren, for the Northern Christian Advocate. William Nast was made editor of the Christian Apologist; and John H. Vincent was elected to the editorship of Sunday school books, papers, and tracts.

The Conference also authorized the continuation of the Swedish language paper, Messenger, and adopted the South-western Christian Advocate as an official weekly paper.

There were no bishops elected.

1880. General Conference was held in Pike's Opera House, Cincinnati, Ohio, May 1 to 28, with 248 clerical and 151 lay delegates present. Bishops attending were Levi Scott, Matthew Simpson, Thomas Bowman, William L. Harris, Randolph S. Foster, Isaac W. Wiley, Stephen M. Merrill, Edward C. Andrews, and Jesse T. Peck.

The Episcopal Address, reflecting the financial depression in the early part of the quadrennium, indicated that the work of the Church as a whole was in good shape despite the diminution of benevolent contributions and the indebtedness into which many churches had fallen. It praised the progress made in Christian education and pointed to 352,908 conversions in the four-year period as evidence of it. Approving the adoption of the International Lesson Series, it nevertheless lamented the neglect of catechetical instruction. The Address also went on to express concern over members of Annual Conferences engaging in secular pursuits or serving in political offices.

The Conference adopted an extensive Ecclesiastical Code relating to church trials; decided that where the pronouns "he," "his," and "him" are used in the Discipline concerning class leaders, stewards, and Sunday school superintendents, this should not be so construed as to exclude women from these offices; called upon the federal government to sustain the rights of Chinese immigrants as guaranteed by treaty; commended President and Mrs. Rutherford B. Hayes on their exemplary life in the White House; and, recommending the planned ecumenical conference of Methodist Churches, referred to the bishops the planning of the program for the centennial of American Methodism.

While the Conference voted to forbid the licensing of women, it nevertheless called upon them to speak out emphatically on the enforcement of anti-liquor laws. In other actions, it provided for a "Monthly Manual" to be sent to all preachers to keep them informed on church thought and life and asked for a denomination-wide collection to pay off the debt of Metropolitan Church, Washington, D. C., over which the Conference had had "advisory care" since 1852.

Editors elected were Daniel D. Whedon, for the Quarterly Review; James M. Buckley, for the Christian Advocate at New York; Alfred Wheeler, for the Pittsburgh Christian Advocate; O. H. Warren, for the Northern Christian Advocate; William Nast, for the Christian Apologist; Henry Liebhart, for Haus und Herd; and John H. Vincent, for Sunday school publications. John M. Phillips and Sandford Hunt were elected Book Agents at New York.

Since Bishops Edmund S. Janes, Edward R. Ames, and Gilbert Haven had died during the quadrennium, and since Bishop Scott was in poor health, the Conference elected four bishops: HENRY WHITE WARREN, CYRUS DAVID FOSS, JOHN FLETCHER HURST, and ERASTUS OTIS HAVEN.

1884. The General Conference met in the Young Men's Christian Association Hall, Philadelphia, May 1 to 28, with 261 clerical delegates, 156 lay delegates, and ten bishops present.

The Episcopal Address took note of the fact that the Conference was meeting in the centennial year of American Methodism. Acting upon this notation later in the session, the Conference requested each Annual Conference to organize a historical society because the centennial year provided an added incentive to collect and preserve significant relics and records.

In the field of social concerns, the Address reported the establishment of homes for the aged in New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore and the founding of the Methodist Hospital in Brooklyn. It also reaffirmed the Church's "undying devotion" to the principles of constitutional prohibition and spoke out sharply against "the terrible crime of polygamy in our Territories." This latter issue elicited from the Conference a demand that the federal government "depose from political and official power in the Territories of the United States, those who either practice or advocate polygamy."

As in previous sessions, the Conference again vigorously opposed all traffic and support of the liquor industry. However, besides declaring the enforcement of prohibition the duty of civil government, it also called for quarterly Sunday school lessons on temperance, the organization of Annual Conference Temperance Societies, the formation of Juvenile Temperance Societies in all Sunday schools, the establishment of a Temperance Department in the Christian Advocate and all weekly and semi-monthly papers published by authority of the General Conference, and quarterly meetings of the Quarterly Conference Committee on Temperance.

Deploring the ease and frequency of divorce, the Conference issued a lengthy statement on the sanctity of marriage, declared adultery the only legal basis for divorce, and prohibited ministers from marrying divorced persons.

In other actions, the Conference outlawed discrimination of worship or religious instruction on the grounds of race, color, or "previous condition of servitude"; again refused to license women to preach or exhort and denied them the right of ordination; adopted a resolution to constitute a Central Conference in India and to authorize one for Japan; and directed that a rubric be inserted at the beginning of the ritual for the consecration of bishops to clarify the fact that the episcopacy is a specialized and sacred superintendency and not a higher order of ministry. It likewise called for the organization of a library association, giving directions for its establishment, and upheld the legality of Annual Conferences locating ministers without their consent. The Conference also gave official recognition to the Church's theological schools which, up to this time, had not been acknowledged in the Discipline.

Editors elected were Daniel Curry, for the Methodist Review; James M. Buckley, for the Christian Advocate; William Nast, for the Christian Apologist; C. W. Smith, for the Pittsburgh Christian Advocate; O. H. Warren, for the Northern Christian Advocate; Henry Liebhart, for Haus und Herd; and John H. Vincent, for Sunday school publications. Chosen as Publishing Agents were John M. Phillips, Sandford Hunt, Earl Cranston, and W. P. Stowe.

Four bishops were elected: WILLIAM X. NINDE, JOHN M. WALDEN, WILLARD F. MALLALIEU, and CHARLES H. FOWLER. WILLIAM TAYLOR was elected missionary bishop for Africa.

1888. The General Conference met in New York City on May 1-31. There were 288 ministerial and 175 lay delegates. All the bishops were present and subscribed the Episcopal Address which was read by Bishop STEPHEN M. MERRILL. It opened by noting with regret the death of Bishops MATTHEW SIMPSON, I. W. WILEY, and W. L. HARRIS, and paid an unusual tribute to two General Church editors, DANIEL CURRY and Marshall W. Taylor. It noted appreciatively the CENTENNIAL OF AMERICAN METHODISM celebrated in Baltimore in 1884, and viewed with satisfaction the prosperity attending the book rooms, CHARTERED FUND, Sunday-School Society, Board of Education, and institutions of learning. These last were listed as twelve theological seminaries, 54 colleges, and 120 academies.

General Conference actions were: a move to organize mission conferences but without giving them representation in the General Conference; and the need to elect missionary bishops. The eligibility of women as lay delegates in Annual and General Conferences, and the mode of supervising the growing mission fields were the leading topics before the Conference. The "time limit" was lengthened somewhat, so that preachers might be allowed to remain five and presiding elders six years in the same charge. A section on Deaconesses was adopted and placed in the Discipline.

Elected as bishops were JOHN H. VINCENT, JAMES N. FITZGERALD, ISAAC W. JOYCE, JOHN P. NEWMAN, and DANIEL A. GODSELL. Missionary bishops elected were: WILLIAM TAYLOR and J. M. THOBURN. Editors elected: For the Methodist Review, J. W. Mendenhall; The Christian Advocate (New York), J. M. BUCKLEY; Northern Advocate, O. H. Warren; the Western, J. H. Bayliss; Pittsburgh, C. W. Smith; Northwestern, Arthur Edwards; Central, B. S. Fry; California, B. F. Crary; Southwestern, A. E. P. Albert; Methodist Advocate, T. C. Carter; Haus und Herd, Henry J. Liebhard; and the Christian Apologist, W. NAST.

The Methodist Advocate gave concern as it was showing a heavy loss and its friends were endeavoring to have it published in Chattanooga rather than Atlanta. A subsidy of $2500 a quarter was asked from the BOOK CONCERN to carry on the work, but with the understanding that neither the Book Concern nor the General Conference would be responsible for the Journal's upkeep.

Considerable debate occurred over women's rights, especially the eligibility of women to take part in the General Conference. As part of the opposition to having the word "catholic" in the Apostles' Creed, a resolution was proposed and referred to committee which asked that the Creed should be made to read, "I believe in the Holy Catholic Church which is the Communion of Saints." This failed of final adoption. The colorful SAM STEEL, representing the M. E. Church, South, made a fraternal stirring address, calling for brotherhood. Sherman's History of the Discipline sums up the Conference of 1888 as "Careful and conservative . . . and at the same time, wisely progressive."

1892. The General Conference was held in Boyd's New Opera House, Omaha, Neb., May 2 to 26. There were 315 clerical delegates, 189 lay delegates, and 16 bishops present.

The Episcopal Address described outstanding growth on the part of the Church's publishing interests, rejoiced in the obvious harmony prevailing throughout the connection, expressed gratitude for the increased humanitarian activities of Methodism, and announced a membership increase of 442,000 for the quadrennium.

In addition, the Address revealed the fact that initial steps had been taken to establish AMERICAN UNIVERSITY as the denomination's school in the nation's capital. The bishops reported that a charter had already been obtained for this new college, that—subject to General Conference approval—a Board of Trustees had been constituted to direct it, and that an excellent site had been purchased at the cost of $100,000 for its construction. They assured the Conference that the university thus brought into being would always be subject to Church control since the present and all other General Conferences would hold the power of confirmation with regard to the trustees.

The Conference approved the establishment of American University but called for an endowment of not less than $5,000,000 over real estate before "any department of the university shall be opened." Among those named as ex officio trustees of the new school were the president and vice-president of the United States.

On the prohibition issue, the Conference maintained its characteristically firm stand, repeating its recommendation that Methodist voters make their anti-liquor sentiments known at the polls. It refused to make any compromise on the practice of polygamy in the foreign field and instructed Methodist missionaries not to receive into membership any persons holding polygamous relations. In like manner, it refused to legislate concerning the election of a colored bishop, citing the fact that "all ministers and members of the Methodist Episcopal Church, of every kindred, tribe, and tongue, are equally entitled to all its rights and privileges."

The Conference gave special endorsement to the AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY and approved the work of the American Sabbath Union in quickening the public conscience with regard to the keeping of the Lord's Day. It postponed indefinitely the report of the Constitutional Commission raised by the General Conference of 1888, but ordered the report published and presented to the General Conference of 1896. It rejected the districting of bishops in favor of keeping an itinerant General Superintendency, declined to elect an Assistant Missionary Bishop for Africa on the ground that the Discipline made no provision for such an office, and declared that bishops could transfer ministers to "any Methodist Church not under our care but having the same doctrines and usages and cooperating with us in our benevolent work."

The Conference sent down to the 1894 Annual Conferences a measure supporting equal clerical and lay representation.

Editors elected were J. F. Berry, for the Epworth Herald; James W. Mendenhall, for the Methodist Review; James M. Buckley, for the Christian Advocate; A. J. Nast, for the Christian Apologist; Henry J. Liebhart, for Haus und Herd; and J. L. Hurlbut, for Sunday school publications.

There were no bishops elected.

1896. General Conference convened in the Armory Building, Cleveland, Ohio, on May 1 and adjourned on May 28. Attending were 238 clerical delegates, 200 lay delegates, and 16 bishops.

Optimism marked the Episcopal Address. The bishops reported that, in a time of depression when secular interests had suffered set-backs, the Church had advanced financially for the quadrennium. At the same time its spiritual progress was evident in the 533,486 Sunday school conversions that had occurred in the past four years. Praising evidences of increased evangelization in the nation's cities, the bishops nevertheless pleaded strongly for downtown churches to remain with the changing populations increasingly characterizing the urban situation.

Upon announcement that the Annual Conferences had failed to ratify the proposed equal representation amendment submitted to them by the General Conference of 1892, the present Conference sent down a similar proposal to the Annual Conferences of 1896 and 1897. It also asked the bishops to set up a new Constitutional Commission. This commission, to be comprised of six laymen, six ministers, and three bishops, was to review the work of the Constitutional Commission of 1888, the recommendations of the Constitutional Commission of 1896, the recommendations of the General Conference Committees on Lay Representation, and all related memorials. Having done this, the Commission was to draft the existing organic law of the Church, suggesting modifications, and make its report as early as January 1899. It was to present the final form of its recommendations by the time of the General Conference of 1900.

Like the bishops, the Conference vigorously denounced the alcoholic beverage industry. Urging pastors and people to cooperate with the Anti-Saloon League, it recommended mass meetings in the interest of temperance, favored scientific temperance instruction, and proposed that the fourth Sunday in November be designated as Temperance Sunday.

The Conference gave hearty support to the American Bible Society; called for the election of bishops without discrimination of color; and authorized the Book Committee to determine whether the 1900 General Conference should be held in Kansas City, Chicago, Saratoga Springs, or Ocean Grove.

Book Agents elected at this Conference were Homer Eaton, G. P. Mains, Lewis Curtis, and H. C. Jennings. J. F. Berry, James M. Buckley, and A. J. Nast were returned to the respective posts to which they had been elected in 1892. New editors chosen were W. V. Kelley for the Methodist Review and F. L. Nagler for Haus und Herd.

The Conference retained JAMES M. THOBURN as missionary bishop of India, but it retired William Taylor as missionary bishop of Africa. In Bishop Taylor's place, it elected J. C. HARTZELL to serve as missionary bishop to African Methodism.

The Conference elected two bishops: CHARLES C. McCABE and EARL CRANSTON.

1900. General Conference met in the Auditorium Building, Chicago, Ill., May 2 to 29. Present were 358 clerical delegates, 356 lay delegates, 16 bishops, and two missionary bishops.

The Episcopal Address summarized the basic doctrines of the M. E. Church in the form of a creed, adding, however, that "Methodism has never insisted on uniformity of thought or statement."

The Conference again refused to license women as preachers or to admit the president of "the Ladies' Aid and similar societies" to membership in the Quarterly Conference. It ordered that the new constitution be submitted to the Annual Conferences in 1901 and instructed that, if it were affirmed by a three-fourths vote of the Conferences, it should be declared adopted and enforced.

Much attention was devoted to temperance and prohibition, with the Conference again calling for political action in this area. In its proceedings, the Conference recommended that each Annual Conference set up a standing committee on the American Bible Society and that a language course be provided for Finnish, Swedish, Norwegian, Danish, Italian, and Spanish Methodists. It likewise set forth an "Order of Worship" to which the bishops called attention in their own foreword.

The UNIVERSITY SENATE was first listed in the Discipline of 1900. Bishop E. G. Andrews was appointed editor of this Discipline.

Book Agents selected by the Conference were Homer Eaton, George P. Mains, Henry C. Jennings, and Samuel H. Pye. Editors elected were W. V. Kelley, for the Methodist Review; James M. Buckley, for the Christian Advocate; A. J. Nast, for the Christian Apologist; Frederick Munz, for Haus und Herd; J. F. Berry, for the Epworth Herald; and Thomas B. Neely, for Sunday school publications.

The Conference elected two new bishops: DAVID H. MOORE and JOHN W. HAMILTON.

1904. The General Conference held its sessions in Hazard's Pavilion, Los Angeles, Calif., from May 4 to 29, with 375 clerical delegates, 374 lay delegates, fourteen bishops, and two missionary bishops in attendance.

Adopting another strong resolution on temperance, the Conference recommended that no ministers or laymen become or "remain members of social clubs which keep a bar or provide intoxicating liquors . . . and that they do not patronize entertainments where liquors are served."

A major decision of the Conference was the acceptance of the action of the Joint Commission on Federation providing for a common hymnal, a common catechism, and a common order of worship for the M. E. Church and the M. E. Church, South. It then extended an invitation to the A. M. E. Church, the A. M. E. Zion Church, and other Negro bodies—such as the C. M. E. Church—to cooperate in this venture.

The Episcopal Address had called for a better interchange between the M. E. Church and the M. E. Church, South. Accordingly, the Conference directed that fifty representatives of the M. E. Church should be appointed to meet in New York in 1905 to deal with the general matter of a federation of Christian Churches. (This became the FEDERAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.)

The Conference also amended the third Restrictive Rule so as to allow Central Conferences to elect a bishop or bishops "for work among particular races and languages, or for any of our foreign missions, limiting their episcopal jurisdiction" to the specific region or group which elected them.

The new constitution, submitted to the Annual Conferences by the General Conference of 1900, was declared adopted and duly published.

Selected as Book Agents were Homer Eaton, George P. Mains, Henry C. Jennings, and Edwin R. Graham. Returned to their respective editorial posts were W. V. Kelley, James M. Buckley, A. J. Nast, and Frederick Munz. S. J. Herben was made editor of the Epworth Herald, and John T. McFarland was elected editor for Sunday school publications. The Book Committee chose Richard J. Cooke as Book Editor.

Bishops elected were JOSEPH F. BERRY, HENRY SPELLMEYER, WILLIAM F. McDOWELL, JAMES W. BASHFORD, WILLIAM BURT, LUTHER B. WILSON, and THOMAS B. NEELY.

Elected as missionary bishops were ISALAH B. SCOTT, W. F. OLDHAM, JOHN E. ROBINSON, and MERRIMAN C. HARRIS.

1908. The General Conference was held in Lyric Hall, Baltimore, Md., May 6 to June 1. Attending were 394 clerical delegates, 392 lay delegates, fifteen bishops, and seven missionary bishops.

The Episcopal Address, following the example of the Conference of 1900, presented a succinct statement of Methodist doctrine and then went on to relate Methodism's distinctive beliefs to the currently disturbing issues of evolution and pantheism. Describing the Methodist Church as a "temperance society," the bishops again strongly indicted both the traffic in liquor and the use of beverage alcohol.

The Conference supported the bishops on the liquor issue and called for total abstinence. As it had done before, the Conference also challenged every Methodist voter to cast his ballot for the suppression of the saloon.

Speaking at length to the social problems of the day, the Conference went on record as standing for equal and complete justice for all; called for arbitration in industry, for the proper protection of workmen against occupational hazards, and for the abolition of child labor; demanded better working conditions for women, the suppression of the "sweat shop," the institution of a shorter work week, and release from employment one day in seven; championed a "living wage in every industry," with emphasis upon the highest wage that each industry could afford; and sought an equitable division of the products of industry.

The Conference took note of the organization of the METHODIST FEDERATION FOR SOCIAL SERVICE, summoned the Church to increase its activities in this area, and formulated and adopted the SOCIAL CREED. It approved an ECUMENICAL CONFERENCE for all Methodism in 1911 and requested that woman's work in the Methodist Church be given a place on the program. It likewise urged that an invitation to union be extended to the M. P. Church.

The Conference re-elected to their respective positions the Publishing Agents and Editors endorsed by the last Conference.

Bishops elected were WILLIAM F. ANDERSON, JOHN NUELSEN, WILLIAM A. QUAYLE, CHARLES W. SMITH, WILSON S. LEWIS, EDWIN H. HUGHES, ROBERT MCINTYRE, and FRANK M. BRISTOL.

1912. The General Conference met in the Auditorium, Minneapolis, Minn., May 1 to 29, with 821 delegates, 20 bishops, and five missionary bishops participating.

The Episcopal Address was lengthy and distinctively theological. Opening with a statement that put the 1912 Conference in historical context, it stressed the spiritual origin and nature of Methodism, reaffirming the universal character of the Methodist Church.

The Address then proceeded to speak sharply to the social issues of the day, denouncing the desecration of the Sabbath, the craze for cheap amusements, the practice of price-fixing, the restraint of trade, the abuses of child labor, and the liquor traffic. Lamenting the arrested growth of the Church, it called for a return to pastoral evangelism.

In no uncertain terms, the Address insisted upon the freedom of the pulpit, opposed diocesanism, and put the bishops on record as firmly in opposition to fixed jurisdictions.

The Conference approved the creation of a commission to work toward Methodist union; authorized two Manuals for Probationers—one for juniors and one for seniors; recognized the METHODIST FEDERATION FOR SOCIAL SERVICE as an executive agency for rallying support on social issues; and challenged the Church, in its capacity as employer, to set high working standards involving sick leave, old age benefits, and profit-sharing.

The Conference gave unordained pastors the privilege of baptizing and marrying so long as they served alone on a charge and called for each local church to minister to its community. In harmony with the Episcopal Address, it passed strong resolutions seeking the suppression of the liquor industry.

The Publishing Agents elected by the last two Conferences were returned to office. Editors selected were W. V. Kelley, for the Methodist Review; George P. Eckman, for the Christian Advocate; Dan B. Brummitt, for the Epworth Herald; A. J. Nast, for the Christian Apologist; A. J. Bucher, for Haus und Herd; and J. T. McFarland, for Sunday school publications.

Bishops elected were HOMER C. STUNTZ, WILLIAM O. SHEPARD, THEODORE S. HENDERSON, NAPHTALI LUCCOCK, FRANCIS J. MCCONNELL, FREDERICK D. LEETE, RICHARD J. COOKE, and WILBUR P. THIRKIELD.

JOHN W. ROBINSON and WILLIAM P. EVELAND were elected missionary bishops.

1916. The General Conference met in Convention Hall, Saratoga Springs, N. Y., May 1 to 29, with 835 delegates, twenty-one bishops, and seven missionary bishops in attendance.

The Episcopal Address advised the delegates that Methodism overseas was showing a healthy growth despite the hostilities of World War I. It then went on to reiterate the opposition of the bishops to any form of diocesanism and to express approval of organic union between the M. E. Church, the M. E. Church, South, and "such other bodies as may share our common faith and experience." Included in the Address were strong statements in support of education and evangelism.

In the area of social concerns, the Conference—like the bishops—spoke out clearly by affirming the right to work as a spiritual necessity; demanding the enactment and enforcement of proper building codes; seeking support for prison reforms; and encouraging employers, investors, and wage-earners to initiate "measures and movements" to assure a living wage as a minimum in every industry. It likewise expressed approval of a Uniform Marriage Law.

On the prohibition issue the Conference bolstered its firm stand by proposing the expulsion of impenitent church members found guilty of abetting the traffic in beverage alcohol by signing petitions favoring liquor licenses, acting as bondsmen for liquor dealers, or renting out property for the manufacture or sale of liquor. It voted to erect a statue to FRANCIS ASBURY in the nation's capital and decided the question of priority in the establishment of Methodism in America in favor of Maryland over New York. It also adopted a Revised Ritual.

Publishing Agents elected by the Conference were Edwin R. Graham, J. H. Race, and Henry C. Jennings. In two editorial changes, James R. Joy was given direction of the Christian Advocate and H. H. Meyer was put in charge of Sunday school publications.

Bishops elected were HERBERT WELCH, THOMAS NICHOLSON, ADNA W. LEONARD, MATTHEW S. HUGHES, CHARLES B. MITCHELL, WILLIAM F. OLDHAM, and FRANKLIN HAMILTON. A. P. CAMPFORD and EBEN S. JOHNSON were elected missionary bishops for Africa.

1920. The General Conference met from May 1 to 27 in the Coliseum, Des Moines, Iowa, with 852 delegates, twenty-five bishops, and four missionary bishops in attendance.

The Episcopal Address again made a strong statement concerning temperance but went on to point out that, since the Eighteenth Amendment had eliminated the saloon as a gathering place, the Church now faced the added responsibility of creating "community centers of physical and intellectual refreshment" featuring art, music, wholesome amusements, and opportunities for discussion and fellowship. The bishops took particular note of the Church's obligation to children and youth, and reaffirmed their stand on economic and industrial issues, spoke out forcefully on the race question, and renewed their approval of the principle of church union. They also called attention to the fact that the Church must play a creative role in the physical and spiritual reconstruction of post-war Europe.

The Conference celebrated national Prohibition as "the greatest victory ever won by the temperance forces" and extolled the success of the Prohibition law.

In other areas of social concern, the Conference called upon the federal government to stamp out lynching, denounced race-track gambling, opposed prize-fighting, demanded "enforceable laws" governing Sabbath observance, and recommended the creation of a Federal Motion Picture Commission to pass on the moral character and influence of films shipped in interstate commerce.

Reaffirming its conviction that the M. E. Church and the M. E. Church, South should be one Church, the Conference authorized a Joint General Convention, to be comprised of not less than 100 nor more than 200 members equally divided between ministers and laymen of both Churches, to consider the whole matter of unification for the purpose of formulating a plan of union. In the meanwhile, it advocated continuing support of the FEDERAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

The Conference appealed for a greater emphasis on stewardship and the deepening of the spiritual life of every member, urging the development of weekday schools of religion throughout the Church; reaffirmed support of the Ecumenical Methodist Commission; and continued the Commission on Faith and Order authorized in 1912 and retained in 1916. It also gave attention to the problem of inadequate ministerial support.

The Conference rejected term episcopacy. It likewise refused to regard a retired bishop as a member of the Annual Conference to which he last belonged and thus to be "cared for in the same manner and degree as other members of the Conference."

J. H. Race and Edwin R. Graham were elected Publishing Agents. Editors elected were George Elliott, for the Methodist Review; James R. Joy, for the Christian Advocate; Dan B. Brummitt, for the Epworth Herald; A. J. Bucher, for both the Christian Apologist and Haus und Herd; and H. H. Meyer, for Sunday school publications.

Bishops elected were LAURESS J. BIRNEY, FREDERICK B. FISHER, CHARLES E. LOCKE, ERNEST L. WALDORF, EDGAR BLAKE, ERNEST C. RICHARDSON, CHARLES W. BURNS, H. LESTER SMITH, GEORGE H. BICKLEY, FREDERICK T. KEENEY, CHARLES L. MEAD, and ANTON BAST. Negro bishops elected by a special ballot were ROBERT E. JONES and MATTHEW W. CLAIR. Missionary bishops chosen were FRANK W. WARNE, JOHN W. ROBINSON, and EBEN S. JOHNSON.

1924. The General Conference met in the Auditorium, Springfield, Mass., May 1 to 29, with 858 delegates and thirty-seven bishops attending.

The Episcopal Address, taking a firm stance against war, reminded the Church of its world responsibility by calling for aid to war-torn Europe. It hailed the initiation of the world service program as an extension of the Centenary Jubilee and stressed the need for a deepening emphasis on stewardship. Giving strong support to educational institutions, it made a special plea for help to theological schools. It demanded the enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment, appealed for interracial cooperation, and reiterated the bishops' endorsement of the Social Creed. In particular, it deplored "the steady growth of the divorce evil," denounced lynching, and urged church members to become actively engaged in politics.

The Conference adopted and sent to the Annual Conferences a constitutional amendment that would admit laymen to the Annual Conference "on such conditions and under such regulations as the General Conference shall from time to time determine." By a vote of 802-13, it adopted the plan of unification submitted by the Joint Commission. It raised a commission of five ministers and five laymen to study the "whole matter of church music." It called for textbooks on Christian internationalism as aids to world peace, supported a proposed amendment to the United States constitution prohibiting the appropriation of public funds for sectarian purposes, and urged Congress to initiate and send to the states for ratification a constitutional amendment establishing uniform divorce laws. It rejected a proposal to discontinue the Area System for the episcopacy and declined to revise the Apostles' Creed. Again recognizing the Anti-Saloon League, it likewise commended the Lord's Day Alliance for its promotion of proper Sabbath observance.

The Conference elected John H. Race, C. C. Douglass, and O. G. Markham as Publishing Agents. It continued George Elliott as editor of the Methodist Review and returned James R. Joy to his post with the Christian Advocate. Other editors elected were W. E. J. Gratz, for the Epworth Herald; A. J. Bucher, for the Christian Apologist; and H. H. Meyer for Sunday school publications.

Bishops elected were GEORGE A. MILLER, TITUS LOWE, GEORGE R. GROSE, BRENTON T. BADLEY, and WALLACE E. BROWN.

1928. General Conference met in Convention Hall, Kansas City, Mo., May 1 to 29, with 864 delegates, thirty-eight bishops, and two retired missionary bishops present.

As with similar addresses in preceding Conferences, the Episcopal Address spoke to such social problems as bargaining in industry, the trend toward laxity in divorce procedures, the practice of companionate and trial marriages, and attempts to evade or revoke the Prohibition Law. It made an interesting appraisal of the local church in Methodism, called upon the denomination to "tighten the bonds which unite Methodism the world around," and expressed support for the reunion of Episcopal Methodism.

The General Conference sent down to the Annual Conferences an amendment concerning the admission of laymen to the Annual Conference. (This was later rejected by the Annual Conferences.) It also sent down an amendment empowering Central Conferences to elect bishops. (The Annual Conferences later adopted this.) It took a strong stand against war, opposed military training in high school and all compulsory military training in college, and went on record as supporting participation in a World Court.

Recommending that Annual Conferences establish minimum salaries for ministers, the Conference set up a committee of seven, of whom three were laymen, to study the matter of adequate support and equitable apportionment. Two commemorative events met with the approval of the Conference: the observance of the 225th birthday of JOHN WESLEY and the JASON LEE Centennial planned for 1934.

The Conference was marked by two unusual occurrences. One was the suspension of Bishop ANTON BAST "from the exercising of the functions of the office of a Bishop in the Methodist Episcopal Church . . . for imprudent and unministerial conduct." The Conference ordered that his name be recorded, not in the roll of bishops, but in the Denmark Conference, of which he was a member at the time of his election to the episcopacy. The other was the resignation of E. STANLEY JONES as a bishop-elect. Chosen for the episcopacy on May 25, Dr. Jones resigned the next day because he felt that he should continue the work he was doing. As a result of his decision, Manila was eliminated as an episcopal residence.

Publishing Agents elected were John H. Race, George C. Douglass, and O. Grant Markham. The Conference chose as its editors George Elliott, for the Methodist Review; James R. Joy, for the Christian Advocate; W. E. J. Gratz, for the Epworth Herald; A. J. Bucher, for the Christian Apologist; and H. H. Meyer, for Sunday school publications.

Two bishops and one missionary bishop were elected. The two new bishops were RAYMOND J. WADE and JAMES C. BAKER. The new missionary bishop was EDWIN F. LEE.

1932. The General Conference met in the Municipal Auditorium, Atlantic City, N. J., May 2 to 25. Present were 848 delegates, thirty-two bishops, and one missionary bishop.

Evangelism received a major stress in the Episcopal Address. The bishops emphasized the continuing need of reaching children and youth for Christ and noted with concern the manner in which local churches were handling the matter of non-resident members. (During the session, the Conference adopted legislation providing for an inactive list of both resident and non-resident members.) Speaking out forcefully on the alcohol issue, the bishops deplored the efforts of repealists to nullify the Eighteenth Amendment. They also reaffirmed their faith in a World Court; and, in keeping with this sentiment, the Conference voted to advocate United States membership in the League of Nations.

The Conference devoted intensive consideration to the matter of militarism. It urged the federal government to extend military exemption to Methodist conscientious objectors, petitioned all educational institutions requiring military training to excuse Methodist students who were conscientious objectors, and demanded that federal support of military training in civilian educational institutions be stopped.

Speaking specifically to social issues, the Conference called for national legislation guaranteeing basic human rights; urged the government to take such legal steps as might be necessary to make possible planned industrial economy, shorter work hours, unemployment insurance, old age pensions, accident and disability insurance, the abolition of child labor, and public works for periods of depression and unemployment; appealed for modification of the Immigration Act so as to "place Orientals on the same quota basis as now governs immigration from European countries"; and demanded more rigid enforcement of the laws regulating the narcotics traffic.

Again expressing its favor of the reunion of Methodism, the Conference urged that unification be made a major objective of the SESQUI-CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION to be held at Christmas, 1934. In two other actions relating to Methodist history, the Conference approved a bicentenary celebration of the birth of BARBARA HECK and recognized Old St. George Church, Philadelphia, as a Methodist landmark.

The Conference granted each Area the privilege, if it so desired, of having an Area Secretary for World Service. It also authorized a commission of two bishops and fifteen others (ministers and laymen) to study the Benevolence and Connectional Program of the Church.

Several proposals were made with regard to the office of District Superintendent, but the Conference vetoed them. It refused to call for Annual Conference confirmation of District Superintendents, rejected a proposition to make the office elective, declined to remove the time limit on the Superintendency, and ruled out the idea of a Functional District Superintendent.

During the session, two active bishops resigned from the office of General Superintendent. These were FREDERICK B. FISHER, elected in 1920, and GEORGE R. GROSE, elected in 1924.

Publishing Agents chosen by the Conference were George C. Douglass, John H. Race, and O. Grant Markham. James R. Joy, A. J. Bucher, and W. E. J. Gratz were all returned to their respective editorial posts. H. E. Woolver was put in charge of the National Methodist Press, and Lucius H. Bugbee was elected editor of Sunday school publications.

The Conference elected two bishops: J. RALPH MAGEE and RALPH S. CUSHMAN.

1936. Conference met at Columbus, Ohio, May 1-19, its larger meetings being held in the Columbus Auditorium. John M. Arters was elected secretary and the Conference opened on the first day with the celebration of the Holy Communion led by Bishops John L. Nuelson, Lester Smith, and Edwin H. Hughes. Bishop Nuelson, the senior bishop, called the Conference to order.

The Episcopal Address dealt largely with the pending Plan of Church Union with the M. E. Church, South, and the M. P. Church. Indeed, this matter was the chief topic throughout the entire Conference. The bishops reported the death during the quadrennium of Bishops Earl Cranston, John W. Hamilton, and William Burt, and made appropriate mention of the work of these Church leaders. Beside the matter of union, world peace was strongly dealt with, and also a strong pronouncement for total abstinence and for prohibition was given.

Concerning the Plan of Church Union, the Episcopal Address stated: "It is the solemn and joyful conviction of your bishops that these flocks of Christ are now moving toward the Good Shepherd . . . to hear His voice. There shall be one fold and one Shepherd."

After considerable debate, at which the Jurisdictional feature of the Plan of Union was both opposed and defended, the matter of the Central Jurisdiction being especially questioned, the vote was taken with 470 votes for the PLAN OF UNION and eighty-three against.

New bishops elected by the Conference were WILBUR HAMMAKER, CHARLES W. FLINT, G. BROMLEY OXNAM, ALEXANDER P. SHAW, JOHN SPRINGER, and ROBERTO ELPHICK. Bishop Springer was recognized as a missionary bishop and Bishop Elphick as one elected by the Central Conference of South America. The new bishops were consecrated at a special service on Sunday afternoon, May 17. The Conference adjourned sine die on May 19, after assigning the bishops to their various Areas.

GENERAL CONFERENCES OF THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, SOUTH, 1846-1938

1846. The first, and to a great degree, the organizing Conference of the M. E. Church, South, met pursuant to the actions of the LOUISVILLE CONVENTION on May 1, 1846, in Petersburg, Va., in the Union Street Church. This had been recently sold to a Negro congregation as the Washington Street Church, long considered the historic church of Petersburg, had not quite been completed. As Bishop J. O. ANDREW, whose status had caused the division of the Church two years before, had not arrived; and Bishop JOSHUA SOULE was present but had not formally adhered to the M. E. Church, South, the delegates were called to order by WILLIAM WINANS of Mississippi. JOHN EARLY of Virginia was elected president pro tem. The sessions were taken up in perfecting the organization of the Church called for by the Louisville Convention of the previous year, which plan had been approved by the Annual Conferences who had sent their delegations to Petersburg. Bishop Soule, after the session opened, formally declared his adherence to the M. E. Church, South, and he was gladly received. T. N. Ralston was elected secretary; THOMAS O. SUMMERS assistant secretary. Major Conference actions included were the setting up of various committees. The Conference took some important action with reference to educational institutions, particularly regarding Transylvania University in Lexington, Ky., which it held "open to be officered by the General Conference about to be assembled at Petersburg." Of great importance was the election of bishops for the new Church. Two were called for and WILLIAM CAPERS of South Carolina, and ROBERT PAYNE of Tennessee, were both elected. They were consecrated as bishops on Thursday, May 14. A strong Committee on Missions was set up; publishing interests were discussed and while the formal establishment of a Book Concern was postponed, the Conference approved the publication of weekly papers in Nashville, Charleston, and Richmond.

JOHN B. MCFERRIN was elected editor of the Nashville Christian Advocate; W. M. WIGHTMAN of the Southern Christian Advocate at Charleston; and Thomas O. Summers and LEROY LEE editors of the Richmond Christian Advocate. A formal history of the organization of the M. E. Church, South, as this had been ordered by the Louisville Convention, was to be published and made available. Likewise a Hymnal was called for; the Discipline for the new Church was to be published by John Early (in 1846) and was to be essentially that of the

M. E. Church. A very lengthy pastoral address from the bishops was sent out to the Church; matters of Conference boundaries (since there was a growing controversy all along the border between the north and south) were all taken up; and commissioners were elected and given authority to deal with the M. E. Church on the problem of the South getting its share of the Book Concern monies as had been set forth in the PLAN OF SEPARATION. Conference closed on May 23.

1850. Conference met in Centenary Church, St. Louis, Mo., on May 1, 1850. Bishop Joshua Soule was not present, but Bishops Andrew, Capers, and Paine were. The address of the bishops was read by Bishop Andrew. This noted changes in the nation and the Church, told of the difficulty of episcopal administration, emphasized missions and noted how the sympathy of the Church was given to the slave population on the plantations over its territory. The rebuff to LOVICK PIERCE by the M. E. General Conference of 1848 was noted; and a special committee was appointed to deal with the matter of the M. E. Church entering the Southern territory. There was slight revision of the baptismal office. HENRY B. BASCOM was elected and consecrated a bishop on May 21, 1850.

1854. Conference met at Columbus, Ga., on May 1. Bishop Soule regretted the absence of Bishop Payne, who was in the city but ill, and reported that he had heard nothing of Bishops Capers and Andrew. Thomas O. Summers was elected secretary. Long and well-written reports were heard on missions and Sabbath schools. The Sunday School Society's Constitution was presented. Bishops elected were GEORGE F. PIERCE (who was presented for consecration by his father, Lovick Pierce), JOHN EARLY and HUBBARD N. KAVANAUGH. The death of Bishop Bascom was reported to the Conference and a due memoir prepared. The appointed Commissioners reported how they had pushed the claims of the M. E. Church, South in the courts in order to obtain their share of the Book Concern's money. They reported with gratitude that Justice JOHN MCLEAN had greatly helped them in presiding at the informal meetings in which they hoped they might secure an amicable settlement without further legal procedures.

1858. Conference met in the Hall of Representatives of the Capitol Building in Nashville, Tenn., on May 1, 1858. All the Bishops—Soule, Andrew, Paine, Pierce, Early, and Kavanaugh were present. Bishop Capers had died during the quadrennium. The address of the bishops emphasized the connective principle of the Church, also missions, and the work of the Church with the Indians. The settlement of the suit in the Federal Courts to obtain the South's share of the Book Concern money was reported as having been decided in favor of the South. The bishops decried as unfortunate proposed changes in the itinerancy and the agitation over lay delegation. A major action of this Conference had to do with expunging the general rule on slavery from the Discipline. The bishops reported that a vote of 1,160 to 311 was for expunging this, and the Conference approved a series of resolutions removing the rule on slavery from the General Rules of the M. E. Church, South, subject to the concurrence of the annual conferences.

1862. No General Conference was held this year due to the turmoil of the Civil War and invasion then enveloping the South. In the parlor of an Atlanta home, on April 10, 1862, Bishops Andrew, Pierce, and Early attended a two-day informal meeting. Bishop Andrew presided. John B. McFerrin, the Book Agent, and Holland N. McTyeire, editor of the Nashville Advocate, had been forced out of Nashville by the arrival of the Union forces. The Atlanta meeting apportioned the episcopal salaries; decided to consolidate the Nashville Christian Advocate with the Southern Christian Advocate, and appealed to the Church to support the China mission. However, almost everything halted in Southern Methodism until the war was over.

1866. The Conference convened on April 4, in Carondelet Street Church, New Orleans, La., the first session of a General Conference of the M. E. Church, South, in eight years due to the Civil War. Present were Bishops Andrew, Early, Paine, Pierce and Kavanaugh, along with 153 clerical delegates. The Conference was influenced significantly by HOLLAND N. MCTYEIRE, who introduced a resolution and saw it adopted admitting lay delegates to the Annual and General Conferences. The Baltimore Conference was admitted into the M. E. Church, South, and a separate organization for Negroes, the COLORED METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, was instituted. The Episcopal Address alluded to problems in publishing, missions and education caused by the Civil War; it also pointed out the need for an increased number of bishops. A motion to change the Church's name to The Episcopal Methodist Church was passed, but the change was later rejected by the annual conferences. The six-month probationary period before being admitted into full church membership was abolished. A proposal to allow unlimited tenure of pastors was adopted, but modified the next day under the vigorous protests of Bishop George F. Pierce. Compromise legislation limited pastoral tenure to four consecutive years. Elected bishops were WILLIAM M. WIGHTMAN, ENOCH M. MARVIN, DAVID S. DOGGETT and Holland N. McTyeire. This Conference proved to be one of the most important and progressive Conferences in the history of American Methodism.

1870. The General Conference met at Court Street Cumberland Presbyterian Church, Memphis, Tenn., May 4-26, with 120 clerical delegates and 106 lay delegates in attendance. All the bishops were present except Bishop Early, whose absence was occasioned by "age and infirmities."

The Episcopal Address referred to the devastating effects of the Civil War, but rejoiced in the fact that the trials thus created "have only tested and increased the attachment and fidelity of our ministers, and the general body of our membership." It recognized the admittance of lay delegates to the General Conference; noted the "prosperous condition" of the publishing interests; called for an "increase of scriptural holiness"; deplored the neglect of class meetings, prayer meetings, fasting, abstinence, and family devotions; lamented increasing indulgence in worldly pleasures; emphasized the religious training of children; directed attention to "the great and effectual door now open in the West," reporting appeals for men to serve there; and declared the intention of the bishops to organize five Negro annual conferences into an entirely separate Church." (The Conference later supported the bishops on this by approving the organization of the Colored Methodist Episcopal Church.)

The Conference retained the Publishing House at Nashville, Tenn.; declined to change the denomination's name to "Episcopal Methodist Church"; and, denying any inherent veto power on the part of the bishops over the General Conference, sent down to the annual conferences a measure providing that "when any rule or regulation . . . adopted by the General Conference" appeared unconstitutional to the bishops, the latter might present their objections—with reasons—to the Conference, but if the Conference adhered to its original action by a two-thirds vote, it should then take the course provided for altering a Restrictive Rule. If affirmed by the annual conferences, the bishops should then "announce that such rule or regulation takes effect from that time." The measure required a three-fourths vote of the annual conferences, which later was given to approve it.

A. H. Redford was elected Book Agent, Thomas O. Summers was chosen Book Editor and editor of the Nashville Christian Advocate. J. B. A. Ahrens was selected to edit the Christian Apologist. The Conference elected one bishop: JOHN CHRISTIAN KEENER.

1874. The Conference met in the Public Library Hall, Louisville, Ky., on May 1, Bishops Paine, Pierce, Kavanaugh, Wightman, Marvin, Doggett, McTyeire, Keener and 194 members were in attendance. The Episcopal Address attempted to prevent narrowing the Christian vision solely to domestic problems, and called for missionary expansion. The address showed signs of a struggle over certain misinterpretations of the Conference of 1866. Methodist class meetings were not abolished, maintained the bishops. Mandatory attendance for membership was simply made a matter of conscience rather than law, they explained. The General Conference freed the Board of Missions from domestic responsibilities which prevented its concentration on foreign missions. Domestic missions were made the responsibility primarily of the annual conferences. A proposal to establish a general missionary agency for the women of the Church was defeated. The Conference explicitly rejected thoughts of union with the M. E. Church and preferred fraternal relations instead. A proposed constitutional amendment to strengthen the prohibition against use of alcoholic beverages passed, but was later defeated by the annual conferences. No bishops were elected.

1878. Conference met on May 1, at First Methodist Church, Atlanta, Ga. Bishops Paine, Kavanaugh, Wightman, Doggett, McTyeire, and Keener answered to their names, and 246 delegates were seated in the Conference. The Episcopal Address was lengthy and unusually confident. It made several organizational suggestions to the General Conference and uttered praise for the accomplishments of the Church during the preceding four years. Tranquility which seemed at last coming during this post-war period was reflected in a renewed emphasis upon "entire sanctification." Two problems, however, seem to have mitigated against what was otherwise an optimistic and otherworldly address. One was the financial embarrassment of the Publishing House; and the still struggling mission field work which had been badly hurt by the division of Methodism in 1844. Significant legislation adopted by the Conference included the admission of a Northern Annual Conference (the Illinois, as it had been) into the M. E. Church, South; and official endorsement of a connectional Woman's Missionary Society. It also took measures to aid in the establishment of a centennial celebration of American Methodism which was to be held in 1884; and decided to participate in the ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE to be held in 1881. No bishops were elected.

1882. The Conference convened in McKendree

Church, Nashville, Tenn., on May 3. Bishops present were Paine, Pierce, Kavanaugh, McTyeire, and Keener. The Episcopal Address was heavily slanted toward missions, reflecting a humble thankfulness for the fruits of missionary labor then becoming manifest, and indicating a keen insight into future needs. The newly-called Ecumenical Methodist Conference of 1881, the first of such world-wide Methodist Conferences, apparently overshadowed the ecclesiastical scene, and gained such attention that only routine legislation was enacted by the Conference.

The Publishing House, at this Conference, began to show astonishing growth and fruitful importance. Elected to the episcopacy were ALPHEUS W. WILSON, LINUS PARKER, JOHN C. GRANBERY, and ROBERT K. HARGROVE. This Conference created a Board of Church Extension, and elected David Morton corresponding secretary of the new Board.

1886. The Conference met on May 5, in Centenary Church, Richmond, Va., with 137 clerical delegates and 131 lay delegates on hand. Bishops McTyeire, Keener, Wilson, Granbery, and Hargrove were present, and their Episcopal Address reflected the growing optimism and increasing affluence and stability of the period, as war years were left behind. It also pointed to the significant missionary and financial progress of the Church. The Conference took a strong and militant stand against the sale and use of alcoholic beverages, although there was a vigorous opposition to this action due to the conservative southern reaction that this might emulate the way the M. E. Church had always "dabbled in politics." Otherwise the Conference was quite routine, though the bishops were directed to include foreign mission fields in their visitation, and a committee was charged to revise the Hymn Book of the Church. Bishops elected were WILLIAM W. DUNCAN, CHARLES B. GALLOWAY, EUGENE R. HENDRIX, and JOSEPH S. KEY.

1890. General Conference was held in Centenary Church, St. Louis, Mo., beginning on May 7. Present were Bishops Keener, Granbery, Hargrove, Duncan, Galloway, Hendrix, Key, and 294 members. Bishop Keener opened the Conference and the Episcopal Address was read by Bishop A. W. Wilson. This reported the death of Bishop Holland McTyeire. The address recognized that the wealth and power which the church then had were immense responsibilities and subject to misuse. Education held a prominent place in the address, with lavish praise for the accomplishments of the church at VANDEBILT UNIVERSITY. The Conference gave itself largely to routine matters. ATTICUS G. HAYGOOD and OSCAR P. FITZGERALD were elected bishops. Bishop Haygood was assigned to the West Coast. The Conference established the Women's Parsonage and Home Mission Society, and inaugurated the EPWORTH LEAGUE.

1894. The Conference began May 3 in Memphis, Tenn. In attendance were 344 delegates and Bishops Keener, Wilson, Granbery, Hargrove, Duncan, Galloway, Hendrix, Key, Haygood, and Fitzgerald. The Episcopal Address was delivered by Bishop Granbery. It dealt with the growing tide of professional evangelists and discouraged a separation of evangelism from the local parish; discouraged overemphasis on sanctification and holiness; recognized the establishment of Scarritt Bible and Training School; encouraged continued support of the Colored Methodist Episcopal Church; and declared that the church had no business in political controversy. The Conference ordered a wider range of Sunday School publications; established a General Board of Education; noticed the founding of AMERICAN UNIVERSITY in Washington, D. C.; appointed a Committee on Federation to prevent waste of men and money between the M. E. Church, South, and the M. E. Church. This Conference was acclaimed by the secular press as a "model of parliamentary procedure." It was the first in which the bishops used their power to check what they held to have been an unconstitutional action of the Conference in allowing laymen to participate in clerical trials. Their "check"—not veto as it has been incorrectly termed—made a constitutional issue of this action, hence forbidden to statutory legislation.

1898. The Conference opened on May 5 in Baltimore, Md. There were present 272 delegates and all the bishops. The meetings were held in the Armory of the Fourth Maryland Regiment. The Episcopal Address was read by Bishop Keener. It reflected on the turn of the century and the rapid progress of the times; mentioned Vanderbilt University as "properly the center of our educational system, to which all our schools and colleges should be correlated"; cautioned against the establishment of numerous and immature missionary conferences; called for a uniform principle in electing lay members to annual conferences; noted the death of Bishop Atticus G. Haygood. The Conference established an Educational Commission to set standards for colleges; initiated a "Twentieth Century Fund," the church's first connectional educational campaign; refused to endorse the Woman's Christian Temperance Union; forbade anyone to preach within the bounds of a charge without the permission of the preacher in charge (extremely controversial). The Conference elected to the episcopacy WARREN A. CANDLER and HENRY C. MORRISON. It was called the "most cautious Conference since 1878."

1902. The Conference met in Dallas, Texas, on May 7, in the Fair Grounds Auditorium. In attendance were 278 delegates and Bishops Keener, Wilson, Granbery, Hargrove, Duncan, Galloway, Hendrix, Key, Fitzgerald, Candler, and Morrison. The Episcopal Address was read by Bishop W. W. Duncan. It showed great interest in world politics and economics; urged stricter adherence to prescribed liturgy and music; called for better support of supernuantes; reflected the friction generated by a misunderstanding of the local preacher's office; dwelt at length on needs of education; advocated uniform and high standards for Sunday school teachers. The Conference established a correspondence school at Vanderbilt University for ministerial training; the office of deaconess was established; local preachers were placed entirely under the jurisdiction of the District Conference.

The Conference was torn at the beginning with a controversy involving James D. Barbee, one of the Publishing Agents, and the United States Senate concerning payment for damages incurred by the Publishing House during the War Between the States. (See PUBLISHING HOUSE CONTROVERSY.) This dominated the entire Conference. In the end Congressional suspicions that the church had acted deceptively were disproved. Bishops elected were A. COKE SMITH and E. EMBREE HOSS.

1906. The Conference met on May 3 in First Methodist Church, Birmingham, Ala. In attendance were 306 delegates and Bishops Wilson, Granbery, Duncan, Galloway, Hendrix, Key, Fitzgerald, Candler, Morrison, Hoss, and Coke Smith. The Episcopal Address was an exceptionally lengthy one. It noted the decreasing supply of ministers; called attention to problems of industrialization and urbanization; described the past quadrennium as the "greatest in the history of the missionary operation of the church"; cautioned against the use of historical criticism in the pulpit.

The Conference gave the right to unordained but appointed ministers to baptize and perform marriages within their charge; took legal steps to relate Vanderbilt University more closely to the M. E. Church, South; provided for annual conference Boards of Missions to employ evangelists within their own territory. JOHN J. TIGERT, SETH WARD, and JAMES ATKINS were elected to the episcopacy.

1910. The Conference met in Asheville, N. C., May 4-21. There were 155 clerical and 155 lay delegates present. Bishops present were Wilson, Hendrix, Key, Fitzgerald, Candler, Morrison, Hoss, and Atkins. A. F. Watkins of Mississippi was elected Secretary.

The Episcopal Address was very long. It reviewed the Vanderbilt Controversy as well as general matters of the church, including the so-called veto-power of bishops, pastoral tenure, and participation in the FEDERAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. It noted the deaths of Bishops John C. Granbery, Charles B. Galloway, A. Coke Smith, Seth Ward, and J. J. Tigert.

Ministers were for the first time advised by the Discipline to abstain from use of tobacco; adult Bible classes were incorporated under the General Sunday School Board; bishops were required to announce appointments to the whole open cabinet before the official minute question; the General Board of Missions was reorganized; the phrase "the holy catholic church" in the creed was debated.

Bishops elected were COLLINS DENNY, JOHN C. KILCO, W. B. MURRAH, WALTER LAMBUTH, RICHARD WATERHOUSE, E. D. MOUZON, and JAMES MCCOY.

1914. The Conference met in Oklahoma City, Okla., in St. Luke's Methodist Church, May 6-23, with 167 clerical and 164 lay delegates present. Bishops present were Wilson, Hendrix, Key, Morrison, Candler, Hoss, Atkins, Denny, Kilgo, Murrah, Lambuth, Mouzon, Waterhouse, McCoy. A. F. Watkins was again elected Secretary.

The Episcopal Address was read by Bishop W. A. Candler. It reviewed the Vanderbilt matter, appraised the EPWORTH LEAGUE, noting with appreciation its service "for the instruction, training and edification of our young people during twenty-four years that have passed since it became part of the organized activity of the church."

The Address claimed that the church alone can insure social progress; denounced secularism and false philanthropy; extolled the church's importance and catholicity; announced the legal loss of Vanderbilt University; rejected the movement for laity rights for women. The Conference noted the death of Bishop Fitzgerald.

The Twenty-Third Article of Religion was altered so as to take care of the objectionable expression of allegiance to the "rulers of the United States of America." This alteration was in behalf of Methodists in foreign lands where mission fields were growing, and where this Article had become embarrassing. A fight was made to get the words "Church of God" substituted in the Apostles' Creed for the words "holy catholic church." A vote by orders was finally called for, and the measure was defeated, largely by the clerical order. A commission was set up to look into the matter of securing a school of theology, since the Vanderbilt School had been lost to the Church. A long discussion ensued as to what the constitution of the Church really was.

A committee was established to ensure that all M. E. Church, South property was legally owned by the church; refused laity rights for women; discussed unification and declared its tentative approval. No bishops were elected.

The Conference adopted by unanimous vote a report recommending that steps toward the organic union of Episcopal Methodism be continued and a commission was appointed to treat with a similar commission of the M. E. Church regarding the proposal of unification by reorganization.

1918. The Conference met in Wesley Memorial Methodist Church, Atlanta, Ga., May 2-18. It was called to order by Bishop Hendrix. He with Candler, Morrison, Hoss, Atkins, Denny, Kilgo, Murrah, Lambuth, Mouzon, answered the roll call. Bishops Key, Waterhouse and McCoy could not be present.

The Episcopal Address, read by Bishop Denny, noted that the Department of Church Extension had grown phenomenally; referred to the failure to come to agreement by the Commission on Unification of American Methodism; urged support of the War with Germany.

The Conference heard a report by Bishops Denny and Hendrix that the Apostles' Creed embodies fixed and formal Methodist doctrine and cannot be changed by a statutory vote of the General Conference. This set to rest the endeavor to amend the creed by getting the words "holy catholic" altered.

The Conference established areas with resident bishops having four-year presidential oversight; modified the pastoral tenure rule; established a War Work Committee; and organized the Board of Temperance and Social Service. Laity rights for women were adopted; EMORY UNIVERSITY trustees were confirmed, and the Emory grant to the Church was announced.

Six bishops were elected: JOHN M. MOORE, W. F. McMURRY, U. V. W. DARLINGTON, FRANKLIN N. PARKER, HORACE M. DUBOSE, and WILLIAM N. AINSWORTH. Upon the withdrawal of Franklin N. Parker (who stated that he did not feel this to be God's will for him), JAMES CANNON was elected after a tense session. Franklin N. Parker was asked to reconsider his refusal to be consecrated, and the point of order was made that as "six bishops" called for had been elected, no further elections were in order. The effort, unsuccessful, was to block James Cannon who was then the runner-up in the last ballot. The Conference decided that a full six bishops should be elected and consecrated, and James Cannon was therefore elected.

The Conference was termed a progressive one: the "most notable General Conference since 1844."

1922. The Conference was held in the Municipal Auditorium at Hot Springs, Ark., May 3-22. Attending were 198 clerical and 191 lay delegates, together with Bishops Hendrix, Candler, Atkins, Denny, Kilgo, Murrah, Mouzon, Moore, McMurry, Darlington, DuBose, Ainsworth, Cannon, and Waterhouse.

The Episcopal Address, read by Bishop Atkins, noted the growth of SOUTHERN METHODIST UNIVERSITY and Emory University; defended the itinerant system; cited immense missionary growth during the just completed Centenary Movement; praised prohibition as a national constitutional amendment destined to abide throughout all time; recommended a strengthening of the divorce prohibition; ordered memorial services for Bishops Hoss, Key, McCoy, and Morrison who had died during the quadrennium.

The Conference established a definite program for building and maintaining hospitals; gave substance to what was to be known as the Superannuate Endowment; established the Board of Lay Activities; recorded failure of the proposed constitutional requirement to substitute "Christ's holy Church" for "holy catholic church" in the Apostles' Creed.

The Conference was the first with women delegates.

Bishops elected were: WILLIAM B. BEAUCHAMP, JAMES E. DICKEY, SAMUEL R. HAY, HOYT M. DOBBS, HIRAM A. BOAZ.

1924. A called General Conference met in the Municipal Auditorium, Chattanooga, Tenn., July 2-4, to consider a plan for the unification of Episcopal Methodism. In attendance were 369 delegates, together with Bishops Candler, Denny, Murrah, Mouzon, Moore, McMurry, Darlington, DuBose, Ainsworth, Cannon, Waterhouse, Beauchamp, Dickey, Hay, Dobbs, Boaz.

The Conference took note of the deaths of Bishops John C. Kilgo, James Atkins, and Richard G. Waterhouse.

Four bishops—Candler, Denny, Darlington, and Dickey—had opposed the call for the special session of the General Conference, and issued a Statement of Protest from Nashville, Tenn., on May 20, 1924. They questioned the legality of the call.

A resolution of the General Conference of 1922 had authorized: "Instead of the joint convention proposed, we recommend a special session of the General Conference of our Church. When a plan of unification is endorsed by a two-thirds vote of each commission and approved by the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, then our College of Bishops is empowered and instructed to call the special session of our General Conference."

The Plan of Unification was to unite the M. E. Church and the M. E. Church, South, into "one Church with two jurisdictions under a constitution, with a General Conference and two Jurisdictional Conferences"—the delegates to the General and Jurisdictional Conferences to be the same. Every vote in the General Conference was to be by Jurisdictions and would require the accepted majority vote of each Jurisdiction to be effective. Bishops were to be elected by the respective Jurisdictional Conferences. Members, preachers, churches, pastoral charges, districts, annual conferences, mission conferences and missions in the United States could be transferred from one Jurisdiction to the other with the consent of the transferring elements. A bishop was to be assigned by the one body of bishops—but not outside his Jurisdiction without the consent of a majority of the bishops of the Jurisdiction involved. The JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCE was to meet every four years at the seat of the General Conference.

Just before the General Conference convened on July 2, five bishops—Candler, Denny, Darlington, Ainsworth, and Dickey—issued a statement opposing adoption of the Plan.

The Episcopal Address was brief, read by Bishop Candler. It merely recited the action of the last General Conference appointing a Commission to continue negotiations with a like Commission of the M. E. Church looking toward Unification, the adoption of a plan by the Joint Commission, and the approval of that plan by the General Conference of the M. E. Church. This was followed by a brief statement signed by Bishops Candler, Denny, and Ainsworth setting forth their reasons for not signing the call for the special General Conference session.

A warm debate followed regarding this paper and its approval which was put in the form of a motion. The motion was defeated.

The Conference then proceeded to the consideration of the Report of the Commission, the majority report being read by Bishop Moore and the minority report by Bishop Denny. The minority report recommended the appointment of a Commission to continue negotiations for Unification on some basis more consonant with the principles for which the M. E. Church, South, had always stood.

An aye and nay vote on the adoption of the majority report of the Commission—which favored the pending plan of Unification with the M. E. Church—was taken. It resulted as follows: for, 298; against, 74. (It should be added however that when this favorable action was put before the Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, for their action, the necessary constitutional majority was not given and the plan thus failed during the next two years.)

1926. The Conference was held in the Municipal Auditorium at Memphis, Tenn., May 5-20. Present were 407 delegates, along with Bishops Hendrix, Candler, Denny, Mouzon, Moore, McMurry, Darlington, DuBose, Ainsworth, Cannon, Beauchamp, Dickey, Hay, Dobbs, and Boaz.

The Episcopal Address called upon the church not to burden the pastor with details and dealt with the problem of heresy. Otherwise it was quite routine.

Actions dealt with the Unification controversy by appointment of a General Conference Committee to "study the whole question in its historic, economic, social, legal and other aspects, and report their findings in detail to our next General Conference in 1930"; ordered publication of the report on the "doctrinal unrest" of the church—a report submitted by the Conference's Committee on the Spiritual State of the Church; increased educational requirements for ministers; provided for central or regional conferences in the mission fields of the church, looking to the speediest possible establishment of autonomous, national Churches.

No bishops were elected.

1930. The Conference was held in First Methodist Church, Dallas, Texas, May 7-26. Bishops attending were: Candler, Denny, Mouzon, McMurry, Darlington, DuBose, Ainsworth, Cannon, Beauchamp, Hay, Dobbs, and Boaz.

The Episcopal Address was prepared and read by Bishop Edwin D. Mouzon. It contained 18,000 words, took an hour and a half to read, and was presented under seventeen heads. It stressed the evangelical character of Methodism; dealt with the M. E. Church, South's relation to the M. E. Church; advocated some exchange of territory and elimination of needless waste and competition, and recommended again provision for a Commission on Exchange of Territory. It reviewed the work of the Mission Board in foreign lands and recommended autonomy where feasible; emphasized lay activities and stewardship; took account of pagan views of marriage and divorce; and called for the Church to stand fast against immorality on stage and screen and in popular fiction. It appealed for justice and brotherhood and the offering of the good offices of the Church in capital-labor affairs in the fast-developing industrial South.

The Conference took note of the death during the quadrennium of Bishops Eugene R. Hendrix and James E. Dickey.

Actions united the General Sunday School Board, the General Epworth League Board, and the General Board of Christian Education into a new General Board of Christian Education; adopted an amendment to the Constitution creating a JUDICIAL COUNCIL, to be submitted to the annual conferences for approval; considered many memorials to appoint another Unification Commission, but merely set up a Commission on Interdenominational Relations; authorized admittance of a preacher not qualified educationally according to the then disciplinary requirements, into the annual conference by two-thirds vote when the presiding elder or examining committee should show the case to be special and unusual; defeated a proposal for limited tenure of bishops.

The Conference elected three new bishops: ARTHUR J. MOORE, PAUL B. KERN, and A. FRANK SMITH.

1934. The Conference met in the city Auditorium, Jackson, Miss., April 26-May 7. Bishops attending were: Candler, Denny, Mouzon, John M. Moore, Darlington, DuBose, Ainsworth, Cannon, Hay, Dobbs, Boaz, Arthur J. Moore, Kern, and Smith.

The Conference took note of the death during the quadrennium of Bishops William F. McMurry and William B. Beauchamp.

The Episcopal Address was read by Bishop John M. Moore and cited 1934 as the sesquicentennial year of Methodism since the organizing of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States of America in 1784; took note of the national economic depression and its effects upon the Church; reviewed education and evangelism and outlined procedures for advance in these areas. It condemned the liquor traffic, war, economic injustice, and commended Christian race relations. It recorded ratification by the annual conferences of the proposed constitutional amendment setting up a Judicial Council. It noted that the Commission on the Revision of the Hymnal had finished its labors and that the manuscript was in the hands of the Publishing Agents. It counseled against term episcopacy.

The Conference set up the Judicial Council; rejected term episcopacy; perfected the organization of the Board of Christian Education; adopted the new "Social Creed"; voted that presiding elders could serve only four years in that office and must serve four years in some other relationship of the church before being eligible for re-appointment. The newly created Judicial Council stated that this, a constitutional matter, must be voted on also by the annual conferences if it were to become law. The bishops were authorized to lead a great forward movement in evangelism and other lines of endeavor in the next quadrennium; revitalized strongly the movement looking to a wise and effective union of American Methodism, that is, with the M. E. and M. P. Churches. The implementation adopted provided for establishment of a Commission on Interdenominational Relations and Church Union, consisting of five bishops, ten ministers, and ten laymen. Similar commissions were set up by the M. E. Church and the M. P. Church. Out of subsequent joint meetings of these commissions came the Plan of Union which resulted in the uniting of the three bodies in 1939.

No bishops were elected at this Conference.

1938. The Conference destined to be the last in the M. E. Church, South, met in the Municipal Auditorium, Birmingham, Ala., on April 28, with 472 delegates, the Judicial Council, nine active bishops and three retired bishops in attendance. The active bishops were John M. Moore, Darlington, (Ainsworth absent), Cannon, Hay, Dobbs, Boaz, Arthur J. Moore, Kern, and Smith. The retired bishops were Candler, Denny, and DuBose.

The Episcopal Address was read by Bishop Hoyt M. Dobbs, Secretary of the COLLEGE OF BISHOPS, though it had been prepared by Bishop Ainsworth who was unable to attend. It paid tribute to Bishop Edwin D. Mouzon who had died the year before. The Address, in view of the proposed and clearly desired unification of Methodism, recorded a summary history of progress of the M. E. Church, South, from 1844 to 1938; confronted the problem of education and the church's part in it; took note of problems created by the repeal of the Prohibition Amendment and cited the Church as the relentless foe of beverage alcohol; decried war, its cost of lives and substance, and remarked upon the then threatening general war. On Methodist union it gave the history of the movement from a definite beginning at the General Conference of the M. E. Church, South, in 1914, up to the Plan of Union then before the 1938 General Conference; this included the votes of the annual conferences (which had been taken before the General Conference met), and recommended the adoption of the report of the Commission on Interdenominational Relations and Church Union. The Address further recommended continuance of membership in the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ and participation in the ecumenical movement; commended the Bishops' Crusade to raise the remaining $450,000 missionary indebtedness created by a sudden slump in missionary contributions; called upon Methodism in this 200th anniversary year of John Wesley's ALDERSGATE experience to mediate the power of God to this age as it did in John Wesley's day.

Bishops Candler and Denny did not sign the Episcopal Address, but issued a separate statement telling why they opposed the Plan of Union and of their questioning the right of the General Conference to complete adoption of the Plan.

The Conference heard fraternal addresses from Bishop Edwin H. Hughes of the M. E. Church and James H. Straughn of the M. P. Church.

Actions approved the Plan of Union to unite the M. E. Church, South, with the M. E. and M. P. Churches to form The Methodist Church.

The 1936 General Conference of the M. E. Church had already approved the Plan 470 to 83, and the annual conferences of that church approved it 17,239 to 1,862. The 1936 M. P. Church General Conference had approved it by a vote of 142 for, and 39 against—twenty out of twenty-five annual conferences approving. The 1937-38 annual conferences of the M. E. Church, South, had in advance of the General Conference approved the Plan by 7,650 votes for, and 1,247 against; and the vote by this General Conference of 1938 was 434 for, and 26 against.

The Conference received a unanimous opinion from its Judicial Council approving the legality of the Plan of Union and method of its adoption. The Conference ordered election in the approaching annual conferences of lay and clerical delegates to a Uniting Conference to be held in 1939; ordered each pastoral charge henceforth to elect a lay delegate to the annual conference instead of continuing to have lay delegates elected by the district conferences; enacted into law a new office of District Missionary Secretary; sent protests to Washington against the sale of munitions to Japan to be used against China in the war in progress; presented a strong paper dealing with the chief moral issues of the day.

Five bishops were retired: John M. Moore, Hay, Boaz, Cannon, Ainsworth. Seven bishops were elected: IVAN LEE HOLT, W. W. PEELE, CLARE PURCELL, C. C. SELECMAN, J. L. DECELL, W. C. MARTIN, and W. T. WATKINS.

GENERAL CONFERENCES OF THE METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH 1828-1936

1828. A General Convention of Methodist Reformers, as they called themselves, assembled at Baltimore, Nov. 12, 1828. More than one hundred delegates were present. Representatives came from Vermont, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Delaware, Virginia, Ohio, North Carolina, Tennessee, Alabama, and the District of Columbia. They elected NICHOLAS SNETHEN, president, and WILLIAM S. STOCKTON, secretary.

A committee was appointed to prepare a system of government for the organization of those reformers who wished to unite under its provisions. Seventeen Articles of Association were adopted and provision was made for holding a general Convention in Baltimore in November, 1830. This was to be composed of both ministers and lay representatives. Agents were appointed to travel through the states to explain and support the Articles, and a committee of five was established to prepare a constitution, discipline, and hymn book to be submitted to the 1830 convention. As the members of the committee all came from slave-holding states, and as slavery was becoming quite an issue everywhere, some dissatisfaction was expressed by representatives from other sections of the country. A resolution to appoint a general president to travel at large through the conferences, invested with powers to transfer any preacher or minister from one to any other conference provided the minister or preacher consented, was put before the convention but lost—to the regret of EDWARD J. DRINKHOUSE, the historian of the Church. "After continued sessions through eleven days," states Drinkhouse, "the convention adjourned sine die."

1830. Agreeable to the order of 1828, the General Convention of the Associated Methodist Churches for the formation of the constitution and discipline of a new Church assembled in Baltimore, Nov. 2, 1830. One hundred and fourteen ministerial and lay delegates had been elected, and eighty-three were in attendance. FRANCIS WATERS was elected president and WILLIAM C. LIPSCOMB and William S. Stockton, secretaries. The convention continued its session for three weeks. A draft for a constitution and discipline had already been prepared by a committee and this was acted upon, "and after due deliberation, adopted, assuming the denominational appellation The Methodist Protestant Church." Antislavery agitation had its effect on this convention, and in the constitutional outline of those who were to be privileged to vote in the new Church, the word "white" was introduced and this caused great opposition. So did the provision holding that "neither the General Conference nor any Annual Conference shall assume power to interfere with the constitutional powers of the civil government, or the operations of the civil laws, yet nothing herein contained shall be construed as to authorize or sanction anything inconsistent with the morality of the Holy Scriptures." This, of course, was to protect the slave-holding interests.

The constitution provided that a general conference should be held in 1834 at Georgetown, D. C., "and every seventh year thereafter." A Book Committee was appointed and arrangements were made for the publication of a weekly church paper to be called The Mutual Rights and Methodist Protestant. JOHN J. HARROD, of Baltimore, was to be Book Agent and Gamaliel Bailey was later engaged by the Book Committee to serve as the editor of this regular church publication. The periodical and publishing house were located in Baltimore. The convention adjourned with prayer by ASA SHINN.

1834. The first General Conference of the M. P. Church convened at Georgetown, D. C., May 6, 1834, with thirty representatives in attendance: sixteen ministers and fourteen laymen. Nicholas Sneathen was elected president; William C. Lipscomb, secretary. Fourteen annual conferences were recognized. Membership of 26,587 was reported as an aggregate from the entire connection, with over 500 ministers and preachers, itinerant and unstationed. The constitution was accepted as it was, but considerable revision of the Discipline was effected. Some trouble was caused by the church paper being in arrears, and provision was made for changing the editor of The Methodist Protestant when the Book Committee should "deem that they have good and sufficient reasons therefor." As it turned out the Book Committee elected Nicholas Sneathen and Asa Shinn to be joint editors of the church paper. Shinn eventually moved to Baltimore in order to carry on his responsibilities, as Nicholas Sneathen seems to have served only for about four months. Shinn's articles advocating a General Conference to be held in Pittsburgh in May, 1838, obtained the consent of the Annual Conferences and when that Conference was held it was decided that the General Conference should meet every four years rather than every seven as at first it had been planned. A Board of Foreign Missions was constituted located in Baltimore. Drinkhouse states that it does not appear that the slavery question disturbed this Conference.

1838. Conference convened at First Church, Pittsburgh, May 15, 1838, with Asa Shinn elected president, and Thomas W. Pearson, secretary. There were forty representatives present from fourteen annual conferences. Beside the ILLINOIS CONFERENCE, a new conference was recognized in ARKANSAS, making seventeen in all. The General Conference approved a plan of establishing a Book Concern, and the existing Book Committee, with little change, was reelected. The hymn book compiled by THOMAS H. STOCKTON was approved and adopted by the Conference.

Slavery was a great issue in this Conference with a majority and minority report upon slavery both submitted, heavily debated and neither adopted. After much debate, a compromise was adopted determining that since there was such wide disagreement, the subject of slavery should be left with the respective Annual Conferences. Drinkhouse says that this was a compromise which left things where they were when the debate began. A move led by the OHIO and PITTSBURGH CONFERENCES to establish a Western church paper, and motivated largely by the anti-slavery forces, eventually succeeded. The Western Recorder was first issued by CORNELIUS SPRINGER, July, 1839, and was by him conducted and published for six years. In 1845, ANCEL BASSETT became its editor and carried it on as an individual enterprise for ten years until in 1855 it was transferred to the church.

1842. Conference assembled in Baltimore, May 3, 1842, with Asa Shinn, President, and John J. Reed and Ancel H. Bassett, Secretaries. Sessions were held in St. John's Church and fifty-one representatives were in attendance from sixteen Annual Conferences. Besides new conferences in Indiana, South Carolina, and Onondaga, a conference was recognized in Mississippi.

There was a discouraging report from the Book Committee and the affairs of the church paper were declared as giving concern. It was decided that a debt of $1,800 had to be raised to help relieve the church of its publishing difficulties, and a plan for such relief was adopted, asking each Annual Conference to raise a sum equal to the amount of fifty cents per member. ELI Y. REESE was elected editor of the church paper.

Many memorials came in on the subject of slavery and again there were two reports. A compromise resolution as offered by John S. Reese was adopted by the close vote of twenty-three to twenty, allowing the different annual conferences to make their own regulations on the subject of slavery. ALEXANDER McCAYNE undertook to defend slavery from the Bible and during the session "not less than twelve leading brethren, residents of Southern States, were severally invited to honorary seats in the Conference, some of whom took part in debate. This was by some considered an unfairness, in giving a preponderating influence to anti-abolition views . . ." (Bassett, p. 124). Much agitation occurred and J. J. Reed of New York, one of the Secretaries of the Conference, withdrew with his papers, declining to ask to be excused. A. A. Lipscomb was appointed Secretary for the closing session. Conference adjourned May 16, 1842. Statistics reported by Drinkhouse showed stationed ministers 634; unstationed 525; members 55,341.

1846. The Conference convened at Cincinnati, Ohio, on May 5, 1846. Francis Waters was chosen president and James E. Wilson and Ancel H. Bassett, secretaries. Seventy-two representatives were present from eighteen Annual Conferences. The new conferences were Muskingum, Huntsville, Louisiana, North Illinois, Florida, Iowa and Maine. A division of the Indiana Conference was authorized, constituting the Wabash Conference, afterwards called North Indiana. The organization of the Philadelphia Conference was authorized, but the Champlain Conference was declared dissolved. Slavery again greatly disturbed the conference. A resolution declaring slavery "an offense condemned by the word of God," was laid on the table by a vote of thirty-five to thirty-one. A later compromise resolution was adopted holding that the General Conference "does not feel authorized by the constitution to legislate upon the subject of slavery"; and recommending that the "different annual conferences respectively should make their own regulations on the subject, so far as authorized by the constitution" (Bassett, p. 128).

The question of Home Missions was debated and it was finally decided that each annual conference should have the right to employ and appoint its own ministers or preachers to serve as home missionaries in any unoccupied portions of its district and to change appointments of certain missionaries at its annual sessions as the conference should judge best.

Eli Y. Reese was again elected editor and Book Agent.

The Board of Foreign Missions as constituted was continued. Statistics indicated that 63,567 members belonged to the church at that time. Conference adjourned with prayer by the president, to meet in Baltimore, May 1850.

1850. The fifth General Conference assembled at West Baltimore Station in Baltimore on the 7th of May, 1850, with George Brown acting as president and A. H. Bassett, secretary. Eighty-eight official delegates (according to Drinkhouse) were listed from thirty-two conferences, but only thirty-five were present on the first day and thirty-three did not come at all. Drinkhouse in his history of the Church indicated that "distance, expense and hardship of travel were the causes, since there were as yet no continuous lines of railroad except the Baltimore and Ohio which had just surmounted the almost insuperable physical barriers to the West." On the second day, Levi R. Reese was elected president on the fifth ballot with A. H. Bassett and B. H. Anderson, secretaries.

The slavery issue was really beginning to divide the Church and in this Conference some efforts were made to term slavery only "an ecclesiastical question." MADISON COLLEGE, Uniontown, Pa., originally founded by the M. E. Church, was accepted by the Conference and proper control was instituted. In a struggle between Steubenville, Ohio, and Charleston, S. C., both nominated for the next meeting of the General Conference, Steubenville was selected by a vote of twenty-four to twenty-three. The report of the Book Concern and Periodical department was an exhaustive one and considered the best showing that had been made to that date. E. Yeates Reese, Book Agent and editor, had his salary increased from $900 to $1,100 a year. Further actions included investing the General Conference with authority to hear and decide on appeals. This passed by a two-thirds majority (24 to 12) but the annual conferences later rejected it; and to provide support "by which presidents of the annual conferences may be stationed, if these bodies see proper to do so." This last (which Drinkhouse surprisingly calls "relief to the diocesan episcopacy of the Church," Drinkhouse, Vol. II, p. 370) was to enable the presidents of the respective conferences to have enough support in travel to oversee his area.

A formal report presented to the Conference recommended that the Order of Deacon be done away, but the report was laid on the table.

Statistics as reported to the General Conference from the thirty-two conferences indicated that there were 778 stationed preachers, 697 unstationed, and 65,694 members. The Conference adjourned close to midnight on May 21, upon motion of Wesley Starr of Maryland.

1854. The sixth General Conference assembled at Steubenville, Ohio, on Tuesday, May 2, 1854, with JOHN BURNS, president pro tem, and W. H. WILLS, secretary. Again there was a sparse attendance and the Huntsville and Florida Conferences were not heard from at all. The total official membership was 102, but only thirty-one answered the roll call on the first day. Bassett says there were "sixty-two representatives in attendance from twenty-three conferences." The difficult travel situation again was held responsible for the short attendance.

John Burns was elected president on the second day with William H. Wills and John Scott secretaries. The Board of Foreign Missions reported the organization of the Oregon Mission, and the work of DANIEL BAGLEY as missionary there. Five ministers, two preachers and 120 members were reported from that Mission. The China Mission "miscarried," as Drinkhouse expressed it, due to the unreliability of the one the Board had depended on for that work.

A new church paper was called for to be denominated the Western Methodist Protestant, to be published by the Western Methodist Protestant Book Concern. An equitable arrangement was worked out between the finances of the Baltimore Book Concern and the equity that should go to the Western. The line-up of the conference and the annual conferences of the north and west represented in this division of the Book Concern foreshadowed the division of the Church to come later. Slavery and the growing tension over it was the real reason for this division of the conferences. The establishment of the Western Book Concern and a western paper it was understood would provide "a medium for the free adverse discussion of slavery" (Drinkhouse, II, 391).

There was a move to abolish the office of deacon, but the Conference decided there was "no necessity for the change." The ratio of representation for delegation to the Conference was fixed at one minister and one layman for every 1,750 members instead of one for every 1,500 as it had been.

The committee on Statistics presented the most complete report the Church had ever received. Drinkhouse comments that this was the last General Conference attended by representatives of the north and west until the reunion in 1877 when again complete Methodist Protestant statistics might be given. This time there were a total of 70,018 members with itinerant preachers, 916, and unstationed ministers and preachers, 767. The Conference adjourned on May 16.

1858. The seventh General Conference of the Methodist Protestant Church met in Lynchburg, Va., May 4, 1858, in the M. P. Church there. Judge B. S. BIBB, of Alabama, was chosen president pro tem. Drinkhouse states that twenty-three ministers and sixteen laymen were present. W. C. Lipscomb, an "unstationed" Maryland minister, was elected permanent president the next day and W. H. Wills, secretary. Wills declining, the Conference elected Joseph White. There was considerable discussion as to seating certain honorary members who were church members but who had not been elected delegates. These were allowed to speak by formal action of the Conference itself. It was decided that the church hymn book should not be published in combination with the Discipline, "as the interest of the Church will be increased by publishing the books separately."

On May 7 the Conference formally received a lengthy memorial from a convention of Methodist Protestants held in Cincinnati the previous year in which the brethren there explained their attitudes toward slavery and asked that the General Conference in 1858 modify the Constitution of the Church so as to do away any suggestion that it protects ministers and members of the Church in slave holding and slave trading. This memorial from Cincinnati overshadowed all other business of the Conference. In reply to it John J. Murray and George Vickers representing a majority of a special committee on memorials refused to sanction the threat of the Memorialists to "resolve on secession or revolutionary action" and declined the request of the memorial. A minority of this committee put in a report stating that "this General Conference has no constitutional authority to grant the prayers of the said petitioners."

Subsequently other reports came in dealing with the Memorialists and asking that the issue be put before the annual conferences and stating that "a severance from this General Conference is not a severance from the Methodist Protestant Church," and that the Conferences of the Church "had as much right to create two General Conferences as two Church Book Concerns." This report signed by W. Collier was, however, laid on the table, and the Conference adjourned on Thursday morning, May 13, in an atmosphere of some uncertainty.

1862. The General Conference ordered for May, 1862, in Georgetown, D. C., could not fully assemble on account of the war, and only the representatives of Maryland were present. However, these organized with Joseph Libby, president pro tem (Francis Waters became permanent president), and D. E. Reese, secretary. Hardly any formal action was taken, though it was understood that the same representatives who had been elected for this Conference would hold over, and that the full Conference would be called together again at the summons of the president.

After the Civil War ended, a call was duly issued for the reconocation of the adjourned General Conference, as it was termed, and this was to be in Georgetown again on May 9, 1865. This was one year in advance of the regular session. Though this came together as an "adjourned" Conference, it was regarded as only tentative since no conferences out of Maryland could have any opportunity to elect their delegates; and even if elected "the absence of facilities of travel would make it impracticable to attend not to name their utter poverty," states Drinkhouse.

The Conference did however meet with Francis Waters as president. There was a sharp debate over the relation of the Church to the government as feelings ran high at the close of the Civil War. A resolution was finally adopted which simply cited the 23rd Article of Religion as the guide of the Church in governmental matters, and saying that since the M. P. Church had never repealed this Article, there was no need to make any fresh statement. The Conference as a body paid a visit of respect to President Andrew Johnson at the White House.

1866. The ninth General Conference met at the Methodist Protestant Church in Georgetown, D. C., on May 1, 1866, with W. H. Wills, of North Carolina, president pro tem. The first action of business was to ascertain who were entitled to sit as members of this body since there had been such a division in the Church due to the war with the separate organization of the Northern and Western Conferences. Ministers and laymen from the following conferences were duly recognized and admitted to seats: from Maryland, North Carolina, Virginia, Alabama, one layman each from Illinois and the Des Moines Mission Conference. A committee was appointed to ascertain the relation to the General Conference of the following conferences: Boston, New York and Vermont, Onondaga, Genesee, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, Muskingum, Ohio, Michigan, West Michigan, Wabash, Indiana, North Illinois, South Illinois, Illinois, Iowa, North Iowa, Wisconsin and Minnesota. A move was made to add West Virginia to this list, but this failed as the recognition of West Virginia as a state had been involved in the Civil War.

On the second day, William H. Wills of the North Carolina Conference was elected president upon the fifth ballot. He thanked the Conference for the honor conferred upon him, and addressed the body in relation to the unusual circumstances under which they were meeting. A permanent secretary was not elected until the following day when on the sixth ballot J. K. Nichols of the Maryland Conference was elected. There was considerable discussion over several reports having to do with whether or not the General Conference had "conventional powers." It was finally decided that it did not have these powers until they had a recommendation in writing from two-thirds of the whole number of the annual conferences. Since not more than three conferences had made such recommendations, the Judiciary committee of the General Conference, whose report was adopted, held that the General Conference was not clothed with "conventional powers."

A committee of four was appointed to wait upon the president of the United States to see if he would receive the Conference in a body, as Georgetown, where the sessions were held, was only a short distance from the White House. The report came back that he did agree to receive the Conference and the time was fixed at 11:00 A.M. on Wednesday, the eighth day of the Conference. The President, Andrew Johnson, subsequently received the Conference at the time appointed.

A letter was read to the Conference from Bishop HOLLAND N. McTYEIRE, who had just been consecrated a bishop of the M. E. Church, South, announcing that lay representation had been agreed to in the Southern Church. He stated that "several prominent brethren of the Methodist Protestant Church" had asked for a commission to be appointed to confer with the Methodist Protestant brethren on the subject of union of the two Churches, "should favorable action on lay representation be taken by our General Conference." McTyre said that since this action had been taken, a committee had been appointed by the M. E. Church, South with this in mind. The Conference in its turn appointed a special committee to reply to Bishop McTyre. This did so by disclaiming power at such a late date in the session "to act in the premises." It expressed gratitude and friendship for the Church, South, and provided for fraternal messengers to the next General Conference of that Church. It called attention to the fact that the M. P. Church was calling a general convention "for other purposes" to meet in Montgomery, Alabama, the next year; and to this convention they invited the Southern Commission to come and "confer with the said convention."

The Conference of 1866 projected a college for both sexes to be under the auspices of the Maryland Conference at Westminster, Maryland. This was the beginning of WESTERN MARYLAND COLLEGE.

J. J. MURRAY was reelected editor of The Methodist Protestant. The conference adjourned on Monday, May 9, at 12:00, noon.

1870. Conference met on Friday, May 6, 1870, at East Baltimore Station in Baltimore, Maryland. After matters of organization and committees had been attended to, J. G. Whitfield was elected president with J. G. Chery and J. Thomas Murray, secretaries. The Conference was fairly well attended by the properly elected delegates, though there was no representation from Mississippi, Missouri, McCain (Texas) or Des Moines. The Conference heard a message from the certain bishops and representatives of the M. E. Church expressing the desire of that Church to treat with a similar Commission from any Methodist Church toward working out a closer bond of union "among the branches of our wide spread Family." (Journal, p. 11). This was responded to later in the session by a formal report expressing similar sentiments and suggesting that fraternal messengers should in every case be appointed between the respective Churches, and also that the editors of the periodicals published by the respective Churches should avoid irritating controversy and "the misrepresentation of each other's history, motives, and conduct." Time was spent also in revising the Ritual. This enlisted considerable debate. Finally, however, a new Ritual was adopted as amended and published in its complete form in the Journal of the Conference.

Among other actions was the recognition of the Western Maryland College as a general institution of the Church; and a request to the Virginia Conference that it not merge into the M. E. Church, South. A report from the Virginia Conference indicated that there was a division in that Conference with some wishing to adhere to the M. E. Church, South, and some bitterly objecting. The majority of the Virginia Conference felt that since both Methodisms had been so badly injured in the Civil War, a union of these two Methodisms would be advantageous.

Overtures from "the Methodist Church" (as the organization of the Northern and Western M. P. Conferences had termed itself) to come into closer relationship were rebuffed by the General Conference. Their answer stated that "whenever the Conferences aforesaid shall see fit to rescind their act of suspension and place themselves again under the Constitution and Discipline of the Methodist Protestant Church, they will be cordially received as co-laborers in the cause of Christ and constituent members of this body" (Drinkhouse, II, p. 505). The Conference adjourned on the twelfth day of its session.

1874. Conference convened in Lynchburg, Virginia, on May 1, 1874, with JOHN PARIS as temporary president. There was a rather complete representation. Drinkhouse, who was a member of the Conference, writes that he does not recollect any large absenteeism. L. W. BATES was elected president, and A. C. Harris and J. B. Watson, secretaries. Fraternal greetings of the Conference were sent to the General Conference of the M. E. Church, South, then in session in Louisville, and a reciprocal message was received in return. The theological department of Western Maryland College was commended to the Church for its care and patronage. No Constitutional changes had been concurred in by the Conferences and so none were made. The Order of Deacon was abolished by a 35 to 16 vote and its form of ordination stricken from the Discipline. Fraternal messages came from the Methodist Church brethren, and the Conference appointed a committee to meet with a similar commission from the Methodist Church looking toward reunion. Statistics reported that there were 546 itinerants, 49,319 members, "with no report from a half dozen Conferences," says Bassett, with property valued at $1,122,351. Matters regarding the Book Concern and its general situation took considerable time of the Conference. E. J. Drinkhouse was elected editor of The Methodist Protestant. There were difficult problems having to do with the Book Concern and its publications, due to what Drinkhouse called the "greenback issues of the Civil War, and the inflation of artificial values." Subsequently, the Book Concern was reconstructed and located in Baltimore. The Conference adjourned on May 12.

1877. A Joint Convention of the Methodist and Methodist Protestant Churches. Pursuant to an agreement made at the joint meeting of the Commissioners of the General Conferences of the divided Methodist and Methodist Protestant Churches held at Pittsburgh, Pa., October, 1875, representatives of the several annual conferences of the Methodist Church and the Methodist Protestant Church met in Baltimore on May 11, 1877. The two different bodies first met in separate places in Baltimore in order to perfect their arrangements for the joint meeting. The respective separate sessions were held for five days with all the formalities which were necessary before going into the reunion. This accomplished and the respective General Conferences adjourned, the combined delegations assembled at their General Convention at the Starr Methodist Protestant Church on May 16 at 4:45 P.M. in order to consummate the union of the Churches. Delegates from the respective Churches walked two-and-two into the convention, a delegate from each Church being paired with a delegate from the other in this march. L. W. Bates was elected president of the convention, J. J. Smith, vice president; secretaries were G. B. McElroy and R. H. Wills. The entire occasion of reunion was marked by exuberant emotion. William Wills of North Carolina, who had been much opposed to union, pledged himself wholeheartedly to it and "at this moment, Dr. Scott of Pittsburgh, the extremist of the other side crossed the chancel and suddenly the two men were folded in each other's arms" (Drinkhouse). The doxology was sung "as never before by these brethren." The time of the conference was taken up with perfecting arrangements for organic union. It also appointed a committee to visit the president of the United States since he had expressed a desire to receive a delegation from the body and it also heard a report from its committee on the Ecumenical Conference of Methodism indicating that the M. P. Church would be glad to cooperate with the M. E. Church in an ecumenical general conference. The Methodist Recorder and Morning Guide, published by the Board of Publication, Pittsburgh, and The Methodist Protestant published in Baltimore, were adopted as official organs of the M. P. Church. Alexander Clark and the publishing agent, James Robinson in Pittsburgh; and E. J. Drinkhouse, the editor and publisher of The Methodist Protestant in Baltimore, were continued in office. An address to the whole Church was prepared "with the view of allaying all disquietude, should any exist, and of setting our members harmoniously to work under our new relations" (Journal, p. 40). Recognizing the fact that there were two official hymn books, the Convention resolved to hold both until a new hymn book should be properly authorized. It was suggested that in the matter of hymnody and worship, the Hymn Book Committee, when appointed, should be authorized to correspond with similar committees in other branches of the Methodist family. Before adjournment, the convention recommended that a day to be selected later in the year, should be set as a day of Thanksgiving to God for the providential guidance resulting in the now happily consummated union. The general convention adjourned on Wednesday, May 23, at 11:40 P.M.

1880. The General Conference assembled at First Church, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, May 21, 1880, called to order by G. B. McElroy, secretary of the 1877 General Convention. He was later elected permanent president on the first ballot, with William S. Hammond, secretary. There were 145 delegates, though the list was reported to be imperfect in some conferences. Thomas Wells, a Negro from Baltimore, was the first of his race to sit in the General Conference. Another innovation was in giving leave to Mrs. J. H. Clancy, of the WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY, to address the body in her official capacity. This was the first instance that recognition was accorded. Action was taken to see that the Church be represented in the forthcoming (and first) ECUMENICAL CONFERENCE; also a committee of fifteen to prepare a new hymn book was appointed. Fraternal delegates were received from the Church, South, and fraternal messengers were appointed to visit that Church and also the Cumberland Presbyterian Church. However, the M. E. Church, having found that its time was much taken up with fraternal messages, had announced that in the future this matter would be taken care of by correspondence only. Drinkhouse comments that "as the Methodist Protestant Church was one of the American Methodisms omitted, self-respect made it impossible for it to accept the poor boon of a recognition by correspondence."

The unification of the Book Concern of the reorganized Church was taken under advisement, and "the Board of Publication of the Methodist Protestant Church" organized, with the two papers of the respective former Methodist Protestant groups, declared official organs. Sunday school publications were put under the Board of Publications and editors and publishers were to be elected by the General Conference. The Committee on Missions reported a new constitution for the Board, and named certain missionary fields as such. The Western North Carolina Conference reported that the Allegheny Conference had been merged into it, and that action was being taken to reunite with the North Carolina Conference; and authority was also given to merge the Deep River Conference into it, so that there would be but one conference in North Carolina. ADRIAN COLLEGE, WESTERN MARYLAND and YADKIN COLLEGES, reported duly to the General Conference. The Conference declined to take any action adverse to freemasonry although the Minnesota Conference had petitioned for such action. The Conference in effect through its committee said that they did not know exactly what obligations Free Masons took, and therefore could not offhand object to freemasonry. Conference adjourned on June 3. Its statistics, admittedly incomplete in 1880, indicated that there were 1,345 itinerant ministers, 755 unstationed, and 118,502 church members.

1884. Conference convened in St. John's Church, Baltimore, on May 16, 1884, and was called to order by the president of the former conference. 161 delegates were registered, but fifty of them were not present, these "mostly from extreme distances." The Hymn Book Commission reported on their work and this was approved. A move was made to join organically with the Cumberland Presbyterians, the proposal greatly helped by the attractiveness of the fraternal delegates whom this Church had sent to M. P. Conferences. The move enlisted popular support and quite favorable official action by the respective judicatory bodies. However, the official organ of the "Cumberlands" at Nashville attacked the plan during the succeeding weeks and it came to naught. The Restrictive Rule was changed so as to read "No rule shall be passed to abolish an efficient itinerant ministry; each Annual Conference shall have authority to determine for itself whether any limit, or, if any, what limit, shall be to the renewal of annual appointments." This allowed the time limit in each Annual Conference to be fixed by that particular body.

Miss Anna Howard Shaw had been elected to Elder's Orders and ordained in the New York Conference, but the Committee on Judiciary reported that this act was unauthorized by the law of the church, and that she was "not entitled to recognition as an Elder in the Methodist Protestant Church." A long debate ensued but the committee's report was adopted. However, Miss Shaw continued acting as an Elder in New York where she had been ordained.

A new constitution for the Board of Missions and one for the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society were adopted. Editors elected included E. J. Drinkhouse in charge of the Baltimore papers, with William J. C. Dulaney, publisher and book agent in Baltimore; and John Scott, editor, and W. McCracken, Jr., publisher in Pittsburgh. Statistics reported indicated that there were 1,321 regular ministers, 905 unstationed, and a membership of 124,695. Sabbath-school statistics were reported too imperfect to rely on. The conference adjourned after a night session on May 29.

1888. The Conference convened in Plymouth Church in Adrian, Michigan, May 18, 1888, called to order by the president, W. S. Hammond. There were 161 actual delegates, but of these forty-four were absent mostly from the South and Southwest. David Jones of Pittsburgh was elected permanent president, and U. S. Fleming of West Virginia, secretary. Three or four days were spent in getting the standing committees properly appointed and organized and hearing reports from colleges, the Book Concerns and general officers. There was considerable discussion over a proposal to revise the Articles of Religion, and upon motion of E. J. Drinkhouse a committee of nine was appointed to formulate "in the interval of the General Conference" Articles of Faith. It had been alleged that there was "latitude of doctrinal teaching," on the ground that Sneathen and Shinn, in the original Convention of the Church, did not favor a Creed for the Church; and that the Articles of Religion had not been adopted by the said Convention. The committee was to complete its work by June 1, 1890 and then refer it to the annual conferences for acceptance or rejection; that the committee should then perfect the Articles, "have them published in the church papers and then referred to the ensuing General Conference" (Journal, p. 37).

An overture was made to the Conference in the matter of licensing women to preach, with the understanding that the Constitution of the church would have to be changed to do this.

College reports showed that Adrian and Western Maryland were flourishing, "with mention of Yadkin in North Carolina and Gittings at LaHarp, Illinois" (p. 639, Drinkhouse). The Communications Committees gave a discouraging report as to the matter of organic union with the M. E. Church and the Committee which had met with the Cumberland Presbyterians and the Commissioners meeting with the Congregational Methodist Church reported no great progress with the Congregational Methodists and mostly good will from the Presbyterians.

Elections put D. S. Stevens as editor of the Methodist Recorder, with the publisher and book agent at Pittsburgh, W. McCracken, Jr.; as editor of The Methodist Protestant, E. J. Drinkhouse, with W. J. C. Dulaney continued as publisher and book agent at Baltimore. Editor of Sunday school literature was J. F. Cowan; and secretary of Home and Foreign Missions, F. T. Tagg. The Conference adjourned on May 28. The statistical reports showed that there were 1,463 itinerant ministers, 1,125 unstationed preachers, and 141,557 members.

1892. Conference convened at Westminster, Maryland, on May 20, 1892. As the president of the last Conference was not present, the 1888 secretary acted as chairman. The attendance was large and "the personnel one of the most creditable that had ever represented the Church" (Drinkhouse). That afternoon Dr. J. W. Hering, a physician of Maryland, was elected president—one of the few laymen to occupy that position. J. F. Cowan was elected secretary. A telegram of fraternal greetings was sent to the General Conference of the M. E. Church then in session in Omaha, but Drinkhouse states that "no response was ever received to it, the sifting committee perhaps, to which much of its incidental business was referred, not regarding it perhaps as of any moment." Four women were enrolled as members of the General Conference but their status as such was debated with a majority and minority report both offered and the determining vote was by orders. They were finally admitted to their seats. The Young People's Society of the Christian Endeavor of the Methodist Protestant Church was recognized, and a publication, Our Young People, made its official organ. The Committee on Education submitted reports from Adrian and Western Maryland Colleges, WESTMINSTER THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, Yadkin College, and Gittings Seminary, as well as a prospectus for Kansas City University. Nothing definite was reported from the committee created to study the Articles of Religion through the quadrennium. Drinkhouse in his history states that this committee could not agree upon any specific recommendations, and that matters were subsequently left as they always had been in the way of doctrinal standards.

Elections: E. J. Drinkhouse withdrew from the editorship of The Methodist Protestant, since he had served as such for eighteen years, and wished to write the Church's history. F. T. Tagg was elected editor in his place. D. S. STEPHENS was elected editor of the Methodist Recorder, and J. F. Cowan for the Sunday school periodicals. W. J. C. Dulaney continued as publishing agent in Baltimore. William McCracken, Jr. declined nomination as publishing agent at Pittsburgh, and U. S. Fleming was elected. T. E. Colbourne (Maryland) became corresponding secretary for the Board of Foreign Missions; for the Board of Home Missions, Benjamin Stout of West Virginia. The report of the Committee on Articles of Faith was recommitted with instructions to report to the next General Conference. The statistical report showed 1,485 itinerant ministers; 1,125 unstationed ministers, and 141,271 members. The Conference adjourned on the tenth day after selecting Kansas City as its next place of meeting.

1896. Conference assembled at Kansas City on May 15, at the Peoples Methodist Protestant Church. J. W. Hering, president, after religious exercises, took some time to make sundry recommendations to the Conference. This presidential message was considered an innovation but a helpful one. The roster of elected delegates indicates that there were 188, but a heavy percentage of absentees were noted, "accounted for by the fact of the extreme western location of the Conference" (Drinkhouse, p. 674). Hering was reelected president—the first time a president had been reelected. T. M. Johnson of North Carolina was elected secretary.

During the sessions the cornerstone of KANSAS CITY UNIVERSITY was laid under the sponsorship of the Church. Stephens, who had been editor of the Methodist Recorder, was elected chancellor of the new university. Subsequently, FRANCIS T. TAGG was reelected editor of The Methodist Protestant; J. F. Cowan as editor for Sunday school literature; with T. J. Ogburn secretary of the Board of Foreign Missions; Benjamin Stout corresponding secretary of the Board of Home Missions; W. J. C. Dulaney was reelected publishing agent at Baltimore; and U. S. Fleming at Pittsburgh. Greetings were sent to the General Conference of the M. E. Church then in session at Cleveland, as it had become known that their return response to the 1892 session had failed in transmission. A resolution against the use of tobacco with certain recommendations to the youth of the Church was passed.

The subject of proposed changes in the Articles of Religion was indefinitely postponed. The Shorter Catechism was ordered revised and published, along with the Sunday school literature. The Young Peoples Society of Christian Endeavor had greatly increased. The General Conference secured an act of incorporation from the Maryland legislature—an important action which gave "a status to the General Conference." Favorable reports came in from the conferences. The statistical report indicated that there were 1,550 regular ministers; 1,116 unstationed; and 179,092 Church members. Conference adjourned on May 23.

1900. Conference met in Christ Methodist Protestant Church, Atlantic City, New Jersey, May 18, 1900. It was called to order by the president, J. W. Hering, who conducted devotional exercises and read a short, business-like, general address. He reported on the ECUMENICAL CONFERENCE which was to be held in City Road Chapel, London, on Sept. 4, 1901, stating that as he had to act before Conference convened he had appointed a committee to represent the Church in getting ready for this London Conference. That afternoon, following several nominations for president, David S. Stephens was elected on the third ballot. T. M. Johnson refusing reelection, Hugh L. Elderdice was elected secretary. A move to assess the annual conferences the sum of five hundred dollars each, for incidental expenses, and for publication of the journal on the basis of their membership was offered, but a substitute prevailed directing that the Board of Publication pay these expenses. The Conference inserted the word "catholic" in the Apostles' Creed after the word "holy," on the recommendation of S. A. Fisher for the Ritual Committee.

Elected delegates to the Ecumenical Conference were D. S. Stephens, F. T. Tagg, T. H. Lewis, M. L. Jennings, and George Shaffer, ministers; and J. W. Hering, W. C. Adamson, Daniel Baker, and W. A. Strickler, lay delegates. Elections: M. L. Jennings, editor of the Methodist Recorder; F. T. Tagg, editor of The Methodist Protestant; C. E. Wilbur, editor of Sunday school literature; F. W. Pierpoint, publishing agent at Pittsburgh; and W. J. C. Dulaney at Baltimore. T. J. Ogburn was elected Foreign Missionary Society secretary; and for secretary of the Home Missionary Society, G. E. McManiman was elected on the second ballot. He received fifty-one votes on both ballots, but three other men being balloted for did not receive that total number of votes on the second ballot. Certain administrative measures were adopted relative to the location of the headquarters of the Board of Home Missions and also the Board of Foreign Missions. The usual reports from the colleges and other institutions of the Church were received and published in the Journal. The Conference adjourned on the night of May 26, with

THOMAS H. LEWIS presiding, he having been called to the chair.

Statistics as published in the Journal of this General Conference indicated that there were ministers and preachers stationed and unstationed, 2,781; and total full members of 179,847.

1904. Conference met in the North Carolina Avenue Methodist Protestant Church in Washington, D. C., May 20, 1904. President D. S. Stephens called the Conference to order. The president's Address, which had by this time become a feature of the General Conference, reviewed the work of the quadrennium, declared that there had been a reasonable growth and a substantial increase in members; but stated that exact figures showing this progress had not been available. Stephens asked that the reports of the secretaries of the several annual conferences, which were to be made to the General Conference, should be submitted to the president of the General Conference at least one month ahead of time. He announced the possession of a new and commodious building obtained by the Publishing interests in Baltimore; called for deeper interest in the educational institutions of the Church, and expressed concern lest these be left to individual initiative. To meet this situation, he recommended the creation of an educational board for the Church. The president's report also treated of many moves and tentative moves looking toward Church union with the Congregational Church and the United Brethren; and made the suggestion that there be a joint cooperation of the three Churches in a General Council "that shall have an advisory relation to the three bodies." The presidential address went into the whole matter of Church polity and Methodist Protestant spiritual goals and ideals. The address concluded, "That God has given us a work to do becomes clearer as the years roll by. That God will assist and guide us in the accomplishment of this work so long as we are true to Him, becomes more and more evident."

On that afternoon Francis T. Tagg was elected president of the Conference by ninety-seven votes to T. H. Lewis' forty-two. H. L. Elderdice nominated F. C. Chambers as secretary and he was elected. The Rev. Washington Gladden of the Congregational Church and the Rev. W. M. Weakley of the United Brethren addressed the Conference on Church union later in the session. A map was presented showing the spread of these respective Churches in the United States, after which the Conference recessed for an informal reception to Drs. Gladden and Weakley. Conference took a further recess in order to visit the White House on the invitation of President Theodore Roosevelt. Elections were: F. T. Tagg, editor of The Methodist Protestant; M. L. Jennings, editor of the Methodist Recorder; C. E. Wilbur, editor of Church Sunday school periodicals; and J. C. Berrien, corresponding secretary and treasurer of the Board of Ministerial Education; T. J. Ogburn, secretary and treasurer of the Board of Foreign Missions; C. E. McManiman for the Board of Home Missions; F. W. Pierpoint agent for the Pittsburgh Board of Publication; T. R. Woodford, agent for the Baltimore Book Directory. The Conference adjourned on Saturday, May 28, subject to the call of the president should this be requested by any commission on Church union appointed by the General Conference, time and place to be fixed by the president in conjunction with the Board of Publication.

1908. The Conference convened in the First Church, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, May 15, 1908. F. T. Tagg, the president, gave what was by then termed "the address and quadrennial report." Thomas Hamilton Lewis was elected president at the afternoon session, and George Shaffer, who had also been nominated, moved that the nomination of T. H. Lewis be made unanimous. Lewis was escorted to the platform by George Shaffer and A. M. Lyons and the gavel presented to him by the retiring president. C. H. Beck of Muskingum was elected secretary.

Fraternity and fraternal relations were much to the fore during this general conference. The M. E. Church sent a deputation consisting of Bishop Henry W. Warren, Dr. John F. Goucher, and Senator John P. Dolliver. The addresses of these brethren greatly impressed the Conference. Also, a deputation from the United Brethren Church visited the Conference and suggested that there should be an organic union of the M. P. and U. B. Churches "on the general principles of the Chicago platform." Bishop Warren for the M. E. Church called attention to the fact that since lay representation had been in effect in his Church, and since this matter had been a point of great division between the two Methodisms and was now removed, there was no reason why they should not work toward organic reunion. In response to these representations, the Conference requested that a committee of three headed by Dr. Lewis, their president, should go to Baltimore at once and personally "express to the General Conference of the M. E. Church our cordial fraternal greeting and our appreciation of the visit of these brethren." A committee on church union was also appointed, with President T. H. Lewis its head. The Methodist Protestant committee forthwith went to Baltimore, others presiding over the Conference in the absence of President Lewis. H. J. Heinz, a nationally known Methodist, invited the Conference to visit the H. J. Heinz Company plant on the afternoon of the next day, and the invitation was accepted. Moves to deepen fraternal relations between the United Brethren Church and the Congregational Churches were also adopted by the Conference. Elections: F. T. Tagg, editor of The Methodist Protestant; M. L. Jennings, editor of the Methodist Recorder; C. E. Wilbur of Pittsburgh, editor of Sunday school periodicals; T. R. Woodford of Maryland was elected publisher there, and F. W. Pierpoint for Pittsburgh; J. H. Lucas, corresponding secretary and treasurer of the Board of Home Missions; and F. C. Klein, corresponding secretary of the Board of Foreign Missions; C. H. Hubbell of Ohio, secretary of the Board of Young Peoples Work. The Conference adjourned Saturday afternoon, May 23. Statistics: Conferences, 32; mission conferences, 16; itinerant ministers, 1,362; unstationed ministers, 490; total membership, 190,708.

Special Session, 1914. A Special Session of the General Conference of the Methodist Protestant Church was held in Columbus, Ohio, on July 15-16, 1914, called pursuant to a resolution of the 1912 General Conference with regard to the negotiations for union. That Conference had authorized a commission on union to call a special session of the General Conference if such "speedy action was advisable," providing that two-thirds of the annual conferences through their presidents did agree when it became known that the United Brethren Church had accepted a plan of union with the Methodist Protestant Church, drawn up by the joint commissioners. However, from the first opening of the Conference with President Lyman E. Davis, in the chair, and Charles H. Beck "at the desk," there was manifest all sorts of divisions of mind with reference to the proposed union. A courtesy move to thank Dr. Davis for what he had done on the commission was immediately objected to by certain delegates. The delegation from Georgia denied the legality of the call of the conference, and reported that if any action toward union were taken the Georgia Annual Conference would feel free to "take what action it felt good in its future relations to the M. P. Church." Great parliamentary bickering ensued. Formal prayer was called for frequently during the session, as was the singing of gospel hymns in patent attempts to help allay the tension. Davis made a lengthy speech explaining the entire situation and favoring the U. B. union. He commented at one point that the plan of the M. E. Church, South for a Jurisdictional organization would favor that Church only; and subsequently both Methodist Episcopal Churches were left out of the immediate consideration of the body which centered on the U. B. overture.

After considerable discussion and uncertainty, a commission of fifteen was appointed, seven laymen and seven ministers, with the president an ex-officio member, and these were instructed to meet with the U. B. commission and to work further with them upon the basis of union and "to consider the further details in the process of union" (p. 71, Journal). All memorials on this matter were to be referred to this commission. The question of property rights, annual conference boundaries, and the like, was much to the fore in these discussions. A motion was made that the entire action of this General Conference as stenographically reported be published as a special journal and this was later done. The Conference adjourned "to meet according to the prescribed resolution adopted by the Conference." This related to further possible actions by the commission. Davis dismissed the Conference after suggesting that they tarry a moment about the altar, and after singing "Blest Be The Tie that Binds."

1916. Conference met at Zanesville, Ohio, in the First Methodist Church on May 19, 1916. President Lyman E. Davis called it to order and conducted the Communion Service in concluding the opening session. That afternoon Davis read "his quadrennial address." He was reelected president at the afternoon session and C. H. Beck elected secretary. There was objection to the motion of J. H. Straughn that the secretary cast a unanimous ballot for Davis as president; a ballot therefore was had, and Davis was overwhelmingly elected.

The Conference proved to be a routine one with a considerable time given to the programs of different Boards and agencies. Unlike the former special session, this one proved amicable, and nothing definite seems to have been reported with reference to church union or the moves which stirred so the 1914 special session. A committee was set up to determine the "origin of American Methodism" and this committee reported later, outlining in general the actual historical beginnings of Methodism in New York and Maryland, and noting the parallelism of origin between the JOHN STREET CHURCH in New York and STRAWBRIDGE'S LOG CHAPEL in Maryland. Time was taken to discuss a more effective combination of the publishing interests as between the headquarters in Pittsburgh and those in Baltimore. The Ritual of the Church was somewhat abridged, and a formal "enlargement and enrichment of the Order of Worship" was adopted, together with a simple form for the Reception of Members in the Church; a brief form for the private celebration of the Lord's Supper; and the deletion in the Burial Service of the sentence "forasmuch as it hath pleased Almighty God, in his wise providence, to take out of this world the soul of our deceased brother," and to substitute in its place "since the soul of our brother has departed." W. V. Kelley was the fraternal messenger of the M. E. Church and delivered his address to the Conference on the morning of May 26. Elections: Lyman E. Davis, unanimously elected editor of the Methodist Recorder; Frank T. Benson of The Methodist Protestant; and C. E. Wilbur for Sunday school publications; F. W. Pierpoint became publishing agent of the Pittsburgh directory and Charles Reiner, Jr., publishing agent of the Baltimore Book Concern; George H. Miller, secretary of the Board of Education for the quadrennium. During this session J. H. STRAUGHN and J. C. BROOMFIELD took prominent parts—men destined in 1939 to be elected bishops in The Methodist Church. An executive committee for the quadrennium was elected. The Conference adjourned on the evening of May 26. The statistical report showed that there were 1,345 itinerant preachers; 685 unstationed; and 191,419 full members.

1920. Conference met at Grace Church, Greensboro, N. C., on May 21, 1920, called to order by President Lyman E. Davis. The opening sermon was delivered by H. L. FEEMAN, president of ADRIAN COLLEGE, and then the Communion Service was conducted by the president. The quadrennial address was delivered that afternoon by President Davis. In this he stated that he had felt it advisable to publish an official opinion that the union movement with the United Brethren had "automatically ceased with the failure of the United Brethren to take the vote of their people." He added that in giving this decision he did not presume to close the negotiations, but merely to announce an accomplished fact. He further said that "the Methodist Protestant Church, having voyaged fifteen years and more on the restless sea of union movements and counter-movements, has discharged her full duty in that direction, and has earned the right to sail a straightforward course . . . flying her own flag." Other sections of the address dealt with financial matters and the missionary work carried on through "progressive development" by the women of the Church. Missions in fact had expanded marvelously and the work in Japan proved of special import and interest to the Conference. Thomas Hamilton Lewis was elected president of the General Conference on the second ballot; and Charles H. Beck elected secretary-treasurer. G. W. Haddaway of Maryland presented the report of the committee on consolidation of publishing interests appointed by the former General Conference, in general advising that a consolidation of publishing interests would be wise and practicable (p. 36); however the General Conference deferred action in order to hear from the Baltimore and Pittsburgh "directories." The official publications of both these centers had reported a financial loss through the quadrennium, but a complete consolidation was not made at this session. The fraternal messenger from the M. E. Church was LUCIUS H. BUGBEE. The Conference looked with favor upon the idea of arranging it so that the president might travel over the Church during the quadrennium, and a salary and support sufficient be provided to enable him to engage in such travel. Missions and the work of missions enlisted much time of the Conference, and reports proved heartening from the various fields. The several colleges and educational institutions likewise made encouraging reports. Elections: Frank T. Benson, editor of The Methodist Protestant; Lyman E. Davis, of the Methodist Recorder; Fred C. Klein, secretary, Board of Foreign Missions; Charles H. Beck, secretary of the Board of Home Missions; and C. E. Wilbur, reelected editor of Church school periodicals. Charles Reiner was reelected publishing agent at Baltimore and L. H. Neiplin, publishing agent at Pittsburgh. The statistical summary in the Journal indicated that in 1919 there were 1,185 ministers, 264 "preachers," and 178,125 full members. The Conference adjourned on the evening of May 28, the closing prayer being offered by E. I. Obee of Japan.

1924. The Conference convened in First Church in the city of Tiffin, Ohio, on Wednesday, May 21, 1924, called to order by the president, Thomas H. Lewis; 155 members answered the roll call. At the afternoon session with F. T. Little of Maryland in the chair, T. H. Lewis was reelected by ninety-four votes, to J. C. Broomfield's fifty-two, and G. W. Haddaway's thirteen. Charles H. Beck of Ohio was elected secretary. J. H. Straughn on the next day presented an outline for reorganizing the administrative forces of the Church. Fraternal messengers were Bishop CLIPPINGER of the United Brethren Church; Bishop WILLIAM F. ANDERSON of the M. E. Church and A. C. MILLAR of the M. E. Church, South. The latter was prevented from attendance by the sudden death of his wife, but his address was sent on and read to the conference by George H. Miller. Bishop Anderson's address stressed the growing need of church union and the move under way toward this by the big Episcopal Methodisms. A special committee replying to Bishop Anderson's address noted that both these Methodisms had invited the Methodist Protestants to participate, and said, "We reciprocate heartily the sentiments expressed and the invitation extended. We favor and long for a United Methodism" (p. 25, Journal). CHARLES L. GOODELL of the FEDERAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES made a formal address to the body on the evening of May 22. Moves were made looking forward to the celebration of the centennial anniversary of the Methodist Protestant Church which was to be at the next General Conference in 1928. Elections were T. C. Cassaday of Alabama, treasurer; Frank T. Benson, editor of The Methodist Protestant; Charles Reiner, Jr., publishing agent at Baltimore; Lyman Edwin Davis, editor of the Methodist Recorder, and L. H. Neiplin, publishing agent at Pittsburgh. After two ballots, C. S. Johnson of Ohio, was elected editor of Sunday school periodicals. Fred C. Kline of Maryland was elected secretary of the Board of Foreign Missions and Charles H. Beck, secretary of the Board of Home Missions. The Conference adjourned on Thursday, May 29, after adopting a resolution stating that its adjournment would be subject to the call of the president if and when "he has been informed by your Committee on Unification of Methodism, that the conditions on which we may enter the movement are probably acceptable to this General Conference" (p. 39, Journal).

1928. The Conference began its sessions in historic St. Johns Methodist Protestant Church, Baltimore, Maryland, May 16, 1928, with T. H. Lewis, President, in the chair. A sermon by C. I. Humphreys of Maryland and a Communion Service closed the morning session. That afternoon President Lewis read his quadrennial report which reviewed the work during the past four years, and made suggestions and recommendations for the work ahead. F. W. Lineberry of Indiana, was called to preside during the election of officers and on the third ballot J. C.

Broomfield of Pittsburgh, was elected president. C. W. Bates of North Carolina became secretary. Fraternal greetings were brought by Bishop John Gardner Murray, the presiding bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church; S. PARKES CADMAN, president of the Federal Council of Churches, J. Ross Stephenson, former moderator of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, and president of Princeton Seminary; and by Bishop CHARLES WESLEY BURNS of the M. E. Church. Bishop Burns brought greetings from his Church, and as the General Conference of that Church was then in session, T. H. Lewis was asked to go to Kansas as soon as possible as a fraternal delegate of the Methodist Protestant Church. The centennial edition of The Methodist Protestant was presented to the Conference by Frank T. Benson, editor.

The matter of Church union was much to the fore and again the Conference passed a resolution that when it adjourned it should be subject to the call of the president "when he has been informed by your commission on Church union that the conditions on which we may enter the movement are probably acceptable to this General Conference" (Journal, p. 22). The one hundredth anniversary of the Church was appropriately celebrated by formal papers and addresses. The fraternal messenger of the M. E. Church, South, was GILBERT T. ROWE, then the Book Editor of the Church. Columbus, Ohio was chosen as the seat of the next Conference. The body was asked to look ahead toward the celebration of the sesquicentennial celebration of American Methodism in 1934 in Baltimore and to appoint an appropriate committee. J. H. Straughn was given thanks for having directed the Centennial Gratitude Gift Campaign. Favorable action was taken asking that the Board of Publications be instructed to merge the two Church papers during the quadrennium if this should prove possible. Elections: F. T. Benson, editor, The Methodist Protestant; L. E. Davis, editor, the Methodist Recorder; Crates S. Johnson, Pittsburgh, as editor of the Sunday school publications; Charles Reiner, agent of the Baltimore Book Directory and Publishing Agent; J. T. Darling of Pittsburgh, Publishing Agent of Pittsburgh; and Thomas H. Lewis, elected contributing editor to both the official papers. S. W. Rosenberger of Ohio, was elected secretary of the Board of Missions. Meanwhile, moves were being made to consolidate the missionary work of the Church as well as bringing together the Board of Education and young people's work. Bishop McDowell of the M. E. Church reported by telegram, "Dr. Lewis this morning delivered a masterful address that was received with contagious and great enthusiasm, spiritual uplift and power." The Conference adjourned on Thursday, May 24.

1932. The Conference met in Grace Church, Columbus, Ohio, on May 18, 1932. J. C. Broomfield, the president, conducted a devotional service and the morning session was concluded by the Communion Service. J. C. Broomfield and J. H. Straughn were both nominated for president. Broomfield was elected by a vote of ninety to seventy. C. W. Bates was reelected as secretary. Fraternal messengers were COSTEN J. HARRELL, Jr. of the M. E. Church, South; and Bishop CHARLES L. MEAD of the M. E. Church. The Conference voted to hold its next session at High Point, N. C. Elections: R. L. Shipley to be editor of the Methodist Protestant-Recorder; G. W. Haddaway, secretary, Board of Missions; Mrs. Marie Thompson of Ohio, associate secretary of this Board; F. W. Stephenson, secretary of the Board of Christian Education; H. C. Staley, treasurer; Miss Edith Beck was elected Publishing Agent at Pittsburgh; and Charles Reiner, Jr., for Baltimore. An invitation from the Joint Hymnal Commission of the Methodist Episcopal Churches to join in compiling a new Methodist Hymnal was reported by President Broomfield, who said that he had presented this to the executive committee of the General Conference, and that five commissioners had been named to join those of the Methodist Episcopal Churches. President Broomfield also reported plans for joining in the sesquicentennial of American Methodism. He reported on the negotiations for union of American Methodism as he and his committee had participated in these during the quadrennium. He stated, "Personally I am for union but not for absorption. Numerical strength does not determine self-respect." He also made a complete report on his travel during the quadrennium, stating that he had visited in every annual conference except North Mississippi and Virginia. Conference adjourned on May 25 at an evening session with President Broomfield pronouncing the apostolic benediction. The number of members was reported as 188,060, with a Church school membership of 177,855.

1936. Conference convened in the First Methodist Protestant Church at High Point, N. C., on May 20, 1936. J. C. Broomfield, president, was in the chair and after the Conference sermon by J. C. Williams of Ohio, led in the Communion Service. That afternoon with E. C. Makosky in the chair, J. H. Straughn of Maryland was elected president and C. W. Bates secretary. The early hours were devoted to a program of welcome and matters of organization and committee work. Fraternal messengers were W. ANGIE SMITH of the M. E. Church, South; and Bishop WILLIAM F. McDOWELL from the M. E. Church; Wesley Boyd from the PRIMITIVE METHODIST CHURCH.

The overriding interest of this Conference was the consideration of a plan for Methodist union which had been formulated by a joint commission of the two Episcopal Methodisms and of the Methodist Protestant Church. It was necessary that the General Conference recommend this plan of union to the Annual Conferences for their adoption if it agreed to it. Much time was spent in parliamentary maneuvering and debating various aspects of the plan. Eventually the vote was taken with the secretary calling the roll by conferences and their representatives answering aye or nay to their names. One hundred and forty-two voted for approval and thirty-nine against. It was therefore declared adopted for submission to the conferences. These were requested to vote upon this matter at their next sessions succeeding that of the General Conference. Elections: R. L. Shipley, editor, Methodist Protestant-Recorder; C. S. Johnson, editor of Sunday school periodicals; Miss Edith Beck, Publishing Agent at Pittsburgh; Charles Reiner, Jr., at Baltimore; F. W. Stephenson, secretary of the Board of Education for educational institutions and F. L. Gibbs, secretary for that Board's Department of Religious Education. C. W. Hadaway was elected executive secretary of the Board of Missions; Miss Bettie Brittingham in charge of Woman's Work for that Board. Conference adjourned on May 27, following a resolution that it should reconvene at the call of the executive committee. This was done so that if a plan of union were approved by the three Churches involved, the Methodist Protestant Church could keep in step with the two Episcopal Methodisms.

1939. Methodist Protestant delegates met together at the time of the Uniting Conference in Kansas City, Mo., and elected James Henry Straughn and John Calvin Broomfield to the episcopacy of The Methodist Church.

GENERAL CONVENTIONS AND CONFERENCES OF "THE METHODIST CHURCH"

1858. A Convention of forty-four delegates elected by M. P. Conferences from the non-slaveholding states was held at Springfield, Ohio, Nov. 10, 1858. George Brown was elected its president and William H. Miller and Reuben Rose secretaries. Its aim was "to suspend cooperation and official fellowship with conferences and churches in which slaveholding is practiced or tolerated, until the evil complained of be removed" (Bassett).

The convention struck the word "white" from the Constitution of the Methodist Protestant Church. An Article against slavery was passed and a resolution against slavery adopted to be put "after the general rules of the Wesleys." The Western Methodist Protestant was approved and Ansel H. Bassett reelected editor and book agent. A committee was created and given power to locate permanently a Western Book Concern. A message from the WESLEYAN METHODIST CHURCH suggested that there should be a joint hymnal prepared by the two respective groups. The missions committee recommended that Oregon, Kansas, and Nebraska become mission fields. It was determined that another convention should be held in November 1860, in Pittsburgh, which would have power to regulate and control the interests of the Church paper and the Book Concern.

1860. Pursuant to the direction of 1858, a convention was held in the Fifth Avenue Methodist Protestant Church, Pittsburgh, on Nov. 14, 1860. George Brown was reelected president and J. J. White, secretary. There were thirty-eight delegates from fourteen conferences. No changes were made in the Constitution and the Discipline since a sufficient number of conferences had not recommended any possible change. The Book Concern was reported to be free of embarrassment. George Brown was reelected Editor and Ansel Bassett, Publishing Agent. The joint hymnal suggested by the Wesleys seems to have been by-passed, but an official hymnal was compiled by Brown and approved by the convention.

1862. A convention of delegates from the former Northern and Western Conferences of the Methodist Protestant Church assembled in the Sixth Street Church, Cincinnati, Ohio, on Nov. 5, 1862. Sixteen annual conferences were represented and commissioners were received from the West Virginia Conference. George Brown was reelected president and J. J. White, secretary. This convention "found itself invested with full legislative powers" (Bassett, p. 198). It gave annual conferences the right to do away with the time limit; gave discretion to the annual conferences in stationing their respective presidents and left it to them as to whether or not they would require their presidents to travel. The word "male" in the Constitution was struck out. A strong resolution was adopted supporting the government and blaming the Methodist Protestant Church in the Southern States for their "armed rebellion against the government of our country" (Bassett, p. 200).

DENNIS B. DORSEY was elected Editor of the Western Methodist Protestant and Bassett again elected Publishing Agent. The convention called for the next "General Conference" to be held in Allegheny, Pa., in 1866. The convention received an overture from the trustees of Adrian College asking for a joint control of that college.

1866. On May 9, 1866, what Bassett calls "the delegated non-Episcopal Methodist Convention" assembled in Union Chapel, Cincinnati, Ohio. Drinkhouse states that the relation of this convention "to the Methodist Protestants of either section is but incidental" (p. 472). This had been authorized by a convention representing the Wesleyan Order, the Methodist Protestant Church, two Free Methodists, and certain others. The convention met in the attempt "to fix a basis of union and the mode of its consummation" (p. 207, Bassett's A Concise History of the Methodist Protestant Church).

One hundred and forty delegates, ministerial and lay, representing the different bodies which had agreed to this convention, were present, although the FREE METHODISTS sent no representation. S. A. Baker of New York, a Wesleyan, was elected president; John McEldowney, another Wesleyan, and George B. McElroy, Methodist Protestant, secretaries. The convention endeavored to work out a plan of union along the line of the regular constitution of the Methodist Protestant Church as this had been revised in 1858. The term "Methodist Church" was proposed as the name for the incipient body, and a move to amend this by substituting the name "United Methodists" failed by vote of 109 to twenty-two. It was ordered that the first General Conference of "the Methodist Church" be held the third Wednesday in May 1867, at Cleveland, Ohio, and once every four years thereafter. A committee of seven was appointed to prepare a Discipline and this was to report at the next General Conference. The convention adjourned in a "gale of enthusiasms" observed Drinkhouse—though later all its plans seem to have been superseded by more representative Methodist Protestant moves.

1866. (November) The General Conference of the Methodist Protestant Church, as it then called itself, was held in Allegheny, Pa., in November 1866, and by order of the Union Convention in Cincinnati of May of that year, the first General Conference of the "Methodist Church" was continued at Springfield. Enlargement of the Western Methodist Protestant was recommended. The editorial work of Dr. Scott, who had been editor for the past two years, was approved, and so was the work of Joel S. Thrapp, publishing agent. Ansel H. Bassett, who had long been publishing agent, was voted approval for his services. The name of the official paper was changed to the Methodist Recorder. Adrian College was drawn into closer connection with the Methodist Church.

1867. The First General Conference of the Methodist Church was held at Cleveland, Ohio, on May 15, 1867. Bassett says this was "almost essentially a Methodist Protestant body minus the name." At least twenty-two of the Methodist Protestant Conferences elected representatives and fifty-three of these from sixteen annual conferences were in attendance. No annual conference of the Wesleyan denomination was represented and since only four ministers and three laymen of that order came, it was evident that the Wesleyans were backing away from anything like union. The official paper of the Wesleyan denomination, Bassett notes, was holding out strongly against union, and certain professors in Adrian College were attempting to "defeat the arrangement for joint proprietorship and joint management of the college." Thomas B. Graham, of Ohio, was elected president of the General Conference and Professor Lowrie and Thomas B. Appleget, secretaries. The Boards of Missions and of Ministerial Education were continued without change. There was a good report concerning the condition of publishing interests. George Brown presented for adoption a copy of the Discipline as prepared by his committee and this was discussed, amended, adopted and prepared for publication. College interests elicited much attention and it was announced that Adrian College had come over completely to become the property of the Methodist Church. John Scott was reelected editor and Ansel H. Bassett, publishing agent. Some considered these elections superfluous as these men had been elected the year before in the Allegheny Convention for a term of four years. A new hymn book was ordered prepared and a committee appointed to look after this work. The statistics indicated that there was a membership of 49,030 members.

1871. The General Conference of the Methodist Church met at Pittsburgh, May 17, 1871. Representatives from twenty-two annual conferences were present. Ex-governor Francis H. Pierpoint was elected president and H. B. Knight and J. R. Mulvane, secretaries. The newly compiled hymnal was submitted by Alexander Clark and was received and approved for publication. The Book Concern was ordered to be moved from Springfield, since that was "an interior city, and does not possess so great advantages for a successful publishing business as a larger commercial city." There was a dissenting minority report against this move, but by a vote of twenty-eight to twenty-six, Pittsburgh was selected as the place to which the Book Concern should be moved. The editors and publishing agents were reelected and the new Board of Publication set up at Pittsburgh.

1875. The General Conference of the Methodist Church met at Princeton, Ill., on May 9, 1875. There were ninety-two representatives present—the largest attendance ever reported in that branch of the Church says Bassett. John Burns of Muskingum was elected president, with three secretaries. A new general agency, the Board of Church Extension, was constituted. Alexander Clark was reelected editor and James Robison, Publishing Agent. Meanwhile, the Honorable C. W. Button of Lynchburg, Va., came as fraternal messenger representing the General Conference of the undivided Methodist Protestant Church, and stating that there was a great desire in his Church that the two branches of Methodist Protestantism should be reunited. The conference responded favorably and appointed commissioners to meet with commissioners of the Methodist Protestant Church "to devise plans for reunion, alike honorable and desirable to each." William Hunter, editor of the Pittsburgh Christian Advocate, as fraternal messenger of the General Conference of the M. E. Church, delivered a welcome fraternal address. The venerable senior bishop (EDMUND S. JAMES), was there unofficially and delivered a lengthy address "replete with words of kind feeling, and distinctly favoring organic union for all branches of Methodism." Reunion was in the air. The conference asked Ansel H. Bassett to prepare a history of the Methodist Protestant Church "at his earliest convenience, and either publish the same, or arrange with the Board of Publication so to do." Membership reported was 53,400.

GENERAL CONFERENCES OF THE METHODIST CHURCH, 1940-1968

1940. This, the first General Conference of The Methodist Church and the successor Conference of the three Churches which had united the year before in Kansas City, met in Atlantic City, N. J., on April 24. As the UNIT-

ING CONFERENCE of the previous year had not been allowed to enact new legislation but only to unify the legislative enactments of the three Churches which united, this General Conference took as its main task to further unify the Church, and adopt new legislation, as well as to further correlate and put into effect the necessary unifying moves.

As there were to be no elections of Boards or bishops in the General Conference, these being reserved to the Jurisdictions, the only Church-wide election held was that of members of the newly created JUDICIAL COUNCIL. It was decided that this Council should be composed of nine persons—five clerical and four lay, and that the COUNCIL OF BISHOPS should nominate by majority vote of the effective bishops, twenty traveling elders and sixteen lay members of the Church, and that from these and such other nominees as might be named from the floor of the Conference, without discussion, the General Conference should ballot for the principal members of the Council. The alternate members were to be elected by a separate ballot from the remaining nominees.

The election named the following: Clerical—FRANCIS R. BAYLEY, GEORGE R. BROWN, WALTER C. BUCKNER, J. STEWART FRENCH, and WAIGHTS G. HENRY; lay—MARTIN E. LAWSON, HENRY R. VAN DEUSEN, MARVIN A. CHILDERS, and VINCENT P. CLARKE.

A report of great significance came from the Committee on Location of Boards and commissions of the newly organized Church. This committee, which was representative of all the Jurisdictions, had prior to the Conference met a number of times and in deciding where to recommend the location of the big Boards of the Church, had to give consideration to what it called the "present property holdings of the various Boards, and the effect that removal from one city to another might have upon the combined property interests of The Methodist Church" (Discipline, 1940, Paragraph 1705). It was noted that several corporations set up by various Boards possessed charters in different states, and it was, of course, necessary to guard against forfeiting charter rights, privileges, trust funds, etc., of such corporations. It asked each board carefully to examine its charter and asked the Conference to create a committee whose duty it should be to report to the General Conference a list of all corporations to be continued, accompanied by advice as to what legal steps might be necessary to insure such continuance in the various states.

The gist of the Committee's report was that there should be a major Board in the North (and this was the BOARD OF MISSIONS and Church Extension, all of whose divisions were to be kept in NEW YORK CITY); and one major Board in the South (and this, it was recommended, should be the BOARD OF EDUCATION located at NASHVILLE). The Board of Publication, a major board controlling the publishing interests of the Church, was directed to continue its printing and manufacturing business in the various cities where it had been established and to set up "houses, distributing agencies, and depositories, and offices" wherever it felt should be wise.

Other Boards were located as follows: BOARD OF HOSPITALS AND HOMES, Columbus, Ohio; BOARD OF PENSIONS, Chicago, Ill., and St. Louis, Mo.; Board of Lay Activities, Chicago; Board of Temperance, Washington, D. C.; Commission on WORLD SERVICE AND FINANCE, Chicago; Commission on EVANGELISM, Nashville; Commission on WORLD PEACE, Chicago; Commission on COURSES OF STUDY, Nashville; and the Board of Trustees of The Methodist Church, Cincinnati, Ohio. Subsequently, certain of these Boards moved—Hospitals and Homes and Pensions going to Chicago entirely; and the Commission on World Peace eventually going to Washington.

One feature of the General Conference sessions was the presentation by JOHN R. MOTT, a lay member of the Conference from the Newark Conference, of the plan for correlating Methodist mission work all over the world. Mott, recognized as a missionary statesman, was chairman of the Committee on Missions which presented the way the correlation of the mission work of the three Churches had been worked out; the adoption of his report proceeded almost unanimously. ROY L. SMITH, speaking in support of this report, dramatically extended his arm toward the Atlantic Ocean, just out of the windows, and said in substance, "Let us not take this as 'Just another report.' We are on the edge of the Atlantic Ocean and the waves of this great sea touch all the lands in which we have work. We are a world Church. Let us not forget it."

Another dramatic feature of the Conference occurred on the night when the Board of Missions had its anniversary occasion. The delegates from the many nations where the Church had work, dressed in native costumes and carrying their national banners, formed a long processional, dramatic and inspirational. Evangeline Booth, daughter of General WILLIAM BOOTH, was the speaker for the evening.

Important matters necessary for the ongoing of the newly organized Church were handled by the various committees, and acted upon favorably by the Conference. A variety of reports, especially those dealing with social action, were adopted—notably a statement on war and peace. As the second World War had broken out in Europe, the State of the Church Committee, through ERNEST F. TITTLE, chairman, presented a lengthy report asking the government in Washington "to persevere in the attempt to secure in Europe and in Asia a negotiated peace." The report was heavily slanted toward the pacifist position. In another report regarding "aggressor nations," the Committee called on all members of The Methodist Church to abstain voluntarily from all sales of direct or indirect war material. It asked the government of the United States "to extend the moral embargo on the shipment of war-making materials." However, a motion was made from the floor to amend the report and ask the government itself to embargo oil and steel being sold to JAPAN, then waging war against CHINA. E. F. Tittle refused to accept the amendment and the Conference supported him in refusing to ask for an actual embargo. Other matters such as anti-semitism and opposition to the then Immigration Act of the United States, and pronouncements in re temperance, prohibition, and public morals were all likewise treated. Congress was urged to enact legislation to prohibit all advertising of intoxicating liquor.

The Conference followed up the action of the Uniting Conference in assigning and conveying to the South Central Jurisdiction of The Methodist Church the rights and title of SOUTHERN METHODIST UNIVERSITY in Dallas.

The Conference adjourned on Monday, May 6, after a stirring address by Bishop EDWIN H. HUGHES. "For me these walls now turn to glass. Out yonder in the far distance in this land, in lonely lands beyond the seas, I behold the millions of our people and the millions of those who wait for the saving Word. . . . We have not only the horizontal window through which we view this planet as a subject of redemption, we have a miraculous skylight as well. . . . And as our Saviour said at the close of a conference with his disciples, 'Arise, let us be going.' Bishop NUELSEN called on James Houghton to lead the doxology and Bishop ARTHUR J. MOORE to give the benediction.

1944. The Conference convened in Kansas City, Mo., April 26, and adjourned on May 6. LUD H. ESTES was elected secretary and also acted as editor of the Journal of the Conference. Bishop H. LESTER SMITH, president of the Council of Bishops, called the Conference to order in the morning of April 26, and the entire Conference then participated in a Communion Service led by Bishop HERBERT WELCH.

Almost all the bishops were present and the Conference noted the bishops who had died during the preceding quadrennium. These were: W. A. Ainsworth, Edgar Blake, W. A. Candler, J. R. Chitambar, Matthew Clair, Sr., Collins Denny, H. M. DuBose, Sam Hay, W. A. C. Hughes, Adna Leonard, Charles B. Mitchell, Charles Mead, Thomas Nicholson, and Ernest Waldorf.

The Episcopal Address was read by Bishop Arthur J. Moore, and as the second World War was on, considerable attention was given in the Address to the attitude of the Church toward war and its hopes for peace. A message of Generalissimo CHIANG KAI-SHEK addressed to Bishop CHEN for the Conference, was read, the Conference giving a standing ovation at the end of the Generalissimo's letter. Fraternal addresses were brought by Bishop PICKETT, Bishop Chen, and Bishop O. E. GUERRA on "international night"—representing respectively, India, China and Mexico. Fraternal addresses were heard during the Conference from Benjamin C. Robson, representing the A.M.E. Zion Church; Bishop William C. Bell, the C.M.E.; J. E. Ellis, the Methodist Church of Brazil; and Elias Hernandez, the Methodist Church in Mexico.

On the request that Episcopal supervision was needed in certain lands where there had been missionary bishops in the former M. E. Church, a motion was made to elect a missionary bishop for Africa, with the understanding that the constitutionality of this action would be at once appealed to the Judicial Council. The Judicial Council forthwith ruled that this action was unconstitutional "as no provision for the election of a bishop by the General Conference" was in the Constitution of the Church.

Debate on the war issue: The greatest interest of the Conference centered on the action and pronouncement the Church should take upon the war then raging. Pacifist attitudes and atmosphere had been dominant in the Church and its literature (as well as that of other Christian Churches) until war actually broke in 1941.

Ernest F. Tittle, chairman of the Committee on the State of the Church, brought in a report which called for the Church "to pray for the welfare of those in the armed forces; for their safe return. . . . believing that God has a stake in the victory of peace with justice in the present conflict, we commend our cause to Him, praying thy kingdom come, thy will be done." Against this report which was felt to be weak and negative, a minority of the Committee under CHARLES C. PARLIN brought in a minority report whose key sentences were "in Christ's name, we ask for the blessing of God upon the men in the armed forces and pray for victory. . . . we are well within the Christian position when we assert the necessity of the use of military forces to resist an aggression which would overthrow every right which is held sacred by civilized man."

It was agreed by these two leaders that the Conference would be asked to suspend its rules to allow a formal debate in which representatives selected by each side would have opportunity to speak to the two reports, and that after this the debate would be thrown open to members from the floor. It was so determined. Speaking for the majority report were Henry Hitt Crane (Detroit), Mrs. Nancy Wright (St. Louis), Glenn C. James (Florida), Albert E. Day (Southern California), Edmund Heinssohn (Southwest Texas).

Speaking for the minority report were Charles A. Jones (Ohio), Paul E. Secrest (N. E. Ohio), Nolan B. Harmon (Virginia), Lynn H. Hough (New York East,) with, of course, Mr. Parlin and Dr. Tittle closing the debate for their respective sides just before the ballot. Each speaker was allowed five minutes and the rule was that no applause was to be allowed. The tension was intense—both over the Conference and packed galleries. In the general debate which followed the selected speakers, a number of amendments were offered, most of these in an endeavor to work out some sort of compromise, but all were struck down. The vote was taken "by orders" upon motion of Littell Rust of Tennessee, the ballots being signed by the delegates. The laymen voted to substitute the minority report, 203 to 131; the ministers, 170 to 169. All names were recorded in the Conference Journal. This substituted the minority report (by one vote!) for the majority, but the next day both sides agreed upon a further statement which seemed to clarify the general attitude.

A constructive action of this Conference was the adoption of a plan for a CRUSADE FOR CHRIST, as it came to be called. This was destined to have great success during the ensuing four years. COSTEN J. HARRELL presented reports of the Committee on World Service and Finance in a report upon apportionments, as well as a revision of the Financial Plan. The Conference supported the Committee, although numerous amendments were offered of a technical nature.

There was a majority and minority report also with reference to giving women the right to join annual conferences since they had other lay rights. The Conference decided against this.

It ordered the editor of the Discipline to arrange the Discipline so that all material dealing with the local church should be put in one section rather than scattered throughout the entire book, as local church matters had been until then under the separate boards and agencies. The Board of Lay Activities objected greatly to its local church legislation being taken out of the Lay Activities Board section, and was made the exception by the Conference.

Elections for the Judicial Council were: For an eight-year term. Clergy—Waight G. Henry, Sr., and Charles B. Ketcham; lay—Martin E. Lawson and Henry R. Van Deusen. Francis R. Bayley, Walter C. Buckner, and Stewart French, clergymen, and Marvin A. Childers and Vincent P. Clarke, laymen, had been elected in 1940 for an eight-year term.

The usual necessary routine matters in the way of administrative acts having to do with the mission fields, institutions of the Church, and nominations for various committees were taken care of. Conference adjourned at 5:57 P.M. on Saturday, May 6, with the benediction by Bishop BRUCE BAXTER.

1948. General Conference convened in Mechanics Hall in Boston, Mass., on Wednesday, April 28, at 11:00 A.M. with Bishop PAUL B. KERN, President of the Council of Bishops, presiding. Preceding the opening session, the bishops, delegates, and visitors assembled in historic Trinity Church (Protestant Episcopal) and participated in the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, the administration of which was presided over by Bishop Herbert Welch, assisted by Bishops Kern, Straughn, Hartman, Mondol, Kaung, Willis King, Paul Martin, Paul Garber and Edwin F. Lee. All the bishops were present except B. T. Badley, E. C. Balloch, U. V. W. Darlington, H. M. Dobbs, Roberto Elphick, Juan E. Gattinoni, Carleton Lacy, F. D. Leete, and George A. Miller. Bishops presented from affiliated Methodist Churches were Eleazar Guerra Olivares of Mexico; Cesar Dacorso Filho, Cyrus B. Dorsey, and Isaías Sucasas, of the Methodist Church of Brazil.

The Episcopal Address was read by Bishop G. Bromley Oxnam and reviewed with appreciation and enthusiasm the achievements of the Crusade for Christ during the past quadrennium. Looking ahead, the Address stated that the Council of Bishops in cooperation with the World Service and Finance Commission and the Council of Secretaries had concurred in a plan which would duly be presented looking toward the quadrennium ahead, which was to be a preaching and teaching endeavor. (As it turned out, the Crusade for Christ and its success was the beginning of a regular "quadrennial program" which since all that time has been looked for and planned for by the Church after each General Conference.) The Episcopal Address, in noting the names of the episcopal brethren who had died, listed W. F. Anderson, Bruce R. Baxter, James Cannon, Jr., John L. Decell, Schuyler E. Garth, Lorenzo H. King, Friedrich H. O. Melle, John Louis Nuelsen, Ernest G. Richardson, and John Wesley Robinson.

The Episcopal Address dealt with the freedom of the pulpit, with temperance, and then went into great detail about interdenominational and ecumenical relationships. It called for a reunion of the Churches, saying, "the churches must become The Church. . . we believe that union must be achieved. . . we believe our Lord is calling upon us to unite." Going into the international situation, the Address stated that "the international skies are dark" and declared that in such an hour the Church must lead. This idea was followed out at great length with an analysis of communistic moves in the world, and of selfish nationalism in various places.

Addressing the Conference at various times were Governor Robert F. Bradford of Massachusetts, Samuel M. Cavert of the National Council of Churches, Bishop Eleazar Guerra of Mexico, Bishop Henry K. Sherrill of the Protestant Episcopal Church, Hon. John Foster Dulles, Secretary of State of the United States, Ralph W. Sockman, pastor of Christ Church, New York (a delegate himself but on the program for a special address), and Bishop Ralph A. Ward, concerning the situation in the Far East where he had been a prisoner during the war. Other distinguished visitors before the Conference were the Hon. Arthur S. Flemming, Congressman Walter H. Judd, Bishop J. W. Ernst Sommer of Germany, and Miss Helen Kim.

The Conference adopted a report on a committee to study the Book of Discipline which among other things asked for "prominent and useful facts about the Church as to present-day membership, contributions and organizations to be included in the Discipline." Also, the editor was asked to see that the decisions of the Judicial Council related to paragraphs in the Discipline should be referred to in a notation in the Discipline so that ruling law would be seen to apply there. A special report of the Judicial Council brought to the General Conference during its session held that it was constitutional for the Germany Central Conference to permit the ordination of an elder to take the place of the ordination as deacon, and the ordination as deacon be omitted, that is, in the Germany Central Conference. The Judicial Council held that this permission was constitutional and that there was "no constitutional limitation on the power of the General Conference in this matter." John Stewart French dissented on the ground that The Methodist Church recognized two orders of ministry and that neither of them could be omitted. The Judicial Council also decided that it had no jurisdiction to determine constitutionality of affirmations of faith. Chester A. Smith of the New York Conference had asked if the action of the General Conference of 1944 in approving the second and third so-called Affirmations of Faith published as part of the Orders of Worship was not a violation of the constitution. The Judicial Council reported that they could not see any question of constitutionality involved and that the Judicial Council itself had no jurisdiction over this matter.

The Conference voted to go into the newly organized NATIONAL COUNCIL of the CHURCHES of Christ. Bishop G. Bromley Oxnam was granted permission to speak for this action. The Conference paid tribute to bishops who were to retire, namely, H. Lester Smith, Titus Lowe, Raymond J. Wade, Edwin F. Lee, W. E. Hammaker, C. C. Seleckman, James H. Straughn, and Lewis O. Hartman.

The Conference proposed an amendment to the constitution of the Church which would allow bishops of the Central Conferences an unchallenged vote in the Council of Bishops. Before this, their vote was limited to matters relating to their own particular conferences. During the succeeding quadrennium, this constitutional amendment was adopted by the Church.

The Conference adopted a lengthy report from the Committee on the State of the Church with which all seemed to agree, as Charles A. Jones of Ohio, Charles C. Parlin of Newark, and V. M. Mouser of Louisiana each spoke in support of E. F. Tittle's rather lengthy statement on Church and War, and the Church and Peace. This report called for an international organization and for respect for the Soviet Union and asked that "our respective governments support a continuing process of negotiations on diplomatic higher levels." It also called for the reduction and control of armament, and for economic justice.

A night address was given by Dr. Joshua Loth Liebman on the subject, "Of Medicine and Religion." He was introduced by Bishop Ivan Lee Holt.

The motion to allow each Jurisdiction additional bishops was debated. Each Jurisdiction which had 500,000 church members or less would under this move be entitled to five bishops, and for each additional 600,000 church members, each should be entitled to one additional bishop. J. N. R. Score of Central Texas and chairman of the Committee on Ministry presented this report which was greatly debated. A count vote was called for, but the move lost by 312 to 328. There was the usual debate upon the use of tobacco by the ministry and upon full clergy rights for women, these to be on the same basis as rights for men. The report to give women full rights was not adopted. There was growing tension over the Central Jurisdiction and its bearing upon the matter of racial discrimination in the Church. The Conference adopted as its program for the coming quadrennium an emphasis on educational institutions.

Elected to the Judicial Council were clergymen John T. Alton, Walter C. Buckner (to succeed himself), Walter A. Stanbury, and laymen M. A. Childers (to succeed himself) and J. Ernest Wilkins.

The Conference closed on May 8, after service of worship and consecration led by Bishop James C. Baker.

1952. The 1952 session convened in the Civic Auditorium at San Francisco, Calif., on Wednesday, April 23, at 10:00 A.M., with Bishop Fred P. Corson, President of the Council of Bishops, presiding. Preceding the official opening, the delegates were assembled in the Civic Auditorium and celebrated the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper which was administered by Bishop Herbert Welch with several bishops assisting him.

As the session began the names of the bishops who had died during the quadrennium were called by the secretary: John M. Moore, Edwin F. Lee, Brenton T. Badley, John Calvin Broomfield, Edwin Holt Hughes, Harry Lester Smith, and George Carlton Lacy.

Bishop Oxnam, secretary of the Council of Bishops, reported all bishops present except Robert N. Brooks, W. Y. Chen, U. V. W. Darlington, H. M. Dobbs, Roberto Elphick, J. E. Gattinoni, John Gowdy, C. T. Kaung, Frederick T. Keeney, and Frederick D. Leete. Bishops present representing autonomous Methodist Churches were Isaias Sucasas, Cesar Dacorso, Cyrus B. Dawsey from Brazil; Eleazar Guerra from Mexico; and Hyungki J. Lev from Korea. Lud H. Estes of the Memphis Conference was elected by acclamation as secretary for the 1952 session.

The Episcopal Address was read by Bishop Paul B. Kern on Wednesday night, April 23, and was one of the longest on record, taking two and a half hours to read. It contained a statement on what Methodists believe (see text of this under DOCTRINAL STANDARDS), and this portion of the Address was later ordered printed by the General Conference and made available over the Church. The Address rejoiced in noting the Advance for Christ and His Church as a successful movement during the previous quadrennium; covered such matters as the growing ecumenical movement; the Negro in The Methodist Church in the United States, calling attention to the fact that "we are a Church of many races, both from this country and abroad." It stated in re solving this problem: "When we treat it as a human problem it baffles us; when we approach it as a God-given opportunity, it thrills us." Higher education, theological education, Church school literature, Christian responsibility in civic life, were all noted, and under the topic "Our Changing Episcopacy," the Address suggested that there should be a better way of exchanging bishops across the Jurisdictional lines and of allowing the bishops some relief on what was called "an endless administrative task." There was a suggestion that the requirements for men entering the ministry should be relaxed somewhat so as to allow them to administer the Sacraments.

There was lengthy treatment of the Church and the achievement of peace; freedom of speech in American life and in Methodism was dealt with, due to the fact that it was the era of what became known as "McCarthyism" in the national field. The bishops called for "a free pulpit and a free pew." The Address closed by saying we had a mission to the multitude and that God did not give us a spirit of timidity but a spirit of power and love and self-control.

The Hon. Earl Warren, Governor of California, brought greetings to the Conference and sat through the reading of the Episcopal Address.

One of the most important actions of this Conference was the report of a quadrennial committee which had been established to study and report upon the local church and to make recommendations with regard to its disciplinary structure. The commission brought to the attention of the Conference a lengthy report dealing minutely with the pastoral charge, Church membership, and the Quarterly Conference, and also many details having to do with the ongoing of each local church. It rewrote the Discipline largely in those sections dealing with the local church, and correlated the various activities of each local church into four commissions—Membership and Evangelism, Education, Missions, and Finances.

In the adoption of this report, much time was consumed and many amendments were offered from the floor, but the Commission as a whole saw its report adopted and the Discipline of 1952 embodied practically all the changes it recommended. Bishop Costen J. Harrell had acted as head of the Commission, and Alexander K. Smith of Philadelphia, secretary. A Commission dealing with the proposed establishment of a general Church headquarters made a report, but its conclusion was that if a central headquarters for the boards and agencies was to be desired, serious consideration should be given to the possibility of locating these in the middle west so as to make these readily accessible. The Commission concluded that there was then too much opposition among Church leaders to the idea that there be one general headquarters and recommended that no action be taken.

A Commission, which had been authorized by the General Conference of 1948 to study the ministry, reported and outlined first what might be called the history and philosophy of the Methodist ministry; and next, legislative suggestions which dealt with supply pastors. It concluded that it would not serve the Church to lower the standards of conference membership.

The matter of ministerial recruitment and the seminaries was taken up and proved informative, but no great action was taken. A Commission on Promotion and Cultivation was established in order that there should be an end of duplication, overlapping, and competition in the financial promotion of the general causes of the Church. The Commission was directed to correlate specifically the various bulletins, leaflets, and promotional material issued by the different boards. A quadrennial Advance Committee was to be constituted to have in charge "advance specials" in the week of dedication.

Prior to this General Conference, there had been a commission, which had become known as the Survey Commission, appointed to study the entire structure of the Church. This had made numerous recommendations with reference to the better correlation of the work of the various boards and agencies, some quite sweeping. Some of the big boards objected, and at the General Conference a Committee of Six was appointed to whom were referred all the legislation having to do with the changes and coordination suggested in reference to the various boards. The committee did not make any special recommendations with reference to the Women's Work, or the Board of Missions, or the Board of Education, or any of the large boards, but did handle certain minor offices, such as the Statistical Office, the Transportation Office, and the Commission on the Course of Study, making certain changes in these. The Statistical Office was taken from under the direction of the Book Editor and placed under that of the Council on World Service and Finance; and the Commission on Course of Study was put under the Board of Education. Harold C. Case and Charles C. Parlin were co-chairmen of the Committee of Six. One publishing agent to be known as the Publisher, rather than two coordinate publishing agents, as had been the case for a long time, was called for. The Committee's measures were adopted by the Conference.

Reporting upon the matter of ritual and worship, as well as upon attempts at union, the Methodist Commission on Church Union presented a lengthy report which called special attention to the identity in many instances of the Articles of Religion and rites and ceremonies as between the Protestant Episcopal Church and The Methodist Church. In parallel columns the separate offices of Holy Communion, Confirmation or Reception, Ordination, and Ordinations of Deacons, Priests, and Baptism were printed, as well as of Matrimony and the Articles of Religion. The Commission on Church Union was directed to continue such efforts as it felt might be helpful looking toward further cordial relations between the Protestant Episcopal Church, and indeed with all other evangelical bodies which might wish to discuss union with The Methodist Church.

The Judicial Council members as elected for 1952-1956 were: Clergy—Walter C. Buckner (died Sept. 12, 1953; succeeded by Hawes P. Clarke in 1953), John T. Alton, Charles B. Ketcham (died April 2, 1953), Ralph M. Houston, and Walter A. Stanbury (died March 30, 1954, succeeded by Lester A. Welliver); Lay—Marvin A. Childers, J. Ernest Wilkins, Clarence M. Dannelly, Fred B. Noble.

The Conference, after some pertinent closing remarks by Bishop Herbert Welch, adjourned with the benediction by Bishop Holt at 7:50 P.M., Tuesday, May 6, 1952.

1956. This Conference was held at Minneapolis, Minn., April 25-May 7, 1956, and convened in the Municipal Auditorium there. It reported itself as being the fifth General Conference since the uniting of the three constituent Churches and the forty-fourth General Conference since the establishment of Methodism in America in 1784. Bishop CLARE PURCELL, president of the Council of Bishops, presided over the opening session. The Sacrament of the Lord's Supper was conducted by Bishop Ivan Lee Holt. The Conference received a message from President Dwight D. Eisenhower. The Governor of Minnesota, the Honorable Orville L. Freeman, as well as the Mayor of Minneapolis, welcomed the Conference.

Leon T. Moore of the Philadelphia Conference was elected secretary-designate of the General Conference, to assume his office on Jan. 1, 1957. He was presented by Lud H. Estes who had been secretary of the Conference up until that time and who acted through the 1956 session, but who asked that he be not nominated again as he had reached the time for retirement.

The Conference noted the death during the previous quadrennium of Bishops R. N. Brooks, U. V. W. Darlington, Hoyt M. Dobbs, L. O. Hartman, F. T. Keeney, Paul B. Kern, F. J. McConnell, J. W. E. Sommer. All bishops were reported as being present except Bishops Arvidson, Balloch, Chen (understood to be in prison in China), Elphick, Gattinoni, Gowdy, Kaung, Miller, and Peele.

The Episcopal Address was given by Bishop Fred P. Corson. This reviewed the moves of the Church during the previous quadrennium and outlined the various challenges to the Church for the years to come. It emphasized the idea that Methodism is a Church continually on the march. It noted the success of the other quadrennial programs and expressed and stated that the Church now looks to this General Conference for a program centering in an urgently needed effort to increase the efficiency of the local church, and to make provision for the needs of our institutions of learning. As it turned out, the program adopted by the General Conference for the ensuing four years was to be along these two lines.

The atmosphere during this whole Conference was one of considerable tension due to the increasing opposition expressed by the majority of the Church, especially the Northern, Western and Overseas Conferences, toward having a Central Jurisdiction. This Jurisdiction was composed of the Negro churches, most of which before Union in 1939 had been in connection with the former M. E. Church. It was held to be a "segregated Jurisdiction" and heated attacks had been made upon it, and innumerable memorials had come in, many opposing the whole Jurisdictional pattern. At length, the Committee on Conferences recommended that a constitutional provision be adopted allowing churches and conferences themselves to be taken across Jurisdictional lines when such moves were agreed upon by the parties concerned. This was presented in what became known as Amendment Nine of the Constitution of The Methodist Church. The Amendment was presented by Leonard Slutz of the Ohio Conference and seconded by Nolan B. Harmon of the Virginia Conference, who had been delegated to represent the Southern Conferences. The adoption of this resolution and the sending down of Amendment Nine to the annual conferences immediately relieved the great tension which had been felt over the whole Conference until that moment.

The Conference heard a report from the Advance Committee for the past quadrennium, and looking ahead toward the 1960 Conference. It strengthened the Commission on Church Union, giving it authority to initiate studies looking toward organic union with other bodies.

A lengthy debate ensued on giving full ministerial rights to women, and after debating this two days and failing to adopt numerous amendments, full rights were given to women so they might join annual conferences and be in the traveling connection as other ministers.

Fraternal delegates appearing before the Conference were W. Russell Shearer and H. Guy Chester of the British Methodist Church; S. J. Laws of the C. M. E. Church; Bishop H. R. Heiminger of the E. U. B. Church; Bishop Robert Gibson of the Protestant Episcopal Church; and Jakeiski Muto of the United Church of Japan. The Conference received a telegram from President Syngman Rhee of Korea: "From one who was a member of the 1912 General Conference which met in Minneapolis, greetings to my many friends."

The Conference set up a Commission on the Structure of Methodism Overseas (commonly called COSMOS) which turned out to be a very important one; it took the usual action in creating committees and commissions to look after various interests of the Church. There was more debate on the attitude of the Church toward war, and the attempt to substitute in the Social Creed the words "we stand for the abolition of war." This was objected to by the committee and after a considerable discussion, failed of adoption.

The Judicial Council members for 1956-60 were: Clergy—Lester A. Welliver, Ralph M. Houston, A. Wesley Pugh, J. Russell Throckmorton, and R. Floyd Curl; lay—J. Ernest Wilkins (died Jan. 19, 1959, succeeded by Vincent P. Clarke), Clarence M. Dannelly (resigned Oct. 1956, succeeded by Paul R. Ervin), Donald A. Odell, and Ivan Lee Holt, Jr.

Ralph Sockman preached a sermon on "The Limits of Love" at the Sunday evening service of the General Conference on May 6. On the following Monday morning came the adoption of a great number of reports, Bishop Ivan Lee Holt in the chair driving these forward relentlessly and under time pressure with the hour of adjournment drawing on. A quadrennial program was adopted which was to be published in the 1956 Discipline. The closing service was led by Bishop W. Earl Ledden, who recognized that retirement would come at the Jurisdictional Conferences to Bishops Archer, Harrell, Holt, Pickett, Purcell, Rockey, and Ralph A. Ward. Benediction came at 3:30 P.M., Monday, May 7, as the Conference had extended the time into the afternoon to complete its work.

1960. General Conference convened in the Civil Auditorium Theatre in Denver, Colo., on Thursday, April 28. There was first a communion service presided over by Bishop DONALD H. TIPPETT. The actual session convened at 11:30 A.M. with Bishop GERALD H. KENNEDY presiding. Bishop GLENN PHILLIPS, host bishop of the Conference, introduced the Hon. Stephen L. R. McNichols, the governor of Colorado, who warmly welcomed the Conference. Leon T. Moore was elected secretary. Fifty-nine bishops were present, fifteen absent because of illness or advanced age, and five bishops of autonomous Methodist Churches present.

The Episcopal Address was read by Bishop WILLIAM C. MARTIN that evening. In beginning, Bishop Martin reverently read the names of nine bishops who had died: John Warren Branscomb, D. Stanley Coors, Z. T. Kaung, Frederick DeLand Leete, Titus Lowe, William Walter Peele, Charles Claude Selecman, Ralph Ansel Ward, and Henry Bascom Watts.

The Address reviewed the record of the past four years, reported the total membership "in our churches in America at the close of the last full conference year" as 9,815,451, which was a net gain since Church union of 2,455,272, with 24,381 pastoral charges and 39,236 churches. The membership in lands outside the United States was reported as 874,732. Bishop Martin added that the more than forty Wesleyan bodies in the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL were reporting 19,116,400 Methodists, with a constituency of more than forty million persons.

Special matters taken up in the Episcopal Address under separate headings were Reclaiming Our Theological Heritage; The Methodist Church in the Ecumenical Movement; Missions and Going "Into All the World"; The Church and the Industrial Order; The Jurisdictional System and Racial Brotherhood; Higher Education; and references also to family life and the world mission of the Church. A dramatic moment came when Bishop Martin closed his Address—and this was just after Easter—by pausing and saying: "Christ is Risen! This is our grand affirmation. This central truth is the source of our hope."

It was reported to the Conference that Amendments IX, X, and XI had been carried during the previous quadrennium. Amendment IX elicited special interest having to do with the transfer of churches across jurisdictional lines. A proposed Amendment XII was adopted during the Conference which would enlarge the General Conference from 900 to 1400, with the jurisdictional conferences directed to convene "at the time and place of the General Conference; or not more than sixty days preceding it." This caused great discussion, and as it turned out through the ensuing quadrennium, the proposed amendment was not adopted.

President Eisenhower sent greetings to the Conference, and Harold Roberts, president of the World Methodist Council, was presented and addressed the Conference.

Other actions of the Conference were: the Interjurisdictional Relations Committee to study and recommend changes in the jurisdictional organization was continued; the Conference secretary reported that 283 memorials had come in to the Conference asking to retain the jurisdictional system, and sixty asked to abolish the Central Jurisdiction. These were all referred during Conference to the Committee on Conferences. A Commission to revise the hymnal was named and commissioned; four regions which were to be "Lands of Decision" were named, with the information that special resources in personnel and funds would be poured into these under the mission advance program during the next quadrennium. These lands were: Pakistan; Southern Rhodesia; Argentina; and Taiwan, Hong Kong, and the lands of Southeast Asia. A formal study of the ministry, which had been previously ordered, declared that The Methodist Church "needs 8,000 new ministers each year." The Conference decided, after some discussion in re constitutionality, that the residence of a bishop in any one Area be limited to twelve years, and that no years served by a bishop before 1960 would be counted in the application of this provision. There was a minority report against this, and considerable debate, but the motion carried.

The Conference had the usual lengthy discussion concerning the Jurisdictional system and efforts to amend it. The General Conference continued, of course, the Judicial Council members who had been elected in 1956 for an eight-year term, and added the following: Clergy—Lester A. Welliver, A. Wesley Pugh, W. Lemuel Clegg (died Nov. 18, 1961; succeeded by John D. Humphrey), R. Floyd Curl, and J. Russell Throckmorton; lay—Paul R. Ervin, Theodore M. Berry, Vincent P. Clark, and Donald A. Odell.

The usual rather large number of committees and commissions were created and membership to same elected. The Conference adjourned on May 9, 1960. There was a closing address by Bishop Gerald Kennedy in which he recalled what President Eisenhower had said to the Council of Bishops when they visited him and when they reminded him of the visit of Bishops Coke and Asbury, only two Methodist bishops as they were then, to George Washington, the first President. Referring to the comparative simplicity of the days of George Washington, President Eisenhower said that then the whole federal establishment consisted of only 150 persons; President Eisenhower commenting on the present day, said, "The larger our organization becomes and the more complicated it becomes, the more necessary it is to keep clear in our minds what our aims are, our purpose, and our goal." Bishop Kennedy commented: "I think that is true of The Methodist Church. With all our size, with all our machinery, we have to remember the main witness we have to bear: that a man may know in his heart that he has been saved and his sins are forgiven. . . . that this inner warmth of heart somehow has to be demonstrated in his social relationships and insight. That our theology is not something primarily that we argue about, but something we sing in our hymns. That we have been called in every generation to spread the good word of confidence, to believe that in His gospel there is an answer to every human problem. . . ." (Daily Christian Advocate, May 9, 1960, p. 647)

Bishop Kennedy pronounced the benediction at 12:45 P.M., May 9, after which the Doxology was sung and the Conference adjourned.

1964. The General Conference convened in the Civic Arena at Pittsburgh, Pa., Sunday evening, April 26, with Bishop PAUL N. GARBER, president of the Council of Bishops, presiding. The Sacrament of the Lord's Supper had been administered that afternoon in Trinity Cathedral (Episcopal) with Bishop W. EARL LEDDEN in charge. Bishop JAMES H. STRAUGHN offered the opening prayer of the evening. All bishops were reported present except Enrique Carlos Balloch, W. Y. Chen, Dana Dawson, Charles Wesley Flint, Juan Gattinoni, Wilbur E. Hamaker, Edward W. Kelly, and J. Ralph Magee. Practically all delegates were present except "because of conditions beyond their control," the Central Germany, East China, Foochow, and the other conferences in China were absent. The Episcopal Address was read by Bishop Gerald H. Kennedy. It noted with solemnity the deaths of Bishops R. E. Jones, Ralph Cushman, B. W. Hodge, W. T. Watkins, Roberto Elphick, B. F. Stockwell, George A. Miller, H. A. Boaz, J. W. E. Bowen, A. Frank Smith, G. Bromley Oxnam, Julio M. Sabanes, John Gowdy, John M. Springer, Clare Purcell, and Theodor Arvidson during the past four years.

The Address reviewed the situation at the time and stated that 496 new Methodist churches in the United States had been organized during the past quadrennium; that the number of churches then was 38,990; that the Church's annual budget was over half a billion dollars, and that at that time there were 30,000 Methodist pastors. It dealt with the ministry and recruitment for the same; with the laity and its opportunity; made special reference to better racial integration as the live issue of the day, stating that "we believe that this General Conference should insist upon the removal from its structure of any mark of racial segregation. . . . this will cost the Negro Methodists some of their minority rights. It will cost some white Methodists the pain of rooting out deep-seated and long-held convictions concerning racial relations, but God Almighty is moving toward a world of interracial brotherhood. . . ."

Missions, ecumenicity, social responsibility, and a look ahead closed the Address, "We are that Methodist Church, claiming its heritage proudly and facing its future confidently through faith in Jesus Christ our Lord and our Redeemer."

J. Wesley Hole of the Southern California-Arizona Conference was elected as secretary-designate to succeed Leon T. Moore.

A report made by what was called the Committee of Thirty-six (the Interjurisdictional Committee) had to do with necessary structural moves in doing away the Central Jurisdiction. There was a long parliamentary tangle over the question as to whether or not the General Conference could compel an annual conference, which was called "the basic body in the Church," to put into its own membership those whom the General Conference might order it to admit. This matter was not clearly decided and was held in abeyance as it was superseded by a report of the Commission on Church Union (also involving this matter) which presented the formal PLAN OF UNION with the E. U. B. Church point by point. The report was presented seriatim in its entirety by Charles C. Parlin, who explained all moves which had been made looking toward the contemplated union up to that date. A strong speech favoring union with the E. U. B. Church was made by Carl Ernst Sommer of Southwest Germany.

A move to call the new church The United Methodist Church, as presented by the Commission, was adversely voted upon by the Conference though it was explained that this vote was advisory only to the Commission on Union. On the motion to have no mention of a Central Jurisdiction in the proposed union, the Conference by a close standing vote, gave its approval.

Other important reports came in, one having to do with a study of the episcopacy. The Committee on Conferences presented a majority and minority report which would make the Order of Deacon an office, not an order. There was quite a debate on this, but the whole matter was referred back to a committee empowered to continue studying the ministry and directed to report in 1968.

Bishop EDWIN E. VOIGT for the Commission on Worship formally presented to the Conference the new Methodist Hymnal. It was adopted by acclamation after one motion from the floor had been made that The Battle Hymn of the Republic be deleted. Bishop Wicke in the chair ruled that the motion was dead for want of a second.

Elected to the Judicial Council for terms expiring in 1972: Clergy—Lester A. Welliver, A. Wesley Pugh, and Murray H. Leiffer; lay—Leon M. Hickman and Samuel W. Witwer. J. Henry Chitwood, clergyman, later served from 1965-68, succeeding John D. Humphrey, who resigned.

The Conference also granted autonomy to BURMA, CUBA, LIBERIA, and SUMATRA and made certain other adjustments with reference to overseas conferences and missions, provided that they each should meet the requirements which had been stipulated for achieving autonomy. Liberia was to be made into a Central Conference and so was Pakistan.

Bishop Herbert Welch, 105 years old, was presented to the Conference and stated that the first conference he saw was in 1888 and that he had been present at all the rest "with three or four exceptions," but that this particular conference was unprecedented in the "number, delicacy and difficulty of the major problems it had been called upon to face."

The Conference adjourned after paying a tribute to Leon T. Moore, its retiring secretary, and hearing an inspiring and able closing statement by Bishop LLOYD C. WICKE. The closing benediction was by Bishop JAMES C. BAKER on Friday, May 8.

1966. An Adjourned Session of the 1964 General Conference convened in the International Ballroom of the Conrad Hilton Hotel, Chicago, Ill., on Tuesday, Nov. 8,

1966, at 8:30 A.M. Bishop RICHARD C. RAINES, president of the Council of Bishops, presided. The Conference was held pursuant to the direction of the 1964 Conference itself that it be called in an Adjourned Session to act upon the pending Plan of Union with the E.U.B. Church; and the receiving of a report of progress in the elimination of the Central Jurisdiction. The Judicial Council held in a decision given April 23, 1965 that the session "must be confined to matters fairly embraced within the two items referred to above—unless the General Conference by subsequent action orders otherwise." (Decision 227, Journal 1964, p. 2825.)

Prior to the session, a service of Holy Communion was held in the Chicago Temple the evening before with Bishop O. EUGENE SLATER in charge, and Bishop FREDERICK B. NEWELL delivering the Communion Sermon. The absence of many delegates at this adjourned session because of conditions beyond their control was reported of the following Conferences: Central Germany, Czechoslovakia, East China, Foochow, Hinghwa, Kiangsi, Mid-China, North China, Shantung, West China, and Yenping. Certain of the affiliated autonomous Churches however sent delegates, namely, Brazil, Burma, Indonesia, United Church of Christ in Japan, Korean Methodist Church, Methodist Church of Mexico, and the United Church of Christ in Okinawa. Mayor Richard J. Dailey of Chicago was presented by Bishop THOMAS M. PRYOR, the host bishop, and welcomed the Conference.

It was understood that the Plan of Union, which was to be the constitution of the new Church, was to be adopted or rejected as a whole, and that while amendments were possible, these would have to be referred back to the Committee for adjustment with the E.U.B. commissioners, which of course would slow matters considerably. The E.U.B. brethren were meeting also at the same time and in the same hotel and it was understood they would likewise have to pass on the whole Plan. Bishop Lloyd C. Wicke, who was chairman of the Ad Hoc Committee of the two negotiating bodies, made a lengthy, detailed presentation covering all major points.

A report of the Committee on Interjurisdictional Relations was in the meantime presented by Leonard Slutz of Ohio. The Jurisdictions were involved in the Plan of Union in that the Central Jurisdiction was not to be mentioned (nor of course allowed) in the Plan of Union, and therefore its conferences were necessarily to be assimilated into the five geographic Jurisdictions if the Plan carried. There was considerable discussion upon this, and debate over an amendment which would have directed the annual conferences and not requested them to absorb completely the Central Jurisdiction by 1972. The majority report presented by Mr. Slutz did not favor making this a mandated move, but a requested one. The majority report was eventually adopted.

The Judicial Council having been asked for a decision regarding possible doctrinal differences decided that in the proposed Plan of Union, inclusion of the Confession of Faith of the E.U.B. Church did not revoke, alter, or change the Methodist Articles of Religion, nor establish any new standards. Its decision meant that the new constitution which was the Plan of Union might be adopted by a two-thirds vote of the members of the several annual conferences present and voting as provided for in the adoption of a regular amendment to the constitution of The Methodist Church; and therefore would not require a three-fourths majority of the votes of the annual conference membership as would have been the case with a doctrinal change. The Judicial Council's report was not unambiguous in giving its reasons, and the General Conference Journal reported that one member of the Judicial Council had dissented from the decision. The decision stood, however, and guided the Conferences in their voting through the ensuing two years.

The matter of term episcopacy and its standing in the new constitution was inquired of, and the language of the constitution cited. The matter of elective district superintendents was debated, but upon the request of the chairman of the Ad Hoc Committee, this was not to be written in the constitution as a constitutional matter, but kept in a statute, resting as it always has upon Methodist common law and practice. Charles Parlin of Northern New Jersey presented the Plan of Union item by item and eventually, after many questions and efforts to amend had been before the house, the report as a whole was adopted. The vote cast was 749 in favor; 40 opposed; 5 who abstained. A two-thirds majority necessary to adopt a constitutional amendment was thus had, and Bishop ROY SHORT, presiding, announced that, "The Conference has approved union with the Evangelical United Brethren Church." There occurred a standing ovation during which Bishop MUELLER, the senior bishop of the E.U.B. Church, was brought to the platform and addressed the Conference fittingly. He announced that his Conference had just approved the Plan of Union by a seventy-five percent vote.

Matters of enabling legislation were dealt with, and the Conference adjourned with the benediction by Bishop GEORGE E. EPP of the E.U.B. Church on Nov. 11, 1966.

1968. The General Conference of The Methodist Church, in what was to be the last session, convened in the Crystal Ballroom of the Baker Hotel, Dallas, Texas, Monday, April 22, at 8:30 A.M., with Bishop Donald H. Tippet, president of the Council of Bishops, presiding. The business of the morning was closing up in proper order the work of The Methodist Church in order to go into The United Methodist Church immediately to be organized. The Conference was in some confusion owing to the overcrowded conditions of the room in which the meeting was held, with no regular seats assigned to the delegates. Certain important reports were heard, one dealing with the quadrennial emphasis, one from the Commission on Promotion and Cultivation, one from the COORDINATING COUNCIL (which it was understood would go out of existence in the new Church); one from the World Family Life Committee; and certain other reports and announcements. Before adjournment, Bishop Tippet announced that the E.U.B. Conference, holding its final session also, had just elected Dr. PAUL WASHBURN bishop on the first ballot; Bishop Tippet also paid a tribute to J. Wesley Hole who was asking to be relieved of the General Conference secretaryship. Bishop CHARLES BRASHARES in a final prayer thanked God for the work which had been done by The Methodist Church through the past years, saying in conclusion: "And so rejoicing as we go forward, we go with great faith in order to thank Thee in that faith for things that are still to come." Adjournment was at about 1:25 P.M.

GENERAL CONFERENCES OF THE UNITED METHODIST CHURCH, 1968-1970

1968. The Uniting Conference—or Organizing Conference—of The United Methodist Church convened in the Dallas Memorial Auditorium, Dallas, Texas, on Tuesday, April 23, 1968, at 8:30 A.M. with Bishop DONALD TIPPETT presiding. There was a dramatic processional and solemn program of union in which Bishop Tippett, Bishop REUBEN H. MUELLER, of the E.U.B. Church, and Bishop LLOYD C. WICKE took part, and a reading of the declaration of union by Bishops Mueller and Wicke respectively. Many persons took part in the service of union representing the different agencies and elements of the Churches then joining. Previous to this morning session, the General Conference and all visitors, of whom there were something like 9,000 to 10,000 present, participated in a Communion Service on the night of the 22nd at the Civic Auditorium at which Bishop NOLAN B. HARMON preached the Communion Sermon. This was possibly as large a gathering for a single communion service as the Church had ever seen.

As the morning session on the 23rd got underway, Bishop W. KENNETH POPE, the host bishop, presented the Hon. John Connally, Governor of Texas, who welcomed the Conference on what he called "a very significant" occasion. "I do so as a Methodist; I do so as governor of this state." Dr. ALBERT OUTLER delivered the sermon as part of the formal ceremonies of union on Tuesday morning, April 23. Charles D. White of the Western North Carolina Conference was elected secretary of the Uniting Conference.

Fraternal delegates presented were: The Very Reverend Ernest Marshall Howse, former moderator and present deputy moderator of the United Church of Canada, who had been selected by the rather large number of other fraternal delegates present to be their spokesman. Presented for recognition also were Dr. William Benfield of the Presbyterian Church of the United States; Dr. Albert Baily, J.P., a lay representative of the British Methodist Church; and a number of other fraternal delegates including Bishop Robert F. Gibson of the Protestant Episcopal Church. Later during the session, the most Rev. John Joseph Carberry, the Roman Catholic Archbishop of St. Louis, was presented by Bishop EUGENE FRANK. He spoke as chairman of the United States Catholic Bishops Committee on Ecumenical and Interreligious Affairs and thanked God "... for this tremendous, wonderful experience, in new life, you might say, between us. We are living in a different world, and this spirit of understanding and mutual love has replaced a sort of a coldness, if you will, or even a distrust or a lack of knowledge of each other which may have characterized our relationships in the past."

The Episcopal Address for all the bishops of both Churches was delivered by Bishop Lloyd C. Wicke. It was signed by one hundred bishops of The United Methodist Church, effective and retired. The Address recorded with regret the deaths during the quadrennium of Bishops Dana Dawson, Edward W. Kelly, Jr., Charles W. Flint, Ferdinand Sigg, W. Vernon Middleton, Alexander P. Shaw, Marquis LaFayette Harris, Ivan Lee Holt, A. Raymond Grant, and P. C. B. Balaram. The Address, as was fitting, dealt largely with the uniting of the two Churches and outlined the path ahead. It paid special attention to almost total urbanization of the nation and how the city had come to be a dominant fact in the present-day life. Also how the Church should meet this challenge, as well as the challenge represented by the youth of the day. A strong desire was expressed to effect reunion with "our brethren of the African Methodist Episcopal, African Methodist Episcopal Zion, and the Christian Methodist Episcopal Churches, who share our common privileges." Important social matters, especially those dealing with race and public morals, were taken up, and the war in Vietnam was treated.

"Let the Church condemn the institution of war for what it is—a transvaluation of every value dear to the heart of Christ. May we resolve to cast our lot with men everywhere in removing these inherited impediments: illiteracy, hunger, disease, poverty, and other corroding disabilities which are among the major causes of war and for which there is an ample remedy" (Journal, p. 253.)

The Conference itself dealt with many matters of great import which had to do with the ongoing of the United Church (see Methodism in the United States, Uniting Conference). The report of the Committee on Interjurisdictional Matters, with its recommendations to abolish completely the Central Jurisdiction, took up much time of the Conference, as there was a minority report requesting that a target date be set for the complete absorption of eleven Negro Conferences yet based upon race, and proposing a constitutional amendment to effect elimination of these conferences not later than the Jurisdictional Conferences of 1972. This was not accepted, and the majority report was adopted as presented by Leonard Slutz of Ohio, who spoke for the majority of the Committee on Conferences, and also had been chairman of the quadrennial Commission on Interjurisdictional Relations. Mr. Slutz affirmed that the adoption of compulsory legislation at this time would tend to delay and "hinder plans now in progress, and seriously jeopardize the spirit of good will and understanding so necessary to make structural changes . . . a significant step toward the much greater objective of genuine brotherhood and an inclusive church" (Journal, p. 812). The racial issue with the status of the existing Negro conferences influenced many actions of this Conference, as it has done in every General Conference since 1939.

Elected to the Judicial Council by the Uniting Conference for the 1968-72 term were: Clergy—Murray H. Leiffer, Charles B. Copher, I. Lynd Esch, Ralph M. Houston, Hoover Rupert; lay—Leon E. Hickman, Kathryn M. Grove, Theodore M. Berry, and Samuel W. Witwer.

The Conference voted to raise a $20,000,000 Fund for Reconciliation, which was started by a heavy subscription from the bishops and a general collection from the Conference. It also adopted a quadrennial plan which took as its slogan "A New Church in a New World," and outlined for the coming quadrennium a program of study in the local churches dealing with Bible study; and outlining a plan for carrying through the purposes of the Fund for Reconciliation.

The Conference adjourned after a closing statement by Bishop Eugene M. Frank, the newly elected chairman of the Council of Bishops, and the benediction by Bishop William C. Martin, on May 4, 1968.

1970. The General Conference met in special session at St. Louis, Mo., on April 20, following a directive of its own given in Dallas in 1968, for the purpose of hearing reports on processes involved in completing the merger of the two former Churches into The United Methodist Church. The new book of Discipline, the mergers of several annual conferences, and the creation of certain general and local church structures new to all United Methodists, were to be considered.

Bishop Reuben H. Mueller called the session to order, after a Communion service in which the conference membership participated. Charles D. White continued as secretary. The Episcopal Address was delivered by Bishop J. GORDON HOWARD. This stressed present conditions in the world with a review of "inner group tensions"; the war then going on in Vietnam; and affirmed, "It must be remembered that what happens here in St. Louis will have repercussions in Tokyo, New Delhi, Freetown, Frankfurt and Santiago. . . . Our parish is the whole world, and a world-wide Church . . . demands a world-wide concern." The address concluded by stressing "the unity we seek" not only for the UMC but for the whole Church of God.

Reporting to the General Conference were certain groups set up in Dallas. These were notably on (1) structure; (2) doctrine and doctrinal standards; and (3) social principles for the new denomination. Reports given at St. Louis simply stated that progress was being made in the respective studies, and that final reports would come at the 1972 General Conference.

Approximately 950 delegates comprised this conference. Sessions had been planned to continue for only five days as it was expected that the contemplated business would be taken care of in that time. Considerable debate occurred over modifying the general budget of the church as this had been adopted for the quadrennium, for the purpose of making funds otherwise designated available for certain educational institutions of Negro Methodists. Financial adjustments were eventually worked out.

Matters incident to the dissolution of the Central Jurisdiction enlisted much time of the conference. Upon the last afternoon, April 25, with Bishop W. KENNETH GOODSON in the chair, it was discovered that due to the departure of delegates no quorum was present. Bishop Goodson thereupon declared the conference adjourned, saying humorously that "all unfinished business becomes unfinished business." He called upon Bishop JOHN WESLEY LORD, the new president of the Council of Bishops, to close the conference, which Bishop Lord did with a few brief remarks and the benediction.

GENERAL CONFERENCES OF THE CHURCH OF THE UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST, 1815-1946

1815. The first General Conference of the Church of the United Brethren in Christ convened June 6 in Bonnet's Schoolhouse, near Mt. Pleasant, Westmoreland Co., Pa., because it was equidistant between the "Old Conference" of the East and the "Ohio District." These two conferences were engaged in considerable debate over several issues of which the most serious and immediate was that of the validity and relevance of the Discipline adopted by the former body in 1813 and revised in 1814. Although he was accused of being "untruthful" and acquitted after an investigation by a committee of three presiding elders, Bishop CHRISTIAN NEWCOMER presided over what he himself described as a gathering in which, "instead of love and unanimity, the spirit of hatred and discord seemed to prevail."

The chief business of the Conference was consideration of the Confession of Faith and Discipline. Reflecting the influence of PHILIP WILLIAM OTTERBEIN and earlier Confessions, the Confession of 1815 presented little that was new and declared freedom in the observance of sacraments. On the other hand, the Discipline reflected in a number of areas the 1808 translation of the Methodist Discipline from the English into the German. But there were also some basic dissimilarities. The United Brethren Discipline provided for the election of bishops to a four-year-term, rather than for a lifetime; permitted members of the Church to elect delegates to General Conference and to control local affairs; and gave the ministers "a large measure of discretion and authority in what pertained to their office and work."

Fourteen of the eighteen authorized delegates participated in the Conference, which continued through June 7. They were Christian Newcomer, Abraham Hiestand, ANDREW ZELLER, Daniel Troyer, George Benedum, Christian Crum, Isaac Niswander, HENRY SPAYTH, John Snyder, Abraham Mayer, Henry Kumlér, Sr., Abraham Troxel, Christian Berger, and Jacob Baulus.

Minutes of the first General Conference are sparse and must be augmented by observations of Newcomer and Spayth and the contents of the Discipline which was printed in 1816.

1817. The Conference met at Mt. Pleasant, Pa., June 2, with twelve delegates in attendance: Christian Newcomer, Andrew Zeller, Abraham Mayer, Joseph Hoffman, John Snyder, Henry Kumlér, Sr., Jacob Dehof, Henry Spayth, L. Kramer, Dewalt Mechlin, C. Roth, and H. Ow. The conference lasted through June 4.

Although there was still considerable reaction against any kind of organization and regulation, the Discipline of 1815 was reaffirmed with few minor changes. Conference authorized the printing of 300 Disciplines in German and 100 in English. For the first time since Martin Boehm and Philip William Otterbein, two bishops were elected: Christian Newcomer and Andrew Zeller, a native of Berks County, Pa., who had become a member of the first annual conference held in Ohio in 1810. The founding of the Muskingum Conference (covering several counties of Western Pennsylvania and the eastern part of Ohio) was authorized.

The minutes of the 1817 General Conference carries no mention of the "Social Conference" of a committee of six with a similar group from the Evangelical Association. This matter received considerable notice in the journal of the 1816 General Conference of the Evangelical Association.

1821. The Conference convened at Dewalt Mechlin's home near Mt. Pleasant, Fairfield Co., Ohio, May 15, and gave indication that the character of the sect was changing. First, of the seventeen delegates in attendance, only three, exclusive of Bishops Newcomer and Zeller (Henry Kumlér, Sr., George Benedum, and Lewis Kramer), had attended previous conferences. Second, two of the new men (John McNamar and Nathaniel Havens) were the first delegates to a General Conference whose native tongue was English. Third, the Conference took a firm anti-slavery stand, the essence of which found its way into the 1821 Discipline. Fourth, indicative of the shifting center of the United Brethren Church away from Pennsylvania, this Conference was the first of eleven successive sessions to be held in Ohio.

In other significant action, the Conference "initiated better methods in securing support for the ministry" through circuit and class stewards, although Drury felt that concern for the welfare of the city minister was sadly lacking. Also, in the field of social concerns, the emphasis was shifted away from the drunkard alone to the manufacturers of alcoholic beverages. A motion was adopted prohibiting preachers from operating distilleries; but there was confusion when the matter of laymen as operators of distilleries was discussed. The matter was finally referred to the annual conferences until the next General Conference. The revision of the Discipline authorized by this Conference was again ordered to be printed in both German and English for the benefit of the English-speaking members of the Church.

Bishops Christian Newcomer and Andrew Zeller presided over the conference. Newcomer was re-elected to the bishopric; but Zeller retired because of ill health and was replaced by Joseph Hoffman, a native of Cumberland County, Pa., who had become an itinerant in 1805.

1825. The General Conference opened its session at the home of Jacob Shaup in Tuscarawas County, Ohio, May 7, with Bishops Newcomer and Hoffman presiding. Of the twenty-four delegates, six had been members of the 1815 Conference (Bishop Newcomer, Henry Kumler, Sr., Christian Berger, Henry Spayth, Abraham Mayer, and Andrew Zeller), a fact which added to the stability of the conference.

Once again the presence of delegates whose native tongue was English (Nathaniel Havens, who had been a delegate in 1821, and William Stewart) prompted reluctant recognition of the fact that the English language was making itself felt within a denomination that had its roots in the German settlements of Pennsylvania. In addition to printing a bi-lingual Discipline, the Conference passed a resolution reading: "Resolved that, if necessary, an English as well as a German secretary shall be elected at an annual conference."

Considerable attention was devoted by this Conference to the training, support, and decorum of the ministry: (1) the questions put to candidates for the ministry were revised; (2) the section of the Confession of Faith dealing with baptism was revised to provide a means for dealing with a minister who privately or publicly condemned the mode of baptism practiced by another; (3) annual conferences were instructed to elect presiding elders who would continually travel within the bounds of their districts and who would be paid a salary equal to that of other itinerant preachers; and (4) an annual public collection at each appointment of every circuit was authorized for the support of bishops at the maximum salaries allowed for other itinerant preachers ($160 annually for married men and $80 for bachelors). While the latter two items were necessitated by the growing realization that a stronger and more efficient itinerant system depended to a large degree upon the financial support of its leaders, implementation of the resolutions was not readily achieved.

Prior to the re-election of Bishop Newcomer and the election of HENRY KUMLER, SR., to the bishopric, the Conference decreed that a second ordination was not necessary when a man was elected Bishop, even though both Bishops Hoffman and Zeller had been so ordained. The election of Kumler, a native of Lancaster County, Pa., continued the influence of Germans from the area in which the denomination arose, despite its shifting center westward. Indicative of this shifting center was the sanctioning by the Conference of the prior actions of the Miami Conference of Ohio by which the Scioto Conference was formed out of the area east of the Black Swamp. As a result of this action, the denomination now had four annual conferences: Original or Hagerstown (1800), Miami (1810), Muskingum (1818), and Scioto (1825).

In other action, the Conference also took steps "to renew the fraternal intercourse" between the U. B. Church and the M. E. Church and defined as fitting subjects to receive the Lord's Supper "all true Christians" and "all who are penitent, seeking the salvation of their souls."

1829. Conference convened at the home of Dewalt Mechlin in Fairfield County, Ohio, May 15, and met the problem of secret societies head-on. It supported the annual conferences that were threatening to expel those persons who had allied themselves with Freemasonry unless they repented. Inasmuch as there appeared to be more Freemasons among the English-speaking ministers and converts, the animosity of some of the German-speaking members of the denomination toward their brethren was rekindled over this issue. Nevertheless, Lawrence reports that "all the members of the Conference, then numbering sixty-two [sic], including those who had joined the Masons, appeared heartily to have endorsed the action taken."

Bishops Newcomer and Kumler, who presided over the Conference, were re-elected to another term; but Bishop Newcomer lived less than a year after the Conference adjourned, leaving Kumler to supervise the affairs of the denomination alone until 1833. Two important changes were made in the structure of annual conferences. (1) the Miami Conference, which had been divided in 1825, was once again split, this time at the Ohio-Indiana line and the Ohio River. The new conference, which included sections of Indiana and Kentucky, was called the Indiana Conference; (2) in the East, the "Old" Conference (also called "Hagerstown Conference") was divided so that all of the churches in Virginia and in Washington and Allegheny Counties, Md., were retained as the Hagerstown Conference, while the remainder of the original conference should be called the Harrisburg Conference. The latter change was consummated in 1831; and eventually the new areas came to be known as the Virginia Conference and the Pennsylvania Conference.

After hearing a presentation from the newly created M. P. CHURCH, which included an invitation to union with that body, the Conference politely responded that such a matter was the concern of the membership of the Church and not of the General Conference. However, there appears to have been no effort to bring the matter to the attention of the membership. Drury suggests that "the United Brethren were too well satisfied with the prospect before Church at that time to take new alliances into account."

This was the first General Conference to elect both a German and an English secretary.

1833. The General Conference convened May 14 in the Dresbach Church on the line between Pickaway County and Fairfield County, Ohio. Although the body again elected both a German and an English Secretary, the minutes for the 1833 session are extremely inadequate; and it is necessary to reconstruct the action of the Conference from other sources as A. W. Drury has done.

Henry Kumler was reelected bishop and two new bishops were named: Samuel Hiestand, a native of Virginia but now a member of the Ohio Miami Conference, and WILLIAM BROWN, a native of Cumberland County, Pa.

Revisions in the Discipline provided for the election of one or more Bishops instead of two, reduced the General Conference representation of each annual conference to two delegates for the entire conference instead of two for each district of the conference, declared that the General Conference "shall have no power to change the CONFESSION OF FAITH or to change the rules of the Discipline," and stipulated that presiding elders be elected for one year instead of four.

The General Conference provided for establishing the Printing Establishment according to a notice published in the first issue of The Religious Telescope, Dec. 31, 1834. However, it appears that the authorization to establish a religious paper was turned over for implementation to the Scioto Conference, which in 1834 elected three trustees "to manage the concerns of the printing press at Circleville, Pickaway County, Ohio": George Dresbach, Jonathan Dresbach, and John Russel. John Kunse (Coons) was named treasurer; and subsequently, William R. Rhinehart was hired as editor of The Religious Telescope. Rhinehart had attempted a religious publication, The Union Messenger, in Hagerstown, Md.; but like the Miami Conference's Zion's Advocate, launched in 1829, it had failed.

Two new annual conferences were authorized: the Sandusky Conference in Ohio and the Wabash Conference in Indiana.

1837. The General Conference, consisting of sixteen delegates from eight annual conferences, convened at Germantown, Ohio, May 9. Bishop Samuel Hiestand delivered the opening sermon. Along with Bishop Henry Kumler, Sr., he was re-elected to another term. JACOB ERB, a native of Manheim, Pa., was named to succeed Bishop Brown, whose absence from the General Conference was indicative of his disinclination toward the office he had held for four years.

The Conference adopted a constitution for the Printing Establishment and re-elected the following persons associated with that enterprise: Trustees, George Dresbach, Jonathan Dresbach, and John Russel; and Editor of The Religious Telescope, WILLIAM R. RHINEHART. WILLIAM HANBY was named Book Agent and Treasurer.

Acting in the shadow of the revision in the Discipline made in 1833 to the effect that "... nothing shall be done by the said conference which would in anywise affect or change the Articles of Faith, neither the spirit nor meaning of the rules or Discipline as they now stand," the 1837 Conference adopted a "constitution" which began with a carefully worded preamble: "We, as members of the United Brethren in Christ. . ." The purpose of the Constitution was stated in the following words: ". . . in order to retain a perfect union, accomplish the ends of justice and equity, insure ecclesiastical as well as domestic tranquility, provide for the common interest of the Church, promote the general welfare of society, and to secure the blessings of the gospel to ourselves, our posterity, and our fellow-men in general. . ."

As Drury observes, "Beyond the securing of definiteness, fixed character, and harmony of practice, the Constitution presented little that was specially significant. Pro rata representation of the annual conferences in the General Conference, however, was definitely provided for. . ." The formula for that representation was one delegate for each 500 members, with any district of less than 500 members entitled to the one delegate.

The promoters of the Constitution, which was unanimously adopted after minor amendments, were William Hanby and William Rhinehart.

1841. The General Conference, convening May 10, at Dresbach's Church, on the line between Pickaway and Fairfield Counties, Ohio, addressed itself again to the matter of a constitution, but with little reference to the 1837 Constitution.

During the interim since the 1837 Conference, the matter had been freely discussed and lines had been formed by those who supported the move for a constitution, and those who felt that what was good enough in the past was good enough for the future. Led by Henry G. Spayth, J. McGaw, and J. J. GLOSSBRENNER, seven delegates voted against the drawing up of a constitution while fifteen delegates carried the motion. Following the vote, a nine-man committee was appointed to draw up a new constitution. Two significant aspects of the committee's membership were that neither William Rhinehart nor William Hanby, both of whom were closely associated with the 1837 venture, was a member of the group, and that several of the original opponents of the constitution were now responsible for formulating it. J. J. Glossbrenner explained his membership in these words: "If there was to be a constitution, I wanted to help to make it as good as possible."

When the committee had completed its job, the 1837 Constitution had been modified in language and articles. Among the new items were a prohibition against membership in secret societies, and a prohibition against slavery. Dropped from the old document was the pro rata principle because of the objection some sections of the Church had against counting their members. Changed was the provision of 1837 that a unanimous rule would be required to repeal the resolutions; the new formula called for a "request of two-thirds of the whole society" before a change in the constitution could be made. However, it was not clear as to how this majority was to be determined.

In other actions, the 1841 Conference re-elected Bishop Henry Kumler, Sr., and Bishop Jacob Erb (Bishop Hiestand had died in the second year of his term). Named to their first term as bishop were HENRY KUMLER, Jr., and JOHN COONS. WILLIAM HANBY, who had taken over as Editor of The Religious Telescope after William Rhinehart was forced to resign in 1839, was elected to his first full term in the office. George and Jonathan Dresbach were re-elected Trustees of the Printing Establishment, with William Leist replacing John Russel. The Conference also forbade the discussion of slavery in The Religious Telescope at the request of the Sandusky Conference and the Scioto Conference, because some people felt that both state and national governments would interfere with circulation if pro-abolition agitation continued, while others feared loss of funds through subscriber reaction. However, in 1845, the prohibition was lifted. The Conference also extended the prohibition against distilling and selling alcoholic beverages, which had been put upon ministers, to include laymen also. It seated the delegation from Allegheny Conference (which had been formed from the Pennsylvania Conference in 1838) even though the 1837 General Conference had not authorized a new conference; and also stipulated that the annual salary of a married preacher be set at $200 instead of $160 and that of a bachelor preacher be set at $100 instead of $80.

1845. The ninth General Conference met at Circleville, Ohio, May 10, 1845, under the leadership of Bishops Henry Kumler, Sr., Henry Kumler, Jr., and John Coons.

For the first time since 1815, an entirely new Board of Bishops was elected: JOHN RUSSEL, a native of Maryland,

J. J. GLOSSBRENNER, a native of Virginia, and WILLIAM HANBY, Editor of The Religious Telescope.

For the first time in the history of the Church, the Conference took a step in the direction of establishing institutions of learning with the adoption of the following by a 19-5 vote: "Resolved, that proper measures be adopted to establish an institution of learning. Resolved, that it be recommended to the attention of the annual conferences, avoiding, however, irredeemable debts." Though debate on the issue of education was to continue for some time, authority had been granted to annual conferences to proceed in founding a college; and by the end of 1846, the Scioto Conference was well on the way to founding OTTERBEIN UNIVERSITY at Westerville, Ohio.

In an even closer vote than that recorded for education, this General Conference voted 11-9 to remove restrictions against discussing the slavery question in The Religious Telescope. The Conference also ordered that the publication be issued weekly, and that the German paper, The Busy Martha, be discontinued. Action on all three issues—education, lifting the ban against slavery discussion, and giving more prominence to the English language paper—indicated that the younger and more liberal element was slowly gaining ground.

One subject upon which there was less evidence of any liberality was that of granting women the right of ministry. A report stating, "We do not think the gospel authorizes the introduction of females into the ministry in the sense in which she requests it." However, as Drury points out, some annual conferences were moving in the direction of licensing women to preach.

The growth of the denomination continued. The 1845 Conference appointed a committee to study the situation and create new conference boundaries where it seemed necessary to promote and accommodate growth. The following changes were authorized: The division of the Pennsylvania Conference into the East Pennsylvania and West Pennsylvania Conferences with the Susquehanna River as the dividing line; the formation of the St. Joseph Conference (Northern Indiana and Southern Michigan); the Illinois Conference and the Iowa Conference (the latter two formed from territories evangelized by the Wabash Conference); and authorization was granted for the formation of the White River Conference in an east-west belt across central Indiana.

In other action, the 1845 Conference (1) voted by a narrow 12-11 margin to establish a course of study for candidates to the ministry; (2) continued the prohibition against the manufacture and sale of alcoholic beverages while rejecting (14-7, with 5 abstentions) a ban on the use of the same; (3) rejected a resolution that ". . . every member of our Society shall contribute freely, quarterly, twenty-five cents or more as the Lord prospers him" (vote: 23-4, thanks to a coalition of those who felt the amount too great and those who felt it too small); and (4) refused the General Conference the right to modify verbally the CONFESION OF FAITH.

In addition to the bishops, the following other officers were elected: David Ewards, Editor of the Religious Telescope, and N. Altman, Agent of the Publishing House.

1849. Bishops Russel, Hanby, and Glossbrenner presided over the tenth General Conference which met at Germantown, Ohio, May 14, 1849. Of the three, only Glossbrenner was re-elected. Jacob Erb, who had served for two previous quadrenniums, was elected after an absence of four years. DAVID EDWARDS, a native of North Wales and Editor of the Religious Telescope since 1845, was named to his first term.

This Conference took action on secret societies that was to start a struggle that would continue through 1889. The rule adopted by a 33-2 vote for inclusion in the Discipline read as follows:

"Free masonry, in every sense of the word, shall be totally prohibited, and there shall be no connection with secret combinations; (a secret combination is one whose initiatory ceremony or bond of union is a secret); and any member found connected with such society shall be affectionately admonished by the preacher in charge, twice or thrice, and, if such member does not desist in a reasonable time, he shall be notified to appear before the tribunal to which he is amenable; and, if he still refuses to desist, he shall be expelled from the Church."

Among the items defeated by vote were: expunging the Constitution; moving the "Telescope office" to Cincinnati; and several motions to supplement or amend the Confession of Faith.

When David Edwards refused re-election as Editor of the Religious Telescope, Bishop Hanby, who had served from 1839 to 1845, was elected. David Strickler was elected Editor of The Busy Martha, the German paper which had been revived and named the German Telescope in October 1846, and Nehemiah Altman was re-elected Publishing Agent.

In other action the Baltimore Otterbein Church was admitted to the denomination under its own name and charter; prohibition against the use as well as manufacturing of "ardent spirits" was established; and several annual conferences were examined but passed on the following issues: in regard to distilling, West Pennsylvania; in regard to secret societies, Ohio Miami; in regard to slavery, Virginia; and in regard to receiving an expelled minister, St. Joseph.

1853. Miltonville, Ohio, a small hamlet near the family homestead of HENRY KUMLER, Sr., was the scene of the eleven Conference, which convened May 9, 1853, with Bishops J. J. Glossbrenner, Jacob Erb, and David Edwards in attendance. Bishop Glossbrenner's informal presentation of matters that should come before the body became the pattern for the formal bishop's message that was to be introduced in 1857. Bishops Glossbrenner and Edwards were re-elected, while Lewis DAVIS, a native of Virginia and a member of the Scioto Conference (Ohio), was elected to replace Bishop Erb.

Missionary activity, doctrinal matters, the moving of the office of the Religious Telescope, and the formation of eight new annual conferences engaged the attention of the delegates. Following the basic ideas of the constitution adopted by the 1841 General Conference, when it organized "The Parent Missionary Society of the United Brethren in Christ," the 1853 Conference took steps to provide a more efficient organization for missionary work at home and abroad. The basic difference between 1841 and 1853 constitutions was that in the latter machinery was established so that annual conferences, circuits, and classes could form societies for raising funds in support of missionary activity. The General Conference elected the following officers to its new missionary organization: J. J. Glossbrenner, President; D. Edwards, L. Davis, and H. Kumler, Jr., Vice-Presidents; J. C. Bright, Secretary; John Kemp, Jr., Treasurer; and Kemp, D. B. Crouse, D. Shuck, John Dodds, William Longstreet, and T. N. Sowers, Managers.

At the time all of this organization was taking place T. J. CONNER and J. Kenoyer were leading a party of four other ministers across the plains toward missionary activity in Oregon. They had been commissioned by the previous missionary board. In January, 1855, the African Mission in Sierra Leone, West Africa, was begun with the sailing of W. J. SHUEY, D. K. FLICKINGER, and D. C. KUMLER, M.D.

Two doctrinal matters, infant baptism and depravity, were debated. Infant baptism was acknowledged as valid and anyone rebaptizing a person who had been baptized as a child was subject to a trial. The doctrine of depravity came up for debate when a resolution was presented for use in questioning candidates for the ministry: "Do you believe in natural hereditary total depravity as held by the Church?" The question was modified, toned down, and passed by a slim margin, but stayed on the books in this form only until the 1857 Conference, when it was brought up for discussion again.

A matter of polity which had been ignored in 1849 despite a petition—lay representation to conference—was brought up and turned aside at this Conference on grounds that it was inexpedient and unscriptural.

The eight new conferences authorized were Rock River, Erie, Maumee (later called Auglaize), Michigan, Des Moines, Oregon, German (a new beginning in Ohio), and Missouri. Drury says that "The formation of some of these new conferences was more an expression of faith than of achievement."

After considerable discussion, the office of the Religious Telescope was moved from Circleville to Dayton, Ohio. Known as the Publishing House, the enterprise was headed by a board of trustees chosen from five annual conferences in Ohio and Indiana. JOHN LAWRENCE was named Editor of the Religious Telescope; Henry Staub Editor of the German paper; David Edwards, Editor of Unity Magazine and Children's Friend; and S. Vonnieda, Publishing Agent.

1857. The twelfth General Conference met in Cincinnati, Ohio, May 12, with Bishops Glossbrenner, Edwards, and Davis presiding. The bishops presented the first formal address reviewing the state of the Church and presenting matters for consideration by the Conference. All three men were re-elected and Henry Kumler, Jr., was named German bishop. However, he resigned on grounds that the work was discriminated against in that there was no financial support for a German bishop. J. Russel, a bishop from 1845 to 1849, was named to succeed him.

The two doctrinal matters that had occupied the attention of the 1853 Conference were brought up again. The debate on infant baptism was settled by changing a simple prepositional phrase, "in this respect," to "in these respects." The matter of "total depravity" created a great deal more friction since the sides were quite equally drawn between the advocates of total depravity and the advocates of partial depravity. However, the matter was resolved with the creation of a new question for ministerial candidates—"Do you believe that man, abstract of the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, is fallen from original righteousness and is destitute of holiness but is inclined to evil and only evil and that continually; and that except a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God?" When only one dissenting vote was cast on the question, W. J. Shuey led the Conference in singing The Doxology.

The following new annual conferences were authorized: Canada, Nebraska, Kansas, Minnesota, Kentucky, Wisconsin, and Parkersburg (formed by a division of the Virginia Conference).

The matter of secret societies was introduced by J. B. Ressler, but his resolution to change the existing law was defeated. The matter of lay delegates, although it was favorably discussed, was also defeated.

Elections for posts other than Bishop resulted in the following: John Lawrence, Editor of the Religious Telescope; Alexander Owen, Editor of Unity Magazine; J. Degmeier, Editor of the German paper; D. K. Flickinger, Missionary Treasurer; and S. Vonnieda, Publishing Agent.

1861. Westerville, Ohio, home of OTTERBEIN COLLEGE (then called University), first college founded by the Church of the United Brethren in Christ, was the scene of the thirteenth General Conference which convened May 13, 1861, with Bishops Glossbrenner, Edwards, Davis, and Russel presiding.

Of the four, only Bishops Glossbrenner and Edwards were re-elected. Henry Kumler, Jr., who had been elected German bishop in 1857 but resigned before serving because he had felt that the German work was being discriminated against, was again elected to the post. This time he accepted. JACOB MARKWOOD, a native of Charleston, West Virginia, and DANIEL SHUCK, a native of Harrison County, Indiana, were elected bishop for the first time. The increase in the number of bishops was necessary because of the organization of the Pacific Coast Area. Bishop Shuck was specifically elected for this post after JONATHAN WEAVER had been named but resigned immediately.

Indicative of the growth of the Church were the announcement in the Bishops' Message that membership had increased by 33,055 during the preceding quadrennium and the attention that was once again given to establishing new annual conferences. The division of the Wabash Conference into Upper Wabash and Lower Wabash, which had taken place prior to General Conference, was approved. New conferences named were Western Reserve (to be formed from the Erie Conference), North Michigan, Indiana German, Fox River, West Des Moines, North Iowa, and California. Since missionary work had been done in Massachusetts, General Conference authorized the organization of a Massachusetts Conference, which was done in 1862.

No new legislation or doctrinal matters came before the body; and the recurring old problems—lay delegation, pro rata representation, and secret societies—caused little flurry. The Conference took the position that the Church was not really demanding the first two, so the subjects were tabled. Dealing with those who joined secret societies was made more stringent with the amendment to the existing legislation that violators "be dealt with as in the case of other immorality." The strong favorable vote is, however, misleading, because the matter was beginning to stir emotions in the annual conferences.

Although the question of slave holding among church members in Virginia and Maryland came to the attention of the 1857 General Conference, the 1861 Conference does not reflect the growing national crisis over slavery and states rights that was soon to explode in open warfare. When the Civil War came, Bishop Glossbrenner was confined to Virginia for the duration, while Bishop Markwood was prevented from visiting family and friends in Virginia.

The following were elected to offices of the general Church: John Lawrence, Editor of the Religious Telescope; S. Vonnieda, Editor of the German paper; T. N. Sowers, Publishing Agent; D. K. Flickinger, Missionary Secretary; and J. Kemp, Missionary Treasurer.

1865. The General Conference of the Church of the United Brethren in Christ convened May 11, at Western (seat of Western College, founded in 1857), Linn County, Iowa. Bishops Glossbrenner, Edwards, Kumler, and Markwood presided. Although Western itself was a strong center of the denomination, a number of the delegates had to walk eight miles from Cedar Rapids to reach it because of lack of transportation facilities.

Tension permeated the General Conference because of the Civil War, which was drawing to a close. All sections of the Church, but especially Maryland and Virginia, had been affected by the conflict; and Bishop Markwood had been refused permission to return to his home state, Virginia, because of his sharp attacks against treason and rebellion. However, when news reached the Conference that Jefferson Davis and his staff had been captured, the delegates rose to sing, "Praise God from whom all blessings flow."

One significant new emphasis during the 1865 Conference was that of Christian education as it was realized in the Sunday school. Such schools had been in existence in individual annual conferences for some time; but it was not until this session that the Sabbath School Association of the United Brethren Church was launched with its own constitution and General Secretary, Isaac Crouse of the Sandusky Conference.

The 1865 Conference reorganized the German work and passed the territory of the Indiana German Mission to the Ohio German Conference. In other boundary matters, the body actually formed the Cascade Mission Conference as authorized in 1861, and authorized the division of the Illinois Conference to allow for the formation of the Central Illinois Conference.

Bishops Glossbrenner, Edwards, Markwood, and Shuck (Pacific Conference) were reelected, with Jonathan Weaver (who had refused election in 1861) succeeding Bishop Kumler. Other elected officials were W. J. Shuey and T. N. Sowers, Agents of the Printing Establishment; D. Berger, Editor of the Religious Telescope; S. Vonnieda, Editor of the German paper and Children's Friend; D. K. Flickinger, Missionary Secretary; and William McKee, Missionary Treasurer.

1869. For the first time since 1817, the General Conference convened east of Ohio, meeting in Lebanon, Pa., May 20, 1869. Although Bishop Markwood was in ill health, all of the Bishops—Glossbrenner, Edwards, Weaver, Shuck, and Markwood—were present.

Just as the 1845 Conference had laid the foundation for the formation of OTTIERBEIN COLLEGE (University), so the 1869 Conference laid the foundation for the formation of Union Biblical Seminary (UNITED THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, Dayton, Ohio), by establishing a Board of Education with specific instructions to establish a seminary. The institution became a reality in 1871.

However important to the welfare of the church the founding of a seminary may have been, the subject to attract the most attention at the 1869 Conference was the old question of secret societies. After three days' debate, the body voted 71-26 to adopt a law requiring more stringent enforcement of the anti-society law in respect to all secret societies.

Also receiving considerable attention was the status of the African Mission. The Board of Missions, pressed by serious financial and personnel problems, had asked General Conference for guidance. After weighing the evidence, the Conference not only voted the continuation of the African work but recommended consideration of a mission in Germany.

Of significance to the work in Pennsylvania was the formation of the East German Conference, which drained considerable strength from the East Pennsylvania Conference for a number of years until the German body was dissolved in 1901. The 1869 Conference also provided for the formation of the Tennessee Conference and the Osage Conference, the latter comprised of territory in parts of Kansas and Missouri.

In other action, the 1869 Conference (1) relaxed its prohibition against choirs and instrumental music; (2) defeated (55-32) a motion for lay representation at General Conference on grounds that there was no widespread demand for it; (3) provided a church erection society as an adjunct to the missionary society; (4) dropped the statement in The Discipline of a fixed salary for itinerant preachers in favor of negotiations between the itinerant and the quarterly conference; and (5) stipulated that a proportion of the money collected by annual conferences be paid to the parent missionary society.

JOHN DICKSON, a native of Chambersburg, Pa., was named bishop to succeed Bishop Markwood. The post of bishop for the Pacific Conference was dropped and the following bishops were reelected: J. J. Glossbrenner, D. Edwards, and J. Weaver. Other officials elected were W. J. Shuey, Publishing Agent; Milton Wright and Daniel Berger, Editors of the Religious Telescope (Berger was later appointed Assistant Editor); D. K. Flickinger, Missionary Secretary; and William McKee, Missionary Treasurer. The Publishing House board was instructed to appoint the Editor of the German paper.

1873. The General Conference convened May 15 in St. Paul's Universalist Church, Dayton, Ohio, because the new building of First United Brethren Church was not yet completed. Bishops Jacob J. Glossbrenner, David Edwards, Jonathan Weaver, and John Dickson—all of whom were in attendance—were re-elected for the next quadrennium.

The Bishops' report showed (1) a gain in membership of 17,347 and the formation of four new mission conferences—Dakota, Southern Illinois, Osage, and Colorado; (2) progress in the African Mission but difficulty in the German mission in Bavaria; and (3) the founding of Union Biblical Seminary in 1871 in accordance with the action of the 1869 General Conference.

Three perennial questions took center stage: (1) how to deal with violations of the prohibition against secret societies; (2) the giving of delegate status to laymen; and (3) the matter of pro-rata representation. The secrecy law was reaffirmed by a vote of 82-22, but the margin in favor of a specific method for dealing with violators received a smaller majority (70-30).

After the Conference had voted 91-12 in favor of submitting to the membership of the churches a proposal for lay representation to General Conference, a debate arose over the proposal that "each annual Conference shall be entitled to three elders, also one layman for every one thousand and less than two thousand, provided that each Conference shall have one lay delegate." The matter in question went beyond granting lay representation into the area of pro-rata representation. A number of amendments liberalizing lay representation were defeated before the original proposal was adopted. However, another technicality remained to sidetrack the issue for at least another quadrennium. That technicality was how to interpret the instructions for amending the Constitution: "There shall be no alteration of the foregoing constitution unless by request of two-thirds of the whole society."

The Conference decided that the Church of the United Brethren in Christ should observe its Centennial in 1874 since it was in 1774 that PHILIP WILLIAM OTTERBEIN became pastor of an independent congregation in Baltimore. In connection with Centennial services, there was to be an effort to raise a Centennial Fund for the benefit of Union Biblical Seminary and the Missionary and Church Extension Societies.

In other elections, the following were reelected; W. J. Shuey, Publishing Agent; MILTON WRIGHT, Editor of the Religious Telescope; D. K. Flickinger, Missionary Secretary; Isaac Crouse, Secretary of the Sabbath School Association. Elected for the first time were W. O. Tobey, Assistant Editor of the Religious Telescope; William Mittendorf, Editor of the German paper; and J. W. Hott, Missionary Treasurer.

1877. Because of the death of Bishop Edwards, June 6, 1876, only three bishops were in attendance at the 1877 General Conference which convened May 10 in the chapel of Westfield College, Westfield, Ill. Once again, the bishops noted an increase in membership (19,233) during the preceding quadrennium.

Bishops John J. Glossbrenner, Jonathan Weaver, and John Dickson were re-elected; Milton Wright and NICHOLAS CASTLE were elected for the first time, bringing the number of bishops to five.

Mrs. D. L. Rike read a paper on the organization of the Woman's Missionary Association in Dayton, Ohio, in October of 1875. This general church body was the outgrowth of individual organizations at the annual conference level which dated back to 1872 (The Ohio German Conference had formed "The Sisters' Missionary Society" in May, 1869, but this group confined its activities to the local area).

The northern part of the Michigan Conference was split away and organized as the Saginaw Conference.

The three problems which had plagued the 1873 Conference again dominated the agenda. The issue of strict enforcement of the law against membership in secret societies was debated with considerable resentment and bitterness. The vote stood 71 to 31 in favor of retaining the prohibition; but even though the matter would come up again in future years, this was the last time that the matter would receive such a favorable vote. Once again the Conference managed to resist democratization as it was proposed in the two remaining questions before the house. Pro-rata representation in General Conference was defeated 54-45. A committee recommended that when a majority of the Bishops was satisfied that there was sufficient demand for lay representation in General Conference, the bishops could draw up a plan through which members of the Church might "express their requests by voting." However, because of its vagueness, the recommendation never came to a vote. One minor inroad was made in the area of lay representation when it was agreed that an annual conference could admit laymen whenever two-thirds of the members of the body favored the move.

In other elections, J. W. HOTT was named Editor of the Religious Telescope to succeed Bishop Wright and W. O. Tobey was retained as Assistant Editor; J. K. Billheimer was named Missionary Treasurer, succeeding J. W. Hott; Robert Cowden was elected Secretary of the Sabbath School Association, a post he was to hold until 1913; and Daniel Berger was elected Editor of Sabbath School Literature, which in 1872 had begun to make use of uniform lessons. Re-elected to office were W. J. Shuey, Publishing Agent, D. K. Flickinger, Missionary Secretary, and William Mittendorf, Editor of the German papers.

1881. With all bishops—Glossbrenner, Weaver, Dickson, Wright, and Castle—in attendance, the General Conference convened May 12 in Lisbon, Iowa. Although the increase was not as pronounced as in previous quadrenniums, the bishops reported a gain of 14,486 members since 1877.

A number of changes in annual conferences were authorized or acknowledged: (1) the East Pennsylvania Conference was attached to the Pennsylvania Conference; (2) the Osage Conference was divided into the Osage, South Missouri, and Arkansas Valley Conferences; and (3) conference was given to the formation of three new conferences since the 1877 session—West Kansas, West Nebraska, and Central Ohio.

Battle weary delegates managed to table the secrecy question after three separate attempts to increase the rigidity of the law, but the mood of both the radicals and the liberals foreshadowed more action on this matter in future years. The question of lay representation in General Conference never came up at all; but pro-rata representation won a mild victory when it was agreed that annual conferences having less than three thousand members were entitled to two delegates, those having between three thousand and six thousand five hundred members were entitled to three delegates, and those having more than 6,500 members were entitled to four delegates.

Four of the bishops were re-elected: John J. Glossbrenner, Jonathan Weaver, John Dickson, and Nicholas Castle. Ezekiel Boring Kephart, an Iowa legislator and a minister with progressive views, was elected to succeed Bishop Milton Wright, who had alienated some of the radicals and who also lacked the support of the liberals.

All other officers of the denomination were reelected; W. J. Shuey, Publishing Agent; J. W. Hott, Editor of the Religious Telescope; Daniel Berger, Editor of Sunday School Literature; D. K. Flickinger, Missionary Secretary; J. K. Billheimer, Missionary Treasurer; and Robert Cowden, Secretary of the Sabbath School Association. Marion R. Drury was later named Assistant Editor of the Religious Telescope, succeeding W. O. Tobey.

1885. Bishop Ezekiel B. Kephart prepared and read the Bishops' address for the General Conference which convened May 14 in Fostoria, Ohio. A gain in membership of 10,861 was noted and the bishops called for a decision on the method of amending the Constitution, recommending that amendments be submitted to the membership for vote, with a two-thirds majority of those voting being required for ratification.

In response to the bishops, a committee of thirteen members of the Conference reported a plan to establish a 27-man Church Commission to prepare amended forms of the Constitution and Confession of Faith for vote by the membership. The Conference approved the commission plan by a vote of 78-42. A modified rule prohibiting membership in secret societies was approved by a vote of 76-38.

Plans to establish an eastern book and publishing house in Harrisburg, Pa., were approved; but when the project proved to be unprofitable, it was dropped in a few years.

A number of boundary changes were noted and authorized. Since the East Pennsylvania Conference and the Pennsylvania Conference had not completely merged as authorized in 1881, the 1885 Conference permitted them to resume their original status as separate conferences. A Maryland Conference was conditionally authorized and three conference mergers were definitely authorized: (1) Fox River with the Wisconsin Conference, (2) Elkhorn Conference with the Dakota Conference, and (3) East Des Moines with the Iowa Conference.

Bishop John J. Glossbrenner retired after 40 years of service in the office and was named Bishop Emeritus. Bishops Jonathan Weaver, Ezekiel B. Kephart, John Dickson and Nicholas Castle were reelected. Milton Wright after a quadrennium out of office, was named Bishop of the Pacific Coast; and Daniel K. Flickinger, whose name had never been associated with the United Brethren Missionary enterprise, was named Missionary Bishop.

In all other elections, the following were returned to office: J. W. Hott, Editor of the Religious Telescope; W. J. Shuey, Publishing Agent; Daniel Berger, Editor of Sunday School Literature; and Robert Cowden, Secretary of the Sabbath School Association. Elected to their positions for the first time were Ezekiel Light, Editor of German Literature; Z. Warner, Missionary Secretary; William McKee, Missionary Treasurer; and D. R. Miller, General Manager of Union Biblical Seminary.

1889. Meeting at York, Pa., beginning May 9, the General Conference was the most significant Conference since the earliest sessions that brought the denomination into being. Two major reasons for this were the action taken on the work of the Church Commission and the split from the Church of a group of dissenters led by Bishop Milton Wright.

The Church Commission appointed by the 1885 General Conference had begun work within the year and produced a Confession of Faith in which there was a more comprehensive statement of accepted beliefs without any substantial change in doctrine from the existing statements. The Constitution was made more manageable and contained a more liberal view on secret societies; provided a clear method for making amendments; and supported lay representation in the governing bodies of the Church.

Both documents were widely published and discussed in preparation for a vote that was to be taken throughout the church late in 1888. Despite some opposition, including a signed petition that was seriously questioned by a committee headed by DANIEL SHUCK, the vote taken in November 1888, favored the adoption of the revisions: the Confession of Faith carried by a vote of 51,070—3,310; the amended Constitution carried by a vote of 50,685—3,659; and the sections on lay representation and secret societies, which were voted on separately, 48,825—5,634 and 46,994—7,289, respectively.

When the 1889 General Conference opened, the bishops took cognizance of the work of the Commission and the result of the voting. With Bishop Wright dissenting—he had not attended the meetings of the Church Commission—the bishops called for ratification of the work of the Commission and the vote of the denomination as a whole. A committee took the matter under advisement and brought back a report declaring the action up to this point regular and asking for ratification. On May 13, the Conference voted 110-20 in favor of the committee's report. When the results of the voting were known and the bishops read a proclamation placing the Church under the new documents, Bishop Wright and his followers left the session and marched to another hall in the city of York to form a new denomination which was to be known as the Church of the United Brethren in Christ (Old Constitution). Meanwhile, General Conference passed a resolution identifying the leaders of the walkout and declared them irregularly withdrawn from the Church.

The resolution of the matter of revision had long lasting results: (1) The Confession of Faith and the Constitution (the latter with some amendments) continued until the formation of The Evangelical United Brethren Church in 1946; and (2) the denomination formed by Bishop Wright, though small, continues to this day.

Following the adoption of the revised Confession and Constitution, the Conference felt freer than any of its immediate predecessors to take progressive action on a number of issues. A basis for lay representation in General Conference (a minimum of 3 per annual Conference and a maximum of 6) was adopted and the standing rule making lay representation in annual Conference sessions optional was changed to make it compulsory. Authority to license and ordain women in the ministry of the Church was assumed; and a scholarly quarterly, the United Brethren Quarterly, was undertaken. Finally, although the increase in membership during the preceding quadrennium was the largest ever recorded to this time (39,250), the move toward the consolidation of some conferences continued with the authorization of a merger of the Iowa and East Des Moines Conferences.

Bishops Jonathan Weaver, Ezekiel Kephart, Nicholas Castle, and John Dickson were reelected. The office of Missionary Bishop was dropped and J. W. HOTT was named to succeed Bishop Wright on the Pacific Coast. Other officers reelected were W. J. Shuey, Publishing Agent; Daniel Berger, Editor of Sunday School Literature; William McKee, Missionary Treasurer; D. R. Miller, Business Manager of Union Biblical Seminary; and Robert Cowden, Secretary of the Sabbath School Association. Elected to office for the first time were ISAAH L. KEPHART, Editor of the Religious Telescope; M. R. DRURY, Assistant Editor of the Religious Telescope; J. W. ETTER, Editor of the Quarterly Review; W. MITTENDORF, Editor of German Periodicals; B. F. BOOTH, Missionary Secretary; and JOHN HILL, Secretary of Church Erection.

1893. Dayton, Ohio, was the scene of the General Conference, the largest gathering of its kind to that time. It convened May 11. Bishops Jonathan Weaver, Ezekiel Kephart, Nicholas Castle, John Dickson, and J. W. Hott were all present, along with 124 ministerial delegates and 52 lay delegates, two of whom were women. With the reduction of the number of bishops to four and the retirement of Bishops Weaver and Dickson, only three of the five presiding bishops were reelected; Kephart, Castle, and Hott. G. A. FUNKHOUSER was elected as the fourth bishop, but declined. In his place, the General Conference named JOB SMITH MILLS, a member of the Iowa Conference.

This General Conference noted an advance in the youth work of the denomination when a memorial from a group of youth reported the organizing of the Young People's Christian Union in June, 1890. The memorial said that the organization had attained a membership of 20,000 since its formation. The Conference also observed that, according to instructions from the 1889 General Conference, the Church of the United Brethren in Christ had been regularly incorporated in the state of Ohio in 1890. However, one of the aftermaths of the 1889 General Conference was less promising. Because of the withdrawal of dissenters under Bishop Milton Wright (approximately 10,677), the Church reported an overall loss of 2800 during the quadrennium in spite of significant gains in some annual conferences.

The Southwest Kansas Conference was formed from the Arkansas Valley Conference and the Maryland Conference was granted permission to unite with the Pennsylvania Conference. In a surprise move, the General Conference removed the three-year limit on pastors who had been in existence for a number of years. In recognition of faithful service, Bishop Weaver was named Bishop Emeritus, Bishop Dickson was honored with a resolution of esteem, and three deceased leaders—African Missionary, J. Gomer; Secretary of the Board of Missions, B. F. Booth; and a pastor and publisher of church music, ISAIAH BALTZELL—were honored by appropriate addresses before the Conference.

Officers reelected for the next quadrennium were Robert Cowden, Secretary of the Sabbath School Association; I. L. Kephart, Editor of the Religious Telescope; M. R. Drury, Associate Editor of the Religious Telescope; W. J. Shuey, Publishing Agent; William McKee, Missionary Treasurer; D. R. Miller, Business Manager of Union Biblical Seminary. Others elected for the first time were J. W. Etter, Editor of Sunday School Literature; H. A. Thompson, Assistant Editor of Sunday School Literature; Ezekiel Light, Editor of German Literature; W. M. Bell, Missionary Secretary; and H. F. Shupe, Editor of the Watchword, a new young people's publication.

1897. The General Conference met at Toledo, Iowa beginning May 13. Bishop Emeritus Jonathan Weaver called the session to order; he was assisted by Bishops Ezekiel Kephart, Nicholas Castle, James W. Hott, and Job S. Mills. An increase of about 36,000 members during the quadrennium resulted in a conference delegation of 145 ministers and 62 laymen, an overall increase of 31 delegates since 1893.

One of the most serious concerns of the Conference was the litigation following the "walkout" of 1889 and now approaching a climax. The affair began with a demand by the "radicals" under Bishop Wright for possession of the Printing Establishment. The "liberals" responded by taking the matter to the Common Pleas Court of Montgomery County, Ohio, where each side presented an illustrious body of witnesses from both within and without their respective groups. The witnesses for the "liberals" included such figures as Dr. Philip Schaff of Union Theological Seminary, New York City; Dr. JAMES STRONG of Drew Theological Seminary, and Bishop J. M. WALDEN of the Methodist Episcopal Church. When the plaintiffs, the "liberals" won the case, the "radicals" appealed to the Circuit Court, where the opinion of the lower court was upheld.

Meanwhile a number of suits arose in other states over local church property. The Printing Establishment lent its support and advice to the local churches. The local churches won their cases in the supreme courts of California, Illinois, Indiana, Missouri, Oregon, and Pennsylvania, and in the court of appeals of the Dominion of Canada. In Michigan, the supreme court ruled against the liberals, but a later decision by the federal court favored the liberals. The immediate concern of the 1897 Conference was the case before the Federal Court in Cincinnati, Ohio. Shortly after General Conference, on May 24, Judge William Howard Taft ruled in favor of the liberals, identifying them as the legal Church of the United Brethren in Christ; but the radicals immediately took the case to the Court of Appeals, where they again lost in a trial concluded in 1899.

The cost of litigation, $35,510.06, was borne by the Printing Establishment, with local churches raising funds to pay their own expenses. However, in almost every instance, court costs themselves were levelled against the radicals, who were now known as the United Brethren in Christ (Old Constitution).

Litigation helped the Church of the United Brethren in Christ to look upon its Constitution with greater faith in its legality, especially after the opinion of the Circuit Court was delivered in 1899. Indirectly, it may also have added impetus to the movement to celebrate the Centennial of the denomination in 1900. The 1897 Conference acknowledged that the 1874 observance had been premature and called for a new program that was to extend from September 25, 1900 to the meeting of General Conference in May 1901. The site of that Conference was set in Frederick, Maryland, near the home of Peter Kemp, where the first Conference was held September 25, 1800.

During the Conference, several mergers of annual conferences were arranged: Arkansas Valley and Southwest Kansas, Michigan and Northern Michigan, Missouri and Southern Missouri.

All of the bishops—Nicholas Castle, Ezekiel Kephart, Job S. Mills, and James W. Hott—were reelected. Other reelections to office were I. L. Kephart, Editor of the Religious Telescope; William McKee, Missionary Treasurer; W. M. Bell, Missionary Secretary; H. F. Shupe, Editor of the Watchword; and Robert Cowden, who was also named Associate Editor of Sunday School Literature, Secretary of the Sunday School Association. Elected to other offices were W. R. Funk, Publishing Agent; W. J. Shuey, Business Manager of Union Biblical Seminary; A. P. Funkhouser, Associate Editor of the Religious Telescope; Edmund S. Lorenz, Editor of German Papers; and H. A. Thompson, Editor of Sunday School Literature.

1901. The General Conference convened May 9, at Frederick, Md., with Bishops Nicholas Castle, James W. Hott, Ezekiel Kephart, and Job S. Mills in attendance. Former Bishop John Dickson was granted an advisory relationship to the Conference, but two former bishops—David Shuck and Jonathan Weaver—had passed away during the preceding quadrennium. The delegation to General Conference consisted of 140 ministers, including one woman, and sixty-two lay delegates, including two women.

Bishop Mills read the bishops' address, which is described by A. W. Drury as "the most comprehensive that had thus far been presented to a General Conference." In the address, the bishops took note of the African uprising that had led to the death of seven missionaries and a sizeable number of native members. They also spoke highly of the advances in science, technology, and education during the century just completed; deplored three serious attacks on the church—(1) the "materialistic hypothesis of evolution, united to an agnostic view of the universe," (2) "a destructive form of 'higher criticism' [that] waged a fierce war upon the Word of God," and (3) a "habit of Mind" derived from the "materialistic theory of life" and the "enormous growth in riches"; and expressed faith that the "Christian leaven" which had led to the freeing of slaves, the extension of political liberty and equality before the law, and the growth of "the spirit of altruism" would continue to be effective.

The structure of future General Conference sessions was drastically changed by the passage (126 to 42) of an act making the number of lay delegates equal to the number of ministerial delegates.

In other actions, the boundaries of a number of annual conferences were changed. First, all boundaries crossing state lines in Indiana, Ohio, and Michigan were adjusted accordingly. Second, the Auglaize, Central Ohio, and Northern Ohio Conferences were discontinued, leaving Ohio with four conferences. Third, the Rock River and Central Illinois Conferences were united as the Northern Illinois Conference; the East Pennsylvania and Eastern Conferences as the East Pennsylvania Conference; and the Pennsylvania and Maryland Conferences as the Pennsylvania Conference. Other, but less sweeping changes were also made.

All of the bishops were reelected; but the death of Bishop J. W. Hott within the year following his reelection, necessitated a mail ballot for naming his successor. GEORGE MARTIN MATHEWS, Associate Editor of the Religious Telescope, was selected by the delegates and appointed to the position on the Board of Bishops. Other re-elections at the 1901 Conference were W. R. Funk, Publishing Agent; I. L. Kephart, Editor of the Religious Telescope; G. M. Mathews, who had been appointed during the 1897-1901 quadrennium to succeed A. P. Funkhouser, Associate Editor of the Religious Telescope; H. F. Shupe, Editor of the Watchword; Robert Cowden, Secretary of the Sunday School Association; and W. M. Bell, Missionary Secretary. Elected to other offices were H. H. Fout, Editor of Sunday School Literature; C. M. Brooke, Business Manager of Union Biblical Seminary; William McKee, Church Treasurer; and W. M. Weekley, Church Election Secretary.

The 1901 General Conference took cognizance of the fact that in 1800 the first Annual Conference Session of the denomination met at the nearby PETER KEMP home. The event was celebrated with an extensive program of Centennial exercises, the addresses of which were published later that year under the title A Century of United Brethren Achievement by the U. B. Publishing House.

1905. The General Conference convened May 11, 1905 at Topeka Kansas. Approval of a "syllabus" projecting cooperation, if not union, with the Methodist Protestant Church and the Congregational Church highlighted the session. Meeting in the chamber of the State House of Representatives, this was the first General Conference to convene west of the Missouri River. Another first was the fact that elected delegates numbered 135 laymen and 135 clergymen (equal lay-clerical delegations) even though the lay delegate from Japan was not in attendance.

Bishops Nicholas Castle, Ezekiel B. Kephart, Job S. Mills, and George M. Mathews attended, with Bishops Castle and Kephart announcing their intention to retire. Both were granted emeritus relationship. Before their replacements were elected, the Conference agreed to add a fifth bishop because of the need for an overseer in the Pacific Coast and because of proposals to broaden the church's work in the South. Three new bishops were elected to join Bishops Mills and Mathews: W. M. Weekley, a native of West Virginia, the Secretary of the Church Election Board since 1895, and a leading proponent of the merger plan under consideration; William M. Bell, a native of Indiana and Secretary of the Foreign Missionary Society; and Bishop T. C. Carter, a former member of the M. E. Church, who in 1894 had led a walkout of pastors and laymen from that group.

The "syllabus" which resulted from action initiated by the 1901 General Conference and which had been adopted by the participating denominations in Washington, D. C., in May 1903, was approved with only 5 dissenting votes in spite of some strong debate. By prior agreement, the three groups convened in Dayton, Ohio, February 7, 1906, with the United Brethren sending 50 delegates. Because of a resolution presented by The Methodist Protestant Church, the gathering declared that its "first and chief business is to provide for the organic union of these three bodies." Undergirding the declaration was a statement of doctrine which included an article on social action (the first such article for a United Brethren Church), a name for the body when it was formed (United Church), and a system of polity. The speed with which the merger movement moved in 1906 is matched only by the speed with which it fell apart when the General Council met again in Chicago, Illinois, May 19, 1907.

The General Conference of the United Brethren in Christ of 1905 authorized the union of the Illinois and Northern Illinois Conference, recognized the Georgia and Kentucky Conferences, and approved the request of the churches in Ontario to enter into a union with the Congregationalists in Canada.

In addition to the bishops, the conference named the following other officers: Editor of the Religious Telescope, I. L. KEPHART; Associate Editor, J. M. PHILLIPPI; Editor of the Watchword, H. F. Shupe; Editor of Sunday School Literature, H. H. FOUT; Associate Editor, W. O. Fries; Editor of the United Brethren Review, H. A. Thompson; Foreign Missionary Secretary, S. S. HOUGH; Home Missionary Secretary, C. Whitney; General Church Treasurer, L. O. Miller; Church Election Secretary, H. S. Gabel; Secretary of the Sunday-school Association, R. Cowden; and Business Manager of Union Biblical Seminary, C. M. Brooke.

1909. The General Conference met May 13, at Canton, Ohio. Although attempts at forming the United Church had collapsed in Chicago in 1907, the 1909 Conference kept the issue alive through discussion and through action supporting the proposal to form the Federation of Churches in America.

Bishops Job S. Mills, George M. Mathews, William M. Bell, T. C. Carter, and W. M. Weekley were present and presided over the session. All were reelected for another quadrennium. Among the 117 lay delegates (as over against 118 ministerial delegates), it was significant that the number of women delegates once again exceeded twenty, even though it did not reach the twenty-five of the previous General Conference. A sad note was injected into the sessions by the large number of ministerial deaths during the preceding quadrennium: Bishop E. B. Kephart, I. L. Kephart, William McKee, C. J. Burkert, D. W. Sprinkle, G. Fritz, J. L. Grimm, and G. H. Hinton.

The Conference distinguished itself by providing for the denomination's first full-time Secretary of Christian Stewardship, a post filled by J. S. Kendall. All existing officers were re-elected with but three exceptions: J. M. Phillippi was named Editor of the Religious Telescope replacing the deceased I. L. Kephart, while he himself was replaced as Associate Editor by C. I. B. Brane, and J. E. Fout was named Business Manager of Union Biblical Seminary in place of C. M. Brooke.

The work of the Women's Missionary Association was given new stature by the adoption of its proposal that it be granted representation on both the Board of Foreign Missions and the Board of Home Missions. In work affecting annual conferences, the union of the Ontario Conference with the Congregationalists in Canada was acknowledged, the North Texas Conference was formed, and these boundary changes were made; Iowa and Des Moines Conferences were united, Northeast and Northwest Kansas Conferences were united, and the Upper Wabash Conference was discontinued with its territory redistributed among adjacent conferences.

1913. The Conference convened May 8, at Decatur, Ill. Like a hardy perennial, the subject of church union again dominated the Conference. The death of Bishop Job S. Mills four months before the close of the previous quadrennium left only four full-time bishops and Bishop Emeritus Nicholas Castle in attendance. During the session, Bishop T. C. Carter joined Bishop Castle as Bishop Emeritus, Bishops George M. Mathews, W. M. Weekley, and William M. Bell were reelected, and three new bishops were named: HENRY H. FOUT, a native of West Virginia, a prolific writer and Editor of Sunday-school Literature since 1901; CYRUS J. KEPHART, another prolific writer, and pastor of First U. B. Church, Dayton, Ohio; and A. T. HOWARD, a native of Michigan and a missionary who was appointed to the "foreign district" of the Church.

The church union proposal entertained during this Conference and which seemed to have a chance of reaching culmination again involved the Methodist Protestant Church. Had it succeeded and had its constitution and declaration of faith been adopted, it would have been known as The United Protestant Church. The action was halted during the succeeding quadrennium after three-fourths of the annual conferences had voted to submit the proposal to the general membership of the denomination when it became apparent that the "grass roots" constituency did not share the enthusiasm of the General Conference for union.

The Conference was distressed by reports that the flood which had ravaged Dayton, Ohio, just prior to the General Conference had caused an estimated loss to the Printing Establishment in excess of $100,000. Prospects of recovering the loss appeared dim in light of the fact that donations from the Church came to only a little more than $7,000.

Although the outcome of the union proposal was not yet evident, the Conference took action improving the operation of some of its agencies and interests. As has already been noted, a bishop to supervise work in foreign fields was authorized and elected. In addition, full-time secretaries were authorized for the Board of Education and for young people's work. W. E. Schell was subsequently elected to the former post and O. T. DEEVER to the latter. Finally, orphanages and benevolent homes were tied more closely to the general church.

In the area of annual conference work, three major consolidations were authorized: Lower Wabash and Northern Illinois into a state-wide Illinois Conference; East Nebraska Conference; and two or more individual Kansas conferences into a state-wide Kansas Conference. All consolidations were completed by the end of 1914.

In addition to the new Secretary of the Board of Education and the Secretary of Young People's work, the following new officers were elected for the quadrennium: Editor, J. W. Owen; Secretary of the Sabbath-school Association, C. W. Brewbaker; Secretary Emeritus, Robert Cowden; and Church Erection Secretary, A. C. Siddall. All other general offices were filled by the reelection of the incumbents.

1917. General Conference convened in Wichita, Kan., May 10. It took another step in the direction of improving the operating efficiency of the general church by establishing a Board of Administration to function in the intervals between General Conferences. With a full-time General Secretary in its service, the Board was charged with the responsibility for promoting the financial plans of the Church and was authorized to coordinate the work of the various departments and agencies and to implement established goals for the quadrennium.

Bishops George M. Mathews, William M. Bell, W. M. Weekley, H. H. Fout, C. J. Kephart, and A. T. Howard were present for the session. All were reelected with the exception of W. M. Weekley, who retired. He was replaced by WILLIAM H. WASHINGTON, Superintendent of the Pennsylvania Conference. In other elections, J. S. Kendall, formerly Secretary of Stewardship, became the first General Secretary and P. M. Camp was named Home Missionary Secretary. All other general officers were reelected.

The Georgia-Florida Conference was dissolved and a new Florida Conference was recognized.

1921. General Conference convened in Indianapolis, Ind., and once again took significant steps toward improving its operation. It created a Department of Evangelism, administered by a newly created Secretary of Evangelism, J. E. Shannon; adopted the report on "Goals and Program for the next Quadrennium" and placed it into the hands of the Board of Administration for implementation, and launched a pension program for the ministers of the denomination. Also, the functions of the Board of Administration were more clearly drawn and one board was established to administer the work of Home Missions and Church Extension.

All of the bishops were in attendance with the exception of George M. Mathews, who had died early in 1921. He was replaced during the Conference by Bishop A. R. CLIPPINGER, a native of Pennsylvania and Superintendent of the Miami Conference. With the exception of A. T. Howard, whose foreign mission post was abandoned and the duties added to the portfolio of other bishops, all other bishops were reelected. They were William M. Bell, H. H. Fout, C. J. Kephart, and William H. Washington.

Two significant addresses—one by William Jennings Bryan, who called for an attack on Darwinism, and one by Robert E. Speer of the FEDERAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES—inspired the delegates, and an address by Bishop O. G. Alwood of the United Brethren in Christ (Old Constitution) raised hopes among a few delegates that the two bodies might again be united. On the latter, no action was taken, but in response to Bryan's address, a strong resolution calling for support of the basic elements of Christianity was adopted.

In boundary changes, East and West Tennessee Conferences were united into one Tennessee Conference, holdings of the Kentucky Conference were distributed among the Tennessee and Indiana Conferences, Minnesota was made a mission conference and Louisiana Conference a mission district, and territory in Arkansas was added to the Oklahoma Conference.

In addition to Bishop Clippinger and the Secretary of Evangelism, J. E. Shannon, other new officers were elected: Associate Editor of Religious Telescope, W. E. Snyder, replacing the deceased C. I. B. Brane; Secretary of the Board of Administration, S. S. Hough; and Secretary of the Foreign Mission Board, S. G. ZIEGLER.

1925. General Conference met in Buffalo, N. Y., May 14-25, with the following bishops in attendance: William M. Weekley (Emeritus), William M. Bell, Henry H. Fout, Cyrus J. Kephart, William H. Washinger, and Arthur R. Clippinger. Bishops Bell, Fout, Washinger, and Clippinger were re-elected as active bishops for the next quadrennium. ARTHUR B. STATTON, an Iowa by birth and Superintendent of the Pennsylvania Conference, was elected as the fifth bishop on the fourth ballot. He replaced Bishop Kephart, who had asked to be relieved of his duties and was named Bishop Emeritus.

The 1925 Conference appeared to have difficulty acting on the revisions to the Discipline the 1921 Conference had ordered through a committee headed by R. R. Butterwick. When the revisions had been enacted, some of the long-standing policies of the denomination had been liberalized: The admonitions against singing and tithing were dropped, the exhortation to "unconformity to the world" was watered down until it was hardly recognizable, and the rule against prohibiting electioneering at the annual conference was dropped.

The 1925 Conference also merged the Home Missionary Society and the Church Erection Society into a single unit with a new constitution and a single secretary. Annual Conferences were instructed to pattern their organization after that established at the general church level. Agreement in the area of Christian education was more difficult to reach when the Committee on Consolidation of Departments presented that phase of its report. After considerable debate, pro-Christian Endeavor forces who saw the development of a Board of Christian Education as a threat to youth work were successful in blocking a favorable vote on the issue. However, the margin of rejection was narrower than it had been in 1921.

Financial reports in general were encouraging in 1925. In the period from 1918 to 1924, benevolent receipts had increased from $363,763 to $630,123, with receipts for the seven colleges showing the greatest increase from $22,148 to $73,041. From 1921 to 1924 the value of churches and parsonages had increased from $20,551,495 to $26,266,139. The total value of all church property (churches, parsonages, schools, homes, printing establishment, and endowment and loan funds) had increased from $27,575,714 to $36,733,927. There was only one serious storm cloud on the horizon. The printing establishment had secured from the 1921 General Conference permission to erect a seven-story "department store building" in Dayton. During the interim, the plans were changed and a fourteen-story building, capped with a tower, was erected because it appeared certain that there would be a tenant for the store facilities. However, shortly after the building was completed in 1924, the firm, which had signed a thirty-year lease, went bankrupt. As it turned out, the Publishing Agent and the General Conference were far more optimistic about clearing the $1,399,589 indebtedness than they had a right to be for this matter was the beginning of more than a decade of controversy over the publishing concern's financial dealings.

In addition to the bishops, other general church officers were named as follows: Relections—W. R. Funk, Publishing Agent; W. O. Fries, Editor of Sunday School Literature; J. W. Owen, Associate Editor; J. M. Phillippi, Editor of Religious Telescope; W. E. Snyder, Associate Editor; H. F. Shupe, Editor of The Watchword; S. S. Hough, Secretary of the Board of Administration; Samuel G. Ziegler, Secretary of the Board of Foreign Missions; W. E. Schell, Secretary of the Board of Education; C. W. Brewbaker, Secretary of the Sunday School Board; and O. T. Deever, Secretary of Young People's Christian Endeavor Society. Newly elected officers—P. M. Camp (formerly Secretary of the Home Mission Board), Secretary of the newly created Board of Home Mission and Church Erection; E. E. Ullrich, General Church Treasurer; and A. C. Siddall, Manager of Bonebrake Seminary. There was no election of a Secretary of Evangelism and bishops were asked to oversee evangelistic activity through the Board of Evangelism.

1929. The General Conference met at Lancaster, Pa., May 14-24, with Bishop William M. Bell, Senior Bishop, presiding. Other bishops in attendance were Arthur R. Clippinger, Henry H. Fout, Arthur B. Statton, and Cyrus J. Kephart (Bishop Emeritus). Bishop Washinger had died in May 1928, and Bishop Emeritus Weekley had died in 1926. Bishops Clippinger, Fout, and Statton were reelected; Bishop Bell was given Emeritus status; and two new bishops were elected: GRANT D. BATDORF, pastor of the host church for the General Conference who until the moment of his election had been slated to become president of Bonebrake Seminary in Dayton; and IRL D. WARNER, pastor of First Church, Akron, Ohio.

This Conference demonstrated a strong interest in increasing the quality of the ministry. The Board of Education reported that 569 pastors were high school graduates, 300 were college graduates, and 149 were college and seminary graduates. Another 954 pastors had completed "common school." This report set in motion the planning that resulted in significant legislation four years later. Equally significant was the report of the Committee on Recruiting and Training of Ministers (appointed in 1925), which "strongly recommended that all young men looking forward to the ministry and missionary work be urged to complete high school work in their local communities where it will be least expensive and then push on and complete a full college course." The administration of Bonebrake Seminary was reorganized and the annual conferences were instructed to supply the seminary with the names and addresses of all their Quarterly Conference ministers.

On Saturday afternoon, May 18, the delegates travelled a few miles south of Lancaster to the site of the Boehm Chapel, where a memorial to MARTIN BOEHM was unveiled. Bishop H. H. Fout delivered the memorial address.

To prevent the breakdown of the foreign mission program, the Conference voted to conduct a campaign to raise $75,000 to honor the seventy-fifth anniversary of the beginning of United Brethren Missions in SIERRA LEONE, West Africa; but the subsequent depression thwarted the campaign. However, missionary activity did receive a boost in the form of closer cooperation between United Brethren, Methodists, and Presbyterians in Santo Domingo.

The Conference established a Department of Christian Education to promote the work formerly delegated to the Departments of Education, Sunday School and Brotherhood Work, and Christian Endeavor. O. T. Deever was named the first executive secretary of the Board.

Although the movement never reached the culmination that had been anticipated, the Conference gave enthusiastic support to the proposal to unite the Reformed Church in the United States, The Evangelical Synod of North America, and the Church of the United Brethren in Christ. Only the first two of these denominations entered a union in 1934.

In addition to the persons whose election has already been noted, the following General Officers were named for the 1929-33 quadrennium: W. R. Funk, Publishing Agent; W. E. Snyder, Editor of The Religious Telescope; J. Balmer Showers, Associate Editor and Associate Publishing Agent; E. E. Harris, Editor of The Watchword; J. W. Owen, Editor of Sunday School Literature; J. A. Lyter, Associate Editor; S. S. Hough, General Secretary of the Board of Administration; Samuel G. Ziegler, General Secretary of the Foreign Missionary Society; P. M. Camp, General Secretary of Home Mission and Church Erection (when P. M. Camp died during the quadrennium, he was replaced by R. S. Showers); and E. E. Ullrich, General Church Treasurer.

1933. The Conference met in Akron, Ohio, May 9-17, with Bishop Henry H. Fout presiding. Other bishops in attendance were Arthur R. Clippingier, Arthur B. Statton, Grant D. Batdorf, Ira D. Warner, and William M. Bell (Bishop Emeritus). Bishop Emeritus Cyrus J. Kephart had died during the preceding quadrennium. All bishops were reelected for the 1933-1937 quadrennium.

Other officers reelected were W. E. Snyder, Editor of Religious Telescope; E. E. Harris, Editor of The Watchword; J. W. Owen, Editor of Sunday School Literature; J. D. Lyter, Associate Editor of Sunday School Literature; S. S. Hough, General Secretary of the Board of Administration; O. T. Deever, General Secretary of the Board of Christian Education; Samuel G. Ziegler, General Secretary of the Foreign Missionary Society; R. S. Showers, General Secretary of Home Mission and Church Extension; and E. E. Ullrich, General Church Treasurer. J. Balmer Showers, who had served as Associate Editor of Religious Telescope and Associate Publishing Agent, was named to succeed W. R. Funk as Publishing Agent.

This election had significance because spokesmen for the financial institutions named Showers as the only churchman in whom they had confidence to liquidate the debt of the publishing interests and prevent bankruptcy.

The 1933 Conference made it mandatory that within eight years all applicants for annual conference license had to be graduates "from a standard college, except in extraordinary cases, such cases to be referred to the annual conference for final decision." Some critics saw this action as an attempt to dictate "to God Almighty whom he shall call into the ministry," but the objection was met with the response that "a call to the ministry is a call to preparation. If a person is not able to properly prepare himself, . . . he is not fit to answer God's call." The Reading Course programs for ministerial candidates was revised through bibliographical changes and the dropping of memory work and course work in German.

The consequences of the national depression of 1929 were very much in evidence during the Conference. The Church Erection Department reported that no new church structures had been undertaken in two years. The Home Missions and Church Erection Society reported it was five months "in arrears in the payment of our missionaries," and the situation was to worsen within the ensuing quadrennium. However, even though the Woman's Missionary Association was also suffering financial problems, the work of foreign missions seemed to be able to weather the financial crisis.

The attitude of Americans toward Japanese and the rise of Communism in China caused more concern than did finances. In fact, the 1933 Conference took the position that in spite of the realities of the depression, too many pastors and churches were using it as an excuse for not meeting obligations to the denomination. Annual conferences were given authority to bring before a special committee any pastor and lay delegate of a local congregation that had neither met its benevolence budget nor taken in any new members during a twelve-month period.

The area of Christian Education was strengthened by enlarging the size and scope of the conference and local boards of Christian education, establishing three age-level councils within the local church, and providing for general conventions of Christian education and summer camp programs. The Conference took action to provide greater support for higher education within the denomination.

1937. General Conference met in Chambersburg, Pa., May 11-19, with the following bishops in attendance: Henry H. Fout, Grant D. Batdorf, Arthur R. Clippingier, Arthur B. Statton, and Ira D. Warner. Bishop Emeritus William M. Bell had died during the quadrennium. All five incumbents were reelected by the Conference. Bishop Statton read the "Quadrennial Address of the Board of Bishops."

The Church Union Committee appointed in 1933 reported progress in its plans to seek a merger with THE EVANGELICAL CHURCH. It reported that the most serious problem encountered was the fact that the United Brethren in Christ did not have a pension program for ministers and their widows comparable to that of The Evangelical Church. This revelation may have prompted the Conference not to postpone a ministerial pension fund campaign as has been done on a number of occasions in the past. The Conference also acted to make it compulsory for all ministers ordained and entering the itinerancy after January 1, 1941, to become members of The Ministerial Pension and Annuity Plan.

The discussion of ministerial standards brought on by action taken at the 1933 General Conference continued through the 1937 Conference even though it was observed that "fewer young ministers were pursuing the Study Course as outlined in the Discipline." Ministers were exhorted, but not required, to attend Bonebrake Seminary. Nevertheless, it was clearly pointed out that beginning with 1941 an applicant for conference license had to be a college graduate. Also, the list of reading materials in the Study Course was revised, over some objection by a delegate who observed that "raising ministerial standards" made it necessary "to raise salaries" since no young man would spend even the money required for Study Course books, if he were to be as poorly paid as some ministers were paid.

When the Conference gave formal approval to the proceedings for reorganizing the printing establishment as THE OTTERBEIN PRESS, it demonstrated its faith in the dedication and accomplishment of J. BALMER SHOWERS, the man the denomination had called from an editorial post in 1931 to meet the financial crisis of the printing establishment. Under the National Administration Program established by Congress in 1934, Showers, who had been named Publishing Agent in 1933, secured court approval in 1935 for the Plan of Reorganization which in turn the 1937 Conference supported.

In addition to the bishops, whose reelection was noted above, the following general officers were also re-elected: J. Balmer Showers, Publishing Agent; W. E. Snyder, Editor of the Religious Telescope; E. E. Harris, Editor of The Watchword; J. W. Owen, Editor of Sunday School Literature; John A. Lyter, Associate Editor; O. T. Deever, General Secretary, Board of Christian Education; Samuel G. Ziegler, General Secretary, Foreign Missionary Society; Victor O. Weidler, who had been named to succeed R. S. Showers, who died during the preceding quadrennium, General Secretary, Home Mission and Church Election Society; and E. E. Ullrich, General Church Treasurer. D. T. GREGORY was named to succeed the retiring S. S. HOUGH as General Secretary of the Board of Administration.

1941. The Conference met in South Bend, Ind., May 13-21. The bishops in attendance were Henry H. Fout, Grant D. Batdorf, Arthur R. Clippinger, Ira D. Warner, and Victor O. Weidler. Bishop Weidler had been elected during the quadrennium to fill a vacancy caused by the death of Arthur B. Statton. During the sessions of this Conference, Bishop Fout retired and was named Bishop Emeritus. Succeeding him was FRED L. DENNIS, a native of Indiana who was serving First Church, Dayton, Ohio, at the time of his election.

The war in Europe and the precarious situation of the United States received considerable attention during the Conference. Impetus was given to this concern about world affairs by Bishop Clippinger's devotional address of Saturday, May 17; a telegram from the America First Committee urging the Conference to memorialize President Roosevelt "by resolution, requesting that he uphold his promises to the American people to keep us out of the wars of others"; and numerous resolutions and recommendations from the Committee on Social Justice and International Relations. Even the recommendation to join the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES was premised on the need for American churches to encourage "our brethren dispersed in lands where worship is not allowed, and who need the ministry and comfort of our own hearts and hands." Among the specific resolutions were these: (1) The Conference urged the President, Secretary of War and Secretary of Navy "to take the same precaution now as in 1917 for protection of our young men in service from being exploited by the liquor traffic and commercialized vice"; (2) The Conference recommended that local churches take special offerings to alleviate "the suffering of hunger and want of those people in both the neutral and belligerent areas of the world"; (3) The Conference urged local churches "where any conscientious objector holds membership" to help provide for his sustenance. (It must be noted that the same resolution took the position that "we as a church will not urge our men to arms, nor will we urge them to take the position of the conscientious objector.") One of the oddities surrounding the discussion of this issue was the fact after the Conference authorized the Committee on Social Justice and International Relations to prepare a special ballot dealing with the attitudes to be taken by the United States with regard to the war in Europe, the Conference refused to permit the distribution of the questionnaire. The questions which never came to a vote were in essence: Should America convoy material into the war zone? Can America's best interests be served by deploying armed forces abroad?

Favorable reaction to the addresses of Bishop George E. Epp of The Evangelical Church, H. R. Heining, President of The Evangelical Theological Seminary, and Bishop H. H. Fout of the United Brethren in Christ indicated that the possibility of merger between the Evangelical and United Brethren Churches was immanent. The Conference expressed its approval of the work of its Commission on Church Union but made it clear that ratification of the proposed union would be postponed until the 1945 General Conference. It was also noted that General Conference approval would have to be followed in the United Brethren Church by a favorable vote at both the annual conferences and local church levels.

In addition to the bishops, other general church officers were elected as follows: Reelections—J. Balmer Showers, Publishing Agent; W. E. Snyder, Editor of Religious Telescope; E. E. Harris, Editor of The Watchword; D. T. Gregory, General Secretary, Board of Administration; O. T. Deever, General Secretary, Board of Christian Education; Samuel G. Ziegler, General Secretary, Foreign Missionary Society; U. P. Hovermale, who had replaced Victor O. Weidler during the quadrennium when the latter became bishop, General Secretary, Home Mission and Church Election Society; S. S. Hough, General Secretary Emeritus; and Wesley O. Clark, who had succeeded E. E. Ullrich during the quadrennium following the latter's death, General Church Treasurer. Newly elected officers—J. GORDON HOWARD, Editor of Sunday School Literature, replacing J. W. Owen, who became Editor Emeritus; and O. O. Arnold, Associate Editor.

1945. General Conference, meeting in Westerville, Ohio, May 15-22, approved and sent on to the annual conferences and local churches for ratification the Basis of Union with The Evangelical Church by a vote of 227-2. Five active bishops and Bishop Emeritus, Henry H. Fout, attended the session. The five were Grant D. Batdorf, Arthur R. Clippinger, Fred L. Dennis, Ira D. Warner, and Victor O. Weidler. Four of the five were re-elected; and J. Balmer Showers, Publishing Agent, was named to succeed Bishop Batdorf.

In addition to the bishops the following were also reelected to general church offices: David T. Gregory, Secretary, Board of Administration; O. T. Deever, Secretary, Board of Christian Education; Samuel G. Ziegler, Secretary, Board of Foreign Missions; U. P. Hovermale, Secretary, Board of Home Missions and Church Extension; Stanley B. Williams, Associate Secretary; W. E. Snyder, Editor of the Religious Telescope; E. E. Harris, Editor of The Watchword; and Wesley O. Clark, General Church Treasurer. John H. Ness, Sr. was named to succeed J. Balmer Showers as Publishing Agent, but the next day he resigned and L. L. Huffman was elected. O. O. Arnold succeeded J. Gordon Howard, newly elected President of Otterbein College, as Editor of Sunday School Literature. Paul R. Koontz was elected Associate Editor.

The Conference greeted with considerable enthusiasm the reports that three important agencies of the Church had liquidated their indebtedness during the preceding quadrennium: The Publishing House, Bonebrake Seminary, and the Otterbein Home. On the second night of the Conference, the delegates viewed a pageant dealing with the history of Otterbein College, then moving toward its centennial. Otterbein is the oldest college of the United Brethren in Christ.

The Conference gave considerable attention to evangelism in its broadest sense and stressed the need for closer attention to "bringing souls to a saving faith in Jesus Christ." The address of Jesse M. Bader, Evangelism Secretary of the Federal Council of Churches, was so forceful that it led the official Conference stenographer to make a public confession and seek admission into the United Brethren Church. The correspondent for The Religious Telescope reported that "It was a high point in the Conference and for a time business was forgotten as the congregation burst into spontaneous singing and spiritual emotion."

1946. A special session of the General Conference preliminary to the merger conference with The Evangelical Church, convened in the First United Brethren Church, Johnstown, Pa., Wednesday, November 13, with Senior Bishop Arthur R. Clippinger, presiding. The five active bishops and two bishops emeriti were in attendance—Arthur R. Clippinger, J. Balmer Showers, Ira D. Warner, Fred L. Dennis, and Victor O. Weidler, active bishops, and Henry H. Fout and Grant D. Batdorf.

Many of the reports of the boards and agencies contained brief historical statements in addition to summaries of recent activities. In the cases of Otterbein College and Bonebrake Seminary, the historical statements were natural outgrowths of their own activities since Otterbein was closing its first century of service, and Bonebrake Seminary had just observed its seventy-fifth anniversary. In all cases, the historical statements were used as a backdrop against which optimism for the future in a merged church was voiced. The session on Friday night, November 15, closed the Thirty-Fourth General Conference of the Church of the United Brethren in Christ by emphasizing the need for evangelism and stewardship. At the conclusion of three addresses on these subjects, the Conference passed a resolution to the effect that all legal and ecclesiastical matters were in order for union with The Evangelical Church the next morning.

GENERAL CONFERENCES

OF THE EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION, 1816-1922

1816. The Conference which convened at the home of MARTIN DREISBACH in Buffalo Valley, Union Co., Pa., October 14, was engaged in a search for identity as an organization. The name "So-Called Albright's People" was no more satisfactory than the name "The Newly-Formed Methodist Conference," adopted at the annual conference of 1807, had been. JACOB ALBRIGHT himself had died in 1808 and there were some deviations from established designation in local situations. Consequently, one of the items of business at the conference was adopting the name "The Evangelical Association" (Diese Vereinigte Evangelische Gemeinschaft, according to the original Conference Book).

Coupled with this search for a name was a search for broader association with other German people of similar religious enthusiasm and experience. Because of contacts between JOHN DREISBACH, who had emerged as a strong leader after the death of Albright, and Bishop CHRISTIAN

NEWCOMER of the Church of the United Brethren in Christ, the prospects of union between the two groups received serious consideration. However, the committee of six persons appointed to meet with a similar group of United Brethren was under instruction to meet in "social conference," a situation which was no more fruitful than a similar meeting had been in 1813. Interestingly enough, when the revised and enlarged Discipline was presented for approval by John Dreisbach and HENRY NIEBEL, the Conference voted that 1500 copies of the document should be printed if the contemplated merger with the United Brethren did not materialize; but there appears to have been no such qualification in the authorization to print 1500 copies of a new hymnal, "The Spiritual Lyre" (Das Geistliche Saitenspiel), also compiled by Dreisbach and Niebel.

In other action, the Conference named Solomon Miller as general book agent and Henry Niebel as his assistant for the operation of the newly established printing house at nearby New Berlin. The annual cash salary of itinerant ministers was established at $60 plus travel expenses.

No bishop was elected at this conference nor at any other conference prior to 1839, when it was deemed necessary to establish the post for better supervision of the pastors.

1820. The General Conference met jointly with the Annual Conference at New Berlin, Pa., June 5-9. All eligible voters of the Annual Conference were certified to vote at the General Conference. John Dreisbach was named President of the Conference and General Book Agent for the denomination.

Business attended to pertained to the book publishing and printing. The Association had 1,992 members, thirty-two itinerant elders, and fifty local preachers. Annual salary of preachers, married or single, was $36.30, exclusive of travel expenses.

1826. The session met jointly with the Annual Conference at New Berlin, Pa., June 5, with JOHN SEYBERT as President.

A second Annual Conference was authorized covering the State of Ohio and named the Western Conference. The original Annual Conference in Pennsylvania was named the Eastern Conference. At the outset, the Western Conference was more of a geographical convenience than an independently functioning judicatory. It was dependent upon the Eastern Conference for both funds and preachers; and until 1839, it was responsible to the Eastern Conference for its actions. Until 1835, it met at least three weeks prior to the Eastern Conference in order that its minutes might be sent to the parent body for approval.

The 1826 Conference showed considerable interest in both the conduct and doctrine of its preachers. It ordered annual examination of each preacher, a project which apparently never fully developed. The Conference also reiterated previous urgings that "wherever practicable, a parsonage be built or bought, by voluntary contributions" for the pastor and his family at every charge.

1827. The Conference met at Orwigsburg, Pa., June 4. This may have been merely another Annual Conference session, even though the minutes refer to the event as a General Conference. Jacob Barber was elected President, but there appears to have been little business affecting both the Eastern and Western Conferences.

The Eastern Conference recorded 2,044 members and the Western Conference, 523.

1830. Conference met November 1, in Centre County,

Pa., JOSEPH LONG serving as President. All elders of the two annual conferences were entitled to attend, but only eight elected delegates were permitted to vote.

The chief business was the revision of the Discipline. The twenty-one Articles of Faith adopted in 1816 were reduced to nineteen by the omission of articles dealing with "Of the Marriage of Preachers" and "Of the Oath of a Christian." Minor changes were made in other Articles. According to Joseph Long, "The General Rules and Instructions of this Association were changed and considerably abbreviated," but the minutes lists none of them. The Conference ordered the Discipline published in English as well as in German.

The Conference ruled, however, that no preacher should be received into the Association unless he had some proficiency in German. Leaders of the denomination feared that work among the Germans would suffer unless this policy were adopted. Conversely, the work among the English-speaking people suffered because of this resolution. The resolution was finally repealed in 1843.

1835. General Conference met at Orwigsburg, Pa., on May 25, with HENRY NIEBEL serving as President. Since no rule to elect delegates to General Conference had yet been agreed upon, every elder in the Eastern and Western Conferences was eligible to vote.

This General Conference transacted more business than had been done at any previous session. It somewhat modified the boundaries of the Eastern and Western Conferences and established three districts in the east and two in the west. It passed a resolution authorizing the publication of a monthly periodical, Der Christliche Botschafter, as soon as 700 subscribers had been procured. Publication began in January 1836.

Noting that in 1832 the Association had founded a Sunday school in Lebanon, Pa., and that a number of local congregations had done likewise since that time, the Conference instructed every preacher to organize German Sunday schools whenever possible on his circuit. It founded the Charitable Society to look after the affairs of retired itinerants and the widows and children of deceased itinerants; and it attempted a new formula for paying the salaries of preachers, but soon found that this reduced the salaries of married men with up to two children and increased the salaries of single men.

The Conference ordered the Eastern and Western Conferences to meet regularly in March, called upon each circuit and station to keep a proper record of quarterly conference sessions, and instituted local preacher conferences on each circuit.

1836. A special session met in Somerset County, Pa., November 14, with Henry Niebel serving as President. The major concern was the attempt to re-establish the publishing house and book bindery. After considerable debate over the possibility of repeating a previous failure, the Conference agreed upon establishing a publishing house at New Berlin, Pennsylvania. William W. Orwig was elected Editor of Der Christliche Botschafter and General Book Agent and was instructed to collect funds for the new enterprise within the bounds of the Eastern Conference. An order was placed immediately for 4,000 copies of the Geistliche Viole, a hymnbook first published in 1818, and for 2,000 copies of J. C. Reinsner's German school book to be used in the newly established Sunday schools.

The Eastern and Western Conferences were declared independent of one another except in the support of their preachers, and the Eastern Conference lost to the General Conference the privilege of calling the latter body into session.

The Conference also established a disciplinary procedure for transferring members who had moved from the area served by one circuit to an area served by another circuit. Individuals were also granted considerable latitude in Baptism. The method of Baptism was optional and persons who had been previously baptized were free to be baptized again if they so desired.

1839. The Conference which met March 25, near Millheim, in Centre County, Pa., Thomas Buck, Chairman, was the most significant Conference of the denomination up until that time.

First, there was manifest need for a bishop, a spiritual leader it had not had since the death of JACOB ALBRIGHT in 1808, even though the Discipline carried numerous references to such an office. To fill the position, it named John Seybert, a forty-seven-year-old man with average preaching ability but with sincere devotion and humility and with outstanding executive talents.

Second, the Conference fixed the Articles of Faith in permanent form: "The Articles of Faith contain all the unchangeable foundational doctrines of Holy Scripture, consequently it is perfectly and logically just they should be constitutionally unchangeable among us."

Third, the Conference limited its own power by adopting a constitution which required a two-thirds majority of all members of every annual conference before any constitutional changes could be made. The General Conference reserved for itself only the changing of disciplinary regulations over temporal economy.

Fourth, the Conference divided the two existing annual conferences into three: East Pennsylvania, West Pennsylvania, and Ohio. Although the Bishop was not granted power to transfer preachers across annual conference lines, individual preachers were granted the privilege of making such changes on their own.

Fifth, the Conference established a system for selecting elders to serve as delegates to General Conference. The ratio was one delegate for every four ministers in each annual conference.

Sixth, the Conference demonstrated its support for the Missionary Society founded in the Eastern Conference in 1838 by including in the Discipline a section on the "Support of Missions."

Seventh, the Conference took a definite stand on two social issues: it opposed the manufacture of spirituous liquors by any member of the Association for any use other than medicinal, and condemned the trading and ownership of slaves by any member.

1843. The Conference met October 23-November 4 in Greensburg, Ohio, the first Conference assembled according to the rules of delegation adopted in 1839. Bishop John Seybert presided and was re-elected to serve another quadrennium. The Conference decided that a second bishop was needed, and named Joseph Long to serve with Bishop Seybert.

Whereas the 1830 General Conference had demonstrated concern for ministering to the Germans, the 1843 Conference acknowledged a growing need for adequate ministry among the English-speaking people. It resolved to labor more diligently among the English-speaking people, announced that an English conference could be organized as soon as ten or more preachers asked for it, ordered the enlargement of the English hymnal, and decided to publish an English newspaper as soon as practicable.

Ministerial welfare again received considerable attention. Each annual conference was urged to take responsibility for paying its own preachers without seeking help from another conference. Annual salaries were fixed at $100 for single preachers and $200 for married preachers, with allowances of $25 for each child under fourteen. In addition, every preacher was to receive expense money. The salary of bishops was set at the same level, and the care of retired itinerants and the widows and orphans of itinerants was expedited by dividing in equal share among the annual conferences the interest from the investments of the Charitable Society, and the profits from the printing establishment.

Because of the distrust of many of the laity, there was less unanimity among the delegates, who were all itinerants, on the educational qualifications of the clergy. Nevertheless, this Conference went on record believing that an educated, divinely called minister can generally accomplish more for the Lord than an uneducated, divinely called minister. To follow up this declaration, the Conference called for the development of a course of study for ministers and ministerial candidates. The Conference also ordered the reprinting of a number of books and hymnals for general use and called for a revitalization of a lagging interest in producing a history of the denomination.

The Conference created a fourth annual conference, the Illinois Conference, by removing from the Ohio Conference all work located within the boundaries of Indiana and Illinois.

Two fraternal delegates from the M. E. Church were received by the Conference.

1847. The Conference met at New Berlin, Pa., September 29, with Bishops John Seybert and Joseph Long in attendance. Both were re-elected. However, before Bishop Seybert could be reelected, the Conference had to set aside two standing rules: that a bishop should be chosen only from the ranks of the presiding elders, and that a bishop could not serve more than two terms.

Much time was spent at this Conference trying to resolve a dispute between the Editor of Der Christliche Botschafter, Adam Ettinger, and the General Publishing Agent, J. C. Reisner. Both were removed from office and ordered to be reconciled with one another.

The Conference made the first significant steps toward establishing an educational institution under the auspices of the Evangelical Association when it resolved to establish "a seminary for general sciences" and sent the matter to the membership of the church for approval. However, the membership turned down the proposal. Meanwhile, individual preachers were urged to make more diligent efforts to establish Sunday schools.

The problem of working among English-speaking people continued to vex the Evangelical Association. This Conference authorized establishing an English paper, The Evangelical Messenger, as soon as there were 800 subscribers. Publication began Jan. 8, 1848. However, forming an English conference was put almost out of reach when it was voted that twenty preachers would have to ask for such a conference.

A fifth annual conference was established by taking away from the East Pennsylvania Conference all territory lying in Canada and New York (exclusive of New York City). The new judicatory was called the New York Conference.

Secret societies came up for discussion at this General Conference since some annual conferences had banned their members from such organizations; but action by General Conference was postponed at this time.

1851. Conference met September 17, at Flat Rock, Ohio, with Bishops John Seybert and Joseph Long in attendance. Both were reelected.

The growth of the Association dominated most of the deliberations of the Conference. Two new annual conferences—the Pittsburgh and Indiana Conferences—were formed. An effort was made to grant the bishops power to transfer preachers across conference lines in order to meet the challenge of expansion, but the motion failed to win a two-thirds majority. Permission was given to preachers and congregations to introduce a system of six months' probation in the reception of members wherever such a course should be considered beneficial.

The matter of moving the printing establishment to a more advantageous location was discussed at length. By a slim margin of five votes, the Conference finally acted to move the establishment from New Berlin, Pa., to Cleveland, Ohio.

Significant for the later history of the Association was the appointment of John Nicolai as first missionary to Germany.

1855 Conference met September 19 in Lebanon, Pa., with Bishops John Seybert and Joseph Long in attendance. Both were re-elected for the next quadrennium.

This General Conference took note of the growth of the Association and tailored its actions to this growth. With 247 itinerant preachers, it no longer seemed feasible to elect one delegate to the Conference for every four preachers, so the ratio was changed to one for every seven. The work begun by the Illinois Conference in Wisconsin had prospered to the point where a separate Wisconsin Conference could be established; and Illinois responded in 1856 by sending a missionary to Minnesota.

In order that the Association might reach people more effectively and feed those who were already in its care, the Conference established a children's paper, Der Christliche Kinderfreund, organized a tract society, and ordered a printing of the History of the Evangelical Association in both German and English.

When Charles C. Koch presented a request that the Evangelical Association plan to unite with the Wesleyan Methodist Church and the Church of the United Brethren in Christ, the matter was politely received, but no official action was taken because there was some question of the legality of the method used in bringing the matter before Conference, and because the general sentiment of the delegates was that there was ample room for cooperation without organic union.

1859. The General Conference met in Naperville, Ill., October 5-18, under conditions that might have torn the group apart had it not been for wise leadership. Two years earlier, Solomon Neitz, a presiding elder in the East Pennsylvania Conference, had published a pamphlet that ran counter to the Articles of Faith of the Association—Christian Sanctification in Accordance with the Apostolic Doctrine. At the time, his own annual conference refused to take action against him; and he continued to promulgate his ideas in Der Christliche Botschafter.

At the instigation of W. W. Orwig, charges were preferred against Neitz by the General Conference and debate on the matter consumed almost a day and a half. Finally, with delegates from the East Pennsylvania abstaining, the Conference voted to sustain the charges and make them a matter of record but did not take any punitive action toward Neitz. In fact, Neitz was entrusted with the responsibility to revise and enlarge a Historical Catechism and was named to the newly established Board of Publication.

Bishops John Seybert and Joseph Long were re-elected; but because of the failing health of Seybert (he died Jan. 4, 1860), a third bishop, W. W. Orwig, was elected. Bishops Long and Orwig were also named to serve with the editors of the various publications in drawing up a course of study for preachers.

As in 1855, signs of expansion were in evidence in 1859. To facilitate missions and publication, the Conference organized a Board of Missions and a Board of Publication. To give closer supervision to Sunday school work, the Conference combined the work of the tract society with it in the Sunday School and Tract Movement.

A new Conference, the Iowa Conference, was organized and divided into three districts coinciding with the geographical areas covered by the new Conference; they were the Iowa, Kansas, and Minnesota Districts. Meanwhile, the Conference granted the West Pennsylvania Conference permission to change its name to the Central Pennsylvania Conference.

Almost unnoticed in the excitement of the charges brought against Solomon Neitz, Adam Ettinger, who had left the Church in the 1847 dispute over publications, was re-admitted into the fellowship.

1863. Conference met October 1-20, in Buffalo, N. Y., with Bishops Joseph Long and William W. Orwig in attendance. Bishop Long was re-elected on the first ballot, but Bishop Orwig withdrew from the race when he failed to win election on the third ballot. Finally, on the fourth ballot, a new bishop was named: John J. Esher, a vigorous young delegate from Illinois who had earlier risen to his feet to cry out against the pessimism he noted in the first episcopal address delivered before Conference. Solomon Neitz, who had been called to order in 1859 because of his holiness views, gained a substantial number of votes for bishop.

New annual conferences continued to spin off from established annual conferences even though the actual growth in membership was not great. A new Conference in Germany was authorized, and three North American bodies were organized: the Canada, Kansas, and Michigan Conferences.

The Civil War made its influence felt during this General Conference; but not because there were known slaveholders among the membership, for the Discipline had forbidden slavery. Instead, the impact was financial, moral, and social. Since slavery had already been declared immoral, war itself was now debated on these grounds; furthermore, there was great concern over how America would care for the vast numbers of freed slaves to be thrown upon society. As a result of these discussions, the editors of church publications were admonished to regard Holy Scripture and the Discipline, to guard and advocate the interests of the Church, and grant a hearing to both sides on controversial subjects. Also, the Board of Missions was directed to find ways to evangelize the newly emancipated slaves.

Missionary zeal was running high in the Association at this time. Earlier in the year, the New York Conference had received funds from enthusiastic supporters in the name of President Lincoln and Queen Victoria, both of whom were made honorary members of the Missionary Society. Another missionary, John Walz, was sent to Germany; and three, instead of two, missionaries were sent to the West Coast.

According to Raymond Albright (A History of the Evangelical Church), the Association was suffering a leadership crisis at this time: (1) the older men were rapidly passing from the scene or becoming less effective; and (2) the number of general church officers was growing at such a rate that some of the best new leadership was absorbed here; but when it came to General Conference, these men had no voice because they were not elected delegates.

1867. The Conference met October 10-28, in Pittsburgh, Pa., under a cloud of theological debate. Solomon Neitz had again stirred up the controversy over entire Sanctification with a sermon in the public press. He had been joined by others, including the Editor of The Evangelical Messenger, and their clamor could not be ignored by the Conference. After Neitz had had an opportunity to explain what he meant in his sermon, the Conference acquitted him. However, it immediately appointed a committee to prepare an authoritative statement on the doctrine of holiness.

The committee brought in a five-pointed statement that was unanimously adopted by the Conference: (1) Christ is the only, all-sufficient source and pattern of sanctification and Christian perfection; (2) entire sanctification has its foundation in regeneration; (3) Christian perfection results in perfect love and in the Christian's having the mind that was in Jesus Christ; (4) sanctification and Christian perfection can be attained in this life and can be retained through faithfulness; and (5) the state of sanctification is reached through entire consecration and self-offering, either gradually or instantaneously. The adoption of this report seemed to bring peace on the issue, although it did come up again in 1887.

In response to the leadership crisis noted in 1863, the 1867 Conference made the following ex officio members of General Conference: the book agent, the elected editors, the corresponding secretary of the Missionary Society, and the bishops, when they are not presiding. After defeating a motion to elect three bishops, the Conference re-elected Bishops Joseph Long and John J. Esher, both of whom were in attendance at the session.

In other action, the 1867 Conference (1) took over from the Ohio Conference the operation of the orphanage it had founded at Tiffin, Ohio; (2) established the General Conference as a court of appeals for any minister who felt that he had been unjustly censured or expelled; (3) constituted the General Conference as the supreme law court of the Association; and (4) went on record opposing the use of tobacco.

The Conference received with enthusiasm the visit and address of WILLIAM NAST of the M. E. Church. In response, the Conference agreed that while it did not appear practical for the Association to enter into organic union with the Methodist Episcopal Church, every effort should be made to serve the Lord cooperatively.

1871. Conference met at Naperville, Ill., October 12-27, only a few days after the disastrous Chicago fire, a situation which prompted the Association to investigate the possibilities of establishing its own mutual fire insurance company.

Since Bishop Joseph Long had died June 23, 1869, Bishop John J. Esher was the only bishop present. He was reelected and Reuben Yeakel, Editor of The Evangelical Messenger, was named to serve with him.

The doctrinal debates had all but subsided by 1871. This was due in large measure to the fact that the official publications of the denomination were now in the hands of editors who supported the denominational position on holiness. While these editors gave little space to opposition views, the 1871 Conference took an interesting step and repealed a statute that had prohibited ministers from publishing books without first submitting them to a review committee.

In other action, the Conference (1) refused to go on record as an anti-secret society church but urged its preachers to keep "aloo from oathbound secret societies"; (2) again turned aside requests to bring about organic union between the Evangelical Association and the Methodist Episcopal Church; and (3) permitted preachers to serve three years instead of two on the same field of service.

1875. General Conference met October 14 to November 4, in Philadelphia, Pa., with Bishops John J. Esher and Reuben Yeakel in attendance. Although there was concern that the Association was not growing as rapidly as it had grown during the quadrennium prior to 1871, the Conference felt it necessary to elect four bishops. Bishops Esher and Yeakel were reelected, and the Conference also named Rudolph Dubs, Editor of Der Christliche Botschafter, and Thomas Bowman, a presiding elder in the East Pennsylvania Conference.

The matter of bi-lingual ministry dominated a good portion of this session; and after two days of discussion, it was agreed that it would be appropriate to organize German conferences in order that work among such people would not suffer. Three specific conferences were established to minister to German-speaking people: The Atlantic Conference, the Erie Conference, and the Iowa Conference (English-speaking congregations in the latter area were to be reorganized as the Des Moines Conference). A Pacific Conference was organized for churches on the West Coast, a Southern Illinois Conference for churches in parts of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Kentucky, and in Europe, a Switzerland Conference.

In terms of expansion, the most significant action taken by this Conference was approving the plan of the Board of Missions to send missionaries to Japan. This move into the Orient led the delegates to rise and sing the Doxology in both German and English.

As an act of participating in the national centennial of 1876, the Conference voted to raise $100,000 for the educational institutions of the Association: Union Seminary (forerunner of ALBRIGHT COLLEGE), Northwestern College (forerunner of NORTH CENTRAL COLLEGE), and Union Biblical Institute (forerunner of THE EVANGELICAL THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY at Naperville, Illinois).

1879. The Conference met October 2-20, in Chicago Ill., with Bishops John J. Esher, Reuben Yeakel, Rudolph Dubs, and Thomas Bowman in attendance. When the number of bishops was reduced to three, Bishops Esher, Dubs, and Bowman were reelected.

With concern for both the growing number of congregations and those who ministered to them, the bishops called for a more highly trained ministry and cautioned both the clergy and the laity to do all in their power to retain worship services in both English and German. The Conference of 1879 also showed its concern for the growing number of young people by ordering a new catechism that would be printed in both English and German and one that could be used in connection with the Sunday school program of the local church.

Although the matter had come up previously, the 1879 General Conference decided to find a more appropriate name than Evangelical Association of North America; but when it took the proposed name, "The Evangelical Church of North America," to the annual conferences for approval, it was rejected. In other action affecting administration and organization, the Conference (1) rejected a proposal to station bishops by areas, (2) withdrew the ex officio relationship to General Conference which elected general church officers had enjoyed, and (3) tightened its system of granting exhorters' licenses.

The Conference authorized the formation of the Nebraska and Platte River Conferences; and in recognition of the growing responsibility of the publishing house, named two publishing agents.

1883. Conference met at Allentown, Pa., October 4-25, with Bishops John J. Esher, Rudolph Dubs, and Thomas Bowman in attendance. The sudden and brief illness of Bishop Dubs early in the session caused considerable concern; but in a few days he was able to assume his role. All three bishops were reelected for the next quadrennium.

The growing strength and influence of the publishing interest, which had been acknowledged in the election of a second publishing agent in 1879, led the 1883 Conference to devise a plan for the distribution of the profits of the enterprise among the annual conferences: one half to be distributed equally among the conferences, and the other half to be distributed on the basis of business turned in by the individual conferences.

Throughout this session, there was high concern for the Christian family, especially the children. Any member of the Association who married an unconverted person was placed on probation for six months. Parents were admonished to look after the spiritual welfare of their children; and the program for training Sunday school teachers which had received attention in 1879 was given new support in 1883 with the subsequent publication of extensive literature for use in the work.

The 1883 Conference went on record for the preservation of Sunday as a holy day and urged laborers to see that their employers grant them one day's rest in seven. To fortify their argument, members of the Conference called on people to travel to and from camp meetings on Saturday and Monday and forbade the sale of anything on camp meeting grounds on Sunday itself. In other actions dealing with social issues, the Conference (1) condemned the loose marriage and divorce laws of some states, (2) called for the abolition of the liquor traffic, and (3) denounced gambling, including speculation on the stock market.

The Conference acknowledged the organization of Schuylkill Seminary, Reading, Pennsylvania, the fifth educational institution under annual conference sponsorship in North America and Europe; and in other actions, the Conference (1) granted a charter to the Woman's Missionary Society, (2) ordered the division of the Minnesota Conference into the Minnesota and Dakota Conferences, and the division of the Pacific Conference into the Oregon and California Conferences, and (3) postponed indefinitely the "Ecumenical Affair" with the Methodist Episcopal Church.

1887. Conference met September 1-27 in Buffalo, N. Y., with Bishops John J. Esher, Rudolph Dubs, and Thomas Bowman in attendance. Apprehension concerning the condition of the church, which was expressed in the Episcopal Address, prefaced the stormiest General Conference and quadrennium the Evangelical Association had ever experienced.

The call for an examination of the moral character of the delegates unleashed the first wave of dissent. Charges were hurled at Bishop Esher, H. B. HARTZLER (editor of The Evangelical-Messenger) and several others. Subsequently, the name of Bishop Esher was cleared, and along with Bishops Dubs and Bowman, he was reelected for the next quadrennium. However, the charges against Hartzler ("unchristian conduct, official misconduct and grievous official offense as Minister and as Editor in our Church") were upheld and he was removed from office.

Another controversy arose over the seating of a fourth delegate from Minnesota Conference; and when the issue came to a vote both those who favored and those who opposed the seating asked that their votes be made a matter of record in the minutes. Behind these controversies were keen personal rivalries among the leaders, especially between Bishops Esher and Dubs; resistance to attempt limiting the episcopal form of government, and probably the constant irritation over the doctrine of Christian Perfection.

Despite the continuing controversy, the Conference found time to transact some business. It authorized the formation of the Texas Conference, reiterated its prohibition against ministers marrying divorced persons, urged that annual conferences take a more active role in providing catechetical instruction in the local churches, extended its "blue laws" to urge church members not to read Sunday editions of newspapers and not to own or hold part interest in an enterprise that does business on Sunday, and called upon annual conferences to keep more efficient records.

1891. The Conference meeting in Indianapolis, Ind., October 1-21, was crucial. Its authority had been challenged by the minority group which had planned its own conference in Philadelphia (see 1891 General Conference of The United Evangelical Church).

Bishops John J. Esher and Thomas Bowman, who were cleared during the conference of charges brought against them in Chicago in 1890, presided over the session. Bishop Rudolph Dubs, who had also been charged by the Chicago committee, had defected from the Association to form the minority group in Philadelphia. The General Conference suspended him and arranged for his replacement. Four episcopal leaders were elected for the next quadrennium. Bishops Esher and Bowman were reelected, and the new bishops were SYLVANUS C. BREYFOGEL, a presiding elder of the East Pennsylvania Conference, and WILLIAM HORN, Editor of Der Christliche Botschafter and Secretary of the General Conference.

The Conference acted against the dissidents, and what had begun as honest debate on theology and polity had now deteriorated into personal conflict. The Conference refused to compromise with the minority and opposed the use of an "outside board of arbiters" to resolve the conflict. It declared that by their actions in going to Philadelphia, the minority had "disentitled themselves of any of the privileges of membership" in the Evangelical Association, and insisted that no preacher who had allied himself with the minority group could function as a preacher of the Association "without being received anew after reformation and accepted in due form by some lawfully constituted annual conference of the Church."

The Conference, though still constituted only of ministers (ninety-eight of them), could no longer ignore the agitation for lay representation—one point at issue in the debate with the minority; the laymen also had been trying hard to bring peace between the warring factions. Consequently, the Conference appointed a nine-man commission (five ministers and four laymen) to prepare a plan and report on the subject.

1895. General Conference met in Elgin, Ill., October 3-18, with Bishops John J. Esher, Thomas Bowman, Sylvanus C. Breyfogel, and William Horn in attendance. All four were reelected.

A report on the state of the church stated that, "The period of conflict has practically come to a close. The government and authority of the Church has been severely tested and fully recognized by the civil courts; . . . the effort to destroy the Church and confound her councils has signally failed."

A few cases of litigation over church property still remained unsettled; but for all intents and purposes the Association was in a position to reorganize itself following the division. The bishops played a major role in the conservation of the Church at this time; and their Episcopal Message reaffirmed their "earnest desire that the relations of this office [bishopric] to the General Conference might remain the same in the future as in the past, and that the General Conference of our Church in its duties toward this highly important office may be always found true to its charge. For in this office the entire Church is officially represented; . . . there be no place in the Evangelical Association for prelatical airs and assumptions in this office. Only by a pure character, a holy walk and conversation, coupled with exemplary faithfulness in the administration of his duties in the meekness of our Lord and the wisdom which is of God, can a bishop in our Church secure to himself the highest esteem in which this office is held in the Evangelical Association. For as the Church in its entirety is represented in this office, and are our bishops the overseers of the Church in particular as well as in general, then truly a sacred dignity adheres in this office."

It is to be noted also that the Association never did adopt the two-term limitation which The United Evangelical Church had adopted in 1894. The Conference also refused to limit the presiding elders to two successive terms.

Lay representation gained ground in 1895 with the presentation of a proposal allowing the election of one lay delegate in each annual conference for the first 4,500 members and a second delegate in those conferences with a membership of 9,000 or more. No annual conference was allowed more than two lay delegates. However, the absence of a lay delegation in 1899 indicates that the proposal did not become law at this time.

1899. The Conference met in St. Paul, Minn., October 5-23, with Bishops Esher, Bowman, Breyfogel, and Horn in attendance. All four bishops were reelected on the first ballot.

The ill effects of the schism of the early part of the decade were being overcome throughout the Church. Although the number of churches and parsonages had declined during the 1895-99 quadrennium, increases were reported in the following areas: 49 new itinerant elders, 116 new local elders, 7,518 new members, 111 new Sunday schools, and 22,549 new Sunday school members, 242 new Young Peoples Alliance chapters with 8,798 new members, and an increase in missionary contributions of $55,552. In spite of these modest gains, the Episcopal Message expressed deep concern over those areas most seriously hit by disturbances of 1891.

The bishops called for (1) a Centennial Jubilee of the Evangelical Association in 1900; (2) care in placing men in pulpits and in entrusting leadership for religious meetings; (3) the administration of discipline according to the will of the Lord and the Discipline of the Association; and (4) a firm attitude against "intrusion into the Church of all worldly entertainments and gatherings; . . . attendance at places of worldly amusement; . . . every form of extravagance either in dress or in luxurious living . . . every form of desecration of the Lord's Day and . . . the crime of intemperance and every evil connected with it."

The Conference noted that the Germany Conference had grown from humble beginnings in 1865 to a conference of more than eighty ministers in 1899. Also, the report of a recent visitor to CHINA was so optimistic that the Conference authorized a study to determine whether or not missionary activity might be undertaken there. It also authorized a study of the possibility of organizing a society for deaconesses.

Children of the Church received considerable attention: (1) a special pronouncement in the relation of children to the Church was prepared and approved for publication in the Discipline, and (2) authorization was granted for the publication of a Junior Catechism for children aged eight to twelve. The matter of lay representation at General Conference was opened again in 1899, when another committee of five ministers and four laymen was appointed to study the issue and report in 1903.

1903. Conference met in Berlin, Ontario, Canada, October 1-21, with Bishops Bowman, Breyfogel, and Horn in attendance. Bishop Esher had passed away April 16, 1901. Bishops Bowman, Breyfogel, and Horn were reelected, but Bishop Esher was not replaced.

This Conference finally adopted and sent to the annual conferences for approval a proposal establishing lay representation at General Conference. The following formula was established: annual conferences of fewer than 7,000 members, one delegate; annual conferences with a membership of 7,000 to 15,000, two delegates; and annual conferences with more than 15,000 members, three delegates.

Other actions: (1) plans were made to establish a Deaconess Society and permission was granted to annual conferences to form their own auxiliary societies; (2) a mission field was established in Hunan Province, China; (3) Bishop Breyfogel was instructed to compile for publication a book on Evangelical Church law; (4) stricter rules were adopted for the supervision of local church members and for the more accurate revision of church rolls.

The Episcopal Message noted that there was no dissension among general church officers and "no disquieting elements" in the annual conferences. "Consequently," they continued, "the literature published by the Church has contained less controversial matter than at any period in her history."

The Young People's Alliance received high praise for its unifying force among the young people, for in the 1903-1907 quadrennium this group played a significant role in starting the movement toward the reunion of the Evangelical Association and the United Evangelical Church.

1907. The General Conference met in Milwaukee, Wis., October 3-22; and for the first time laymen were represented in the Conference. Bishops Thomas Bowman, Sylvanus Breyfogel, and William Horn were in attendance and were reelected for the next quadrennium. Samuel P. Spreng, Editor of the Evangelical Messenger, was named the fourth bishop.

The Conference liberalized and extended the principle of lay representation. It adopted a new formula which allowed one delegate for every 3,000 members, but no fewer than one delegate per annual conference. Lay representation was extended to annual conference sessions on the basis of four laymen for each Presiding Elder's district.

This Conference received an extensive report on the efforts to organize a National Federation of the Churches of Christ in America and went on record favoring continued participation in such a movement. It was to be this participation in the Church Federation program along with the activities of the Young People's Alliance that would bring the Evangelical Association and The United Evangelical Church closer to reunion, for both groups shared this nascent ecumenical concern. It was earlier in 1907 (April 8) that young people from both denominations meeting in Chicago framed a resolution calling for closer relationships between the groups that had reached the parting of the ways in the 1890's. A Commission on Church Union and Federation was appointed to consider further the prospects of reunion.

Along with a growing interest in ecumenicity, the Conference showed a deep concern for evangelism and the state of public morals. The former concern led to the formation of a Commission on Evangelism. The latter concern led the Conference to take the position that ignorance and intemperance go hand in hand and urged that temperance work be combined with education in an effort, among other things, to reduce labor problems. To reinforce this position, the Conference also decreed that from this point on, only unfermented wines should be used in the celebration of the Lord's Supper.

The Conference followed up its action of 1903 relative to the formation of a Deaconess Society by adopting a constitution for the organization. In matters relating to the ministry of the Church, the Conference decreed that ministers themselves should give catechetical instruction in their churches, and voted to extend the tenure of a minister at one parish and the tenure of a presiding elder in one district to five years.

1911. The Conference met in Cleveland, Ohio, October 5-23, with Bishops Thomas Bowman, Sylvanus C. Breyfogel, William Horn, and Samuel P. Spreng in attendance. All four were reelected for the next quadrennium.

The Conference heard from its Commission on Church Union that negotiations with The United Evangelical Church were progressing favorably and appointed a new Commission "with enlarged powers and with instructions to continue negotiations with the Commissioners of The United Evangelical Church." However, the Conference referred back to the Commission for further study the request of the Canada Conference for union with the Methodist Church in Canada. The Conference instructed its Board of Bishops to appoint fraternal delegates to The United Evangelical Church, the Church of the United Brethren in Christ, and the Methodist Episcopal Church.

The responsibilities of the Commission on Evangelism, which had been formed in 1907, were broadened to include a Bureau of Literature and a Bureau of Social Service. Interest in public morals also ran high during this General Conference, with the body going on record (1) favoring "civic righteousness" on the part of elected officials as well as the general population, (2) commending "Anthony Comstock, and others, toward the suppression of impure literature and the White Slave Trade," and (3) registering disapproval over the fact that the Secretary of Agriculture under President Taft, James A. Wilson, had accepted an invitation to act as Honorary President of the Brewer's International Congress.

The 1911 General Conference also took a significant step in the direction of caring for its ministers after retirement by establishing a Superannuation Fund with an extensive constitution, a general secretary, and a strong Board of Administration consisting of both laymen and ministers. However, two quadrenniums were to pass—one for educating the Church to the need and one for fund raising—before the Fund would become legally incorporated and fully operative.

1915. The General Conference met in Los Angeles, Calif., October 7-25, with Bishops Thomas Bowman, Sylvanus C. Breyfogel, William Horn, and Samuel P. Spreng in attendance. Bishops Bowman and Horn retired and had the distinction of being the first superannuated bishops of the denomination. They were replaced by GOTTLIEB HEINMILLER, Editor of Der Christliche Botschafter, and LAWRENCE H. SEAGER, President of Northwestern College.

While on the one hand observing the centennial of peace between the United States and Canada, the Conference lamented the outbreak of war in Europe, noted that the denomination was represented in four of the warring nations, and commended "every just effort on the part of our [national] administration for the settlement of all questions at issue, without an appeal to arms."

With the enthusiastic support of the Bishops, the plan for reunion with The United Evangelical Church proceeded. At the same time, the Conference voted to continue its relationship with the FEDERAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, instructed its Commission on Evangelism to cooperate with the Commission on Evangelism of the Federal Council, authorized its Bishops to appoint delegates to the Conference on Faith and Order called by the Protestant Episcopal Church, and assumed a more favorable attitude than the one noted in 1911 toward the request of the Canada Conference to join in a united church movement in Canada.

The Conference extended the tenure of a minister at one parish to seven years, established a budget system of financing all the major activities of the denomination, and created a commission to study annual conferences to determine where new work might be established.

Bishop Bowman reported that he had already received $286.65 to erect a memorial to Jacob Albright near the Memorial Chapel and his grave in Kleinfeltersville, Pennsylvania. The Conference instructed Bishop Bowman to continue his fund raising efforts on behalf of this project.

1919. Conference met in Cedar Falls, Iowa, October 2-17, with Bishops Sylvanus C. Breyfogel, Gottlieb Hein-

Miller, Lawrence H. Seager, and Samuel P. Spreng in attendance, along with Superannuated Bishop Thomas Bowman. The other superannuated bishop, William Horn, had died in 1917. All four active bishops were reelected for the next quadrennium.

The 1919 Conference had little difficulty accepting the carefully planned basis of union with The United Evangelical Church which had been worked out by the joint Commissions of the bodies seeking to be reunited. A favorable climate had been created as early as 1916, when the two denominations gathered together to celebrate the centennial of the first Evangelical conference, the establishing of missions in New York and Canada, the erection of the first Evangelical church building, and the organization of the Evangelical printing business. Following the adoption of the basis for union, the Conference voted to hold a special General Conference session in 1922 to coincide with the regular General Conference session of The United Evangelical Church.

In other action, the Conference (1) discontinued the Evangelical Correspondence College it had founded in 1895, (2) launched the Forward Movement for the strengthening and enlarging of the Church, (3) established a "Committee of Fifteen" to review the condition of the Church in post-war Germany and to render financial and spiritual assistance as needed, and (4) ordered the incorporation of the Superannuation Fund, the charter of which had been adopted in 1915, "in such state as they may deem wisest and for the best interests of the Fund."

With the end of World War I, the Bishops called for stronger evangelistic efforts, but also noted that "the spiritual life of the Church grows as she goes forth in ministering service. She treads the path of the ransomed with firmer, nobler tread when she carries upon her shoulders the burden of the world's woe."

1922. The General Conference was a special session called to order in Detroit, Mich., October 5, for the purpose of working out the final details of the anticipated merger with The United Evangelical Church. Called to order by Bishop S. C. Breyfogel, the Conference voted unanimously to adopt the report of the joint commissions on Church Federation and Union. Other Bishops in attendance were S. P. Spreng, G. Heinmiller, L. H. Seager, and Thomas Bowman (superannuated).

Bishop Breyfogel read the Episcopal Message on the morning of the second day of the Conference. It was a long document consuming almost the entire session. It was interrupted twice, once for the singing of "All Hail the Power of Jesus' Name," and another time (following a section on the proposed organic union with The United Evangelical Church) for a period of silent prayer.

The Conference remained in session through October 13 and adopted the enabling act for the union of the Evangelical Association and The United Evangelical Church during the closing moments of the evening session on the eighth day of the meeting.

GENERAL CONFERENCES OF THE EVANGELICAL CHURCH, 1922-1946

1922. The General Conference, convening in Detroit, Mich., October 14, marked the end of division among Evangelicals which had begun in the late 1800's. The members of the 1922 General Conference of The United Evangelical Church had traveled from Barrington, Ill.

(their eighth session), for a merger session with the Evangelical Association. Bishop S. C. Breyfogel of the Evangelical Association presided over the merger session. Other bishops were: from the Evangelical Association, S. P. Spreng, C. Heimmler, L. H. Seager, and Thomas Bowman (superannuated); and from The United Evangelical Church, William F. Heil and M. T. Maze. Bishops Breyfogel, Seager, Heimmler, Spreng, and Maze were elected to serve in the merged church. J. F. DUNLAP was named to succeed Bishop Heil.

The Conference reaffirmed an extensive resolution adopted earlier by the merging groups to forget past animosities and to make the union "complete in numbers and highly effective as an instrument of salvation among men." Matters of polity and creed had been so carefully worked out by the joint Commission on merger that few changes had to be made between 1922 and 1946.

The Evangelical Church agreed to maintain two publishing houses, one at Cleveland, Ohio, headed by Publisher C. Houser, and one at Harrisburg, Pa., headed by Roy H. Stetler.

The Evangelical of the United Evangelical Church and The Evangelical Messenger of the Evangelical Association were merged into The Evangelical-Messenger, with E. G. Frye serving as Editor and A. E. Hagen as Associate Editor. Other officers elected were T. C. Meckel, Editor of Der Christliche Botschafter; W. C. Hallwachs, Editor of The Evangelical Endeavor; W. E. Peffley, Editor of Sunday School Literature; G. L. Schaller, Associate Editor; Christian Staebler, Editor of Das Evangelische Magazin and German Sunday School Literature; George E. Epp and B. H. Niebel, Executive Secretaries of the Missionary Society; B. R. Wiener, Field Secretary of the Missionary Society; H. F. Schlegel, Executive Secretary of the Church Extension Society; and E. W. Praetorius, General Secretary of the Evangelical Leagues of Christian Endeavor and Sunday Schools.

In his A History of the Evangelical Church, Raymond W. Albright reports that the new denomination had 259,417 members on its Church rolls, 419,245 Sunday school members, and 1,856 full-time ministers, with an additional 575 "in a local or part-time relationship."

A minority group of The United Evangelical Church, centered largely in eastern and central Pennsylvania, refused to enter The Evangelical Church. Instead this group, which included a few congregations in Ohio and Illinois, formed The Evangelical Congregational Church with approximately 20,000 members.

1926. General Conference met in Williamsport, Pa., October 7-21, with Senior Bishop Breyfogel presiding at the opening session. Other bishops in attendance were Samuel P. Spreng, Lawrence H. Seager, Matthew T. Maze, and John F. Dunlap. Bishop Gottlieb Heinmler, who had been assigned to oversee the Church in Europe, had died early in the quadrennium. Bishop Emeritus Thomas Bowman had also passed away. Bishops Breyfogel, Spreng, Seager, Maze, and Dunlap were reelected with two new bishops: John S. Stamm, a member of the Illinois Conference and professor of systematic theology at the Evangelical Theological Seminary, Naperville; and Samuel J. Umbreit, formerly superintendent of the mission work in Japan who had been overseeing the European work since the death of Bishop Heimmler. The Conference consisted of 144 ministerial and 129 lay delegates.

The Episcopal Message expressed concern that the Church assume responsibility "to cultivate . . . an international conscience which will demand the settlement of international disputes by peaceful means." They looked askance at the "lowering of moral standards" in the areas of amusement, observance of the Lord's Day, and family life, and expressed confidence that "the Eighteenth Amendment will triumph." They also called for "the application of the principles of Jesus in industrial relations . . ."

Although The Evangelical-Messenger during the past quadrennium had given considerable space to the theological controversies that followed on the heels of the advancement of science during this period, the General Conference of 1926 appears to have been little affected by the problem. The spiritual concerns had been forcefully enunciated by the bishops and the temporal concerns surrounding the strengthening of the united church occupied considerable time that might have been taken up in theological debate. Furthermore, confidence in the Articles of Faith of The Evangelical Church adopted in 1922 ran so high that these statements continued unchanged through 1946.

The 1926 General Conference passed legislation bringing all the religious education work of the local church under the supervision of the General Conference and the local boards of Christian Education in an effort to correlate more closely the activities of the young people of the church.

In addition to the bishops, the following General Church Officers were named: by reelection—C. Houser and Roy H. Stetler, Publishers; E. G. Frye and A. E. Hagen, Editor and Associate Editor, respectively, of The Evangelical-Messenger; T. C. Meckel, Editor of Evangelical Endeavor; W. E. Peffley and G. L. Schaller, Editor and Associate Editor, respectively, of English Sunday School Literature; H. F. Schlegel, Executive Secretary-Treasurer of the Board of Church Extension; George E. Epp, Executive Secretary-Treasurer of the Board of Missions; and E. W. Praetorius, General Secretary of the Board of Religious Education; by election for the first time—J. E. Klein, Editor of German Sunday School literature; and Das Evangelische Magazin; C. H. Stauffacher, Field Secretary of the Missionary Society; B. R. Weiner, Secretary of Evangelism.

1930. The General Conference met in Milwaukee, Wis., October 9-22, with Senior Bishop Sylvanus C. Breyfogel presiding over the opening session. Other bishops in attendance were Samuel P. Spreng, Lawrence H. Seager, Matthew T. Maze, John F. Dunlap, John S. Stamm, and Samuel J. Umbreit. There were 135 ministerial and 118 lay delegates.

Bishops Seager, Maze, Dunlap, Stamm, and Umbreit were reelected. Bishops Breyfogel and Spreng were granted Emeritus relationships and George E. Epp, Executive Secretary-Treasurer of the Board of Missions, was elected to his first term as bishop. For the first time, the episcopal area system was adopted in the interest of closer personal supervision of the annual conferences.

The Conference noted several achievements during the preceding quadrennium: (1) the relocation of the Western Publishing House to better quarters in Cleveland; (2) the merging of Schuylkill College, Myerstown, Pennsylvania, into "Greater Albright College at Reading," and the erection of the Bishop Breyfogel Memorial School of Theology Building in Reading; and (3) "the erection" of the Albright Memorial Church in Washington, D. C. However, all was not optimism. The effects of the economic Depression were felt throughout the denomination. The Missionary Society reported a deficit of $77,000 and had few prospects for improving its financial condition. Conference superintendents found it necessary to unite smaller congregations into circuits in order that pastors might have a better income. The bishops lamented the tragedy of unemployment and growing antagonism between capital and labor. They urged the Church to mediate such disputes whenever possible, but also called upon it to (1) "emphasize anew in preaching and teaching the value of human personality" and "work with more intense zeal and concentrated purpose to establish the law of love in the hearts of the people, the rich as well as the poor, the poor as well as the rich." In spite of protest, the office of Secretary of Evangelism, which had been vacant since the death of B. R. Weiner, in 1927, was eliminated for economic reasons; and the responsibility for evangelism was laid on the shoulders of the bishops, whose number had been reduced from six to five.

The Conference demonstrated its ability to look to the future. The bishops (1) called for "an aggressive and constructive campaign for Christian stewardship," (2) expressed sympathy with the "modern trend toward the greater unification of our so greatly divided Protestantism," and spoke highly of the contribution of "modern facilities for travel, transportation and communication [which] have truly made the human race one" to the crusade for a better world. The Conference created a Board of Public Morals and Temperance; but the Board of Religious Education, with which it was to be affiliated, never implemented the legislative action of the Conference. General Conference also gave its approval for the organization of The Albright Brotherhood and placed the body under the supervision of the Board of Christian Education.

In addition to the bishops, whose election was noted above, the following General Church Officers were also named by the Conference: by reelection—Roy H. Stetler, Publisher; E. G. Frye, Editor of The Evangelical-Messenger; T. C. Meckel, Editor of Der Christliche Botschafter; Raymond M. Veh, who had been appointed to fill the unexpired term of the late W. C. Hallwachs, Editor of the Evangelical Crusader; W. E. Peffley and G. L. Schaller, Editor and Associate Editor, respectively, of Sunday School Literature; C. H. Stauffacher, Field Secretary of the Missionary Society; E. W. Praetorius, Secretary of Religious Education; by election for the first time—W. B. Cox, Executive Secretary-Treasurer of the Board of Church Extension; C. Hauser and Edwin Heina, General Treasurers; W. L. Bollman, Executive Secretary-Treasurer of the Board of Missions; and C. A. Mock, Associate Editor of The Evangelical-Messenger.

1934. General Conference met in Akron, Ohio, October 4-15, with Senior Bishop Lawrence H. Seager presiding at the opening session. Other bishops in attendance were Matthew T. Maze, John F. Dunlap, John S. Stamm, Samuel J. Umbreit, George E. Epp, Sylvanus C. Breyfogel (Emeritus) and Samuel P. Spreng (Emeritus). One hundred twenty-four ministers and 117 laymen constituted the delegation.

Only Bishops Stamm and Epp were reelected since Bishops Seager and Maze were granted Emeritus relationship, Bishop Dunlap retired and the European episcopate was dissolved. For economic reasons, the Board of Bishops was reduced to four and only two new bishops were elected: ELMER W. PRAETORIUS, Secretary of Religious Education, and CHARLES H. STAUFFACHER, Field Secretary of the Missionary Society.

Other officers named were: by re-election—Roy H. Stetler, Publisher; E. G. Frye, Editor of The Evangelical-Messenger; Raymond M. Veh, Editor of The Evangelical Crusader; W. E. Peffley and G. L. Schaller, Editor and Associate Editor, respectively, of Sunday School Literature; W. L. Bollman, Executive Secretary-Treasurer of the Board of Missions; and by election for the first time—S. J. Umbreit, Editor of Der Christliche Botschafter; J. A. Heck, General Secretary of Christian Education; Carl Heimiller, Executive Secretary-Treasurer of the Board of Church Extension and Field Secretary of the Board of Missions.

The Church's involvement in social action concerns culminated during this Conference in the organization of a Board of Christian Social Action headed by the Bishop of the Eastern Episcopal Area. The bishops reported that the continuing interest in ecumenical affairs had led the Commission on Church Federation and Union to begin discussions with the Church of the United Brethren in Christ on the subject of organic union. The Commission presented a report of its activities to the Conference, which approved the same and recommended the continuation of the negotiations which the Commission had begun both with the Church of the United Brethren in Christ and with the United Church of Canada.

The Conference removed the seven-year time limit on pastorates; rejected the proposal that a rubric on "inactive members" be included in the statistical report blanks; ordered the closing of the Publishing House in Cleveland with the property to be sold as soon as possible; discontinued the European episcopate and established Harrisburg, Pennsylvania, Naperville, Illinois, St. Paul, Minnesota, and Kansas City, Missouri, as the centers of the Eastern, Central, Northwestern, and Southwestern episcopal areas; adopted a formal constitution for the Commission on Finance, which had been operating without such a document since 1915; and brought all of its educational activities from the local church to the colleges and seminaries under a newly formed Board of Christian Education.

Though the Conference manifested an interest in improving the preparation of its ministers, the body rejected a suggestion that college graduation be made a requirement for entering the ministry. It did, however, increase the number of required years of seminary training from two to three.

Both the unstable political situation in the world and the financial crisis at home continued to plague missionary activity. The Committee on Missions reported that because its deficit had risen to $164,255 it had to reduce the salaries of missionaries by 50% and that until things improved it would be impossible to replace retiring or withdrawn missionaries. The Conference combined the offices of Field Secretary of the Board of Missions and Executive Secretary-Treasurer of the Board of Church Extension. Such events as the Japanese invasion of Shanghai and Hitler's rise to power in Germany caused widespread concern and the bishops called for favorable action on the "Peace Program of the Churches" outlined by the Federal Council of Churches.

1938. General Conference met in Johnstown, Pa., October 6-14, with Senior Bishop John S. Stamm presiding. Other bishops in attendance were George E. Epp, Elmer W. Praetorius, Charles H. Stauffacher, Matthew T. Maze

(Emeritus) and Samuel P. Spreng (Emeritus). Bishops Emeriti Sylvanus C. Breyfogel and Lawrence H. Seager had died during the quadrennium. One hundred twenty-seven ministers and 122 laymen constituted the delegation. The four active bishops—Stamm, Epp, Praetorius, and Stauffacher—were subsequently reelected for the next quadrennium.

The Commission on Church Federation and Union held out hope for ultimate union with the Church of the United Brethren in Christ despite the fact that it had encountered some knotty problems. The bishops also reported favorably on a movement to establish a WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. The Evangelical Church subsequently became the first American denomination to join this worldwide ecumenical body when it was finally established.

In other action, the Conference adopted the constitution for an Administrative Council to govern the affairs of the Church between General Conference sessions. To accomplish this, the Commission on Finance was dissolved. The Conference also established a Board of Christian Social Action, removed the 8-year limitation on Superintendents serving a given district, and granted permission to the European Church to organize an independent Reichs Konferenz.

Despite the fact that the work of the Deaconess Society in Europe was increasing it was voted that interest in the Deaconess Society in America had decreased to the point where it became necessary to discontinue it. The Conference agreed to this. The Conference sessions were however conducted with a sense of urgency for renewed Christian witness and service because of the tenuous world situation. The bishops had established this tone with their fervent Episcopal Message.

The Conference commissioned: (1) a new junior study book to meet the growing demand for catechetical instruction materials; (2) a manual of rituals for "permissive use"; and (3) a history of the Church. In the latter they were endorsing action already taken by The Historical Society of the Evangelical Church.

In addition to the bishops, the following General Church Officers were named: by reelection—Roy H. Stetler, Publisher; Edwin G. Frye, Editor of The Evangelical-Messenger; S. J. Umbreit, Editor of Der Christliche Botschafter; Raymond M. Veh, Editor of The Evangelical Crusader; W. E. Peffley and G. L. Schaller, Editor and Associate Editor, respectively, of Sunday School Literature; William L. Bollman, Executive Secretary-Treasurer of the Missionary Society; Carl Heimiller, Executive Secretary-Treasurer of the Board of Church Extension; and J. Arthur Heck, General Secretary and Executive Secretary-Treasurer of the General Board of Christian Education; and by election for the first time—Arthur H. Doescher, Secretary and Executive Secretary-Treasurer of the Board of Trustees of the Superannuation Fund.

1942. General Conference met in Naperville, Ill., October 7-16, with Bishop John S. Stamm presiding. Other bishops in attendance were George E. Epp, Elmer W. Praetorius, Charles H. Stauffacher, and Samuel P. Spreng (Emeritus). Bishop Emeritus Matthew T. Maze had passed away during the quadrennium.

The highlight of this Conference was the approval and adoption of the Plan and Basis of Union and the proposed Discipline for The Evangelical United Brethren Church presented by the Joint Commission on Church Federation and Union of The Evangelical Church and the Church of the United Brethren in Christ. The vote was 226-6. The document was referred to the annual conferences for approval in time for the 1946 General Conference.

The Bureau of Architecture, reactivated in 1937 and which had become affiliated with the Federal Council of Churches Interdenominational Bureau of Church Architecture, was reorganized as the Board of Church Extension "to cultivate reverence for the House of God and appreciation of good church architecture." Although there were explicit warnings that ritual must not replace preaching, the Conference adopted a manual of rituals which contained significant alterations in the ritualistic practices up to this time.

The Conference adopted constitutions for Councils of Administration in the annual conferences and local churches similar to the one adopted in 1938 for the general church. The Conference voted to extend the responsibilities of the Secretary of Christian Education by assigning to him the additional office of Secretary of Evangelism. The Board of Christian Social Action responded to the social and economic unrest and urged the Conference to make significant statements condemning racial discrimination, and affirming the right of capital and labor to organize, closer governmental supervision over the economic order to prevent exploitation, a larger share in the economic life and a number of related matters. Also, although the denomination as a whole had withheld its blessing of United States involvement in World War II, the Conference supported the efforts of the Board of Christian Social Action to minister both to the men in uniform and the conscientious objectors among its membership.

The four active bishops were reelected as were the following General Church Officers: Roy H. Stetler, Publisher in the United States; C. Dick and F. Cloor, Publishers in Germany and Switzerland, respectively; E. G. Frye, Editor of The Evangelical-Messenger; Raymond M. Veh, Editor of The Evangelical Crusader; H. Pfäfflin, Editor of Der Evangelischer Botschafter in Germany and E. Jost, Editor of Der Evangelischer Botschafter in Switzerland; W. E. Peffley, Editor of Evangelical Sunday School Literature; G. L. Schaller, Associate Editor; and Carl Heimiller, Executive Secretary-Treasurer of the Board of Church Extension.

The following officials were elected for their first term in office: Carl Heimiller, Executive Secretary-Treasurer of the Board of Missions; A. F. Weaver, Recording Secretary and Executive Secretary-Treasurer of the General Administrative Council; and Reuben H. Mueller, General Secretary and Secretary-Treasurer of the Board of Christian Education.

1946. General Conference met in the Beulah Evangelical Church, Johnstown, Pa., November 11-15, with Senior Bishop John S. Stamm presiding. Other bishops in attendance were George E. Epp, Elmer W. Praetorius, and Charles H. Stauffacher. Bishop Emeritus Samuel P. Spreng had died during the quadrennium. One hundred twenty delegates—eighty-six ministerial and eighty-four lay—answered the roll call.

Since twenty-one of twenty-four conferences had given unanimous approval to the Plan and Basis of Union with the Church of the United Brethren in Christ, this was the last meeting of this body prior to the consummation of that union. In their Episcopal Message, the bishops called attention to the fact that they had issued a Code of Ethics for ministers of The Evangelical Church, a statement concerning the relationship of the denomination to the FEDERAL COUNCIL OF THE CHURCHES OF CHRIST in America, and a pamphlet on the Quarterly Conference and the Administrative Council of the Local Church. They urged the adoption and continued use of these documents in The Evangelical United Brethren Church upon its formation.

The Conference acted favorably upon a number of boundary changes and recommended their approval by The Evangelical United Brethren Church: Northwest Canada Conference was given full conference status in place of the missionary status it had previously held; the Montana Conference of The Evangelical Church was granted permission to merge with the Montana Conference of the Church of the United Brethren in Christ; and the Oregon-Washington Conference of The Evangelical Church was granted permission to merge with the Oregon Conference of the Church of the United Brethren in Christ.

In harmony with the Plan of Union of The Evangelical United Brethren Church, bishops and church officials were elected by The Evangelical General Conference as its proportion of the leadership. All of the bishops were reelected for the next quadrennium and the following General Church officers were named: Roy H. Stetler, Publisher; J. W. Kreckler, Editor of The Evangelical-Messenger, replacing E. G. Frye; Raymond M. Veh, Editor of the Evangelical Crusader; G. L. Schaller, Editor of Sunday School Literature replacing W. E. Peffley, retired; Carl Heimiller, Executive Secretary-Treasurer of the Missionary Society; Reuben H. Mueller, Executive Secretary of Christian Education (it was agreed that the Executive Secretary of Christian Education shall also be the Executive Secretary of Evangelism); A. F. Weaver, Executive Secretary-Treasurer of the Administrative Council; A. H. Doescher, Executive Secretary-Treasurer of the Pension Fund; M. N. Berger, Executive Secretary-Treasurer of the Board of Church Extension.

The Conference adjourned to reconvene jointly with the members of the Special Session of the General Conference of the Church of the United Brethren in Christ in First United Brethren Church, November 16, for the formation of The Evangelical United Brethren Church.

GENERAL CONFERENCES OF THE

UNITED EVANGELICAL CHURCH, 1891-1922

1891. General Conference met in Philadelphia, Pa., Oct. 1-16, under the leadership of dissidents from the East, was not yet a full-fledged general conference even though it behaved as one. It was a rump session consisting of a minority group which had not accepted the decision of the 1887 General Conference of the Evangelical Association to meet in Indianapolis (cf. "1887 General Conference of the Evangelical Association"). Forty-four ministerial delegates were in attendance at the session which billed itself as the "Twentieth General Conference of the Evangelical Association" and which included in its printed proceedings the proceedings of the First General Lay Convention of the Evangelical Association.

A delegate to the lay convention presented "an earnest, able and touching address in which he referred to the fact that . . . the laity considered themselves the 'peacemakers in the Evangelical Association.'" Another communication from laymen submitted a proposition for adjusting the differences between the disputing parties then meeting in separate sessions.

Meanwhile, the Conference took action making peace virtually impossible. The body reversed the decision of a trial conference held in Chicago in 1890 to suspend Bishop Rudolph Dubs but at the same time the General Conference upheld the trial conference's decision to suspend Bishops John J. Esher and Thomas Bowman, both of whom continued as bishops for the group meeting in Indianapolis.

The General Conference named Wesley M. Stanford and Henry B. Hartzler to succeed Bishops Esher and Bowman and continued to function through the 1891-94 quadrennium as a Church within a church.

1894. The Conference convened in Naperville, Ill., November 29-December 3, in what was officially the first general conference session. Since 1891, the group had functioned as a separate body within the Evangelical Association; but when reconciliation attempts on the part of laymen failed and court decisions went against the minority group in Ohio, Iowa, and Pennsylvania, it became apparent that a new organization had to be formed.

The East Pennsylvania Conference was the first annual conference body to organize itself as The United Evangelical Church in Reading, Pennsylvania, October 10, 1894. Other conference bodies or splinter groups from then followed suit: Central Pennsylvania, October 16; Pittsburgh, October 24; Ohio, November 5; and Oregon, November 7.

Thirty-five ministerial and thirty-one lay delegates (the first lay delegates in a General Conference of the denomination) came to Naperville to effect the organization of The United Evangelical Church with a membership of 61,120 and a ministry of 415 regular itinerants. Bishop Rudolph Dubs called the session to order and was assisted by the two men elected by the minority group in 1891—Bishops Wesley M. Stanford and Christian S. Haman. However, when the official organization was effected, only two bishops were named for the next quadrennium: Dubs and Stanford. A Discipline was adopted and ordered printed, boards and agencies were created, and plans were made for the publication of a catechism and of German and English hymnbooks. The Conference agreed to purchase the Evangelical Publishing Company from a group of private investors of the dissident group in the Evangelical Association who had organized it originally and to center its publication activities in Harrisburg, Pennsylvania.

1898. General Conference convened in Johnstown, Pa., October 6-18, with Bishops Rudolph Dubs and Wesley M. Stanford in attendance and presiding. Both were reelected for the next quadrennium. Forty-one ministerial and thirty-six lay delegates were in attendance. The number of participating annual conferences was increased from six to eight and the Rev. S. L. Wiest was named the first publisher.

The reports of the first quadrennium for The United Evangelical Church indicate an irregular growth pattern. The number of regular itinerant ministers had increased from 415 to 426, but the number of members appears to have decreased by about 2,000. At the same time, both the Sunday School and the Christian Endeavor Society had grown substantially since 1894. Although the Church had no theological schools, it was responsible for two colleges and a preparatory school: ALBRIGHT COLLEGE, Central Pennsylvania College in New Berlin, and the preparatory school Lafayette Seminary at Lafayette, Oregon.

The General Conference spoke out quite firmly on social issues, praising the end of the war in Spain, condemning socialism but calling for the alleviation of those adverse conditions in society which make the rise of socialism possible, urging moral reform that would bring an end to the liquor traffic and divorce, and opposing the growing "passion for pleasure" in America.

1902. Conference met in Williamsport, Pa., October 9-21, with Bishop Rudolph Dubs and Bishop Wesley M. Stanford in attendance. However, since The United Evangelical Church had departed from the Evangelical Association and placed a two-term limit on its bishops, neither of the two leaders was reelected. They were succeeded by Bishop Henry B. Hartzler, who had been Editor of The Evangelical, and Bishop William F. Heil, who had been corresponding secretary of the Missionary Society.

The Episcopal Message presented a happy retrospect of the first eight years of the new denomination; resounding praise because from its inception in 1894, the group had (1) involved its laymen in the General Conference and (2) included in its articles of faith a statement on "entire sanctification" which recognized the desire on the part of members to attain the highest possible experience of the divine life; and a listing of questions of moral reform to which the Conference should give its attention.

The General Conference authorized the incorporation of the Board of Church Extension, elected its first Editor of Sunday School and Christian Endeavor League literature, and made numerous, but not extensive, changes in its Discipline.

1906. General Conference met in Cedar Rapids, Iowa, October 4-15, with Bishops Hartzler and Heil in attendance. Both were reelected for the ensuing quadrennium. There were fifty-one ministerial and forty-two lay delegates.

The "Preface" to the Proceedings of this session reports that "the Fourth General Conference of The United Evangelical Church marks an interesting and splendid epoch in the history of the Church. Advancement and enlargement seem to be watchwords." It then goes on to outline the many favorable operations then being carried on.

The Conference graciously received A. W. DRURY of the Church of the United Brethren in Christ, who not only outlined similarities between the groups but also spoke enthusiastically about the prospects of bringing the United Evangelicals into the conferences on union being conducted by the Congregational, Methodist Protestant, and United Brethren Churches. The Conference also named a committee to represent the denomination at the discussions on Church Federation which led to the first meeting of the Federal Council of Churches in Louisville, Ky., in December 1908.

1910. Conference met in Canton, Ohio, October 6-15. Bishops Hartzler and Heil presided over the delegation of forty-six laymen and forty-six ministers. Having reached the end of their second terms, they were replaced by Bishops William H. Fouke and Uriah F. Swengel. Bishop Fouke had been Editor of the Keystone League of Christian Endeavor Journal and a member of several boards and Bishop Swengel had been Secretary of the General Conference and Editor of the Conference Journal.

The Church was experiencing growth. There were now

73,551 members of 997 congregations, 509 ministers, and 100,690 Sunday School members.

At this Conference, Daniel A. Poling, who was later to become Editor of The Christian Herald and an interdenominational leader, was elected to his first denominational office, General Secretary of Sunday School and the Keystone League of Christian Endeavor.

Interest in Church Federation continued high and both the Church of the United Brethren in Christ and The Methodist Episcopal Church had representatives on hand to cultivate cooperative situations which might lead to union. However, the most significant trend in this area was an undercurrent of support for reunion with the Evangelical Association. In their Episcopal Message, the bishops noted that the Evangelical Association had also passed at their 1907 General Conference resolutions favoring possible reunion.

1914. The General Conference met in Barrington, Ill., October 1-10, at the conclusion of the first convention of the Keystone League of Christian Endeavor in Chicago. Both Bishop Swengel and Bishop Fouke, who presided over the sessions, were re-elected for the next quadrennium.

Youth work and Christian education work in general had made noted advances during the quadrennium despite the fact that Daniel Poling had resigned his post as General Secretary of Sunday School and the Keystone League of Christian Endeavor in 1912 to become General Secretary of the Ohio State Christian Endeavor Society. Although there was no unanimous support for the materials, the Graded Lessons had been introduced shortly before General Conference as possible alternatives to the Uniform Lessons which had already been in use. Also, efforts were made to improve teaching in the local Sunday school through teacher training classes.

Once again, Church Federation and union dominated the Conference. Reunion with the Evangelical Association appeared closer than ever as G. Heinmiller, the fraternal delegate from the Evangelical Association, was enthusiastically received when he brought his message, and gave a glowing report of the progress of deliberations between the two groups. The Church of the United Brethren in Christ and The Methodist Episcopal Church were again represented at General Conference by fraternal delegates.

1918. Conference met in a truncated session in York, Pa., October 3-5, because the influenza epidemic was sweeping the country. Bishops Uriah F. Swengel and William H. Fouke presided over the meetings which were conducted behind closed doors under quarantine conditions that included an all-night session. Bishop Rudolph Dubs, who had been elected near the close of the 1914 General Conference to help relieve Bishops Swengel and Fouke of a heavy load of work anticipated for the 1914-1918 quadrennium, had passed away on March 31, 1915.

Bishops Swengel and Fouke were retired under the two-term ruling and were succeeded by Bishops William F. Heil, a former bishop who had been serving on the Commission on Church Federation and Church Union, and Mathew T. Maze.

Reunion with the Evangelical Association moved into its final stages at this Conference when the report of the Commission on Church Union was unanimously adopted and authorization was granted to have it published in The Evangelical. The Conference established a War Service Commission to assure the continuing influence of the Church on those going into military service. Although it was never to become a major concern, the deaconess work of the denomination came up for discussion since local churches were planning to use deaconesses as assistant pastors and since provision had to be made for both the training and care of these servants of the Church.

1922. The General Conference, the eighth since the group had split away from the Evangelical Association in 1894, convened in Salem United Evangelical Church, Barrington, Ill., October 5-9, for the purpose of giving final approval to the plans for reunion with the "mother church." Bishops William F. Heil and M. T. Maze were in attendance and shared the responsibilities of presiding over the daily sessions.

Considerable discussion accompanied the voting; and when the call came for the adoption of the resolution approving the Basis of Union, fifteen delegates refused to vote and presented a protest for inclusion in the minutes in the name of the East Pennsylvania Conference. However, the group of protestors made the trip from Barrington, Illinois, to Detroit, Michigan, on October 10. There, on October 11, another statement was presented for the record by E. S. Woodring, "Chairman of the East Pennsylvania Conference Delegation, for and in behalf of that Delegation, except Rev. A. J. Brunner, Ministerial Delegation." The delegation defended its refusal to participate in merger proceedings because some of its differences and complaints in relation to the merger had not been satisfied. The upshot of this protest was the subsequent formation of a splinter group in Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Illinois, which took the name The Evangelical Congregational Church. After drawn out litigation in the courts of Pennsylvania, the Evangelical Congregational Church secured the campus of Albright College in Myerstown, Pennsylvania, when the institution moved to Reading in 1928, and made it the center of denominational activity.

In spite of the opposition, the Enabling Act was adopted on the basis of 75 favorable votes. This, coupled with the fact that the annual conferences had earlier voted 614-58 in favor of merger, paved the way for the formation of The Evangelical Church, October 14.

GENERAL CONFERENCES OF THE EVANGELICAL UNITED BRETHREN CHURCH, 1946-1966

1946. This General Conference, the first after the merger but the thirty-sixth in the sequence of the history of the former two denominations, convened November 16 in the First United Brethren Church, Johnstown, Pennsylvania, with Bishop A. R. CLIPPINGER of the United Brethren Church presiding and reading the Declaration of Union. Bishop JOHN S. STAMM responded for the Evangelical Church and delivered the message for the first communion service of the new denomination.

In addition to Bishops Clippinger and Stamm, the following bishops participated in the General Conference: for the former United Brethren Church—IRA D. WARNER, V. O. WEIDLER, Fred L. Dennis, J. Balmer SHOWERS, and Grant D. BATDORF and H. H. FOUT, Bishops Emeriti; for the former Evangelical Church—George E. EPP, E. W. PRAETORIUS, and C. H. STAUFFACHER. All of the bishops were retained by the new denomination.

In addition to the bishops, the following General Church Officers were elected: L. L. HUFFMAN and Roy H. STETLER, Publishing Agents; Joe Willard Kreckler, Editor of the Telescope-Messenger, and Everett E. Harris, Associate Editor; Raymond M. Veh, Editor of Builders; Orrie O. Arnold, Editor of Sunday School Literature, and G. L. Schaller, Associate Editor; D. T. Gregory, Executive Secretary of the Council of Administration, and A. F. Weaver, Associate Secretary; Carl Heimiller, Executive Secretary of the Department of World Missions, and Samuel G. Ziegler, Associate Secretary; U. P. Hovermale, Executive Secretary of the Department of Church Extension, and M. N. Berger, Associate Secretary.

Wesley O. Clark, Treasurer, Board of Missions; Miss Janet Gilbert, Executive Secretary of the Women's Society of World Service, and Miss Marion L. Baker, Associate Secretary; REUBEN H. MUELLER, Executive Secretary of the Board of Christian Education and Associate Secretary of the Commission on Evangelism; O. T. Deever, Executive Secretary of the Commission on Evangelism and Associate Secretary of the Board of Christian Education; Arthur H. Doescher, Executive Secretary-Treasurer of the Board of Pensions and George A. Heiss, Associate Secretary; and A. F. Weaver, General Church Treasurer. All elections were based on a previously agreed upon plan for proportionate representation.

In addition to Builders and The Telescope-Messenger, the following items of literature were authorized: two Sunday school teachers' magazines—Bible Teacher and Children's Worker; four reading papers—Children's Stories, Boys and Girls, Friends, and The Christian Home; and eleven pupils' lesson helps, seven based on the Uniform Lessons and 4 based on the Cycle Graded Series.

The merging of the Evangelical and United Brethren Churches created an organization consisting of 52 annual conferences in North America, seven annual conferences in other lands, and 8 missions not having annual conference status. Operating under the general control and supervision of the General Conference were nine colleges, three seminaries, and 10 benevolent institutions. The Discipline authorized by the General Conference contained a six-part "Historical Statement," a section on "Constitutional Law," a section on "Temporal Economy," and a section on "Rituals and Formulas." The latter contained two rituals for the baptism of adults, and a ritual for the dedication of infants. The section on "Constitutional Law" retained "The Confession of Faith of the Church of the United Brethren in Christ" and "The Articles of Faith, and the Doctrines of Regeneration, Sanctification and Christian Perfection of the Evangelical Church."

1950. General Conference met in Dayton, Ohio, November 10-20, with Bishop Arthur R. Clippinger presiding at the opening session and delivering a devotional message entitled, "The Christian's Message for Today," and Bishop John S. Stamm reading the Episcopal Message. Other bishops in attendance were George E. Epp, Fred L. Dennis, J. Balmer Showers, Ira D. Warner, E. W. Praetorius, C. H. Stauffacher, and Grant D. Batdorf, Emeritus. Of these, Bishops Clippinger and Stamm joined the emeritus ranks, and Bishops Dennis, Epp, Praetorius, Showers, Stauffacher, and Warner were reelected. To round out the agreed upon board of seven bishops, DAVID T. GREGORY, formerly Executive Secretary of the Council of Administration, was elected.

In other elections, the following were returned to office: L. L. Huffman and Roy H. Stetler, Publishers; Joe Willard Kreckler, Editor of The Telescope-Messenger; Raymond M. Veh, Editor of Builders; Carl Heimiller, Executive Secretary of World Missions; U. P. Hovermale, Executive Secretary of Home Missions and Church Extension; Wesley O. Clark, Treasurer of the Board of Missions; O. T. Deever, Secretary of Evangelism and Associate Secretary of Christian Education; A. H. Doescher, Executive Secretary-Treasurer of the Board of Pensions; and O. O. Arnold, Editor of Sunday School Literature. Newly elected officers were HERMANN W. KAEBNICK, General Church Treasurer and Associate Secretary of the Council of Administration; Lyle L. Baughman, Executive Secretary of the Council of Administration.

The Conference approved bases of union which involved 29 annual conferences: Allegheny and Pittsburgh to become the Western Pennsylvania Conference; two California Conferences to become one; Colorado and Colorado-New Mexico to become the Rocky Mountain Conference; North Dakota and South Dakota to become the Dakota Conference; Indiana (Ev.), Indiana (UB), St. Joseph, and White River to become Indiana North and Indiana South Conferences; multiple conference situations to be remedied by the formation of one conference in each of the following states—Iowa, Michigan, Minnesota, Montana, Nebraska, and Wisconsin; and the Ohio (Ev.), East Ohio, Miami, Sandusky, and Southeast Ohio to become Ohio East, Ohio Miami, Ohio Sandusky, and Ohio Southeast. The accomplishing of these mergers left the E. U. B. Church with 39 annual conferences in North America, four in Europe, and one in West Africa. These conferences were located in seven episcopal areas with resident bishops in North America and one overseas episcopal area to be supervised by the Board of Bishops without a resident bishop.

In the interest of economy and implementing the uniting of the two former churches, the Conference agreed that the ratio system of electing officers be dropped beginning with the 1954 General Conference, and that positions filled by General Conference elected associate officers be eliminated as vacancies occur through retirement, death, or other disability.

1954. General Conference met in the Civic Auditorium, Milwaukee, Wis., November 10-18. Bishop George E. Epp presided at the opening session and Bishop Ira D. Warner read the Episcopal Message, the tone of which was both ecumenical and evangelistic. The ecumenical references centered on the fact that 10 years after merger the uniting of annual conferences was moving ahead with satisfying results and an observation that the NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES had become "a strong voice of Protestantism in America." The evangelistic note was less optimistic but more urgent since statistics for 1953 indicated that it had taken 22 members to win one person to Christ and 16 members to win one person to church membership.

The seven active bishops and 431 voting delegates were in attendance. In addition to Bishops Epp and Warner, the episcopal leaders were Fred L. Dennis, David T. Gregory, J. Balmer Showers, C. H. Stauffacher, and E. W. Praetorius. Two bishops emeriti were also present: Arthur R. Clippinger and John S. Stamm. While four of the bishops were re-elected, three joined the ranks of the emeriti: Praetorius, Showers, and Stauffacher. Elected to replace them were LYLE L. BAUGHMAN, formerly Secretary of the Council of Administration; HAROLD R. HEININGER, formerly president of The Evangelical Theological Seminary at Naperville, Illinois; and REUBEN H. MUELLER, formerly Executive Secretary of Christian Education.

In other elections, the following were returned to office: L. L. Huffman and Roy H. Stetler, Publishers; Joe Willard

Krecker, Editor of The Telescope-Messenger; Raymond M. Veh, Editor of Builders; O. O. Arnold, Editor of Sunday School Publications; Carl Heinmiller, Executive Secretary of World Missions; and U. P. Hovermale, Executive Secretary of Home Missions and Church Extension; Wesley O. Clark, Treasurer, Board of Missions; and Arthur H. Doescher, Executive Secretary-Treasurer, Board of Pensions. Elected to general church offices for the first time were E. Craig Brandenburg, Executive Secretary of Christian Education; Ralph M. Holdeman, Executive Secretary of Evangelism; Hermann W. Kaebnick, Executive Secretary of the Council of Administration; and Cawley H. Stine, General Treasurer of the Missions and Benevolence Funds.

The Conference authorized the uniting of York College, York, Nebraska, and Westmar College, Le Mars, Iowa; and modified the plan for allocating territory to seminaries so that the following annual conferences would be "common territory" for both United Theological Seminary (which had been formed at Dayton, Ohio, during the past quadrennium by the uniting of Bonebrake Theological Seminary and the Evangelical School of Theology) and Evangelical Theological Seminary: Kansas (Ev), Kansas (UB), Oklahoma, Rocky Mountain, Texas, and Missouri. Also in the area of education, the Conference responded to a memorial from the Dakota Conference concerning the spiritual standards of the colleges of the denomination by (1) reaffirming its faith in the boards of trustees managing the educational institutions, (2) expressing appreciation for the leadership of the people on these boards, and (3) reaffirming paragraph 1062 of the Discipline concerning the operation of institutions of higher education in the E. U. B. Church.

The Conference approved the recommendation of the Committee on Ways and Means establishing a special financial campaign of $5,150,000 for the following quadrennium. Of the total, $4,150,000 was to be raised for the colleges and seminaries and the balance for home missions and church extension.

Plans for the merging of individual annual conferences continued; but except for the ratification of the mergers approved in 1950, few new major boundary changes were authorized. The following plans for merger were approved: Kansas (Ev) and Kansas (UB) to become the Kansas Conference; Oklahoma and Texas to become one conference; New England, Atlantic, and East Pennsylvania to become one conference; New York and Erie to become one conference (Erie Conference turned down the union); and Oregon (UB) and Oregon-Washington (Ev) to become one conference.

1958. The General Conference met in the Scottish Rite Masonic Cathedral, Harrisburg, Pa., October 9-17. Bishop Ira D. Warner convened the opening session; and Bishop George E. Epp read the quadrennial episcopal message during the evening of the first day. The official voting membership of the Conference was 427.

The bishops in attendance were Ira B. Warner, George E. Epp, J. GORDON HOWARD, Reuben H. Mueller, Harold R. Heininger, Lyle L. Baughman, and J. Balmer Showers (Emeritus). Of the group, Bishops Heininger, Mueller, Baughman, and Howard were reelected, while Bishops Epp and Warner were named Emeriti Bishops. New bishops elected were Hermann W. Kaebnick, formerly Executive Secretary of the General Council of Administration; PAUL M. HERRICK, formerly pastor of First Church, Dayton, Ohio; and W. MAYNARD SPARKS, formerly Chaplain and Instructor in Religion, Lebanon Valley College. Following the death of Bishop Baughman during the subsequent quadrennium, PAUL W. MILHOUSE, newly elected executive secretary of the General Council of Administration, was elected by mail ballot to succeed him.

The Conference approved a financial campaign of $5,150,000 for missions and church extension during the 1959-1963 quadrennium. Of the total, $2,000,000 was to be retained by the annual conferences. Action was taken permitting the employment of a Secretary of Stewardship by the General Council of Administration. In other action the Montana Conference was raised from the status of mission conference to annual conference; the Committee on Church Federation and Union was instructed to "further study and explore the possible advantages and the potential problems involved in organic union with THE METHODIST CHURCH and to report thereon from time to time through the church press and in such a manner as it may deem advisable . . . to continue exploratory conversations with the Commission on Church Union of The Methodist Church for the purpose of developing possible bases of consideration for union"; the construction of a general headquarters office building in Dayton, Ohio was authorized; and a declaration was adopted calling for racial integration and the appointment of ministers of other races where advisable for more effective service to multiracial congregations.

A highlight of the Conference was the observance of the 12th anniversary of the merging of The Evangelical Church and the Church of the United Brethren in Christ. Included in the observance were numerous tours to significant historical areas for both former denominations and a pageant, The Crown of Wild Olives, presented by students and staff members of ALBRIGHT and LEBANON VALLEY COLLEGES. Originally planned for only one performance, it was repeated to a second capacity house after only a brief rest for the members of the cast.

A sad note of the Conference was sounded in the Episcopal Address when attention was called to the fact that three Emeriti Bishops and three active Bishops had passed away during the quadrennium. The Emeriti Bishops were John S. Stamm, Charles H. Stauffacher and Arthur R. Clippinger. (Bishops Stamm and Clippinger had played leading roles in the merger of the Church of the United Brethren in Christ and The Evangelical Church in 1946.) The active Bishops were David T. Gregory, PAUL E. V. SHANNON, who had been elected by mail ballot less than two months before his death to succeed Bishop Gregory, and Fred L. Dennis.

1962. The Conference met in the Civic Auditorium, Grand Rapids, Mich., October 23-November 1. Bishop Reuben H. Mueller read the Episcopal Message which he had prepared on behalf of the Board of Bishops, all members of which were in attendance: Harold R. Heinger, Paul M. Herrick, J. Gordon Howard, Hermann W. Kaebnick, Paul W. Milhouse, Mueller, and W. Maynard Sparks. The seven were reelected and reassigned to the areas they had been serving during the last quadrennium.

CHARLES C. PARLIN, a leading layman of The Methodist Church, addressed the conference on the third day and paved the way for later discussion and action leading toward the merger of The Methodist Church and The Evangelical United Brethren Church. On October 29, by a vote of 310-94, authorization was granted to the Commission on Union to proceed with its work on a basis of union.

The conference unanimously approved a consolidation of "The Confession of Faith of The Church of the United Brethren in Christ" and "The Articles of Faith, and The Doctrines of Regeneration, Sanctification and Christian Perfection of The Evangelical Church" into a single statement of 16 articles known as "THE CONFESSION OF FAITH of The Evangelical United Brethren Church." This action was subsequently endorsed by the annual conferences. In other action, the Conference approved a new constitution for the Board of Publication and provided for a new publication, Church and Home, which was to replace The Telescope-Messenger and Our Home beginning in January, 1964. J. WILLARD KRECKER was elected Executive Editor of the new magazine and L. L. Huffman was elected Publisher with jurisdiction over both The OTTERBEIN PRESS and The EVANGELICAL PRESS. A revised constitution for the Board of Pensions was also approved. After considerable debate on both subjects, approval was given for the revision of the Disciplinary Statement on divorce and remarriage to allow a "more realistic and more redemptive ministry," but a statement in opposition to capital punishment was defeated.

The Conference honored six persons upon their retirement from general church offices: Robert S. Smethers, publisher of The Evangelical Press; John H. Ness, Sr., Executive Secretary of the Board of Pensions; Miss Edith A. Loose, Editor of Children's Graded Publications; Miss Alta Becker, Editor of Children's Uniform Publications; Benjamin C. Cain, Secretary of the Department of Town and Country Church; and Carl Heinmiller, Executive Secretary of the Department of World Missions.

The Conference was privileged to hear addresses from a number of prominent laymen and clergymen from the Worldwide Christian Movement. In addition to Charles C. Parlin, the group included Leslie E. Cooke, Director of the Division of Inter-Church Aid, Refugee and World Service of the World Council of Churches; J. Irwin Miller, President of the National Council of Churches; Brooks Hays, Special Assistant to President John F. Kennedy; Richard E. Kelfa-Caulker, First Ambassador from Sierra Leone to the United States and a son of E. U. B. missionary activity in his country; George A. Buttrick, Minister of Madison Avenue Presbyterian Church in New York City; and Elmer G. Homrighausen, Professor of Christian Education at Princeton Theological Seminary.

1966. General Conference, meeting in Chicago, Ill., November 8-17, voted 325 to 88 to approve the Plan and Basis of Union with The Methodist Church and sent it on to the annual conferences for final ratification. The stage was set for this action in the Episcopal Address, which was read at the opening session by Bishop J. GORDON HOWARD. Bishop REUBEN H. MUELLER presided. Other bishops in attendance were Bishop Emeritus GEORGE E. EPP and active Bishops Harold R. Heinger, Paul M. Herrick, Hermann W. Kaebnick, Paul W. Milhouse, and W. Maynard Sparks. All seven bishops were reelected to office.

Prior to the vote on union, the Conference was divided into 20 discussion groups in order that more people might be involved in debate before the hour of decision arrived. A number of critical items were brought out of these groups for debate on the conference floor after which they were referred to an inter-conference negotiation. With these items pending, the vote was taken to approve the Constitution and Enabling Legislation to send these documents on to the annual conferences for final ratification. After both The Methodist Church and The Evangelical United Brethren Church had conducted their respective votes, Evangelical United Brethren joined the Methodists in the latter's meeting place (in the same hotel) for a Thanksgiving service.

With both the formalities of voting and the celebration of Thanksgiving behind them, the Evangelical United Brethren General Conference returned to its own quarters for further sessions addressed to matters pertinent to the continuation of the Church until such a time as union would be consummated.

Among the items of business accomplished were these: (1) The Canada Conference, which is located in Ontario, was granted permission to merge with the United Church of Canada; (2) Church and Home magazine was changed from a semi-monthly publication to a monthly publication; (3) A plan for the reorganization of the Board of Missions under a single chief executive officer was adopted and JOHN F. SCHAEFFER was elected General Secretary; (4) DONALD THEUER was named to succeed L. L. Huffman as Publisher and CURTIS A. CHAMBERS to succeed Joe Willard Kreyer as editor of Church and Home; (5) All other general officers were returned to office and most board memberships were continued because of the prospects of union in 1968; (6) Support for continued participation in the Consultation in Church Union and confidence in continued participation in the work of the NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES were voiced; (7) Concern for the Vietnam War was expressed, local churches were encouraged to study the National Council of Churches statement in United States policy toward Communist China, and concern was expressed over the need for "strengthening moral values and discipline of American men in Vietnam"; and (8) The denomination's traditional statement on temperance was upheld.

1968. The Conference which convened in Dallas, Texas, April 22, prior to the merging conference, was really a continuation of the 41st (1966) General Conference. All seven bishops were in attendance. Bishop Harold R. Heininger retired from office and was replaced by PAUL A. WASHBURN, who had been serving as Executive Secretary of the Commission on Church Union of The Evangelical United Brethren Church since 1964.

The Conference approved the recommendation of the General Council of Administration denying withdrawal petitions to annual conferences opposed to union with The Methodist Church. Original petitioners were from the Montana and Pacific Northwest Conferences and 13 local congregations in the Erie Conference.

Five retiring general church staff members were honored during the afternoon session: Bishop Heininger, Charles C. Bartsch, Regional Secretary for the Board of Missions, Paul Price of the Board of Education, Cawley Stine, General Church Treasurer, and Raymond M. Veh, editor of Builders.

On Tuesday, April 23, The Evangelical United Brethren Church became a part of The United Methodist Church.

GENERAL MINUTES. The general statistics of The United Methodist Church are published annually in one volume under the name of General Minutes of the Annual Conferences of The United Methodist Church in the United States and Overseas. This volume is edited by the Director of the Department of Statistics of the COUNCIL ON WORLD SERVICE AND FINANCE and published by the METHODIST PUBLISHING HOUSE. It contains in addition to twenty-six items of statistics, the place, date and presiding bishop, and the answers to the disciplinary questions pertaining to changes in the status of the ministerial members of the conferences, and their appointments to the several charges of the conferences.

The General Minutes have been published since 1785 when the volume was designated, "Minutes Taken at the Several Annual Conferences of the Methodist Episcopal Church." They were originally published in pamphlet form. However, in 1794, JOHN DICKINS, the first BOOK AGENT in the United States, "issued a volume embracing all the minutes from the commencement of Methodism in America, a period of about twenty-one or twenty-two years"—1840 edition of the Minutes of the Annual Conferences.

The Publishing House continued to edit and publish the minutes until 1952 when the editing was transferred to the Council on World Service and Finance.

More recent years have seen the inclusion of items such as—specialized lists, the names and fields of missionaries, chaplains, deacons, transfers, class of the year, discontinued, and the death roll. Judicial Decisions rendered during the quadrennium and statistics for each individual church are also usually carried.

ROY A. STURM

GENERAL RULES. As early as December 1738, JOHN WESLEY drew up rules for his band societies, and during the following years it became clear that if he were to exercise a strict but fair discipline over the conduct of his followers in general they must understand what was expected of them before they became members of the Methodist societies. This was reinforced by a searching enquiry into the conduct of Methodists in different parts of the country during 1742 and 1743, the climax coming at Newcastle, where he felt obliged to expel fifty out of eight hundred for unbecoming behaviour. He immediately drew up a set of rules, publishing them there in Newcastle, dated Feb. 23, 1743. He prefixed a brief history of Methodism and its organization, and entitled the pamphlet, The Nature, Design, and General Rules of the United Societies.

At least thirty editions of this work appeared during Wesley's lifetime, and many more afterwards. In Britain the document continued to be published as a separate pamphlet, but early in the nineteenth century its title was changed to Rules of the Society of the People called Methodists. The Rules were also incorporated in the Class Books printed for the use of CLASS LEADERS. With METHODIST UNION in 1932 they were quietly dropped from the official discipline of the new church, although the principles behind them were enforced by a brief statement on membership.

The General Rules were officially adopted by the newly-formed M. E. Church of America in 1785, and in 1787 THOMAS COKE and FRANCIS ASBURY prepared a revised edition, which has continued to appear in the Discipline. In America the rules were rarely printed separately, but throughout nearly two centuries have continued to retain their position in the official Disciplines of Methodism. They are no longer enforced, however, and modern Disciplines omit the former regulation that the "General Rules" should be read to each congregation at least once each quarter. The General Rules, however, are published as constitutional matter in the Discipline of The United Methodist Church and the GENERAL CONFERENCE of that church is forbidden by Restrictive Rule No. 5 to "revoke or change the General Rules of our United Societies."

Wesley himself made minor changes in subsequent editions of the General Rules, and the American Discipline of 1789 added an important prohibition: "The buying or selling the bodies and souls of men, women or children, with an intention to enslave them." Other modifications have appeared from time to time. The general tenor of Wesley's rules has remained the same, however. They made no attempt to furnish a general code of conduct, but presupposed the acceptance of the moral code summarized in the Ten Commandments, along with a religious code based upon the ordinances of the Holy Scriptures and of the Christian church. Nor were they "rules" in the usual sense, but rather illustrative examples of the three principles which those who wished to retain their membership in the Societies were expected to follow: "doing no harm," "doing good," and "attending upon all the ordinances of God." These examples were not intended to be exhaustive, but demonstrated how Methodists were expected to solve specific problems of conduct which might easily be overlooked or misunderstood.

Here is the text of the first edition of this document as penned by Wesley:

RULES, &C. OF THE UNITED SOCIETIES

1. In the latter end of the year 1739 eight or ten persons came to me in London, who appeared to be deeply convinced of sin, and earnestly groaning for redemption. They desired (as did two or three more the next day) that I would spend some time with them in prayer, and advise them how to flee from the wrath to come, which they saw continually hanging over their heads. That we might have more time for this great work, I appointed a day when they might all come together, which from thenceforward they did every week, namely on Thursday in the evening. To these, and as many more as desired to join with them (for their number increased daily), I gave those advices from time to time which I judged most needful for them; and we always concluded our meeting with prayer suited to their several necessities.

2. This was the rise of the United Society, first at London, and then in other places. Such a Society is no other than "a company of men having the form and seeking the power of godliness, united in order to pray together, to receive the word of exhortation, and to watch over one another in love, that they may help each other to work out their salvation."

3. That it may the more easily be discerned whether they are indeed working out their own salvation, each Society is divided into smaller companies called Classes, according to their respective places of abode. There are about twelve persons in every Class, one of whom is styled the Leader. It is his business: (1) To see each person in his class once a week at the least, in order to receive what they are willing to give toward the relief of the poor, to enquire how their souls prosper, to advise, reprove, comfort, or exhort, as occasion may require; (2) To meet the Minister and the Stewards of the Society once a week, in order to pay in to the Stewards what they have received of their several Classes in the week preceding, to show their account of what each person has contributed, and to inform the Minister of any that are sick, or of any that walk disorderly and will not be reprov'd.

4. There is one only condition previously required in those who desire admission into these Societies—a desire to flee from the wrath to come, to be saved from their sins. But wherever this is really fixed in the soul it will be shown by its fruits. It is therefore expected of all who continue therein that they should continue to evidence their desire of salvation:

First, by doing no harm, by avoiding evil in every kind, especially that which is most generally practised. Such is the taking the name of God in vain; the profaning the day of the Lord, either by doing ordinary work thereon, or by buying or selling; drunkenness, buying or selling spirituous liquors, or drinking them—unless in cases of extreme necessity; fighting, quarreling, brawling, going to law, returning evil for evil, or railing for railing, the using many words in buying or selling; the buying or selling uncustomed goods; the giving or taking things on usury; uncharitable or unprofitable conversation; doing to others as we would not they should do unto us; doing what we know is not for the glory of God, as the putting on of gold or costly apparel, the taking such diversions as cannot be used in the name of the Lord Jesus, the singing those songs, or reading those books, which do not tend to the knowledge or love of God; softness, and needless self-indulgence; laying up treasures upon earth.

5. It is expected of all who continue in these Societies that they should continue to evidence their desire of salvation:

Secondly, by doing good, by being in every kind merciful after their power; as they have opportunity doing good of every possible sort, and as far as is possible to all men: to their bodies, of the ability which God giveth, by giving food to the hungry, by clothing the naked, by visiting or helping them that are sick or in prison; to their souls, by instructing, reproving, or exhorting all we have any intercourse with—trampling under foot that enthusiastic doctrine of devils, that "we are not to do good unless our heart be free to it;" by doing good especially to them that are of the household of faith, or groaning so to be, employing them preferably to others, buying one of another, helping each other in business—and that so much the more because the world will love its own, and them only; by all possible diligence and frugality, that the gospel be not blamed; by running with patience the race that is set before them, "denying themselves, and taking up their cross daily," submitting to bear the reproach of Christ, to be as the filth and offscouring of the world, and looking that men should "say all manner of evil of them falsely, for their Lord's sake."

6. It is expected of all who desire to continue in these Societies, that they should continue to evidence their desire of salvation:

Thirdly, by attending upon all the ordinances of God. Such are the public worship of God, the ministry of the word, either read or expounded, the Supper of the Lord, private prayer, searching the Scriptures, and fasting, or abstinence.

7. These are the General Rules of our Societies, all which we are taught of God to observe, even in his written word—the only rule, and the sufficient rule, both of our faith and practice. And all these we know his Spirit writes on every truly awakened heart. If there be any among us who observe them not, who habitually break any one of them, let it be made known unto him who watches over that soul as one that must give account. I will admonish him of the error of his ways. I will bear with him for a season. But if then he repent not, he hath no more place among us. We have delivered our own souls.

John Wesley.

Feb. 23, 1742-3.

Henry Carter, The Methodist: a study in discipleship, London: Kelly, 1914.

Davis and Rupp (eds.), A History of the Methodist Church in Great Britain, 1965, Vol. 1, chapter VI, "The People called Methodists: 'Our Discipline,'" by John Lawson.

FRANK BAKER

GENESEE CONFERENCE. (See WESTERN NEW YORK CONFERENCE.)

GENUFLECTION. Traditionally this is an act of reverence made by touching the knee or knees to the ground (Lat. genu, knee; flectere, to bend). It differs from kneeling in being more a temporary or instant act of bending the knee, as kneeling is usually for a longer period. A simple genuflection, the Roman Catholic dictionary holds, is made with the right knee and to be used "in venerating the Sacrament when it is enclosed in the Tabernacle, and in certain ceremonies, the Cross." A double genuflection, according to the same authority, is made with both knees simultaneously, and is to be made before the blessed Sacrament when that is exposed. Catholics also hold that genuflection is a mark of homage given to the Pope, to a Cardinal, and to a Bishop in his own diocese.

In the Protestant Episcopal Church there is a bending of the knee and quite often a simple bending of both knees, as in the old-fashioned English curtsy, by reverent persons who genuflect at the mention of the name of Jesus, or when they pass in front of their high altar.

In Methodism nothing like this type of genuflection has ever been practiced, unless the call for kneeling at the Sacramental Table may be termed genuflection. Even this is not mandated in Methodist Disciplines, and from an early date a rubric in the American Communion Service stated that those who have "scruples against kneeling" at Communion table may take it standing or sitting.

Kneeling in prayer has, however, been the traditional Methodist way of worshiping, and the simple bowing of the congregation in prayer, as is now allowed by recently written rubrics in the American Orders of Worship, was looked upon with disfavor by certain older Methodists. Kneeling rails within the pews are not found today in Methodist churches and the custom of kneeling in church worship is not insisted upon. However, in private devotions, the devout feel it right to kneel when at all possible.

The Book of Worship for Church and Home. Nashville: The Methodist Publishing House, 1964.

The New Catholic Dictionary. Conde B. Pallen and John J. Wynne, editors. N. Y.: Van Rees Press, 1929. N. B. H.

GENEVA, Switzerland, is first mentioned by Julius Caesar, who recorded his visit to this spot 2,000 years ago and remarked on its natural beauty. In 1124 the Bishop of Geneva, a vassal of the Germanic emperor, was acknowledged as the temporal prince. During the Renaissance, the citizens of Geneva began to take a prominent part in the official affairs. The doctrines of the Reformation were preached in Geneva by Guillaume Farel and others from 1532, and, by 1536, Catholic rites had been abolished and the Reformed religion accepted as the established faith. The same year saw the arrival of JOHN CALVIN. Through his work, Geneva acquired an important influence over the spiritual life of Europe.

Henry Dunant (1828-1910), a Geneva citizen and an ardent member of the Y.M.C.A., advocated the cause of suffering humanity and thus became the founder of the Red Cross movement. His agitation led to the Geneva Convention (1864), and Geneva has served since then as the international headquarters for the International Committee of the Red Cross and the International League of Red Cross Societies.

In 1920 Geneva was chosen as the permanent site of the League of Nations. In 1939 the League Assembly adjourned for the last time, but with the end of the Second World War, the United Nations established its European headquarters in the League of Nations Palace. Many of the humanitarian, cultural, and administrative agencies of the United Nations have also established their headquarters in Geneva.

For a long time many Christian international committees have had their offices in Geneva: the Y.M.C.A., the Y.W.C.A., the WORLD STUDENTS' CHRISTIAN FEDERATION, and others. Therefore, it is not surprising that Geneva was chosen as the site of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and most of its agencies.

The influence of Methodism in Geneva religious life goes back to the early years of the nineteenth century, when Methodist laymen from England and Scotland, as Richard Wilcox and the brothers James and Robert Haldane, came there and held religious meetings. No French-speaking Methodist church was organized, but in connection with the whole movement, the Evangelical Free Church was founded. It still exists. Because of these free churches the Methodist Church holds no French services in the French-speaking Swiss cantons.

Since 1876 pastors of the Lausanne Methodist Church went regularly to Geneva to minister to the German-speaking and German people in the city. In 1880 a Quarterly Meeting was organized, and Johann Spoerri was appointed as the first pastor of the church. By 1879 it was possible to begin services in Nyon, the birthplace of JOHN WILLIAM FLETCHER. The work in Geneva grew gradually, and services were held in different places of the town's vicinity. Special attention was given to the work among those young people who had come from the German-speaking section of SWITZERLAND and from GERMANY to learn the French language. A girls' hostel was opened and a special service for these young people organized. Today the Geneva Methodist Church is a strong German-speaking church in this international, officially French-speaking city.

In 1957 the second session of the CENTRAL AND SOUTHERN EUROPE CENTRAL CONFERENCE (Geneva Area) of The Methodist Church was held. Its first business session took place in the John William Fletcher Memorial Hall of the Bethel Methodist Church.

HERMANN SCHAAD

GEORGE, AUGUSTUS P. (1848-1917), American minister, was born at Sodas, N. Y., Feb. 14, 1848, the son of

Rev. and Mrs. A. C. George. Though he felt the call to the ministry at an early age, he did not become a preacher until 1875 when he was licensed at Pueblo, Colo. He spent two years at DREW SEMINARY before coming to KANSAS in 1881 where he joined the SOUTH KANSAS CONFERENCE. In 1884 he transferred to the SOUTHWEST KANSAS CONFERENCE. In 1886 he was appointed PRESIDING ELDER of the newly organized Garden City District where he was to meet, guide and help the new settlers not only in spiritual matters but also in the proving up of their claims. Here he established new churches, organized Sunday schools—preempting the land for God and Methodism. He has been depicted as one travelling from church to church in a spring wagon, spending the nights by the roadside, preaching to cowboys at a round-up camp, etc.

He served as pastor, presiding elder, Sunday school missionary and as Field Secretary of the Missouri State Sunday School Association. To the young people he was "Big George." He was exactly the type of man to carry on pioneer work. He died at St. Louis, Mo., Dec. 16, 1917.

Herbert, Barton and Ward, Southwest Kansas Conference. 1932.

Journal of the Southwest Kansas Conference. 1918.

WILLIAM F. RAMSDALE

ENOCH GEORGE

GEORGE, ENOCH (1767?-1828), American bishop, was born in Lancaster County, Va., and was taken in boyhood to NORTH CAROLINA. Reared as an Episcopalian, he became a Methodist under the ministry of DEVEREAUX JARRETT and JOHN EARLY and was sent by Bishop ASBURY to assist in the formation of a circuit on the Broad and Catawba Rivers in North Carolina.

He was admitted on trial in 1790 and sent to the Pamlico circuit in North Carolina. He then served in order, Caswell, Guilford and Broad River Circuits; was a PRESIDING ELDER in SOUTH CAROLINA; Charleston and Edisto Circuits; and was presiding elder in the Holston area. In 1798 he went to the North because of his health but returned to the South in 1799 to serve as circuit preacher and presiding elder in and near BALTIMORE.

He was elected bishop in 1816, to reinforce the labors of MCKENDREE, the only bishop in the Church after the death of Asbury two months earlier. During the twelve years of his episcopacy he served the NEW YORK, NEW ENGLAND, GENESSEE, CANADA, PHILADELPHIA, MAINE, PITTSBURGH and OHIO CONFERENCES. He was later assigned a tour of the Southern Conferences, but after a visit to the HOLSTON CONFERENCE, he became ill in Staunton, Va., where he died on Aug. 23, 1828.

F. D. Leete, Methodist Bishops. 1948.

Minutes of Conferences, 1829.

M. Simpson, Cyclopaedia. 1878.

W. B. Sprague, Annals of the Pulpit. 1861.

ELMER T. CLARK

GEORGETOWN, SOUTH CAROLINA, U.S.A. Duncan Memorial Church is the oldest congregation in SOUTH CAROLINA, and has an almost unequaled record of ministerial recruitment and service to the church. The church began during the winter of 1784-85, right after the CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE, when Bishop ASBURY, newly ordained, started with WOOLMAN HICKSON for "missionary work in the Southern States." JESSE LEE and HENRY WILLIS joined them, and entering South Carolina and stopping for preaching and worship at Cheraw, proceeded via Long Bluff courthouse, across Lynch's River, Black Mingo Creek, and Black River into Georgetown. They arrived there on Feb. 23, 1785 and Asbury preached. William Wayne was converted at this time—the first Methodist convert in South Carolina.

The next morning, Asbury left for CHARLESTON but returned in about two weeks, and the Georgetown Methodist Church was then formed. William Hickson was ordained a local preacher, and Woolman Hickson was left in Georgetown to serve the new church. Georgetown thus claims to have had the first Methodist church in South Carolina.

Early years showed slow progress. In 1791 there were about twenty members, white and colored, and in 1809, Joseph Travis found "three males and a few females among the whites, but a goodly number of pious colored people." By 1813 there were about 100 white, and that many Negro members. The present church reports close to 1,000.

In 1817 the Methodist Church in Georgetown was set up as a corporation—"a body politic and corporate in deed and in law, by the name and style of The Methodist Episcopal Church of Georgetown."

DUNCAN MEMORIAL, GEORGETOWN, SOUTH CAROLINA

The congregation now worships in their third church building. There is no exact certainty as to when the first building was erected, but the second building was constructed before 1840 on land bequeathed by William Wayne. This is on the site where the chapel stands today. The graves of Mr. and Mrs. Wayne were placed beneath the steps leading to the porch. The present sanctuary was named previous to 1901 as Duncan M. E. Church, South. The pastor at that time was W. M. Duncan.

Another Methodist church organized in Georgetown in 1899 by L. C. Loyal, known as West End Church, was merged with Duncan Church in 1933.

With the growth of the city, a need for a new Methodist church across the Sampit River was evident, and in 1954, 107 members of Duncan Church transferred their membership to the new church, named Wayne Church, in honor of William Wayne. In 1964 the Herbert Memorial Church was organized in the Kensington Community of Georgetown, with eighty-five members from Duncan becoming charter members of the new church. This was named for C. C. Herbert, a beloved former pastor of Duncan Memorial, and member of the well-known Herbert family of South Carolina Methodism.

Among those who have served Duncan Memorial as ministers were—WILLIAM CAPERS, the first native South Carolinian to be made a bishop; JOHN W. TARBOUX, elected the first bishop of the Methodist Church of BRAZIL. Ten ministers, two of whom became bishops, and twelve ministers' wives, as well as four directors of religious education, have been trained for Christian service as members of Duncan Memorial. Bishop PAUL HARDIN, on Feb. 28, 1965, helped this Church celebrate its 180th Anniversary. Emily C. Stacey, with her 175 Years of Methodism in Georgetown, S. C. from 1785 to 1960, has been the able historian of the life of this historic church, and of its congregation.

South Carolina Methodist Advocate. Feb. 25, 1965.

GEORGETOWN, TEXAS, U.S.A., First Church. The Georgetown Mission was formed in 1849 as a part of the TEXAS CONFERENCE, Springfield District, with eighteen appointments in two counties, J. W. Lloyd as traveling preacher and J. W. Whipple, presiding elder. In 1872 SOUTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY came to Georgetown, largely through the efforts of William Monk, James Ferguson, and Captain J. C. S. Morrow, members of the location committee. Three years later, in 1875, the Georgetown circuit was cut to twelve appointments, all in Williamson County.

The step from mission to local church came in 1874, with organization on the second floor of the University building, which stood on the site of the present Georgetown High School building. There were thirty-five charter members. In 1879 Georgetown was made a half-station with Round Rock. James Campbell, first graduate of Southwestern University, was appointed pastor and lived in Round Rock the first year. The next year Georgetown was made a station and Campbell moved there. It was then decided to build a combination church and chapel. Plans were drawn for a two-story building and construction was begun on the southwest corner of the present high school property. By the time the first floor had been completed the funds were exhausted, and for the next ten years that first floor served as church and chapel for Southwestern University. Each member of the church furnished his own wooden bench. The organ was brought from Chapel Hill, and Mrs. E. E. Chrietzberg was the organist. Ladies of the church improved the worshipful atmosphere by pasting pastel paper over the windows. It was in this chapel-church that such men as John M. and J. Sam BARCUS, FRANK ONDERDONK, John R. Nelson, Bishop H. A. BOAZ, Emmitt Hightower, and W. B. McKeown entered the ministry.

In 1892 plans were drawn and work begun on the present building. It was completed and dedicated four years later, in 1896. From this church came a number of Methodist ministers, including the brothers, A. FRANK and ANGIE SMITH, both of whom were later elected to the episcopacy. In 1917 the Mood home just west of the church was purchased for "Sunday School and Epworth League." This home served the purpose until the present education building was completed in 1933.

It was in 1950, under the pastorate of James William Morgan, that plans for redecoration and remodeling of the sanctuary were drawn, and the work was completed in 1954, along with many other improvements. In 1964, during the pastorate of Lively Brown, a remodeling program of the education building was completed. The membership has hovered around 750 for half a century.

Felix B. Secrist, First Church, Georgetown, Texas (pamphlet). 1954. WALLACE E. CHAFFELL

GEORGETOWN, WASHINGTON, D. C. (See WASHINGTON, D. C., Georgetown.)

GEORGIA (estimated 1970 population 4,492,038), one of the original thirteen colonies, has an area of 58,876 square miles and is the largest state east of the Mississippi. Located in the southeast, the state borders the Atlantic for 100 miles. Its 660-square-mile Okefenokee Swamp, one of the largest in the nation, is an important wildlife refuge. Georgia ranks high in lumber production, provides half the world's turpentine, and is by far the nation's largest producer of peanuts. The state's manufacturing has increased about nine times since 1940. Leading manufacturing industries are textiles, transportation equipment, food and paper products, apparel, and chemicals. The state has forty-nine institutions of higher learning. Called the "Empire State of the South," Georgia was named for George II, who granted the land to General JAMES OGLETHORPE in 1732. Oglethorpe made the first settlement in the territory in 1733, and in 1735 brought over CHARLES WESLEY as his personal secretary and JOHN WESLEY as chaplain to the colony.

While in Georgia the Wesleys labored chiefly in SAVANNAH and Frederica, encountering numerous difficulties, both personal and ecclesiastical. During their stay in Georgia they met and were influenced by the Moravians. Charles Wesley returned to England in 1736 and his brother followed in 1737. Considering his Georgia mission a failure, John Wesley wrote, "All the time I was at Savannah I was thus beating the air. Being ignorant of the righteousness of Christ. . . ." (Journal, May, 1738). It is generally agreed that Wesley underestimated the effectiveness of his Georgia ministry. GEORGE WHITEFIELD followed the Wesleys to America, and in 1740 he founded the BETHESDA ORPHANAGE, visiting it and collecting money for it for the next thirty years.

The work of the M. E. Church began in Georgia in 1785 when the appointments for the year read, "Georgia: Beverly Allen." The conference at which Allen was appointed was conducted by Bishops COKE and ASBURY at the home of Major GREEN HILL near Louisville, N. C., April 20-23, 1785. The conference included preachers from VIRGINIA, NORTH and SOUTH CAROLINA. Coke wrote of it, "In this Division we have had an increase of nine hundred and ninety-one this year; and have stretched our Borders into Georgia. Beverly Allen has all Georgia to range in." Beverly Allen and his brother William are said to have settled earlier at "Pearl Mill," Wilkes County, Georgia. The present Bethlehem Church in Elbert County (then part of Wilkes) claims to be the oldest Methodist congregation in the state, dating from this period. Allen probably did not work in Georgia after 1785, and eventually he was expelled from the connection.

In 1786 the VIRGINIA CONFERENCE met at Salisbury, N. C. and assigned Thomas Humphries and John Major to Georgia, which was merged with the work in South Carolina as one district, James Foster, presiding elder. In 1787 the Virginia Conference was divided to form the SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE, the latter including South Carolina and Georgia. The new conference met in Charleston, March 22, 1787 with Bishops Coke and Asbury in charge. At the conference Coke noted, "Great has been the work of God . . . [in] . . . Georgia. . . ." Georgia was made a single district with Richard Ivy as presiding elder. In 1788 the South Carolina Conference was divided to form the Georgia Conference, an arrangement which continued until 1794 when Georgia was again made a part of the South Carolina Conference. Bishop Asbury held the first conference in Georgia, April 9, 1788, ". . . at the forks of Broad River, where six members and four probationers attended." Probably those present were Ivy, Humphries, Moses Parks, HOPE HULL, James Connor, Bennett Maxey, Isaac Smith, Matthew Harris, Reuben Ellis, and John Mason. Hull, "Father of Georgia Methodism," came to the state at that time.

The 1789 session of the Georgia Conference met at Thomas Grant's near Washington, Ga. Coke wrote, "On the 9th of March we began our Conference in Georgia. We have 2,011 in Society in the state of Georgia: the increase in the last year has been 784."

In 1830 the South Carolina Conference was again divided to form the Georgia Conference, the latter to include FLORIDA as well as Georgia. The new conference began with five districts, some 47 charges including missions, 75 preachers, and 20,585 members. Four of the charges were stations: Augusta, SAVANNAH, MACON, and Columbus. Athens, Sparta, and Washington, though not stations, were important in the work in the early years. ATLANTA had not yet become a population center.

In the numerous references to Georgia in Asbury's Journal one finds the names of leading laymen such as Judge William Tait, General David Meriwether, and Daniel and Thomas Grant. Prominent Methodists who preached or taught in Georgia in the earlier decades were LORENZO DOW, JESSE LEE, STITH MEAD, and STEPHEN OLIN. LOVICK PIERCE, father of Bishop GEORGE F. PIERCE, was an outstanding preacher and leader. John Andrew of St. John's Parish (now Liberty County) was the first native Georgian to be ordained (1790). He was the father of Bishop JAMES O. ANDREW.

In 1845 the Georgia Conference adhered South, and the M. E. Church had no organized work in Georgia for the next twenty-two years. During this period the Southern Church served both white and Negro members, frequently in the same local congregation. At its first session in 1830, the Georgia Conference established a slave mission on Little River. By 1834 the conference had nine Plantation Missions, and in 1861 it appropriated $11,838 for 39 such missions which were served by 41 missionaries. When the Civil War began the Georgia Conference had 11,125 Negro members in the Plantation Missions, not to mention some 11,000 more in the white and Negro churches of the conference.

In 1866 the Georgia Conference was divided to form the NORTH and SOUTH GEORGIA CONFERENCES, both of which have continued to the present. The two conferences reported a total of 57,837 white members in 1867, and 273,500 members in 1939.

The M. E. Church reentered Georgia and organized the Georgia Conference on Oct. 10, 1867, to include both white and Negro work. Nine years later the conference had 12,177 members and 95 traveling preachers, at which time it was divided along racial lines to form the Savannah Conference, the latter to include the Negro work and leave the Georgia body as a white conference. Work among the white people of Georgia proved difficult for the Northern Church. The Georgia Conference had 2,471 members in 1877 and only 4,718 when unification came 62 years later. In 1896 the Savannah Conference was divided to form the Atlanta Conference, the territory of the latter being the north half of the state. In 1939 these two conferences continued in the Central Jurisdiction of The Methodist Church and were merged in 1952 to form the GEORGIA CONFERENCE of that Jurisdiction.

The M. P. Church organized its Georgia Conference on July 22, 1830 with twenty preachers and eight laymen. Eppes Tucker was elected president. In 1850 the conference had about the same number of preachers and some 2,000 church members. At its peak strength the M. P. Church had about 4,000 members in the state. The Georgia Conference (MP) came to unification in 1939 with 30 charges, 30 ministers, 2,419 members, and property valued at $69,385. In 1892 the M. P. Church organized North and South Georgia Mission Conferences to minister to Negroes. The two bodies were merged in 1904 to form the Georgia Mission Conference. The Mission Conference, which included the Negro work in Florida, continued until unification in 1939.

Three Negro Methodist denominations have work in Georgia. The C.M.E. Church has three conferences, Georgia, South Georgia, and Southwest Georgia, and a total of approximately 35,000 members. In 1956 the A.M.E. Church had eight conferences in Georgia: American Georgia, Atlanta Georgia, Augusta Georgia, Georgia, Macon Georgia, North Georgia, South Georgia, and Southwest Georgia. Its total membership in the state is about 69,000. The A.M.E. Zion Church has a Georgia and a South Georgia Conference with a total of some 3,500 members in the state.

Nine members of Georgia conferences have been elected bishops: James O. Andrew (1832), George F. Pierce (1854), JOSEPH S. KEY (1886), ATTICUS C. HAYGOOD (1890), WARREN A. CANDLER (1898), WILLIAM N. AINSWORTH (1918), JAMES E. DICKEY (1922), WILLIAM T. WATKINS (1938), and WILLIAM R. CANNON (1968). Bishops ARTHUR J. MOORE and MARVIN A. FRANKLIN began their ministry in Georgia but were serving in ALABAMA when elevated to the episcopacy. LUCIUS H. HOLSEY, a slave who was converted at Athens, Ga., about 1857, later became a bishop in the C.M.E. Church and was influential in the founding of PAINE COLLEGE at Augusta. Other Georgia Methodists widely known for their service as churchmen are: IGNATIUS FEW in education, YOUNG J. ALLEN and LAURA HAYGOOD in foreign missions, SAM JONES in evangelism, ASA G. CANDLER in business and philanthropy, HENRY W. GRADY in journalism, MARY HARRIS ARMOR in temperance, and Mrs. M. E. Tilly in social concerns.

Fifty-eight colleges, institutes, and high schools were started by Georgia Methodists. They served longer or shorter periods, and all but a few passed from the scene. Today The Methodist Church has in Georgia one university, two theological schools, four colleges, four junior colleges, one secondary school, and a number of Wesley Foundations. The list includes EMORY UNIVERSITY, CANDLER SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY and GAMMON THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY; CLARK, LA GRANGE, Paine, and WESLEYAN COLLEGES; Andrew, Oxford College of Emory University, Reinhardt, and Young Harris (junior) Colleges; and Vashiti (secondary) School. Paine College is also related to the C.M.E. Church, and Gammon is a part of the Interdenominational Theological Center in Atlanta.

The Southern Christian Advocate, established in 1837, served both South Carolina and Georgia Methodism until 1878. At that time Georgia Methodism launched the Wesleyan Christian Advocate as its own paper with Atticus G. Haygood, then president of Emory College, as editor. The publication experienced financial difficulties at times, but has survived. In 1965 it reported some 49,000 subscribers.

Georgia Methodism supports a number of service institutions, including Methodist Children's Homes at Decatur and Macon, the Ethel Harpst Home at Cedartown, the Warren Candler Hospital at Savannah, the Crawford W. Long Memorial Hospital which is a part of Emory University, the Magnolia Manor at Americus, and the Towers, the Wesley Woods Retirement Community at Atlanta, community centers, and inner city and rural work in various sections of the state.

In 1970 the three conferences of The United Methodist Church in Georgia reported 24 districts, 941 charges, 1,193 ministers, 392,280 members, property valued at $213,534,308, and $27,000,439 raised for all purposes during the year.

F. Asbury, Journal and Letters. 1958.
 T. Coke, Journals (Extracts). 1793.
 E. J. Hammond, ME Church in Georgia. 1935.
General Minutes, ME, MES, TMC, UMC.
Minutes of the Georgia Conferences.
 A. M. Pierce, Georgia. 1956.
 G. G. Smith, Georgia. 1913.

W. THOMAS SMITH

GEORGIA CONFERENCE (CJ) descended from the Georgia Mission Conference (ME) which was organized at Atlanta, Oct. 10, 1867, Bishop DAVIS W. CLARK presiding. The Georgia Mission Conference (Georgia Conference beginning in 1868) was formed as the M. E. Church reentered Georgia following the Civil War. (See GEORGIA.) For the first nine years the Georgia Conference included both white and Negro ministers and churches.

On Nov. 1, 1876, during the session of the Georgia Conference at Augusta, the Negro work was set off as the Savannah Conference, Bishop LEVI SCOTT presiding. Nearly twenty years later, on Jan. 22, 1896, when the Savannah Conference convened in Atlanta, it was divided to form the Atlanta Conference, Bishop WILLARD F. MALLALIEU presiding. This meant that the M. E. Church then had one white and two Negro conferences in Georgia.

At unification in 1939 the white conference was merged, while the two Negro bodies continued as conferences in the Central Jurisdiction. Then on July 13, 1952, the Atlanta and Savannah Conferences met in a special joint session at Waycross and merged to form the Georgia Conference (CJ), Bishop J. W. E. BOWEN presiding. The next session of the Georgia Conference (CJ) was held at SAVANNAH, May 27-31, 1953 with Bishop Bowen presiding.

The Savannah Conference began in 1876 with five districts, 76 charges, and 9,728 members. In 1895 it reported 122 charges and 19,092 members. When the Atlanta Conference was formed in 1896, it took about 12,000 members, leaving some 7,000 to the Savannah Conference. Both conferences grew in membership until 1920. In that year the Atlanta Conference reported 18,678 members and the Savannah Conference 9,389. Within five years both conferences had declined some twenty percent in membership, and they continued at about that level until 1939 when the Atlanta Conference reported 14,386 members and the Savannah Conference 6,094. By 1952, when the two conferences merged to form the Georgia Conference, the membership of the Atlanta Conference had dropped to 10,686, while that of the Savannah Conference had risen to 6,422. In the year following the merger there was a small net gain in membership, and thereafter the growth was more rapid. The Georgia Conference showed a net gain of about thirty-three percent in membership in 1968 as compared with 1953.

The M. E. Church founded CLARK COLLEGE at Atlanta in 1869. Bishop Clark, for whom the school was named, emphasized theology because he desired an educated ministry for the Negroes. The theological department at Clark became the nucleus of GAMMON THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, which was chartered in 1880 and named for Elijah H. Gammon of ILLINOIS, who made an initial gift of $180,000 to the institution. Through the years the M. E. Church and all of its conferences in Georgia gave support to Clark and Gammon. It is claimed that one-half the ministers occupying the pulpits in the Central Jurisdiction received their training at Gammon. With an endowment of nearly $2,000,000, a plant valued at more than $2,000,000, and nearly 1,000 students, Clark has become a strong Methodist college. Gammon, now one of the fourteen theological schools of the church, is a part of the Interdenominational Center in Atlanta. The seminary has an endowment of more than $1,000,000 and a plant valued at nearly $2,000,000.

In 1968 the Georgia Conference (CJ) had five districts, 57 charges, 85 ministers, 30,444 members, and property valued at $5,390,605. On the abolition of the Central Jurisdiction in 1968, the conference became a part of the Atlanta Area of the South Central Jurisdiction pending merger with the overlying conferences of that Jurisdiction.

General Minutes, ME, TMC.
Minutes of the Georgia Conference and its predecessors.
 A. M. Pierce, Georgia. 1956. ALBEA GOBBOLD

GERDINE, JOSEPH LUMPKIN (1870-1950), American layman who gave his life to missionary work in KOREA, was born in Pickens County, Ala., July 13, 1870. He studied at the University of Georgia, and began law practice in MACON, Ga. Devoted to the church, he became a leading layman, and in 1898 was elected state president of the EPWORTH LEAGUE of Georgia.

In spite of being urged to continue in law, his call to the ministry was such that he joined the SOUTH GEORGIA CONFERENCE in 1901, and the next year accepted a call to missionary work in Korea.

He was engaged in evangelistic work in Wonsan, 1902-05; Songdo, 1906-08; and Seoul, 1908-26. While in Wonsan he helped start the Korean revival movement. After 1926, he taught in the Methodist Seminary in Seoul. During furloughs he studied at the Biblical Seminary in New York, and at EMORY and VANDERBILT UNIVERSITIES.

His training as a lawyer was used to good effect during the infamous Conspiracy Case of 1912. About 125 Koreans, including 98 Christians, were falsely charged with plotting to kill Governor Terauchi. Lawyer Gerdine toured JAPAN and Peking seeking the advice and cooperation of news correspondents. Through his efforts the trial gained wide publicity and revealed the fact that the case was based entirely on forced confessions. As a result of this revelation the government acquitted all but four and these were later exonerated.

J. L. Gerdine retired in December 1937, due to ill-health in the family, and took up residence in ATLANTA, Ga. He died March 13, 1950, in Crescent City, Fla. and was buried in Atlanta.

CHARLES A. SAUER

GERMAN CAMP MEETINGS, U.S.A. The CAMP MEETING played an important role in the religious life of the German-speaking people during the nineteenth century. It was a logical outgrowth of the religious services held in people's homes or in barns, as one can readily see in the case of the "Great Meeting" at the Isaac Long Barn in 1767, when the crowd overflowed into the orchard. However, it is not the service at the Isaac Long Barn that marks the beginning of camp meetings among the German settlers, but a meeting conducted by JACOB ALBRIGHT in May, 1810, on the farm of Michael Maize, near New Berlin, Pa. The followers of OTTERBEIN and BOEHM conducted their first camp meeting at Rocky Springs, Franklin County, Pa.

As in the case of the English-speaking people attending the camp meetings conducted by Methodist, Baptist, and the German-speaking people travelled miles to hear Presbyterian evangelists beginning in the late 1790's, Evangelical and United Brethren preachers and to share in the spiritual excitement of the meetings themselves. By 1816, the camp meeting had become so well established that the Evangelical Association noted in its Discipline that one of the duties of an elder was to "set the date for and conduct camp meetings according to his judgment."

The rapid increase in the number of camp meetings and camp meeting sites was both a boon and a bane. It was a boon in that it gave people an opportunity to hear spirited preaching without travelling great distances. Furthermore, it served as a means of growth for both the EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION and UNITED BRETHREN CHURCH because of the large number of converts. Finally, the camp meeting frequently afforded people a fellowship not available elsewhere, a fact alluded to by writers like Schuyler Enck in his history of the Mt. Gretna Camp-meeting Association when he wrote of setting up camp, renewing acquaintances, and the aroma of food cooking over open fire.

On the negative side of the picture, it must be noted that the high enthusiasm of the meetings attracted the curious as well as those who were seriously searching for soul satisfaction. Sometimes rowdiness broke out, as was the case at Womelsdorf, Pa., in 1825. Sometimes family quarrels arose because of a feeling that converts were deserting the true faith. In 1829, one such occurrence at a camp meeting in Somerset County, Pa., almost ended in tragedy as an enraged wife rode down the aisle on a colt to beat her kneeling husband over the head with a stone. Foiled by one of the worshippers, she next pulled out a butcher knife but was soon disarmed. Stapleton reported that several years later, the woman herself was converted at a camp meeting held on the same grounds. It is no surprise that camp meetings were branded by one established denomination as "deviations from Lutheran ways" (Abdel Wentz, A Basic History of Lutheranism in America); but not all criticism was this negative. George Boone, a cousin of Daniel Boone and a member of the Society of Friends, criticized the "tumultuous and noisy part of the worship" and the material of John Erb's sermon but used the same letter to assure Daniel Bertolet that he wished the Evangelical "Society" well in its effort "in putting down vice and immorality" (Albright, A History of the Evangelical Church).

Since World War II, the camp meeting program has been either radically changed or completely replaced by a church camping program which is oriented toward education. Some groups like the United Christian Church, an offshoot of the United Brethren Church, still give a prominent place to the "old-fashioned" camp meeting. Some conferences of The United Methodist Church continue camp meetings along with their diversified church camping programs. In Pennsylvania some of these camp meetings are given an occasional flavor of the past through preaching and singing in the Pennsylvania German dialect.

R. W. Albright, Evangelical Church. 1942.

A. W. Drury, History of the U.B. 1924.

A. Stapleton, Flashlights. 1908.

W. W. Sweet, The Story of Religion in America. 1946.

BRUCE C. SOUDERS

GERMAN DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC, CENTRAL CONFERENCE IN THE (Zentral Konferenz in der Deutschen Demokratischen), was organized in 1970 of what had been the Annual Conference in the G.D.R. This then became a largely independent body as a Central Conference of equal status with all other Central Conferences. It covers the whole of East GERMANY and consists of the former Central Germany Annual Conference, the East District of the Northeast Germany Annual Conference (these two formerly Methodist), and the larger part of the East Germany Annual Conference (then Evangelical Association)—united in 1968. The three East Germany Districts are the (East) Berlin, the Dresden, and the Leipzig.

The former Central Germany Annual Conference was the first annual conference overseas which accepted full responsibility for its own self-support, when it was created in 1926. The new conference now reports a membership of 143 ministers and 20,000 members.

The newly organized Central Conference in the G.D.R. elected as its first bishop ARMIN HAERTEL, who was duly installed by Bishop FRANZ W. SCHAEFER of Zurich, republic senting the United Methodist Church. The formation of this Central Conference was authorized by the 1970 General Conference in St. Louis.

C. ERNST SOMMER

GERMAN METHODIST CHURCH IN AMERICA. Many German people were among the successive waves of immigrants who came from different parts of Europe to make their homes in the American land of promise more than a hundred years ago. They poured into the upper Ohio Valley by way of PITTSBURGH, and spread out into the middle west. Others settled in Wheeling, Marietta, Portsmouth and on to CINCINNATI where the German Methodist Church originated.

Leaders of the OHIO CONFERENCE, of the M. E. Church, recognizing the language and cultural barriers faced in these German settlements, were convinced that here in their midst was a field for the newly organized Missionary Society which was under the leadership of Secretary NATHAN BANGS. ABEL STEVENS in his History of American Methodism described it as "one of the most remarkable events in the history of modern missions, the beginning of German Methodist Missions."

In the 1832 session of the Ohio Conference, first steps were taken when ADAM MILLER was named as missionary to the Germans about Cincinnati. He was handicapped by his limited knowledge of the German language and search continued for a qualified German-speaking leader.

Such a leader had providentially been in the making in the person of WILLIAM NAST, the founder of German Methodism, as this started in and about Cincinnati and rapidly spread to German settlements in every direction. It not only provided vital spiritual appeal to the newcomers, but eventually, under the leadership of L. S. JACOBY, was planted in the German "Fatherland." These German colonies were fertile fields for Methodist missions, and there rapidly developed churches, circuits, districts and conferences. For approximately 130 years this German Mission fulfilled its purpose as a separate entity. Even before 1939 when Methodist Unification officially took place, the German branch of the church was well along in the processes of uniting.

The history of certain of the German-speaking American annual conferences will be told in this Encyclopedia under their respective names. They all in time were absorbed into the regular annual conferences within whose territory they had been carrying on their work. They have made a great contribution to American Methodism. Their CHARLES CITY COLLEGE, CENTRAL WESLEYAN COLLEGE, MOUNT PLEASANT GERMAN COLLEGE, and Wallace College (now a part of BALDWIN-WALLACE) were institutions of great worth.

OTTIS RYMER SNODGRASS

GERMAN MISSION CONFERENCE (MES) was organized at Houston, Texas, Dec. 16, 1874 with Bishop JOHN C. KEENER presiding. This was the same year in which the M. E. Church organized its SOUTHERN GERMAN CONFERENCE in Texas. From the beginning the German Mission Conference included all of the German work of the Southern Church in both TEXAS and LOUISIANA. The conference began with three districts—New Orleans, Houston, and New Braunfels—19 preachers, and 110 members.

The outstanding leader of the German Mission Conference was FREDERICK VORDENDAUMEN, a native of Germany and a convert from Lutheranism. His predominance in the conference continued until his death in 1899. J. B. A. Ahrens and John A. Pauly were also leaders in the conference.

The Germans generally were opposed to slavery, and though the M. E. Church, South began work among them in Texas and Louisiana in the 1840's and had little or no competition from the M. E. Church in that ministry until after the Civil War, still in the long run the German work of the Southern Church did not thrive as well as that of the Northern Church. The Southern German Conference (ME) began with 438 members against 110 for the German Mission Conference (MES). In 1900 the statistics were 2,536 against 1,366, and in their last years before merger the one had 4,445 members and the other 1,897.

The first World War, the limitation on immigration, and the assimilation of second generation Germans in this country, lessened the need and the appeal of German language churches. In 1918 the name of the German Mission Conference was changed to SOUTHWEST TEXAS CONFERENCE, and the following year it was dissolved and the German preachers and churches were absorbed in the overlying English-speaking conferences of the M. E. Church, South. In that year the conference reported one district, 17 pastorates, 1,818 members, and property valued at $88,133.

General Minutes, MES.

H. M. DuBose, History, 1916.

M. Simpson, Cyclopaedia, 1878.

N. B. H.

GERMAN ORPHAN ASYLUMS, Warrenton, Missouri, and Berea, Ohio, U.S.A. (See ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI, Methodist Children's Home of Missouri, and BEREA, OHIO, Methodist Children's Home.)

GERMAN-WALLACE COLLEGE, Berea, Ohio. (See BALDWIN-WALLACE COLLEGE.)

GERMANTOWN, Philadelphia, Pa., U.S.A. First Church is one of the outstanding churches of Methodism in the NORTHEASTERN JURISDICTION. The first Methodist sermon in Germantown was probably preached by GEORGE WHITEFIELD, Nov. 27, 1739. In his Journal he writes, "According to appointment, I preached at German Town, seven miles from Philadelphia, from a balcony, to about six thousand people. God strengthened me to speak nearly two hours, with such demonstration of the Spirit, that great numbers continued weeping for a considerable time." JOSEPH PILMORE preached in Germantown Dec. 1, 1771, and on May 31, 1773, FRANCIS ASBURY preached in the Dutch Reformed Church on Market Square now occupied by the Market Square Presbyterian Church. EZEKIEL COOPER, who later became the second BOOK EDITOR of the M. E. Church, preached in the Academy Building on School House Lane in May of 1796, and on June 24 of the same year he organized a class of about eleven members. It was from this class that First Church finally grew.

The Academy in which Cooper preached was later closed to the Methodists, and they began to meet in each other's homes. In 1803 HENRY BOEHM, who had also preached occasionally in Germantown, began a fund for a meeting house and a lot was purchased on Haines Street, then known as Bickius Lane. Later it was called "Methodist Lane" or "Meeting House Lane." The first church building was erected there in 1804 and was enlarged and rebuilt both in 1824 and again in 1858.

The church was originally called the Haines Street M.E. Church, and it was for a time on the Bristol Circuit which then had nineteen preaching places. In 1831 the Bristol Circuit was divided and the Germantown Circuit with fourteen preaching places came into existence. In March of 1834 the church was incorporated under the name The M.E. Church in Germantown, and in 1851 it was made a single station. Through the years the church aided greatly in the expansion of Methodism, becoming the mother church of most of the present-day Methodist churches in and around Germantown.

In 1898 the present Gothic structure was erected on the corner of Germantown and High Streets. In 1931 under the leadership of J. S. Ladd Thomas, pastor of the church, the Turner Memorial Chapel and the Church House were erected at a cost of $375,000, providing at once one of the most beautiful chapels and most practical church school buildings in PHILADELPHIA.

The ministers of First Church, Germantown have included some of the leading orators of Methodism, and the church is justly famous for beauty of its Turner Chapel, its aggressive urban program, its long list of outstanding preachers and ministers, and its missionary outreach.

Francis H. Tees, Pioneering in Penn's Woods. Philadelphia: Philadelphia Conference Tract Society of the M.E. Church, 1937.

Robert Thomas, A Century of Methodism in Germantown. Press of the Germantown Independent, 1895.

FREDERICK E. MASER

GERMANY developed from the East part of the empire of Charlemagne, divided among his grandsons in A.D. 843; FRANCE, in the West, and Germany afterward helped themselves to parts of the realm in between, Germany further expanding toward the East. Much of the latter territory was lost in the two world wars. Since 1945 the country has been divided into East Germany (about 17,000,000 inhabitants, of whom 2,000,000 are Roman Catholics) and West Germany (about 61,000,000 inhabitants, with Roman Catholics and Protestants nearly equally divided).

The Franks had accepted Christianity around A.D. 500. Later, the Irish monks gained considerable influence in France and Germany. But it was an Anglo-Saxon, Boniface, who reorganized the church and connected it safely with Rome. This was at the time a good and helpful thing. It created a situation, however, which afterward led to centuries of struggle between the popes and the emperors. Then came the Reformation, and Luther brought about a movement which continued against many difficulties, until around 1800 the beginning of what one sometimes calls, none too aptly, the post-Christian era, challenged all churches to reconsider their positions. There are those who hold we are still in that process.

The Reformation relied on the princes of the various German territories to safeguard the Lutheran churches in their regions. In 1555 this principle was accepted by both the Protestants and the Roman Catholics, the slogan being cuius regio eius religio (in free translation, "the religion of a country is that of its duke or king"), the ruler's personal decision in religious matters to decide the religion of his subjects. Thus the background of religious life in Germany was the state church, and only Lutherans were accepted as a possible alternative to Roman Catholicism. It took the Thirty Years' War and the peace treaty of 1648 before the Reformierte Kirche (the Presbyterians of Germany) were considered eligible as well. The development ended there for something like two hundred years, and there came the age of rationalism and deism. The French Revolution marked the finish of one and the beginning of another era, as did the Industrial Revolution. The Napoleonic Wars brought to an end the so-called "Holy Roman Empire of German Nationality" (1806). Germany then became more or less a geographical term and a loose federation of countries, until it was again united in 1871.

Not only did Hegel's philosophy, characterized as pantheistic by our forefathers, influence poets and thinkers, politics and sociology; it also gave a new impetus to a critical review of the Bible and of church history, and historicism began to prevail. The German intelligentsia was to a large extent lost to the church, as was the newly developing class of industrial workers. Hegel felt that this age was "the century of the masses." Secularism got into its stride, and the state and nationalism were gloried.

But this was only one side. The age of ideology and modern idolatry became also the "center of missions." A revival swept Great Britain and the continent; it made for a fellowship of believers, bridging all national, denominational, and confessional barriers, and there was a deep striving for personal salvation. The Methodist Church was part of this movement, but it was a church at the same time—a free church, a nonstate church, a church of members who were admitted on profession of faith only, which implied a personal and free decision for Christ. Since the so-called left wing of the Reformation era, this had been unheard of in Germany. The complex nature of the period was enhanced by the fact that during this very same time there was a resurgence of confession-alism, rooted, of course, in rigid state-church thinking.

The Wesleyan Movement and an Independent Church. CHRISTOPH GOTTLIB MUELLER had emigrated to England during the Napoleonic Wars (1806) because he did not want to fight in the army of his country, Württemberg, which was allied to France, and particularly not against fellow Germans. In LONDON he got into touch with Methodism, was converted, and served as an exhorter. Revisiting his home country in 1813, he gave his testimony at a Moravian meeting in his father's home, and the people were deeply impressed. They wrote to London, asking for a Methodist missionary. Not until 1831 did the Wesleyan METHODIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY decide to send Mueller, who was a layman. With his British wife and family he came and took up work in his home town of Winnenden, eighteen kilometers from STUTTGART. He intended to work within the state church of his country, and regarded it as his task to lead people to a clear conversion and a life of sanctification. Soon there arose conflicts, not only with the state authorities and the church but also with the pietists living in those parts. As was the case with early Methodism in England, this was a society movement within a church. As in England then, state-church life revived in consequence of Methodist work. Church attendance and attendance at Holy Communion increased where people were becoming converted.

Mueller and his fellow workers earned their living in various jobs and contributed their missionary efforts as laymen. A year after Mueller's death (1859), the British Wesleyan Methodist Church sent the first ordained minister as general superintendent of what they termed "lay activities in rural regions." Starting with 1861, Waiblingen (twelve kilometers from Stuttgart) became the center of the work. After a certain discipline had been introduced, there came a new revival, and the membership was doubled within three years. In 1867 Wesleyan Methodism in Germany took its first step by going into a city of the Württemberg territory, i.e., Stuttgart. In 1872 a law was passed establishing religious liberty and making it possible for societies to develop into independent churches. Some of the marks of churchhood were services during state-church hours, celebrating Holy Communion (begun in 1873) and baptisms, and then the first ordination of a German Wesleyan minister (1875). A ministerial training college, working illegally as a make-shift affair before this, was established on Oct. 15, 1873.

Beginnings of the Methodist Episcopal Church. The 1848 revolution brought about repercussions on the whole continent, and many German countries introduced both political and religious legislation which aimed at liberty. This made it easier to work in the field of evangelism with the foundation of a nonstate, non-Catholic, non-Lutheran, or Presbyterian church in mind. LUDWIG S. JACOBY chose the city-state of BREMEN as his stepping stone, and this proved a wise choice; for here there was not only liberal legislation but also the will to conform to it. Jacoby was one of many emigrants to America who had become Methodists there, and who in letters to Germany had spoken about their personal religious experience. Germans in their native land asked for Methodist missionaries, and in December 1849, Jacoby preached his first sermon in Bremen. Following Easter a local church was officially founded, and on May 21, 1850, the first QUARTERLY CONFERENCE was held. As Jacoby was an ordained minister, Holy Communion and baptism soon became part of the established pattern. The periodical Evangelist was published; Sunday school work was taken up immediately. Whereas here the mission board had started with a planned enterprise and careful strategy, another returned immigrant from the United States, ERHARD WUNDERLICH, a layman, began to have devotions and public meetings in his big farmhouse (September 1850) in Saxony (Sachsen-Weimar). This led to a revival. Persecution at the hands of the authorities and antagonistic people finally forced him to return to America, but his brother, FRIEDRICH, the grandfather of BISHOP FRIEDRICH WUNDERLICH, continued the work. In 1865 he was ordained, left the state church, and held the first Methodist communion service in Saxony. From here Methodism expanded over the then kingdom of Saxony, HAMBURG and FRANKFURT (1851), Oldenburg, and then SWITZERLAND (1856) are milestones on the road of extension.

Jacoby was not satisfied with the advance of Wesleyan Methodism. He wanted to move faster. Thus Episcopal Methodism invaded Württemberg (Heilbronn, 1851; Ludwigsburg, near Stuttgart, 1857). From here there followed a rapid expansion in the years 1857-76. Certainly the advance of these episcopal pioneers was favored by the fact that Episcopal Methodism owned something that Mueller had in vain longed for: a theological seminary, PREDIGERSEMINAR, founded in Bremen in 1858 and moved to Frankfurt in 1868.

During the 1860's and then the 1880's, work in BERLIN progressed well. Other steps of development led to Pomerania, the Bavarian Palatinate (Pirmasens), and the Kingdom of Bavaria. This era ended with the division of the advancing work into a Germany Conference and a Swiss Conference (1886). Together they had in that year 11,134 members, 3,033 members on trial, and 22,509 Sunday school scholars. The German work was again subdivided in 1893 into the North Germany and the South Germany Conferences (the former with the Berlin, Bremen, Oldenburg, and Leipzig Districts; the latter with the Frankfurt, Karlsruhe and Stuttgart Districts). The statistics of these two conferences (together) were as follows: 82 ministers, 8,646 members, and 2,925 members on trial. In the 1890's, Episcopal Methodism was successful in gaining access to the East German regions, particularly Stettin, Danzig, Koenigsberg, Breslau; since the second World War all of them, as the West German government terms it, have been Polish or Soviet administration.

An interesting appreciation of Methodism at the end of the nineteenth century was given inadvertently by a Lutheran professor, Theodor Christlieb, when he published an article in 1881, asking how the state church must be changed to "make the evangelism of Methodism more and more superfluous and thus in future keep its expansion within modest limits." He saw in Methodism "reformed activity, simple and practical sermons that were close to life," and pastoral care. "Methodism has," he wrote, "amongst all churches, the most personal cure of souls through its classes." Methodism was and is a minority church—but some of Christlieb's observations are more easily achieved in such a church than in large institutions.

Something should be said regarding the sociology of Methodism at this time. In the south Methodism was and is largely a rural church among farmers and peasants; this also applies to a number of other regions. In Saxony industrial workers made up a considerable portion of membership. In the cities and towns all over the country it mostly served the lower middle class. After the two world wars it has become more and more middle class. But this is a trend of the total population as well. The old-fashioned type of proletariat has gone out of existence in Germany.

Formation of the Five Annual Conferences. In 1896 the two Methodist Churches in Germany merged. Obviously this had an enlivening effect, and there came, from 1900 onward, a "time of steady development in depth, in breadth, and height," as JOHN L. NUELSEN said. The same authority said of the work before the first World War: "The trend was more in the direction of teaching and education; that is why such a large number of Bible and other study courses for layworkers were held. It was a time of consolidation. During the war some unpleasantness was caused by some people describing Methodism to be 'of foreign extraction'." During those years the indebtedness of Methodism to Germany was emphasized—something that John L. Nuelsen continued to do afterward. And, indeed, the first American missionaries had stated that they came to Germany to repay what their new country, the United States, owed to the Reformation, to the pietists, and in particular to the MORAVIANS.

After the first World War the Weimar constitution of the first German republic granted a larger measure of religious liberty to Methodism than it had ever experienced in Germany before. These paragraphs are included in the present constitution of the Federal Republic (West Germany) and therefore are still valid. The constitution of the German Democratic Republic (East Germany) also guarantees the free practice of religious life.

By the 1920's the state churches in Germany had been largely disestablished and were now, to a certain extent, on the same footing as the hitherto "sectarian" free churches. Thus a measure of official recognition by the state was granted to the free churches—particularly the status of recognized corporations. This brought economic advantages (church-owned property for church use was no longer taxed), but it also helped to do away in time with many prejudices, held up to that time by state and church, by theologians and the laity. Therefore the Landeskirchen (the territorial churches) proved far friendlier after the revolution than they had ever been before. Now they objected less to the doctrines of Methodism (conversion, assurance, sanctification) and their methods of work than they had done before, but they deplored the fact that Methodism had brought separation into German Protestantism. This can scarcely be changed, because Methodism in Germany is, apart from the Roman Catholic Church, the only truly supranational church—and this is one of its vital contributions. Methodism became more popular, not to say respectable, in the eyes of the public. This was to a large extent due to John L. Nuelsen, a princely bishop, who, both as a theologian and a church leader, as the organizer of a great relief drive and a man of ecumenical importance, had caught the eyes and the hearts of many Germans. It was something of note for German Methodism when in 1922 Adolf Deissmann came to the chapel of the seminary in Frankfurt and conferred upon Bishop Nuelsen the honorary D.D. degree of Berlin University. But there was something else in the Methodism of those years as well. In the years 1919-24 the membership grew by thirty-four percent. A year after (in 1926) the annual conferences had been divided into the Central Germany, the Northeast Germany, and the Northwest Germany Annual Conferences on one hand, and the South Germany and the Southwest Germany Annual Conferences on the other. The statistics of the total German work were then 230 ministers and 40,841 members.

From 1930 to the Present. The economic depression and afterward the time of the Nazi state offered extremely difficult and dangerous problems. The Methodist Church in Germany grew to be independent of American financial grants, which was good; but Methodism in Germany was, for the time being, very poor. As a free church, as were the Baptists and the Evangelical Association, it asked no financial aid from the state. The Methodist Church had never supported party politics, one way or the other. However, the one thing that the new regime did not like from the very beginning was international connectional bonds. Attempts to make of German Methodism a national Methodist institution were warded off, but in 1936 the area of the GERMANY CENTRAL CONFERENCE was separated from the former Central European Central Conference; this was effected in a correct legal way, and the new Central Conference did not become autonomous. The flexibility of Methodism got the better of the Nazis. Moreover, the German Methodist Church did not have any "German Christians." It stood as a solid block for the full gospel, for the Old Testament as well as the New, and for the Methodist heritage. In innumerable encounters, pastors and lay people proved faithful to their Master.

The first German to be elected bishop was F. H. OTTO MELLE (1936-46). He, as well as his successor, J. W. E. SOMMER (1946-52), were able not only to preserve the existing church through manifold and diverse perils but also strengthen it. Of course the war inflicted severe injury and damage. Not only was the recruitment of the fifty to sixty-year-old men during the Nazi regime below requirement, but of these men many were killed in action. Retired ministers preached and administered in three or four circuits as the younger men served with the armed forces; laywomen and older laymen carried on the work as well.

More easily to be assessed is the loss of property. Of the 398 church buildings, forty-five were completely destroyed, thirty-nine severely damaged, another fifty-seven it was later found could be repaired after the war. Evacuation, carried through for a variety of reasons, dispersed the members of the local churches to such an extent that one could not know whether these congregations would ever worship together again. But the age of miracles has not passed. These local churches gathered again, and in 1945-50 the Methodist Church in Germany grew and expanded. A total increase of seventeen percent during this time witnesses to that fact. Bishop Wunderlich once said that, standing in front of the rubble left of a church building, he thought it would take thirty years for the necessary reconstruction. In actual fact the work was achieved within twelve years.

The INDIANA area, under Bishop RICHARD C. RAINES, gave not only physical assistance but spiritual as well to the German Central Conference during the quadrennium of 1948-52 and after. And there were other American friends.

After the currency reform of 1948 the German Methodist Church was destitute. Salaries had to be implemented by help from brothers and sisters abroad. Now not only is the church self-supporting, but it has become a giving church. The partition of Germany has not impeded actual church activities. The two conferences in the East, the Central Germany Annual Conference (with 41.6 percent of all German Methodists) and the Northeast German Annual Conference, which was badly hit by loss of territory (something like thirty or forty percent), have carried on their work with faithfulness and spiritual vigor.

In 1953 Bishop Friedrich Wunderlich came to be in charge of the area. Like his predecessor he was able to serve the two parts of Germany, traveling back and forth. He was permitted to do so by pointing out that he was not a mere West German (national) bishop but a bishop of a world church. Also, after the second World War the ecumenical fellowship has deepened. Never before in the history of Germany has the Methodist Church been held in so high esteem as is the case now. Bishop Sommer, together with Pastor Niemoeller, founded the "Cooperative Fellowship of Christian Churches in Germany," whose vice-president Bishop Sommer was then, as Bishop Wunderlich later became. In particular the helpful social work of the Methodist Church made possible and almost necessitated cooperation with the national churches, and Bishop Wunderlich represented both the Methodist Church and the other free churches on all significant boards and commissions.

Apart from sixteen hospitals and about the same number of holiday and youth centers, a number of nursing schools (including one in East Germany) and old-age homes, an orphanage and connected with it a school, and the relief offices of the Central or various annual conferences, there has been built a village for refugees and various settlements in cities and towns. However, the Methodist Church in Germany is still a minority church. The statistics show around 65,000 members and a constituency of about 105,000. More than 300 active pastors and about 1,200 lay preachers serve in something like 1,100 churches and preaching places. The total of Sunday school children (ages 4-13) amounts to 18,000. The vitality of free church life in general and of lay activity in particular are important contributions of the Methodist Church in Germany, and it also imparts leadership beyond its numbers in the fields, not only of social concern, but also of evangelism, small group work, fellowship church, and radio approach (Radio Luxemburg, Evangeliumssender Wetzlar).

United Methodist Church. To the Methodist Church in Germany the merger with the EVANGELISCHE GEMEINSCHAFT (Evangelical Association, not called E.U.B. because in Germany the United Brethren in Christ joined the Methodist Church in 1905) is a matter of great importance. The union is important for both churches in strengthening their witness in Germany, and being ecumenically and economically helpful. Cooperation in a joint committee and on conference and local church level was far advanced, when union actually came.

Annual Reports of the Missionary Society of the M. E. Church, 1820-1906.

Annual Reports of the Board of Foreign Missions of the M. E. Church, 1907-39.

Der Christliche Apologete. Cincinnati, 1839-1941.

Der Evangelist, Bremen and Frankfurt, 1850-.

P. N. Garber, Continental Europe. 1949.

John L. Nuelsen, Kurzgefasste Geschichte des Methodismus. Rev. ed., 1929.

F. Wunderlich, Methodists Linking Two Continents. 1960.

C. ERNST SOMMER

Annual Conferences. The GERMANY CENTRAL CONFERENCE of 1968, according to the Plan of Union, consisted of eight annual conferences—Central Germany (M), Eastern Germany (E), Northeastern Germany (M), Northwest Germany (M), South Germany (M), South Germany (E), Southwest Germany (M), and West Germany (E). These eight annual conferences united into five annual conferences, as follows: In 1968, Central Germany, Eastern Berlin District of Northeastern Germany, and Eastern Germany (E) united to form the Annual Conference within the German Democratic Republic (GDR) with 84 ministers and 15,348 members. The West Berlin Districts of Eastern Germany (E) and Northeastern Germany united to form the West Berlin Annual Conference with 26 ministers and 2,181 members. The Northwest Germany and West Germany formed the Northwest Germany Annual Conference with 107 ministers and 17,326 members.

In 1969 the Southwest Germany and western part of South Germany (E) formed the Southwest Germany Annual Conference with 79 ministers and 7,630 members. South Germany (M) and the rest of South Germany (E) formed the South Germany Annual Conference with 218 ministers and 31,837 members.

WALTHER ZEUNER

Deaconess Work. Theodor Fliedner, a Lutheran pastor, founded the first and largest deaconess institution, called Mutterhausdiakonie, in Germany, the first "motherhouse" in Kaiserswerth (1836) became the model for all subsequent deaconess institutions of the state and free churches, including Switzerland. The deaconesses constitute a community of faith, living and serving. They do not receive a salary but simply pocket money. The motherhouse takes care of their physical and spiritual needs in the best way until the end of their days. A modernized uniform links the deaconesses and also identifies them as such in public.

HOSPIZ TEUCHELWALD, FREUDENSTADT, GERMANY

The student, after entering the motherhouse from the age of eighteen, studies for three years until she can pass the major state examination in nursing. Provided that she is sure of her vocation after several years of trial, she will be consecrated and is then a full member of the motherhouse. To be able to devote herself exclusively to her task, she renounces marriage. However, no monastic vows are required so that there may be exceptions from the rule. If she is no longer capable of working, she can spend the rest of her life in the motherhouse.

There are four motherhouses in Germany: Bethanien Frankfurt (founded in 1874); Bethanien Hamburg (1878); Bethesda Wuppertal (1886); Martha-Maria NÜRNBERG (1889). They all owe their origin to the revivals held about that time, following the evangelism of the Methodist Church in Germany, and in particular to the initiative of individual pastors.

The number of all the deaconesses in these houses is about 1,300, including the retired deaconesses. With the deaconesses are also other Christian nurses, called Verbandschwestern (associated nurses), who perform the same acts of kindness, though they receive salary. They number about 250. Besides these groups there are free nurses and also a large number of civil co-workers.

In West Germany the Deaconess Work has fourteen hospitals with 2,150 beds for patients; in Frankfurt (2), Heidelberg, Wiesbaden, Hamburg (2), Berlin (2), Wuppertal-Eldersfeld, Nürnberg, München-Solln, Stuttgart (2), and Ulm; in East Germany are three hospitals: in Karl-Marx-Stadt, Leipzig and Plauen, with 170 beds altogether. All the hospitals are well equipped and enjoy a deserved prestige, both in their own communities and wherever their work is known. Many patients are thankful not only for diligent nursing but also for spiritual help.

The hospitals support a number of first-class training schools, some with a vocational training of three years and some of one year. There are also some preparatory schools for household and for social and nursing professions. All the motherhouses have their own homes for nurses and old people, and also holiday centers. The deaconesses are sent from the motherhouse to hospitals, to local churches, to communal social works, or to foreign missions.

The Deaconess Work is an essential branch of church work. However, organized diaconia does not exclude services on one's own initiative, because the organization cannot do the work alone.

HANS MISTELE

Evangelical-Methodist Men. This department was launched in 1964 by the German Central Conference in Leipzig. Since the union with the men's work of the Evangelical Association, there are in existence 130 local circles of Evangelical-Methodist Men, counting a membership of 2,455. Their objectives are in accordance with the Discipline of the United Methodist Church. A special emphasis is placed on promoting personal evangelism and seeking Christ's way of life daily, bearing witness in this way in business dealings and in social contacts, and also engaging in definite Christian service. The department developed during the last years a number of evangelistic teams. Some of their members are laymen and some are pastors. They conduct special missions to win people for Christ and his church.

PAUL ORLAMUNDER

Missions (Missionswekd der Methodistenkirche in Deutschland). A merger of the German Women's Division and the Missionary Society was effected in 1965, and two general secretaries were elected: Paul Huber and LUISE SCHOLZ. Also a working committee was created. After two grave setbacks in both worlds was the German Methodist Church has again sent or is supporting twelve men and women in the various fields of Asia, Africa, and Latin America. Important further projects are the training of Korean orphans to become nurses, a "bread for the world" program, and assistance to African students in Germany.

CARL ERNST SOMMER

New Churches in Germany. During the past two decades new churches of the Evangelisch-Methodistische Kirche in Germany were built where 1) churches had been destroyed or severely damaged through war events; 2) in communities with old churches of the nineteenth century, the buildings having become out of date or where through an insufficient number of rooms the churches could no longer serve present-day demands; and 3) in new residential areas, particularly on the outskirts of larger cities where new parishes developed.

During the first 100 years of Methodism in Germany, churches in the country had been simple meeting rooms, or in a few cities with the accent on worship and evangelization. The new building concept after the second World War, however, is characterized as follows: 1) in connection with rooms designed for worship, in an increasing measure rooms are added and especially furnished to serve a more differentiated community work (youth and adult groups, choir, church music, games, etc.). Multi-purpose rooms are necessary for economical reasons. 2) In several places social establishments as kindergartens, homes for working people, old people's homes, apartments for old people, etc., were built in connection with the church. 3) Several churches have departed from the previous customary arrangement of pews in favor of a new order—an open polygon or semicircle with chairs, which in a higher grade achieves a sense of a community orientated toward the pulpit and communion table. These rooms demand different shapes and are of different construction.

Since about 1950 a large number of new churches have been built. The number of these is given here according to annual conferences: West Berlin (9); German Democratic Republic (12); Northwest Germany (21); South Germany (38); Southwest Germany (16).

THEOPHIL SEEMUELLER

Publishing Interests. Christliches Verlagshaus Stuttgart has been, since the merging of the Deutsche Evangelisch-Methodistische Kirche (German United Methodist Church) in 1968, the only publishing house of that church. Each of the two churches in Germany had its own publishing house and they could both look back on a great tradition. The publishing house of the Methodist Church was the Anker-Verlag with its beginnings dating back to 1850. That year saw the first number of the Sunday paper, Der Evangelist. The house was actually founded with its own press in Bremen in 1860. The publishing house of the EVANGELISCHE GEMEINSCHAFT in Deutschland was founded in Stuttgart in 1872 and had its own press. The church magazine, Evangelischer Botschafter, was started in 1864.

Both houses developed successfully and soon had a good name in the German evangelical circles. Complications and losses were admittedly experienced due to World War I, but were overcome during the 1920's. Serious difficulties were not experienced again until the Hitler regime, when stateside measures were aimed at a restriction of all activity within Christian publishing houses. In 1941 publication of all Christian periodicals was prohibited. Then the Anker-Verlag in Bremen was completely destroyed by bombing in 1944, while the Christliches Verlagshaus in Stuttgart suffered a seventy percent damage. The Methodist Church started to rebuild its publishing house after the war, and finally established it in Frankfurt/Main. The Christliches Verlagshaus was rebuilt in Stuttgart at its former site. When Theophil Wendt, the managing director of the Anker-Verlag, died unexpectedly in 1967, the fusion of the two publishing houses in the wake of the union of the two churches was decided upon and the merged house settled in Stuttgart, keeping the name of Christliches Verlagshaus.

The publishers bring out some twenty books per annum, both in fiction and non-fiction, with the latter predominating in such fields as theology, history, biography, ethics, etc. Also there is produced literature for Sunday school and youth work; a Christian block-calendar, Tägliches Brot, with a circulation of 65,000 copies, and a book-calendar, Die Jahreszeiten, with 30,000 copies.

The following periodicals are being published: The Sunday magazine, Wort und Weg (20,000 copies per week); the pamphlet, fur heute (50,000 copies per week); the Sunday school paper, Der Kinderfreund (20,000 copies weekly); the young people's magazine, Miteinander (3,000 copies per month); the junior league paper, Die Fackel (2,500 copies per month); a Bible reader's guide, Wort und Wandel (7,000 copies quarterly); a magazine for Sunday school workers, Dienst am Kinde (2,000 copies per month); a magazine for church workers, Der Mitarbeiter (2,000 copies per month). The printing shop works for other publishers of books and periodicals also. The German edition of the well-known devotional guide, The Upper Room, is being printed there. The mail-order book shop sends out publications of its own publishing house and of other publishers to 250 local districts within the Evangelisch-Methodistische Kirche in Germany, as well as to numerous individual customers. There are also two book shops (in Stuttgart and Karlsruhe).

HEINZ SCHAEFER

Women's Work. Within the process of church union in 1968, the women's work of the two churches, formerly "Gemeindefraudienst" and "Methodistischer Fraudienst," were united under the new name, "Fraudienst der Evangelisch-Methodistischen Kirche." The order of this organization, adopted the same year, is giving the women their own responsibility with regard to program, projects and finances. Membership is open to all women of the United Methodist Church, but there are especially active groups in every congregation. The organization is built up according to the church structure: in the local church a leader and a treasurer; in the annual conference a conference secretary, district secretary, and a treasurer; on the Central Conference level a president, vice-president, and treasurer.

Projects in world mission include paying salaries and insurance for women missionaries (four in 1969); sharing in general projects of the Board of Missions of the United Methodist Church in Germany; supporting special projects in INDIA, KOREA, CEYLON, AFRICA, BRAZIL—these include scholarships, salaries, schools, church work, and help in emergency cases. In the church at home strong emphasis is placed on all varieties of congregational tasks. These include paying for the training and partly for the salary of women assistant pastors (Gemeindehelferinnen), of whom some are already ordained elders; contributing to the salary of a woman secretary of Christian education (children's work), and scholarships for training of deaconesses.

The Fraudienst has kept a membership in the World Federation of Methodist Women for about twenty years.

The aim of women's work is to meet the needs and interests of women of today's world; to strengthen the church in her concerns and responsibilities, such as spiritual life, missionary outreach, Christian social witness and service, and ecumenical cooperation.

MARIA WUNDERLICH

GERMANY CENTRAL CONFERENCE is one of the strong central conferences of the United Methodist Church. It is composed of the Northwest Germany, South Germany, and Southwest Germany Annual Conferences. FRANKFURT is the episcopal seat of this Central Conference, and the Frankfurt Area, as it is known in episcopal administration, has been the residence for successive bishops since 1946. Work of the Central Conference was entirely self-supporting when the Second World War broke out. At the end of the war about sixty-five percent of all church buildings, hospitals and homes were destroyed or greatly damaged. Generous aid was given by The Methodist Church in U.S.A. to the support of pastors and refugees, and to the reconstruction of church buildings. Fifteen years later Germany Central Conference, through its annual conferences, became self-sustaining. All destroyed churches were rebuilt and many more new churches and homes were erected.

The division of Germany between the East and the West has, of course, created many crucial problems. It has not, however, broken the bonds of fellowship and unity between Methodists. The bishop has been able to travel across the demarcation line and to preside at anual conferences, and also at the unification conference at Dresden in 1968.

The union of the Evangelical Church in Germany with the Methodist Church greatly enlarged and strengthened Germany Central Conference. In the German Democratic Republic (Eastern Germany) a separate CENTRAL CONFERENCE (GDR) has been established with 140 ordained ministers and about 35,000 Methodists, which is entirely self-supporting. There are three annual conferences in the Federal Republic (Western Germany) with 375 ordained ministers and about 65,000 members. Germany Central Conference has nineteen hospitals with about 1,770 deaconesses and nurses, two theological seminaries, and numerous homes for the aged, for young people, for recreation and social work.

Presiding over the Frankfurt Area within recent years have been Bishops F. H. OTTO MELLE (1936-46), J. W. ERNST SOMMER (1946-52), FRIEDRICH WUNDERLICH (1953-68) now retired, and C. ERNST SOMMER (1968-). (See also GERMANY.)

FRIEDRICH WUNDERLICH

GERRY, NEW YORK, U.S.A. Gerry Homes (FREE METHODIST) were established by the Genesee Conference for needy and dependent children and ministers and their wives, missionaries and deserving lay persons. Land and buildings were donated by WALTER A. SELLEW (later bishop) in 1888. Recent buildings include the infirmary, duplex units, and central heating plant. There is a 150-acre dairy farm. The children's home was closed in 1965. Gerry Homes can accommodate fifty adults and its assets amount to $500,000.

BYRON S. LAMSON

GERSHOM, GOVINDA RAJU (1868- ?), was born in Ranipet, North Arcot District, INDIA, on June 8, 1868. His parents were Mudaliar and Lakshammal. He received his education in the Kolar Mission School, the Kolar Government High School, and the Mission Theological School. He served as a supply pastor in Kolar for two years, 1891-92, and after joining the SOUTH INDIA CONFERENCE served the Kolar Church and evangelistic work for fourteen years. After five years as district superintendent in Madras and Belgaum, he was pastor of the Telugu Church and Circuit in HYDERABAD. His last years were spent in Kolar again, and he retired there in 1928.

The foundations of the work in Kolar were laid by Louisa Anstey, who gathered starving children during the great famine of 1876-77 and toiled for her charges for more than thirteen years. Gershom was one of the young men saved by "Mother Anstey." He wrote:

In this is God's purpose proven and His power manifested in bringing six of us out of distress of famine to the highest privilege of being his ambassadors and co-workers with Christ Jesus. How glorious and marvellous are His thoughts for His children. Of others who grew up in the Orphanage several are exhorters and local preachers who are doing excellent service for the Master.

He retired from active service in 1928, and for many of his later years lived with his son, Edwin Gershom, who is a member of the South India Conference.

Bombay Guardian, April 10, 1880.

Minutes of the South India Conference.

JOHN N. HOLLISTER

METHODIST HEADQUARTERS, ACCRA, GHANA

GHANA (formerly the Gold Coast) is a country of central West Africa, located on the Gulf of Guinea. Its boundaries are: south, Gulf of Guinea; west, Ivory Coast and Upper Volta; north, Upper Volta; east, Togo. The area is 92,100 square miles and the population (1969 estimate) is 8,600,000. The capital is Accra which has a good airport, and a modern harbor at Tema, eighteen miles to the east. Ghana comprises the former British colony of the Gold Coast, and the western part of the former German colony of Togo.

The history of Ghana like that of all West African coastlands, is obscure until the appearance of European traders and navigators beginning in mid-1400's. A Portuguese first noted what was to be called "Gold Coast" in 1471. British and others had arrived by 1560, and Britain finally secured dominance over this stretch of coast. Trading posts were consolidated, and inland contacts established. Two powerful tribes were notable. The Fante were more peaceful and a missionary approach to them proved comparatively easy. The Ashanti were more warlike, given to slave-running. The Ashanti Wars in the early 1800's demonstrated fierce brutality (by 1902 the status of the Gold Coast as a British colony was clear). The Gold Coast became a British colony in 1874. The Ashanti area was annexed in 1901, and in the same year the Northern Territories became a British Protectorate.

In 1957, Ghana became a member of the United Nations and the British Commonwealth of Nations, with Dr. Kwame Nkrumah as Prime Minister. In 1960, following a referendum, a republican constitution was adopted with Nkrumah as president. Nkrumah and his party were overthrown by a military coup in February, 1966, and for more than three years, the country was governed by a National Liberation Council, composed of officers of the armed services and the police. The country returned to civilian rule in October 1969, with a government led by Dr. Kofi A. Busia.

Methodism was introduced on New Year's Day, 1835, when JOSEPH DUNWELL arrived in Cape Coast. He had been sent by the Wesleyan METHODIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY in response to a plea from William de Craft, a young Fante who had organized groups of young men for Bible study, first in Cape Coast, then in Dixcove. Dunwell died in June, 1835. From 1835-37, the Missionary Society sent out five missionaries who all died. In January, 1838, the Rev. and Mrs. THOMAS BIRCH FREEMAN reached the Coast. Freeman was destined to lay foundations for Methodism both among the Fante and Ashanti and across wide areas to the east. Others followed, the work spreading to TOGO, DAHOMEY and the area later to be called NIGERIA. New points of contact were made in the Gold Coast, as in Nigeria, by manumitted slaves from SIERRA LEONE who had settled there. Some of these were Methodists. The church grew in members and influence, and developed a trained and gifted ministry. Schools, both elementary and secondary, were established, and provision was made for teacher training. In 1961, British Methodism in Ghana became an autonomous Conference, its first president being Francis C. F. Grant. Membership was 70,000, with a constituency approaching 200,000. The church is engaged in medical work, through its hospital at Wenchi and in mobile clinics based on Lawra. There is an agriculturalist working in the Northern Ghana Mission—a mission largely staffed by the church in South Ghana.

The training of the ministry is carried out in cooperation with Presbyterian and Anglican churches of Ghana, at Trinity College, Legon near Accra. There are two lay training centers.

The Conference consists of five districts and a mission. The present president (1969/70) is T. WALLACE KOOMSON. By 1968, membership had risen to 80,590, with a constituency of almost 225,000. Over 1,600 churches and preaching places and more than 1,000 schools marked the progress of the work.

In 1896, the A.M.E. Zion Church opened work in the Gold Coast, led by the late Bishop John Bryan Smith. Two annual conferences were formed—East Ghana and West Ghana—with a membership of over 5,000. Work was also begun by the A.M.E. Church in the late 1930's, through the pioneering efforts of Mrs. Europa J. Randall, a missionary of that Church sent from Sierra Leone. A number of preaching places and schools developed. Methodism soon became the largest Protestant unit in Ghana.

F. L. Bartels, Ghana Methodism. 1965.

J. Beecham, Ashantee and the Gold Coast. London: Mason, 1841.

L. L. Berry, Century of Missions (AME). 1942.

A. Birtwhistle, Thomas Birch Freeman. 1950.

Encyclopaedia Britannica.

Findlay and Holdsworth, Wesleyan Meth. Miss. Soc. 1921-24.

T. B. Freeman, Journals. 1844.

The Missionary Seer.

National Geographic, Sept. 1961.

R. T. Parsons, The Churches and Ghana Society, 1918-1955.

Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1963.

Report of the Department of Foreign Missions, A.M.E. Zion Church.

A. E. Southon, Gold Coast Methodism. London: Hodder & Stoughton, n.d.

C. K. Williams, Achimota: The Early Years. London: Longmans, 1962.

S. C. Williamson, Gold Coast—What of the Church? London: Cargate, 1952.

World Methodist Council, Handbook, 1966-71.

ARTHUR BRUCE MOSS

GHLIN, Belgium. The Methodist Church (French) was organized in an old barn following a revival under a gospel tent. The church was built in 1933 by H. H. Stanley and has become the head of a Methodist circuit around Mons. The parsonage was built in 1966. Pastors have been M. Geva, 1924-25; H. H. Stanley, 1926-27; E. Smet, 1928-35; H. van Oest, 1936-37; M. Geva, 1938-54; M. Mahieu, 1955-60; and A. Lheureux since 1961.

WILLIAM C. THONGER

GIBBLE, PHARES BRUBAKER (1888-1967), American E. U. B. preacher, author and historian of his conference.

The son of Abraham Shelly and Annie Longenecker Gible, P. B. Gible was born in Rapho Township, Lancaster Co., Pa., June 3, 1888. After attending the public schools of the township in which he was born, he studied at Elizabethtown College in preparation for a brief career as a public school teacher. After four years of teaching in the Rapho Township schools, he studied at the Lebanon Valley Academy, Annville, Pa., for two years before transferring to LEBANON VALLEY COLLEGE, where he earned the A.B. degree in 1915. He received his B.D. degree at Bonebrake Theological Seminary (now UNITED THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY), DAYTON, Ohio, in 1918 and took additional work in Semitic Languages and the History of the Ancient East at Johns Hopkins University, BALTIMORE, Md. In 1929, Lebanon Valley College conferred on him the D.D. degree.

He began his active pastorate the year he received his Quarterly Conference license; and with the exception of the years 1915-18 and 1918-23, he gave all of his pastoral service to the East Pennsylvania Conference until his retirement in 1957. From 1915 to 1918, he served churches in OHIO while attending seminary and from 1918 to 1923, he was pastor of OLD OTTERBEIN CHURCH, Baltimore, Md. He was a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE for six consecutive sessions. At the time of his retirement in 1957, the EASTERN CONFERENCE named him Historian Emeritus, an honor which carried with it an annual stipend that continued until his death in 1967.

On June 15, 1910, Gible married Pearl Beatrice Sherk; and to this union were born three sons and two daughters.

Gible died April 7, 1967, and was buried at Gravel Hill Cemetery, Palmyra, Pa.

BRUCE C. SOUDERS

C. A. GIBBS

GIBBS, CAREY ABRAHAM (1892-), an American bishop of the A.M.E. Church, was born in Madison, Fla. on March 20, 1892. He was educated at EDWARD WATERS COLLEGE (Florida), where he received the A.B. degree (1912), and Payne Theological Seminary (Ohio), which granted to him the B.D. degree (1923). He has received the D.D. and LL.D. degrees (honorary) from Edward Waters College. He was admitted to the North Ohio Annual Conference in 1921 and ordained deacon and elder. He served pastorates in OHIO and FLORIDA and was a presiding elder and president of Edward Waters College. He was elected to the episcopacy in 1948 from the pastorate of Mount Zion Church in Ocala, Fla. He presently resides at COLUMBIA, S. C., and supervises work of the Seventh Episcopal Area District comprising six annual conferences in the state of SOUTH CAROLINA.

R. R. Wright, Bishops (AME). 1963. GRANT S. SHOCKLEY

GIBRALTAR. According to military records the Methodist society in Gibraltar was founded early in the year 1769. A garrison order by General Lord Cornwallis dated June 9 of that year reads, "Whereas divers soldiers and inhabitants assembled themselves every evening to prayer, it is the Governor's positive order that no person whatsoever presume to molest them nor go into their meeting to behave indecently there."

The leaders of the young church were soldier preachers stationed in the garrison. Their meetings, characterized by Methodist fervor and devotion, soon attracted not only soldiers but also civilians, many of them seeking admission to the society. The civilian members brought much needed stability into the early society, whose military members were continually being moved to other garrisons as political necessity demanded. Despite Cornwallis' order, the church met with considerable opposition from the military and inhabitants of the garrison. In 1803, however, after Cornwallis had gone, the authorities began to move against the society. In this year Mr. Burn, the schoolmaster, was threatened with expulsion from the town if he continued to preach at the meetings. In June two noncommissioned officers of the Queen's Regiment were court-martialed for attending a Methodist meeting contrary to regimental orders, and each received 200 lashes. For several months a civilian member of the congregation stood at the door of the meeting room to prevent any soldier entering and being punished. In 1804 General Fox was appointed to command the garrison, and subsequently granted permission for troops to attend Methodist meetings.

The year 1804 also saw the appointment of James McMullen as minister of the church. McMullen arrived to find yellow fever raging in the garrison, and within three weeks he had died. His wife also died a few days later. A child of the marriage, who was sent back to England by the authorities, became the mother of JAMES H. RIGG, the Methodist historian.

It was not until 1808 that another minister was appointed—WILLIAM GRIFFITH, under whose leadership in 1809 a church was built with a small house next door for the minister. These premises, though now not under Methodist control, remain to this day in Prince Edward's Road.

In 1832 WILLIAM RULE was stationed at Gibraltar. The fight for religious freedom in the British army will always be associated with William Rule. In July 1839, General Lord Hill, commander-in-chief of the army, issued a general order giving to each soldier "full liberty to attend the worship of Almighty God according to the forms prescribed by his own religion." Three months later Rule was informed that two of his members were under arrest on account of their being Methodists. That evening nothing could be done, but next morning Rule was outside the barrack gate waiting for the reveille to sound. He took a statement from a corporal who had been reduced to the ranks because of his leadership of a group of Methodist men, and sent a copy to the governor, together with a letter accusing the colonel of the regiment of persecution. The governor declined to intervene, whereupon Rule appealed to the commander-in-chief. The result was that an order was published that Wesleyans must be marched to their own church on Sunday mornings. Rule also organized a day school on Methodist premises.

In 1830 the lease on the property was renewed and in 1837 the house was rebuilt. In 1849 adjoining property was secured and in 1874 the land was granted in perpetuity. In 1878, school premises were built by H. H. Richmond. After some years the school house became a recreational club for soldiers and sailors and in 1898 it developed into the "Welcome Home and Institute," where servicemen might find recreation without reference to religious denomination. In 1909 the church building was enlarged and renovated. The pastoral and social work of the church has continued in the present century, being particularly effective during the period of the two world wars. Of special mention is the work of F. Brown, who during a ministry of over twenty years exercised a great influence upon the civilian population as well as many servicemen. During the Second World War the fellowship at the church and manse was of such quality that many of its members continue to meet as "the Gibraltar Club" in the United Kingdom.

METHODIST CHURCH, MAIN STREET, GIBRALTAR

In 1951 the ammunition ship "Bedenham" exploded in the harbor and considerable damage was caused to the church buildings. The decision was then taken to vacate the premises in Prince Edward's Road and to concentrate the work in the premises in Main Street. It is at 297 Main Street that the Methodist witness continues today. The premises consist of a restaurant, kitchen and managers' flat, and church, Sunday school and youth rooms and minister's flat.

As in the past the church exercises pastoral care over Methodist and free church servicemen and their families stationed in Gibraltar and also local residents. Friendly relations have been established with the local Roman Catholic and Anglican communities. The resident minister is officiating chaplain to Methodist and free church service personnel of all nations.

S. D. Bailey, Padre Brown of Gibraltar. London: Epworth, 1955.

W. H. Rule, A Mission to Gibraltar and Spain. London: Mason, 1844.

_____, Recollections of My Life. London: Woolmer, 1886.
Some Account of the Opposition Made to the Religious Instruction of the Soldiers at Gibraltar. London: Butterworth, 1805.

S. Watkins, Soldiers and Preachers Too. London: Sharpe, n.d.
 KEITH R. JEFFERIES

GIBSON, EDMUND (1669-1748), bishop of London and canonist, was born at Bampton, Westmorland, in December 1669. He ordained CHARLES WESLEY to the priesthood in 1735. In 1738 he questioned JOHN and Charles WESLEY about their teaching regarding JUSTIFICATION, ASSURANCE, and the rebaptism of Dissenters, and gave a cautious judgment that the religious societies could not be called conventicles. The course of events modified his good opinion of Methodism. In a pastoral letter to his diocese in August 1739, Gibson sharply criticized both GEORGE WHITEFIELD and John Wesley. Whitefield replied in kind. In 1747 Gibson returned to the attack in a visitation charge. John Wesley answered in detail in A Letter to Dr. Gibson, etc., June 11, 1747. Bishop Gibson died at Bath, Sept. 6, 1748.

N. Sykes, Edmund Gibson. London, 1926. THOMAS SHAW

GIBSON, TOBIAS (1771-1804), American pioneer preacher and the first to bring Methodism to the lower MISSISSIPPI country, was born on Nov. 10, 1771, in what was then Liberty County, S. C., now Georgetown County. He was the son of Jordan and Mary Middleton Gibson. When he was about twenty years of age, he became a member of the SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE and served pastorates in that state and in portions of NORTH CAROLINA. When Bishop ASBURY held the South Carolina Conference at CHARLESTON in January 1799, he appointed Gibson to the Anson and Little Peeedee Circuit, with the understanding that he was to remain there until Spring, after which he was to go to NATCHEZ in the Mississippi Territory as a missionary.

Asbury would doubtless have appointed someone to the Mississippi Territory before this but for the fact that the Spanish had been holding this region and would not tolerate any Protestant missionaries at all until the boundary line that is now between LOUISIANA and southern Mississippi was finally fixed sometime before the turn of the century.

In the Spring Gibson made his way overland by a wild circuitous route, traveling on horseback over the vast mountains to the Cumberland River in NASHVILLE, a distance of about 600 miles. At that place he sold his horse, bought a canoe, and paddled down the Cumberland into the Ohio, down the Ohio into the Mississippi, and finally changed to a flatboat and drifted down the river to Natchez. Late in 1799 he organized the first Methodist congregation in Mississippi at WASHINGTON, a village six miles east of Natchez which for a time became the territorial capitol of the region. The first congregation consisted of eight persons—Randel and Harriett McKinley Gibson, William and Rachel Smith Foster, Edna Gibson Bullen, Caleb Worley, and two colored slaves.

According to Henry G. Hawkins, Tobias Gibson was "above mediocrity in intellectual power and had a fair education for that day. He had pecuniary resources sufficient to give him a comfortable support." He was a man of rather frail physique but had gladly consented to go to this untried field, supported as he was supposed to be by his salary of $64 a year. Those who heard him preach remembered especially his singing, and John G. Jones calls him "a sweet singer in Israel."

Gibson organized a number of churches in the Mississippi territory, including one at Kingston in 1800. At the end of the first year he reported sixty members in the Territory. He did not attend the WESTERN CONFERENCE, of which he was then a member, until October 1802, at STROTHERS MEETINGHOUSE, Cottontown, Tenn. A year later he attended the session at Mt. Gerizim Church in KENTUCKY. At these conferences he asked for additional help to man the churches in Mississippi.

For one year Gibson was made a supernumerary by the Western Conference, with Moses Floyd in charge of the work. A year or two later Gibson's health gave way and he died on April 5, 1804, and was buried in a family cemetery a few miles southeast of VICKSBURG.

The officials of Crawford Street Church, Vicksburg, obtained the necessary permission from the city fathers and from the county board of health, and on Friday, June 28, 1935, the Revs. H. C. Hawkins, N. B. Harmon, Sr., M. M. Black, and T. J. O'Neil, together with A. J. Martin, monument builder, and Bernard Fisher, undertaker, went to the lonely grave in the pasture south of Vicksburg, disinterred the dust, placed it in a hermetically sealed box, and conveyed the box to a concrete vault in a spot beside Crawford Street Church.

Martin took the original shaft to his marble yard, where he polished it, bringing out in bright and legible form the inscription cut on one face of the shaft at the time it was set up, and which reads: "Sacred to the memory of Rev. Tobias Gibson, who settled in Mississippi in 1799; was emphatically the father of Methodism in this country, being the first minister who organized a church in this then territory. . . ."

Tobias Gibson never married, it is said, because a love affair which existed between him and a young woman in Mississippi had to be terminated because of his failing health. Claiborne, in his History of Mississippi, says, "If ever any man received a divine call to do good, to persuade men to reform, Tobias Gibson was the man." Gibson Memorial Church, Vicksburg, presently with 700 members, was named for him.

J. B. Cain, Mississippi Conference. 1939.

Henry Gabriel Hawkins, Methodism in Natchez. Jackson, Miss.: Hawkins Foundation, 1937.

J. C. Jones, Mississippi. 1887, 1908.

M. Simpson, Cyclopaedia. 1878.

J. B. CAIN

GIBSON, WILLIAM (1832-1894), British Wesleyan Methodist, was connected with the French work. He entered the Wesleyan ministry in 1852, and was stationed in Paris, 1862-72, and 1878-94. He lived in Paris during the Franco-Prussian War and published Paris During the Commune (1871). He died Aug. 27, 1894.

JOHN KENT

GILBERT, BENJAMIN FARISS (1871-1933), American missionary to CUBA, was born to Gabriel Goodman and Elizabeth S. Gilbert in Estill Springs, Tenn., March 28, 1871. Graduated from VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY, he went to Cuba in 1902 where his first appointment was in La Gloria, Camaguey Province, at an English speaking colony of over 2,000 persons.

His next appointment was in Puerto Principe (later called Camaguey), where in 1903 he opened Colegio Ingles with one pupil on Republica 40; this school became COLEGIO PINSON.

Maria Olivia Molina became his bride in 1905 and to their union were born four children. In 1914 he was transferred to the Colegio Central school at Virtudes 10, Havana, and six years later became director of training for ministerial candidates as a part of CANDLER COLLEGE. During this time he served for several years as pastor of Leland Memorial Church, Marianao, and one year as editor of El Evangelista Cubano.

With failing health he retired in 1932, and died a year later.

GARFIELD EVANS

GILBERT, FRANCIS. (See GILBERT, NATHANIEL.)

GILBERT, JOHN WESLEY (1865-1923), American C.M.E. minister and professor at PAINE COLLEGE, was born on Jan. 9, 1865, in Hephzibah, Ga.

His beginnings and his ending are shrouded in mystery. His parents were humble Negro farm hands, Gabriel and Sarah Gilbert. Very little is known about his early years except that he would go anywhere anyone would offer a Negro boy the opportunity of learning. He died of a disease some of the ablest physicians in America could describe only as "like sleeping sickness." In between these vague terminals, however, is a life so vivid, and journeys of such distance and depth that adventure is added to scholarship, and distinction to devotion. Two Methodisms honor him and many students call him blessed.

Gilbert is most widely remembered for his missionary venture in the CONGO. With Bishop WALTER RUSSELL LAMBUTH he left Lubo, Africa, before Christmas 1911, with sixty carriers to walk a thousand miles into the country of the Atetela tribes to find a "right place" to establish a Methodist mission. They found it in the village of WEMBO NYAMA on Feb. 1, 1912. It is not known exactly why Gilbert was not among the missionary party which returned in 1913 to establish a work which prospered greatly. Dr. Ina Corinne Brown's judgment: "Perhaps the white church was not quite Christian enough to treat Negroes as brothers as Bishop Lambuth had done." The writer's own judgment is that the Belgian owners of the Congo had no intention of turning loose in their Africa a Negro of Gilbert's stature and attainments, and for obvious reasons. It is abundantly clear that both Gilbert and Lambuth anticipated his return in a joint venture of two branches of Methodism, that of the M. E. Church, South, and the C.M.E. CHURCH, as one of an interracial missionary team. Today the Gilbert-Lambuth Memorial Chapel at Paine College memorializes the joint venture and abiding value of the mission of these two men.

Gilbert is best known as a teacher and scholar. It is all but tragic that his papers were treated so carelessly that little of his writing is preserved. His letter to Mrs. GEORGE WILLIAMS WALKER upon the death of Dr. Walker is a literary gem in its feeling and precise expression. It suggests his powers. The portion quoted here served primarily to describe event and relationship.

Dear Dr. Walker, who picked me up off the streets of Augusta nearly twenty years ago to try to let the influence of Christ

... have His course in my life, was as much a father to me as he was a husband to you.

... me, the first of my race whom (he) met as a student, the first one to matriculate at Paine (College), the first one of my race whom he helped prepare for wide usefulness in the Master's vineyard, the one who was ever in the closest and holiest confidence with him in trying to carry on the work in Christ's name for the uplift of the lowly—to embody his faith and spirit.

Gilbert had both a gift and a deep desire for learning. Walker, the true founder of Paine College, tutored him for admission to Brown University where he received the B.A. and M.A. degrees, and so distinguished himself that he was granted full scholarship to study in the American School of Classics in Athens, Greece. He was the first Negro elected to the faculty at Paine, precipitating something of a social crisis (magnificently resolved by trustee WARREN A. CANDLER). His scholarship gave him membership in the Philological Association of America, and in the Archaeological Institute among others which, with Brown University, published his writings. He was a linguist of pure distinction, at home with Greek, Hebrew and Latin, so gifted in French that Belgian officials supposed he had been born in France, and so quick to sense nuances and tones that he began on the trail to translate into anglicized Atetela the Greek versions of the Roman and Corinthian New Testament letters.

Bishop Lambuth described him: "He is diligent, painstaking, and consecrated. He has breadth, culture, and piety. . . . For sincerity of purpose, high character and noble ideals, he has few equals and no superior."

John Wesley Gilbert was a Christian gentleman, professor, scholar, linguist, preacher, lecturer, churchman, missionary, writer, editor, and in that order. He was one of the finest products of and contributors to Methodist higher education.

E. C. Calhoun, Congo Quest. 1961.

Joseph C. Colclough, The Spirit of John Wesley Gilbert. Nashville: Cokesbury, 1925.

Periodicals of the M. E. Church, South and the C.M.E. Church, 1884-1939.

CLAYTON CALHOUN

GILBERT, NATHANIEL (172?-1774), West Indian Methodist, was the son of Nathaniel Gilbert, a wealthy planter. He was born in ANTIGUA during the 1720's. Sent to England to study law, he was called to the bar at Gray's Inn in 1746, practiced in Antigua, was made a member of the House of Assembly in 1747, and became its speaker. After reading Wesley's Appeals, he visited England in 1757 with his wife, children, and some household slaves, to meet WESLEY. He heard Wesley preach in a private house at Wandsworth, and Wesley baptized two of the slaves. His brother Francis became an itinerant preacher under Wesley in 1758, and Nathaniel returned to Antigua in 1759. He immediately began "house meetings," to which his slaves came with his family, and soon afterward started preaching to the slaves on his own plantation. These unofficial services were the real, if tentative, beginnings of Methodism's colonial missionary work. When Gilbert died, on April 20, 1774, there were two hundred members in the society, almost all slaves, and the work was continued by Mary Leadbetter, the children's nurse, who had married Francis Gilbert, and by two slave women, Sophia Cambell and Mary Alley, until the arrival of JOHN BAXTER.

Frank Baker, "Origins of West Indian Methodism," London Quarterly Review, January 1960.

CYRIL J. DAVEY

GILLESPIE, JOHN JONES (1813- ?), American M.P. layman from PITTSBURGH, Pa., was born in Milton, Northumberland Co., Pa. on Nov. 13, 1813. He was prominently identified with the interests of his church as representative to numerous annual and general conferences, president of the Board of Publications for many years, a church and college trustee, and one of five representatives of the M. P. CHURCH at the assembly of Methodists from Europe, America and Australia that met for two weeks in London in September 1881.

