During the first years of the church's history, services were held in the court house and later in a private home. In 1790 the first Methodist church building was erected. After belonging to the New Jersey Circuit, the Trenton Circuit, the New Jersey and Philadelphia Circuit, the West Jersey Circuit, and the Burlington Circuit, Burlington became a station in 1833.

A new church building, on the present location, was erected in 1819. In 1847 another building took its place. Broad Street Church now has a commodious sanctuary and educational building.

In 1853 some of the members of the Broad Street Church organized Union Church, which continues to carry on an active ministry.

BURMA, formerly a part of the British crown colony that had been administered in INDIA, gained autonomous national status Jan. 4, 1948, as a republic—The Union of Burma. It was admitted to membership in the United Nations. Burma lies along the eastern shore of the Bay of Bengal. Its area is 261,789 square miles, and the population was estimated in 1969 as 26,980,000. The bulk is of Burman stock, but there are sizeable groups of other indigenous peoples—Karens, Chins, Shans, Kachins. An approximate one million are Indian and Chinese immigrants. Rangoon, the capital and only major port, has a population of nearly a million; Mandalay, the center of the Dry Zone some 400 miles up the Irrawaddy River, about 200,000. There are no other large cities, but a number of towns with between 30,000 and 50,000 inhabitants. The great majority of the people live in villages, mostly using traditional agricultural methods. There is an extensive oil industry, and in the deep interior a developing mining industry. Organized and effective school opportunity exceeds that of many similar countries, two-thirds of the population being literate.

The Burmans are Buddhists of the Hinayana type, as in Ceylon. Pagodas abound; the most noted, the Shwe Dagon in Rangoon, dates from 588 B.C. The popular Buddhism of the ordinary folk in town and village alike is somewhat mixed with animism. Hindu temples, Muslim mosques, Chinese Buddhist temples, mark the enclaves of the immigrants.

Although the powerful Japanese drive of World War II across northern Burma was checked at the Assam border, much of central and southern Burma was devastated by conquest and enemy occupation, 1942-45. Upon the collapse of Japanese power, the native Burmese leaders negotiated with Britain for independence and autonomy. Despite the disrupted economy and the huge task of rebuilding, the new republic achieved international recognition—Premier U Nu standing for high ideals in government, and U Thant succeeded Dag Hammarskjöld as Secretary-General of the United Nations.

Christianity made its first approach to Burma in 1807 through British Baptist missionaries, whose work was later transferred to American Baptists, the first of whom, Adoniram Judson, arrived in 1813. From their efforts has stemmed the success of the American Baptist Mission, whose churches, schools and other institutions have firmly established Christianity among the Karens and other tribal or indigenous races of Burma.

A British army chaplain, J. H. Bateson, saw the need and opportunity for missionary work in Upper Burma. He persuaded the Wesleyan METHODIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY to begin work there, and this was done in 1887 when two missionaries and two Sinhalese ministers were sent over from CEYLON. Slow but steady progress was made, and congregations were established in many of the towns of the Dry Zone of Upper Burma. For many years educational work had a large place in the life of the church, though to a lesser extent after World War II. In 1966, expatriate missionaries of all faiths were expelled, and hospitals, schools and all other church institutions were nationalized. Nevertheless, Christian teachers exercise an even wider influence than before, and in 1967 the Methodist constituency in Upper Burma increased by more than a third. In 1968 membership stood at 8,123, with a constituency of 17,186. Christian staff still work at the former Methodist Leprosy Home and Hospital, and the church in the home continues to bear its witness. More recent developments have been in the Upper Chindwin and Chin Hills areas, where work among the Lushais and kindred peoples began in 1928, and further north, where work among the Khongsai began in 1939.

The Methodist Church, Upper Burma, became autonomous in 1964, under its Burmese president, U Ba Ohn. The church is divided into four districts, each with its own chairman and synod. It is separated geographically from the area of the Episcopal Methodist Church of Lower Burma, and works mainly among different ethnic groups. Close fraternal contacts are maintained. There are joint conferences every third year, and a joint standing committee which plans united youth activities, the interchange of workers and other joint programs. Both churches, together with others, cooperate in the work of the Christian Literature Society, the Burma Christian Council and in Regional Councils.

Beginning in 1873, JAMES M. THOBURN, an American Methodist missionary in Calcutta, India (later bishop), received frequent appeals for help from Indian Methodists who had settled in Rangoon. In 1879 WILLIAM TAYLOR sent Robert E. Carter of Ohio to Rangoon to begin work. Learning of this, Thoburn went promptly to Rangoon to meet Carter, and to coordinate his program with that of Methodists in India. The Baptist Mission offered the use of its facilities. With the aid of civil officials, property was soon secured. Services were begun in Tamil and Telegu, languages of immigrants from South India. The first church was dedicated in 1880. The WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY of the M. E. Church sent Edna Warner in 1881 to establish a girls' school, which was opened in January 1882. Burma became a district of the South India Conference in 1884, and in 1887 WILLIAM F. OLDHAM was appointed presiding elder. His residence was in SINGAPORE, 1,200 miles away, where he was to initiate American Methodist work. This was unwieldy administration, and the Burma District was incorporated into the Bengal Conference of India when it was established in 1888. In 1901 the work in Burma became a Mission Conference, and in 1927 it became the Burma Annual Conference of the M. E. Church. In February 1950 the Burma Conference was included within the newly created Southeastern Asia Central Conference, whose bishop was to reside at Singapore. The work in Burma was thus again administratively yoked with Malaya. When the Andaman Islands were opened to civilian settlement in 1951, thirty families of the Tamil congregation moved with their pastor and Methodism became the first Christian element in the development. Four churches and several schools now constitute the Andaman District.

After careful study of the eager request and the specific proposals of the Burma Annual Conference, the 1964 General Conference of The Methodist Church voted to grant autonomy to Burma Methodism. Acting on this authority, the Burma Conference on Oct. 10, 1965 organized itself as an independent self-governing church, The Burma Methodist Church, and chose LIM SI SIN as bishop. He was at that time district superintendent, pastor of the Amoy-speaking Chinese congregation in Rangoon, and widely respected both by government and the community at large. Bishop HOBART B. AMSTUTZ of the Southeastern Asia Central Conference consecrated Pastor Lim Si Sin as bishop, the first national Burmese to hold that office in Methodism. The session of the organizing conference was truly ecumenical, as guests were present from the Anglican, Baptist and Roman Catholic Churches, and the East Asia Christian Council.

The membership of the new Burma Methodist Church is somewhat over 2,000, organized in twenty congregations. Work is established among Buddhist Burmans, Chinese and Indian immigrants, and certain English-speaking groups. Rangoon is the center of operations, which reach into a number of towns and villages in the southern delta region, as well as in the Andaman Islands. Close ties will remain with the Board of Missions in America. It is anticipated that merger may eventually take place with the Methodist Church of Upper Burma, the inheritor of the original Wesleyan Methodist Mission.

ARTHUR BRUCE MOSS

BURNET, AMOS (1857-1926), British Wesleyan Methodist minister, who served as a missionary administrator in INDIA, and the Transvaal, SOUTH AFRICA; and later became PRESIDENT of the British CONFERENCE, was born at Little Steeping, Lincolnshire, England, on August 5, 1857. Converted at Boston, Burnet had three years' training at RICHMOND COLLEGE; and was appointed in 1881 to the Mysore District in INDIA, "where, until 1893 he ministered to the English congregations, civil and military, in the city of Bangalore."

After returning to England, he spent nine fruitful years at NOTTINGHAM. In 1902 he answered a call from the Wesleyan METHODIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY to take the oversight and general superintendency of the work in the Transvaal. The Anglo-Boer War (1899-1902) had recently ended, and a wise and strong leader was needed to rally the scattered Methodist people and prepare for advance in the post-war period.

Burnet arrived in the Transvaal on October 30, 1902 and plunged immediately into his new duties. The first six years of his administration are reported in his A Mission to the Transvaal (1909). A further eleven years of service followed during which his influence grew as he won the confidence of the heads of Churches, leaders in commerce and Government administrators. Whites honored and trusted him; and blacks revered him as a powerful friend and advocate.

Recalled to Britain in 1919, he was appointed one of the General Secretaries of the Missionary Society. His services to Methodism overseas and in Britain were recognized by the Church when he was elected President of the Conference of 1924 which happily met in his much loved Nottingham. Shortly after the completion of his year of office, his health failed, and he died on August 1, 1926. Three daughters became Headmistresses of South African schools. His wife, Esther, was one of the founders of Methodist women's work in the Transvaal, and the Burnet Memorial Church at Kilnerton commemorates his seventeen years of service to the Transvaal and Swaziland District.

BURNETT, JOHN SEVIER (1866-1942), American minister of the HOLSTON CONFERENCE, was born Nov. 25, 1866 near Webster, N. C. He began his ministry upon being received into the BLUE RIDGE CONFERENCE (MEC) in 1888. He served as pastor while pursuing his studies. Upon his graduation in 1901 he was appointed superintendent of the Chattanooga District, and gained early recognition as a leader of great ability.

His outstanding achievement was the establishment of the PITTMAN COMMUNITY CENTER on Webb's Creek in Sevier County, Tenn. in 1921. This facility was designed to bring education and vocational training to the people in this remote Appalachian area. The Center opened with 150 pupils. By 1933 it had a graded school, 13 teachers, a hospital with a doctor and a nurse. Burnett worked diligently in cooperation with the Centenary Program of the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension to make the Center serve its purposes. In 1919 Burnett was made Superintendent of Mountain Work, and in the following year he was named Superintendent of Southern Highlands Division of Home Missions and Church Extension—all of the M. E. Church.

A Community School similar to the Pittman Center was established in 1925 near Brayton, Tenn., in the Morgan Springs Circuit.

Burnett was noted as a man of simple tastes with a great sympathy for the people he served. He saw their needs and worked devotedly to give them more educational and training advantages.

He was married Aug. 12, 1892 to Laura Eleanor Petty. They had four children. He died Feb. 9, 1942 while en route to the West Coast. He was buried at CHATTANOOGA, Tenn.

BURNS, CHARLES WESLEY (1874-1938), American bishop, was born at Willow Grove, Pa., on May 28, 1874. He earned degrees at DICKINSON COLLEGE and BOSTON UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY and honorary doctorates from five other institutes of learning.

He joined the PHILADELPHIA CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church in 1899 and became city missionary executive in Worcester, Mass. His pastorate at Landsdowne, Pa., was followed by assignments to Coatesville and Spring Garden and First churches, PHILADELPHIA. In 1916 he transferred to MINNESOTA and was pastor of Hennepin Avenue Church at MINNEAPOLIS from 1916 to 1920.

In the latter year he was elected a bishop and assigned to the Helena area, then to SAN FRANCISCO, and in 1932 to Boston. He died in Boston on Jan. 19, 1938, and was buried at First Church, Germantown, in Philadelphia.

Bishop Burns was a member of the Board of Hospitals and Homes of the M. E. Church, President of the Massachusetts Council of Churches, and trustee of BOSTON UNIVERSITY, Wilbraham and East Greenwich Academies, and Northeast Deaconess Hospital.

ELMER T. CLARK

BURNS, FRANCIS (1809-1863), American missionary bishop and the first Negro so elected, was born at Albany, N. Y., on Dec. 5, 1809. His parents were poor and at the age of four he was given to a Methodist farmer, a Mr. Atwood, in Greene County, N. Y. He attended the public schools and at the age of fifteen he was converted and joined the M. E. Church. He was inclined to the ministry, but he was bound to his master until he was twenty-one years of age, and his formal education was insufficient. He was licensed as a local preacher, however, and began to hold meetings on the Windham Circuit.

He attracted the attention of the officials of the Missionary Society in New York and was advised to begin studies with a view to going to LIBERIA. This he did, and in September 1834 he accompanied John Seys as a missonary teacher to that country. He joined the Liberia Conference of the M. E. Church in 1838 and in 1844 he returned to New York, where he was ordained by Bishop JAMES.

In Liberia he taught in the MONROVIA Seminary and edited Africa's Summary. He was PRESIDING ELDER of one of the two districts for ten years, and for six of these he was president of the conference.

In 1856 the GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church made provision for a missionary bishop in Africa, and Francis Burns was elected by the Liberia Conference in 1858. He returned to the United States and was consecrated at the GENESSEE CONFERENCE on Oct. 14, 1858 by Bishops E. S. JAMES and OSMON BAKER. He at once returned to Liberia and served in the episcopal office there for five years. Because of impaired health he returned to America and died at BALTIMORE on April 18, 1863, three days after his arrival and three months after the Emancipation Proclamation. His body was returned to Liberia and buried at Monrovia.

BURNS, JOHN (1808-1883), was a distinguished leader in the work of the M. P. Church in the then western area of the United States where he was at various times affiliated with the OHIO, PITTSBURGH and MUSKINGUM Annual CONFERENCES. He was a member of nearly all the general conferences from 1842 until his death. He was born in Washington Co., Pa., on April 10, 1808, and at the age of eighteen united with the M. E. Church in Wheeling, Va. He was afterward licensed "to exhort" and in December, 1832, he united with the Ohio Conference of the M. P. Church and served a mission near Wheeling for a salary of fifty cents a year. He later became associated with the Pittsburgh Conference and he was ordained as an elder in 1837. When the Muskingum Conference was set off in 1842, he became a member of it.

Burns filled many prominent appointments in the Pittsburgh and Muskingum Conferences; he was president of the convention which met in Zanesville, Ohio, in 1854, Springfield in 1856, Cincinnati in 1866, and the famous union convention of the northern and southern branches of the M. P. Church which met in BALTIMORE in 1877. In 1876 he served as a member of the commission to establish the basis for the union of the two churches of the following year. He was president of the GENERAL CONFERENCE of May, 1854, that met in Steubenville, Ohio, and of the General Conference (of the northern or "Methodist Church") that met in May, 1875, at Princeton, Ill. He received a salary of $72 plus house, rent and fuel in 1834. During the period of separation of the northern and southern branches of the M. P. Church, 1858-1877, he proved a pacificator and he played a prominent role in the movement for reunion which culminated in the convention of 1877. In 1878 he was appointed chaplain to the penitentiary at Columbus, Ohio. At the convention of 1854 the western and northern conferences of the church asked for the establishment of a western church paper and Book Concern. Arrangements were made to purchase The Western Recorder from ANCEL H. BASSETT and it was renamed The Western Methodist Protestant. At a second convention of delegates from those conferences supporting The Western Methodist Protestant and Book Concern held in November, 1856, a report was offered which asked for the separation of the northern and western conferences from the southern conferences. Burns was a member of the Board of Publication at Pittsburgh for a number of years. Despite his opposition to taking any action, a convention was called in November, 1857, and the "Methodist Church"—as this branch of the M. P. Church called itself—was established.

John Burns received the D.D. degree from WESTERN MARYLAND COLLEGE in June, 1875. He died on Sept. 12, 1883.

BURNS, ROBERT EDWARD (1909-), American university president and educational innovator, was born at Flat River, Mo., July 26, 1909, to John L. and Stella Lee (DeGrant) Burns. In 1946 he became the first alumnus (A.B., 1931, A.M., 1946) to be president of the Methodist-related college (now UNIVERSITY OF THE PACIFIC), at Stockton, California's oldest (1851) chartered institution of higher learning.

His inaugural address, "Pioneer or Perish," stressed his belief that education needs the American frontiersman's creativity and courage to develop and apply new ideas and methods to solve problems. His own special contribution is the widely-copied cluster college system, exemplified at the University of the Pacific, which he adapted to American needs and standards from the system at Oxford and Cambridge. It has semi-autonomous liberal arts schools bracketed within the university organization.

Dr. Burns was a member of the executive committee of the CRUSADE FOR CHRIST campaign in 1945, has since 1948 been associated with the UNIVERSITY SENATE, and was a member of the 1962 and 1968 GENERAL CONFERENCES. He is a 33° Mason and is affiliated with various historical and educational groups. WILLAMETTE UNIVERSITY and the University of Evansville have conferred honorary degrees on him. Dr. and Mrs. (Grace Weeks) Burns live in the President's Home on the University of the Pacific Campus.

BURT, THOMAS (1837-1922), British Methodist, was one of the most respected miners' leaders during the period when organized labor was becoming a formidable force in modern politics. He was a Northumberland PRIMITIVE METHODIST, who despite lack of formal education used his father's books to such good purpose that he became in turn general secretary of the Northumberland Miners' Union, a Liberal M.P. for Morpeth, secretary of the Board of Trade, president of the Trades Union Congress, and a privy councillor. When he retired from the House of Commons in 1918, he had become the "Father of the House," having been an M.P. since 1874. As a trade-union leader for forty-eight years, he was noted for his belief in moderation and conciliation and in international friendship and peace. He was a staunch temperance man in Parliament at a time when the Liberal party took heed of the Nonconformist conscience in politics.

BURT, WILLIAM (1852-1936), American missionary and bishop, was born at Padstow, Cornwall, England, on Oct. 23, 1852. He went to the United States in early life and was educated at WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY and DREV THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, receiving honorary doctorates from Grant, Wesleyan, and SYRACUSE UNIVERSITIES, and from DICKINSON COLLEGE.

He joined the NEW YORK EAST CONFERENCE of the M. E. CHURCH in 1881 and was pastor of St. Paul's Church, Manhattan, and DeKalb Avenue Church in BROOKLYN. In 1886 he went to ITALY and served as PRESIDING ELDER in Milan, was sent to Florence in 1888 and to Rome in 1890. He was in Italy fourteen years. He built several churches and schools, including a college for boys and another for girls.

William Burt was elected a bishop in 1904 and was resident bishop in Europe until 1912. He then returned to the United States and was bishop at Buffalo, N. Y., until his retirement in 1924.

He was a delegate to the ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCES at London in 1901 and Toronto in 1911. He was decorated by the king of Italy with the Order of Cavaliere di ss. Maurizio e Lazzaro in 1903. He died at Clifton Springs, N. Y., on April 9, 1936, and was buried in Lynn, Mass.

He translated the Discipline into Italian in 1888 and was the author of ten other books and addresses, including Europe and Methodism.

BURTON, JOHN WEAR (1875-), was born in England but came to NEW ZEALAND in his early years. He entered the ministry in 1897. After several New Zealand appointments he became a pioneer missionary to the Indians in Fiji in 1902. Largely through his attacks upon the system under which Indians were recruited to work in Fiji, the system of indentured labor was abolished in 1916. Domestic circumstances compelled Burton's retirement from Fiji in 1911. On transfer from New Zealand he became Overseas Missions Secretary in the VICTORIA AND TASMANIA CONFERENCE (AUSTRALIA) in 1914. From 1925 to 1945 he was General Secretary of Overseas Missions, directing all missionary operations during that period.

He was PRESIDENT of the NEW SOUTH WALES CONFERENCE in 1931, Secretary-General 1941-45, and President-General 1945-48. He holds the honorary D.D. degree.

He was a prolific writer on the subject of missions.

BURUNDI, Africa, where the FREE METHODIST CHURCH has a significant work, is located on a high plateau of rolling hills. It borders the north end of Lake Tanganyika, and in area is about the size of the state of Maryland. Its population is 3,475,000 (U.N. est. 1969). Agriculture and cattle are the chief sources of income. Some tobacco, coffee and palm oil are exported. Since 1962 the Kingdom of Burundi has been an independent nation. The King and his Cabinet share power with a thirty-two member elected assembly. The United Nations subsidizes the administration.

In 1935, pioneer Free Methodist missionary J. W. HALEY, with Board permission but with meager financial support, entered the country, and established the first station at Muyebe, site of a former German mission. Haley was an authority on indigenous church methods, which he employed here. A revival movement spread across the country, reaching all the missions. Within a few years 50,000 conversions were reported. An excellent cooperative spirit has always existed between the missions. Jointly operated institutions include a Bible school, normal school, home economics school, literature center, Gospel Radio Station CORDAC, and Nyakanda Leper Colony. The Bujumbura Protestant Center is staffed by Free Methodists. A full conference was organized in 1961. There is a thirty-five bed hospital at Kibuye. In 1969 there were over 7,000 church members and 5,000 elementary school pupils. The churches are self-supporting. The main stations are Muyebe, Rwintare, Kibuye, Mweya and Bujumbura.

BURWASH, JOHN (1842-1913), Canadian Methodist scientist and theologian, was born in Lachute, Quebec, May 8, 1842. In 1863 he graduated from Victoria College, and in the same year he was received on probation for the Methodist ministry. He was ordained in 1867.

A term as tutor in the Victoria College preparatory school prepared him for the position of vice-principal of Mount Allison Male Academy, to which he was called in 1870. During that year he taught natural science at the university, and in the following year mathematics besides. After a short period in the ministry he attended Harvard University and then returned to Mount Allison as professor of natural science, a position which he held until 1890.

Returning to Victoria in 1890 he spent two years in the chair of natural science, before being transferred to homiletics and pastoral theology, where he remained until 1910. Both arts and divinity students attended his classes in English Bible. He was said to have been equally at home in theology, natural science, and mathematics, and to have been an eloquent preacher.

In recognition of his achievements he was awarded honorary doctorates by Mount Allison in 1888, and the University of New Brunswick in 1900. He died in Calgary, Nov. 16, 1913, after a brief retirement.

BURWASH, NATHANAE (1839-1918), Canadian minister and educator, was born at St. Andrew's, Lower Canada, on July 25, 1839. His father's family were Loyalists from VERMONT, his mother's family were Scots. When Nathanael was a child, the family moved to Baltimore, Canada West, in the heart of the old Methodist region of that province. He was first educated at the local school and then at thirteen entered the preparatory section of VICTORIA COLLEGE (UNIVERSITY) in nearby Cobourg. He graduated with the B.A. in 1859 and was ordained into the Methodist ministry in 1864.

For a few years Burwash gained practical experience as a circuit minister. In 1866, however, he became professor of natural science at Victoria, for which he prepared by study at Yale University. His scientific labors added a new dimension to his insight into the teaching and work of the church. This was put to good use when in 1871 he was appointed the first professor of theology in Victoria University. Once again he felt the need to broaden his education. This was accomplished by attendance at GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE, from which he received the S.T.B., followed by an S.T.D. from NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY.

In 1887, after fourteen years as dean of theology, Burwash succeeded S. S. NELLES as president and chancellor of Victoria University, a post which he held until 1913. As head of the university, Burwash made his most important contribution to the welfare of his church and to the development of education in Canada. The great issue facing Victoria in 1887 was the possibility of federation with the University of Toronto, a matter which had been revived seriously in 1883. This proposal aroused bitter controversy in Methodist and secular circles, but its partisans were numerous and effective.

During the spring of 1887, the Ontario legislature passed an act embodying the federation scheme. It was accepted by Victoria in 1890, in large measure through Burwash's skillful leadership of the pro-federation forces.

The implementation of federation required not only the reorganization of Victoria's curriculum but also the physical transplantation of the College from Cobourg to Toronto. The new building was opened in 1892. From that time forward, Burwash's tenacious devotion to the federation concept helped to ensure its success. At the same time he guided the college through difficult years of readjustment. New residences and a library were constructed, largely through the generosity of the Massey family, Andrew Carnegie, and C. A. Birge. More significantly, the chancellor helped to adapt the intellectual outlook of the college and the church to the changing theological climate of the twentieth century.

While he was engaged in these difficult tasks, Burwash served his church as preacher, member of general conferences, delegate to the ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCES, and as a member of the committee from whose work the union of 1925 would come. He found time as well to write The History of Victoria College (1927), Egerton Ryerson (1906), and Wesley's Doctrinal Standards (1909).

Burwash was elected a fellow of the Royal Society of Canada and was given the LL.D. by the University of Toronto. His greatest honor, however, was the affection and respect bestowed on him by his brethren, his academic colleagues, and the students of Victoria. When he died on March 30, 1918, it was said of him: "Theology and the humanities, yes, and science too, went hand in hand for him; all unconscious, so to speak, of the jealousies, feuds and strifes which mischief makers sometimes seek to stir up between . . . the three daughters of wisdom . . . the three kindred sciences of God, man and nature." His memory lives in the great building known as Burwash Hall, and in the lives of those whom he inspired.

BUTCHER, JOHN CLARKE (1857-1923), was a notably effective missionary in the North India and Northwest India Conferences. Born in Tingewick, Bucks, England, and educated in NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY (B.A.), GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE (B.D.), and the Chicago Medical College (M.D.), he came to INDIA as a Methodist Episcopal missionary in 1885. He served in the North India Conference at Moradabad and Bijnor, and as principal of the Philander Smith College at Naini Tal. In 1905, he was transferred to the Northwest India Conference, as superintendent of the Punjab District. In his first year on the district, three thousand persons were added to the churches under his care. Except for a furlough, he remained on the Punjab District until 1915. Like the pioneer Robert Hoskins, whom he greatly admired and extolled, Butcher employed illiterate new converts and taught them as they worked. Many made great progress and achieved notable results in evangelism. Butcher constantly used the phrase given world-wide currency in more recent years in the literacy program of Frank Laubach, "Each one teach one." Taking into his district ministers who had not been accounted successful elsewhere, though they were educated and trained, Butcher communicated enthusiasm to them; and, as preachers-in-charge leading a group of new literates, they won thousands to Christ. Butcher's leadership had much to do with building the great church of today in the Punjab.

Going to Delhi in 1918, he repeated the record he had made in Lahore, adding from three to four thousand village converts yearly. With the help of R. E. Crane he built and opened a new boys' boarding school at Sonapat and erected a temporary church, the first M. E. place of worship in Delhi. He and Mrs. Butcher died only hours apart and of different causes in the extreme heat of June, 1923.

BUTLER, CLEMENTINA (1862-1949), promoter of American Methodist missions and leader for half a century in the WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY of the M. E. CHURCH, was born in BAREILLY, INDIA, in 1862, the daughter of WILLIAM BUTLER and Clementina (Rowe) Butler. She attended the New England Conservatory of Music in Boston.

Possessing a thorough knowledge of India and sharing her parents' enthusiasm for Christian missionary work, she served from 1889 to 1933 as executive secretary of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society, founded by her mother in the Tremont Street Church of Boston. In 1912 she organized the Committee on Christian Literature for missions in the Near and Far East; she assisted in establishing an annual missionary conference at Northfield, Mass., as well as the Central Committee for the United Study of Missions among church denominations. In India she set up the Ramabai Association which sponsored the first school for widows in that country. Under Miss Butler's leadership the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society was the first organization to pension missionaries through an insurance plan; it also established the first hospital for women in Bareilly. At the Tremont Street Church Miss Butler established a missionary museum. She also secured funds for the placement of eleven memorial windows there. She wrote William Butler: The Founder of Two Missions of the Methodist Church; Mrs. William Butler: Two Empires and The Kingdom; and Trophies From the Missionary Museum. She had a lively interest in the Mexican Mission under the superintendency of her brother, JOHN WESLEY BUTLER.

She died Dec. 5, 1949, at the Hotel Brunswick in Boston. At her funeral service in the Tremont Street Church, Bishop LEWIS O. HARTMAN acclaimed her "the greatest woman Methodism has produced in the past fifty years."

BUTLER, JOHN WESLEY (1851-1918), American missionary to MEXICO, was born on Oct. 13, 1851, in Shelburne Falls, Mass., the son of WILLIAM BUTLER and Julia (Lewis) Butler. He attended Chelsea High School, Boston Latin School, and Passaic Collegiate Institute. From 1871 to 1874 he was enrolled at BOSTON UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY. Following his ordination as a Methodist minister and a few months service as pastor of the Eggleston Square Church in BOSTON, he was appointed in 1874 to Mexico as a missionary where his father, founder and superintendent of the mission, was then stationed.

John Butler was given the pastorate of Trinity Church, Mexico City, the first M. E. church to be organized in that country. He served as pastor in Mexico from 1874 to 1888, and as a district superintendent from 1889 to 1918. Concurrently with his other responsibilities he served variously as publishing agent, overseer of schools, and acting president of the Mexico Institute and Mexico Theological School. In 1911 he was president of the Mexico Annual Conference. He was a delegate from the Mexico Conference to the ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCES in 1901 and 1911, and to every GENERAL CONFERENCE from 1888 to 1916. He was the author of Sketches of Mexico (1894); Mexico Coming Into Light (1906); and The History of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Mexico (1918).

On Aug. 13, 1878 he married Sara Aston, daughter of the Rev. Henry Aston of the NEW YORK EAST CONFERENCE. John W. Butler died March 17, 1918, and was buried in the American Cemetery in Mexico City. When he died there were 30,000 Methodist communicants in Mexico.

Bishop W. P. THIRKIELD wrote, "Mexico Conference stands as his enduring monument." Professor Gustavo A. Velasco said of him: "For over thirty years he was the best known North American citizen in Mexico. His look, his laugh, his advice were all attractive, sweet and helpful. He could have been a bishop but was only [one] de facto."

WILLIAM BUTLER

BUTLER, JOSEPH (1692-1752), British philosopher and moralist, born at Wantage, Berkshire, May 18, 1692. He became Bishop of Bristol (1738) and then of Durham (1750). JOHN WESLEY appreciated his answer to deism, The Analogy of Religion (1736); the moral theory of his Sermons (1726) finds more favor today. In a conversation with Wesley in August 1739, Butler objected to Methodist field preaching as unauthorized, and because "the pretending to extraordinary revelations and gifts of the Holy Ghost is a horrid thing—a very horrid thing!" (J. Wesley, Journal, ii. 256-57.) When Butler asked Wesley not to preach in his diocese, Wesley answered that as a Fellow of an Oxford College, he could preach anywhere in England; legally he was wrong. Butler died at Bath, June 16, 1752.

HENRY RACK

BUTLER, WILLIAM (1818-1899), founder of the missions of the M. E. Church in both INDIA and MEXICO, was born in Dublin, IRELAND, of English parentage, Jan. 30, 1818. He was educated at Hardwick Street Mission Seminary (Wesleyan) in Dublin and at Didsbury College, Manchester, England. Later the D.D. degree was conferred on him. He became a Methodist in 1837, joined the Irish Conference in 1844, and was ordained elder in 1848. While in Manchester he married a Miss Lewis who died shortly after bearing him a son. He then married her sister Julia, by whom he had two more sons. The family emigrated to America in 1850, and in May, 1851, Butler was admitted to the NEW YORK EAST CONFERENCE and was immediately transferred to the NEW ENGLAND CONFERENCE where he served successively churches at Williamsburg, Shelburne Falls, and Westfield, Mass. While at Westfield his wife died suddenly. Later, at his request, Clementina Rowe of Wexford, Ireland, came to America, and they were married at Portland, Me., Nov. 23, 1854. They had two daughters.

Before emigrating to America, Butler became interested in foreign missions. In 1852, he published a Compendium of Missions, and in 1856, while he was pastor at Lynn, Mass., Bishop MATTHEW SIMPSON chose him to launch a mission in India. Commissioned Superintendent of the India Mission in a ceremony in his church, Butler and his family arrived in that land in the spring of 1857. After consulting with British officials and missionaries of other churches, Butler resolved to occupy the territory north of the Ganges River. Delayed by the Sepoy Mutiny, the mission opened officially in Bareilly in August, 1858, and within three years, Butler, with the help of reinforcements from America, had established nine mission stations in strategic locations.

As superintendent of the mission, Butler was "virtually bishop, presiding elder, finance committee, treasurer, and corresponding secretary." Energetic, ambitious for missionary expansion, certain about the rightness of his own judgments, and impatient of restrictions imposed by church officials in New York, Butler was not easy to work with or for. In 1864 he resigned and reentered the pastorate in the New England Conference, serving briefly at Chelsea and at Dorchester Street, Boston. In 1869 he became secretary of the American and Foreign Christian Union, a position which kept him in touch with missions.

In December, 1872, Bishop Simpson again turned to Butler and asked him to start a mission in Mexico. Arriving in Mexico City early in 1873, Butler chose a few strategic centers and expanded the missionary activity of each, as he had done in India. Moreover, noting that Protestant missionaries generally indulged in tirades against Romanism, he opposed such and insisted that Methodist missionaries would seek to remove darkness by introducing the light of truth. Within a year he reported the organization of two English and seven Mexican congregations, along with other achievements. His son, JOHN W. BUTLER, came to Mexico as one of his helpers in 1874.

The Board of Missions in New York found Butler no more willing to follow directions in Mexico than in India. He used funds appropriated for the mission in ways that seemed best to him and did not hesitate to obligate the board for expenditures beyond what had been appropriated. In April, 1878, the board voted to recall Butler "as soon as practicable." While insisting that what he had done was justified by the circumstances, he resigned in December, 1878, worked briefly with the FREEDMEN'S AID SOCIETY, and in 1880 began a three-year pastorate at Melrose, Mass. In 1883 he started a two-year trip to India and the Holy Land, became supernumerary in 1885, spent some months on a visit to Mexico in 1887, assisted in the "Million and a Quarter for Missions" campaign, and then superannuated in 1891. He published Land of the Veda (1872), From Boston to Bareilly and Back (1885), and Mexico in Transition (1892). Living in retirement at Newton Center, Mass., he was a semi-invalid for eight years. He died in the Missionary Rest Home, Old Orchard, Me., Aug. 18, 1899.

Contemporaries agreed, and historians confirm, that notwithstanding Butler's lack of administrative finesse, he was a wise and devoted missionary who rendered great service. His foresight and grasp of the opportunities and the needs in both India and Mexico were remarkable. He made direct appeals to pastors and churches at home, contrary to the instructions of superiors in New York, but in that way he awakened the churches to the needs of foreign missions and brought capable volunteers to the field. On resigning in India, after less than seven years of actual work, he reported among other accomplishments, nine cities occupied, a printing establishment in operation, a number of chapels, schoolhouses, and orphanages erected, ten churches organized, 1,322 pupils, four native preachers and eleven exhorters at work, and 161 persons witnessing each week. That report "registered an achievement rarely, if ever, equaled in so short a time in Methodist missionary history." Butler's clear vision of India as a great mission field, his driving purpose, and his determination not to be defeated by the home church's lack of vision, accounted for his success.

BUTTE, MONTANA, U.S.A. Methodist Church Extension of Silver Bow County, Montana, was organized Oct. 8, 1952, with J. J. Haggerty as first president. A financial drive received pledges of $20,700 and in the fall of 1954 the present site of the Aldersgate Church was purchased.

The Church Extension Association faced much controversy in the next two years. Many favored one central church, while others preferred their old established churches. Finally the official board of Grace Church decided to offer leadership and relocate under the auspices of the Association. Plans were drawn in the summer of 1957. The second move was to propose a merger with St. Paul and Unity Churches, which was accomplished on April 13, 1958. Robert Craver and Ole Aarvold led the congregations at this time.

On April 27, 1958 a ground-breaking ceremony took place for a fellowship hall with representatives from all Methodist churches in Butte participating. Less than a year later on March 1, 1959 the fellowship hall was consecrated by Bishop GLENN R. PHILLIPS, and about that time the three churches became Aldersgate Church in fact with Ole Aarvold as minister.

Despite two long strikes in Butte, a third financial drive to raise funds for a sanctuary netted pledges of about $58,000. Ground was broken on June 16, 1963 and the building was consecrated by Bishop Phillips on Feb. 23, 1964.

During the church years of 1964-66 a study committee worked in cooperation with similar committees at Mt. View, Trinity and Mt. Bethel Churches, and discussed the formation of a Butte Methodist Larger Parish. In June, 1966, the Larger Parish became fact when Marion G. Hixson became Minister of Preaching and Administration and Robert Link became Minister of Membership and Education. On Sept. 25, 1966 the congregation of these four churches renewed their vows as members of the new Butte Methodist Larger Parish.

Aldersgate has the largest and newest segment of the Larger Parish and serves as the administrative and nerve center for the Parish. Future plans include the building of another educational wing on the present structure.

BUTTERFIELD, SIR HERBERT (1900-), British historian, born at Oxenhope, Yorkshire, Oct. 1, 1900, educated Cambridge University, where he became Fellow of Peterhouse (1923-55) and Master from 1955, Professor of Modern History from 1944, and Vice Chancellor of the University 1959-61. Professor Butterfield has achieved an international reputation for his many important writings both in history, historiography, and political science, among which a few may be mentioned: George III, Lord North and the People (1949), Christianity and History (1949), History and Human Relations (1951), Christianity in European History (1951), Christianity, Diplomacy, and War (1953), George III and the Historians (1957), and International Conflict in the 20th Century (1960). For his services to scholarship he was knighted by Queen Elizabeth II in 1968.

BUTTERWORTH, JOSEPH (1770-1826), British layman and son of a Baptist minister, was born in Coventry in 1770. He married into the Cooke family of Trowbridge, and thus became acquainted with ADAM CLARKE, who had earlier married his wife's sister. Through Clarke he was introduced to Methodism, became an enthusiastic and faithful CLASS LEADER, and eventually (with THOMAS THOMPSON) one of the two most influential Methodist laymen of his time. Like Thompson he was a founding member of the COMMITTEE OF PRIVILEGES, and followed Thompson as general treasurer of the Wesleyan METHODIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY. Butterworth founded a lucrative bookselling business in Fleet Street, specialising in law books, but also venturing to publish religious works, notably Adam Clarke's famous Commentary. His home became a focal point for many great philanthropists, and here the first meeting of the BRITISH AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY was held. He followed Thomas Thompson into Parliament, becoming the second Methodist M.P., serving for his native Coventry (1812-8), and for Dover (1820-6). He died suddenly June 30, 1826.

BUTLE, GEORGE (1810-1874), NEW ZEALAND Methodist minister, was born in Yorkshire, England. Entering the ministry in 1838, he was one of six missionaries who arrived in New Zealand on the mission brig "Triton" in 1840. Pending the arrival of WALTER LAWRY, Buttler served for a time as the first resident European Methodist minister in AUCKLAND. Later, he spent a long period of years at the Te Kopua Station, which he made almost self-supporting by developing a flock of sheep. Following his wife's death, he returned to England and served in two circuits under the British Conference.

Increasing deafness forced an early retirement, and he returned to New Zealand as a supernumerary and spent the last thirteen years of his life at Spring Farm, Otahuhu, Auckland. He died on July 10, 1874.

BUTTRAM, JOSIAH (1820?-1892), American minister, married Lucinda Zumwalt in MISSOURI on Dec. 3, 1840. In discharge of his circuit-riding duties, he moved to ILLINOIS in 1844; to TENNESSEE in 1853; to GEORGIA in 1854; and to ALABAMA in 1860 just before the outbreak of the Civil War. One son, Elijah, then seventeen years of age, was drafted into the Confederate Army against the will of his family. Elijah stayed in the South after the war.

In 1872 Josiah and his family traveled by covered wagon to Albany, OREGON and thence into WASHINGTON Territory to land known today as Pomeroy. The certificate for their homesteaded land is dated June 20, 1884.

The Buttrams raised twelve children. Lucinda died in 1919 and was buried beside her much traveled husband in the Pioneer Cemetery at Pomeroy, Washington.

ROSCOE SHELLER

BUTTS, THOMAS, British Methodist, with William Briggs was the first steward of JOHN WESLEY'S BOOK ROOM from 1753 to 1759. This appointment freed Wesley from many business responsibilities which were hampering his ministry. Thomas Butts was a capable and honest businessman, "as honest as honesty itself." He insisted that Christians should pay their debt. His Harmonia Sacra was the chief source for Wesley's Sacred Melody, a volume of tunes to which Methodist hymns were sung. Occasionally he traveled with both John and CHARLES WESLEY on their preaching tours.

BUTTZ, HENRY ANSON (1835-1920), American minister, teacher, and New Testament scholar, was born on April 18, 1835, at Middle Smithfield, Pa., in humble circumstances. The ability he demonstrated in the local school attracted the attention of a Presbyterian minister who aided him in attending Blair Presbyterian Institute in New Jersey. Then he entered Princeton University, from which he graduated in 1858. That year the NEWARK CONFERENCE was formed by dividing the NEW JERSEY CONFERENCE, and Buttz became a charter member of Newark Conference. At this first session, held in Morristown, N. J., HENRY BOEHM, Bishop ASBURY'S traveling companion from 1808 to 1813, told of his and the Bishop's visit to the town on May 16, 1811, when they "borrowed the Presbyterian meeting house, where the Bishop preached that evening." Buttz and Boehm became friends. On Boehm's 100th birthday they dined together. When Boehm died a few months later, Buttz conducted the funeral service.

Buttz became pastor of the Morristown Church and was responsible for the erection of a stone structure on the Green. In 1870 he went to DREW THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY as teacher of Greek New Testament. A leading Methodist layman of Morristown, GEORGE T. COBB, gave money for the endowing of the professorship. Buttz taught Greek New Testament for forty-two years. For thirty-two years, 1880-1912, he served as president of the Seminary. He never read from an English New Testament when conducting a service, but translated directly from the Greek New Testament. His "Epistle to the Romans in Greek" compares the text of Robert Stephens with those of Tregelles, Tischendorf, Westcott and other scholars. Honorary degrees were awarded him by Princeton, WESLEYAN, DICKINSON and OHIO WESLEYAN. He was a delegate to eight GENERAL CONFERENCES and to the first and second ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCES. He addressed the Fifteenth Peace Conference in Milan, in 1906, as one of its delegates. In 1860, he married Emily Hoagland. Two daughters were born to them. Buttz died on Oct. 6, 1920 and was buried in the John Hancock Cemetery in Madison, N. J.

BUXAR, India. The Buxar Brides' School was founded by Mabel Sheldon, a missionary of the M. E. CHURCH. This unique institution trains brides for the responsibilities of marriage, including housekeeping, child care, religious education in the home, and involvement in community affairs. Many brides trained here were married during early childhood by arrangement of their parents and the parents of the groom before either family had been converted. The training given prepares them to begin their real married life long after the wedding ceremony, and in an atmosphere of Christian faith and purpose very different from that which would have prevailed had they not been given this training. Homes in which the wife has had the advantage of such training are easily recognized as superior, and have a far-reaching influence for good.

Miss Sheldon retired from missionary service in INDIA in 1965. She was born Nov. 29, 1894 at Tingley, Iowa, and received her B.A. and M.A. degrees from Kansas State College, Pittsburg, Kan. She went to India in 1927, was appointed to Buxar in 1934, and except during furloughs served there until her retirement.

The Brides' School is part of the Methodist Center in Buxar and Simri. Other institutions there, all founded by Miss Sheldon, are a coeducational junior high school, a hostel for high school boys attending a government high school, an extension service that maintains a network of primary schools, and a coordinated program of adult education, worship, and witness.

The principal of the Brides' School in 1966 was Frances Paul. The heads of all the institutions of the Methodist Center are Indian women of the Methodist Church.

BUYERS, PAUL EUGENE (1878-1960), American preacher and missionary to BRAZIL, was born on a farm near Newman, Ga. He was converted and joined the M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH at Whitesburg, Ga., at the age of eighteen. He attended YOUNG HARRIS, a small Methodist mountain college in northern Georgia. He was licensed as a local preacher in 1904 and received his B.D. in 1909 from VANDERBILT. To secure an education he worked hard from childhood. Convinced that God was calling him to the mission field, he applied to the Board of Missions of the M. E. Church, South and was appointed to Brazil by Bishop W. R. LAMBUTH in 1910.

Buyers was then engaged to Eunice Segars, a student at the Methodist Training School for Young Women in NASHVILLE, Tenn., but as she had a four-year contract with the Board of DEACONESSES, he had to leave her behind when he went to Brazil. He returned to marry her on June 16, 1914. Buyers worked for thirty-eight years in Brazil, as pastor, head of Institute Granbery and of the theological seminary, as superintendent at various periods both of the Instituto Anna Gonzaga and of the Instituto Central do Povo, RIO DE JANEIRO. He also served as treasurer of the Board of Missions. Of all Methodist missionaries in Brazil, he did the most writing. Besides many translations and his autobiography, he wrote

A History of Methodism, The Founders of Methodism, and short biographies of Dwight L. Moody, FRANCES E. WILLARD, JOHN WESLEY, Martin Luther, JORGE L. BECKER, and JAMES M. TERRELL. These works furnish good background material for a study of Methodism in Brazil.

Eunice, his wife, proved an unusually fine worker with young people and wrote a book on recreation for youth. She died in 1934 while they were in the United States. In 1936 Buyers married Viola Matthews, a missionary of the Woman's Missionary Council, who died in 1942. Three years later he married Allie Cobb, another well-known missionary in Brazil. They retired to the United States in 1949. Mrs. Buyers died in South Carolina, and Buyers died in Florida on Jan. 5, 1960. Survivors included his and Eunice's children—Grace, Ola Ruth, John, and Paul. Grace married WILBUR SMITH, a second generation missionary and now a bishop of the Methodist Church in Brazil.

CABINET. A term employed in The Methodist Church U.S.A. to designate the bishop and district superintendents when they meet together, usually to consider matters relating to an Annual Conference. The cabinet originated in the early days of American Methodism, when the PRESIDING ELDERS (now district SUPERINTENDENTS) were called together by the bishop to advise him in the making of pastoral appointments. This was first formally done by Bishop McKENDREE in 1812 when he summoned the presiding elders to meet with him when he was considering drawing up the appointments for the preachers. The aged Bishop ASBURY expressed public surprise at McKendree's calling in the presiding elders, saying that he had never felt the need of such a move. McKendree tactfully said to the much older Bishop, "You are our father, and have no need of such advice. I am a brother and do need the advice of my brethren in the important matter of stationing the preachers." From that day to this, every bishop has met with his cabinet in the all-important matter of making the appointments. The cabinet members themselves owe their status to the bishop's selection and appointment; and it is not inappropriate to refer to them as "The Bishop's Cabinet."

The cabinet as an entity was not early recognized in the book of discipline and as late as 1876, Bishop MATTHEW SIMPSON said it had "no legal recognition by the church." Subsequently, however, the cabinet was recognized in many ways, by and in the Discipline, and its action and duties prescribed. The name presiding elder was changed to district superintendent in the M. E. Church in 1908, and at church union in 1939 this name was adopted for The Methodist Church. The members of the cabinet are amenable to the bishop, and he presides over their meeting when he is present. If he may not be present, he asks one of the district superintendents to preside, or in some cases, the cabinet elects a chairman for certain duties which cabinet members may perform without the presence of the bishop. A secretary of the cabinet is almost always either elected, or appointed by the bishop, in order that records of the cabinet procedures may be carefully kept.

In many Annual Conferences, the nominations which the Conference is to vote upon for offices, boards, Annual Conference commissions, and the like, are made by the cabinet. It in such cases acts as a nominating committee, though an Annual Conference, if it prefers, may elect or create another nominating group.

Many bishops call their cabinets together at intervals during the year to review the work, or better to manage the affairs of a Conference administratively. When the conference year is drawing to a close, the cabinet meets frequently to begin talking over and making the appointments, with each district superintendent looked to to inform the bishop and cabinet concerning the work and needs for the charges and of the ministers.

The cabinet, as such, has no parliamentary entity apart from the status given it by the bishop and by conference and disciplinary regulations. As the bishop is not a member of the conference, he cannot, even with the secretary of the cabinet, make a motion. Two cabinet members, as they are individually conference members, may do this for him, but the usual annual conference watches "motions from the cabinet" quite strictly.

The bishop must read his appointments to the full cabinet—every and all appointments—before he reads them publicly to the conference. The bishop has the right to make changes in the appointments at any time before he reads them publicly, but he must notify the full cabinet of any such changes before he does announce them publicly, and so fix them for the year. The bishop, being the ultimate one responsible for the appointment making, may overrule or act against the advice of the full cabinet, but wise bishops seldom veto a unanimous cabinet, and then only in some matter the bishop considers to be of the highest moment. The cabinet selections of each bishop have a great deal to do with the success or failure of his administration. Experienced bishops state that a strong cabinet makes the best sort of executive body for carrying out all the work and administrative processes of any annual conference.

See letter of McKendree to Asbury, Oct. 8, 1811, in R. Paine, William McKendree, 1869.

S. PARKES CADMAN

CADMAN, SAMUEL PARKES (1864-1936), British-American clergyman, was born at Wellington, Salop, England, on Dec. 18, 1864, and was trained for the Methodist ministry at Wesleyan College, Richmond, Surrey. He went to the United States and became pastor of Metropolitan Temple in NEW YORK CITY in 1895. He became distinguished and received honorary doctorates in five fields from nine American institutions. In 1901 he became pastor of Central Congregational Church in BROOKLYN but continued to retain his membership in the M. E. Church.

Cadman was acting president of Adelphi College in Brooklyn for two years, president of the FEDERAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and national radio minister of that body, lecturer at Yale, Bangor Divinity School, Hartford Theological Seminary, University of California, VANDERBILT, and other institutions. In 1920 he was the delegate to the Tercennial of the Mayflower's Sailing in Great Britain, chairman of the American section of the Conference on Life and Work at STOCKHOLM, Sweden in 1925, and gold medalist of the National Institute of Social Sciences. In 1932 he was decorated by the king of Sweden as a Commander of the Royal Order of Vasa. He was one of the founders and first president of the International Society of Theta Phi, honorary theological fraternity.

Cadman became widely known as one of the first ministers to adopt the radio for a regular series of public addresses, with questions and answers on current topics. He was always in complete command of his audience anywhere, and every question given him from and in a public gathering, he always seemed to handle with complete ease and assurance. He delivered one of the principal addresses at the Methodist SESQUICENTENNIAL in BALTIMORE in 1934.

After a somewhat slow and involved beginning, he suddenly turned into the great orator and master of assemblies which he truly was. Cadman was the author of eleven books, among them The Three Religious Leaders of Oxford, which included John Wesley, and Ambassadors of God, the Lyman Beecher Lectures, 1920.

He died on July 12, 1936, in Brooklyn.

He joined the MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church, South in 1915, and served fourteen appointments of that conference before he retired in 1962.

Dr. Cain has served in various conference activities, including the Board of Education, the Board of Ministerial Training, and the Historical Society, having been chairman of all three. He was a delegate to the ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE in 1947, the WORLD METHODIST CONFERENCE in 1956, and the Southeastern Jurisdictional Conference in 1948. He has been a member of the Association of Methodist HISTORICAL SOCIETIES and of its executive committee, becoming vice-president of that body in 1960-64. CALCUTTA, India, capital of the state of West Bengal, banking and financial center, and one of the famed port cities of the world, has a population of about 3,100,000. Until 1911 it was the capital of INDIA.

Two Methodist districts are represented in the city. The Bengali District has five churches, two of which are self-supporting, with 1,657 members. The English-Hindustani District has three churches, including self-supporting Thoburn Memorial, and several preaching places. There are 722 names on the Methodist rolls.

In addition to the churches, the Methodist ministry in Calcutta is varied and effective. The Bengali District Educational and Evangelistic Work includes four primary schools with an enrolment of 309, relief work through the Bengal Christian Council, and six Women's Societies of Christian Service with 108 members. The Hindustani Social-Evangelistic and Educational Work, begun in 1867, involves supervision of a primary school, two Women's Societies with forty-eight members, and a limited social work program.

Institutions, in addition to the two described below, are: Calcutta Boys' High School and Hostel, which is an English-medium primary and high school for boys with an enrolment of 1,120 and hostel facilities for 150. Calcutta Girls' High School, in its second century of service to girls of many races, offers a diversified course in the English language to an enrolment of 700. Lee Collins Primary and Junior High School is coeducational and serves an enrolment of more than 500 in the heart of the most depressed area of an overcrowded refugee section of Calcutta. Woman's Christian College, with an enrolment of 300, is a union institution in which Methodists cooperate.

Collins Institute. This coeducational high school was opened in 1893 as the Bengali department of the Calcutta Boys' School. It was known then as the American Methodist Institution. The present name was given it in honor of B. A. Collins, a Methodist layman from the state of Washington who along with his son TRUMAN COLLINS contributed generously to its building and endowment. If the gifts of Collins and his son are considered as one donation, it is probably the largest single contribution ever received by the BOARD OF MISSIONS.

The avowed purpose of the institute was early stated to be "to develop Indian leadership for the Annual Conference." Its success in achieving that purpose has been very limited, but it has made substantial contributions to education and public service. In 1921 it stood first in the Province of Bengal in the proportion of its students who were successful in the university matriculation examination. Among the early American principals were C. S. Bomwetch (the first), Benjamin J. Chew, JOHN E. ROBINSON, and HENRY M. SWAN. For the past forty years all principals have been Indians. Among them Lolit B. Chatterji, Hrit K. Mondol, and A. B. Singh have been outstanding. The enrolment in 1969 was about 1,600.

Lee Memorial Mission is a notable institution founded by David Hiram Lee and his wife, Ada Hildegarde Jones Lee, after they had suffered a terrible domestic tragedy. David Lee came to India as a bachelor in 1875, to work in the self-supporting mission led by William Taylor. Ada Jones, whom he had known slightly in college in Ohio, came the next year in the Woman's Union Mission. They were married in Madras in 1881. Two years later, in failing health, they returned to America, and he accepted an appointment in the East Ohio Annual Conference. After health problems were solved and they began praying for an opportunity to return to India, generous gifts made it possible for them to go back without help from the Board of Missions, and with the approval of JAMES M. THOBURN, they opened a Bengali Mission in Calcutta.

Six of their children attended Queen's Hill School in Darjeeling, now known as Mount Hermon School. In September 1899, a landslide swept all six children to their death. The Lees returned to their work in Calcutta, and from all India, the U.S.A., and many other countries, messages of sympathy and comradeship in service poured in upon them. There were so many gifts that they purchased a centrally located property, and so many friends helped with life and money that a great institution has been developed and maintained to the enormous good of multitudes.

Lee died in 1924, but Mrs. Lee remained until 1948. She never returned to America. In 1936 she asked Dr. and Mrs. Walter Griffiths to accept the responsibility for superintending the Mission. In 1940 the bishops of the Methodist Church in India, who were the trustees of Lee Memorial Mission, arranged the transfer, and the Griffiths began a service which continued for more than a quarter of a century. The Rev. and Mrs. E. D. Benedict succeeded Dr. and Mrs. Griffiths in 1965.

Lee Memorial has a varied ministry, touching every aspect of life in the great city of Calcutta and reaching into the villages in every direction. Many orphan children adopted by the mission and educated in its schools, and at its expense in schools elsewhere in India or abroad, hold positions of eminence in church and state. The mission stands as a testimony to the power of faith and hope and love.

Enrolment in 1969 was 489.

Immediately elected as principal of the Maine Wesley Seminary, he served there until 1834, and then became vice-president and professor of mathematics in DICKINSON COLLEGE, Carlisle, Pa. Three years later he transferred to the chair of metaphysics in the college. As a professor he was popular with the students. He took a deep interest in the moral questions of his day, and was especially active in promoting temperance. In 1846 he was one of the more than 900 delegates who met in London and formed the Evangelical Alliance. He published several books: Philosophy of Christian Perfection, Christianity Tested by Eminent Men, The Doctrine of the English Verb, and a Manual of Elocution, including Voice and Gesture. He died of tuberculosis, June 6, 1848.

CALHOUN, EUGENE CLAYTON (1912-), American pastor, missionary, and longtime President of PAINE COLLEGE, was born in Douglas, Ga. on Nov. 18, 1912. His parents were Eugene Clayton and Gussie Barnes Calhoun. He received the B.A. from FLORIDA SOUTHERN COLLEGE in 1934, its D.D. in 1957, and the B.D. from SOUTHERN METHODIST UNIVERSITY in 1940. He married Frankie Salina Morgan.

Dr. Calhoun joined the FLORIDA CONFERENCE in 1934 and served appointments there and in North Carolina until he went as a missionary to Soochow, CHINA in 1940. He returned to serve at Murray Hill in Jacksonville, Fla., 1941-46, and then again to Changchow, East China, 1946-47. He was elected President of Paine College in 1956 and served as such until 1970, when it was decided that the work of this school should be supervised by a Negro President. Dr. Calhoun, who had encouraged this move, subsequently returned to his conference for an appointment.

He is the author of Of Men Who Ventured Much and Far (1961) and The Forgiving Forgiveness (1962). His representation of Paine College through the various southern conferences, with whose Methodism Paine College has always been historically affiliated, has caused him to be well known especially over the Southeastern Jurisdiction of the U.S.A.

CALIFORNIA, U.S.A., third largest state geographically and now the largest in population, was admitted to the union Sept. 9, 1850, without ever having been designated as a territory. Mount Whitney (14,495 feet) and Death Valley (-282 feet) are the highest and lowest points in the continental U.S.

From the beginning the M. E. Church and the M. E. Church, South vigorously promoted work in California. As time passed, the former became decidedly the stronger church in the region. At the outset the M. P. Church sought with little success to gain a foothold in California; after 1908 it no longer claimed even a mission conference there. Today there are only two annual conferences in California—CALIFORNIA-NEVADA and SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA-ARIZONA—but if we count missions, mission conferences, provisional conferences, foreign language conferences, and conferences created by changing names, there have been twenty-five since 1848. (See TABLE OF METHODIST ANNUAL CONFERENCES.)

The famous JEDEDIAH SMITH, a fur-trapping layman, was the first Methodist to set foot in California; he arrived at San Bernardino in November, 1826. On October 1, Adna Hexock, a licensed Methodist exhorter, at a funeral in Santa Clara, preached the first Protestant sermon in California. The following month a Methodist church was organized at SANTA CLARA. In 1848, the GENERAL CONFERENCE (ME) created the Oregon and California Mission Conference. The work in California became a district in that mission conference. In September, 1849, WILLIAM TAYLOR and ISAAC OWEN came as Methodist missionaries. Taylor went on to become a world missionary, was elected bishop, and served in Africa. Taylor and Owen may be considered the founders of Methodism in California.

In 1850, the California District began the publication of the California Christian Advocate. At the first session of the state legislature, the Methodists sought a charter for a college. It was granted July 10, 1851, thus making the UNIVERSITY OF THE PACIFIC the first chartered college on the Pacific coast.

The California Conference was organized in SAN FRANCISCO in August, 1851. Two years later the conference sent a "missionary" to LOS ANGELES. By 1860 the conference had seven districts, eighty-one preachers in full connection, seventy-three churches, fifty-two parsonages, and 3,441 church members. Also, it had initiated missionary work among the German speaking settlers and in ARIZONA and NEVADA.

In 1849, the bishops of the M. E. Church, South determined to establish a mission in California. Accordingly, JESSE BORING and A. M. WYNN of the GEORGIA CONFERENCE and D. W. POLLOCK of the ST. LOUIS CONFERENCE arrived in San Francisco via PANAMA early in 1850, began distributing Southern Methodist literature, organized circuits, and enrolled members. The work progressed rapidly, and in April 1852 the PACIFIC CONFERENCE was organized.

Centered at first around San Francisco, the Southern Methodists, like their northern brethren, soon discovered possibilities in the southern part of the state. Learning in 1854 that a group in the church at Los Nietos on the Los Angeles Circuit of the M. E. Church desired to be related to the Southern Church because they objected to an abolition society in the congregation, the presiding elder of the Stockton District of the Pacific Conference went to Los Nietos, formally organized a class of sixteen persons, and promised to send them a Southern Methodist preacher the next year. Three ministers came and inaugurated the work in southern California.

Both branches of the church had difficulty in southern California during the Civil War. In 1858 the M. E. Church withdrew its ministers from Los Angeles because so many people resented their position on slavery. They did not return until 1866. The region was not much more receptive to the southern preachers. However, the Southern Church did manage to continue some of its work there during the war years. California was in reality a border state with nearly as many people from the slave states as from the north. Each church lost in membership in California during the war years. After the war the northern church was more successful in regaining momentum than the Southern Church.

The Southern Church organized the Los Angeles Conference in 1870, and the northern church formed the Southern California Conference in 1876.

Gold was discovered in Nevada in 1860, and the California Conference began mission work there. The General Conference created the Nevada Conference in 1864, but it was never strong. In 1884 it became a mission, and in 1918 it was absorbed by the California Conference.

In 1856, the M. E. Church started work among the Germans in California which grew into the California German Conference by 1891 and continued until 1927 when it was absorbed by the English-speaking conferences. A Swedish district in the California Conference became a part of the Pacific Swedish Conference (included all states west of the Rocky Mountains) which was organized in 1908 and continued for twenty years before being absorbed by the English-speaking conferences.

The Latin American Mission was formed in 1920 by dividing the Southern California Conference. The mission became a provisional conference in The Methodist Church and carried on until 1957 when it was absorbed. The California Conference organized the PACIFIC JAPANESE MISSION in 1900 and the PACIFIC CHINESE MISSION in 1908. The latter was merged with the CALIFORNIA ORIENTAL MISSION of the M. E. Church, South in 1939, became a provisional conference bearing that name in The Methodist Church and was absorbed in 1952. The Japanese work also became a provisional conference in The Methodist Church in 1939 and was absorbed in 1964. The M. E. Church did work among American Indians, Filipinos, Finns, Italians, Negroes, and Portuguese without organizing them into separate missions or conferences. The church won more Orientals than any other foreign-language group.

The M. E. Church, South organized the Pacific Mexican Mission in 1914 to include its Spanish-speaking work in California, Arizona, and parts of MEXICO. Four years later, the part of the mission which was on United States soil was merged with that part of the Mexican Border Conference which was in west Texas and New Mexico, to form the Western Mexican Mission. The Southern Church organized its California Oriental Mission mentioned above in 1926.

At the time of Union in 1939, the Methodist Episcopal Church in California, Nevada, and Arizona—the three states included in the California conferences—was nearly six times as strong numerically as the M. E. Church, South. The northern church had 145,100 members and the southern body 25,126.

Due in part to the recent great increase in population in the area covered by the California conferences, Methodism there has grown rapidly. In 1968, the two California conferences had 1,427 ministers, 871 pastoral charges, 391,257 church members, and churches, parsonages, and other property valued at $253,410,536. The conferences own, support, or are related to about fifty institutions, such as colleges, theological seminaries, hospitals, children's homes, homes for the aged, settlement houses, community centers, missions, and campsites.

CALIFORNIA CONFERENCE (E.U.B.) extended the full length of the state and also included Phoenix, Ariz. The conference was divided at the Tehachapi Mountain Range into North and South Districts with headquarters at SACRAMENTO and LOS ANGELES, respectively. It came into existence in 1951, five years after the merging of the Evangelical and the United Brethren streams of church life.

"Father" David Thompson (of the U.B. Church) came in 1849 and was soon joined by others in earnest evangelistic preaching. ISRAEL SLOANE arrived in 1858 under appointment of the Home, Frontier, and Foreign Missionary Society. Within seven weeks, he had organized the first United Brethren class in the state; and in less than a year had formed two QUARTERLY CONFERENCES. In two more years, the General Conference recognized California Conference.

The first regular session of the California U.B. Conference met in Yolo County in 1862, with six ministers present. There were six or seven classes with a total of ninety-three members. DANIEL SHUCK, bishop of the Western conferences, arrived in the state in 1864. Travelling hard, dangerous trails, he visited the scattered flocks for many months to bring renewed hope and win new converts until in the fall of that year he was ready to hold a conference session.

In 1863 the Board of Missions of The Evangelical Association appointed three missionaries from Pennsylvania to work on the West Coast. James Crossman was sent to OREGON; C. F. DEININGER and Michael Guhl to CALIFORNIA. In June, 1864, Deininger and Guhl, with wives and children, arrived by ship at San Francisco and were warmly welcomed by a few German families who were awaiting them. These two men began a Germanlanguage ministry at San Francisco and San José; and Crossman, at Salem, Ore.

The Pacific Coast Conference of The Evangelical Association was organized by Bishop RUDOLPH DUBS in 1876 at the Salem church. That same year the Board of Missions sent F. W. VOEGELIN to California. Under his leadership the Association was strengthened in San Francisco and extended east and south as far as Los Angeles and Orange Counties.

After eight years, the Pacific Conference was divided into the Oregon and California Conferences, the latter holding its first separate session in 1884 at Santa Ana. At this time California had seven preachers, one station, seven missions, and a total membership of 257. The United Brethren bishop's residence for the Western Area had been in California since 1937, but the Evangelical Association bishops had resided outside the state until conference union in 1951.

In 1967, the united conference had eighty-five ministers of all classes, including eight probationers; forty-three churches (charges) with a total of 9,359 members; and church and parsonage properties valued at over $7,225,000. In that year the churches paid out $208,201 for missions and benevolences and $1,188,772 for all purposes.

Near La Puente the United Brethren established the Colonel R. M. Baker Home for Retired Ministers in 1911 with its directors elected by the California Conference. In 1968 it had twenty-three housekeeping units and a fellowship hall. The Pacific Evangelical Home for Aged People was started in Burbank by The Evangelical Church in 1922.

In 1969, the conference united with the two former Methodist conferences in the area: California-Nevada and Southern California-Arizona Conferences.

CALIFORNIA-NEVADA CONFERENCE. The 1848 GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church created the Oregon and California Mission Conference which was divided in 1851 to form the California and Oregon Conferences. In 1948 thirty years after the California Conference had absorbed the Nevada Mission, its name was changed to the California-Nevada Conference. (See CALIFORNIA for early history of Methodism in the state.)

The gold rush of 1849 brought many people to the SAN FRANCISCO area, and the first work of the California Conference centered there. The Methodist preachers had a part in helping to make law and order prevail in the mining communities. Within a few years the placer mining period passed, the people adopted more normal ways of life, and immigrants began to settle in other parts of the state. In 1853, the California Conference sent a "missionary" to LOS ANGELES. Discouraged by the pro-slavery sentiment in the southern part of the state, the conference withdrew its ministers from Los Angeles in 1858 and did not send them back until 1866. After the Civil War, a land boom brought in more people, and a Los Angeles District was formed in 1870. By 1875 the conference had seven districts, 136 pastoral charges, and 9,330 church members including probationers, and in 1876 it agreed to the organization of the Southern California Conference.

In April, 1906, half of the Methodist churches in San Francisco were destroyed by the earthquake and fire and the others were damaged. That fall the district reported a ten percent loss in membership. It was not until 1910 that the membership in the San Francisco District exceeded the 1905 total. However, by 1907 the total membership of the conference was about equal to the number reported in 1905, some 21,000. From that time forward the numerical growth of the conference was steady but not spectacular.

The Methodists started several academies in California before public schools were established. At the first session of the state legislature in 1851, they sought and were granted a charter for California Wesleyan College. The next year the name was changed to the UNIVERSITY OF THE PACIFIC and the school was located at Santa Clara. In 1924, it was moved to Stockton where it was in a good position to weather the reverses of the depression era and go on to become a first-rate institution of higher learning. Other schools related to the conference in the early years were: Oak Grove Institute, Alameda; Stockton Female Institute; Maryville German Institute; and Napa Collegiate Institute. The latter was merged with the University of the Pacific in 1892.

As early as 1856, the California Conference established a German district, and that was the beginning of a long and extensive ministry to ethnic or language groups in the state. Before the last foreign language conference was absorbed in 1957, the California Conference had organized eight different language conferences or missions and had ministered to several language groups within its bounds without organizing them into conferences.

Related to the conference's ministry to foreign language groups was the work of the WOMEN'S MISSIONARY SOCIETY of the Pacific Coast, organized at San Francisco in 1870 for the purpose of helping Chinese women who were brought from Asia and were living in virtual slavery in California. California Methodist women rendered humanitarian service to the Chinese women and made converts among them.

In the last quarter of the nineteenth century a strong Lay Association was developed in the conference.

In 1939, the California Conference of The Methodist Church began with 59,225 members. Some 38,578 came from the California Conference (ME), 11,308 from the Pacific Conference (MES), 255 from the Western Norwegian-Danish Conference (ME) which merged at that time with the English-speaking conferences, and 9,084 by extension of the conference boundary to include territory that was in the Southern California Conference before unification.

The California-Nevada Conference has a strong Women's Society of Christian Service which reported 24,805 members in 1968 and contributions of $251,504 to the conference treasurer.

The conference supports or is related to a number of institutions—hospitals, homes for the aged, a youth center, seminaries, schools, and missions.

In 1968, the conference had eight districts, 554 ministers, 387 pastoral charges, 124,121 members, and churches, parsonages and other property valued at $129,-149,437.

CALIFORNIA ORIENTAL MISSION was organized by the M. E. Church, South in 1926 by dividing the PACIFIC CONFERENCE which for the preceding eleven years had maintained an Oriental Mission District. The denomination had started oriental missionary work on a modest scale in SAN FRANCISCO in 1897. After the earthquake in 1906, the two Episcopal Methodisms agreed to a partial division of responsibility for oriental missions. All of the Korean work was assigned to the Southern Church, while both denominations continued to minister to the Japanese.

Churches for Japanese and Koreans, with native preachers, were developed by the M. E. Church, South in San Francisco, OAKLAND, STOCKTON, Manteca, SACRAMENTO, and other cities in California, not to mention one church in Terry, Texas. C. F. REID was the first superintendent of the California Oriental Mission; he was assisted by T. S. Ryang, a native Korean preacher.

When organized in 1914, the Oriental Mission District of the Pacific Conference had three Japanese and two Korean appointments. In 1927, the California Oriental Mission had a Japanese and a Korean district with a total of eight appointments and 458 members. At unification in 1939, the mission had 640 members.

In merging the Methodist oriental missionary work in 1939, the Japanese ministers and churches of the California Oriental Mission of the Southern Church were placed with the Pacific Japanese Mission of the Northern Church to form the PACIFIC JAPANESE PROVISIONAL CONFERENCE of The Methodist Church.

The Pacific Chinese Mission of the Northern Church and the Korean work of the California Oriental Mission of the Southern Church were merged in 1939 to form the California Oriental Mission of The Methodist Church. In 1941, the mission had six Chinese, four Korean, and four Filipino appointments with 506, 302, and 86 members, respectively. In 1945, the mission was designated as the California Oriental Provisional Conference and it continued as such until 1952 when it was absorbed by the English-speaking conferences of the Western Jurisdiction. In 1951 the provisional conference had 14 appointments and 904 church members.

CALKINS, CHARLES LLEWELLYN (1895-1967), American minister and board secretary, was born in MINNEAPOLIS, Minn. on Nov. 5, 1895, the son of George Darwin and Florence Gertrude (Goff) Calkins, but he spent his childhood and youth in Parker, S. D. After graduation from DAKOTA WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY in 1917, he obtained the B.D. degree from GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE in 1921, and the next year he received the M.A. from both NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY and the University of Chicago. He was honored with doctoral degrees by Garrett Biblical Institute in 1938 and Dakota Wesleyan in 1945.

He joined the Wisconsin Conference of the M. E. Church, but upon completion of his formal education he transferred to the Southern California Conference in 1922 and later to the California Conference, holding pastorates in the SAN FRANCISCO Bay area until 1932. He then transferred to the DETROIT area, serving at Preston, Mich. for five years.

After one year at the Jefferson Avenue Church in Detroit, he became affiliated with the General BOARD OF PENSIONS, serving as assistant to the General Secretary, THOMAS A. STAFFORD, from 1938 until 1952, when he became General Secretary.

Calkins rendered great service to the entire church by increasing the pension rate paid to pastors in all the conferences and by raising the operations of the Pension Fund to a completely sound business basis. He retired in 1964.

He married Kathleen Carnie on Dec. 7, 1921, and she died in July 1927, leaving one daughter. His second wife, Dorothy Ferris, whom he married on Aug. 31, 1928, and by whom he had three children, preceded him in death by one month. He died in San Francisco, July 16, 1967.

CALKINS, HARVEY REEVES (1866-1941), American clergyman, missionary, and church executive, was born in Valparaiso, Ind., April 11, 1866. He received the B.A. degree in 1888 and the M.A. in 1891 from NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY, and completed his theological training at GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE in 1890. He travelled and studied abroad for three years, 1890-91 and 1896.

He was ordained to the M. E. Church's ministry in 1892, and served pastorates in COLORADO and ILLINOIS. He was a missionary field evangelist from 1898 to 1900, when he went to INDIA as a missionary, an assignment which lasted ten years.

Calkins was a delegate to the WORLD MISSIONARY CONFERENCE at Edinburgh in 1910. He was named as a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1912, and as a reserve delegate to the conferences of 1916 and 1920. From 1912 to 1918 Calkins was Stewardship Secretary of the Committee on Finance of the church, and served as Stewardship Editorial Director of the Missionary Centenary in 1919-20. He returned to the foreign mission field for the next nine years, teaching for two years in schools in CHINA, and then returning to India until 1929.

Calkins was Secretary of the Laymen's Economic Fellowship (1929-31) and Director of Stewardship for the Board of EDUCATION (1932-36). Calkins published eight books, two of them on Christian stewardship. He died Feb. 16, 1941.

CALLAO, PERU. Colegio America is a Methodist school in Callao founded in 1891 by THOMAS B. WOOD of ARGENTINA. Wood began the school almost immediately after his arrival in Peru. Finding no public education, he started his high school with six pupils. It was first called Callao High School, a name continued until recently.

The school was intended to provide bilingual education to young people of low-income families in Callao, port city to LIMA. During its seventy-five-year history it has gained prestige among the leading schools of Peru. In 1965 it had a faculty of fifty-four and 947 pupils—600 in the elementary department and 347 in high school. The regular high-school course prepares for entrance to Peruvian universities, and there is a three-year commercial course to train bilingual secretaries for positions in business.

During most of its history Colegio America was administered by missionaries, but about the middle 1950's the balance in administration and faculty began to swing toward Peruvians. In 1966 the director, CARLOS CARASCO, and principal of the elementary department, Carmela Silva de Diaz, were both Peruvians.

With a combination of funds raised locally and mission gifts from the U.S.A., a complex of modern buildings has been erected on the campus near the Bella Vista plaza. The school has been coeducational except for 1940-50, when the Ministry of Education prohibited co-educational classes.

CALL TO THE MINISTRY. (See MINISTERIAL CALL.)

CALLAWAY, MORGAN (1831-1899), American minister and educator, was born at Washington, Ga., April 16, 1831, the second son of Jesse and Mary (Wooten) Callaway. He was educated in the schools at Washington and Athens, Ga. Converted in a revival at Athens, Callaway first joined the Baptist Church, but soon transferred to the M. E. Church, South. He read law and was admitted to the bar in Augusta but because his father did not favor that vocation, he turned to teaching.

In 1860, while president of Andrew Female College, Cuthbert, Ga., Callaway was admitted on trial in the GEORGIA CONFERENCE. At the first Confederate call to arms, he volunteered and served throughout the Civil War, most of the time in VIRGINIA. As a captain in Cutt's Battalion, he was wounded in action. Though still listed as in the army when the Georgia Conference met in January, 1865, Callaway was received into full connection at that session. He was ordained deacon in November, 1865, and elder in December, 1866, and at both sessions was appointed to Washington, Ga., where, in addition to serving the church, he taught school. His first wife, Leila Hinton, died there, and on June 24, 1868, he married Georgi Frances Ficklen.

From 1867 to 1871, Callaway was appointed to LA GRANGE FEMALE COLLEGE, the first two years as a professor and the last two as president. From there he went to EMORY COLLEGE where he taught English literature, linguistics, and etymology. He was a great favorite with the students, because, it was said, he gave no grade lower than 97. In 1882, at the urging of ATTICUS G. HAYGOOD, Callaway left Emory and became the first president of PAINE COLLEGE, the Methodist school for Negroes at Augusta. Two years later he returned to Emory as a professor. Among Callaway's writings were his essays on The Education of Women, Art and Women, The Aesthetics of Literature, and Christian Communism. Throughout his life Callaway was devoted to Christian higher education. Since his contemporaries called him "Doctor," presumably Emory College awarded him the D.D. degree. He died Jan. 16, 1899.

CALVERT, JAMES (1812-1892), British missionary pioneer to FIJI, was born at Pickering, Yorkshire, and apprenticed to a printer and bookseller at Malton. Converted in 1831, he began preaching two years later, and his interest was captured by the work in the South Seas. After training as a printer, he gained admission to a LONDON hospital to equip himself more usefully, and after training at Hoxton Theological Academy was designated for Fiji with Thomas Jaggard and JOHN HUNT. He remained in Fiji from 1838 until 1855, returning again in 1860-64. His wife Mary was a staunch helper; she and Mrs. Richard Lyth, when both missionary husbands were absent, stopped the last cannibal feast in Fiji. The Calverts worked in SOUTH AFRICA at Kimberley and Potchefstroom from 1872-80. Mrs. Calvert died soon after returning to England, but Calvert revisited TONGA and FIJI in 1885, then touring and speaking widely in AUSTRALIA and America. He died at Hastings, March 8, 1892.

CALVIN, JOHN (1509-1564), the great theologian of FRANCE, SWITZERLAND and Central Europe, who exerted an enormous influence upon all subsequent Protestant thought. The system of doctrine which he taught and which is set forth in his Institutes soon came to be known as Calvinism, and as such, as well as through his other writings and personal leadership has greatly influenced the Christian world from his time to the present. There is an enormous literature dealing with Calvin and Calvinism, to which reference may be made for those wishing a more detailed study.

Particular interest and import for Methodism was the doctrinal conflict between Methodism and Calvinism, especially in the early days of the Methodist movement. The reader is referred to the CALVINISTIC CONTROVERSY for an analysis of the basic area of conflict; and to the life of GEORGE WHITEFIELD, to that of Selina, COUNTESS OF HUNTINGDON, as well as ROWLAND HILL, AUGUSTUS TOPLADY, and others who were strict Calvinists; and to the writings of JOHN WESLEY himself, who from time to time discussed and set forth his own differences with the Calvinistic teachings. See also the article on JACOB ARMINIUS for the basic differences between Arminianism which Methodism eventually came to espouse and Calvinism as set forth by its champions. (See also DOCTRINAL STANDARDS OF METHODISM.)

N. B. H.

CALVINISTIC CONTROVERSY IN AMERICAN METHODISM. In his important letter "To the Preachers in America," Oct. 3, 1783, JOHN WESLEY warned: "Undoubtedly the greatest danger to the work of God in America is likely to arise . . . from preachers . . . speaking perverse things, or bringing in among you new doctrines, particularly Calvinism. . . ." The American Wesleys proved quite faithful in maintaining a diligent watch over their doctrinal relations at this point. In their address to the subscribers for Volume 1 of the Arminian Magazine, 1789, Bishops COKE and ASBURY summarized Methodism's concern in this manner:

We are not ignorant that the Gospel has been preached in the eastern and northern parts of these United States, from the earliest settlement of the country; but this has been done chiefly, though not entirely, through the Calvinistic medium: the consequence of which has been, that the religious books in general which have been circulated in those parts, and in some measure through the southern states, have more or less maintained the doctrines of unconditional election and reprobation—that "GOD is" not "loving to every man" and that "his mercy is" not "over all his works;" and consequently, that "Christ did" not "die for all," but only for a small select number of mankind: by the means of which opinions, Antinomianism has insensibly gained ground, and the great duties of self-denial, mortification, crucifixion to the world, and all the other severe but essentially necessary duties of religion have been too much neglected and despised.

According to NATHAN BANGS, American Methodism's chief historian in the early nineteenth century, it was the activity of the "Charitable Society for the Education of Pious Young Men for the Ministry . . ." which brought a new wave of public controversy to the fore. Organized shortly after 1810 by the new American Board of Commissioners (Congregationalist and Presbyterian), the "Charitable Society" drew attention to the shortage of competent ministers in the rapidly expanding western settlements. The considerable extent of Methodist work in these sections—through preachers, people, and books—was taken as a matter for alarm, occasioning among Methodists a renewed effort "to rescue our institutions from reproach. . . ."

It was as a result of participating in a revival on the Albany circuit (Durham, 1809) that Bangs himself was challenged to public debate by local pastors of "the established order." Subsequently, one of the pastors (Seth Williston) published a volume of Sermons . . . (1812) which included a number of reflections on the thought and character of the Methodist ministers. Bangs' reply to Williston was entitled The Errors of Hopkinsianism (1815), for he recognized Williston as a representative of those transitions in Calvinistic doctrines which were becoming increasingly dominant in the early nineteenth century. The exchange continued, with Williston's Vindication of Some of the Most Essential Doctrines of the Reformation (1817) and Bangs' The Reformer Reformed (1818).

Interestingly enough, it was in another defensive essay—entitled An Examination of the Doctrine of Predestination . . . (1817)—that Bangs questioned the adequacy of the term "Arminian" as a designation for Methodism's doctrinal position, since many "who have been denominated Arminians, have not always owned their doctrine sufficiently with divine grace. . . ."

Actually, it was WILBUR FISK, the first president of WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY in Middletown, Conn. (1830-39), whose theological reflections on revisionist Calvinism gained the most significant attention within early nineteenth-century American Methodism. His Discourse on Predestination and Election (1830), delivered as a sermon in Greenwich, Mass., received a number of critical reviews in New England publications—most notably, from E. T. Fitch, of Yale University, in the Quarterly Christian Spectator. In response, Fisk wrote a series of essays for the Christian Advocate and Journal, subsequently published (1837) under the title of Calvinistic Controversy, which surveyed the changes taking place within the Calvinistic system in American religious thought.

Fisk was especially critical of that interpretation traditionally associated with the influence of Jonathan Edwards, which saw man's free agency as circumscribed by the complex influence of motive control (and, of course, subject to the Divine decrees). Such a position implied a passivity of mind which was contradictory to that "power of spontaneous moral action" which was considered the only valid ground of man's responsibility. In their opposition to the type of "necessitarianism" which they discerned in the Edwardean-Calvinist tradition (supported, as the attempt was, by appeals to Locke and Leibnitz), American Methodists such as Fisk and Bangs (and ASA SHINN) responded by appealing to such elements of anti-necessitarianism as were to be found in the philosophic writings of Reid, Beattie, Stewart, and T. C. Upham.

Fisk's consideration of the problems of moral agency did not, however, overlook the effect of sin—and of GRACE—upon man's "power of choosing good or evil." As a matter of fact, he continued, "the faculties that are essential to mind have become corrupted . . . so as to render man utterly incapable of a right choice without prevention and cooperating grace." In their doctrine of a restorative preventive grace—thus, a "gracious ability" to respond to the gracious call of repentance and saving belief—Fisk and his American Wesleyan contemporaries felt they were speaking to a critical weak spot in the Calvinistic discussions (wherein Calvinism found itself limited to the options of a monergistic passivity of the moral self, or a synergistic activity of the natural self in relation to the work of grace). In his Examination of . . . New Divinity (1839), intended as a supplement to Fisk's studies, Francis Hodgson observed that the uniqueness of "evangelical Arminianism" at this point was clearly recognized by certain of the theologians within "New-England Calvinism."

Subsequent nineteenth-century critiques of Edwardean "necessity"—representing Methodist sponsorship or authorship—included A. T. BLEDSOE'S Theodicy (1853), RANDOLPH FOSTER'S Objections to Calvinism as It is . . . (1849), and DANIEL WHEDON'S Freedom of the Will as a Basis of Human Responsibility (1864). The appeal in such writings, increasingly, was to the testimony of the consciousness (and "the moral sense") and its relevance for a doctrine of essential self-causality (i.e., man's own spontaneous, originative volitional agency). As the prolific and controversial editor of the Methodist Quarterly Review from 1856 to 1884, Whedon's unique emphasis on Methodism's "Arminianism"—as the "theology of freedom"—served to sustain the anti-Calvinistic self-understanding within nineteenth century American Methodism. Even Whedon's Commentary on the New Testament (first of five volumes issued in 1860) was written specifically to offset the Calvinistic perspective ("Augustinian exposition") of commentaries such as "Barnes, Hodge, Stuart, and Schaff's Lang."

Interestingly, enough, the arbitrary disjunctions drawn by Whedon between the theological anthropology of Calvinism and Arminianism—and his appeal to man's unequivocal consciousness of possessing a "power of contrary choice"—were rejected by DANIEL CURRY, an editorial colleague of some note within the M. E. Church (editor, for instance, of The Christian Advocate, at New York, from 1864 to 1876). On the other hand, Whedon's work on the Will was considered as "simply grand and unanswerable" by THOMAS O. SUMMERS—the leading nineteenth-century theologian with the M. E. Church, South (general book editor from 1850 to 1878, and dean and professor of systematic theology in the Biblical Department at VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY from 1875 to 1882).

One of the most perceptive and independent of American Methodism's commentators on the Calvinistic issues was WILLIAM FAIRFIELD WARREN, who became the first president of BOSTON UNIVERSITY (in 1873). In an early article on "Arminius" (Methodist Quarterly Review, 1857), Warren insisted that the error of "the Predestinarians (and especially the Calvinists)" lay in their unjustified rejection of the Church's historic position that every exercise of the Divine efficiency (in the production of temporal phenomena) was subjectively conditioned; Arminius' significance lay in his systematic restatement of this tradition. Actually, Warren continued, revisionist Calvinism as found in New England ("Edwardean," "New Divinity") was remarkably akin to "original Arminianism" in its distinction of certainty from necessity, in its stress on the active and voluntary nature of sin and holiness, in its understanding of atonement as governmental, in its limitation of obligation to ability, etc. (see his article on "Theology, New England," published in 1881 in McClintock and Strong's Cyclopedia. . .). Warren, however, also noted the "radical difference" between New England theology and Arminianism in the former's doctrine that salvation is dependent upon sovereign divine election and in its consideration of human ability "apart from the gracious aids of the Holy Spirit."

One of American Methodism's leading theological scholars toward the latter part of the nineteenth century was JOHN MILEY, who succeeded Randolph Foster in the chair of systematic theology at DREW THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY in 1872. His Atonement in Christ (1879) and Systematic Theology (1892-94) became widely influential, and marked something of a culmination of the tendency to define Methodism—theologically—by way of its explicit opposition to Calvinistic doctrine. The fundamental point at issue, insisted Miley (with Whedon) was Calvinism's acceptance of universal Adamic guilt. Such a position must be countered by the insistence (not as with earlier Wesleyans, and contemporaries such as Warren, that such guilt had been resolved through the universality of redemptive grace, but) that the sole ground of guilt was free personal agency; the latter position was nothing other than "consistent Arminianism" (Arminius himself would have affirmed universal Adamic guilt, though not all who have called themselves Arminians would do so).

The ultimate effect of the influential writing of men such as Daniel Whedon and John Miley (anticipated in Nathan Bangs, Asa Shinn, and Wilbur Fisk, and elaborated by A. T. Bledsoe, MINER RAYMOND, D. C. KELLEY and others) was a major reorientation of Methodist theology in terms of the emphasis on a highly nominalistic doctrine of moral responsibility (limited in terms of an unequivocal doctrine of the will's freedom of contrary choice). The corporate tradition of Methodism's dialectical opposition to Calvinism (as with Whedon, "Freedomism" versus "Necessitarianism")—together with a century-long effort to counter the revisionist claims of New England Calvinism as affecting moral agency—must be seen as the primary determinants in such a transitional development.

In his Theological Transition in American Methodism (1965), Robert Chiles has extended the study of American Methodism's theological stance into the twentieth century—especially attending to the philosophical-theological emphases of ALBERT KNUDSON (at Boston University's School of Theology for over three decades following 1906). Knudson enhanced the influence of the philosophy of "Personalism" within American Methodism—a philosophy which in some important respects may be seen as a phase still further in dialectical reaction to philosophies and theologies of determinism; certainly Knudson's defense of "metaphysical freedom"—the "libertarian viewpoint"—(over against "naturalistic necessitarianism") was reminiscent of nineteenth-century emphases within American Methodism.

The effort to reassess the proper theological meaning and relevance of the Wesleyan tradition—and its inter-relationships within the larger context of Reformation theology (including Calvinism)—has proved to be the unique emphasis of mid-twentieth century historical studies within American Methodism. Beginning most notably with GEORGE CELL's The Rediscovery of John Wesley (1935), this research has included the efforts of Methodist scholars such as DAVID SHIPLEY ("Methodist Arminianism in the Theology of John Fletcher," unpublished dissertation, Yale, 1942), ROBERT CUSHMAN ("Salvation for All: Wesley and Calvinism," in Methodism, edited by William Anderson, 1947), WILLIAM R. CANNON (The Theology of John Wesley, 1946), Franz Hildebrandt (From Luther to Wesley, 1951), Colin Williams (John Wesley's Theology Today, 1960), and ALBERT OUTLER (John Wesley, 1964). In addition to the study already named by Robert Chiles, the theological transitions within American Methodism have been the particular object of studies by John L. Peters (Christian Perfection in American Methodism, 1956), Leland Scott ("Methodist Theology in America in the Nineteenth Century," unpublished dissertation, Yale, 1954), William J. McCutcheon ("Theology of the Methodist Episcopal Church during the Interwar Period, 1919-1939," unpublished dissertation, Yale, 1960), and essays by Scott, McCutcheon, and GERALD McCULLOCH in the three-volume History of American Methodism (1964). Of relevant interest, also, are the Historical Papers read at the BICENTENNIAL OF AMERICAN METHODISM in Baltimore, April, 1966. (See COOK-JAMIESON DEBATE for illustrative incident.)

CALVINISTIC METHODISTS were first denominated such in England when this term was generally applied to those who as Methodists began to adopt Calvinistic principles. GEORGE WHITEFIELD, himself, who was one of the members of the HOLY CLUB and a co-worker of the Methodists, became Calvinistic in his theology and differed strongly from JOHN WESLEY in his view of God's complete sovereignty over the will of man.

The term Calvinistic Methodist also came to be the name of a definite group in England and in Wales for some years during the last part of the eighteenth and first years of the nineteenth century. (See also WALES and WELSH CALVINISTIC METHODISM.)

GIRLS DORMITORY, PINSON COLLEGE

CAMAGUEY, Cuba. Colegio Pinson was one of the oldest educational institutions of Methodism in CUBA. Originally it was called Colegio Ingles, but was changed to Pinson in honor of W. W. PINSON. Organized in 1903 at Calle Republica 50, Camaguey by B. F. GILBERT, it was moved to an American colony at nearby Bartle. But soon after the Camaguey Electric Company made an attractive offer of two blocks in the Zambrana suburb of Camaguey, with five houses built as homes for their Canadian employees. The city also offered concessions of utilities, and the school came back to Camaguey.

The directors were B. F. Gilbert and J. P. LANCASTER, 1903-10; BEN O. HILL, 1910-29; O. K. HOPKINS, 1910-12; Harry McNeil, 1922; GARFIELD EVANS, 1929; E. E. CLEMENTS, 1929-31; CECIL V. MORRIS, 1931-34; Lorenzo Verdecia, 1934; Carlos Perez Ramos, 1935-38; J. G. Board, 1938-43; MOISES BOUDET, 1943-57; Jose Blanco, 1957-60; E. C. Morgado, 1960-61.

The school had a notable existence because of its thorough teaching and the fact that it maintained a separate English department in all grades. Colegio Pinson, as well as other church schools in Cuba, was taken over by the Castro regime when it came into power a few years ago.

In 1952 when a former director, Ben O. Hill, revisited the school, a banquet was given in his honor with 200 former students in attendance. It was Methodism's first coeducational boarding school in a radius of 300 miles. Its fame was such that any student was sufficiently recommended by saying he was a graduate of Pinson.

The school had two financial disasters. One in the 1920 nation-wide bank failures when all the contributed funds for imperative new buildings were lost. Again when the school provisionally loaned to BRAZIL its share of the allotment of the centenary movement funds. Neither of the amounts was recovered.

In 1932 a hurricane struck the Camaguey coast from the south. It took a toll of 3,000 lives in Santa Cruz del Sur, and Pinson lost five buildings. Yet, not a single student was injured and several hundred people in addition to the students were saved in the new administration building.

CAMAK, DAVID ENGLISH (1880-1967), American minister, educator, and author, was born July 26, 1880, in Fairfield County, S. C. He graduated in 1903 from WORFORD COLLEGE, where he also received the honorary D.D. degree in 1919. Ordained soon after graduating, he was admitted to the SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE and immediately sought with success a factory area assignment for close church and community contact with working people. He held many pastorates in the South Carolina and WESTERN NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCES, retiring from pastoral work in 1946.

Best known as the founder in 1911 of the Textile Industrial Institute at Spartanburg, he opened the school with one student and $100 borrowed money in a borrowed building. He moved the school a year later to another borrowed building and enrolled seventy-five students. In 1913 the Institute came to occupy its present site at Spartanburg where it has more than 600 students and thirty instructors. In 1942 the name was changed to SPARTANBURG JUNIOR COLLEGE. During the school's difficult early years when some suggested that he close it, Camak said he would continue "because God can't use a quitter." He retired as President in 1923.

Camak married Lottie Blair, Oct. 8, 1903, and they had three children. Known as "Daddy Camak" to thousands of graduates, he moved to Greer, S. C. after retiring and died there Jan. 25, 1967.

His published works include a novel and a history of Spartanburg Junior College.

CAMARGO, JOSÉ MEDEIROS DE (1898-1938,) Brazilian lay preacher, teacher, and electrical engineer, was born in Santa Rita de Passa Quatro, state of São Paulo, in 1898. His parents moved to Avaré, São Paulo, when he was a boy. After primary studies he graduated from the normal school in Campinas. He married Else Rocha, and they had four children—Paulo, Rita, Joao, and Helio. Camargo taught for a while in Rezende, state of RIO DE JANEIRO; then he moved to JUIZ DE FORA, state of Minas Gerais, where he studied electrical engineering and afterwards taught at Instituto GRANBERY.

Deciding later to practice engineering, he moved to São Paulo where he invented and patented an electric generator much used in rural areas. He also taught mathematics and Portuguese at Mackenzie College, now a university, a Presbyterian institution.

Camargo devoted himself to the cause of public literacy, becoming vice-president of the Bandeira Paulista de Alfabetizacao (São Paulo Literacy Campaign) and traveling to scores of cities to push literacy projects. On Sundays he preached with fervor in whatever evangelical church was at hand.

He died in São Paulo in 1938 at the age of forty. He was a witnessing layman dedicated to his Lord and the church.

ISNARD ROCHA

CAMBRIDGE, England. Although JOHN WESLEY preached in a number of villages around Cambridge (he claimed that there were four thousand people in his congregation at Meldreth, ten miles away, and ten thousand at Shel-ford, five miles distant), he never preached in Cambridge itself. The nearest he came to doing so was at Grantchester, a village within easy walking distance of the town, where he "was sorry" that the "gentlemen" (university undergraduates) did not come to hear him. Indeed, his opinion of Cambridge and its university, as revealed in his Journal and letters, was anything but complimentary: he wrote of "miserable roads," and described Samuel Furley's tutor as "a dunce."

The first mention of Methodist activities in Cambridge is in the Journal of Thomas Story, a Quaker friend of William Penn. Story died in 1742, only four years after Wesley's "evangelical conversion," but in 1739 he wrote a letter to James Logan, legal representative of William Penn in Pennsylvania, concerning "the young men at Cambridge called Methodists"; telling of their open-air preaching, their prison visiting, and the persecution they received at the instigation of the clergy of the Established Church.

The activities of the "HOLY CLUB" at Oxford are well known, but few realize that there was a similar movement a generation later at Cambridge. Based on the principles of the former, of which, of course, Wesley himself was the leader, this emulatory movement was led by ROWLAND HILL, an undergraduate of St. John's College and son of Sir Rowland Hill. He was also brother to Richard Hill, who made a name for himself by opposing his brother Rowland and by publishing an attack on Wesley in his pamphlet A Review of the Doctrines Taught by the Rev. Mr. John Wesley.

This Cambridge "Holy Club" caused a "great stir" in the university in 1767. They preached in the open-air, notoriously in the village of Chesterton, and before the gates of Cambridge Castle. These activities incensed the university authorities who determined to "stamp out" this "enthusiasm." Some of the "Club" members were expelled, Rowland Hill himself only escaping a like fate because he was the son of an influential father. He was, however, subjected to various restrictions, and when he left the university in 1769 the movement died.

It was not until 1798 that there was Methodist preaching again in the town. A layman named Pinder walked from Thetford in Norfolk on an evangelical preaching tour, and eventually came to Cambridge. Although he was a Methodist and made no attempt to hide the fact, he was cared for in the home of the minister of the Baptist chapel at Harston, a village some four miles outside the town. This was remarkable at a time when there was extreme bitterness between the denominations. From Harston, Pinder walked each day into Cambridge to preach, but only small success attended his efforts, and the few who attached themselves to him gradually drifted away. He returned to Norfolk, but came back again at a later date, and this time achieved better results. This visit saw the beginnings of the establishment of Wesleyan Methodism in the town.

Pinder's first "meeting house" was in a "hired room" at an inn called "The Brazen Organ." Part of the stables of the inn, unsanitary and unclean, the room overhung the putrid waters of the town ditch, from which noxious smells penetrated through the floor.

The first real chapel was erected in Fitzroy Street, built by the members of the young society in their own time and with their own hands, with materials paid for by sacrificial giving out of their meager earnings. The work was superintended by William Beacock. It was to this chapel that James Mole, the first WESLEYAN METHODIST minister to reside in Cambridge, was appointed; and it was in this building, in after years, that Gipsy (RODNEY) SMITH, later to become a world-famous evangelist, sought and found the Grace of God.

Missionary zeal entered into the hearts of the Cambridge Wesleyans, and other preaching places were established in the town. Cottage meetings were held, and, as time went on, more chapels were erected. Their first venture into property ownership, after the building of the Fitzroy Street chapel, was the purchase of a building in Green Street from Independent Congregationalists. After a time this became inadequate for their needs, and an entirely new chapel was erected in Hobson Street. None of these buildings remain today, the oldest Wesleyan Methodist building still in use in the town being the one on Hills Road, which stands upon the site of a temporary building erected in 1866.

Wesley Church, on Christ's Pieces, took the place of the Hobson Street chapel, and was built particularly for work among the undergraduates and members of the university. This work has flourished through the years, and each succeeding generation adds to the number of men and women all over the world who have memories of their association with Methodism in this place.

While Wesleyan Methodism expanded in Cambridge itself, it spread also to the surrounding district. Evangelistic labors of devoted ministers and laymen resulted in societies being formed and chapels being built in a number of villages. The Cambridge Wesleyan Methodist Circuit was originally formed from Bury St. Edmunds, but in time geographical considerations required its division, and other circuits, Saffron Walden and Cottenham, were formed from parts of it. After METHODIST UNION it assumed its present formation, with six chapels in the town of Cambridge and fifteen in the surrounding villages.

Primitive Methodism. The introduction of PRIMITIVE METHODISM into Cambridge did not take place until 1831. In that year Joseph Reynolds, a Primitive Methodist preacher, was sent from Tunstall in Staffordshire to begin the evangelization of East Anglia, with his center in Cambridge. The privations, hardships, opposition and ill treatment which he endured as he walked three-quarters of the way across England to reach his destination are almost beyond belief! His arrival in Cambridge was no more pleasant, he being forced to feed upon cold cabbage which he took from a field, and to sleep under a haystack until he was able to establish himself in the town.

After a severe struggle, during which he was subjected to open opposition and even personal injury, often inflicted by some of the undergraduates inspired by the local clergy, his preaching began to show results. He formed a society at Barnwell, which, however, was short lived; but at Castle End he had better results. There a cottage was purchased which his followers turned into a chapel, the site of which is incorporated in the buildings of the Castle Street chapel today.

In 1855 the Primitive Methodists purchased the Fitzroy Street chapel from the Wesleyans, and then began a tremendous surge of evangelism on their part. They went out preaching into all the villages for miles around, often poaching on ground where societies had already been established by the Wesleyans. It must be admitted that much of their enthusiasm was misplaced, showing more of the spirit of competition, if not opposition, than co-operation. In the town of Cambridge they built several chapels, and in the country villages they hired rooms and erected buildings as they were able to do so. There can be no doubt that they over-reached themselves, both physically and financially. Many were the disappointments they suffered, and it is clear that if they had been content to consolidate their work in a few places, they would have had greater success.

The Wesleyan and Primitive Methodist Circuits of Cambridge united in 1936, and the Cottenham Wesleyan Circuit joined the amalgamation in 1952.

Leys School. The Founder of Methodism laid particular stress upon the desirability of acquiring as good an education as possible. When the universities of Oxford and Cambridge removed the theological tests, it became possible for young Nonconformists to enter upon a career at these universities, and to take advantage of prior preparation at a public school. This public school is situated at the south end of the city on an estate bought there in 1875. Its founders were leading Wesleyan Methodists who wanted to form a Christian but nonsectarian boarding school, and to provide greater contact between Methodism and the university. The school was incorporated as a Charitable Trust in 1878 and accommodates about 390 boys. The school was closely connected with Methodism in its early days: the first headmaster was WILLIAM FIDDIAN MOULTON, an outstanding Classical scholar; his son, JAMES HOPE MOULTON, was one of the first sixteen boys to attend the school, and after he had entered the Wesleyan ministry in 1886, he taught there for sixteen years, leaving to become a professor at Manchester University. It was in this period that the Leysian Mission was founded, a London settlement started in 1886 and moved to its present premises in City Road, London, in 1902. Senior boys visit this Settlement from time to time. The school still has a Methodist chaplain, but the school is not a connexional one, nor in any sense is it under the authority of the Methodist Conference.

JOHN EDWARDS

Wesley House. Another academic institution which Methodism established in Cambridge is Wesley House, a theological college for the training of its ministers. From a resolution moved at the Wesleyan Methodist Conference of 1911 by Michael Gutteridge, there has grown a work which through the years has been of inestimable benefit to the ministry and the church. Within a few years of its opening it became apparent that this was a nonconformist theological college quite different from any of its contemporaries; it not only retained the best features of a denominational seminary, but also benefited from all the intellectual influences of the university. The students were encouraged to attend the lectures of all the divinity professors, Anglican, Congregationalist, as well as Methodist, and they thereby developed a world-wide vision of catholicity. Today this is even more evident: not only does Wesley House have students from other denominations, but also from other countries.

Present-day Methodism. While deeply concerned with the work in the Circuit, Cambridge Methodism realizes that it holds a unique place in the world church, consequent upon so many men and women from all over the world coming to study in the university. For this reason particular stress is placed upon the work among the undergraduate population of the town, and a re-arrangement of ministerial responsibility has lately made it possible for extra ministers to be set aside for this particular work.

CAMBRIDGE, WISCONSIN, U.S.A., was the site of the first Scandinavian Methodist church in the world, as well as the first such church in Wisconsin, and one of the pioneer churches of that section of the country. It is presently called Willerup Methodist Church in honor of the great Dane, CHRISTIAN EDVARD B. WILLERUP, who had so much to do with the planning of Methodism in DENMARK, and with organizing Scandinavian mission work in America.

In the spring of 1850 the ROCK RIVER CONFERENCE sent C. Peter Agrelius as a missionary to the Norwegian people in Wisconsin. He had heard about the inflow of Norwegian emigrants into this region and came to preach Christ to them. For several weeks he held meetings in schoolhouses and homes near Cambridge with wonderful success. Then he moved on to other Scandinavian settlements, as he had adopted the whole state as his field. Shortly after he left, the Methodist BOARD OF MISSIONS at NEW YORK CITY received a call from Cambridge, asking for a man who could preach in Norwegian. Christian Willerup, a Dane who was an ordained minister in the GENESEE CONFERENCE, accepted the call and was transferred to the Wisconsin Conference. He preached his first sermon in Cambridge in November 1850. In one of his reports he wrote, "Not a day passes when I am at home but there are ten to twenty persons coming to me about their spiritual needs." In April 1851, after less than five months of service, he was able to organize the church with fifty-two members, and on May 3 it was incorporated at Madison, Wis.

Then they felt the need of a church home. Willerup planned a stone church, 44 by 65 feet, that would cost over $4,000. He took a subscription and got only $400 in cash and $300 in work, beside the lot for the church and cemetery, but he went ahead and laid the cornerstone. Farmers hauled the stone and the walls were built. Then the funds ran low and he went to New York, appealing to the Board of Missions for help to complete his church, but he did not get very much from them. At that time Jenny Lind, the famous Swedish singer, was touring America, and she sent $200 for the building fund. That fall Willerup mortgaged his own horse and buggy and some of the members mortgaged their farms in order to complete the building. However the interior was not completed and furnished until the following year. It was dedicated in the early summer of 1852.

Down through the years the church has been in continuous operation. It has had fifty pastors, some of whom became prominent in Scandinavian Methodism. Thirty-five years after its organization, this church acquired a beautiful tract of land at Lake Ripley, which it named "Willerup Bible Park," now famous for its institutes. Fifty years after its organization this church spent $4,000 for remodeling and new furniture, and on its eightieth anniversary it installed a modern $3,000 pipe organ.

Knute Nelson, U.S. senator from MINNESOTA and state governor, was reared in this church. The famous Norwegian violinist, Ole Bull, once gave a concert in the Cambridge church, and while many pious Methodists then considered "the fiddle" as an instrument of the devil, the church was filled.

Seven of the former pastors are buried in the cemetery beside the church. In 1970 Willerup Church, the mother church of Scandinavian Methodism, had 181 members and its property was valued at $273,500.

CAMDEN, NEW JERSEY, U.S.A., population 117,159, is a large city of southern NEW JERSEY across the Delaware River from PHILADELPHIA. Camden was incorporated as a city in 1851, but long before that time—in 1809—under the direction of Richard Sneath, a class of seven members was formed with James Duer, a member of St. GEORGE'S CHURCH at Philadelphia, as leader. At this time Camden was known as Billy Cooper's Ferry.

Camden is first mentioned in the conference minutes of 1811, when there were 190 members and John Wilson was pastor. It was constituted as one charge with Burlington in 1812. Then the name "Camden" disappeared from the minutes until 1825, when again the name disappeared, not to appear until 1828 when Edwin Stout was pastor. In 1829 Camden was connected with Gloucester Circuit when JACOB CRUBER and Richard Greenback were in charge.

The church, which came into being as the First Church of Camden, has had several buildings in different locations until it located at the present site at Sixth and Stevens Streets. Other churches in the city are Asbury, Bergen Square, Bethel, Broadway, Centenary Tabernacle, Fairview, Fairview Village, Ferry Avenue, Parkside, St. George-Wesley, and State Street.

CAMERON, DONALD 1877-1962), New Zealand layman, was born in Dunedin of Scottish parents, who had arrived there in 1861. He began work with the engineering firm of Reid and Gray in 1891, and in later years became the firm's chairman or directors. He was very active in public life, serving a term as mayor of St. Kilda (a Dunedin suburb) from 1910 to 1913, and two terms as mayor of Dunedin from 1944 to 1950. In the Province of Otago's centennial year, 1948, he was knighted by King George VI, as a recognition of his services to his native city. Cameron was actively interested in education and was a member both of the Otago Education Board and the Otago University Council.

He was an active member of DUNEDIN CENTRAL MISSION for fifty-five years, and for half of that time, he was circuit steward. For many years the Cameron family attended St. Kilda Church in the mornings and Central Mission in the evenings. His death, late in 1962, removed from our midst one of the finest laymen.

CAMP MEETING METHODISTS. On the borders of Staffordshire and Cheshire, the revivalism which marked the opening of the nineteenth century found expression under the guidance of HUGH BOURNE in field preaching and praying in the open air by CAMP MEETINGS after the American pattern, largely influenced by the advocacy of an American evangelist, LORENZO DOW. Disapproval of such methods by the Liverpool Conference of 1807 caused the Burslem Circuit to dissent from such new methods. Bourne was expelled from the Wesleyan Society in 1808 for his continued participation in this form of evangelism. Those associated with this enterprise became known as Camp-Meeting Methodists, though until 1810 they did not form a distinct community, but rather a mission band whose labors were auxiliary to those of the regular churches. A parallel situation arose at Tunstall, Staffordshire, where the part played by WILLIAM CLOWES in these meetings led to his expulsion with a few followers. This separated group became known as the CLOWESITES. These two groups made common cause in 1811, and the new denomination took the name of PRIMITIVE METHODISTS in February, 1812. CAMP MEETING MOVEMENT (in America). What was probably the first camp meeting to be held anywhere, was held in Logan County, Ky., near the Tennessee line, in July of 1800. The leading spirits in this meeting were two brothers, John and William McGee, John being a local preacher in the M. E. Church, and William, a Presbyterian minister in charge of a congregation in Sumner County, Tenn. These two brothers frequently held meetings together. In 1799 they attended a sacramental meeting held in the congregation of the Reverend Mr. McGready, a Presbyterian minister, on Red River in Logan County. The McGees and others preached and, as the meeting drew to its close, religious enthusiasm mounted to high tide and a number of people professed to be blessed. This meeting proved to be prophetic of the meetings that were to follow. In July, 1800, the McGees returned to Logan County to a location on Mud River three miles east of Russellville. Here thousands of people came together from far and near and encamped in the woods for several days and waited upon the ministry of the Word. Twenty years later, John McGee, in a letter to THOMAS L. DOUGLASS, PRESIDING ELDER of the NASHVILLE District, describes this memorable meeting and states that during its course about forty people were converted.

After this, camp meetings multiplied quickly. That held by the McGees in Logan County was soon followed by two others which reached yet larger proportions, one of them in Sumner County, Tenn., a little southeast of the Cumberland Ridge, and the other on Desha's Creek near the Cumberland River. The movement spread quickly both in KENTUCKY and TENNESSEE, until within a short time the whole of the wilderness country was aflame with revival fires, and, as multitudes were converted, its gradual moral transformation became apparent.

One of the most notable of the camp meetings of this early era was the meeting at Cane Ridge in Bourbon County, Ky., in August, 1801. The pastor of two congregations in Bourbon County, Concord and Cane Ridge, had himself witnessed the camp meeting scenes in Logan County, and returned to relate to his people the things which he had seen and heard. Their interest was aroused and the next summer they witnessed similar scenes themselves. Their meeting was not planned originally as a camp meeting, but as a sacramental one, but religious interest was so high at the time that people came from far and near, even from OHIO and Tennessee. The little meetinghouse could not hold the crowds, and so an adjournment to the woods became necessary. The Cane Ridge meetings gave strong impetus to the so-called Restoration Movement and the birth of the Church now known as the Disciples of Christ.

Frequently preachers of various denominations cooperated in the holding of camp meetings. A. H. REDFORD, the historian of Kentucky Methodism, says that, generally speaking, the Baptists were opposed to them, although there were individual Baptist preachers who were much interested, and who had a large part in the movement. The Presbyterians themselves soon abandoned this type of meeting, but the Methodists held to it. In 1801, WILLIAM MCKENDREE was appointed presiding elder of the Kentucky District. He saw the possible value in camp meetings and entered vigorously into the promotion of them. McKendree's district included all of Kentucky, Tennessee, and Ohio, a large part of VIRGINIA, and missions yet to be established in ILLINOIS, MISSISSIPPI and MISSOURI. Throughout this vast expanse of territory under McKendree's direction camp meetings spread. Bishop FRANCIS ASBURY likewise became committed to the camp meeting plan, and under his leadership such meetings were soon being promoted throughout the entire land. In 1808 he writes, "We shall have perhaps four or five hundred camp meetings this year." Following the leadership of Asbury and McKendree, the early presiding elders of American Methodism took an active part in the promotion of these meetings which Asbury used to call "our harvest seasons." Prior to 1830 it was common practice for presiding elders to schedule camp meetings in connection with their fourth QUARTERLY CONFERENCES.

A number of accounts have come down to us of these

Christian "feasts of Tabernacles" as Bishop HORACE DU-BOISE once termed them. People would come sometimes by the thousands from far and near, on horseback, on foot, and in wagons, bringing their household goods and provisions with them, and remain for eight to ten days or sometimes longer. PETER CARTWRIGHT, who was himself converted in a camp meeting, and who during the long years that he was a presiding elder frequently spent two or three months of the year in camp meetings, writes an interesting description: "The people would erect their camps with logs or frame them and cover them with clapboards or shingles. They would also erect a shed, sufficiently large to protect five thousand people from wind and rain, and cover it with boards or shingles, build a large stand, seat the shed, and here they would collect together from forty to fifty miles around, sometimes farther than that. Then, twenty, and sometimes thirty, ministers of different denominations would come together, and indeed I have known these meetings to last three or four weeks."

Religious emotion was at high tide during these meetings. Sudden and spectacular conversions were common. Barton W. Stone in writing of the camp meeting which he attended in Logan County says, "The scene baffled description. Many fell down as men slain in battle and continued for hours in an apparently breathless and motionless state, sometimes for a few minutes reviving and exhibiting symptoms of life by a deep groan or piercing shriek or a prayer for mercy fervently uttered. After lying there for hours they obtained deliverance. The gloomy cloud that had covered their faces seemed gradually and visibly to disappear, and hope in smiles brightened into joy. They would rise shouting deliverance and then would address the surrounding multitude in language truly eloquent and impressive."

This description tallies well with that given by others of these scenes and is fairly typical. Not infrequently these meetings were marked by excesses in the form of queer bodily manifestations, such as jerking, or dancing. Some early preachers and laymen discountenanced these, but others looked upon them as indications of being filled with the Spirit.

Naturally camp meetings came in for considerable criticism and the Methodists, being largely responsible for their promotion, received their full share of this. In the Journal of LORENZO DOW, an eccentric preacher of that day, there is an interesting defense of camp meetings. He first listed six common objections to them as follows: "1) The camp meetings represent too much time spent in vain; 2) By attendance upon such meetings health is exposed and injured; 3) The principal advocates of the camp meetings are the ignorant and illiterate Methodists; 4) The preachers are vehement, boisterous and ostentatious; 5) The solemn worship of God ought to be performed in houses dedicated to sacred use; 6) The exercises and engagements at such places are absurd, their opinions are enthusiastic, their practices are disgusting, and the whole business is intolerable." To all of which objections Dow makes answer both in the form of argument, and of oftentimes ingenuous appeal to Scripture.

But the camp meetings are to be tested finally by their fruits. Indeed they were unusually effective. In them multitudes were converted. Bishop Asbury mentions again and again in his Journal camp meetings where 100, 500 or 1,000 were converted, and where similar numbers entered into the experience of entire sanctification. With multitudes added to the church and with the spiritual level of the people called Methodists lifted to a high plane, Asbury wrote in his Journal, "Camp meetings have done this." The influence of the camp meetings and the revival did not stop with those who were directly reached. Communities as a whole felt their impact and in the West especially the moral tone of society was greatly improved.

As the nineteenth century wore on, camp meetings gradually fell into disuse. After the Civil War they were revived, and once again became somewhat popular. Some of these late nineteenth century camp meetings, especially where there is an established camp site, yet survive, but most of them are now so changed as to bear small resemblance to the original camp meeting.

Camp Meeting Sites. A number of camp meetings—meaning sites, property, or grounds upon which camp meetings are held—have become widely known, and some of these will be found described under their own names in this Encyclopedia. However, it is not possible even to list all the camp meetings which have been, or are at present, held by United Methodist conferences or other church groups. Certain rather famous and historic meeting places will be described and certain others may be mentioned in connection with present-day conference life and activity. See especially under MAINE to get a typical account of the influence of camp meetings past and present upon Methodist church life in one area. Quite a literature may be referred to for further information on the subject.

CAMP MEETINGS (British). The American camp meeting was introduced into England in 1807 by HUGH BOURNE and his Staffordshire associates, and the opposition of the WESLEYAN METHODIST Conference to the use of them was one of the causes of Bourne's expulsion and the formation of the PRIMITIVE METHODIST CONNECTION. Bourne was directly influenced by articles about American camp meetings in the Wesleyan Methodist Magazine and by LORENZO DOW. The camp meeting style of revivalism suited the largely rural population among which the Primitive Methodist movement started. In England, however, the meetings usually lasted only from dawn to dusk on a single day, commonly Saturday, and were concluded by a rally in the evening in the local chapel.

There are many descriptions of such gatherings in the early issues of the Primitive Methodist Magazine. Bourne wanted a system which was flexible and varied; he said that the sermons must be short, that companies of the faithful should be praying for conversions throughout the day. He borrowed camp-meeting songs from America, via Lorenzo Dow. He saw the camp meetings as an alternative to the great country fairs, or wakes.

The Wesleyan Methodists thought the camp meetings disorderly, disliked the way in which laymen predominated, and were afraid that the government, worried by the war with FRANCE, would suspect political undertones to these gatherings of very humble people. Despite the objections, however, some Wesleyan Methodist ministers tried the system, especially HODGSON CASSON. In the southwest the BIBLE CHRISTIANS did much of their early work through open-air preaching, but do not seem to have been attracted by camp meetings as such. In the second half of the nineteenth century Primitive Methodism became much more urban, and camp meetings dropped into the background, though some circuits still held them in the summer in the twentieth century. Revivalism, however, moved from the country to the city, and from the farm wagon to the enormous Agricultural Hall, Islington, London, where Moody and Sankey held their great London meetings in 1875.

CAMPBELL, JABEZ PITT (1815-1891), American bishop of the A.M.E. CHURCH, was born in Slaughter Neck, Del. on Feb. 5, 1815. In 1828 he fled from DELAWARE to PENNSYLVANIA to escape enslavement, only to be apprehended and sold in that state. His education was self acquired. He was converted in 1825, preached his first sermon in 1838, ordained deacon in 1841 and elder in 1843. Campbell served pastorates in Pennsylvania, New York, New Jersey, Maryland. He was also instrumental in opening A.M.E. work in the New England states. In 1864 he was elected fraternal delegate to the M. E. GENERAL CONFERENCE. He was elevated to the episcopacy in 1864 and served the First, Fifth, Third and Second Episcopal District Areas. He organized ten annual conferences and was the first A.M.E. bishop to visit HAITI. WILBERFORCE UNIVERSITY honored him with the D.D. degree. Campbell College, Jackson, Miss., was named for him, as were many churches in his connection. He died on Aug. 9, 1891, after serving as bishop for over twenty-seven years.

CAMPFOR, ALEXANDER PRIESTLY (1865-1919), American educator, missionary, and bishop, was born Aug. 9, 1865 in Soniat, Jefferson Parish, La. His mother gave him to Stephen Priestly to be educated. He attended Leland University, 1879-80, and New Orleans University, 1880-82. He received his theological training at GAMMON THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, 1893-95, and attended Union Theological Seminary and Columbia University, 1896, and the University of Chicago summer sessions, 1912 and 1914.

From 1889 to 1893, Alexander Camphor was professor of mathematics at New Orleans University. In 1895 he joined the DELAWARE CONFERENCE of the M. E. CHURCH and became pastor of the church at Germantown, Pa. In 1896 he was pastor of St. John's Church, Orange, N. J.

Feeling that he could best serve as a missionary to Africa, he went to LIBERIA in 1897 and served as President of the College of West Africa, MONROVIA, until 1907. He also served as United States vice-consul for Liberia. Returning to the U.S.A. in 1908, he became President of Central Alabama Institute at Birmingham. He remained in this post until 1916, when he was elected bishop for Africa and returned to Liberia.

Camphor was a highly respected and influential figure in the church in the early 1900's. He was a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCES of 1904 and 1912, attended the WORLD MISSIONARY CONFERENCE at Edinburgh in 1910, and was an active participant in the African Society, Freedmen's Aid Institution, and the Southern Sociological Congress. Continuing his deep interest in education, he served on the board of trustees of the two schools where he had been president. He was also the author of Missionary Story Sketches.

He died in Orange, N. J., on Dec. 11, 1919, and was buried in New Orleans, La.

CAMPOS, HIPOLITO DE OLIVEIRA (1848-1931), Brazilian preacher and ex-priest, was born in Pitangui, state of Minas Gerais. His parents, strict Roman Catholics, dedicated him early in life to the priesthood, sending him to the seminary in Diamantina, where he was ordained a priest. Because he was an outstanding, cultured, consecrated minister, and a fine speaker, he was sent to JUÍZ DE FORA, Minas Gerais, for the express purpose of combating Protestantism, especially the Methodists who had an active church and a much-appreciated educational institution (Instituto Granbery) in that city.

Padre Hipolito, as he was called, used pulpit, press, and all other possible means to fight the Methodists. These responded with the witness of their lives and arguments drawn from the Bible. On one occasion JOHN M. LANDER, principal of Instituto Granbery, presented him with a fine leather-bound Bible, which he promptly burned, saving the covers to be made into a pair of house slippers. As time passed and he became more and more interested, he decided to examine their arguments and the text of their Bible. He concluded that they were sincere and knew the Scriptures. Then the padre began listening in, though concealed in a next-door house, to the preaching of W. B. LEE, and he also began reading Nights with the Roman Catholics. He was truly converted and left the Roman Catholic Church on Feb. 1, 1900. He retired into the interior of the state, where he met and married Francisca Isaura de Franca. The two made their public profession of faith in the Methodist Church of Juíz de Fora, causing a sensation in Roman Catholic circles throughout the country.

Anxious how to preach the Gospel, Hipolito sought admission into the Methodist Conference and was received in full connection in 1903 [it was with a certain reluctance on the part of the Church due to his age and fear that he might not adjust to the itinerancy]. His ministry proved a rich one during twenty-one years of active and nine years of retired service. As an ex-priest he always drew large crowds; and for this same reason stirred up opposition and even personal persecution.

He not only preached but wrote and translated articles and leaflets, the most popular being Why I Left the Roman Church. His translations included John Wesley, His Life and Work, by Matthieu Lelievre, and Power from Prayer, by E. Bounden.

In 1926, after retirement, he was sent to Portugal on a specific evangelistic mission. He also preached in Paris and the Madeira Islands. He died in Rio de Janeiro on Aug. 30, 1931.

JOSÉ GONCALVES SALVADOR

CANADA. British North America, 1765 to 1883. LAWRENCE COUGHLAN, the first Methodist itinerant in the future Canada, began to preach at Conception Bay, Newfoundland, in 1765. Sixteen years later, WILLIAM BLACK, a Yorkshire immigrant, set out as a missionary to the scattered settlements of Nova Scotia. In 1790, WILLIAM LOSEE, a preacher in the newly formed M. E. Church of the United States, made an informal visit to the Loyalist communities near Kingston, Upper Canada. Casually, and without formal planning, the initial steps had been taken which would lead within a century to the establishment of the Methodist Church in Canada, a body whose 1,644 ministers and 169,803 members were spread across the nation and whose activities were a familiar and influential part of the Canadian scene.

The growth of Methodism in Canada between the last years of the American Revolution and the final decades of the nineteenth century reflected and embodied the external and internal pressures, the complexities and the dilemmas of the vast and diverse regions out of which this country has been built. Not surprisingly, therefore, the history of Methodism was characterized by tensions and by movements for consolidation, by persistent division between Methodism and society, and by a constant process of adaptation to the emerging Canadian community.

In the last years of the eighteenth century British North America was still a wilderness, interspersed, except in Quebec, with a few pockets of settlement. One hundred years later, much of Canada was still unsettled—many of its people were accessible only by sea, by trails, or by execrable roads. When the Methodist Church entered a wider fellowship in 1925, many of its adherents were still on the far frontiers, objects of missionary endeavor. In effect, Canadian Methodism was always confronted with a steadily growing but singularly intractable physical environment—one which called for the utmost devotion, and for the efficient deployment of available resources.

AS IN AUSTRALIA and the United States, the people who gradually filled up eastern Canada and eventually the enormous spaces of the western provinces were remarkably heterogeneous in origin and attitudes. Quebec (Lower Canada) had long been and would continue to be a French and Catholic province, with a small English-speaking, Protestant minority. The Maritime Provinces were settled by successive waves of New Englanders, Loyalists from the northern states, Presbyterian and Catholic Scots, and by Catholic Irish. Ontario (Upper Canada) received part of the Loyalist wave, principally from the western regions of the northern colonies, and it participated in the general advance of the midwestern frontier, but throughout the nineteenth century it experienced a large influx of immigrants from the United Kingdom, among whom Scots and Irish were most numerous. The western provinces, which did not begin to fill up until the latter part of the nineteenth century, had a substratum of settlers either from Britain or the older provinces, to which were added thousands of settlers from central and eastern Europe, and significant numbers from the plains states in America. Around the fringes of this developing mosaic hovered the aboriginal population—the nomadic Indians of eastern Canada, the settled Six Nations, the great tribes of the western plains, and the complex societies of the western coast. To many of these diverse groups, Methodism could never hope to minister successfully, unless, as was sometimes the case, they were so disoriented by new and strange conditions that they were receptive to any kind of religious teaching. Rather, Methodism could and did appeal most effectively to former Americans, the English, and the Irish. But awareness of the inherited antipathies and prejudices and of the different needs of Europeans and Indians imposed a premium on imaginative flexibility in the Methodist system and in Methodist teaching.

Two corollaries of these conditions were of crucial importance for Methodism, especially in the nineteenth century—one of these was characteristic of other developing churches; one was unique to the Canadian environment. The Methodist preachers were constrained, not only by the heterogeneity of their potential following, but also, and perhaps more importantly, by the necessity of reconciling the needs of relatively mature communities with those of scattered pioneer settlements. As in other societies, the emergence of towns and cities and the progressive strengthening of urban as opposed to rural interests produced a new climate of opinion in which teaching was more important than preaching, and reason more highly valued than emotion. For a religious organization to adapt itself to this kind of situation in a restricted area is relatively simple; to effect it in the context of a steadily expanding area, which has a rural vision of itself, is a delicate and often frustrating task.

To this normal source of tension in a maturing society must be added the interplay of metropolitan pressures to which the Canadian provinces were exposed. As British colonies living in close proximity to the dynamic United States, they were confronted constantly with the necessity of accepting either British or American models, or of effecting a satisfactory fusion of the two, a task complicated by the profound anti-Americanism of the Canadian ruling groups. To espouse the American example was a sure way to earn the accusation of disloyalty and hence of unsuitability. Positively, this tension created a determination to define Canadian interests and practices in Canadian terms, in itself an unrewarding pursuit, because so many Canadians were in a sense spiritual inhabitants of other realms often more imaginary than real.

To the simple, fervent men who first brought JOHN WESLEY'S teaching to British North America, the potential immensity and complexity of building a new church in a new land was fortunately not evident. For them, the little knots of settlers scattered over the face of Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, and Upper Canada were simply poor souls who faced the awful prospect, as one put it, of "dropping into Hell," and who must be made aware of the saving virtues of conversion and sanctification while there was yet time.

Although Coughlan lit a flame in Newfoundland which was not extinguished, William Black's decision to enter upon a missionary career was ultimately of much greater significance. Offspring of a Yorkshire Methodist family, converted characteristically at a private meeting, Black turned naturally to John Wesley for assistance in dealing with a mission field which began to expand dramatically after 1783. At Wesley's instance he hastened to BALTIMORE in 1784, where he attended the founding conference of the METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH. Spurred by THOMAS COKE, Wesley's special emissary, the conference approved the sending of volunteers to Nova Scotia, and thereby established Nova Scotia as a district in the American organization.

This association was severed in 1800, largely because the American conference was unable and unwilling to supply the increasing needs of an antipathetic community. In the interval, Methodism had begun to take root in several major centers: Halifax, Liverpool, Cumberland, Saint John, and St. Stephen. James and John Mann and DUNCAN MCCOLL, Loyalists all, had been recruited to the ministry, and under Black's direction had organized a rudimentary CONFERENCE, the CIRCUIT system, and SOCIETIES, according to the Wesleyan pattern. There were only 850 members, but they had some feeling of identity, a reputation for loyalty, and an abiding hostility to the New-Light congregations, so influential throughout Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

Isolated and weak as they were, the societies doubtless were gratified with Black's reception at the English conference, whose sessions he attended in 1800. His visit coincided with the burgeoning of missionary interest in the Wesleyan connexion, which would lead to the formation of the Missionary Committee and, in 1818, of the WESLEYAN MISSIONARY SOCIETY. Hence, the conference willingly dispatched the first four of many volunteers, who would make a distinct impact on the life of Maritime Methodism.

During the first three decades of the nineteenth century these societies faced the dual challenge of adaptation to English Methodism and of consolidation in an ever-expanding field of operations. The English missionary authorities were prepared to support their brethren only on their own terms, namely, the creation of an effective organization responsive to the rules established by them, and the modification of the societies' attitudes in accordance with the traditions of English Methodism. In practice, this involved the formation of regular circuits, the grouping of the circuits into districts, and the acceptance by the district meetings of the stationing and financial procedures laid down by the missionary secretaries. The insistence on centralization, however, was balanced by the encouragement of local initiative, but in such a way that in practice it was often inhibited.

The process of assimilation was facilitated by the gradual retirement of the original missionaries. After 1812, Black and his older colleagues were superseded by a new generation of preachers drawn from the English conference. Devoted men, who served Methodism well and in some cases for a generation or more, they were nevertheless more restrained in their preaching, more intent upon discipline, and more subservient to the existing alliance between government and the Church of England than their predecessors or their brethren in the United States and Upper Canada.

In contrast, the society in which the missionaries worked was developing rapidly, and continued to be hostile to their religious and political attitudes. Not only were the numbers of settlers steadily increasing, in pockets scattered throughout the three provinces, but many of them yearned for a simple, highly evangelical faith, and for a church which would not heed the liturgical, social, and political attitudes of the Church of England.

In short, the situation in the Maritime Provinces demanded a religious body with imaginative, exceedingly zealous local leadership. Since Methodism did not possess this attribute it grew slowly—between 1800 and 1825 the membership rose from some 800 to 2,200. The Methodist preachers and laity gained a reputation for orderly and unobtrusive piety, and for peaceful collaboration with authority in church and state.

While the Methodists in the Maritime Provinces were engaged in the painful process of finding their place among New-Lights, Anglicans, and Presbyterians, and of adapting themselves to the Wesleyan pattern, Methodism in Upper Canada advanced rapidly, but as it grew it was confronted with deepening hostility. Between 1790 and 1812 a succession of able itinerants, including DARIUS DUNHAM, WILLIAM LOSEE, NATHAN BANGS, HENRY RYAN and WILLIAM CASE, came to the province. With the encouragement of the NEW YORK and subsequently the GENESSEE CONFERENCES and the support of the bishops, circuits were established, societies formed, the CAMP MEETING and the regular forms of Methodist worship and discipline were introduced. By 1812 there were 3,418 Methodists in Upper and Lower Canada, organized in thirteen circuits and two districts. To the religiously conservative, the Methodists and their preachers were American or American-oriented fanatics, but to others they were a respectable community of enthusiastically pious Christians.

The War of 1812-14, however, produced a crisis in the Methodist ranks as it did in the provinces generally. In its aftermath, the flow of American settlers into Upper Canada subsided sharply. More significantly, the province came of age as a self-conscious community in which anti-Americanism had become an article of faith and a badge of respectability. No longer would representatives of American institutions be welcome in Upper Canada, and assiduous efforts would be made to combat the dissemination of American ideas.

In the Methodist societies the problems inherent in this new situation acquired a sharper focus because, during the war years, the first emissary of the English conference appeared in Lower Canada. This event was a belated response to the insistence of the Montreal Society that American preachers were unwilling to work in Canada, and that they were disloyal. The Missionary Committee, perhaps not understanding the circumstances, sent William Bennett from Nova Scotia to investigate on its behalf. Bennett and William Black urged the committee to supply the Canadas with Wesleyan missionaries. Despite the pointed admonitions of the American GENERAL CONFERENCE, the Wesleyans accepted their advice, and a protracted, bitter feud ensued between the agents of the two great branches of Methodism.

In all probability the charges leveled by each side against the other were exaggerated. There was, however, no escaping the fact that the climate of opinion was reducing the effectiveness of the American church and that the concurrent influx of settlers from Britain was creating a new set of social conditions. Hence, although in 1820 the two conferences reached an agreement to share the Canadas, the societies in Upper Canada perceived that a more constructive solution was required. To this end, the M. E. General Conference was asked to create a Canadian conference, a step which was taken in 1824. Four years later the General Conference approved the separation of the CANADA CONFERENCE and its establishment as an independent branch of Methodism.

The Methodist Episcopal Church in Canada came into existence at a conference held near Kingston in October, 1828. Its polity was almost identical with that of the parent church; its doctrines and the manner of their expression remained unchanged. In two respects, however, the new church was distinctive. No longer was it a body of American missionaries operating in a foreign country; rather, with the exception of WILLIAM CASE and ANSON GREEN, both of whom were identified closely with Upper Canada, the rising figures in the connexion were British North Americans. The Ryerson brothers in particular, who would exercise a formidable influence in the ensuing decades, were born in the colonies and, in common with future Bishop JAMES RICHARDSON, were closely related to the Loyalist tradition. Moreover, the new leadership were keenly aware of the challenging conditions which confronted them and determined to strike out along new paths.

Although Canadian Methodism's new status deprived its enemies of their most powerful weapon against it, its position was still very insecure. At this point Upper Canadians were sharply divided over the future development of their provincial society, a division which crystallized around the associated questions of political reform and the proper relationship between church and state. Broadly speaking, Canadians favored either an oligarchic government or one responsive to popular pressures. Similarly some sought to preserve the informal hegemony of the Church of England, especially in education; others, probably the majority, desired the separation of church and state and the enunciation of impartial political and social policies. The resolution of these conflicts, however, was dependent upon the way in which the colonial relationship evolved. More importantly, it was contingent upon the changing balance of forces in an emerging community.

In this situation the Canada Conference sought recognition as a genuinely Canadian organization; founded a newspaper, THE CHRISTIAN GUARDIAN; and began to lay the foundations for its own school, the future Upper Canada Academy. Through The Guardian and in other ways, the conference and the Methodist societies espoused the reform position, especially with respect to the abolition of ecclesiastical privileges and of the Anglican monopoly over higher education. In so doing the Methodists were concerned principally to defend their own interests; the transformation of Upper Canada along liberal lines was for the conference as such a secondary, if laudable, objective—a distinction that was not readily apparent to the Methodists or their opponents.

The outspoken Methodist opposition to many features of the existing order aroused the antagonism of the governor and the local oligarchy. The most effective weapon of the latter was the English Wesleyan Conference, with its Anglican and Tory proclivities, whose representatives were being pressed by their sympathizers in Upper Canada to break the 1820 agreement. Fortified by promises of public financial support, in 1832 the Wesleyans moved to extend their work in the province. Once again Canadian Methodism was in crisis.

Although the Canada Conference was convinced that its cause was just, it was appalled by the specter of intra-Methodist dissension. Not only would it impede the continuing struggle for religious liberty, but it was unlikely to strengthen the Methodist appeal to many recent arrivals from Britain. It could deprive the conference of funds badly needed to sustain new circuits and the Indian missions. Equally, there was a positive danger that capitulation to Wesleyan or political pressure would alienate many existing members, some of whom at least had close ties with the United States or with the reformers. On balance the conference concluded that compromise would be more fruitful than conflict; hence union with the Wesleyan Conference was proposed. It was put into effect in October, 1833.

As in 1828, this new relationship brought about both visible and invisible adjustments in the polity and outlook of Canadian Methodism. Since the Canadian church was to be assimilated to the English pattern, the distinction between annual and general conferences was dropped, along with the general superintendency. The former alteration strengthened the authority of the conference as a clerical body, but this formal change could not be associated with a diminution of informal lay influence in the quarterly meetings and on the periphery of the conference. Similarly the annual appointment of a president by the English conference was a mixed blessing. Undoubtedly many Upper Canadian Methodists were attached to the episcopate, and, in a growing church, bishops could provide a sense of continuity and the type of direction urgently required. Conversely the president as an outsider on a short term was more likely to be a center of friction than to provide intelligent leadership. The key figure, in fact, in the new dispensation was the missions superintendent, likewise an English appointee, and not wholly subject to the authority of conference. Upon him would rest the burden of expansion and of bringing the two connexions into line with each other. Finally, and possibly most crucial, the union involved the replacement of three orders of preachers by one, and the refusal to ordain local preachers in future. Since the latter stood midway between the laity and the conference and were greatly attached to their privileges, this step led inevitably to their alienation and in consequence to profound unrest among the members generally.

Unfortunately these structural modifications in Canadian Methodism were accompanied by certain less tangible elements. The English Missionary Committee would receive an annual grant from the Upper Canadian government for the furtherance of its objectives, which were, as was admitted privately, to extend the missions, especially to the Indians, and to curb the allegedly dangerous political activities of the Canada Conference. The latter body, however, had been a conspicuous opponent of state aid to religious denominations. Now it would be impossible to argue plausibly that it was not a recipient of such assistance. It would appear, too, that both parties tacitly agreed that The Guardian should adopt a more moderate political posture, or—to use the current euphemism—it should become an “exclusively religious journal,” an understanding that was pregnant with future conflict.

Indeed, the union of 1833 was profoundly disappointing to both parties. As the process of adjustment proceeded, increasing tension developed within the societies and between the conference and the community. This was reflected first in the formation of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1834, a body that drew away the disaffected and competed with the Wesleyans for the allegiance of those outside the fold. By 1838, the Wesleyan Conference had fewer members than in 1833. This falling away in members was accompanied by declining support for the academy and for missions and by disputes between the itinerants and the societies. More broadly, at a time when the province staggered into rebellion and its bitter aftermath, the conference and The Guardian spoke with an uncertain voice to the questions besetting its people. At first, in response to Wesleyan pressure The Guardian came very close to identifying the conference with the Tory camp. After the rebellion, the Methodists rallied again to the cause of political reform, but their testimony was no longer clear-cut. Their determination to uphold the voluntarist position had been undermined. Hence they accepted unwillingly a provisional settlement of the church-state problem in which the principle of state support for religious bodies was embodied. Moreover, in their efforts to determine whether the Missionary Society or the Canadian Conference should retain such government grants as might be forthcoming, the two conferences came to blows in 1839-40. In 1840 the union came to an end in recriminations whose fervor matched in intensity the optimistic declarations of 1833.

Between 1840 and 1847, the Canadian Methodists experienced all the distracting pressures from which they had sought escape in 1832. The conference's decision to pursue its own course in its own way precipitated the establishment of a Wesleyan district in Canada West in whose ranks were included such prominent figures as WILLIAM CASE, MATTHEW RICHEY, and EPHRIAM EVANS. The Wesleyans and the Canadians waged an unseemly war in the press, the mission stations, and the circuit pulpits, for the allegiance of the Indians, the societies, and potential converts. Both groups pursued the politicians and the governors-general, in the expectation of settling the knotty question of government grants to education and to missions. Each side professed optimism about its chances of winning the allegiance of increasing numbers of Canadians, but in reality all were uneasily aware that their disputes would result in losses to other branches of Methodism and to other churches.

By 1846 the more moderate and institutionally oriented on both sides were seeking an acceptable compromise. The Canadians for their part hoped to combine independence and collaboration with the Wesleyans. The Wesleyan leaders now realized that their agents had exaggerated their potential following; they were sensible of the spectacle presented by intra-Methodist conflict; and they were moving reluctantly toward a relaxation of ecclesiastical mercantilism, comparable to developments in the secular sphere. Hence the intemperate in each camp were overruled, and amid much tearful rejoicing, a fanfare of pious declarations, and much covert grumbling, the English and Canadian conferences were reunited in 1847.

The terms on which the two conferences came together did not differ substantially from those accepted in 1833. If anything, the explicit recognition of the parent conference's right to appoint the president and co-delegate (vice-president) and of its veto over all acts of the Canada Conference strengthened its hand significantly. The association was harmonious nonetheless, and continued until the establishment in 1874 of the Methodist Church of Canada. This in turn reflected the developing institutional concern of the Canadian church and the prudent course pursued by the leading representatives of both conferences.

In the interval between 1828 and 1847, when the Canadian Methodists were attempting to clarify their status and to consolidate their position, the Methodist societies in the eastern provinces were moving hesitantly and peacefully toward self-government. With the formation of the Conference of Eastern British America in 1855 this objective was secured.

The third phase in the evolution of Maritimes' Methodism began in 1826 with the division of the work into two districts—Nova Scotia and New Brunswick—a step that appeared likely to facilitate the diffusion of the Gospel. In reality, though, the essential problem of this field was neither organizational nor environmental in character. Certainly Wesleyan Methodism was at a disadvantage in communities whose ties were with New England, Scotland, or Catholic Ireland. Similarly the combination of widely scattered settlements and poor communications placed a premium on mobility and flexibility. But the political atmosphere was less hostile than in Upper Canada. Methodists did not need to prove their loyalty, and they were not confronted with the quasi-monopolistic ecclesiastical arrangements characteristic of the upper province. Rather the growth of Methodism in this region was inhibited by the ambivalent attitudes of the Missionary Society and of the local membership.

From the outset the London Missionary Committee and the secretaries assumed that in time the districts in British North America and elsewhere would become self-supporting. The itinerants were strongly pressed to organize their circuits carefully and to collect regularly from them, and the district meetings were requested to improve their financial position by all conceivable means. Regrettably, any signs of initiative and independence in the district meetings were not well-received in London. The preachers and the societies for their part naturally tended to lean on the society and to assume that in the end it would pick up the bills. When new measures were suggested, they were reluctant to face up to their implications or to resist the society's wrath effectively.

This colonial relationship slowed but did not halt Methodist expansion in the eastern provinces. As in Upper Canada, changes in the Methodist leadership gave a new impetus and direction to the work. Among these, three Englishmen, ENOCH WOOD, William Temple, and RICHARD KNIGHT, along with HUMPHREY PICKARD, a British North American, stood out. After 1847, Matthew Richey and Ephraim Evans brought to this field their experience of Canadian Methodism. With the possible exception of Richey, all these men had thrown in their lot with the colonial cause and were desirous of putting Methodism on its feet throughout the whole of British North America.

At their instance the societies became more self-reliant and more alert to secure new recruits. In these years Methodism began, through the use of protracted meetings and eventually of camp meetings, to make a more direct and forceful appeal to those outside the fold. After several false starts, THE WESLEYAN, a periodical devoted to the Methodist cause, began to appear regularly in 1849. The year 1843 witnessed the formal opening of MOUNT ALLISON ACADEMY (now UNIVERSITY), a preparatory school in which religious nurture and intellectual training were combined effectively. The academy would soon acquire a branch for female education; both were indicative of the growing Methodist interest and activity in the field of higher education. By 1850, in consequence of these developments, the Maritimes' districts were more confident of their own position and abilities and were prepared to accept new responsibilities.

In the English conference and the Missionary Committee a new mood was taking shape. The successful operation of the Canadian union strengthened the society's long-standing conviction that the missionary districts should become self-supporting. At the same time the potential dimensions of the committee's task were expanding rapidly, but the disturbed state of the English connexion indicated that it would become increasingly difficult to finance the mission fields. Thus, in 1852, the Maritimes' districts were pressed to consider how they might contribute to the formation of "a new church in a country possessing all the elements of a mighty empire," one that would "grow with the growth of the empire itself."

The first session of the Conference of Eastern British America met on July 17, 1855, in Halifax, with JOHN BEECHAM, the senior missionary secretary, in the chair. This was attended by missionaries from the mainland districts, as well as from Newfoundland and BERMUDA, who now became members of the Wesleyan Methodist connexion or Church of Eastern British America. The new conference stood in the same relationship to the parent conference as the Canada Conference. It was an affiliated, autonomous body, which was expected ultimately to finance its work fully and to direct its own affairs, subject to the final authority of the English conference.

In 1853 the Canada Conference accepted responsibility for the Wesleyan missions in the Hudson's Bay Company territories, a decision that was implemented in 1854. In this latter year, the Lower Canada District, which had functioned in isolation since 1820, became a part of the Canada Conference. Hence 1855 marks the point at which the whole Wesleyan community in British North America was united under the two affiliated conferences. It had indeed come of age, and would move rapidly toward full independence and broader union.

At the midcentury, the Wesleyan flock numbered about 50,000 members and nearly 300 ministers. Their institutions were largely copied from the English Conference; these were still run by the itinerants, lay representation not having been accepted by either conference. In reality laymen were playing an increasingly effective part outside the conferences, particularly in financial questions. Doctrinally the Wesleyan preachers and communicants subscribed to the standards and the attitudes of English Methodism. Canadian Methodism was still a vigorous, enthusiastic religion characterized by powerful preaching, a simple liturgy, and firm discipline. Doubtless, too, there was a wide range in religious practice from the rather formal and solemn outlook of the English preachers to the rather emotional informality of the older Canadian preachers. More significant for the future were the use of professional evangelists and the growing doubt over the mandatory relationship between membership and attendance at CLASS MEETINGS. Indeed the Wesleyan Methodist Church was becoming an ongoing community, rather than simply a collection of the converted, a community that was concerned to defend and enlarge its institutional interests and objectives.

Among the concerns of the two conferences, publications and education ranked high, but even closer to the hearts of the ministers, especially of the Canada Conference, was the missionary enterprise.

Before the Canada Conference was organized, mission work was coming to be recognized as a separate function of the Methodist organization. Its initial focus was the condition of the Indians, which was a matter of concern to the parent M. E. Church and to the societies in Upper Canada. The Genesee Conference appointed a committee on Indian affairs in 1821, and in 1824 the Canada Conference established its own Missionary Society.

Then and later the Indian problem constituted a massive challenge to the British North American churches. In Upper Canada there were substantial numbers of Indians, among whom the largest group were the remnants of the Six Nations, resident in the Grand River Valley. In what became northern Ontario, there were many scattered tribes, particularly along the water route to the western territories. Beyond the lakes, in the vast area from Fort Garry (WINNIPEG) to the Rockies, lived the great tribes of the plains and beyond the Rockies, along the shores of British Columbia, were the distinctive Indian societies of the western coast. In Upper Canada, the impact of western civilization had in large measure disrupted the traditional economy and culture of the Indian communities. They lived on the fringes of settlement in varying degrees of degradation and demoralization, unable to assimilate themselves effectively into a new world or to protect the debris of their past.

From the outset, the Canada Conference, guided by William Case, was convinced that the Indians were as deserving of Christian teaching and as likely to be receptive to it as white people, and that the way to survival lay through assimilation to western society. The evangelization of the Indians, it was believed, would make possible the introduction of those civilizing influences that would in turn enable the Indians to compete effectively with their white neighbors. To this end, the Missionary Society attempted in and around its missions to establish model settlements in which Christian teaching, elementary education, and training in domestic and other skills were provided in ways that would appeal genuinely to the Indians.

The implementation of this plan was conditioned by several factors—political-ecclesiastical rivalry, intra-Methodist conflict, inadequate resources, and the reluctance of the Indians. To begin with, the Methodist Conference had to persuade the Upper Canadian government, whose wards the Indians were, that the latter should not be the exclusive responsibility of the Anglican Church. This threat had not been removed when the Wesleyan intrusion began. Although the Wesleyans brought additional financial resources, the shaky relationship between the two conferences was not beneficial to the Indian missions. The Indians themselves proved much less susceptible to the combination of Christianization and civilization than had been anticipated initially.

In any event, by 1852 the Wesleyan mission to the Indians had become stabilized in Canada West. At that point the Canada Conference had fifteen Indian missions, around which lived 1,039 Indian converts. At each mission there was a chapel in which some of the services were held in the Indian languages, with the help of hymnaries and Scriptural passages translated for them by such indefatigable laborers as PETER JONES. Most of the missions had primary schools; in addition, the children were entitled to attend either of the two industrial schools at Alderville and Mount Elgin. These latter institutions, which functioned under the joint auspices of the Methodist Church and the Indian Department, provided a broad academic and vocational training in controlled conditions. As such they represented the most comprehensive effort to achieve the objectives laid down twenty-five years earlier.

Clearly the missionaries themselves were disappointed with the results of their historic efforts on behalf of the Indians. Some were Christians; many lived in better conditions than in the past; many had at least the rudiments of education. Conversely, the destruction of the Indian cultures still proceeded more rapidly than their assimilation to western ways, possibly because of the enormous gap between the two societies and the paternalist attitudes of church and state. Nevertheless, the Methodists had taken a leading part in securing the recognition of the Indians as human beings, worthy to be treated with dignity and charity.

While the Indian missions in Canada West were being consolidated, the dimensions of the field had begun to expand dramatically. During the summer of 1838, JAMES EVANS and Thomas Hurlburt reconnoitered the whole region from Manitoulin Island in Lake Huron to the western end of Lake Superior. Two years later, at the invitation of the Hudson's Bay Company, Evans was appointed by the Wesleyan Missionary Society as superintendent of missions in the northwest, a region stretching from Lake Superior to the Rockies. R. T. Rundle, William Mason, and George Bamley were selected to assist Evans in his monumental endeavor. Late in 1840, missions were established at Norway House, Rainy Lake, Moose Factory, and Edmonton House.

In the west these devoted men worked toward the same goals as their brethren in Canada—the Christianization and civilization of the nomadic plains tribes, a task that was greatly eased by Evans' invention of the Cree syllabic alphabet. Initial progress was slowed, however, by his controversy with the company, which resulted in his recall to England in disgrace. Fortunately his colleagues remained; their numbers were supplemented by Henry Steinhauer and Peter Jacobs, Indian converts from the Upper Canada mission, of whom the former would become closely identified with the western region.

By 1853, the Wesleyan Missionary Society was anxious to shed its responsibility for the northwest; the Canada Conference was ready to assume it. In recognition of the change, JOHN RYERSON journeyed to the west in 1854 on a tour of inspection. The Conference dispatched Thomas Hurlburt, Robert Brooking, Allan Salt, and THOMAS WOOLSEY to augment and revive the missions. Within a decade, however, it was recognized that the potential range of the western mission was far greater than had been supposed. The west was on the verge of massive settlement, and of incorporation into the new Canada that was emerging out of the scattered British North American colonies.

The challenge and the opportunity presented by the widening horizons of British North America confronted not only the two Wesleyan conferences, but also the smaller Methodist bodies that had long been established in the provinces. There were four of these: the Methodist Episcopal Church, the METHODIST NEW CONNEXION, the PRIMITIVE METHODIST CHURCH, and the BIBLE CHRISTIAN CHURCH. The Methodist Episcopal Church, unlike the others, was a fully independent body; it was also the largest and most influential in this group. Despite the numerical prominence of the Wesleyans, no description of Canadian Methodism would be complete without adequate recognition of these organizations.

When the union between the Canadian and English conferences was effected in 1833, it aroused much dissatisfaction in the Canadian societies. This arose first out of the precipitate fashion in which the negotiations were carried out and, more importantly, from the failure to consult the quarterly meetings in advance. It was argued with some justification, that important alterations had been made in the church's polity, in a way that did not conform to the spirit and letter of the Discipline. The local preachers, who stood midway between the itinerants and the societies, were convinced that their privileges had been reduced substantially. More broadly, many believed that the conference's political influence would be gravely impaired by the arrangements between the two bodies, and by Wesleyan pressure. Canadian and radical interests, which were thought by many to be identical, would, it was suggested, be sacrificed and distorted. The fact that all these misgivings proved to have some substance accounts in some measure for the growth of Episcopal Methodism.

During the winter of 1833-34 much informal discussion took place between the local preachers and in consequence a conference was called for June 25, 1834, at Cummer's Church, north of TORONTO. Eleven persons attended, of whom only three were elders. This conference resumed its sessions in February, 1835, and summoned a general conference for June. At this latter session JOHN REYNOLDS, formerly of the Canada Conference, was elected general superintendent and ordained. There were now twenty-one preachers and 1,243 members. From this point forward the Methodist Episcopal Church in Canada was formally in existence.

From the outset this body professed to be legitimately in continuity with the Methodist Episcopal Church in Canada, constituted in 1828. Its members held therefore that, far from being a group of secessionists, the ministers and members of the Wesleyan Methodist Church had in fact seceded. Whether this was a legitimate claim is arguable, but its constant reiteration and repudiation, coupled with disputes over church property, served to embitter the relationship between the two churches and to keep them apart until 1883.

In the long years between 1835 and 1883, the Methodist Episcopal Church became an important entity in its own right. When it entered the union, it had three conferences in Ontario, 259 ministers and probationers and 25,671 members, divided into 545 congregations. This numerical growth was a tribute to the leadership of Bishops Reynolds, PHILANDER SMITH, James Richardson, and ALBERT CARMAN. Undoubtedly a major contribution was made by the two latter. James Richardson, a strong and saintly man who had already played a valuable part in the Wesleyan Methodist Conference, was bishop from 1858 to 1874. In this year, Albert Carman, a vigorous, scholarly preacher and administrator was elected in his place. His wise guidance helped immeasurably to bring about union with the Methodist Church. He continued to serve the greater body as general superintendent until 1914.

Although territorially the Methodist Episcopal Church was an Ontario body, it developed certain distinctive characteristics which were in due time embodied in the larger Methodist organization. In its polity was perpetuated the balance between executive and legislative authority, and between lay and clerical interests, which existed in the early American Methodist Church. The bishops were effective but not overbearing officers; the principle of lay representation in conference was not accepted until 1878. The religious outlook of the Methodist Episcopal was authentically Methodist, but not identical with the Wesleyan attitude. If anything, the former were more evangelical; they fought hard and effectively to keep alive the revival spirit and techniques. They were suspicious of relaxations in the Discipline; they campaigned assiduously against intemperance and other forms of immorality. It was thus not surprising that, in a later generation, Carman should have resisted (perhaps with some reason) the liberalization of Methodist theology and the reshaping of the church's role in society. Above all, Episcopal Methodism was distinctly North American in its orientation. Although the Wesleyans were very conscious of the problem of adaptation and assimilation, they were necessarily influenced by their English connection and by formerly English preachers. In contrast, the Methodist Episcopal were self-consciously independent and Canadian, but they maintained links with the American church. It was their "parent" and in its institutions some of their ministers were trained. When in 1864 the M. E. Church in the United States finally accorded recognition to the Canadian Methodist Episcopal Church, it was a matter of great jubilation and a kind of vindication.

As with the Wesleyans, the Episcopal Methodists were not content to rely upon preaching alone to spread their message. In 1845 the Canada Christian Advocate, their answer to The Christian Guardian, began publication under the editorship of THOMAS WEBSTER and Joseph Leonard. Two years later it became the official organ of the General Conference. With it was associated in Hamilton a Book Room, which provided literature for the growing community.

Perhaps more importantly, the church was very aware of the need for and the utility of educational institutions. Hence in 1857, Belleville Seminary was founded, to provide secondary education for men and women. Despite financial stringency, the church determined not to accept public assistance, a decision that for a time slowed the seminary's growth. Even so, in 1866 it became a university; as ALBERT COLLEGE it filled an important place in the Ontario educational system until in 1884 it was amalgamated with VICTORIA (UNIVERSITY). Albert College and ALMA COLLEGE in western Ontario remained as preparatory schools, a role which they still perform.

In contrast to the Methodist Episcopal Church with over 100,000 members and adherents in 1881, the New Connexion, Primitive Methodists, and Bible Christians were in a much weaker position.

During the 1830's, frequent appeals were made from Upper Canada to the Methodist New Connexion Conference in England. At last, in 1837, the conference appointed John Addyman to that province; in 1839, Henry Crofts came to assist him. One of their first contacts was with representatives of the Canadian Wesleyan Methodist Church, a small group that in 1829 had seceded from the Canada Conference, under HENRY RYAN. The latter, possibly in response to the contemporary agitation in American Methodism, had accepted lay representation in the conference at the outset, but this had not proved sufficient to counter the Wesleyan appeal. The Canadian Wesleyans were feeble, and hence sought union with the New Connexion Conference. This was effected in 1841.

The conference of the Canadian Wesleyan Methodist New Connexion (after 1864, The Methodist New Connexion Church in Canada) was linked on very favorable terms with the parent conference. It was to direct the Canadian work, with the assistance of the English representative who was to supervise the mission and the mission fund, to which the English conference would contribute. There was an explicit understanding, however, that, as the Canadian church became self-supporting, so too its freedom would be enlarged, until it became a fully independent religious community, united only in affection with the English New Connexion.

Between 1848 and 1874 the Canadian New Connexion grew from twenty preachers and 2,484 members to 117 ministers and 8,312 members. These were organized into districts under one conference. In the conference possibly the most distinctive contribution was made by the missions superintendents: John Addyman, H. O. Crofts, J. H. Robinson, John Medcraft, and William Cocker. Under their direction, the conference remained true to the principles of the English societies, in particular the entire separation of church and state. Thus the conference strongly supported the secularization of the Clergy Reserves, resisted the extension of separate schools for Roman Catholics, and the division of the University of Toronto's endowment between sectarian colleges. Equally the conference spoke out strongly against intemperance and other social evils.

The Canadian New Connexion originally expounded its views through the Christian Messenger, founded in 1844, a journal from which all political comment was excluded. This was succeeded in 1854 by the Evangelical Witness, edited until 1870 by H. O. Crofts, who sought to make it a powerful intellectual and moral influence. This too was merged with The Christian Guardian in 1884.

Two important contributions were made to the Canadian Methodist tradition by this relatively small body. It kept to the fore the principle of lay representation, a concept that, despite the democratic atmosphere of Canada, was grasped with extraordinary difficulty by the Wesleyans and Episcopalians. Their advocacy would help to secure it in the united church. Similarly, they were a uniting group. In their ranks were the Ryanites and also the Methodist Protestants of Lower Canada. To them, consequently, Methodist disunity and rivalry appeared unnatural; clearly those many beliefs and practices which Methodists held in common must prevail.

In 1829, William Lawson, a Primitive Methodist local preacher from Cumberland, England, migrated to Upper Canada, where, following the example of the Canadian and American Methodists, he preached in the York market square and soon acquired a group of followers. At their urgent request, the Primitive Methodists in England sent Nathaniel Watkins, followed by William Summersides. These two proceeded to build up circuits and societies around York.

Since the English Conference had no regular missionary organization, in 1832 the work in Canada was placed under the HULL Circuit, one of the strongest in England. Eleven years later the conference authorized the formation of a District Meeting which assumed control of the work in Canada. Subsequently HUGH BOURNE, one of the founders of Primitive Methodism, visited the Canadas, where he set a magnificent example of self-sacrificing and evangelical zeal. Through his influence and with the support of the General Missionary Committee in England, Primitive Methodism began to expand in Upper Canada.

By 1883 there were ninety-eight preachers and 8,090 members in the Canadian circuits. From 1854 onward, the work was directed by a Canadian Conference, composed, as was the English practice, of ministers and laymen. This conference was largely autonomous, but its operations were regarded as a part of the total work of the English conference. The latter continued to provide an annual grant for the Canadian missions.

Although the Primitive Methodist Church had the usual churchly attributes—conference, districts, and a newspaper called the Christian Journal founded in 1858—it had some distinctive features. Within the connexion there was an exceptionally close link between ministers and laymen, a natural consequence of the manner in which the denomination began. In Canada, too, Primitive Methodism was essentially an urban church. Toronto was, and remained, the most powerful center of this group. The circuits were developed along the lines of communication radiating from that city—in Belleville, Georgetown, Brampton, Guelph, Brantford, Woodstock and Goderich. In these cities and towns the Primitive Methodist ministers reached out effectively to the less prosperous, more so perhaps than the Wesleyans and the Episcopal Methodists.

If the Primitive Methodist Church was the home of immigrants from northern England, the Bible Christian Church was the haven of those from the western counties, in which the denomination had emerged after 1815. The home conference, founded in 1819, was intensely evangelical and filled with missionary zeal. Hence, in 1831 it decided to send two missionaries to British North America—one to Prince Edward Island and one to Upper Canada. Francis Metherall began his mission at Bedeque, P.E.I., in 1832; John Eynon and his preacher wife reached Cobourg, Upper Canada, in 1833.

From these two bases, the Bible Christian work expanded throughout much of Prince Edward Island, and around Cobourg and London in Upper Canada. By 1883, there were eighty ministers and 7,400 members, of whom the majority were in central Canada. Direction was given by a conference established in 1855, in which ministers and laity were equally represented. The conference was affiliated with the home conference, but was effectively independent in financial and legislative matters.

In Canada, the Bible Christians continued to be a strongly evangelical community, whose ministers sought out the religiously disinherited wherever they were to be found. Not only were the laity encouraged to take an active part, but also women were accepted into the ministry, to which they made a remarkable contribution. The people were characterized by simplicity and frugality. The ministers were total abstainers; the members were asked to adhere to this rule. As did the Primitive Methodists, the Bible Christians fought for the separation of church and state, and against the extension of separate schools. In their zeal and their devotion to the missionary ideal, the Bible Christians helped to keep alive within their sphere the outlook of early Methodism.

Such were the various branches of Methodism on the eve of British North America's transformation into the Dominion of Canada. In 1864, when the federation movement began, each was proud of its own identity and looking forward to continued expansion in its own right. Within a decade, however, the two Wesleyan conferences were united with the New Connexion Church in the Methodist Church of Canada. In another decade, the other bodies were incorporated within the Methodist Church. How was this remarkable merger effected?

If one were to believe Methodist historians and contemporary commentators, one would suppose that the union movement was the natural consequence of a great outburst of brotherly love throughout the whole Methodist community. To some extent this was the case. Obviously, at crucial times a spirit of tolerance and charity was manifest in the behavior of many ministers and laymen, but for a satisfactory and comprehensive explanation of union, one must look elsewhere.

The vital forces at work in the consolidation of Canadian Methodism were external and internal. The creation of the Canadian nation was in itself a dramatic event that opened new vistas, and in all levels of society focused attention upon the possibilities inherent in union. This incipient nationalism clearly had a subtle and profound impact upon all the British North American churches.

Confederation in its turn was symptomatic of significant changes in the provinces, and especially in Ontario, the Methodist heartland. In the 1860's and 1870's industrialization, urbanization, the disappearance of the rural frontier, and the exhaustion of settled agricultural areas greatly stimulated social mobility. Rural British North America began to lose population steadily to the towns and cities. Above all, once the Northwest was annexed to Canada, the flow of people to the west attained substantial proportions. Thus all the churches were faced simultaneously with an unstable constituency in their traditional recruiting grounds, and with the potentially overwhelming challenge of bringing the Gospel to the new settlements on the prairies.

From the 1840's onward, the Methodist churches had competed vigorously with each other as well as with other denominations. The loss of members to another branch of Methodism was, if anything, a more gloomy prospect than their departure for other churches. So long, however, as rural and small-town Ontario was growing, competition was supportable. Once migration became a major factor, the sources of supply for converts and money began to dry up, at the very time when the demand for men and money to evangelize the west burgeoned substantially. By 1870, the real costs of this situation were becoming evident, and it was being said that the Methodist people were "burdened beyond endurance."

Impending financial crisis was not enough to bring about Methodist union; rather it provided a kind of inescapable context of which the Methodist leaders were keenly aware. The positive pressures conducive to union were internal, not external; fundamentally they arose out of the very nature of the Methodist enterprise.

As is well known, the divisions within the Methodist fold were not essentially religious or doctrinal. All the Canadian Methodist churches subscribed to the same basic theology. They differed in the manner in which their beliefs were presented, but these differences of emphasis were not in themselves sufficient to keep them apart. Appropriate hymns and impassioned preaching could be counted upon to blur them in any crisis. Rather, the Methodists differed on questions of church polity. Specifically they held divergent views about the relative merits of episcopacy versus an elected presidency, of ministerial conferences versus mixed bodies of laymen and clergy, and the rights of ministers and laymen. Each Methodist church was convinced that its structure embodied the best features of one system or another. Moreover, in the last analysis, all Methodists thought in connexional terms. Each connexion sought to preserve itself because it was something in which every member had an abiding interest.

Ultimately, nonetheless, no connexion existed for itself. It had life in order to grow—that is to spread the Gospel by all available means. The crux of the matter after 1870 was that if Canadian Methodism was to continue as a growing connexion and to take up the great opportunity presented in the northwest, the various connexions could not continue to function separately. Consolidation not cooperation or federation was clearly imperative.

It was in this general context that a joint union committee of the five churches opened negotiations in January, 1871. Their recommendations proved unattractive to all except the Wesleyans and the New Connexion Church, the former because of their increasing interest in the West, the latter because of a sharp decline in membership. At the same time, the Canada Conference was moving toward division into several annual conferences, which opened the way for the adoption of a general conference and for collaboration with the Conference of Eastern British America.

In 1872, representatives of the two Wesleyan conferences reached agreement in principle on the union of the two conferences. Agreement between the New Connexion and the Canada Conference was longer in coming, largely because neither side was ready to make broad concessions on lay representation. At its 1873 meeting, however, the Canada Conference accepted the principle for the proposed general conference. This in turn quickly brought sympathetic response to union from the British Conference, and, a year later, acquiescence on the part of the New Connexion Conference.

The first General Conference, representing the former Canada Conference, the Conference of Eastern British America, and the New Connexion Conference, met in the Metropolitan Church, Toronto, September 16, 1874. A. EGERTON RYERSON, who had done much toward building the "Methodist Cathedral" and whose dream of a Canadian Methodism had helped to inspire the union movement, was very fittingly elected as the first president of the General Conference. At once the name was changed from The United Wesleyan Church of Canada to the Methodist Church of Canada, a move which demonstrated the good will of the new church to those still outside its ranks.

Another decade was required to translate the hopes and aspirations of 1874 into the final union, which came formally into effect on July 1, 1884. During the interval there were anguished debates about union in the newspapers and conferences of all the Methodist bodies. In the Methodist Church itself there was increasing disquiet over the cumbersome organization established in 1874, which proved to be unable to deal effectively with the massive growth in the church's missionary task. Increasingly, its leaders, especially ALEXANDER SUTHERLAND, the missionary secretary, argued that a general superintendency must be established, not only to deal with missions, but more importantly to preserve the church from fragmentation and regional pressures. But, if agreement could be reached on this point, little except a bitter history would divide the Methodist Episcopal from the Methodists. The principle was accepted by the General Conference of 1882.

For their part, the Episcopal Methodists were very reluctant to consider union, partly because of their long-standing feud with the Canada Methodists, partly because their leaders feared that a move toward union might sunder their own connexion irrevocably. They too were beset, nonetheless, with increasing costs for churches, missions, and education, and declining morale in their congregations as the financial pressure grew. Hence, in 1881 their representatives began to meet with Canada Methodist delegates in the hope of establishing a basis for union. Once the latter accepted general superintendency, the skillful leadership of Bishop Carman assured the participation of his flock and terms of union satisfactory to the smaller Methodist bodies.

The motto of the final phase of the union negotiations might well have been Bishop Carman's phrase, "the necessity of the organic union of the Methodists to carry on the work of God and thereby save more men." Although inevitably there were some dissenters and some who departed, the people of the four churches accepted union "to carry on the work of God." After the new church came into existence in July, 1884, their doubts and hesitations vanished. The material and spiritual resources of the Canadian Methodist connexion were liberated in such a way as to impart a new and broader meaning to the saving of men. Methodism had come of age with Canada; for both a greater future beckoned.

The Methodist Church. Union in 1884 of the Methodist Church of Canada, the Methodist Episcopal Church in Canada, the Primitive Methodist Church in Canada, and the Bible Christian Church of Canada brought almost all the Methodists of the nation within a single denomination that called itself simply "the Methodist Church."

Although the uniting groups differed considerably in temper and retained keen memories of past controversies, most Canadian Methodists had been convinced for some years that their coming together was desirable and even inevitable. A union between the Wesleyans and the New Connexion in 1874 (forming the Methodist Church of Canada) had originally been intended to include them all, and its failure to do so had disappointed many. Developments thereafter emphasized the drawbacks of disunity. As settlers began to trickle into the Western prairies, purchased by Canada from the Hudson's Bay Company in 1869, it became evident that each group, acting alone, could not hope to minister to its scattered adherents. In the Ontario countryside, depopulated by migration to the West and to the cities, duplication of effort seemed ever more wasteful. The missionary efficiency of Canadian Presbyterianism, after its consolidation in 1875, pointed to union as the answer, and economic depression in the early 1880's added a note of urgency. Only inherited distrust and the reluctance of some British authorities to let their dependents go delayed the consummation.

A circular letter from the ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE in 1881 provided the necessary goal. Inspired by its urgent suggestion that separated Methodist bodies should seek closer relations with each other, representatives of the four churches previously mentioned resolved to unite and agreed upon a basis of union. This received the required majorities from conferences and quarterly boards, and in 1883 a constitutive conference determined that union should take place on July 1, 1884. It may be significant that, while some parts of Ontario were unfavorable to union, the western conference of Manitoba gave it unanimous support.

Only two issues gave the framers of the basis of union any serious trouble. One of these was episcopacy; the other, lay representation in church courts.

Methodism as originally introduced into the colony of Canada by American preachers had been episcopal in form, but the Canadian Conference had adopted presbyterial government when it united with the British Wesleyans in 1833. The Primitive Methodists and Bible Christians, both of English origin, were similarly presbyterial in polity. To the Methodist Episcopal, however, the retention of bishops had always been important. They were the descendants of those who, after 1833, had refused to accept British aid and British ways. Episcopacy was a part of their original testimony and their most conspicuous badge of separate identity. The framers of the union went a long way toward meeting their desires. The Methodist Church would be predominantly presbyterial, but superintendents would direct its work and preside over its General Conference. It was intended that there should always be two general superintendents, elected for overlapping terms of eight years. Instead, after a brief experiment with the double superintendency, two men in succession guided the church over its career of forty years. ALBERT CARMAN, formerly bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was senior superintending from 1884, sole superintending after 1892. S. D. CROWN, elected to assist the aging Carman in 1910, succeeded to full responsibility in 1914 and retained it until the inauguration of The United Church of Canada in 1925.

Lay representation was the special concern of the Primitive Methodists and Bible Christians, who had both broken away from the main Wesleyan body in Britain in opposition to what they regarded as the ministerial autocracy of Conference. The Bible Christians, well in advance of their time, even admitted women to all courts on equal terms with men. Canadian Wesleyans had traditionally excluded laymen from their Conferences. The church that resulted from their union with the New Connexion in 1874 had both a quadrennial general conference, to which laymen were admitted, and annual area conferences, largely responsible for ministerial standing and settlement, to which they were not. The union of 1884 provided for lay representation at all levels, although not for the representation of women. Stationing committees were to consist solely of ministers. The desire of many Methodist Episcopalists to continue their practice of ordaining senior lay preachers was not granted.

Early History. At the time of its inception, the Methodist Church had almost 1,200 effective ministers and slightly more than 150,000 full members. Of the former only about sixty served west of the Great Lakes, and no more than 3,500 of the members were located there. It was the largest Protestant church in Canada, able to call on the resources of an enthusiastic membership and capable of further expansion.

The most spectacular advance was to be in the West, and the union came just in time for it. In 1885 many of the Indians and half-breeds of the plains rose in rebellion against the Canadian authorities, and volunteers from eastern Canada helped to restore order. The hostilities advertised to potential settlers the agricultural possibilities of the area west of Manitoba, and their speedy end assured them of its pacification. The completion of the Canadian Pacific Railway in the same year made the occupation of the region for the first time economically feasible. There was no immediate rush to people the prairies, but new farm lands were opened each year, and the frontier of settlement moved gradually westward. In 1886 the church named JAMES WOODSWORTH its first superintendent of missions in the northwest.

From the beginning it was clear that congregations would have to be gathered and not merely shepherded. The wheat farming that became the prairie staple required large acreages, and the huge land holdings of the Hudson's Bay Company and the Canadian Pacific Railway lowered population density even further. Many of the first settlers came from parts of Canada where Methodism was strong, but in most districts no denomination could muster more than a handful of people. Later immigrants, a larger proportion of whom came from the United States and Europe, complicated the denominational pattern still further. The situation was highly competitive, and many people attached themselves to the first church that offered acceptable ministerial oversight. With their somewhat pragmatic requirements for ordination, Methodists were able to meet the situation more successfully than some, and in 1894 Woodsworth began also to recruit ministers from the British Isles. Although it did not receive as many reinforcements by immigration as some other communions, Methodism contributed its full share to the development of the West.

Canadian Methodists greatly increased their commitment to missionary work overseas during the years after Union. A mission in JAPAN, founded in 1873, became a conference of the church in 1889. A second mission was opened in WEST CHINA in 1892. Throughout the 1890's, under the impulse of the Student Volunteer Movement and the Forward Movement for Missions, missionary staffs in both fields were steadily augmented. The inception of the Laymen's Missionary Movement in 1906 led to further expansion, especially in West China. No more overseas fields were opened, the Methodist Church preferring to concentrate its energies upon these two well-stated enterprises.

Along with outreach into new geographical areas went a determined effort to consolidate the Christian penetration of national life. Canadian society had never completely outgrown the rough habits of the frontier, among which drunkenness was the most conspicuous and to many the most offensive. Now, with increasing cultural opportunities, political confederation, and the successful extension of pastoral care to practically the whole population, the time seemed ripe for a concerted attempt to reform Canadian manners. Methodists had always been required to abstain from spirituous liquors, and the Canadian church extended the prohibition by judicial interpretation to all alcoholic beverages. Considerable drunkenness remained, and by the 1880's emphasis shifted to the demand for restrictive legislation. In 1884 many communities took advantage of local option to outlaw the sale of liquor. Opposition was intense, however, and a few years later the "wets" had regained many areas. The Methodist Church concluded at its General Conference of 1890 that nationwide prohibition was the only solution, and its ministers took a prominent part in successive public campaigns. In 1898 a national plebiscite gave prohibition a large majority in every province but Quebec, but efforts to secure satisfactory legislation were destined to remain tantalizingly short of success.

Evangelism continued to be a major emphasis. Late in 1884 HUGH T. CROSSLEY and John E. Hunter began to hold preaching missions that retain a place in the Canadian folk memory even today. In many communities "gospel" or "hallelujah" bands gave enthusiasm a less formal expression. The emphasis on holiness then current in the United States crossed the border, and for a time individual conversion continued to be the normal mode of entry into the Methodist Church.

Union was not achieved without losing the loyalty of some members. In 1884 the Salvation Army was new in Canada and still highly sensational in its methods of proselytizing. It made a natural appeal to Methodists, and a number of contemporary observers attributed some of its attraction to discontent with the Union. About the same time, a Methodist minister named Ralph Horner began to hold tent meetings, sometimes in competition with the services of his brethren. After his expulsion from the Methodist ministry he organized the Holiness Movement in 1894; then breaking with this, he founded the Standard Church of America. Against these signs of dissatisfaction must be set an increase in membership of thirty-eight percent in the seven years after union. Perhaps the secessions are to be regarded as signs not of decline, but of revival out of control.

Canada was beginning to change, however, and Methodism was changing with it. Cities of some size were appearing, and with them increased wealth and sophistication. Congregations became concerned with the architecture of their buildings and the esthetics of their worship, although as late as 1906 a minister was formally condemned for wearing a preaching gown. Such manifestations, superficial in themselves, were signs of a more fundamental change in church and society. Ministers began to find that established approaches no longer evoked the same response. The older methods of evangelism continued, but their effectiveness was limited. They worked in static rural areas, or among recent arrivals to the city. They entertained and even moved young people, but they no longer served as a basis on which stable congregations could be built. Methodism would have to take account of urbanization.

Old methods fell into decay, and new ones were sought to replace them. A series of committees investigated the decline of the class meeting. They invariably commended the institution and urged that strenuous efforts be made to revive it, but the decline was not stemmed. Protracted meetings were still occasionally held and usually described as successful, but they became steadily less popular. Important new camp meeting sites were established at Grimsby, Ontario, and Berwick, Nova Scotia, but they were imitations of OCEAN GROVE and CHAUTAUQUA rather than outgrowths of the old native tradition. In the West, where geography might have been expected to favor the methods of the sawdust trail, they were used with real success only by newer sects. Methodists preferred summer schools for young people, forerunners of ambitious camping programs to come.

Christian Nurture and Education. As elsewhere, impassioned evangelism among adults gave way to the systematic Christian nurture of children. Experts in pedagogy arose within the church, and techniques of Sunday school instructions were readily imported from the United States. Onward, a Sunday paper for adults begun in 1891, attained a higher circulation than any other Canadian periodical. Educational standards undoubtedly rose, although it proved difficult from the beginning to effect a smooth transition from Sunday school to church membership. EPWORTH LEAGUES for young people, embodying the current program of Christian Endeavor, flourished for a decade or so after 1890 and then proved difficult to maintain.

Changes in practice reflected, or were reflected in, a new theological climate. Most conspicuous among the intellectual influences of the time was the higher criticism of the Bible. Canadian Methodists were aware of this as soon as any others in North America, and they gave it a ready welcome. Theological colleges quickly accepted it as a presupposition of their teaching. Books by leading critics appeared on lists assigned for study to candidates for the ministry. George Workman, appointed to the Old Testament chair at Victoria College in 1882, deemed it worth his while to spend the years from 1884 to 1889 at Leipzig, mastering the new scholarly techniques. NATHANAEL BURWASH, president of the college, lent the prestige of his office to the new ideas. By the turn of the century, or shortly thereafter, most ministers had at least tacitly accepted them.

The legitimacy of critical methods was to be generally acknowledged, however, only after the church had been split by several bitter controversies. The first of these was precipitated by a lecture by Workman in 1890, and resulted in his dismissal from the faculty of theology at Victoria College. The chief issue was his denial of the value of Old Testament prophecy as evidence for the truth of the Christian faith. Then in 1907, after he had returned from the wilderness to become professor of Old Testament exegesis and literature at the Wesleyan Theological College, Montreal, he was dismissed again on charges related to his attitude to various Christian doctrines. This case was fought doggedly in both ecclesiastical and civil courts, but Workman was unable to obtain redress. The third major controversy involved GEORGE JACKSON, a British minister then temporarily on loan to the Canadian church. In 1909, while under appointment to the chair of English Bible and homiletics at Victoria College, Jackson was indiscreet enough to query the historicity of the first chapters of Genesis. This time the outcome was different. Efforts to prevent the confirmation of Jackson's appointment failed, as did an attempt to persuade the General Conference of 1910 to condemn views that were recognizably his. His opponents were able to secure a statement binding theological teachers to the doctrinal standards of Methodism, but the effects of this were more than offset by guarantees of substantial academic freedom written into the statement. Significantly, no formal charge of heresy was ever laid against either man.

The charges against Workman and Jackson derived most of their weight from the prominence of those who pressed them. E. H. Dewart, editor of the denominational organ, The Christian Guardian, made an issue of Workman's opinions at a time when most Methodists were paying little attention to them. In the proceedings against Workman, and again in the Jackson case, General Superintendent Albert Carman made himself personally responsible for ridding the church of heretical teaching. He obtained considerable support from laymen and from older ministers, but the ministry as a whole showed, when opportunity offered, that its sympathies were with the teachers he attacked.

Heart searching over the issues raised by biblical criticism was by no means peculiar to Canadian Methodists, but their special difficulties at this period can be explained at least in part. Their earlier preaching had been derived from the Bible by men who had the benefit of few conscious hermeneutical principles but were restrained from faddish interpretations by loyalty to Wesley's doctrinal standards. Many of the evangelists of the late nineteenth century, although perhaps more literate, were content to urge their hearers to Christian commitment by using any arguments that came to hand. By temperament they were theologically conservative, but one heard complaints that their doctrine was not always authentically Wesleyan. The result must have been to leave many of their converts with almost no intellectual explanation of their experience.

It was during the same period that theological education became a normal part of the preparation of Canadian Methodist ministers. Theological teachers, unencumbered by an entrenched academic tradition, naturally adopted the newest critical methods. Students found in them not only the attraction of novelty but also, for the first time, a plausible intellectual formulation of Christian faith. Opposition came not from them but from those who remembered the days when a hearty conversion was sufficient qualification for the ministry. One suspects that the basic offense of higher criticism was less in its direct assertions than in the premium it seemed to place on academic qualifications.

The decision of the General Conference of 1910, in form a compromise, in fact marked the end of attempts by conservatives in the church to prevent the dissemination of critical views in the colleges. Later generations of students learned them as a matter of course. On the whole, however, the effect of these controversies may have been to discourage theological speculation within the ministry. The dogmatic approach was suspect of obscurantism and would be shunned for generations. The critical approach was acceptable, but experience showed that it could be dangerous to propagate it beyond a trusted circle of fellow ministers. Interest turned to other fields, notably pedagogy and social ethics.

New Canadians. A new set of problems was posed to Methodism by a striking change in the composition of the Canadian people that began toward the turn of the twentieth century. The Liberal administration elected in 1896 set out to encourage immigrants, and a boom provided the economic conditions to support them. The new settlers included, for the first time, a large number from the continent of Europe. Eastern Europeans, many of them from the Austrian province of Galicia, formed bloc settlements on the prairies. Italians and Poles, among others, gave some of the cities of the East a cosmopolitan look they had never had before. The stream of immigration continued unabated until the outbreak of the First World War, and resumed with diminished force after it. Canada outside Quebec had hitherto been something of a WASP (White, Anglo-Saxon, Protestant) preserve, tintured with well-assimilated Germans and tolerated Irish Catholics. It would never be that again.

Methodism took its first official notice of the new immigrants in 1899, when the Manitoba and North-West Conference appointed a committee to study it. The initial reaction of most Canadian Protestants was one of dismay. Not only were the prospects of recruiting new members limited, but the folkways introduced by the new arrivals would surely undermine the efforts of the churches to instill habits of abstinence and sabbath observance. The intolerance of some words spoken in church courts then would be reckoned scandalous in these days of increased intercultural awareness. Obviously, however, Methodism would have to take account of the presence of the newcomers, and to be true to itself would have to serve them as well as it could.

Some of the service was direct. The church appointed chaplains to meet new arrivals at major ports. As early as 1901 it established a center of work in a Galician settlement in Alberta. On the prairies it set up hospitals and community centers. In the cities it founded All Peoples' Missions and Churches of All Nations, staffing them with ministers who could lead services in the necessary languages. It published a Ukrainian periodical, The Canadian. The Woman's Missionary Society provided more than its share of workers.

The emphasis in this setting was inevitably not quite what it had been among Protestants of British descent. Proselytism was played down, some of the All Peoples' Missions not even having chapels at the beginning. The first step, it seemed, was to transform foreigners into good Canadians. But what is a "good Canadian"? The initial definition was undoubtedly inspired in large measure by fear of the different and unknown. Canadianization meant the dissemination among newcomers of the moral and social attitudes approved by Canadian Protestants, and one of the motives behind it was a desire to neutralize Roman Catholic influence. Service implied love, however, and in time the agents of the church began to identify themselves with those among whom they worked. They sought to establish the self-respect of the immigrants by calling them not "foreigners" but "new Canadians," a phrase that has in its turn lost caste. They encouraged them to contribute the fruits of their own cultures to Canadian life, so that there would be not a melting pot but a mosaic. Thus Methodism, along with other churches, helped to formulate a philosophy of Canadianism that has influenced the nation's mythology if not always its practice.

Meanwhile the church pressed with undiminished vigor its campaign to maintain traditional moral standards. It continued to urge nationwide prohibition and extended its attack to include gambling and prostitution. It sought, for a short time successfully, to prevent streetcars from running on the Lord's Day. The results, however, continued to be disappointing. The new arrivals were not easily impressed with the advantages of a Victorian moral code.

It soon became evident that the Canadian churches were confronted by a problem more complex than that of interpreting their position to newcomers to Canada. They were dealing for the first time with the effects of widespread industrialization, and they soon discovered that a great many people were compelled to live under conditions that predisposed them to vice rather than virtue. When this happened, moral reformism was gradually transmuted into social criticism.

Social Concerns. Interest in the social order had begun to manifest itself within Canadian Methodism in the early 1890's, when the national economy was severely depressed. A sessional committee on "sociological questions" was first named by the General Conference in 1894. Its early reports were couched in conventionally pious language, the first one suggesting that "when society has become impregnated with the teaching of Jesus of Nazareth, trusts, monopolies, heartless combinations and oppressive economic conditions shall have been superseded by a universal brotherhood." By the middle of the next decade, however, Methodism was expressing doubts about the compatibility of the capitalistic system with the Christian gospel.

The social concerns that had been developing within the Methodist Church found official expression in 1902 in the setting up of the Board of Temperance, Prohibition and Moral Reform, later Social Service and Evangelism. Methodists were some years ahead of other Canadian churches in instituting such a board, which under the leadership of S. D. Chown, soon became one of the most important sections of the church's secretariat. It gave leadership in familiar campaigns against alcohol and gambling. It became the church's mouthpiece on issues of public morality. It sought to formulate the mind of the church on more complex problems of the social order. Later it seemed appropriate to add the promotion of evangelism to its functions, for Methodists were persuaded that the conversion of individuals is inseparable from the transformation of society. During the first decades of the twentieth century, when the prestige of theology was not high, it is probable that Canadian Methodists looked for ideological guidance less to the doctrines of their church than to the pronouncements of this board. Indeed, the tradition that the Board of Evangelism and Social Service is chiefly responsible for interpreting the mind of the church to the world is still very strong within The United Church of Canada.

By 1910 a form of the social gospel was accepted by most Canadian Methodists. As officially formulated and as commonly preached, it had few features at this stage that could be described as radical. On the one hand, it continued the indigenous tradition of seeking to reform public and private morality both by precept and by legislation. On the other, it contemplated a more far-reaching change in society that would eliminate economic conditions conducive to immorality. The aim of the Methodist Church, according to the 1910 report of the Board of Temperance, Prohibition and Moral Reform, was "to Christianize the laws, the institutions and the social relationships of the people throughout the Dominion of Canada, Bermuda and Newfoundland." Such a program could obviously lead to radical political action. For the moment, however, its cutting edge was blunted by the optimism of the decade. Encouraged perhaps by the Methodist doctrine of perfection, most preachers were convinced that good will on the part of all would make possible the speedy transformation of existing society into God's promised kingdom of righteousness. Industrialists and financiers in the pews apparently did not feel threatened.

In fact few Methodists had any clear idea of the sort of social change they desired. Under the leadership of SALEM G. BLAND, a purposeful group of radicals was beginning to take shape. Most others still expected the renewal of public life through the conversion of individual politicians and the disappearance of slums through the reformation of those who lived in them. Radicals and reforming moralists shared only an imprecise vocabulary of social utopianism into which they read very different connotations.

If Canadian Methodism had not yet found clear answers to the questions raised by industrialization, its search for answers led it to take its first steps toward the creation of a complex bureaucratic structure. At the time of the Union of 1884 the denomination had full-time officials only for publications and missions. Finances for various phases of the work were raised separately, and the church had no general treasurer. In 1886 a secretary of education was added, chiefly to deal with the problems of denominational colleges and universities. By 1894 there was a separate secretary of Sunday schools and Epworth Leagues. Temperance, Prohibition and Moral Reform in 1902 was the next department to have a secretary, and the development of specialized types of redemptive work in the cities added steadily to its institutional responsibilities. With the adoption of a unified system of finance in 1910, the Methodist Church had become an efficient modern institution instead of a frontier fellowship, and the erection of the new Wesley Buildings in Toronto in 1914 gave it a head office with room for expansion.

By the second decade of the twentieth century the prospect for Canadian Methodism was one of rapid but orderly change. Enthusiasm for rebuilding society reached new heights at a Social Service Congress in Ottawa in early 1914, and tensions among the reformers seemed well on the way to resolution. A generation trained in new American techniques of Christian education set out to formulate new curricula for Sunday and midweek instruction that would be specifically related to the Canadian setting. Based on the currently popular text, "Jesus increased in wisdom and stature, and in favor with God and man," such programs as Tuxis Boys, Trail Rangers, and Canadian Girls in Training caught the enthusiasm particularly of potential leaders among youth and inspired many volunteers for the ministry and for service as deaconesses or community workers. Many of these programs were cooperative, and a wider union of churches, discussed below, was already being projected.

The outbreak of war accelerated and complicated the process of change. For the time being, almost all the efforts of the church were concentrated on war work, including hospitality for trainees and the provision of comforts for men in the trenches. It has been said that Methodists, more than some others, gave their pulpits over to patriotic themes and even to appeals for enlistment. Such comparisons are difficult or even impossible to verify. If there was any substance in the claim, the explanation may be that Canadian Methodists have always been particularly sensitive to accusations of disloyalty or of halfhearted loyalty. The fact that their first preachers were American left them open to this charge at the time of the War of 1812 and again whenever trouble with the United States threatened, and they always denied it vigorously. When rebellion broke out in the Northwest in 1885, the Methodists asserted with considerable pride that the loyalty of the Indians among whom they worked had prevented more serious trouble. One might expect some sensitivity, therefore, when in 1914 the British-type enlistment forms used in Canada took note of Methodists only under the unfamiliar designation of "Wesleyan" and thereby gave the impression that they were not signing up in proportion to their numbers. But if it was a natural human reaction that led some Methodist preachers to become too strident in their patriotism, the price was paid within the denomination itself. Methodists had never been prominent in military circles, and a generation of young people who had been brought up to believe in the imminent coming of the Kingdom of God was ripe for disillusionment when the war failed to end war.

Disillusionment expressed itself most dramatically in Winnipeg in 1919. The war was followed immediately by an economic slump, and trade unionists who already suspected that many workers had given their lives for the sake of profits to the capitalists were determined to establish their right to collective bargaining. A local dispute accordingly became a city-wide general strike, lasting from May 15 to June 27, 1919, and marred by violence when two persons were shot in a scuffle between strikers and police. Strikes were still not commonplace in Canada. Respectable citizens were shocked that most of the strikers were of Anglo-Saxon origin rather than recent immigrants, and respectable Methodists were even more shocked that two men who had been in their ministry were prominently associated with the strike. J. S. Woodsworth, son of the first Methodist superintendent of missions, formerly minister of the All Peoples' Mission in Winnipeg and later national leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party, was charged with sedition during the strike, for uttering words borrowed from the prophecy of Isaiah.

A wedge was inevitably driven between those who merely desired a better world and those who were prepared to take radical steps to secure it. Many Methodist leaders were as careful to dissociate themselves from those who took part in the strike as they had been to associate themselves with the war effort. Some of the ministers who were most deeply committed to the social gospel withdrew from the pastorate to enter politics, as indeed some like Woodsworth had already done in despair of sympathy within the church. One of them, WILLIAM IVENS, founded a "labour church" that expanded into about twenty local units. It soon dwindled, but the apparent social consensus of Methodism was permanently shattered.

In its last years of independent existence the Methodist Church was more aware of conflict than of confident advance. The war was followed by recriminations, and the prestige of leaders slipped in church as in state. Yet the church learned a great deal from its trials. Its pronouncements lost some of their optimistic willfulness and became both more realistic and more courageous. In 1922 the church went so far as to admit women to its courts.

Church Union. The formation of the Methodist Church in 1884, like the earlier consolidation of Canadian Presbyterianism in 1875, suggested to many the desirability of further and bolder projects of union. The first formal proposal came from the Church of England in Canada. In 1886 its Provincial Synod of Canada invited Methodists and Presbyterians to confer with it on union, and in 1889 a series of meetings took place. It soon became evident that Methodists and Presbyterians were not prepared to negotiate on the terms of the Lambeth Quadrilateral, which had been issued earlier that year, but a union of non-episcopal churches seemed much more practicable.

At first the Methodists responded to suggestions of organic union with considerable coolness. They were at the time the largest and fastest-growing Protestant denomination in Canada, and they may have counted on the effects of their own union to consolidate their position even further. Instead they proposed federation in 1894, cooperative work in smaller communities in 1898. In the later years of the 1890's, organic union seemed to have become a dead issue, especially for Methodists.

As the turn of the century approached, however, the mood of the churches began to change. The new mass immigration seemed to call for Protestant consolidation and for the creation of a church that could mediate a Christian Canadianism. Plans for federation and cooperation failed to command enthusiasm, and many wondered if organic union would not be a more satisfactory and even easier solution. The Canadian Society of Church Union, founded in 1898, helped to shape a favorable climate of opinion. Methodists, in particular, may have had their sense of self-sufficiency shaken by the disclosure of the census of 1901 that they were no longer the largest or fastest-growing Protestant church.

When Presbyterian fraternal delegates to the General Conference of 1902 suggested that the time was ripe for organic union, the Methodist Church responded warmly. A joint committee of Methodists, Presbyterians, and Congregationalists was soon set up. By early 1904 it was able to report that it found no insuperable obstacles to union, and a basis of union was drawn up by 1908. Meanwhile Anglicans and Baptists had been invited to take part in the discussions, but neither found it possible to do so.

Arminianism. "The eternal, wise, holy and loving purpose of God . . . embraces all events," but God "in the Gospel freely offers His all-sufficient salvation to all men." The polity is essentially presbyterial, providing for government by ascending regional courts known as presbyteries, conferences, and a general council. The basic congregational court is a session after the Presbyterian pattern, but there is also an official board similar to the quarterly board of Methodism. Ministers are stationed by a settlement committee although, since congregations have the right to call ministers of their choice, the action of the committee is in most cases a mere formality.

For Canadian Methodists the basis implied some significant departures from familiar procedures. They had been accustomed to a general superintendent and to some continuity in district chairmanships, whereas in The United Church of Canada all presiding officers would be elected for short terms. Many of them, without experience of the call system, were apprehensive at the prospect of having to cater to local tastes. On the other hand, many Methodists came from sections of the church that had not had the superintendency before 1884, and many congregations were finding ways of securing the ministers they desired. In any case, Methodists were held together more by bonds of common experience than by the possession of a single confession or polity. Few of them were prepared to cavil at the terms of the Basis of Union.

The Methodist Church moved toward union as quickly as its constitutional provisions would allow. In 1910 the General Conference approved the Basis, defeating an amendment that would only have "cordially received" it by 220 votes to 35. It then sent it to the district meetings for consideration and to the annual conferences for their opinions. Only the conference of Newfoundland, whose traditions owed much to Britain and little to Canada, reported an adverse vote. A plebiscite of members and adherents in 1912 showed almost ninety percent in favor of the Basis. The few Congregationalists of Canada had already determined on union by a decisive majority.

The union for which Methodists had so clearly shown themselves ready was delayed for more than a decade, first by a lack of unanimity among Presbyterians, then by a conviction that it would be unfair to press an issue that had proved so controversial while many church members were absent in military service. Initially, enthusiasm for union had been more conspicuous among Presbyterians than among Methodists. Many Presbyterians hesitated to identify themselves with Methodist moral and social crusades, however, and especially among recent immigrants from Scotland and Ireland there were those for whom Presbyterianism was a badge of ethnic origin. In the end about a third of the Presbyterian membership declined to enter the United Church, claiming to continue in themselves the Presbyterian Church in Canada.

The union might not have taken place if there had not been mounting pressure for it from another quarter. Early attempts to secure cooperation on the northern and western frontiers of settlement had little success, for despite favorable words the denominations tended to give priority to their own extension and the people resisted arbitrary transfer from one communion to another. Once the Basis of Union had been published, however, there was a spontaneous movement for the establishment of community churches. Some of these were affiliated with one or two or even three denominations. Others, especially in the province of Saskatchewan, set up an interim organization of their own patterned on the Basis of Union. This grass-roots movement, eluding the control of denominational leaders and threatening to become an independent denomination if union were long delayed, helped to stiffen the determination of waverers. The Presbyterian Church resolved upon union in 1916.

Before the union could be consummated, two major steps still had to be taken. Legislation providing for the holding of property had to be piloted through the Canadian Parliament and all the provincial legislatures, in every case over the determined opposition of Presbyterian nonconcurrents. By the terms of the legislation, moreover, votes on the disposition of property had to be taken in every Presbyterian congregation where they were requested. Both of these steps were made necessary by the division in the Presbyterian ranks, for the Presbyterian Church in Canada was not an incorporated body and had a tradition of congregational autonomy on issues of union. Methodists contributed materially to the drafting of legislation. On the whole, however, their part in this last stage was one of anxious waiting. For years they had delayed urgent projects in the expectation of union, always with the risk that the negotiations would break down at the last minute or that capricious legislators would refuse the needed legislation. In the circumstances their patience was exemplary.

At last, at a great service in the Mutual Street Arena, Toronto, on June 10, 1925, The United Church of Canada came into being. The Methodist Church, which had been created by a union forty years earlier, became in its turn an integral part of a larger fellowship. George C. Pidgeon, the Presbyterian moderator, was elected first moderator of the United Church. The Methodist general superintendent, S. D. Chowh, recognized the recent ordeal of the Presbyterian unionists by declining to receive the nomination that was his by right of seniority.

The Methodist Church in 1925. The Methodist Church that entered union in 1925 consisted of ten annual conferences, roughly equivalent in number although not in boundaries to the provinces. It included practically all the Methodists of Canada, Newfoundland, and Bermuda; the chief exceptions were the FREE METHODISTS, a few tiny groups of Negro origin, and a small body of German-American background known as the Evangelical Association (afterward a part of the EVANGELICAL UNITED BRETHREN CHURCH). The Christians associated with the West China mission were also still counted within the membership of the Canadian church.

The Methodist Church had 2,061 ministers and probationers on circuit, 314 students for the ministry, 51 deaconesses, and 1,925 local preachers. Its total membership was 418,352, considerably more than double that of 1884, and was distributed among 4,662 preaching appointments. It had 3,953 Sunday schools, with 42,635 teachers and 347,384 pupils. Its property was valued at $44,612,208, and in its last year it raised almost $10,000,000.

More significantly, Canadian Methodism had extended its influence into every part of the country and into every segment of the national life. Except in French-speaking Quebec and in a few other ethnically homogeneous areas, one could count on finding a Methodist church within easy reach. Methodism had been firmly established for generations in the cities and countryside of eastern Canada and in the fishing coves of Newfoundland. Along with other major denominations it had kept pace with settlement in the North and West, a circumstance that helped to prevent the recurrence in Canada of the lawlessness of the American "wild west." Throughout its history it had maintained a keen interest in the Indian population, although it left the Eskimos to the care of Roman Catholics and Anglicans. It ministered to the needs of immigrants from the time of their arrival, although in most cases there was no expectation of building up congregations among them.

The Methodist Church kept in touch with its people in a great variety of ways. In the East most circuit boundaries had long since been fixed, and tall Methodist steeples erected in the late nineteenth century are still a feature of the Ontario landscape. The towns of the West were already building ambitiously, but even with cooperative effort, many communities still had to make do with small false-fronted frame buildings. In the rural areas of the West and North, students maintained an itinerant ministry from schoolhouse to schoolhouse, and few cared what denomination had sent them. MISSION BOATS, often forced to navigate treacherous waters, served the isolated fishing hamlets of Newfoundland and Labrador, as well as lonely fishermen and loggers in British Columbia. In what is now called the inner city, where a different set of problems had to be faced, All Peoples' Missions and social service centers were increasing in number and importance.

Methodism was well provided with institutions of learning. It sponsored several universities and federated colleges, as well as a number of day and residential secondary schools. Primary schools were maintained chiefly for Indian and other minority groups. At an early stage of Canadian history, Methodists had found themselves barred from existing colleges by denominational tests. As a result they always stressed the openness of their schools, seeking to provide a Christian atmosphere rather than to win recruits for their own communion. This nonsectarian emphasis led to some playing down of the peculiar doctrines of Methodism and delayed the foundation of specifically theological colleges. By 1925, however, a chain of such colleges spanned the country and an increasing proportion of ministers held theological degrees.

Publishing Interests. The church maintained the oldest and largest publishing house in Canada. It had secured a press in 1829 to print The Christian Guardian, founded by EGERTON RYERSON to uphold the claims of Methodism over against ecclesiastical privilege. The existence of this press made possible the publication of books, and the tradition whereby saddlebag preachers were both encouraged to distribute good literature and given a commission on books sold provided a corps of inexpensive agents. At first, books were largely devotional and controversial, but some book stewards were not averse to publishing wholesome works of a general nature. Under WILLIAM BRIGGS, book steward from 1878 to 1918, the publishing house moved seriously into the field of general trade publishing; his sponsorship extended to authors as remote from the traditional concerns of Methodism as Robert W. Service, the balladeer of the Yukon. To the confusion of amateur book collectors, Briggs followed the example of earlier book stewards in placing his own imprint on books published under his regime. Upon his retirement, however, The Ryerson Press was adopted in 1919 as a trade name. Lorne Pierce, who in 1920 became literary adviser and later editor, gave the press a new intellectual standing. Literary and artistic interests were stirring in Canada, and Pierce assumed the role of a discoverer and sponsor of new talent. He also brought to the press a share in the strategic and lucrative business of publishing school texts. The profits of the enterprise, by a long-standing Methodist tradition, augmented the pensions of retired ministers.

The possession of a large and efficient printing establishment assumed a new importance with the introduction of more systematic Sunday school curricula. Most early materials were imported from the United States, but when the demand for Canadian publications arose, the press was able to meet it. Departments were established both for lesson helps and for story papers for use in Sunday schools. By the time of Union, much of the material was being edited cooperatively, but most of it came off the presses of the Methodist Publishing House. (For a more complete account see METHODIST BOOK AND PUBLISHING HOUSE.)

Overseas Work and Nation Building. Besides its varied enterprises in Canada, Methodism bequeathed to the United Church responsibility for its overseas work in Central Japan and West China. In 1925 there were, including those on furlough, twenty Canadian Methodist missionaries in Japan and ninety in West China. Ten more were under appointment to China, which became the largest overseas field to be related to The United Church of Canada. Japanese Christians associated with the Canadian mission belonged to the Japan Methodist Church, which later entered the Kyodan. Those in China became part of the Church of Christ in China upon its formation in 1927.

The most distinctive quality of Canadian Methodism, perhaps, was its peculiar combination of evangelism with nation building. Methodism came to Canada not only without any state connection but under auspices that made it distinctly suspect to the state. Suspicions of disloyalty to the British connection made its preachers even more emphatic than they might otherwise have been in disclaiming any ulterior political designs. Their purpose, as they often had to insist, was to bring men and women to saving faith in Jesus Christ. On the other hand, their natural resentment of ecclesiastical privilege put them in the forefront of the popular struggle against the colonial oligarchy and required them to keep a close watch on political developments. In later years their desire to reclaim drunkards and gamblers led them, almost imperceptibly at first, into social concern and even political agitation. Yet the one role never nullified the other. Evangelism and social service were two aspects of the one saving action, and the latter was always tributary to the former.

The combination had its perils. Evangelism could be watered down into mere humanitarian improvement, and old time Methodists missed the old sacred fire. Social analysis could be blunted by dependence on personal conversion as a cure-all, and radicals like J. S. Woods-worth complained that the church was taking refuge from courageous action in reassuring pious phrases. On the other hand, Methodism's double emphasis gave it a ready rapport with the people to whom it ministered. It was aware of the complexity of the environment in which they lived without losing its concern for their personal needs and aspirations. It is small wonder that Methodism was in many ways the most Canadian of denominations and certainly the most responsive to rising sentiments of Canadian nationhood. In a local Methodist circuit, or in a national Methodist board, one could gauge with remarkable accuracy the pulse of a nation in process of formation.

Continuation. Those who projected the Union of 1925 intended not to extinguish the Methodist Church but to continue it within a new and more inclusive fellowship. To this end, as part of the ceremony inaugurating The United Church of Canada, the general superintendent offered as the inheritance of his communion "evangelical zeal and human redemption, the testimony of spiritual experience, and the ministry of sacred song." The United Church has participated actively in the work of the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL, as also in that of the International Congregational Council and the World Alliance of Reformed Churches. Methodists never supposed that they were leaving behind them their old identity but rather that they were becoming Presbyterians and Congregationalists as well.

Many will inevitably ask, however, to what degree the Methodist spirit and the Methodist mind in fact survive in The United Church of Canada. Even among those who know the church well, no two would give quite the same answer to this question. Certainly no one could mistake a court of the United Church for one whose traditions are undilutely Methodist. The name of John Wesley has lost some of its sacredness along the way, and no one could successfully urge a course of action with the argument that Methodist—or Presbyterian—custom demands it. Whether there has been a more radical loss of Methodist tradition is not so easy to establish.

One occasionally hears the suggestion that the Presbyterian wing of the church, despite smaller numbers, has really swallowed up the Methodist. Evidence adduced includes a trend to formality in worship, an emphasis on nurture rather than conversion, and an increasing concern with questions of speculative theology. But these developments are only reflections of movements originating elsewhere, and long before 1925 Methodists were prominent in importing some of them into Canada. In any case, the Methodist inheritance is obvious in some of the most conspicuous features of the United Church: its inclusiveness, its deep roots in community life, its ready response to lay movements, its concern for public morality and social justice; not least its institutional efficiency. The shouting revivalist of the frontier seems far back in the ancestral line of the United Churchman of today, but the pre-union Methodist is a father or at most a grandfather whose features are still reproduced plainly in those of his offspring.

JOHN WEBSTER GRANT

The United Church of Canada, formed by a union of the Methodist Church, the Presbyterian Church, and the Congregational Churches, was inaugurated at a service held in Toronto, on June 10, 1925. The new church was designed as an institution in which the traditions of the three uniting bodies would intermingle in a mutually beneficial fashion—an objective symbolized by the concluding statement of each retiring leader: "Receive ye our inheritance among them that are sanctified."

In 1926, the United Church comprised eleven conferences and 114 presbyteries (including Trinidad and Honan). It had a membership of 600,522 and 1,261,778 persons under pastoral care. Today it has eleven conferences and one hundred presbyteries. The 1965 membership was 1,064,033. 2,635,217 persons were under the pastoral care of 3,413 ministers on 2,658 charges.

Although it proved impossible to prevent the emergence and growth of a continuing Presbyterian Church, the United Church regarded itself as the essential legatee of the churches incorporated within it. It secured membership in the International Congregational Council, the Oecumenical Methodist Conference (now WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL) and the World Alliance of Reformed Churches. Representatives of the United Church continue to play an active role in these organizations. The Church has testified to its commitment to further union through its support of the ecumenical movement and by its openness to union with other Canadian churches.

From the outset, the United Church was characterized not so much by the spirit of innovation in doctrine and polity, as by the judicious admixture of elements drawn from its predecessors. The doctrinal basis of union was a conservative statement in which the insights of the Calvinist and Arminian traditions were recognized, shorn of the harshness of election and some of the urgency of Wesley's teaching. The church was not committed to a rigid formulation, or to the full implications of the theological climate of the 1920's. Similarly, its polity contained important features drawn from the Presbyterian and Methodist systems. The local congregation retained a substantial measure of autonomy, but this was balanced by the authority of presbyteries, conferences and the General Council. Conferences meet annually, the General Council at two-year intervals, the former under elected presidents, the latter under moderators elected for two-year terms.

A common complaint—at least until recently—was that in the United Church, the Methodist tradition was swamped by the Presbyterian tide. It would be more accurate to say that within two generations, the inheritance of the three churches was assimilated into the life of a new body, distinct in certain respects from any and all of its predecessors. There are, however, certain emphases in the United Church which reflect in some measure its Methodist heritage. These were mediated in part by those moderators who were formerly Methodists: JAMES ENDICOTT, T. A. MOORE, Peter Bryce, A. S. TUTTLE, J. H. Arnup and George Dorey.

Within the Methodist Church there was persistent tension between the central and local authorities. If the Presbyterian influx strengthened the position of the latter, it did not prevent the emergence of a centralized bureaucracy in the United Church. The secretariat of the General Council, the boards and their secretaries, the publishing house, the national Church newspaper, have become important factors in the government of the Church. In various ways they exercise leadership, maintain a feeling of continuity, and impart a sense of direction which otherwise would be lacking. Collectively they have come to play a role analogous to that played by the general superintendency and the general boards of the former Methodist Church. It is not without significance, too, that, at this juncture, the United Church is considering the establishment of its own episcopate.

In common with other churches, the United Church has been greatly affected recently by the swirling currents of contemporary theological controversy. Its response to these and to the changing intellectual fashions of the thirties, has had a certain Methodist flavor. On the whole, the mood of the United Church has been eclectic—its theologians have sought to adapt rather than to destroy, to assimilate rather than to resist new ideas. That no great scholars have been produced, is held by some to be characteristically Methodist; that no searing divisions have developed is also testimony to the residual authority of Methodism.

Throughout its history, the United Church has been confronted not only by massive changes in ideas, but by a rapidly evolving social order, in which acute social distress and war have quickly succeeded each other. It could not be said that the complex challenges of this new situation were met with outstanding creativeness; but they were handled in an open-minded way which owed something to the Methodist heritage. The United Church has continued, though certainly with decreasing conviction, to make room for the evangelical appeal, for satisfying emotional needs, and for personal commitment. More importantly, it has sought to define the social significance of charity in a comprehensive way. For some, this has involved no more than the enforcement of the old prohibitions against intemperance, divorce, and Sabbath-breaking, preferably with the state's assistance. For others, however, the search for holiness has meant a searching critique of the social order, and an effort to devise radical solutions to the problems of poverty, social instability and war. The uneasy marriage of these two elements, and their continuing vitality, are in part at least symbolic of the Methodist past.

Since its inception, the United Church has never been without a certain tension induced by its commitment to two distinct ends. As a large and growing institution, it has naturally developed a corporate identity and a galaxy of vested interests. At the same time, its leaders have contended that its end is not simply the furthering of its own existence; rather, its purpose is to promote Christian unity in Canada. Here again, two Methodist convictions have been of importance. Canadian Methodists, as others, were insistent that, in the growth of the Church, tradition must always take second place to the immanent and continuous direction of the Holy Spirit. They were certain, as well, that the Holy Spirit sought the creation of a Christian Canadian nation. Within the last decade, this impulse has taken the form of a movement towards union with the Anglican Church, out of which it is hoped will arise a new church fitted to play a prophetic role in contemporary Canada. If this should come to pass, and if the resulting church is truly new, it will be a fitting reincarnation of the highest meaning of the Methodist tradition. If the new church embodies simply another blend of traditions, this will be mute evidence that the historic qualities of Methodism have departed from Canadian Christianity.

CANADA, WEST CHINA MISSION. (See WEST CHINA MISSION.)

CANADA CONFERENCE (EUB), which became part of The United Church of Canada in 1968, grew out of a spiritual concern for those who had migrated to CANADA following the American Revolution and at the turn of the nineteenth century. The migrants included people who desired to remain loyal to the British Crown and others whose motives were less lofty and whose attitude toward the faith and ideals of their neighbors was often hostile. Among them were God-fearing Germans from PENNSYLVANIA who settled in the counties of Upper Canada and the area around the Niagara Peninsula, so it was natural for the "Albright People" to accept an invitation from concerned Canadians to whom they had been recommended as "clear and powerful preachers of the gospel."

When the 1837-38 revolutionary movement in Canada, which had halted missionary activity, was ended, many influential people petitioned for the return of the "Evangelicals." One of these was a Lutheran, W. H. Peterson, editor of The Canada Museum of Berlin (now Kitchener), Ontario, the first German newspaper in Canada, who wrote to the States: "Will you, who have plenty, let us suffer in the wildness without pity? Come over and help us."

In 1839, at the end of a historic camp meeting near Waterloo, Ontario, to which Bishop JOHN SEYBERT had traveled 500 miles from Pennsylvania on horseback, the first Canadian "Evangelical" congregation was formed.

The mission was now extended in all directions through Western Ontario by various missionaries who toured neglected areas, often suffering severe personal attacks. Bishop Seybert later wrote in his journal, "By 1843 we had a solid foothold in British territory." The Ontario churches continued to belong to the NEW YORK CONFERENCE.

The year 1864 brought a parting of the way when at the New York Conference "Evangelical" ministers had to choose whether to serve in the newly-formed Canada Conference or to remain in the U.S.A.

In 1882, the Canada Conference began to look westward. The investigating committee reported, "We are of the opinion that there is a wide field open for us in the Canadian Northwest." A long line of daring missionaries pushed westward. Finally, with the work enlarging in the West, the NORTHWEST CANADA CONFERENCE was established in 1926. Across the years, missionaries from the Canada Conference have gone out, also, to Texas, Germany, Japan, China, Nigeria, Sierra Leone, New Mexico, and Brazil.

In 1946, by denominational union, the Canada Conference of The Evangelical Church became the Canada Conference, The Evangelical United Brethren Church. On Jan. 1, 1968, the Canada Conference was merged with the United Church of Canada in connection with the 1968 union in the United States of the parent Evangelical United Brethren denomination with the Methodists to create The United Methodist Church.

In 1967, the end of its final year (and the Canadian Centennial Year), the Canada Conference membership was approximately 10,000 in sixty-two congregations with fifty ministers. Total contributions were $812,305, an average per member of $82. Assets were $4,833,763, including a superintendent's manse, three campsites and a Senior Citizen's Home already built and operated jointly for some years with the United Church of Canada.

The United Brethren in Christ history of early missionary advance in Canada parallels the "Evangelical" story, resulting in an Ontario Conference of that denomination. However, early in the twentieth century the conference merged with the Congregationalists who, later in 1925, together with Canadian Methodists and Presbyterians formed the United Church of Canada.

Although The Evangelical United Brethren Church has been a small denomination in Canada, the respect with which her sons have been regarded resulted in the election (1952) of E. Emerson Hallman, Canada Conference Superintendent, to the position of president of the Canadian Council of Churches, and the appointment of the late Honorable Louis Breithaupt, member of Zion EUB Church, Kitchener, Ontario, to the position of Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Ontario (1952-1957).

CANADA CONFERENCE (ME). Methodism in Canada began in Nova Scotia. WILLIAM BLACK, son of an Englishman by the same name, was converted in 1779. Two years later Black became the first Methodist itinerant in the region. When 20,000 loyalists moved north into Nova Scotia following the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown, Black wrote JOHN WESLEY in England for preachers. Apparently Wesley thought they could be supplied more readily from the United States. Black attended the CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE at BALTIMORE in 1784 and appealed for help. FREEBORN GARRETTSON and JAMES O. CROMWELL were then ordained for Nova Scotia. From that time until 1800 all Methodist preachers in Nova Scotia came from the United States, but afterward they were supplied from England.

The immigration of loyalists into Upper Canada (actually it was southern Canada, but it was "up" the St. Lawrence River from Quebec) made that region English-speaking and Protestant in contrast to Roman Catholic French-speaking Quebec, and it made possible the development of a strong Methodism in the Great Lakes area of Canada.

Methodism spread from NEW YORK into Upper Canada. Freeborn Garretson, who had helped briefly in Nova Scotia, led in establishing Methodism in the region (now Ontario) after he was appointed presiding elder in upstate New York in 1788. By 1794 there were two circuits on the Canadian side of the St. Lawrence River.

When the GENESEE CONFERENCE was set off from the NEW YORK CONFERENCE in 1810 it included the work in both Upper and Lower Canada. In 1812 the Upper Canada District reported seven circuits and 2,550 members and the Lower Canada District four circuits and 295 members.

The War of 1812 and its aftermath slowed down the work of the M. E. Church in Upper and Lower Canada. Patriotism proved stronger than religion; American missionaries were not welcome in Canada. The situation improved little after the war. Canadian Methodists believed they suffered some disabilities as citizens because they belonged to a church with headquarters in the United States. But even so, the M. E. Church tried for a decade to hold onto its Canadian work. When memorials from Canada asked the 1820 GENERAL CONFERENCE to make the Canadian work a separate annual conference, the request was denied on the ground that it might prevent the interchange of preachers essential to the prosperity of the work. However, the General Conference did authorize the bishops to establish a conference in Upper Canada during the quadrennium if they deemed it expedient and if the Genesee Conference concurred. Also, an agreement was soon worked out to transfer the work in Lower Canada to the British Conference.

The bishops did not form a Canadian Conference during the quadrennium, and in 1824 the Canadians asked for an independent conference with power to elect a bishop who would reside in the province of Upper Canada. The General Conference was unwilling to go that far, but it did create the Canada Conference which was to remain under the jurisdiction of the M. E. Church.

Apparently the General Conference underestimated the determination of the brethren in Canada. Before the new Canada Conference could meet and organize, the dissatisfied Canadian Methodists assembled a convention for the purpose of organizing an independent body and publishing a declaration of grievances and rights. The bishops then asked NATHAN BANGS, one of the founders of Canadian Methodism, to visit the province and try to allay the agitation. Also, Bishop ENOCH GEORGE and ELIJAH HEDDING immediately began visitation in the province. Peace was finally restored when the bishops promised to urge the 1828 General Conference to authorize the Canadian Methodists to organize as a separate church.

By 1828 the M. E. Church was willing to let the Canadian Methodists go their own way. The General Conference adopted a resolution saying the Canada Conference was at liberty to form a separate church, and it went on to express the hope that friendly relations would prevail between the churches in the two countries.

In 1828, its last year, the Canada Conference had about thirty charges, thirty-nine preachers, and 8,595 members.

ASA G. CANDLER

CANDLER, ASA GRIGGS (1851-1929), American layman and philanthropist and brother of Bishop WARREN A. CANDLER, was born at Villa Rica, Ga. in 1851. He entered the drug business as an apprentice in 1870 and was a member of a drug firm in Atlanta from 1873 until 1899. During this period he developed the soft drink, Coca-Cola. He was organizer and president of the Central Bank and Trust Company and the Atlanta Warehouse Company.

When the M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH relinquished its interest in VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY, Asa Candler gave $1,000,000 to move EMORY COLLEGE, of which he had been a benefactor, to ATLANTA as EMORY UNIVERSITY. He was president of the Board of Trustees and on the finance committee of the institution. His letter to his brother, Bishop Candler, making his offer of one million dollars to establish a Christian university and giving his idea and ideals as to what such a university should be, is a classic statement carefully preserved in the archives of Emory University. It directs, with reference to the institution being endowed, that "the plans and methods of which are to be definitely directed to the advancement of sound learning and true religion." He also wished "that the characteristic excellences of our people may be made better, and the things which blemish our lives may be speedily obliterated." His portrait hangs in the Board Room of Emory. Among his large benefactions was a gift of $75,000 to the Wesley Memorial Fund.

He died at Atlanta on March 12, 1929.

ELMER T. CLARK

CANDLER, WARREN AKIN (1857-1941), American minister and unusually strong, able and colorful bishop of the M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH in the final years of that connection prior to church union, was born at Villa Rica, Ga., Aug. 23, 1857. He was the son of Samuel Charles and Martha (Beale) Candler. He was graduated at EMORY COLLEGE in 1875, and later became its President. He joined the NORTH GEORGIA CONFERENCE in 1875 and rapidly made his way into acknowledged church leadership through unusual strength and ability.

After pastorates in the North Georgia Conference, in 1886 he became assistant editor of the Nashville Christian Advocate. In 1888 he was elected President of Emory College, then at Oxford, Ga., and served for ten years until his election as bishop. He had been a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCES of 1886 and 1890, and also the ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCES of 1891 and 1911. He became chancellor of EMORY UNIVERSITY on its move to Atlanta in 1914 and served there until 1921.

He married Nettie Cartwright of LaGrange, Ga. on Nov. 21, 1877. Their children were Annie Florence (Sledd), wife of ANDREW SLEDD, noted New Testament scholar, and professor at Emory University; John Cartwright; Samuel Charles, an attorney and long-time trustee of Emory University; Warren Akin; and Emory Candler. Warren A. Candler with his brother, ASA GRIGGS CANDLER, the capitalist and philanthropist, and another brother, Judge John Candler, became the fathers and leaders of what has become widely known as "the Candler family of Georgia."

Bishop Candler was a noted preacher as well as a good educator. He had the ability to put great truths in simple and yet commanding language. In the field of enlarged administration, which became more and more important to the general church in his day, he was looked to for leadership. He gave direction and guidance in missions, especially in Latin America and CUBA. Candler College in HAVANA was named for him.

He was gifted with a devastating type of humor which he brought into his sermons and lectures and on almost all other occasions. Yet his humor was always subordinate to his theme. Among the Methodists of the South generally the Candler aphorisms have become legendary.

He was bitterly opposed to the union of the M. E. Church, South with the M. E. Church, and together with Bishop COLLINS DENNY, he threw his full weight against certain of the earlier plans for union. He helped to defeat the Plan of Unification in 1922, when it appeared that union was then imminent. When Union finally came, however, in 1938, Bishop Candler refused to countenance those who then left the Church, South because of union.

Very conservative in his social and political views as well as in theology, he was a true successor if not the last of the older generation of Southern Methodist bishops who drew an almost complete line between the mission of the church and the political and social embroilments of the present-day world. "Let politics alone!" was his injunction to his preachers as the national prohibition movement enlisted the full resources of the M. E. Churches behind the eighteenth amendment. "It used to be 'believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved,'" he said, "but now it is, 'Believe in prohibition and surely thou shalt be saved.'"

Bishop Candler was a helpful member on the Hymnal Commission (1930-34), sharing joint chairmanship with Bishop WILLIAM ANDERSON of the M. E. Church, and fighting hard for old tunes and old hymns which he loved. One tune in the Methodist Hymnal of 1930 and that of 1964 was named "Candler" in his honor, for he insisted upon using that particular melody for the "wrestling Jacob" hymn ("Come O Thou Traveller Unknown"). He ranged the world in all manner of helpful moves for the church. Bishop ARTHUR J. MOORE once said,

"I found Bishop Candler's tracks all over the world in all our mission work."

Upon the loss of VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY from the M. E. Church, South, Bishop Candler took a leading part in enlarging Emory College and bringing it to Atlanta to become Emory University. This was partly at the instance, and with the great financial support of his brother, Asa G. Candler, who gave a million dollars. Bishop Candler became the first chancellor of the new Emory, and chose the first faculty for the school of theology, which was later named the Candler School of Theology. He was himself a sound scholar and delighted to entertain world-renowned scholars and get them to lecture at Emory. He had inherited from Bishop George F. Pierce, who in turn got from Bishop McKendree, an old cavalry cape, and whenever the bishop marched upon the campus wearing this old garment, the theological students knew that he was ready for some sort of emergency.

When some of the brethren in KENTUCKY were claiming (a bit too presumptuously) that they had attained "Christian perfection" and at annual conference someone asked Bishop Candler, "Do you not think these brethren will get to heaven?" "Yes," returned the bishop, "if they don't run past!"

On another occasion the fraternal delegate from England was introduced to make a formal address to the General Conference. He objected to being listed for a "fraternal" address, since he said the British Church was the "mother church" of American Methodism. "Brother," cut in Bishop Candler, who was presiding, "you are going to make a maternal address!"

To critics in the school of theology who delighted to point out that the Bible was out of harmony with scientific findings in many matters, the bishop said, "Well, the Bible is like the headlight of a great locomotive rushing through the night—meant to show the track ahead and not to hunt out 'coons and rabbits on either side of the track."

He wrote energetically both articles and books, having a long list of the latter. Among these his best known were Christus Auctor, a manual of Christian Evidences (1900); Great Revivals and the Great Republic (1904); Wesley and His Work (1912); Life of Thomas Coke (1923); The Christ and the Creed (1927); Bishop Charles Betts Galloway, A Prince of Preachers and a Christian Statesman (1927).

Upon his retirement he lived in Atlanta, taking a great interest in the growing Emory University, and always glad to see and counsel with all who enjoyed calling upon him. He suffered somewhat a decline of his great mental powers during his last months and died in 1941. At his own request he was buried in Oxford, Ga., a place always dear to him.

CANDLER COLLEGE, Havana, Cuba, is the largest Methodist educational institution in CUBA. This school was founded early in 1899 by Thad E. Leland, a Methodist missionary. It began in downtown Havana, as a primary school for boys and girls. It was named after Bishop WARREN A. CANDLER and his brother ASA G. CANDLER. The latter gave the money for the first building on the new campus. Thad E. Leland was succeeded by E. E. Clements and B. F. Gilbert. The fourth director of the institution, H. B. BARDWELL, who led the school for forty years, moved it out of downtown Havana into the suburban section of Marianao, where its growth and development were such that it soon became known as one of the best educational institutions in Cuba. In 1920, as Candler had developed into a school for boys, Buenavista School for girls was founded across the street from it. Throughout the rest of their history, the two institutions developed in parallel. The primary school at Candler grew with the addition of high schools, both in Spanish and in English, as well as a three-year commercial department. In 1949, when Bardwell retired, he was succeeded by the first Cuban director of the institution, Carlos Perez Ramos. Under Perez's leadership, the school continued to grow, and in 1957 extended its services by changing it into Candler University, the first Protestant university in Latin America. At that time the program of Candler extended all the way from kindergarten into the doctoral program. In 1961 the school and all its properties were nationalized by Castro's government.

CANDLER SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY, the first school of EMORY UNIVERSITY in Atlanta, opened on Sept. 23, 1914, less than four months after the GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church, South had severed the church's connection with VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY. At least $500,000 of ASA CANDLER's gift was to be set aside as endowment.

In 1915, the school was named for Bishop WARREN A. CANDLER.

Located in the center of the campus, it is an integral part of Emory University, and its faculty members have fellowship with the scholars of many disciplines. The students have access to courses in other schools of the university and to the university's library facilities. Bishop Candler gave to the school his wide collection of Wesleyana—more than 2,600 items—which includes every book written or edited by JOHN WESLEY and all of the Methodist hymnals.

Representing a variety of theological orientations, the Candler School of Theology has lived close to the church and kept a deep respect for Methodist traditions. The SOUTHEASTERN JURISDICTION adopted a plan for increasing the income for current support, and in 1957 authorized the raising of funds necessary for the erection of Bishops Hall for Theological Studies.

In 1966, twenty-nine states and six foreign countries were represented in the student body, which came from 108 different colleges.

Degrees granted are the Bachelor of Divinity, the Master of Christian Education and the Doctor of Sacred Theology. The M.A. and Ph.D. degrees are offered in the division of religion of the graduate school, largely under the leadership of the theological faculty.

JOHN O. GROSS

CANNON, JR., JAMES (1864-1944), American preacher, editor, reformer, college president, and bishop in the M. E. Church, South, was born in Salisbury, Md., Nov. 13, 1864. He was the son of James and Lydia Robertson (Primrose) Cannon. He was graduated from RANDOLPH-

MACON COLLEGE with a B.A. degree in 1884, and received the M.A. from Princeton in 1889. His B.D. degree came from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1888. He married Lura Virginia Bennett, Aug. 1, 1888, and they had three daughters and six sons. After she died in 1928, he married Mrs. Henry Hawley McCallum on July 15, 1930.

Cannon entered the ministry of the M. E. Church, South in the VIRGINIA CONFERENCE in 1888. He was president of Blackstone Female Institute (later Blackstone College for girls) from 1894 to 1918. While there he served as editor of the Baltimore and Richmond Christian Advocate from 1904 to 1918. He was superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League of Virginia from 1910 to 1919, and was elected a bishop in 1918. He was general superintendent of the Southern Assembly, now LAKE JUNALUSKA, from 1911 to 1919.

He was a member of the General Conference of his church five times, and a member of the Anti-Saloon League of America from 1900 until his death. He was a delegate to many world conferences, among them the WORLD MISSIONARY CONFERENCE in Edinburgh, 1910; the Universal Conferences of Life and Work and Faith and Order in Geneva, 1920-37; Lausanne, 1927; Life and Work, Stockholm, 1925; World Conference on Life and Work in Oxford, the World Conference on Faith and Order in Edinburgh, and the World Peace Conference in Geneva.

He was chairman of the Executive Committee of the World's League Against Alcoholism, and visited Europe ten times in connection with war problems, 1918-22. He was a delegate to the ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCES in 1921 and 1931. He was chairman of the Southern Commission on Unification of Methodism from 1918 to 1926. One of his most distinguished services was as a member of the Executive and Administrative Commission of the FEDERAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. He was chairman of the Federal Council Commission on Relations with Religious Bodies in Europe from 1920 to 1924; chairman of the Commission on Marriage and the Home from 1922 to 1930.

Bishop Cannon had charge of the mission work of the church in several areas—MEXICO, Belgian CONGO, CUBA, and BRAZIL. He served from 1918 to 1934. He also served in ALABAMA from 1920 to 1922. He was in charge of the Pacific Coast work from 1934 to 1938. He was a trustee of the Church Peace Union; a member of the Survey Commission of the Near East; chairman of the Commission of the Near East Relief of the M. E. Church, South.

The fight against the liquor evil was the passion of his life. He often said that his hatred for drink came from memories of visiting, with his mother, the homes of poor people impoverished by alcohol.

Probably his greatest work was as organizer and President of Blackstone College. On more than one occasion, he said that he regretted ever leaving Blackstone for the episcopacy. No person ever had a more devoted, loyal group of students than Bishop Cannon.

As editor of the Baltimore and Richmond Christian Advocate he exposed the evils of the day. He became a national and international figure for temperance. To a great extent he was responsible for prohibition laws. When Alfred E. Smith was nominated for the presidency and advocated the repeal of prohibition, Bishop Cannon led the movement called "The Anti-Smith Democrats," and the "Solid South" was shattered in the national election of 1928. Since there was no paper to carry the temperance side of the battle, Bishop Cannon organized the Richmond Virginian with the help of J. Sidney Peters. He worked against the evil of child labor and made many enemies. On his second trip to Africa he contracted the dread African fever and came near dying. He suffered from the effects of this as long as he lived.

For much of his life he was a center of ecclesiastical and political controversies. He was attacked by the secular press, and won a suit for libel which he brought against the Hearst newspapers. He was accused of gambling in the stock market, but was exonerated by the GENERAL CONFERENCE (MES, 1930), although he confessed that he had dealt in stock market ventures. The U. S. Senate Lobby Committee and the Senate Campaign Funds Committee looked into the Virginia campaign expenditures in hearings of 1930 and 1931, but Bishop Cannon defied the committees, challenged their authority and refused to answer questions. Throughout the latter years of his life he was continually persecuted by the press.

He was the author of many pamphlets, mostly on the liquor evils, and of numerous articles and editorials in the church papers.

Bishop Cannon died in Chicago on Sept. 6, 1944, and was buried in historic Hollywood cemetery, Richmond, Va.

CANNON, JOHN S. M. (1880-1952), American conference lay leader and children's home superintendent, was born at Lockesburg, Ark., Jan. 13, 1880, the son of John and Mary (Turrentine) Cannon. He attended Henderson-Brown College in Arkadelphia one year and then transferred to the University of Arkansas, winning the LL.B. degree from its Law School in 1911. He married Edna Dollarhide, June 11, 1901, and they had three children, Julian, Robert and Mildred. Cannon joined the church at eleven years of age. In 1900 he moved his membership to Winfield Church, Little Rock, became a STEWARD in 1911, and continued active there the rest of his life.

Between 1926 and 1948, Cannon held several positions of leadership in the LITTLE ROCK CONFERENCE—secretary of the board of lay activities, 1926-32, and conference LAY LEADER, 1932-34 and 1936-42; secretary and treasurer of the board of education most of the years from 1933 to 1948; secretary of the board of church extension, 1933-39; and membership on the Arkansas Methodist Centennial Commission, 1934-36. He was a delegate to four General Conferences, 1934-48, and to the 1939 Uniting Conference. He served on the General Board of Lay Activities (MES) during its final years.

As superintendent of the Methodist Children's Home at Little Rock, 1943-51, Cannon was instrumental in relocating it on an eighty-acre tract on the western edge of the city. Since Little Rock grew in that direction, within eight years the value of the property increased from the purchase price of $10,000 to nearly half a million dollars, and it has since further appreciated. Cannon died Jan. 5, 1952.

CANTON, OHIO, U.S.A., population 113,631, is the county seat of Stark County, and has come to be a strong manufacturing and industrial city. Methodist itinerants came very early to Canton, and it is first mentioned in the conference minutes for 1823, when William Tipton was appointed to the Canton Circuit, which was then in the Portland district. Canton was placed in the PITTSBURGH CONFERENCE when it was organized and held its first session on Sept. 15, 1825. In 1862 and 1863, under the pastoral labors of S. P. Woolf, a new church was completed, costing about $52,000. This church was destroyed by fire in January, 1881.

First Church, Canton, was dedicated Sept. 23, 1883. It stands today, above the busy streets in the center of the city, a churchly stone edifice which proudly shows to visitors a pew in which WILLIAM MCKINLEY, later president of the United States, was accustomed to worship. The church and the attached educational building were recently remodeled and renovated at a cost of more than $300,000, thus demonstrating the congregation's belief in the mission of the church in the inner city.

Other Methodist churches in Canton are Christ Community, Crystal Park, Dueber Avenue, Simpson, Turner Chapel and Church of the Lakes. The total membership of the seven Canton churches is approximately 6,692. Canton is also the location of Bethel A.M.E. Church, St. Paul's A.M.E. Church, Bethel C.M.E. Church, McKinley Wesleyan Methodist Church, Second Wesleyan Methodist Church and a Free Methodist Church.

CAPE GIRARDEAU, MISSOURI, U.S.A. The first distinctively American settlement in MISSOURI was made in Cape Girardeau County prior to the LOUISIANA Purchase. Some Methodists had settled here as early as 1803. The town was laid out in 1807, and it became an important Mississippi river port after 1820.

The first Methodist SOCIETY was organized in July 1809 by SAMUEL PARKER, presiding elder of the Indiana District, WESTERN CONFERENCE, with four full members and three probationers. Little is known about the society between 1811 and the late 1830's when a brick church was built on a lot which was deeded to Trustees of the M. E. Church, Jan. 28, 1843. This building was completely destroyed in the tornado of Nov. 27, 1850.

At the division of the M. E. Church in 1844-45, the Cape Girardeau church voted to adhere to the South, but was restrained by Nelson Henry, presiding elder, almost forcibly. This initiated a local conflict which continued until after the Civil War.

The Southern Methodists built a frame church in 1854. It collapsed under the weight of excessive snow in the winter of 1856. The congregation then worshiped in other places while attempting unsuccessfully to rebuild.

The M. E. Church congregation made several attempts to build a church and this was accomplished in 1867. The building was sold to the Southern Methodists in 1884, which terminated the English-speaking M. E. Church in Cape Girardeau.

The German M. E. Church was organized in 1855 and has had an unbroken existence of steady growth, having occupied three buildings. Following the abandonment of the German language in 1922, the old name of Ebenezer was changed to Grace.

After 1880 the Southern Methodist church flourished. A new and larger building was occupied in 1893. This was outgrown and a large and imposing structure was erected on a new site in 1907 at Ellis and Bellevue. It was named Centenary to commemorate the appointment of the first Methodist preacher to Missouri in 1806, and the laying out of the town of Cape Girardeau in 1807.

Hobbs Chapel was built on the north edge of the town in 1890 to provide for a Society which had been organized a year or two before.

The continued growth of Southern Methodism in the expanding town required a mission in the south part of the city. This was begun in 1896 in a frame church. In 1910 a lot was given at Maple and Ellis Streets by Louis Houck, historian and builder of southeast Missouri railroads. The frame building was moved to this site and became the nucleus of an expanded brick structure, Maple Avenue Church.

A mission was established in the near north side in 1918, which resulted in the building of Third Street Church at the corner of Third and Big Bend Streets.

Total membership for the five churches as reported in 1970 was 3,229.

CAPE MAY MARKER

CAPE MAY COMMISSION, THE, is the name by which an epochal and most important meeting took place between representatives of the M. E. Church, and of the M. E. Church, South, Aug. 17-23, 1876. The two great Episcopal Methodisms in the United States had divided in a bitter controversy in 1844, and the Civil War coming in 1861-65 and arraying section against section, had inevitably set these churches more decidedly against each other. After the war the reunited country, however, seemed to call for a reunited Methodism, especially since slavery, a fundamental issue between the positions the two churches had taken, had been destroyed.

The rejection, however, by the M. E. Church in 1848, of the PLAN OF SEPARATION had led that church officially to hold the M. E. Church, South, to have been a seceding body, and not of equal status with itself in Methodist life and standing. The decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in 1857, holding valid the Plan of Separation and forcing the M. E. Church to give to the Southern Church its share of the Book Concern, as agreed in the Plan of Separation, did not lessen the hostility between the two churches, which was then soon greatly furthered by the Civil War. It was, therefore, a great step forward that each one of the Episcopal Churches in 1876 should appoint a Commission who might treat with the other, not simply regarding property conflicts, but on the wider basis of a real and growing fraternity.

The Commissioners appointed by the M. E. Church were Morris D.C. Crawford, the Honorable Enoch L. Fancher, Erasmus Q. Fuller, General CLINTON B. FISK, and JOHN NEWMAN.

By order of their General Conference, the Southern bishops appointed as Commissioners, E. H. Myers of Georgia, R. K. HARGROVE (later bishop) of Tennessee, Thomas M. Finney of Missouri, the Honorable Truett Pope and the Honorable David Clopton. Upon the death of Pope in April 1876, the Honorable Robert B. Vance of North Carolina was appointed as his successor.

The group met at Cape May, N. J. and issued a statement which Bishop JOHN M. MOORE calls in The Long Road to Methodist Union, "a historic declaration and basis of fraternity." It declared:

Each of said Churches is a legitimate branch of Episcopal Methodism in the United States, having a common origin in the Methodist Episcopal Church organized in 1784.

Since the organization of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was consummated in 1845 by the voluntary exercise of the right of the Southern Annual Conferences, ministers and members, to adhere to that communion, it has been an Evangelical Church, reared on Scriptural foundations, and her ministers and members, with those of the Methodist Episcopal Church, have constituted one Methodist family, though in distinct ecclesiastical connections.

The action of the Cape May Commission was questioned somewhat at the ensuing General Conference of the M. E. Church in 1880, but J. M. BUCKLEY, then of great influence in his church, made a motion which closed the matter, as it affirmed: "That we resolve the action of the Commission on Fraternity, appointed by the bishops by the order of the last General Conference, as final."

Bishop John M. Moore in his Long Road to Methodist Union states, "This declaration adopted by both Churches, that each is a legitimate branch of the original Methodist Episcopal Church and each is equal to the other in succession to the original, that the two are twin Sisters in Episcopal Methodism, was the answer to thirty years of questions, contentions, disputes, and conflicts. It removed from the Church, South, the stigma of 'secession'. It supported the position of the Federal Court that the General Conference of 1844 was competent to divide the Church and that it did divide it. It recognized the independent and legitimate standing of the Church, South." Bishop Moore's evaluation was commonly agreed to by Methodists of good will in both Episcopal Methodisms, and was an immense step toward the final union, which came about in 1939.

In 1961 a tablet commemorating this epochal meeting at Cape May, was unveiled in the yard of the Methodist Church at Cape May, N. J., with appropriate ceremonies. Attending were Bishops representing the Southeastern Jurisdiction, and the South Central Jurisdiction, NOLAN B. HARMON and IVAN LEE HOLT respectively. Representing the Northeastern Jurisdiction were Bishops FREDERICK P. CORSON and JOHN W. LORD; and representing the Central Jurisdiction was Bishop EDGAR A. LOVE, in whose Central Jurisdiction territory Cape May was located, as it was within the NEW JERSEY CONFERENCE presided over then by Bishop Corson. Appropriate ceremonies were connected with the unveiling of the tablet which states:

CAPPELLINI, CAVALIERE LUIGI (1841-1898), an Italian minister, was born at Spezia, Italy, Sept. 3, 1841. During his military service (1859-1867) a torn portion of the Bible, John 13-17, blew by chance to his feet while he was on sentry duty at Perugia. The incident led to his becoming a colporteur and a student under HENRY PICCOTT at Padua. He went as a free-lance missionary to the military in Rome in 1870. When the American Mission was founded he was one of the first two Italians to be ordained in 1874. In 1877 he transferred to the British Mission, and carried on a ministry at the Military Church in Via della Scrofa until his death on Jan. 27, 1898.

CAPERS, WILLIAM (1790-1855), American bishop and founder of the missions to the slaves, was born at the Bullhead Swamp plantation, St. Thomas Parish, South Carolina, Jan. 26, 1790. His father had been a captain in the Revolutionary War. He attended South Carolina College, being awarded the M.A., and studied law for a brief period. He was admitted on trial to the SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE in December, 1808, and appointed to the Wateree Circuit. He served the following circuits for one year each: Great Pee Dee, Charleston, Orangeburg, Wilmington (North Carolina), and Santee. He located at the annual conference in December 1814, being readmitted three years later. In 1818 he was appointed to COLUMBIA, S. C., and in 1819 and 1820 to SAVANNAH, Ga.

He founded the Asbury Mission to the Lower Creek Indians at Coweta (in present-day Russell County, Ala., about nine miles south of Columbus, Ga.) in 1821, and served as superintendent of the mission from 1821 to 1824. In 1823 and 1824 he was pastor of the Milledgeville, Ga. station, as well as superintendent of the Indian mission. His appointment for 1825-26 was CHARLESTON, S. C., where he also edited the Wesleyan Journal (Oct. 1, 1825 to March 3, 1827, when it merged with the Christian Advocate). From 1827 through 1830 he was presiding elder of the Charleston District, founding the first slave missions during 1829. After a year in Columbia (1831), he was again in Charleston, as preacher in charge (1832-33). In 1833 there occurred an unfortunate split in the Charleston church, due to the objection of some of the leading white members to the accommodations for colored people. In addition, he was also superintendent of missions to the plantation Negroes, for whom he prepared a catechism for their oral religious instruction. He transferred to the GEORGIA CONFERENCE in 1834 to serve as pastor of Savannah and superintendent of the slave missions on the nearby islands. In 1835 he returned to South Carolina, where he taught briefly at the South Carolina College, apparently expecting to become its president. He returned to Charleston in 1836, where he edited from mid-1837 to 1840 the Southern Christian Advocate, authorized by the 1836 General Conference.

The 1840 GENERAL CONFERENCE divided Methodist territory into three missionary departments, with Capers being appointed to the Southern division, a position he filled until 1844, travelling extensively throughout the South.

He was a delegate of the South Carolina Conference to every General Conference from 1820. In the 1844 General Conference he took a prominent part in the debate centering around Bishop JAMES O. ANDREW and his status as bishop. Capers championed the cause of Andrew and the South. The PLAN OF SEPARATION was adopted, the M. E. Church, South was organized, and Capers was elected bishop of the new church at its first General Conference in 1846.

The episcopal labors of Bishop Capers were arduous. His first assignment was to the Holston, Virginia, North Carolina, Georgia, South Carolina, and Florida Conferences. The following year he made a tour to the West, including Missouri, Texas, and the Indian Mission in Oklahoma, continuing such intensive episcopal itineration during his entire episcopate.

He died at Anderson, S. C., on Jan. 29, 1855, and was buried at Columbia. In the Washington Street Church there is a marble tablet to his memory with an inscription about his founding the mission to the slaves.

CAPLES, WILLIAM GOFF (1819-1864), American minister and educator, was born in Jeromeville, Ohio, April 23, 1819, the son of Robert F. and Charlotte Caples. As a young man, the father practiced law and served four years as judge of the common pleas court in Wayne County, Ohio, and then devoted the rest of his life to farming. William grew up on the farm. He studied law at Findlay, Ohio, 1836-37, but never practiced. He was converted in December, 1835, joined the M. E. Church, became a class leader, and in 1836 was licensed to exhort. For a while he clerked in a store at Findlay. In 1838 he married Charlotte Gist, and the next year they accompanied her father, General George W. Gist, as immigrants to Missouri. During 1839, Caples was licensed to preach, and that October he was admitted on trial in the MISSOURI CONFERENCE. Beginning on circuits, he was soon appointed to such stations as Glasgow, Brunswick, Hannibal, and Weston. Also, he served the Weston, Fayette, and Brunswick Districts. He quickly developed a reputation as an able and forceful preacher. Two leading contemporaries ranked him at the top. Bishop ENOCH M. MARVIN declared that Caples was "the greatest preacher in Missouri. His rank would have been with the first class anywhere on the continent." William S. Woodard wrote, "As far as my opportunities and ability to form a correct opinion, enable me to do so, I give this verdict: W. G. Caples was the greatest preacher Missouri ever produced." Caples left no printed sermons, but contemporary accounts of his pulpit efforts seem to indicate that his messages were singularly lucid and gripping. In perspective it is doubtful that he matched Bishop Marvin as a pulpit preacher.

Perhaps Caples' surest merit was his able leadership in education under church auspices. He advocated a statewide system of church schools, one high school in every presiding elder's district, with one central college or university in Missouri. Though that plan was never realized, he was one of the founders of CENTRAL METHODIST COLLEGE in 1854 and was almost solely responsible for locating it in Fayette. He served as agent for the college two years, 1856-58. Though strongly favoring church colleges, Caples, like many other Methodist leaders of his day, was opposed to theological seminaries.

Though from Ohio, Caples voted for the Missouri Conference to adhere South in 1845. He was a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCES of the M. E. Church, South of 1850, 1854, and 1858, and to the one that did not meet in 1862. His friend Marvin worked vainly for his election to the episcopacy in 1858. Caples served briefly as an unofficial chaplain under General Sterling Price, was taken captive by Union forces in 1862, was imprisoned six months, and was then paroled. Returning to the pastorate, he was just beginning the second year of his second tour at Glasgow when the opposing forces were fighting for control of the town. A stray Confederate cannon ball struck him as he stood at the foot of the paragonage stairway, and he died three days later on Oct. 11, 1864.

on Aug. 25, 1868. He was educated at Atlanta University, Chicago Theological Seminary and the University of Chicago. He received honorary degrees from WILBERFORCE UNIVERSITY and MORRIS BROWN COLLEGE. Converted in 1877, he was licensed to preach in 1888, ordained deacon in 1889 and elder in 1890. He was the pastor of churches in the states of Florida and Illinois. During a long term as pastor in Chicago he was an outstanding figure in the public and political life of the city and state for more than a quarter of a century. Carey, the father of Archibald Carey, Jr., pastor of Quinn Chapel and recently elected judge in CHICAGO, was elected to the episcopacy in 1920. He served the Fourteenth and Fourth Episcopal Districts. Carey died on March 23, 1931.

CARGILL, DAVID (?-1843), British Methodist missionary pioneer to FIJI, was a graduate of Aberdeen University. He entered the Wesleyan ministry in 1832, and was designated immediately for the Friendly Islands. His scholarship was to be used in translation work, already begun by WILLIAM CROSS and others. In spite of the tiny staff of half-a-dozen in TONGA, the mission there wished to establish work in Fiji among the cannibal islanders, and Cargill began the mission there with Cross in 1835. Cargill was scholarly, austere, and gentle, making considerable impact on the islanders, but died April 25, 1843, after returning from furlough to Vavau in the Friendly Islands.

CARHART, WALTER D. (1876-1960), American missionary to CHILE, 1906-48, was born in Marshalltown, Iowa. He was received into the conference on trial in 1907 and served the churches in Iquique, CONCEPCION, and SANTIAGO. He also taught in Iquique English College, Colegio Americano in Concepcion, and the Sweet Memorial Institute in Santiago. For several years he served the Board of Missions as its field treasurer in Chile. Other responsibilities included being administrator of El Cristiano, official organ of the Chile Annual Conference, and superintendent of the Central District.

In 1909 he married Ethel Shepherd, who had come to Chile as a Methodist missionary from the Dakota Territory, U.S.A., and who also carried on an active life of service as teacher in Colegio Americano in Concepcion, and later as director of Sweet Memorial Institute.

In 1948 the Carharts were retired from active service of the Board of Missions, but were asked to go to CUBA as advisors for the Methodist agricultural school being organized at Preston. However, after only one year in Cuba they were recalled to Chile to alleviate the shortage of missionaries at the EL VERGEL AGRICULTURAL INSTITUTE, where they remained for ten years.

CARIBBEAN AND THE AMERICAS, METHODIST CHURCH IN THE. The Methodist Church in the Caribbean and the Americas was formally inaugurated in 1967, at the Methodist Conference Center, Belmont, Saint Johns, Antigua, West Indies.

The church then comprised six former overseas districts of the British Methodist Conference, namely, GUYANA, HONDURAS, JAMAICA with the sub-district of HAITI, LEEWARD ISLANDS, PANAMA and COSTA RICA, and the South Caribbean districts. This number was increased to eight in 1968, by the addition of the BAHAMAS and the elevation of Haiti to district status.

In accordance with the move toward autonomy, it was decided in 1960 that there should be an autonomous Conference of the Methodist Church in the Caribbean.

The British Conference agreed to and encouraged this move. Douglas Thompson, then President of the British Conference, and Sister Dora Dixon, Secretary for the Caribbean area of the Methodist Missionary Society, with Edward Rogers and Arthur H. Chapple, were present to represent the British Methodist Church in ceremonies connected with the setting up of the Methodist Church in the Caribbean and the Americas. Also present were the chairmen, ministerial and lay representatives, appointed by the synods of the districts that comprise the Conference of the Methodist Church in the Caribbean area.

The Deed of Foundation by which the new church was inaugurated was signed on May 18, 1967. Four officers of the Conference were appointed: President, HUGH B. SHERLOCK; Vice-President, Sir Donald Jackson; Secretary, EDWIN L. TAYLOR; and Treasurer, J. R. A. McDONALD. According to the constitution the President may be elected annually for five years, and the Vice-President's office is of two years' duration. The Vice-President for 1969-71 is C. Frank Henville. The President of the Conference is a Vice-President of the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL, and Edwin Taylor is a member of the Central Committee of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Land was given for a Conference headquarters by the government of Antigua. The place is called Belmont, and commands a view from every point of the compass. The island of Antigua was chosen chiefly because of its historical connections with early Methodism in both Britain and America (see WEST INDIES).

In its various districts the church works with many other denominations in a variety of ways. The Caribbean Committee for Joint Christian Action is concerned with Sunday school programs and audio-visual work. In most parts of the Caribbean, Methodist churches are members of Christian Councils, some of which include Roman Catholic as well as Anglican and Protestant members. Ecumenical training is given to Methodist and other ministers at the United Theological College of the West Indies, at Kingston, Jamaica, of which the principal, John Hoad, is a Methodist. Methodists share in a joint outreach to students on the various campuses of the University of the West Indies.

While English is the language of the conference and district meetings (except in the Haiti district synod), the church covers an area around the Caribbean where French, Spanish, Dutch, French creole, papiamento, and the language of the Guyami Indians of Panama is spoken.

Situated in the islands of the Caribbean, the mainland territories of Guyana in South America and in Honduras and Panama and Costa Rica in Central America, the church exists in the territories of many different governments, all of whom accept the presence of the church which seeks to cooperate with them in their service to the people of the territories.

The Methodist Church in the Caribbean and the Americas has its own missionary outreach among the Valiente Indians of Panama, in Haiti, and in Honduras. Certain projects are supported jointly by all the districts of the church.

He was president of the Board of Trustees of Texas Methodist Student Movement, president of the Texas Methodist Planning Committee, president of the North Texas Conference Board of Education, 1960-62, president of the Greater Dallas Council of Churches, 1957-59. CARLISLE, JAMES HENRY (1825-1909), American educator and college president, was born in Winnsboro, S. C., on May 24, 1825. In 1853 he was elected to the first faculty of WOFFORD COLLEGE by the SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE. From 1854 to 1875 he served as faculty member and from 1875 to 1902 he was president of the college, continuing at the same time his duties as teacher.

Carlisle was a noted churchman. He was elected to the first General Conference of the M. E. Church, South, and was reelected as long as he would consent to serve. He was also selected as fraternal delegate to the general conferences of other denominations. While he wrote for the church publications occasionally, it was as a public speaker that he made his most significant contribution. A man of striking appearance, impressive sincerity, and unusual gifts, he was certainly one of the most influential leaders in South Carolina in his day.

For fifty years Carlisle gave himself with assiduous dedication to the mission of a small college. He conceived that mission to be "the making of men; the development of immature youths into capable, honest, high-minded, patriotic citizens and Christians." Thus it was as teacher and counselor that he made his largest contribution. Subject matter to him was secondary to his interest in the development of the student. Personal contact with each student in and out of the classroom gave him intimate knowledge of Wofford men. Long before personal counselling was known as a part of college procedure, he inaugurated a system of counselling involving each student of the college. The student body was small, and he made it a point to spend one hour in this personal relation with each student during the college term.

Under Carlisle's leadership an amazing number of distinguished men were trained for church and state. Out of the small college came bishops, governors, senators, and congressmen, leaders in industry, and dedicated men in every walk of life.

Carlisle died in Spartanburg, on the campus of Wofford College, on Oct. 21, 1909.

CLARENCE CLIFFORD NORTON

CARLSON, BENGT AUGUST (1833-1920), was a Swedish minister, one of the founders of the Methodist work in SWEDEN, FINLAND, and RUSSIA. He was born in Tydje in the county of Dalsland, Sweden, Nov. 25, 1833. As a young man he migrated to America. He was converted at the BETHEL SHIP in New York harbor and became a Methodist. He soon began to preach and was accepted on trial in the CENTRAL ILLINOIS CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church in 1865, ordained deacon in 1866 and elder in 1867. He became a pioneer in Jamestown, N. Y. In 1869 he was sent to Sweden to cooperate with Victor Witting (see SWEDEN) in their pioneer work. Carlson worked in Karlskrona (where the first Methodist chapel in Sweden was built in 1870), Kalmar, and Stockholm. He was presiding elder for Karlskrona, STOCKHOLM, and GOTHENBURG districts. He was sent to Finland in 1884, founded the Methodist Church in the capital, Helsingfors (Helsinki). He preached in many places in the south of Finland, stretching his work in 1888 even to St. Petersburg (now Leningrad), then the capital of the vast Russian Empire. He started the Methodist church magazine, Nya Budbäraren (New Messenger), was its first editor from 1886 to 1891, when he returned to Sweden after the death of his wife, Emma Rydow. Pastor in several charges in Sweden until his retirement in 1907, he was also Sweden's first delegate to the General Conferences in 1880 and 1884. He published several tracts and books about important points of Methodist theology.

MANSFIELD HURTIG

THOMAS CARLTON

CARLTON, THOMAS (1808-1874), senior BOOK AGENT of the M. E. Church, 1852-72, was born in Londonderry, N. H., July 20, 1808, and while a lad his parents moved to Niagara County, N. Y., where he spent his youth on a farm. He joined the church in 1825, and was admitted to the GENESSEE CONFERENCE in 1829. His major appointments in the next twenty-three years were: agent for Genesee Wesleyan Seminary, 1834-35, and 1837; First Church, ROCHESTER, 1840-41; Lima, 1842-43; and a total of seven years on three districts—Wellsborough, Niagara, and Buffalo—between 1844 and 1852.

In 1852 the GENERAL CONFERENCE elected Carlton as senior book agent at NEW YORK, and there in the next twenty years he rendered outstanding service to the church. At the same time he was also treasurer of the Missionary Society of the denomination. (During that period the society regularly elected the senior book agent as its treasurer so as to have the benefit of the accounting facilities of the BOOK CONCERN.) Endowed with tact and business acumen, Carlton was a remarkably successful book agent. During a difficult period in the nation's history, he lifted the Book Concern to a commanding position in the field of publishing and disseminating Christian literature.

During Carlton's last quadrennium, JOHN LANAHAN, the junior book agent, discovered irregularities in several departments of the Book Concern and publicly exposed them. A bitter quarrel ensued, and charges and counter charges were aired in the 1872 General Conference. That body exonerated Carlton, but it did not reelect either agent.

The Genesee Conference elected Carlton a delegate to the General Conference seven times, 1848-72, the vote being almost unanimous on the seventh occasion. In 1872 Carlton took the supernumerary relationship in his annual conference, and though continuing his interest in the enterprises of the church, he engaged partially in secular pursuits. He died at Elizabeth, N. J., April 17, 1874.

ALBERT CARMAN

CARMAN, ALBERT (1833-1917), principal of ALBERT COLLEGE, Belleville, Ontario, bishop of the M. E. Church in CANADA, and superintendent of the Methodist Church of Canada, was born June 27, 1833, in Matilda Township, Upper Canada of United Empire Loyalist stock. Originally from Kehl, near Strasbourg, Germany, the Carman (Kerman) family settled at Johnstown, N. Y. in 1750, moving to Montreal in 1781 and to Matilda Township in 1784. He was educated at Dundas High School and Victoria College, from which he graduated in 1855.

Converted during a student mission, he turned his attention toward the church, and on June 4, 1857, was admitted on trial as a minister. He was ordained an elder in 1864.

In 1857 Carman became professor of mathematics at Belleville Seminary, a newly opened Methodist Episcopal college, and in 1858 he was appointed principal. He strongly supported the seminary's financial appeals in The Canadian Christian Advocate and assumed control of the college's internal finances. He attempted to increase the enrollment by rearranging the terms so that young men might attend college but return to the farm at busy periods. He sought a university charter for the seminary, and in 1866 it became Albert University, for whose interests he contended vigorously.

Albert Carman became a bishop of the Canada M. E. Church in 1874. As bishop, Carman emphasized the pre-eminence of the spiritual life. He asserted the necessity of spiritual renewal and fidelity to Methodist principles. Preaching was of fundamental importance, but effective preaching could come only from an informed mind and a warmed heart. He believed that the church must be strictly governed and that changes should be effected in an orderly and deliberate fashion. In an expanding nation the church had to grow and to diversify its work. To this end, he strongly supported the missionary enterprise in the Western provinces and promoted higher education. Carman was one of the founders of Alma College, a Methodist Episcopal school for girls, which began in 1878. Finally, he was conscious of the need for association between the branches of Methodism and between different branches of the church.

Bishop Carman attended the first Methodist Ecumenical Council at Wesley's Chapel, London, in 1881, one result of which was to reactivate Methodist union negotiations in Canada. In 1882, he was appointed chairman of the joint Methodist committees on union which agreed on a basis of union, and the following year he was a delegate to the Canadian United General Conference at which it was proposed that Methodist union should be consummated July 1, 1884. Two general superintendents would be appointed to serve the Methodist Church of Canada, S. D. RICE and Albert Carman. Following the deaths of Rice and of his successor, J. A. Williams, Carman continued as sole general superintendent until 1910.

Carman welcomed moves toward a wider church union, and was a member of the Methodist union committee which met the union committees of the Presbyterian and Congregational churches in 1904 to form a joint committee on union. In 1905 he helped to found the Methodist Church of Japan. However, in Canada the controversy in the Methodist theological colleges precipitated by Carman's rejection of the findings of modern biblical scholarship was a major obstacle to union and to peace in his own church.

Carman campaigned actively against social evils in Canada. A prolific writer, he contributed numerous letters and sermons to the press. His emphasis on the work of the Holy Spirit found expression in his book, The Guiding Eye or The Holy Spirit's Guidance of the Believer.

The Methodist General Conference in 1910 appointed Carman for a further eight years as general superintendent, a duty to be shared with S. D. CHOWN, appointed for a four-year term. In 1914 the General Conference relieved Carman, then eighty-one, of his duties and appointed him general superintendent emeritus.

He died Nov. 2, 1917. At the funeral service in Carlton Street Methodist Church, Toronto, T. A. Moore described Albert Carman as a genial autocrat, an evangelistic preacher, a master of assemblies, an intense patriot, and a great churchman. He was buried at Mount Pleasant Cemetery, Toronto, on Nov. 6, 1917.

ALBERT BURNSIDE

CAROLINE MAMA was a saintly Indian lady converted as a young woman shortly after the Sepoy uprising. On the membership rolls her name was recorded as Ellen Richards. She worked as a Bible woman in LUCKNOW, visiting Hindu and Moslem women who after the custom of the upper-class families of the day were confined to their homes. She had such charm and grace, and so abounded in kindness, that her visits were eagerly sought after. Her testimony was convincing, and her prayers seemed to reach both the throne of God and the hearts of all who heard them. The date of her birth is not known.

JULIAN S. CARR

CARR, JULIAN SHAKESPEARE (1845-1924), American layman and prominent industrialist, was born in Chapel Hill, N. C. on Oct. 12, 1845. He graduated from the University of North Carolina.

During the War Between the States, Carr served as a Lieutenant General in the Confederate Army of Northern VIRGINIA, commanding the NORTH CAROLINA division. After the war he took part in the work of the United Confederate Veterans.

A very successful Southern businessman, Carr was president of the Bull Durham Tobacco Co., the First National Bank of Durham, and the Ormond Mining Co., and in addition was on the Board of Directors of more than a dozen business and religious institutions. He took particular interest in furthering the work of charitable and educational institutions, and served as a Trustee of the North Carolina Children's Home; GREENSBORO COLLEGE; PAINE COLLEGE; Training School for Colored People, Augusta, Ga.; AMERICAN UNIVERSITY; Home for the Aged at Durham; Confederate Home for Women, Fayetteville, N. C. He volunteered his services as an aide to Herbert Hoover as Federal food administrator in 1917-1919.

His election as delegate to the 1921 ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE in London and to the ROBERT RAIKES Sunday School Centennial recognized his outstanding service to the Church.

In 1881, Carr met and was very much impressed by a young Chinese lad who had reached Wilmington, N. C., on a Coast Guard vessel. The young man had recently been converted to Methodism and Carr agreed to sponsor him. The young man, CHARLES J. SOONG, after attending Trinity College and VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY, returned to CHINA as a missionary and founded one of the most prominent families of modern China. He married a devout Christian woman and they had six children. One of the daughters became Madame Sun Yat Sen; another became the wife of H. H. Kung, a descendant of Confucius and Finance Minister; a son, T. V. Soong was both Finance Minister and Foreign Minister of China; and the youngest daughter, Mayling Soong, became the famed MADAME CHIANG KAI SHEK.

Carr was a member of the original committee which proposed the Southern Assembly at LAKE JUNALUSKA, N. C., and was on its first Executive Committee.

He died in Durham, N. C., on April 29, 1924.

CARR, WESLEY MOORE (1894-1950), American minister, educator, and missionary to BRAZIL, was born in Hughart, W. Va. on April 22, 1894. He received a B.A. from RANDOLPH-MACON COLLEGE, a B.D. from CANDLER SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY, the S.T.M. and Th.M. from Union Theological Seminary, and later did graduate work in hellenistic studies at Yale Divinity School. His first appointment in the United States was in the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE. In 1922 he went to Brazil with his wife, Le Etta Ball, as a missionary.

Carr taught Greek and New Testament in the seminary then connected with INSTITUTO GRANBERY and later in the seminary when it was moved to Rudge Ramos, near SÃO PAULO. At various times over the years, he served as district superintendent; as Reitor (principal) of the seminary and as Reitor of Instituto Uniao in Uruguaiana, South Brazil. He was a member of the language committee for new missionaries, served with the board of education in the South Brazil Conference; and with the boards of trustees of the Instituto Metodista in São Paulo, the Instituto Piracicabano, and the interdenominational Evangelical Confederation. Twice Carr was a delegate to World Sunday School conventions—in Rio de Janeiro, 1932, and in Oslo, 1936. In 1941 he represented Brazilian Methodism at the first Latin American Consultation in BUENOS AIRES. He was the author of two books in Portuguese—Paulo and Comentarios sobre o livro de Galatas (Commentary on Galatians).

During an interim in the United States, Carr became visiting professor at EMORY UNIVERSITY; then at SCARRITT COLLEGE and at VANDERBILT. Mrs. Carr died while they were in NASHVILLE. Prior to his return to Brazil in 1947 he married Hester Bruce of Georgia, who had been a missionary in Brazil under the Women's Division of The Methodist Church.

Carr died suddenly on Feb. 6, 1950. He was buried at his request in the Santo Amaro Cemetery, scene of his last parish.

Survivors included his wife, Hester, and three children from his first marriage—Rosalie Carson, Jeannette Castil, and Kenneth (died December 1967).

HESTER BRUCE CARR

CARRADINE, BEVERLY (1848-1919), American pastor and holiness evangelist of the M. E. Church, South, was born April 4, 1848, in Yazoo County, Miss. He was converted at the age of twenty-six in the summer of 1874. His call to preach soon followed, and the same year he was licensed to preach by the MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE. His ordination to DEACON came in 1876 and to ELDER in 1878. He served the Vernon, Madison, Brandon and Crystal Springs charges before transferring to the LOUISIANA CONFERENCE in 1882. There he served the St. Charles (now Rayne Memorial) and Carondelet Street Churches in NEW ORLEANS in successive order. In 1889, while pastor at Carondelet Street, Carradine testified that he experienced the instantaneous baptism of the Holy Spirit. In 1890, he transferred to the ST. LOUIS CONFERENCE where he served Centenary and First Church in ST. LOUIS. During these years he quickly rose to fame as an outstanding spokesman for the holiness movement.

Carradine was a flaming evangel for righteousness in New Orleans at the time when the Louisiana lottery was holding that state in its evil grip. Some time later, after his tenure in St. Louis, he became persuaded that the Methodist Church had grown cold and was forgetting its mission to spread holiness. So he located in 1893 and went into evangelistic work on his own account. For a time he was in the Oliver Gospel Mission in Columbia, S. C. He also published a holiness paper.

In 1890 his book Sanctification appeared and immediately became a classic statement of the holiness position. He became deeply involved in the "come-out" controversy as the century closed (the "come-outers" insisted on leaving the church—"Come ye out and be ye separate") but was a strong advocate for holiness people to remain within the Methodist Church. Among his many books are Graphic Scenes (1911), Heart Talks (1899), The Sanctified Life (1897), The Second Blessing in Symbol (1893), The Old Man (1896), and Pastoral Sketches.

Beverly Carradine was a man of a singularly sweet disposition and reflected none of the self-sufficiency too often found among the "perfectionists." In his old age, having no church connection to support him, he knew the pinch of poverty. Upon learning of this fact, certain of his friends, including a bishop of the M. E. Church, South, did what they could to alleviate something of his condition. Upon his death his body was borne to Vicksburg, Miss., where the preachers and certain comrades of earlier years, led by Nolan B. Harmon, Sr., then pastor there, met the train bringing his body and tenderly laid him to rest.

CARROLL, JOHN SALT KILL (1809-1884), Canadian minister and historian, was born in New Brunswick in 1809. At an early age he was exposed to Methodist preaching, which led him to seek systematically for salvation. He had a profound religious experience in 1824; three years later he began to preach. He was ordained in 1833.

From 1827 until his death in 1884, John Carroll was an active minister. He served on circuits throughout Upper Canada; he was a district chairman for twenty-seven years, and in 1863 he was co-delegate of the WESLEYAN METHODIST CHURCH. His pastoral work was characterized by most careful attention to detail. Although he was not a great preacher, his genuine saintliness, zeal, and good judgment made him a most effective minister.

In addition to his pastoral work, Carroll was an indefatigable student and writer. Although he had little formal education, he acquired a sound knowledge of Greek and Hebrew, theology, and ecclesiastical history. Above all, in his generation he was the most eminent historian of Methodism in Upper and Lower Canada. It was fitting that the man who preached WILLIAM CASE's funeral sermon should write between 1867 and 1877 the five volumes entitled Case and His Contemporaries; or The Canadian Itinerants' Memorial. Unlike many such works, it is judicious, accurate, and charitable. In addition Carroll wrote Past and Present (1860), My Boy Life (1882), Father Corson; or the Old Style Canadian Itinerant (1879), and The School of the Prophets (1876). In these and in his innumerable contributions to The Christian Guardian and other periodicals, Carroll not only kept alive a knowledge of the Methodist past, but also softened the asperities between the various Methodist churches.

Carroll's death occurred but a few months after the formal inauguration of the Methodist Church in Canada, in which all the Methodists were united. As one who had labored faithfully for this consummation, it was doubtless an event which cheered his last days. He died as he had lived, intent upon the extension of his church. Subsequently, one wrote: "Though his familiar form will be no more seen among us, and we shall miss his words of inspiration and admonition, he will long live in the affectionate remembrance of his brethren, to whom his name is still as ointment poured forth."

CARROLL, NATHANIEL MONROE (1837-1931), American preacher, was born in Calvert County, Md., as a slave sometime during the year 1837, and was received on trial at the first session of the WASHINGTON CONFERENCE, organized in Old Sharp Street M. E. Church, Oct. 27, 1864. His pastoral record extended over MARYLAND, VIRGINIA and the District of Columbia. Carroll had been a trustee of MORGAN COLLEGE for twenty-three years, one of the founders and president of the Aged Men and Women's Home which later became the N. M. Carroll Home in Baltimore, Md. He gave fifty-three years of successful service in the Conference. He was instrumental in building twenty-six churches, saved sixteen from being sold; served as presiding elder ten years; licensed to preach fifty-four preachers; organized forty-four Epworth League chapters, and was instrumental in bringing thousands into the Kingdom of God. Upon retirement he received the Chautauqua salute and a silver loving cup. N. M. Carroll was called the "father" of the Washington Conference. He was the embodiment of preparedness, punctuality, a faithful pastor, a wise administrator, and a far-seeing counsellor. Two sons, John and Clayton, became ministers; one son, Daniel, became a doctor.

CARSON, HATTIE GERE (1862-1927), an American missionary to MEXICO and CUBA, was born Nov. 17, 1862 in Baltimore, Md., in the home of C. G. Carson and Sarah Gere Carson. Soon after they moved to SAVANNAH, GA., and became active members in the Wesley Monumental Church. Through the influence of her home and church she became interested in missions.

She was appointed in 1895 as a missionary to Mexico where she served for four years in Durango. In 1899 she was sent to Santiago de Cuba to open a school for girls. After a year in the Oriente Province, it was decided to open the school in Havana. This school was the beginning of Eliza Bowman School which was later moved to a permanent location in Cienfuegos.

Two of her close associates were Marcia Marvin, daughter of Bishop ENOCH MARVIN, and Ethel Ellis of North Georgia.

For health reasons she asked to be released from being director of Eliza Bowman and was transferred to become a teacher in Colegio Pinson, CAMAGUEY in 1914. There she made her home with the Rev. and Mrs. B. O. Hill, as a part of their family.

Although her health continued to fail, she kept on teaching, having her classes meet in her bedroom. In 1926 she made a brief trip with Mrs. Hill to her sister's home in Georgia but soon longed for the tropical sunshine. She suffered intensely for months, but her last days were full of repose and she slipped quietly away in 1927. For a time her body was placed in a vault in the cemetery of Camaguey, but according to a promise B. O. Hill took her remains to the States in 1929, when he retired, and she was reinterred in Bonaventure Cemetery, Savannah, Ga.

CARSON, HERMAN ROBINSON (1890-1967), American minister and conference executive, was born at Greenfield, Ill., Nov. 22, 1890, the son of John and Hannah Jane (Zink) Carson. He received the A.B. degree and the diploma in theology in 1916 from ASBURY COLLEGE, and the school awarded him the D.D. in 1950. He married Irene Thomason, Aug. 31, 1911, and they had three sons. After the death of his first wife, he married Effie M. Patton, Dec. 25, 1945.

Admitted on trial in the NORTH INDIANA CONFERENCE in 1917, Carson was ordained deacon in 1919 and elder in 1921. He served pastorates until 1946, the later ones being Fort Wayne Trinity, Portland, Anderson Noble Street, Decatur, and Goshen First. From 1946 to 1960 he served as executive secretary of the conference Preachers' Aid Society. Carson held a number of conference and connec-tional offices: president of the conference board of education, 1939-41; dean of the Epworth Forest Institute and Assembly, 1945-47; trustee of the Ball State University WESLEY FOUNDATION, 1935-60; vice-president of the Purdue University Wesley Foundation, 1950-60; president of the conference historical society, 1950-60; president of the Indiana Methodist Historical Society, 1952-60; president of the North Central Jurisdictional Historical Association, 1946-60; and a member of the executive committee of the ASSOCIATION OF METHODIST HISTORICAL SOCIETIES, 1950-60. A member of the Sons of the American Revolution, he was Indiana chaplain, 1964-66, and chaplain general, 1965-66. He was a contributing author to and editor of the History of the North Indiana Conference, volume 2, published in 1956.

CARSON CITY, NEVADA, U.S.A., the seat of Ormsby County, the capital of the state, and historically the birth-place of NEVADA Methodism. Here Jesse L. Bennett preached in 1858 and established the first Methodist Society in Nevada in 1859.

Although the first society, its church building was the sixth in the state. In 1861, with the appointment of W. T. Blakely, a campaign for capital funds was launched. Territorial Governor James W. Nye attended the initial meeting. Actual building, however, awaited Warren Nims, who arrived in 1863. A parsonage was completed in 1864. Work on the church began in 1865. Nims hauled all the stone for the church from the prison quarry with a team of horses and a cart. Nevada's first governor, H. G. Blasdel, was a trustee during this period. The church was dedicated on Sept. 8, 1867, by Bishop EDWARD THOMSON. During the pastorate of W. H. D. Hornaday, the church building was enlarged, remodeled, and fitted with stained glass windows. A rededication took place in August of 1909 with Bishop EDWIN HOLT HUGHES presiding.

The Methodists and Presbyterians became a Federated Church in 1929. The Federation was dissolved in 1948.

In 1959, the church observed its centennial. Fred A. Rinehart was the pastor. Bishop DONALD H. TIPPETT preached the centennial sermon, "Reveille or Retreat," on May 3. The General Assembly of the State of Nevada adopted a resolution memorializing Jesse L. Bennett: "The first Protestant minister to carry the word of God to the inhabitants of the eastern slopes of the Sierras."

CARTER, CULLEN TULLER (1880-1966), American minister, historian, and executive secretary (1921-36) of the TENNESSEE CONFERENCE, was born Nov. 15, 1880, in Hickman Co., Tenn., and was educated at Hardin College, the old University of Nashville, and VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY.

He was admitted on trial into the NORTH ALABAMA CONFERENCE in 1905 and transferred the next year to the Tennessee Conference. During his forty-eight years in the ministry Carter organized, built, or rebuilt thirty churches, the major portion of this work being done while he was executive secretary of the conference and in charge of the training program for Sunday school teachers.

As a historian of Methodism in Tennessee, Carter published the following works: Methodist Doctrinal Beliefs (1942); History of the Tennessee Conference (1948); Life and Letters of Asbury (1954); History of Methodist Churches and Institutions in Middle Tennessee (1956); Methodism in the Wilderness (1960); Methodist Leaders in the Old Jerusalem Conference, 1812-1962 (1961); History of the Cookeville District (1962) and History of the Columbia District (1962). As a result of his interest in Methodist history, he was instrumental in having a number of historic sites in the Tennessee Conference marked and monuments erected. During the last years of his life, Carter was curator of the Methodist museum and archives at MARTIN COLLEGE, Pulaski, Tenn., a collection chiefly amassed by him.

During the first World War Carter served with the Y.M.C.A. in France. Later he traveled extensively in Palestine, Egypt, Europe, MEXICO, and CUBA.

In 1905 he was married to Mary Lucy Christopher of Westmoreland, Ala. They had one son, James Paul. The first Mrs. Carter died in 1957. In 1959 he married Mrs. Mary McFerrin Faris Duncan.

Carter died April 20, 1966, at his home near Pulaski.

CARTER, DAVID WENDELL (1848-1937), American missionary to CUBA and MEXICO, was born July 8, 1848. After abundant labors for twenty years in Mexico, with his principal work as editor of El Evangelista Mexicano, he was requested by Bishop W. A. CANDLER to give one month to study conditions in Cuba. As a result he took his family and later transferred to Cuba, arriving in HAVANA, Feb. 22, 1899.

He had married Cornelia Stanley Keith, Oct. 20, 1884. Their children were Keith, Ella Douglas, David W., Jr., Annie Frazier, Hugh Servier, Stanley and Cornelia Keith.

He secured legal status for the church from the government in 1899. He had the power of attorney for the Board of Missions of the M. E. Church, South, and he became the superintendent of the entire mission. At the first Cuba Annual Conference on Jan. 30, 1900, he was appointed district superintendent over ten circuit and station preachers. By 1906 the work had grown to such a degree that the island was divided into Eastern and Western Districts, and Carter was assigned to the Western District. He arranged for evangelistic services to be held in every church.

While on furlough in 1936, his doctors advised him that a change in climate would be beneficial to him, and he was transferred to the Western Mexican Border Conference.

Most of the city properties throughout Cuba were bought under his supervision—properties in use up to the present time. "A man of piety, culture, judgment, frank but friendly, he gave his latter years to the Mexican work in Texas," where he retired in 1929 after fifty-two years in the active ministry.

He died Sept. 3, 1937, and was buried at Georgetown, Texas.

CARTER, HENRY (1874-1951), British Methodist, was born in Plymouth. He entered the Wesleyan Methodist ministry in 1901, training at Handsworth College. An associate of S. E. KEEBLE, he entered the Temperance Department of the Wesleyan Church in 1911, remaining there for thirty-one years. Prominent as a temperance reformer, Carter was appointed to the Liquor Control Board (1916), and was a member of the Royal Commission on Licensing (1929-32). For his work on this, he received the C.B.E. He helped to create the Order of Christian Citizenship (see CHRISTIAN CITIZENSHIP DEPARTMENT) and the Methodist Peace Fellowship. He worked unceasingly for refugees, displaced persons, and other victims of the two World Wars. His most important publication was his BECKLY Lecture, The English Temperance Movement (1933), one of the few serious studies of this vital factor in nineteenth-century English history. He died on June 19, 1951.

FRANK CUMBERS

CARTER, RANDALL ALBERT (1867-1954), eleventh bishop of the C. M. E. CHURCH, was born at Fort Valley, Ga., on Jan. 1, 1867. He received the A.B., M.A., and D.D. degrees from PAINE COLLEGE, and honorary doctorates from LANE COLLEGE and ALLEN UNIVERSITY.

He joined the SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE in 1887 and transferred to the GEORGIA CONFERENCE the following year. He served as pastor of churches in Dunbarton, Augusta, and Barnesville in Georgia. He was secretary to the EPWORTH LEAGUE from 1898 to 1903, and was PRESIDING ELDER for fourteen years.

He was elected a bishop in 1914 and lived in CHICAGO. He was long a member of the FEDERAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and a member of its Executive Committee. Bishop Carter was the author of numerous books, including a volume on the Hebrew Prophets.

CARTER, THOMAS COKE (1851-1916), American U. B. bishop, was born Jan. 1, 1851 in Carroll County, Tenn. to loyal Methodist parents. Local educational opportunities being meager, he walked to another community to study under an unusual teacher. At seventeen he preached his first sermon. In 1869, he joined the TENNESSEE CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church and served a circuit. He spent four years at TENNESSEE WESLEYAN COLLEGE, then transferred to DEPAUW UNIVERSITY from which he graduated in 1875. He was principal of the West Tennessee Seminary one year, and was president of Tullahoma College as well as college pastor, 1876-80. He was married to Maggie Brown in 1875.

He was superintendent of Mission Schools of the M. E. Church in Central CHINA, 1880-82, but became critically ill and was returned home. Recovering quickly, he was called to fill the vacant editorship of the Atlanta-based Methodist Advocate, later published at CHATTANOOGA, Tenn., which he did well for nine years. As a member of the Northern branch of Methodism and editing a paper for that church in the South, sharp controversies arose to make the work difficult.

In 1894 he transferred his credentials to the CHURCH OF THE UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST. He was known as an individualistic and outstanding southern orator, a religious journalist, and educator. The BOARD OF MISSIONS appointed him superintendent of all advance work in the South, and in 1905 to the bishopric as episcopal head of that field. It appeared for a while that great advance was being made in the South; but by 1909 it was evident that the prospects were not as hopeful as they had been portrayed. In 1913 the work was dissolved and the GENERAL CONFERENCE elected Bishop Carter to an emeritus relationship without salary, although he was but sixty-two years of age at that time.

Carter gave himself to preaching and lecturing, and in this field he was very popular throughout America. He came to a tragic death in Cincinnati, Ohio, Feb. 27, 1916, and was buried at Chattanooga, Tenn.

CARTWRIGHT, BARTON H. (1810-1895), American pioneer preacher, was born in Genesee Co., N. Y., March 9, 1810 and died at Oregon, Ill., April 3, 1895. He was the son of a Baptist preacher. When he was twelve years old, his father died while looking for a new home in ILLINOIS. At the age of eighteen, Barton was converted and joined the M. E. CHURCH. In 1833 he traveled on foot and by boat to Flint Hills, now BURLINGTON, IOWA. On his first Sabbath there he crossed the river to attend services at an appointment on the Henderson River Mission, of which BARTON RANDLE was preacher. Because of the preacher's illness, Cartwright was persuaded to preach in his place. He was given an exhorter's license by Randle and was licensed to preach in March 1834, by PETER CARTWRIGHT.

His first assignment was to the Flint Hills settlements in Iowa "to preach and form societies, if practicable, and to make report thereof to the Conference." That he might be independent, he preferred to rely upon his own labor for support. He started for his mission with four yoke of oxen, a breaking plow, and a load of provender. His time was divided between breaking prairie for the new settlers in the daytime, and holding meetings at night and on the Sabbath. He started the first Methodist class in Flint Hills, in the home of Dr. Ross, not later, he says, than the first of May, 1834, which consisted of six persons, with Dr. Ross as the leader. This class was the start of what is now First Church in Burlington, Iowa. In the fall he was received on trial into the conference. He was received into full connection in 1836. At that time he asked and received location, but continued to work as he was able. In 1839 he was readmitted. The next year he was assigned into the ROCK RIVER CONFERENCE when the ILLINOIS CONFERENCE was divided. He served as a Chaplain with the 9th Regiment of the Illinois Volunteer Infantry in 1863, and was with Sherman and Kilpatrick in the famous march to the sea.

Cartwright was married April 18, 1839 to Chloe J. Benedict, who was the first school teacher in Ogle County, Ill. He was superannuated in 1883, died at Oregon, Ill. April 3, 1895, and was buried there.

CARTWRIGHT, PETER (1785-1872), American pioneer circuit rider, whose unusual career and colorful exploits have become a tradition in American Methodism, was born Sept. 1, 1785, in Amherst County, Va. His family moved to Lancaster, Lincoln Co., Ky., in 1790, and settled ultimately in 1793 at Rogue's Harbor, Logan County. Here Peter became devoted to dancing, horse racing, and playing cards. Except for some religious instruction from his Methodist mother, he received little education. He was converted in a camp meeting in 1801 and immediately joined the M. E. CHURCH, receiving an exhorter's license in May, 1802. Becoming a travelling preacher in October, 1803, he fell under WILLIAM MCKENDREE'S influence. In 1806 he was ordained deacon by Bishop ASBURY, and two years later was ordained elder by Bishop McKendree.

His early ministry successively included Red River Circuit in KENTUCKY; Waynesville Circuit, covering a part of TENNESSEE; Salt River and Shelbyville Circuit, extending into INDIANA; and Scioto Circuit in OHIO. Self-reliance, readiness with tongue and fist, and a quick sense of humor all fitted "the Kentucky boy," as Cartwright was called, for the frontier.

"After mature deliberation and prayer," he married Frances Gaines, a girl of nineteen, on Aug. 18, 1808, because, he explained, "I thought it was my duty to marry." Cartwright was presiding elder of the Wabash District in 1812 and of Green River District in 1813-16. Then, after four years on circuit in Kentucky and two as presiding elder of the Cumberland District, he was transferred in 1823 to the ILLINOIS CONFERENCE, where he was presiding elder of different districts until 1869.

This famous pioneer preacher received $238 in 1821, the highest salary in the KENTUCKY CONFERENCE; but, moving with his wife and six children to the Sangamon Circuit in Illinois, he received $40, all told, for the year.

Cartwright presided at the Illinois Conference session held September 1833 at Union Grove, Ill., in Bishop JOSHUA SOULE'S absence, mapping out an extension across the Mississippi River. Elder Cartwright, of Quincy District, commissioned Barton H. Cartwright on March 23, 1834, "to preach and form societies in the Flint Hills Settlement in Iowa." Also, "Uncle Peter" preached on North Hill, near Burlington, during the summer of 1834.

For twenty years a circuit rider and fifty years a presiding elder, "God's Plowman" as Cartwright called himself, stands out as a "Paul Bunyan of evangelism," with "legendary physical prowess, ready adaptability to all conditions of life, keen wit and an amazing power of pungent speech; and an unwavering devotion to the gospel and the Church." He was elected thirteen times in succession to the General Conference.

A strong anti-slavery man, he participated in the great General Conference debate of 1844 when the M. E. Church divided. Cartwright began his speech by saying, "Having now heard the law and the prophets, not to say the Scribes and the Pharisees. . . ."

He was twice a member of the Illinois Legislature. His one defeat came in 1846 when he ran for United States Congress against Abraham Lincoln. Minus academic training himself, he strongly advocated the founding of Methodist colleges and was largely instrumental in founding MCKENDREE COLLEGE. He died Sept. 25, 1872, at his Pleasant Plains home, Sangamon County, Ill. He and his wife were buried at Pleasant Plains. His home church at Pleasant Plains was voted to be the first conference historic site of the CENTRAL ILLINOIS CONFERENCE at its 1969 session, and was dedicated such on Oct. 19, 1969 by Bishop LANCE WEBB. The pulpit from which Peter Cartwright preached is still used in the church, with other memorabilia on display there.

CARVALHO, FELIPE REVALE (1870-1911), Brazilian preacher, was born in the state of Bahia, but moved when quite young to JUIZ DE FORA, state of Minas Gerais. He was converted under the preaching of JAMES L. KENNEDY, who had begun work in that city in 1884. Carvalho was licensed and began preaching almost at once. By May 1886, he was pastor of a little congregation in Rio Novo, Minas Gerais, with LUCCERO DE MIRANDA. On August 27, three policemen arrested them and marched them through the streets to the police station.

Kennedy arrived in town that very day, accompanying Bishop J. C. GRANBERY, who was coming there to preach. Hearing of the matter, Kennedy succeeded in having the order revoked, so that Carvalho and Miranda could continue their ministry.

On Aug. 17, 1890, Carvalho married Emilia Fontoura. Many years later in Cataguazes, a mob of fanatics attacked him after he had preached, dragging him and his pregnant wife through the streets and beating them mercilessly. When the police finally arrived and asked him what he wanted done to his attacker, he said for them to do nothing but see that "order is maintained, and then to free them, for they do not know what they are doing." Kneeling on the dusty street, bleeding and bedraggled, Carvalho prayed for those who had attacked him. His spirit of forgiveness so impressed the owner of the house that he was, as he himself said, "truly converted at that moment."

Carvalho was weakened by the rigors of rough travel and lack of nourishment. He was so impaired in health that in 1906 he asked for superannuation, the first Brazilian preacher to be thus retired. He died in 1911, survived by his widow and four children.

CARVOSSO, BENJAMIN (1789-1854), British Methodist missionary pioneer in AUSTRALIA, was the son of the Cornish class leader William Carvosso. He was born Sept. 27, 1789, at Gluvias, Cornwall, and entered the Wesleyan ministry in 1814. After five years in England, he offered to go to AUSTRALIA. Landing in Van Diemen's Land (Tasmania) in 1820, he introduced Methodism there before going on to SYDNEY. In 1825, after serving in Sydney, Windsor, and Paramatta among convicts and free settlers, he was sent to establish work in Tasmania again. By a ministry in homes and prisons, as well as in the pulpit, he laid foundations for the work that followed, returning to England in 1830. Still in the active ministry, he died at St. Ives, Nov. 20, 1854.

CYRIL J. DAVEY

CASA MATERNA ORPHANAGE, a Methodist home for children on the Corso Garibaldi, 235, in Portici, Naples, Italy, was founded on June 12, 1905, by RICCARDO SANTI and his wife Ersilia Bragaglia Santi in Naples, Italy.

Pastor Santi counted on the support of his small congregation in caring for the first two homeless children who were begging on a street corner trying to sell matches. On an impulse, he took the children home and from that day on he devoted himself to care for an ever-increasing family of orphan and abandoned children. Though Casa Matera is today sixty-one years old, it has always been a family affair for the Santis. They first made use of a small apartment, and as the number of children increased, they moved to a large home. Realizing the children's need of an education, Santi opened a school in connection with the home.

In 1909, the family numbered fifty members, and for the following ten years they lived in a building which was bought by the Methodist Church, which building served also as a church in the center of the city. In 1920, the M. E. Board of Missions acquired for Casa Matera a beautiful property in Portici, once the former home of Prince Monaco.

Casa Matera went through two World Wars. In 1938, Mussolini closed the school connected with the home because of its liberal teaching, but the home remained open to care for a good number of children. In 1942, the children were evacuated to a place near Salerno. When the Santi family returned to their home after the war, they found the buildings partially destroyed. With countless war orphans roaming the streets, there was greater need than ever before for shelter, food and clothing, which Casa Matera gave willingly. Santi and his staff, with the help of many friends abroad, rebuilt and renovated their place and added an infirmary building and a school building. This was provided with money raised in America during the Week of Dedication, 1952. Casa Matera has a band, choir, athletics and social activities, including parties. Girls are taught home arts, such as cooking and sewing. In 1957 another building was added to give more comfortable space to the older boys, and with it also workshops in mechanics and carpentry.

Since 1957 Casa Matera has been under the direction of TEOFILO SANTI, a physician, and EMANUELE SANTI, a member of the NEW YORK CONFERENCE of the United Methodist Church, who for many years was pastor in the New York area. His conference appointment is "Chaplain to Casa Matera." These two children of Papa Santi have made their own the saying of their father: "In front of a child who suffers, I do not ask who is the child, I become that child." These words express the whole philosophy of life of this family.

About fifty members of the staff work together for the welfare of the children. Volunteer organizations such as the Casa Matera Society, Inc., exist for the purpose of raising funds. Casa Matera is now on the list of Advance Specials of the United Methodist Church, and it is a recipient of gifts from the Christian Children's Fund, Inc., of Richmond, Va. At the present time, Casa Matera counts 450 children who live in seven buildings, with a large park with varieties of plants and trees. There is a vegetable garden and also a chicken farm. Through its life, 10,000 children have entered the home. Several boys are now serving the Methodist Church in Italy as ministers.

Emanuele Santi himself is well known in the United States, which he has visited from time to time in order to promote and gain support for the unique institution he and his brother direct.

CASE, FRANCIS HIGBEE (1896-1962), United States senator, was born Dec. 9, 1896, at Everly, Iowa, the son of Herbert Llewelyn and Mary (Grannis) Case. His father, a Methodist circuit rider, moved with his family to SOUTH DAKOTA in 1909. Francis won the A.B. degree at DAKOTA WESLEYAN in 1918 and the A.M. at NORTHWESTERN in 1920. Dakota Wesleyan awarded him the LL.D. degree in 1939. He married Myrle Lucile Graves, Aug. 19, 1926, and they had a son and a daughter. Entering the field of journalism, Case was assistant editor of the Epworth Herald, Chicago, 1920-22; telegraph editor and editorial writer for the Rapid City Daily Journal, 1922-25; and editor and publisher of the Hot Springs (S.D.) Star, 1925-26, and of the Custer (S.D.) Chronicle, 1931-46. In 1939 he was elected to Congress from the second district of South Dakota and was successively reelected six times. In 1951 he was elected to the Senate and served the remainder of his life. As a congressman Case was a member of the appropriations committee, and he initiated the Renegotiations Statute. As a senator he was a member of the armed services and public works committees. He sponsored bills on water conservation, desalination, cloud modification, and weather research. He was a delegate to the 47th, 48th, and 49th Conferences on Interparliamentary Union. In 1918 he was a private in the Marine Corps, and later held the rank of major in the Reserve. For a time he served as a trustee of Dakota Wesleyan. His service as a statesman is commemorated by a Potomac River bridge and a lake in South Dakota created by a dam on the Missouri River.

He died June 22, 1962, and was buried at Rapid City, S. D.

CASE, HAROLD CLAUDE (1902-), American minister and college president, was born at Cottonwood Falls, Kan., on May 20, 1902, the son of Harry Claude and Rose (Kiger) Case. He obtained his B.A. degree from BAKER UNIVERSITY in 1923, and a D.D. was given him there in 1934. He studied at the Pacific School of Religion and was awarded the S.T.B. degree at BOSTON UNIVERSITY in 1927, after which he did graduate work at Harvard and at GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE. He has been the recipient of numerous honorary degrees, including the Litt.D. from HUSTON-TILLOTSON COLLEGE in 1944; and the LL.D. degree from WEST VIRGINIA WESLEYAN in 1954; and from NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY in the same year; and from Tufts University in 1955.

He married Phyllis Elizabeth Kirk on June 29, 1927. Their children are Harold Robert, Phyllis Rosanna (Mrs. Victor Kazanjian) and David, who was tragically killed when a child. Dr. Case was ordained to the ministry of the M. E. Church and after serving North Shore Church, Glencoe, Ill. (1928-33), became pastor of the First Church in TOPEKA, Kan. (1933-38); and Elm Park Church in SCRANTON, Pa. (1938-45). From there he went to the First Church of PASADENA, Calif. (1945-51), becoming president of Boston University in that year. He served there until retirement in 1967, when he became president emeritus.

Dr. Case was a member of the GENERAL CONFERENCES of 1936, 1940, 1944, 1948, 1952, and 1956. At the General Conference of 1952, he was made head of a powerful committee created by that Conference to consider the findings of a Study Commission which had reported on and recommended the correlation of the various Methodist Boards and AGENCIES. His committee managed the complicated legislation correlating the various organizations of the church in a way that proved acceptable and the General Conference adopted with scarcely any change the report of Dr. Case's special committee. This embodied the "Commission Plan" which subsequently dominated the structural organization in each local church.

He was a member of the UNIVERSITY SENATE of The Methodist Church, 1960-68; of the Executive Committee of the Massachusetts Committee of Catholics, Protestants and Jews; a director of the Advisory Board of the State Street Bank and Trust Company; of the Board of Directors of Sterling Drug, Inc., New York; of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences; and a trustee of Boston University.

Dr. Case has also been an official representative of the Church at various overseas and home conferences, including President Eisenhower's Commission on Education Beyond High School. Among his writings, his book The Prophet Jeremiah (1953) is most frequently mentioned.

He died Feb. 20, 1972.

CASE, LELAND DAVIDSON (1900-), American editor and historian, was born in the Methodist parsonage at Wesley, Iowa, on May 8, 1900, the son of Herbert Llewelyn and Mary Ellen (Grannis) Case.

The Case family moved to the Black Hills of SOUTH DAKOTA in 1909 when the father was appointed by the NORTHWEST IOWA CONFERENCE to the Black Hills Mission.

Case studied at DAKOTA WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, 1918-20; received the B.A. degree from Macalester College in 1922; did graduate work at the Universities of Minnesota and Chicago, and in 1926 received the M.A. degree from NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY, where he later taught journalism. Four schools have bestowed honorary degrees upon him.

Case married Josephine Altman on July 28, 1931. His vocation has been journalism, which has included the city editorship of the Paris edition of the New York Herald-Tribune. For twenty years he edited The Rotarian magazine. In 1956 the METHODIST PUBLISHING HOUSE commissioned him to study its general publications, resulting in changing the role of The Christian Advocate to a professional publication for pastors and the grouping of its family functions in a new magazine, Together. He served as editorial director of both until 1963. In 1965 he began a two-year term as director of the California History Foundation at the UNIVERSITY OF THE PACIFIC, Stockton.

He was founder in 1939 of Friends of The Middle Border at Mitchell, South Dakota, and co-founder of its offspring, The Westerners, whose "corrals" are scattered over the United States and Europe. Among his memberships are the Society of Midland Authors; Western History Association; and Bibliographical Society of America. Books he has written or co-authored include Editing the Day's News, Around the Copy Desk, and The Black Hills.

During the United Nations Conference in SAN FRANCISCO in 1945, Dr. Case was an associate consultant for the United States Department of State. He received alumni awards from Macalester College, Northwestern University, and Dakota Wesleyan; a citation from SOUTHWESTERN COLLEGE; and the ST. GEORGE'S Award. He was a delegate to the WORLD METHODIST CONFERENCE in Oslo; served as a vice-president of the Association of Methodist HISTORICAL SOCIETIES, and chairman of its committee on SHRINES and Landmarks. He is one of the writers and consultants for this Encyclopedia. He resides near Tucson, Ariz.

JOHN V. MADISON

CASE, WILLIAM (1780-1855), Canadian preacher and apostle to the Indians, was born in Swansea, Mass., Aug. 27, 1780, into a moderately prosperous family. Having a good primary education, he probably taught school before his conversion in 1803. In 1805 he was received on trial by the NEW YORK CONFERENCE and appointed to the Bay of Quinte circuit in Upper Canada under the superintendency of HENRY RYAN.

His own description of his inner feelings as he traveled north provides an insight into his character:

As I was drawing near to the field of my future labor, I felt more and more deeply impressed with the importance of my mission, and my insufficiency for preaching to a people already well instructed; as yet but a boy, only about two years since my conversion, devoid of ministerial talents as I was of a beard; I feared on account of my incompetency that I should not be received in a strange land. So strong were the emotions of my heart, that I dismounted and sat down, and wept and prayed. While thus weeping, these words were spoken to me. . . . I will go before thee—[I] will prepare the hearts of the people to receive thee. (Case and His Cotemporaries, i, 18.)

Clearly emotionalism, honesty, humility, and diffidence were blended in his personality.

WILLIAM CASE

His capacity to endure hardship, his zeal and self-sacrifice, his energy and devotion, and his simplicity and personal integrity inspired his brethren and endeared him to them. He was truly one whole heart touched by God.

Following the War of 1812-14 the Methodists of Upper Canada faced the rebuilding of their circuits amid accusations of disloyalty. Many of the preachers were Americans, and certainly the Canada district was a part of the GENESEE CONFERENCE. Even William Case, who believed all political entanglements were undesirable, who was extremely unworldly, and who believed his task was to save souls, was suspect. As an itinerant and after 1815 as a PRESIDING ELDER, he devoted much attention to evangelism, having particular success in the revival that followed the Conference of 1817. Eventually his devoted efforts, his good will, and gracious spirit won for him confidence and respect, not only in the community but in the Methodist ranks, now embittered by the intrusion of the British Wesleyans.

At this point, Case, in common with many of his American brethren, became acutely interested in the welfare of the Indians. The conversion of the Mississauga chief, PETER JONES, in 1823 at a Methodist CAMP MEETING in Ancaster township, was recognized by him as a significant opening for an Indian mission. In association with Jones and others he began to devote himself to this work. In 1828 the newly independent Canada Conference appointed him superintendent of Indian missions and schools. In 1833 he was stationed at the Credit mission and designated as "General Missionary to the Indian Tribes." From 1837-51 he was superintendent of the Alderville Mission and its manual labor school. During this period of his life his letters and reports provided much information on the state of Indian missions.

When the CANADA CONFERENCE became independent in 1828, William Case was elected president of the Conference pro tempore. He remained in office until 1833 when the episcopate was abolished in Upper Canada.

Case's career as acting superintendent is one of the most interesting and neglected aspects in the early history of Canadian Methodism. He had been a presiding elder for many years. His capacity as a conciliator had been tested successfully in the conflict between the Methodist Episcopal and British Wesleyan preachers, and between extremists and conservatives in the movement toward an independent Canada Conference. He had undeniable integrity, popularity, and valued experience. Yet it is evident that this sincere, meek, likeable, but limited preacher did not have the qualities of leadership requisite to his office. He set up his headquarters at Grape Island and gave his major attention to the Indian work. Never before or after his appointment did he resemble Bishop ASBURY, Bishop MCKENDREE, or even the saintly Bishop GEORGE. Happily the presiding elders assumed more responsibility, compensating for the weak leadership in the highest executive office. William Case was overshadowed by the RYERSONS, RICHARDSON, and even his close friend ANSON GREEN. As the Methodist Church moved rapidly into a new social and political situation, Case's unworldly faith began to appear archaic. After five years the episcopacy was discarded.

After 1833 his power and influence declined, though the mention of "the Venerable Elder Case" brought a warm glow to the hearts of Methodists. He gave his last twenty years predominantly to Indian missions. Here he truly earned his high reputation. When he died, Oct. 19, 1855, at the age of seventy-five, the universal mourning was, in part, for a good man who had served faithfully—but much more for a poignant memory of an age then passed—for Methodism by that time had moved from the fringe of society into the arena of Canadian life where simple goodness was not enough to meet the challenge of a complex era. Appropriately he was buried near his mission, in the depths of rural Canada.

William Case lived through a most exciting period of Canadian church history. He held the lasting respect and affection of all. He was elected to almost every office of importance with very few qualifications for any of them as the world sees it. Of him it could truly be said that he worked and prayed and wept for the souls of men. He lacked aggressiveness, vision, and a broad concept of the Kingdom of God upon earth. His one aim was to be good. This he accomplished as a demonstration of what Christ had done for him.

CASTLE, JOSEPH (1801-1881), an American minister and physician of strength and versatility, was born in Devonshire, England, on Jan. 6, 1801. His parents having removed to CANADA, in 1819 he joined the church, and in the following year received license to exhort. In 1823 he was admitted on trial into the GENESEE CONFERENCE. His subsequent appointments were Wilkesbarre, Pa.; Oswego, Auburn, Ithaca, Utica, and Cazenovia, N. Y. In 1837 he received the A.M. degree from Hamilton College. In 1838 he was appointed PRESIDING ELDER of the Berkshire district, but at the end of one year was transferred to Albany. In 1841 he was transferred to Union Church, PHILADELPHIA, and from then on seems to have remained a member of the PHILADELPHIA CONFERENCE.

Desiring to study medicine, he entered the Pennsylvania College of Medicine in 1844, graduating in 1848 and in the same year received the D.D. degree from DICKINSON COLLEGE.

Castle was a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCES of 1832, 1836, 1840, 1844, 1860, 1864 and 1868. From 1863 to 1871 he was presiding elder on the South Philadelphia, Reading and Central Philadelphia districts, after which he was stationed at the Western church and on the city mission. In 1875 he asked to be superannuated.

Joseph Castle died Feb. 1, 1881.

CASTLE, NICHOLAS (1837-1922), American U. B. minister and bishop, was born Oct. 4, 1837, in Elkhart Co., Ind. After the deaths of his parents and brother, he lived seven years with Mr. and Mrs. John Frizzell, who gave him three months schooling each year.

He received a license to exhort on Aug. 2, 1856, and a few months later a license to preach. In 1858 he was admitted to the St. Joseph Conference, Church of The UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST, and appointed junior preacher on the Warsaw circuit. He served as PRESIDING ELDER nine years and was elected a member of the GENERAL CONFERENCES of 1869, 1873, and 1877.

On June 14, 1860 Castle married Catherine A. Hummer, who died in 1879. In 1881 he married Ellen Livenood. He became an earnest advocate of HOLINESS.

He was elected bishop in 1877, and served two terms on the Pacific Coast District. Later his services were given to the districts east of the Rocky Mountains. He retired from the regular active work of the church in 1905, and in 1913 published his book, The Exalted Life, which set forth his views on the subject of holiness. He died April 18, 1922 and was buried in a cemetery at Philomath, Ore.

CLAYTON G. LEHMAN

CASTLEREAGH, New South Wales, Australia. Although constituted a Government township in 1810, Castlereagh never developed into an urban community. Its chief claim to distinction is that the first building for Methodist worship in Australia was erected there. It was built by John Lees, on his property, and opened for worship by SAMUEL LEIGH on Oct. 7, 1817. John Lees set aside a "consecrated acre" the produce of which was annually devoted to the work of the mission. On part of this he built another chapel in 1819. A brick church was opened in 1847 and was known as "The Tea Meeting Church," since tradition has it that money for the building was raised by twenty-two tea meetings.

Originally on the Windsor Circuit, in 1860 it became part of a new circuit named the Castlereagh and Penrith Circuit. Since 1880, when this circuit was renamed the Penrith Circuit, it has been a regular preaching place within it.

CASTRO, EMILIO E. (1927-), Uruguayan minister, scholar, and bishop, was born in MONTEVIDEO, the last of ten brothers and sisters. He made an outstanding record as a student in secondary school and the Union Theological Seminary (Facultad Evangelica de Teologia) in BUENOS AIRES, ARGENTINA. As a CRUSADE SCHOLAR of the BOARD of MISSIONS of The Methodist Church, he studied under Karl Barth at the University of Basel, Switzerland.

Castro has held pastorates in Mercedes, Durazno, and Montevideo in URUGUAY, and in LA PAZ, BOLIVIA. He has been active in ecumenical affairs, missions, Christian vocations, evangelism, urban ministries, press-radio-television, social revolution, nonviolence, world peace, inter-American relations, theological training, and theology.

Known as an outstanding minister in the Uruguay Annual Conference, Emilio Castro was for nine years pastor of Central Church, Montevideo, the largest Methodist church in the country. During the last year of that pastorate he was also district superintendent. In 1966 he left the local pastorate to dedicate his time to ecumenical interests. He later became coordinator of the Committee for Latin American Association of Theological Institutions. At the same time he was executive secretary for evangelism in the Uruguay Annual Conference, a vice-president of the Christian Peace Conference, and officially active in several other ecumenical organizations.

At the conference constituting the autonomous Methodist Church of Uruguay, Dec. 5-8, 1969, in Montevideo, Emilio E. Castro was elected bishop to be general superintendent of the newly organized church. He resides in Montevideo and there administers the spiritual and temporal affairs of the Methodist Church of Uruguay.

CATECHISM. A catechism is a form of instruction in Christian faith and duty arranged in question and answer, so that it may be memorized together. Most of the great Catechisms of Christendom are intended as vehicles of popular instruction, being designed for children, or the unlearned. The germ of the idea lies in the questions asked at BAPTISM in the ancient church. The last stage of the preparation of the CATECHUMENS for Baptism was to teach to them a three-fold answer to be given in response to questions regarding faith in Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, corresponding to the three-fold immersion of Baptism. Out of these three-fold answers grew the three-fold baptismal creeds, such as the APOSTLES' CREED.

In later centuries longer catechisms in question and answer form were developed for instructional purposes. The Reformation period produced a great development of catechisms both among Protestants and Roman Catholics. The Protestant catechisms became in a sense popular denominational Confessions of Faith. The more traditional such as Luther's Catechisms, and the English Catechism, follow the pattern of an explanation of the Creed, the Ten Commandments, and the Sacraments, while the Calvinist catechisms are most systematically theological, and follow the plan of Calvinist doctrine. Notable among these are Luther's Smaller Catechism (1529), which has been most influential in molding the piety of the German nation; and Calvin's Instruction of Faith, which is admirable as a summary of his doctrinal position, but too long and complicated to be learned by heart as a catechism. The theologically developed Heidelberg Catechism of 1562-3, as revised by the Synod of Dort in 1619, is the most generally accepted confession of the Reformed (Calvinist) Churches.

The Catechism of the Church of England, composed chiefly by Cranmer and Ridley in 1549 as a part of the Book of Common Prayer, is intended to be learned by candidates for Confirmation. The advised time for the duty of teaching this catechism to the growing children was on Sunday afternoon, and so we find that JOHN WESLEY records of his voyage to GEORGIA: "At four were the evening prayers; . . . when the children were catechised, and instructed before the congregation" (Journal, Oct. 21, 1735).

The Shorter Catechism, composed by the Westminster Assembly of Divines, and authorized by the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland in 1648, became the traditional confession of Presbyterianism. It opens with perhaps the most famous and most profound of all catechetical questions. In 1876 Thomas Carlyle declared, "The older I grow . . . the more comes back to me the first sentence in the Catechism which I learned when a child, and the fuller and deeper its meaning becomes: 'What is the chief end of man? To glorify God and enjoy Him for ever.'"

In 1748 John Wesley followed these examples, preparing what he called "Instructions for the Young." In later British Wesleyan Methodism there was long used a catechism derived from the catechism of the Prayerbook of the Church of England. In the modern period the British Conference in 1951 approved a new Junior Catechism. This gives simple teaching regarding God as Father, Christ as Savior from sin, the Holy Spirit, the Church, prayer, and sacraments, each with a text of scripture in support. There is also a list of the chief days in the Christian Year. In 1952 a Senior Catechism was approved, more suited to young adults. This is based on a brief exposition of the Apostles' Creed, followed by sections on salvation, the Church, prayer, and the new life of righteousness, in question and answer form with supporting scripture references.

The American Conference of 1787 ordered the preachers to teach Wesley's "catechism" to the children of every charge, while in 1848 DANIEL KIDDER, editor of Sunday school materials, was asked to prepare a Church catechism, which document was approved by the M. E. GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1852. With the improvement of public school education, "reading, writing, and spelling" were dropped from Sunday school curricula, and by 1825 the Sunday school largely based its instruction upon the recitation of passages of Scripture memorized during the previous week. Fifty years later arose the "uniform lessons" for children and adults alike.

In the early years of the twentieth century, with the growth of "graded lessons" in church schools, educators turned away more and more from the catechetical question and answer pattern. Indeed, for many years now they have been overwhelmingly opposed to it. At the organization of The Methodist Church in 1939, the question of training materials for the young was before the CURRICULUM COMMITTEE. There were expressions of great antipathy to the idea of an official catechism, and it was decided to produce a series of manuals for training in church membership. These were to be arranged for different age groups. In time three or four such manuals were produced and have been used more or less here and there over the church.

For some years after the 1939 union, the METHODIST PUBLISHING HOUSE made available a catechism drawn up by the bishops of the M. E. Church back in the last century. The advertising and sale of these catechisms was greatly objected to by Christian educators in The Methodist Church, and anything like promotion for this material was eventually given up. There are, therefore, now no official American Methodist catechisms. (See EDUCATION IN METHODISM; SUNDAY SCHOOLS.)

JOHN LAWSON

CATECHUMENS were candidates for BAPTISM in the ancient church, who were placed under a system of instruction prior to their admission. Often men and women were emotionally stirred by the preaching of missionaries without gaining any clear idea of the truths involved. They needed more comprehensive understanding of Christianity before coming into full membership.

For example, Luke dedicates his Gospel to Theophilus, and speaks of him as one under instruction, to whom he wishes to impart fuller and more accurate knowledge. In this wide sense the history of the catechuminate is identical with the history of "religious education."

When the early Christian Church had become the Roman Catholic Church, dependent primarily upon sacraments rather than upon faith, the catechuminate declined rapidly. Training was shortened in point of time, and the religious instruction element was so completely overshadowed by the liturgical that often not more remained than the memorization of some creedal forms and prayers.

ROBERT W. GOODLOE

CATHOLIC. It is most necessary that all should understand, and use aright, this frequently contentious word, seeing that the Apostles' Creed contains the clause "I believe in the holy Catholic Church," while the doctrinal statement of the British Deed of Union, 1932, starts with these words: "The Methodist Church claims and cherishes its place in the Holy Catholic Church which is the Body of Christ." The Greek word catholic (by derivation literally "answering to the whole") means in its primary sense "universal." It is plain that in the New Testament there is a most impressive sense of wonder and joy that in the Church, which is the New Israel, and the reconstituted People of God, all those divisions which painfully trouble the human race are dissolved into a new reconciling fellowship (Galatians 3:28; Ephesians 2:11-14; Colossians 3: 10-11, etc.). In this fellowship believers of many different talents cooperate for mutual upbuilding, under the influence of the one Spirit (I Corinthians 12; Ephesians 4: 11-13, etc.). Through the life and teaching of this fellowship God's will for man is made known fully, certainly, and with authority (John 16:13-15; 20:22-23; Acts 15:12-31; I Corinthians 1:18-29; Ephesians 3:1-10, etc.). It is of the essence of the Christian religion that the fellowship is for all; and that the divine revelation is whole, rounded, complete, balanced, certain, and satisfying. In fact, the Christian Gospel is universal. Thus, though the word "catholic" does not occur in the New Testament, the essential idea conveyed by this word is everywhere.

The first known place in Christian literature in which the word catholic takes on a specific theological sense is in the Epistle of St. Ignatius to the Smyrnaeans (c. 112 A.D.). It is significant that he is appealing for the unity and discipline of the Church around her sacramental life and for the spiritual authority of her rulers, the bishops. "Let that be considered a valid Eucharist over which the bishop presides, or one to whom he commits it. Wherever the bishop appears, there let the people be, just as, where-soever Christ Jesus is, there is the Catholic Church" (c. viii). It will be observed that it is not the presence of the bishop which constitutes the Church, but the presence of Christ. Yet the sacraments, and the sacramental and teaching ministry, indicate where Christ is to be found. This is the essential "catholic" idea.

As time went on, and disputes about doctrine or discipline troubled the Church, "the Catholic Church" became the term used to designate the original, continuous, and authentic Church, as opposed to innovating groups which take their rise from human leaders; and to describe the one Church as it exists in every place, as opposed to local variations. Furthermore, derived from this root meaning of "catholic" as "universal" there closely follows another. That which is accepted by the whole of the catholic Church as the essential and authentic Christian doctrine is the whole and balanced Christian faith, authoritatively and reliably declared. Doctrinal opinions held by a section only may be true so far as they go, or they may be in error, but at the best they are not fully authenticated, and they are not essential. They are not more than matters of personal opinion. The faith of the universal or catholic Church is the catholic faith, that is to say, the authentic and orthodox faith. Thus when we come to the sad spectacle of disputes in the Church leading to division (as in the Byzantine Empire, and between the eastern and western branches of the Church in A.D. 1054), we find each side claiming to be "the Catholic Church." This of course involves the claim that the other side to the dispute has fallen into heresy or schism, and has ceased to be a part of the true Church, of which there can be but one.

When we come down from these ancient disputes to the modern day, what is involved in the claim of the Methodist Church to be a part of "the Holy Catholic Church"? It means that Methodism claims to be within the main stream of original and authentic historic Christianity, and is not any kind of individualistic deviation or innovation. Methodism has indeed given emphasis to certain special teachings, such as Full Assurance, and Perfect Love, which are perhaps not accepted by the majority of Christians. But she has never affirmed that these are essential doctrines of the faith, because to insist upon some private emphasis as essential to "the true faith" and "the true Church" is the mark of the uncatholic mind. Though they are precious to Methodists, they are not more than matters of personal opinion.

Methodism, therefore, is not characterized by any peculiar doctrine of her own. She affirms that her essential doctrines are simply those expressed in the authoritative formularies of the ancient and undivided Church which is the ancestor of all the present-day orthodox denominations. These in brief are: the unity and personality of the sovereign creator, God, revealed as Father, Son, and Holy Spirit; the full divinity and humanity of our Lord;

His saving divine act in His life, atoning death, and resurrection; the great fact of the historic Church, and the work of the Holy Spirit through it. Particular tokens of this Methodist catholicity are that we accept the canon of Scripture, and do not put any other sacred writings alongside it, as do certain deviationist bodies. We accept as authoritative the Creeds which go back to the Ecumenical Councils of the ancient and undivided Church, as an interpretation of Scripture. Among these pride of place is claimed by the NICENE CREED. We accept the two sacraments instituted by our Lord as of perpetual obligation in the Church. We accept the disciplined life and worship of the historic Church as an essential part of the Christian life. And we look, in intention at least, on all other Christians who accept these essentials as our brothers in Christ.

The usage of this word "catholic" has become subject to much confusion as a result of the division in the Church at the Reformation. The Roman section of the Church then continued fixedly in the old tradition of calling herself "the Catholic Church," with the claim that she was the whole of the duly-constituted and disciplined Church, the Protestants not being truly part of the Church. There was a certain tendency on the Continent of Europe to accept this nomenclature, so that Protestants become commonly designated "Evangelical" (i.e., Lutheran) or "Reformed" (i.e., Calvinist), while the Roman Church was known as "the Catholic Church." In line with this, the Lutheran version of the Apostles' Creed runs: "I believe in . . . a holy Christian Church." We observe that this usage has largely been imported into theological circles in America, as well as into common parlance. Thus the custom has grown up in some quarters of making a distinction between the two senses of the word "catholic" by using a small letter (the catholic Church) for the whole body of the universal Church; and a capital letter (the Catholic Church) for the Roman Catholic Church. Methodist sensitivity on this point has been shown in other ways. Thus in 1836 the American Church printed the Apostles' Creed with a footnote: "By holy catholic church is meant the church of God in general." The M. E. Church, South, substituted in the Creed itself, which was found in their Discipline only in the Office for Adult Baptism, the expression: "I believe in the Church of God." This remained until 1906, when the generally accepted form of the Apostles' Creed was restored in the Order of Worship then provided for Sunday worship.

It is noteworthy that at the Reformation the Church in England affirmed her claim to be both Catholic and Protestant; not a new Church of the Reformation alone, but the ancient Catholic Church of the nation reformed. Thus the Church of England, and the Anglican communion following her, has always been careful to describe herself as a part of the Catholic Church. So the Apostles' Creed in the Book of Common Prayer runs: "I believe in . . . the holy Catholic Church"; and the Prayer for All Conditions of Men: "more especially we pray for the good estate of the Catholic Church." It is noticeable that the Wesleys, and original Methodism, followed this English tradition, in token of which the Book of Offices of the British Methodist Church has the capital "C" of the Prayer-book, while the Apostles' Creed as it appears in the American Methodist Hymnal is printed with the small letter. So a non-theologically minded British Methodist, speaking carelessly might be found to say "the Catholic Church" when he meant "the Roman Catholic Church," but a theologically instructed person would follow the Anglican usage, and be careful to say "the Roman Catholic Church," when that is what he meant. This would be a mark to him that he was not acceding to the traditional Roman claim that she is herself "the Catholic Church," and the only duly-constituted Christian Church. The latter claim, which we cannot accept, the Roman Church is rightly and happily modifying in these recent years.

The enlightened Methodist will gladly affirm that the Roman Catholic Church is an important part of the Church universal, and indeed the largest and most stable Christian denomination. She is therefore not "a false Church." Yet the Methodist will likewise stoutly affirm, following Wesley, that he also is a Catholic (or if he prefers, a catholic) Christian. So Wesley could publish as one of his doctrinal standards his fine sermon entitled "Catholic Spirit" (Sermon XXXIV), though he was enough a man of the eighteenth century and a loyalist to find it hard always to carry out these principles in practice. We may also consider what he intended by his famous saying: "We think and let think" (Journal, May 18, 1788). He certainly did not mean by this that it is a matter of relative indifference whether or no the Methodist believes in such doctrines as the Trinity, the Incarnation, the Atonement, or the Resurrection. He invariably assumes that basic Catholic doctrine is accepted by all his people. However, the Methodist Society need not be divided in its fellowship or evangelism by those contentions, issues which commonly did divide the churches of his day, such as the pros and cons of predestination, episcopal versus presbyterial Church order, and the precise manner of administration of the sacraments.

This unity in agreed essentials, and liberty in "opinions" is the true spirit of catholicity, which makes possible the unity of the Church. In the true sense of the word Wesley was a catholic Christian. His characteristic doctrinal emphases, such as Arminian evangelicalism, Full Assurance, and Perfect Love represent a creative moderating synthesis between extreme opinions which had been falling apart into divisive controversy since the Reformation. And as Dr. Outler has rightly observed, he was able to move forward in this way because he could move back in mind to be inspired by the authentic and original Christianity of the ancient and undivided Church.

In these days, when "the great new fact of our times" is the ecumenical movement, and when we are called to dialogue and to fellowship with all sorts of Christians, including many who have made a particular point of calling themselves "Catholic," it should be a matter of great gratitude to us Methodists that our heritage leaves us splendidly unentangled in any divisive claim on behalf of some particularity of doctrine, polity, or discipline. We have particular teachings and institutions which we firmly believe are good for us, but we are not committed to an attempt to extend them universally in the Church. And equally, we are not a creedless or individualist Church, which tries to live by theological indifference, and does not know exactly where it stands corporately on essentials. Our people may have confident and authoritative guidance on all spiritual essentials because the Methodist Church is firmly grounded on "the faith once committed to the saints," which is the faith agreed upon by the whole of the Church universal.

Our doctrine is not a philosophy consisting in opinions adopted by men, which all pass away no matter how eminent these teachers may be in their own day. It is a divine revelation and a divine saving act, declared and performed once for all in Christ, and recorded in Holy Scripture. The philosophical system used as a background to this faith, and the precise theological words used to communicate it, may on occasion be revised, but not the Catholic faith itself. As the Methodist Deed of Union, in England in 1932, declares in words which are filled with mature Christian wisdom, though they do not altogether conform to the conventions of the present generation, "The Conference shall not have any power to alter or vary in any manner whatsoever the clauses contained in this Deed which define the doctrinal standards of The Methodist Church." This openness in non-essentials and security in essentials is exactly what is involved in the Methodist claim to be a part of the catholic church. And the distinction between what are the essentials and what the non-essentials is something only to be learned in the long and wise experience of the historic and universal church, as she has sought to live within the Scriptural faith.

CAUGHEY, ANDREW CLARKE (1840-1929), NEW ZEALAND layman, was born at Portaferry, Northern Ireland, and emigrated to New Zealand in 1879. He entered the ministry, serving in the Paparoa and Pukekohe Circuits. Ill health forced his retirement in 1882, and he went into partnership with his brother-in-law, thus founding the well known Auckland firm of Smith and Caughey, Ltd.

As a layman he served the Methodist Church faithfully. He and his sister (Mrs. W. H. Smith) jointly gave the Mount Albert property which became Auckland's first Methodist children's home, and he acted as treasurer for many years.

From 1911 to 1928, he leased a large residence ("Dunholme") to the church at a very low rental for a theological center. He was treasurer of, and a generous donor to the Trinity College Building Fund. His death came only a few months before the college was completed.

Caughey's public benefactions were numerous and generous. He and his wife vacated their lovely home at Mount Albert and presented it to the city of Auckland as a children's hospital. The Y.W.C.A. and the Y.M.C.A. also received generous help from him.

CAULKER, SOLOMON BROOKS (1915-1960), E.U.B. minister in SIERRA LEONE, West Africa, was born Feb. 25, 1915, the son of George A. Caulker, Mambo village, Kagboro Chiefdom, Sierra Leone. Educated in the mission schools at Shenge and Albert Academy, Freetown, he graduated from LEBANON VALLEY COLLEGE (A.B.), Bonebrake (now UNITED) THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY (B.D.) and University of Chicago (M.A.). He married Olive Selby of Nashville, Tenn. and to them two children were born.

Returning to Sierra Leone, Caulker was employed on the faculty of Fourah Bay College. At the time of his death he had become the Vice Principal of Fourah Bay, the University College of Sierra Leone, and Dean of the students, and was being considered as the first native Principal. He served on many boards and committees of church and government. He also directed the Albert Academy Choir and the British Council Choir.

He was killed in an airplane crash near Dakar, West Africa, Aug. 29, 1960, as he was returning from having delivered a special address in Israel at a world conference on "Science in the Advancement of Small States."

CAUSTON, THOMAS, chief magistrate and storekeeper in SAVANNAH, Ga., during JOHN WESLEY'S residence there from February 1736 to December 1737. SOPHIA HOPKEY, a niece of Mrs. Causton, lived with him and his wife. The Caustons desired a match between her and Wesley; but when she married a Mr. Williamson, their former friendship with Wesley turned to enmity. Soon after the marriage, Wesley expelled Mrs. Williamson from Holy Communion, and a warrant was issued against him for defamation of character. At the trial Causton put before the jury a "List of Grievances," maintaining that Wesley was unfit to be a minister. The jury, under Causton's influence, returned a verdict of "guilty," but a minority of twelve were against this. Wesley, feeling that he could do little more good in GEORGIA, left for England in December, 1737. Later Causton went to England to explain inaccuracies in his accounts and perished at sea on his return voyage.

CAVALLERO, VIOLETA (1912-), a women's leader in URUGUAY, was born in MONTEVIDEO and attended public schools until the fourth grade. Then she was enrolled in Crandon Institute, where she finished her high school studies. She then attended Instituto Modelo, the women's section of what is now the Union Theological Seminary (Facultad Evangelico de Teologia), in BUENOS AIRES, ARGENTINA. She was consecrated a deaconess of The Methodist Church.

Miss Cavallero has written hymns for special occasions, such as the one for the twentieth anniversary of the interdenominational Women's Council. She was deaconess and pastor of the Malvin Church, Montevideo, and founder of children's kindergarten and other social work there. Since 1949 she has been a teacher of Christian education in Crandon Institute and has directed the social work of the Crandon Primary School.

She went to the United States in 1946-47 to study at SCARRITT COLLEGE. She returned as a part of the International Team in 1955, and the Mission to America sponsored by the General Board of EVANGELISM in 1962.

Since 1957 she has spoken in a Methodist broadcast every Sunday morning over one of Montevideo's largest radio stations. Her life and influence are described in two books published in the United States: He Wears Orchids, by Elizabeth Lee, and Living for Others, by Stanley J. Rowland.

CEDAR FALLS, IOWA, U.S.A. First Church had its origin in the coming of a Methodist circuit-rider to the Upper Cedar Valley in 1843. From the preaching of Harry W. Reed to the scattered groups of settlers in this locality came the first Methodist society, organized in 1851. Then came the formation of a circuit, and finally in 1857, First Methodist became a station. One of the interesting events in this early history was the attempt of a few members to introduce an organ and choir into the worship service. When this was discovered on Sunday morning, several members left the service, and the minister proceeded with the usual custom of "lining out" the hymns to be sung in the orthodox way.

Two small buildings were erected before the present sanctuary was constructed in 1895 under the leadership of J. C. Magee, father of Bishop J. RALPH MAGEE. While the sanctuary has since been renovated, worship continues in the structure made of stone from a quarry in IOWA. A new educational building costing over $325,000 was erected in 1960.

Forty-four ministers have served First Church, one of whom, TITUS LOWE, was elected bishop. A number of young people have gone into the ministry and other areas of church service.

First Church presently has a membership of over 2,100 with a staff of eleven, full and part-time. It helped to establish St. Timothy's, which has grown to over 900 members, and maintains a close relationship to the WESLEY FOUNDATION at the State College of Iowa.

CEDAR RAPIDS, IOWA, U.S.A., the county seat of Linn County on the Cedar River, has a population of 104,900. The work of the M. E. Church there stemmed from the ROCK RIVER ANNUAL CONFERENCE of ILLINOIS in 1841, when a class was organized as "the Cedar Mission" in the log cabin of Thomas Sharp.

The first congregation of fourteen members was established in 1843 by I. Searles and later continued by S. W. Ingham. The first building was constructed in 1854. This congregation is now St. Paul's, the largest Methodist Church in Iowa with 3,464 members. It occupies an unusual half-round building, which was dedicated in 1914. The structure was designed by the man said to be the father of modern American architecture, Louis Sullivan of Chicago.

Cedar Rapids became part of the UPPER IOWA ANNUAL CONFERENCE when it was created in 1856, and today is in the NORTH IOWA ANNUAL CONFERENCE. Seven other Methodist churches—Asbury, Kenwood Park, Lovely Lane, St. James', St. Marks', St. Peter's and Trinity—bring the total Methodist membership to 7,912. Agencies of the North Iowa Annual Conference located in Cedar Rapids are St. Luke's Hospital and School of Nursing, founded in 1884; the Meth-Wick Manor, a home for the aging, begun in 1958; and a district office of the Hillcrest Children's Services. CORNELL COLLEGE, sponsored by the Conference, is located twenty miles east at Mt. Vernon, Iowa.

In 1890 the John Hus M. E. Church was organized as a ministry to a sizable Czech population in Cedar Rapids. The work in the Czech language declined by 1942, and the church was renamed Asbury in 1958.

Other Cedar Rapids churches of Methodist origin are: Bethel A.M.E. Church (1874); The Free Methodist Church (1877); and the First Wesleyan Methodist Church. There are also three congregations of the IOWA CONFERENCE of the former EVANGELICAL UNITED BRETHREN CHURCH: Faith, Salem, and Sharon.

CELL, GEORGE CROFT (1875-1937), American historian and theologian, was born at St. Thomas, Pa., on Feb. 20, 1875, and died in suburban Boston, on April 18, 1937. He was graduated from BAKER UNIVERSITY with the A.B. degree in 1901, and from BOSTON UNIVERSITY with the S.T.B. in 1904. He pursued graduate work both at Boston University and at the University of Berlin and earned two Ph.D. degrees—one from each University.

In 1908 he was elected Professor of Historical Theology at BOSTON UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY, which position he held with distinction until his death in 1937. He was a rugged and forceful teacher. Cell also was a prolific writer on theological, philosophical and economic themes for leading papers and magazines. As an author he had to his credit several distinguished works in German, besides a number in English, including his last book, published two years before his death, The Rediscovery of John Wesley. This book has continued to be a standard reference on Wesley's theology emphasizing, some think too heavily, the Divine over against the human side of religious experience.

Cell was a member of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences. He was a great teacher, friendly, tolerant, forgiving and appreciative.

CENICK, JOHN (1718-1755), British lay preacher, was the son of Quakers who had become Anglicans. A spiritual awakening in 1735 was followed by severe struggles, but he achieved a "deeper peace" on Sept. 6, 1737. He at once commenced preaching and writing hymns. Many of his hymns CHARLES WESLEY corrected and published in 1739. As a hymn writer Cennick is perhaps best known for the hymn beginning, "Jesus my all, to heaven is gone."

John Cennick was one of JOHN WESLEY'S lay preachers before MAXFIELD was, and some consider him to be Wesley's first lay preacher. GEORGE WHITEFIELD suggested that Cennick be the first master of KINGSWOOD SCHOOL. In his preaching he became Calvinistic, and John Wesley disowned him with a number of others, and they went into the Whitefield connection. Wesley, however, said emphatically that it was not on account of doctrine, but because of their personal abuse, that he disowned them, as at that time the Calvinistic attack against Wesley was vituperative and intense. After a time Cennick left the CALVINISTIC METHODISTS and joined the MORAVIANS. Subsequently he wrote Wesley a kind letter in which he said that he really loved "the servants and witnesses of Jesus in all the world, and wished all to prosper." Wesley answered in the same spirit. Simpson says of Cennick: "Although his career was comparatively short, yet in zeal, successful labor it is difficult to equal it . . . He had a lion's courage and a martyr's piety, but his passions sometimes mastered his prudence."

CENSUS OF 1851 (British). The census of religious worship held on March 31, 1851, as part of the official population census, was the first and last of its kind to be held in Great Britain. What was asked for was information about attendance at public worship on a particular Sunday, and about the number of sittings available in churches and chapels. Because the result could be interpreted as showing that half of the nation was non-Anglican, the Established Church opposed any repetition of this census, suggesting instead a census of religious profession, in which the Anglican Church would have appeared much larger. A barrister, Horace Mann, was appointed to collect and write up the data of the 1851 census. The figures collected were those given by the minister or priest in charge of the local congregation; modern studies of the returns suggest that the overall picture presented was substantially correct. There was a total of 34,467 places of public worship, of which 14,077 belonged to the Church of England. The number of attendances recorded in 1851, for morning, afternoon and evening was: Church of England, 4,939,514 (47 percent); Nonconformist—4,857,751 (47 percent); Roman Catholic—365,430 (4 percent); and sectarian—256,695 (2 percent). The grand total amounted to about 41 percent of the total population. Horace Mann worked out a figure for the actual number of people who attended church, which allotted to the Church of England 3,773,474 (52 percent); the Nonconformists 3,007,348 (42 percent); Roman Catholics 305,393 (4 percent); and the sectarians 174,817 (2 percent). A careful inquiry into the figures suggests that one must replace the picture of Victorian England as a land overflowing with Christianity, with the plainer fact that in round figures one adult in every two (perhaps 54 percent) actually went to church. If one turns to the Methodist figures one finds that Methodism accounted for fifty percent of the Nonconformist sittings, and fifty percent of the total Nonconformist attendance, 2,417,353, a figure which was also about half of the attendance recorded in the Church of England. The next largest Free Church was the Congregationalist, which recorded 1,214,059 attendances, or about a quarter of the Nonconformist total. There were about three quarters of a million Baptist attendances; there was no other large single Nonconformist group. If one compares this overall Methodist figure, which Horace Mann interpreted as implying 1,385,372 individuals, with the membership figures available for 1851, one finds that the WESLEYAN METHODIST membership was 302,209; the PRIMITIVE METHODIST membership 106,074; the WESLEYAN METHODIST ASSOCIATION 20,557; the NEW CONNEXION 16,692; and the BIBLE CHRISTIANS 13,324, the total of this membership being about 458,000. Since the Victorian habit of church going meant that there were always more attenders than members, this is quite reasonable, but suggests that in estimating the total size of the Methodist community in Britain in the nineteenth century one should not multiply the membership by more than three, a lower figure than is sometimes used. The 1851 figures are likely to have been as favorable to Methodism as a whole as those at any other time in the century. Analysis also shows that where Nonconformity was particularly strong in relation to other churches—in the industrial towns of the north of England—this was due above all to the efforts of the Methodists. The figures also suggest that much of this Methodist success came from Wesleyan Methodism; that the Primitive Methodists, although more working-class in social composition, did not contribute a higher proportion of people from this class to the general total.

CENTENARIO COLEGIO (Centenary College), a Methodist school for girls in Santa Maria, Brazil, heart of the state of Rio Grande do Sul, was founded on March 27, 1922, by Eunice F. Andrew, of Kentucky, and LOUISE BEST, of SOUTH CAROLINA, both missionaries of the WOMEN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY (MES). The name honors the Methodist Centennial Movement in the United States, which provided the funds for the original building; and at the same time, the centennial of Brazil's independence from Portugal in 1822.

From an original enrollment of seven, the school grew until there were in 1966 over 500 students. Beginning with an unpretentious cottage on the property, it now consists of three large brick buildings, a frame gymnasium, and a chapel. It is an elementary and junior and senior high school, its secondary course having been officially accredited in 1934 by the federal government.

In the beginning, the school was supported entirely by funds from the United States. Now it is almost self-supporting. With the exception of one or two missionaries, all the teachers and pupils are Brazilian. After Miss Andrews' retirement in 1939, Louise Best was named principal, remaining so until her retirement with honors in 1957. She was followed by Florence R. Ford. The present principal is Mrs. Herta Chagas (1970).

CENTENARY COLLEGE, Cleveland, Tenn., U.S.A., a Methodist institution, was established in 1883 by GEORGE R. STUART, a pastor at Cleveland. The school was opened in September, 1885, with David Sullins as president. In 1924 it was adopted by the HOLSTON CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church, South. It was sold to another denomination in 1937.

CENTENARY COLLEGE OF LOUISIANA, the oldest college west of the Mississippi River, is located in SHREVEPORT, La. U.S.A. Its first component was founded by the State at Jackson, La. in 1825, and until 1845 was called The College of Louisiana. In 1839, the one hundredth anniversary of Methodism, the MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE founded a college called Centenary, at Clinton, Miss. The following year, this college moved to Brandon Springs, Miss., where it graduated its first class in 1844. In 1845, when the State was about to close the College of Louisiana, friends of Centenary arranged for it to acquire the buildings and grounds at Jackson. The Civil War in the United States interrupted its services from 1861-1865. In October, 1861, the faculty met and wrote across a blank page of the minutes of the faculty meetings these words, "Students have all gone to war. College suspended and God help the right." In the difficult years of reconstruction, the college struggled valiantly, and contributed much to the leadership of its territory. For its increasing prosperity and effectiveness, it owed much to Bishop JOHN C. KEENER, who drove many miles in his buggy collecting funds for the college he loved.

Centenary was invited to move to the growing city of Shreveport, La., the Atkins family and their associates offered land for a campus, and the citizens of Shreveport gave a substantial sum for buildings and equipment. In 1908 the college opened its first session in Shreveport, La. It has had a steady growth in endowment, physical facilities, and student body. The college celebrated its one hundredth anniversary in 1925. During the past twenty-five years, it has made notable progress in buildings, endowment, and student body. The market value of its present endowment is more than eight million dollars. The present student body numbers more than eight hundred day students with about the same number enrolled in the evening division.

CENTENARY COLLEGE FOR WOMEN, Hackettstown, N. J., was founded in 1866 by the NEWARK ANNUAL CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church to commemorate the centennial of American Methodism. Chartered in 1867, it operated as a coeducational preparatory school and ladies' college from 1874 until 1897, when the college department was discontinued. The coeducational preparatory program was offered until 1910, when the institution became an academy for girls. Since 1929 it has been a two-year college for women. The present name was assumed CENTENARY FUND. One of the outstanding events in the history of British Methodism during the first half of the nineteenth century was the celebration of the first centenary of the Methodist movement. It was ultimately decided to date this, not from the great experience of JOHN WESLEY on May 24, 1738, but from the formation of the United Societies in 1739. The plan of the celebration, which involved more than the financial proposals, was approved by the Conference of 1837. In accordance with the resolutions, the PRESIDENT of the CONFERENCE convened a select committee of over 250 ministers and laymen in the Oldham Street Chapel, Manchester, in October 1838. The enthusiasm and spiritual impulse of the meeting spread throughout the connection. Similar centenary meetings were held in all the main centers.

The ready response to the financial feature of the celebration surprised the responsible officers. It would appear that no target figure had been suggested, but the published figures revealed a total exceeding £220,000, which was an amazing result for that period. Its disbursement was in accordance with the agreed plan, the proportions, on the basis of £200,000, being £70,000 for buildings for the Theological Institution at Richmond (London) and Didsbury (Manchester) (see THEOLOGICAL COLLEGES); £70,000 for the Missionary Society, including the Centenary Building in Bishopgate Street, London; £10,000 for the Auxiliary Fund for retired ministers and widows; £38,000 for relief of distressed chapels; £7,000 for chapels in Ireland; £5,000 for education, with a further allocation of the surplus after meeting expenses. The final acts of celebration of the centenary were associated with the Conference in July 1839 and at meetings throughout the country in the following October.

CENTENARY FUND, THE MISSIONARY, a movement in the two large branches of American Methodism in 1918-1919, to celebrate the one-hundredth anniversary of the formation of the Methodist Missionary Society—which organization later became the BOARD OF MISSIONS. It took the form of a Centenary Celebration, or a great Methodist World's Fair at Columbus, Ohio, which featured exhibits from all the Methodist churches in the world; and in addition there was a financial campaign undertaken to raise large sums of money for the home and foreign missions of both Churches.

The financial goal in the M. E. Church, South, was $25,000,000 in new money, over and above the regular assessments. In the M. E. Church the goal was much larger. In both Churches the amounts were oversubscribed. In the "Eight-Day Drive" in May, 1919, the Southern Church pledged considerably more than $50,000,000, and the total expense of the campaign was less than two percent of that amount.

The movement in the M. E. Church was led by S. Earl Taylor, Secretary of the Board of Missions; and in the M. E. Church, South, the Director-General was W. B. BEAUCHAMP, Secretary of the Laymen's Missionary Movement. This was then a department of the Board of Missions but later it became the Board of Lay Activities. At the ensuing GENERAL CONFERENCE, Beauchamp was elected a bishop, although he was not a member of the General Conference which elected him. Both of these large Churches employed professional fund-raising counselors.

In the Southern Church the funds were distributed to both the General and Woman's Section of the Board of Missions. Also sharing in the Centenary Fund were Annual Conference Boards, Church Extension, European Reconstruction, and the erection of buildings at NASHVILLE, Tenn., and LAKE JUNALUSKA, N. C. After UNIFICATION in 1939 the Nashville building was sold, and proceeds used for the home office pensions of the Board. The Centenary Building at Lake Junaluska was destroyed by fire, but was rebuilt and named Lambuth Inn, in honor of Bishop WALTER R. LAMBUTH, who before his election to the episcopacy had been one of the greatest foreign missionaries of Southern Methodism in both JAPAN and CHINA, and General Secretary of the Board of Missions.

No movement of such magnitude as "The Centenary" had ever before been attempted in any Church, and a large organization was formed to carry it out. The headquarters staff consisted of secretaries of finances, spiritual resources, stewardship, woman's work, life service, surveys, evangelism, service and publicity departments. In addition, the secretaries of the SUNDAY SCHOOL, the EPWORTH LEAGUE, and missionary boards were regarded as department heads. The publicity department was subdivided into several bureaus having to do with speakers, literature, etc. Campaign directors were appointed in all annual conferences, districts, and local churches; manuals were published for each of these, and numerous meetings were held to train personnel for their work.

The Centenary funds were used to build new churches and strengthen the work in the existing home and foreign fields. Funds designated for European Reconstruction were used in BELGIUM, CZECHOSLOVAKIA, and POLAND, where the need was very great, especially in Poland, which had been devastated in World War I. Relief work in these mid-European countries developed into Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, which are today in the Geneva Area of the CENTRAL AND SOUTHERN EUROPE CENTRAL CONFERENCE. The M. E. Church, South, also started work in Manchuria and Siberia, but it disappeared in the Bolshevik Revolution.

The M. E. Church made similar use of its Centenary funds. Work was started in Europe, and at one time there was a bishop resident in Paris. A school was started in Rome, but it disappeared because of Vatican opposition. All this work was later merged with national churches, although two or three small churches struggled on in Paris on an independent basis, and the CASA MATERNA Orphanage in Naples continued to flourish.

CENTENARY INSTITUTE, Summerfield, Ala., U.S.A., first school established under the auspices of the ALABAMA CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church, was projected by the conference as its part in the celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of Methodism. During 1839 funds were contributed by communities throughout the Alabama Conference. In accordance with the decision of the conference to establish the school in the community making the largest contribution, Valley Creek, near Selma, was selected. Centenary Institute was incorporated by an act of the Alabama State Legislature on Jan. 2, 1841, and building was begun soon thereafter. By 1843 three or four buildings were ready for use, the Institute having actually opened in 1842 in incomplete quarters.

From the beginning provisions were made for both male and female students. In 1845 the name of Valley Creek was changed to Summerfield, and the following year Valley Creek Academy, a private school incorporated in 1829, became a part of Centenary Institute.

The school flourished between 1845 and the beginning of the Civil War. As many as 500 students were in attendance much of the time. Some of the best trained men of the Alabama Conference were appointed as officers and teachers in the school. After 1844-45 it was authorized by the state legislature "to confer degrees and grant diplomas," and for at least a part of its career it was considered a college.

The fortunes of the school began to decline during the Civil War and Reconstruction periods. By 1880 it had become increasingly difficult to keep its doors open. About 1886 it ceased to exist, except as a local school. By its adoption of the report of a special committee in 1888, the Alabama Conference announced its determination not to attempt to reestablish a college or seminary in the Centenary Institute buildings but to concentrate its support on two new and enterprising conference colleges—Southern University (forerunner of BIRMINGHAM-SOUTHERN COLLEGE) and Alabama Conference Female College (forerunner of HUNTINGDON COLLEGE). It was further determined that the property should be converted to the use of an orphans' home and school. The Alabama Methodist Orphanage (the present Methodist Children's Home) opened its doors on the site in January, 1890, and remained in that location until its removal to Selma on Sept. 25, 1911.

CENTENNIAL OF AMERICAN METHODISM. At the M. E. GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1860, a committee was appointed on the Centenary of American Methodism. In accordance with this committee's report, the General Conference recommended that the whole church properly observe the coming centennial with two objectives in mind: the spiritual improvement of the church; and the raising of a large fund for such church enterprises as the committee might designate.

The General Conference of 1864 appointed an additional committee on the centenary and adopted its recommendation that the centennial should "commence on the first Tuesday in October, 1866, and continue through the month, at such times and places as may best suit the convenience of the Societies."

The primary object of the centennial was "the spiritual improvement of our members, and especially by reviewing the great things God hath wrought for us, the cultivation of feelings of gratitude for the blessings received through the agency of Methodism."

In furthering this purpose the annual conferences were urged to provide a memorial sermon at their regular sessions, and the first Sunday of January 1866 was set apart as a time to invoke God's blessing on the church in the Centennial year. ABEL STEVENS, the recognized historian of the church, was commissioned to write a volume, The Centenary of American Methodism. To this was added a chapter by John MCClinton on "The Connectional Arrangements for the celebration . . ." and a set of tables showing the growth of the M. E. Church during the one hundred years.

Beyond this, the church was challenged to raise a large sum of money for two departments of Christian enterprise: "the one connectional, central, and monumental, and the other local and distributive."

This local fund was distributed by especially chosen local committees for a variety of immediate local needs. The connectional fund was called The Centenary Educational Fund, and ten specific educational purposes were laid before the people for their consideration. To this was added the Sunday School Children's Fund, out of which grew the CHILDREN'S DAY Program and particularly the Student Loan Fund of the Board of Education.

The Centenary Committee had hoped to raise a minimum of two million dollars for the Connectional Fund to be used for "those institutions and agencies to which the church has been most indebted for its efficiency," by which was meant the church's educational institutions and agencies. The total amount raised was over $8,700,000. The Children's Fund in addition amounted to more than $83,700. The colleges were greatly aided in stabilizing their finances, and new institutions were founded including DREW THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, Madison, N. J.; Centenary College Institute, and Centenary Biblical Institute at Baltimore, Md. The latter was for the "education of . . . pious young men, especially colored, for the ministry."

The M. E. Church, South did not observe the centennial. A committee appointed to consider the centenary presented a report to the GENERAL CONFERENCE meeting in April 1866, in NEW ORLEANS, which was adopted. It advised that "no centenary celebration should be held until 1884, just a hundred years from the organization of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States." The reason for this decision was attributed by the New York Christian Advocate to "the present embarrassed condition of the Church, South." The War Between the States had but recently come to an end, and the South was prostrate.

Statistics prepared for the Centennial observance of the M. E. Church noted eight other Methodist bodies in the United States: the M. E. Church, South; the M. P. CHURCH, South and North; the A.M.E. CHURCH; the Evangelical Association; the WESLEYAN METHODISTS; the A.M.E. ZION CHURCH; and the FREE METHODIST CHURCH. These totalled 4,859 travelling and 8,788 local preachers and 980,604 members. The M. E. Church in addition totalled 7,576 travelling and 8,602 local preachers, and 1,032,184 members.

CENTRAL ALABAMA CONFERENCE was formed in 1876 by dividing the membership, not the territory, of the ALABAMA CONFERENCE of the M. E. CHURCH. Its boundaries include the state of ALABAMA and the part of FLORIDA west of the Appalachicola River. When organized the conference had forty-eight pastoral charges and over 5,200 members. At the time of union in 1939, Central Alabama became one of the strong conferences in the Central Jurisdiction of The Methodist Church. In 1968, the conference had four districts—Birmingham, Huntsville, Montgomery, and Tuskegee—and more than 15,000 members.

When the Central Jurisdiction was dissolved, according to the plan of union that made possible the formation of The United Methodist Church, Central Alabama became a conference in the Birmingham Area of the Southeastern Jurisdiction, pending the time of its full absorption into the Alabama conferences of that Jurisdiction.

CENTRAL CITY, COLORADO, U.S.A. Except for a Roman Catholic Church at Conejos, near the New Mexico border, the first permanent and denominationally authorized church in Colorado was the St. James M. E. Church at Central City. Its attractive masonry building, begun in 1864, is the oldest extant church edifice in the state.

A number of preachers who had come to the gold fields in an unofficial capacity had first preached in Central City with the opening of the gold mining. But it was not until July 10, 1859, that two official missionaries of the M. E. Church, WILLIAM H. GOODE and JACOB ADRLANCE, not only preached in Central City, but actually founded a church of forty-five members there. Many of these were hard rock miners from Cornwall, popularly known as Cousin Jacks. The two missionaries went on to Golden, and then to Denver, leaving a local elder, George W. Fisher, as the preacher-in-charge. Bethuel T. Vincent (a brother of Bishop JOHN VINCENT) was appointed to Central City in 1863.

In the following year he began the editing and publishing of the first magazine of any kind to be published in Colorado, The Rocky Mountain Sunday School Casket, which was used in his and other churches until 1868, when publication was suspended. During the prosperous mining days the Central City church grew and prospered, and was one of the largest churches in Colorado. It came to be known as a singing church, since so many of its members were Cornish and Welsh. With the decline of mining, both Central City and the church declined, so that the present membership is very small. Since the church building has become a shrine of the ROCKY MOUNTAIN CONFERENCE, it has been kept in good repair. Annually, on the Sunday nearest the date of founding, July 10, there is a homecoming and pilgrimage to the church, with as many as nine hundred persons attending the two morning services. A historical marker was placed on the building a number of years ago by the Conference Historical Society. A plea that other Colorado churches be encouraged to schedule worship services at St. James, that its value as a shrine might be better known and that it will not be forced to close, was made in the Together Denver Supplement of May 1969.

CENTRAL COLLEGE, a FREE METHODIST institution, is located in the heartland of the nation at McPherson, Kan., a community of 10,000. It is the only two-year college in the states operating under the auspices of the Free Methodist Church, serving a special function with its emphasis on personalized education in the initial collegiate years. Central was the first two-year college to achieve accreditation from the State of Kansas and has a history that places her among the early colleges of like type in the nation. The school was founded in 1884 at Orleans, Neb., as Orleans Seminary; it moved to McPherson in 1914, renamed Central Academy and College, and in 1959 the name became Central College. In 1965-66 the program was limited to a junior college program.

Central's two-year program on a residential type campus is designed to help the student bring his purposes into focus. Both liberal arts background courses and terminal curricula are offered. There are 200 students from many denominations. The school offers higher education in the context of a Christian life view.

BYRON S. LAMSON

CENTRAL CONFERENCE OF MIDDLE AND SOUTHERN EUROPE (UMC) was organized in Berne, SWITZERLAND, on May 4-9, 1969, with representatives of the Methodism of ten different countries present. This organization came about out of the former Central and Southern Europe Central Conference of The Methodist Church, as this united with the work of the E.U.B. Church in Switzerland. The Central Conference includes AUSTRIA Provisional, BELGIUM, BULGARIA Provisional, CZECHOSLOVAKIA, HUNGARY Provisional, North Africa Provisional, POLAND, Switzerland (Methodist), Switzerland (Evangelical), and YUGOSLAVIA Mission. (See Discipline, 1968, P. 1901.)

With the reorganization of the work called for under the new constitution of the United Methodist Church and especially in bringing in the Switzerland Conference, it was felt necessary to make a thorough reorganization of the work in Middle and Southern Europe and North Africa. Bishop FRANZ SCHAFER, the bishop in charge of the former Methodist work in Central and Southern Europe, is given credit for working out the plans for this and outlining in his episcopal address to the Uniting Conference in Berne the procedures which should be followed and the goals of United Methodism in Central and Southern Europe. His address called attention to the fact that the Central Conference for Central and Southern Europe extends across ten countries. He said in part: "Each of these lands has its own culture, its characteristic social forms and its particular religious background. Our Methodist Churches are everywhere minority churches. In comparison with others, they have no great past to which they may refer, nor can they claim traditional rights of the state or of a superior association of churches. Their understanding of the church and their service as a church can only be formulated anew from the Biblical command and in reference to the variations of the given environment. The result is that for our Central Conference the questions of the church, of its self-understanding, and of the justification for its existence are genuine, not merely academic."

The celebration of Union of the E.U.B. Church in Switzerland with The Methodist Church in Switzerland was held on Sunday afternoon, March 9, 1969. The occasion was declared by Bishop EUGENE FRANK, who was present, to be as "moving and dramatic as the celebration in Dallas, Texas. Instead of an expected congregation of some 400 persons, the mammoth sports hall in Berne was completely filled with over 5,000 persons. A great choir filled the stage area."

Bishop Schafer will continue as the bishop of the Area with his residence in ZURICH, but his administrative responsibility continues to be known as the GENEVA Area. The executives and churches under his direction working in the separate nations and conferences make up a much more powerful Central Conference.

CENTRAL GERMAN CONFERENCE (ME) was organized in the Race Street Church, CINCINNATI, Ohio, Aug. 24, 1864 with Bishop THOMAS A. MORRIS presiding. The organization of this conference was the result of work begun by WILLIAM NAST, the founder of German Methodism, in Cincinnati in 1835. Nast was admitted on trial in the OHIO CONFERENCE in September 1835, and appointed missionary to the Germans in Cincinnati. The next year he developed a five-week circuit with twenty-two preaching places over the state. In 1837 the first German Methodist society—Burke's Chapel—was organized in Cincinnati. In 1839 the Christian Apologist (Der Christliche Apologete), the German Methodist paper which continued for 100 years, was established in Cincinnati with Nast as editor. Ten men were working among the Germans by 1840. In 1843 the Ohio Conference formed a German Mission District with six charges. The work grew. In time there were two German districts in the Cincinnati Conference and two in the NORTH OHIO CONFERENCE, as well as some attached to other conferences in other states. By 1864 there were 306 German preachers and 26,145 German members in the M. E. Church, and the GENERAL CONFERENCE that year decided to organize a system of German conferences. The Central German Conference was one of three such bodies formed in 1864.

At the beginning the territory of the Central German Conference was OHIO, MICHIGAN, and a part of INDIANA; but it was quickly extended to include a part of ILLINOIS, KENTUCKY, TENNESSEE, WEST VIRGINIA, and western PENNSYLVANIA. At its first session the conference reported six districts, sixty-nine charges, seventy-two preachers, and 8,952 members.

German Wallace College was founded at Berea, Ohio, in 1864 with William Nast as the first president. In the same year the German Methodists started the Children's Home at Berea, and in 1908 they started the Home for the Aged in Cincinnati.

In 1889 the Central German Conference had four districts—Cincinnati, Louisville, Michigan, and North Ohio

—13,382 members. Twenty-five years later there were the same four districts and 13,802 members. The first World War caused a reaction against the use of the German language in the United States, and that, coupled with the restrictions placed on immigration shortly after the war, limited both the need and the appeal of German language churches and conferences. In 1933 the Central German Conference was merged with the overlying English-speaking conferences. In that year it reported two districts—Michigan-Indiana and Ohio—seventy-six charges, 15,591 members, and property valued at $783,970.

CENTRAL ILLINOIS CONFERENCE is the oldest continually existing conference in ILLINOIS Methodism. It was formed in 1824 as the Illinois Conference, which at that time included INDIANA, Illinois, and the as yet little explored Northwest Territory. By successive steps between 1832 and 1856, ROCK RIVER, INDIANA and SOUTHERN ILLINOIS CONFERENCES were set off from Illinois.

In 1856 the Peoria Conference (after 1859 the Central Illinois Conference) was carved out of the Illinois and Rock River Conferences. In 1928 the Central Illinois Conference was absorbed by the Illinois Conference. In 1960 the name of the Illinois Conference was changed to Central Illinois, which better describes its location.

In 1852, after the separation of Southern Illinois, the Illinois Conference reported 17,304 members; in 1928 the united conference had 156,920 members.

Within the bounds and under the care of the Central Illinois Conference are two schools—MACMURRAY COLLEGE at Jacksonville and ILLINOIS WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY at Bloomington. Most significant for Methodist higher-education work is the WESLEY FOUNDATION at the University of Illinois. This unit, the first such foundation in the country, was begun by JAMES C. BAKER (later bishop) in 1913. The conference's philanthropic institutions are the Babyfold, Chaddock Boys Home, Sunset Home, Everglow Lodge, Methodist Hospital, Cunningham Children's Home, and Langleyville Community Center. In 1964 the Conference Office Building was erected in Bloomington on the campus of Illinois Wesleyan University. The Conference Historical Library with its large collection of Methodistica is also located there.

The conference was a pioneer in Methodist public relations. As early as 1949 it employed a full-time director and issued a quarterly Methodist Action.

In 1969, after merger with the Evangelical United Brethren, the Central Illinois Conference reported 226,527 members in 740 congregations served by 523 ministers.

CENTRAL JURISDICTION. (See NEGRO IN AMERICAN METHODISM, and JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCES.)

CENTRAL KANSAS CONFERENCE of The Methodist Church was formed by the merger of the NORTHWEST and SOUTHWEST KANSAS CONFERENCES. The organizing session was held at Salina, Oct. 5-9, 1939, with Bishop CHARLES L. MEAD presiding. At the beginning the conference had eight districts: Colby, Concordia, Dodge City, Liberal, Hutchinson, Salina, Wichita, and Winfield; 341 charges; and 92,601 members.

The Central Kansas Conference continued to support institutions established or supported by its predecessor conferences, along with new ones which came into being after 1939. The list includes: SOUTHWESTERN COLLEGE and KANSAS WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, PHILANDER SMITH COLLEGE and ST. PAUL SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY METHODIST, Asbury Hospital at Salina, Grace Hospital and School of Nursing at Hutchinson, Hadley Memorial Hospital and Rehabilitation Center at Hays, Wesley Medical Center at Wichita, the homes for the aged at Topeka and Hutchinson, the children's home at Newton, and the WESLEY FOUNDATIONS at the state institutions of higher learning. In 1967 the conference transferred ownership of Boothroy Hospital at Goodland to Sherman County.

In 1967 the conference had seven districts: Concordia, Dodge City, Hays, Hutchinson, Salina, Wichita, and Winfield; and 382 ministers, 240 charges, 135,878 members, and 379 churches valued at $47,789,017. In 1968 the name of the conference was changed to Kansas West Conference.

CENTRAL METHODIST COLLEGE, Fayette, Mo., was chartered in 1855. Howard-Payne, Scarritt-Morrisville, Central College for Women, and Marvin College merged with Central College between 1922 and 1925. Central Methodist College, as it was named in 1961, was related to the former M. E. Church, South, and is the only Methodist college in MISSOURI. Branches of the Methodist Church in Missouri founded at least twelve institutions, and all but Central Methodist College have been consolidated with other institutions or closed. Missouri Wesleyan, Cameron, Missouri, a college of the M. E. Church, consolidated with BAKER UNIVERSITY at Baldwin, Kan. Central Wesleyan College, founded by the CENTRAL GERMAN CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church, was closed prior to union during the 1930's. Degrees granted are the B.A., B.S. in Education, B.M. (Music), and B.M.E. (Music Education). The governing board has twenty-six members, all elected by the two annual conferences in Missouri.

JOHN O. CROSS

CENTRAL NEW YORK CONFERENCE (ME), was organized at Auburn, N. Y., April 15, 1869, with Bishop LEVI SCOTT presiding. The 1868 GENERAL CONFERENCE abolished the ONEIDA CONFERENCE and used part of its territory and some from the BLACK RIVER CONFERENCE to form the Central New York Conference. The Central New York Conference is regarded as the legal and historical successor of the Oneida Conference. The name of the conference indicates location. It began with six districts—Auburn, Cazenovia, Cortland, Herkimer, Oswego, Rome, and Syracuse—187 charges, and 26,731 members.

The Oneida Conference, formed by dividing the GENESSEE CONFERENCE, was authorized by the 1828 General Conference and was organized in 1829. The Genesee Conference was organized in 1810 at Lyons, Wayne County, N. Y. The first session of the Genesee Conference was held in a storehouse belonging to one Daniel Dorsey. In 1960 the Central New York Conference, meeting at Newark, took time to assemble at the site of Dorsey's barn to commemorate the one hundred fiftieth anniversary of the organization of the Genesee Conference. At the same time gaveln made from wood taken from the Dorsey barn were on sale. A historical marker has been erected at the barn site.

The desire to build a new college in the conference region figured in the passing of the Oneida Conference and the creation of the Central New York Conference. When Ezra Cornell chose Ithaca for the site of his school in 1865, Syracuse became the choice of the Methodists for a new college. They believed that a strong annual conference should be built around SYRACUSE UNIVERSITY (founded in 1870). The result was the formation of the Central New York Conference. Since education was the watchword, the preachers pledged $46,050 from their meager incomes at the first session of the conference so as to move the old Genesee College from Lima to Syracuse and thus launch the university. Thereafter, every issue of the conference journal fully reported on the progress of the infant university, as well as on Cazenovia Seminary which dated from 1823.

Notwithstanding the growing strength of Syracuse University, during the last quarter of the nineteenth century and the first of the twentieth, the majority of Methodist ministers in central New York were trained at Cazenovia. The conference finally dissociated itself from the Cazenovia school in 1942 when the trustees, without sufficient financial resources or academic accreditation, insisted on starting junior college courses. Syracuse University is now one of the eight Methodist-related universities in America. It has an endowment of about $40,000,000, a plant valued at nearly $100,000,000, and an enrollment of more than 16,000 regular students.

In 1872 when the East Genesee Conference was abolished, the Central New York Conference received a part of its territory, but at the same time the Central New York Conference gave up some territory to the NORTHERN NEW YORK CONFERENCE which was created in that year. In 1874 the Central New York Conference had seven districts, 211 charges, and 32,313 members.

The Central New York Conference came to unification in 1939 with four districts—Elmira, Geneva, Syracuse East, and Syracuse West—258 charges, 61,042 members, and property valued at $6,319,928. At that time it received a few ministers and churches from the Onondaga Conference of the M. P. Church. Also, at that time the Syracuse Area was formed, including the Central New York, Northern New York, and WESTERN NEW YORK (Genesee at that time) Conferences with the episcopal residence at Syracuse.

Four members of the Central New York Conference have been elected bishops: EDWARD C. ANDREWS and JESSE T. PECK (1872), ERASTUS O. HAVEN (1880), and WALLACE E. BROWN (1924). Six other bishops either began or served part of their ministry in the conference before their election: JOHN P. NEWMAN (1888), FREDERICK D. LEETE (1912), FREDERICK T. KEENEY and ERNEST L. WALDORF (1920), RALPH S. CUSHMAN (1928), and DWIGHT E. LODER (1964).

In 1964 the Central New York Conference projected a campaign to raise $1,000,000 by the time of its centennial in 1969, the money to be used for church extension, ministerial training, rural and urban work, and camps.

The conference maintains Casowasco Camp for all ages on Owasco Lake. It supports the Children's Home at Williamsville and the Folts (retirement) Home at Herkimer. It has joined the other conferences and denominations in an ecumenical approach to religious ministry to students in the institutions of higher learning in the state.

In 1968 the Central New York Conference reported three districts—Elmira, Geneva, and Syracuse—175 charges, 218 ministers, 81,869 members, property valued at $38,381,615, and a total of $4,808,951 raised for all purposes during the year.

CENTRAL NORTHWEST CONFERENCE dates from 1877 and the formation of the Northwest Swedish Conference to care for Swedish work of the M. E. Church in the midwest. The first session was Sept. 6, 1877, at Galesburg, Ill., with Bishop J. T. PECK presiding. In 1894 the Swedish work split into three conferences: Central Swedish (Illinois); Northern Swedish (Wisconsin and Minnesota); and Western Swedish (Iowa and Neb.) In 1928 these conferences were reunited to form the Central Northwest Conference.

Swedish work in the midwest began when OLAF HEDSTROM settled at Victoria, Ill., in 1838. Here he founded the first Swedish Methodist church in the west on Dec. 15, 1846. From Victoria the work spread, and in 1848-49 entered Chicago.

A convention of all Scandinavian Methodists met in 1866 in Chicago and called for a separate Scandinavian conference. Not until 1877 was action taken on the resolution.

Beginning in 1862, Swedish Methodism was served by a newspaper, Sandebudet (The Messenger) issued in Chicago. A second periodical Vaktaren had a short existence beginning in 1889.

One institution of higher education was located within the bounds of the Central Northwest Conference. The Swedish Theological Seminary was founded March 1, 1870, at Galesburg, Ill. In 1875 it was moved to Evanston, Ill. Later it was known as Wesley Academy and Theological Seminary. In 1934 it became the Evanston Collegiate Institute, a two-year, junior college for all Scandinavian Methodism. The Evanston Collegiate Institute survives today as KENDALL COLLEGE in Evanston. Bethany Home and Hospital, now under the auspices of the NORTHERN ILLINOIS CONFERENCE, was begun in 1891 by the Northwest Swedish Conference.

In 1942, during the phasing out of foreign language work in American Methodism, the Central Northwest Conference was absorbed by the English-speaking conferences in ILLINOIS, IOWA, WISCONSIN and MINNESOTA. At that time it reported 8,157 members in seventy-seven churches served by fifty-five ministers.

CENTRAL OHIO CONFERENCE (ME), known as the Delaware Conference from 1856 to 1860, was organized at Lima, Sept. 25, 1856, with Bishop BEVERLY WAUGH presiding. It was formed by dividing the NORTH OHIO CONFERENCE. Its territory was northwest Ohio. At the beginning the conference had four districts, 63 charges, 98 preachers, and 14,768 members.

The reasons for changing the name of the conference are not clear. While Delaware may have suggested a conference in the state of Delaware, Central Ohio was not altogether appropriate because the conference was not in the central part of Ohio. It is said, perhaps facetiously, that the conference leaders believed the new name would assure better seating for General Conference delegates. In those days delegations were seated alphabetically.

The 1873 journal notes that a CAMP MEETING was held at Lakeside in 1872, and that a committee was appointed to visit the North Ohio Conference and ask that body "to become joint patrons with us in this camp meeting enterprise." The North Ohio Conference agreed. Such was the beginning of the LAKESIDE ASSEMBLY.

The Central Ohio Conference grew steadily. In 1880 it reported six districts, 127 charges, and 24,854 members. In 1912 there were 179 charges, 179 preachers, 63,966 members, and property valued at $3,121,650.

The Central Ohio Conference merged with the CINCINNATI CONFERENCE in 1913 to form the WEST OHIO CONFERENCE.

CENTRAL PENNSYLVANIA COLLEGE, E.U.B. (See ALBRIGHT COLLEGE, Reading, Pa.)

CENTRAL PENNSYLVANIA CONFERENCE (ME) was created by the 1868 GENERAL CONFERENCE out of territory taken from the East Baltimore and PHILADELPHIA CONFERENCES. The East Baltimore Conference was dissolved at the time, the remainder of its territory going to the BALTIMORE and PITTSBURGH CONFERENCES. The aim of the General Conference was to make conference boundaries conform more nearly to state lines. In 1872 Harrisburg was taken from the Philadelphia Conference and added so that the Central Pennsylvania Conference would have one large city within its bounds. After that date there were no more major changes in the boundaries of the Central Pennsylvania Conference until 1962 when it received some territory from the Baltimore, CENTRAL NEW YORK, and GENESSEE CONFERENCES and gave up today to the newly formed WESTERN PENNSYLVANIA CONFERENCE. Today the northern and southern boundaries of the conference are the state lines, while it touches the Philadelphia and WYOMING CONFERENCES on the east and the Western Pennsylvania Conference on the west. Of Pennsylvania's sixty-seven counties, thirty-three in whole or in part are in the Central Pennsylvania Conference.

Methodism reached central Pennsylvania in 1770 when a circuit rider, possibly ROBERT STRAWBRIDGE or one of his preachers, entered the region and preached at the home of George Fickes in Adams County. Three years later the cornerstone of historic Rock Chapel was laid, and the building was completed in 1776. The church became a part of the Little York or Carlisle Circuit. Little York was the first circuit formed in the region; FREE-BORN GARRETTSON organized it and called it Little York to distinguish it from NEW YORK. As more circuits were added in the region they were formed into districts. At first the territory was in the Baltimore Conference, but it fell within the East Baltimore Conference when that body was organized in 1857.

The first session of the Central Pennsylvania Conference was held at Danville, March 10, 1869 with Bishop LEVI SCOTT presiding. At the time it reported 183 traveling preachers, 119 local preachers, 398 Sunday schools with 32,472 pupils, 324 churches with 28,240 members, and 65 parsonages.

District as well as conference boundaries were realigned in 1962, and a fifth district, State College, was added to the existing ones, Altoona, Harrisburg, Sunbury, and Williamsport. After having been a part of the Washington, and then of the Western Pennsylvania Area, the Central Pennsylvania Conference became a separate area in 1964 with the presiding bishop residing in Harrisburg.

The Preachers' Aid Society of the conference owns the entire stock of LYCOMING COLLEGE at Williamsport. DICKINSON COLLEGE at Carlisle is within the bounds of the conference. The conference board of education is incorporated, and it owns and manages four camp and retreat centers: Wesley Forest at Weikert; Greene Hills at Barree; Mount Asbury at Dickinson; and Camp Loyalsock at Forksville.

The conference owns and operates three homes: the Methodist Home for Children at Mechanicsburg, established in 1917; Epworth Manor at Tyrone; and Bethany Village. The two latter are retirement homes and their capacity is 105 and 103 guests, respectively. Also, the conference sponsors the Central Pennsylvania Methodist, a publication begun by the conference interboard council in 1959.

In 1968 the Central Pennsylvania Conference reported 268 ministers, 284 pastoral charges, 131,001 members, and property valued at $69,763,698.

CENTRAL PROTESTANT, THE (1873-1891), was the official news organ of the NORTH CAROLINA ANNUAL CONFERENCE of the M. P. Church and was edited by John L. Michaux. The subscription price was two dollars a year. In its latter years The Central Protestant was largely a restatement of news carried in The Daily Workman, a secular newspaper also issued by Michaux. The Central Protestant was succeeded in 1894 by Our Church Record, later known as The Methodist Protestant Herald. The North Carolina Annual Conference was the only conference in the M. P. Church to publish its own denominational publication.

CENTRAL TENNESSEE CONFERENCE (ME). (See TENNESSEE, TENNESSEE-KENTUCKY CONFERENCE, and TABLE OF METHODIST CONFERENCES.)

CENTRAL TEXAS CONFERENCE (MES) was organized at Waxahachie, Texas, Nov. 16, 1910, with Bishop JAMES

ATKINS presiding. The conference was formed by dividing the NORTHWEST TEXAS CONFERENCE. As its name indicates, the territory of the conference embraces central Texas. While the territory was only about one-half as large as that retained in the Northwest Texas Conference, the initial strength of the Central Texas Conference was about twice as great. Of the sixteen districts, 354 pastoral charges, and 115,794 members in the original Northwest Texas Conference in 1910, ten districts, 206 charges and 76,595 members fell within the new Central Texas Conference when the division was made.

The Central Texas Conference had within its area several strong institutions prior to unification in 1939. SOUTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY at Georgetown, which was established as a merger of four earlier small colleges, was the premier Methodist college in Texas. The school received good support until the leaders of Methodism in Texas became convinced that it was not possible to build a first-rate university in the small community of Georgetown. Even so, Southwestern University proved strong enough to maintain itself after its president, R. S. Hyer, left in 1911 to become president of the new SOUTHERN METHODIST UNIVERSITY in DALLAS. In 1968 Southwestern University had twenty-eight buildings, 850 students, property valued at $10,000,000, and an endowment of $8,000,000.

TEXAS WESLEYAN COLLEGE was organized in Fort Worth in 1890 as Polytechnic College. In 1914 it was called Texas Woman's College, became coeducational in 1934, and was then renamed Texas Wesleyan College. In 1968 the school had an enrollment of 1,800, an endowment of $2,500,000, and a plant valued at $6,500,000.

The METHODIST HOME at WACO, property of all Texas Methodism, was established in 1890 for the care of orphan children. It has since broadened its ministry to include children of need who may not be orphans. In 1968 the institution was caring for 460 children, and had 31 buildings, property valued at $4,000,000, and an endowment of $16,000,000.

The Methodist Hospital at FORT WORTH, owned by the conference, was opened in 1930. When the conference was about to lose the institution in 1937 because of the economic situation, a local physician, Charles H. Harris, assumed its half-million dollar debt and saved it. He also gave $1,000,000 to establish the Harris School of Nursing. In appreciation of Harris' generosity the hospital trustees voted to rename the institution "Harris Hospital, property of the Central Texas Conference of The Methodist Church." The hospital has five buildings, 580 beds, and property valued at $21,000,000.

Wesleyan Homes for the aged, with a capacity for 102 people, was established at Georgetown in 1962 at a cost of $1,250,000.

The Central Texas Conference joins other Texas conferences in supporting the Texas Mission Home for unwed mothers at SAN ANTONIO, the Texas Methodist College Association, WESLEY FOUNDATIONS, and The Texas Methodist, a state publication for Methodism.

The conference has established what is called an "Extended Ministry" whereby several larger charges include one or more small, weak churches which cannot afford the cost of permanent pastors. This new ministry provides Sunday services not only to the larger churches, but also to the smaller churches each week. The program is saving many smaller churches and providing them with adequate services.

The Central Texas Conference came to unification in 1939 with nine districts, 237 pastoral charges, 97,786 members and property valued at $6,717,187. In 1968 the conference had eight districts, 218 pastoral charges, 356 ministers, 117,694 members, and property valued at $50,522,995. The total amount raised for all purposes that year was $7,952,681.

CENTRAL WESLEYAN COLLEGE, Warrenton, Mo., of German-American Methodist patronage, started as an academy in Quincy, Ill., in 1854 and was moved to Warrenton in 1864 as the Western Orphan Asylum and Educational Institute. In March 1870 it was chartered as Central Wesleyan College under the Southwest German Annual Conference of the M. E. Church. It offered academy, college and theological courses in the German language. The first class was graduated in 1870 and the college made considerable progress under three long presidencies of Hermann A. Koch (1870-1895), GEORGE D. ADDICKS (1895-1909) and OTTO E. KRIEGE (1909-1925). In 1909 it absorbed its sister institution of the St. Louis German and West German Conferences, the Mount Pleasant German College, Mount Pleasant, Iowa. Seven buildings were eventually constructed and some 900 students were graduated between 1870 and 1927. Gradually the English instruction courses began to overshadow the German, the use of German was dropped entirely during World War I, the St. Louis German and West German Conferences were dissolved in 1926 and the German character of the college was lost. It became the responsibility of English-speaking Missouri Methodism which had other colleges to support. In 1930 it became a junior college. Despite valiant efforts of President Franklin F. Lewis in 1939, the college quietly closed in June 1941. Its buildings and funds reverted to the Orphan's Home which was subsequently merged with the Methodist Children's Home in St. Louis. Today the buildings have been sold for other purposes. A memorial marker was placed in front of the College Methodist Church, Warrenton on Aug. 1, 1964 by the Alumni Association. The archives are deposited at Northeast Missouri State Teachers College, Kirksville.

CENTRAL WEST CONFERENCE (ME) was organized at Kansas City, Mo., April 15, 1929, with Bishop MATTHEW W. CLAIR, Sr., presiding. The 1928 GENERAL CONFERENCE adopted an enabling act permitting the Central Missouri, Lincoln, and LITTLE ROCK CONFERENCES to consolidate into two conferences. The Central West Conference was formed by merging the Central Missouri Conference with a part of the Lincoln Conference.

The Central Missouri Conference (ME) was formed in 1886 by dividing the MISSOURI and ST. LOUIS CONFERENCES of the denomination along racial lines. The new conference was composed of the Negro ministers and churches from the other two, and its territory was

MISSOURI and KANSAS. The first session of the Central Missouri Conference was held at Sedalia, Missouri in March, 1887 with Bishop WILLARD F. MALLALIEU presiding. At the outset the conference had three districts, sixty-four charges, and 5,705 members. As time passed, churches in IOWA and south ILLINOIS were included in this conference.

When the Central West Conference was formed, its territory included all the Negro work in Missouri, Kansas, COLORADO, NEBRASKA, IOWA, NORTH and SOUTH DAKOTA, MONTANA, and part of Illinois. The conference began with five districts, Kansas City, St. Louis, Omaha, Sedalia, and Topeka. It had 118 charges and 9,016 members. In 1938 it reported four districts and 11,993 members. In 1939 the conference became a part of the Central Jurisdiction of The Methodist Church.

The Central West Conference supported PHILANDER SMITH COLLEGE, Little Rock, Ark.; and beginning in 1953, a WESLEY FOUNDATION at Lincoln University, Jefferson City, Mo. The conference erected a community chapel costing $31,000 at the latter institution in 1960.

In 1964 the Central West Conference reported three districts, St. Louis, Kansas City, and Topeka, with 66 charges, about 14,500 members, and property valued at $3,582,097. In that year all of the conference's work outside of Missouri was merged with the appropriate overlying white conferences. On May 21-22, 1966, the final session of the Central West Conference was held in St. Louis with Bishop EUGENE M. FRANK presiding, and its remaining 35 charges, 24 ministers, and 8,067 members were then received into the MISSOURI EAST and MISSOURI WEST CONFERENCES.

CERTIFICATES OF REMOVAL. (See MEMBERSHIP IN METHODIST CHURCHES.)

CEYLON has a population of 12,000,000, approximately seventy percent being Sinhalese (mainly Buddhists), twenty-three percent Tamils (mainly Hindus), five percent Moors and Malays (Muslims). There are about 30,000 Burghers of European descent. By religion, Christians make up seven percent of the total (Sinhalese, Tamils and Burghers). Roman Catholics number one million; there are 50,000 Anglicans, 26,000 Methodists, 5,000 Baptists, 5,000 Church of South India, and small numbers of other denominations. Roman Catholicism was firmly established during Portuguese rule over the coastal regions (1505-1658). The Dutch then took over and imposed Reformed Christianity. The British captured the coastlands in 1796. In 1815 they deposed the king of the interior Kingdom of Kandy, and until independence in 1948 the whole island remained under British rule. The British influence on Ceylon Methodism is, therefore, paramount. In the early British period a favorable government permitted the following societies to establish missions: the London Missionary Society (1805), the Baptists (1812), the Wesleyan Methodists (1814), the American Board of Missions (1816), and the Church Missionary Society (1818).

The organizer of the Methodist Mission to Ceylon was THOMAS COKE, the Wesleyan Conference's General Superintendent of Missions. Not content with directing expeditions to America and Africa, Coke had dreamed, since

PETAH CHURCH, COLOMBO, FOUNDED IN 1814

1784, of reviving "a genuine work of religion in the immense regions of Asia." In 1808 the British Government in Ceylon had been criticized in Parliament by WILLIAM WILBERFORCE and other Evangelicals for failing to maintain the Dutch churches and schools and for allowing the decline of Protestant Christianity. The Chief Justice of Ceylon, visiting England, discussed the problem with Wilberforce, who referred him to the Wesleys. Coke realized that here was an opening into the East and that Ceylon must be "the first grand outpost of our mission to India."

The 1813 WESLEYAN METHODIST CONFERENCE, having heavy commitments elsewhere, dared not at first sanction Coke's ambitious plans for an Asian mission, but Coke dramatically swayed the anxious debate by offering £6,000 toward the cost. Authorized by the Conference, he and six young missionaries (four British, two Irish) set sail for Bombay on Dec. 31, 1813. Coke never reached INDIA. He died at sea on May 3, 1814. Five of his companions went on to Ceylon, landing at Galle and Weligama on June 29, 1814, to be warmly welcomed by the military commandant. The Governor of Ceylon was equally friendly, and suggested that the best means of meeting the Ceylonese would be to open English schools. They considered this unexpected advice very carefully before deciding to accept it; for, as preachers, they did not wish to be too much involved in "secular" occupations. Bereaved of the venerable Coke, they might have chosen to remain together. Instead, at their "little conference" of July 11, 1814, they acted in the spirit of WESLEY and Coke by deciding to separate to far-distant stations—JAMES LYNCH and THOMAS SQUANCE to Jaffna; WILLIAM AULT to Batticaloa in the Tamil North and East; B. Clough to Galle and G. Erskine to Matara in the Sinhalese South. Methodism was thus established from the very beginning in both sections of the island.

Ault died of fever on April 1, 1815, after a devoted but tragically brief ministry. Meanwhile, Colombo became the mission headquarters in March 1815 after the arrival of WILLIAM M. HARVARD, who, being a printer, set up a press, forerunner of today's Wesley Press. On Dec. 22, 1816, Harvard and Clough opened the Colombo Pettah chapel—"the oldest Methodist church in Asia," which is today the heart of the Colombo City Mission. On each station Sunday and weeknight preaching was immediately begun in private houses and military barracks. First attempts at itinerant open-air preaching through interpreters were disappointing, and in 1817 it was decided to open vernacular schools in the villages surrounding the stations, education being intended to lead to conversions. By 1819 there were eighty-four schools, each a preaching place, with 5,000 pupils in the coastland villages, from Point Pedro in the Jaffna Peninsula to Trincomalee and Batticaloa in the northeast, and from Negombo in the west to Dondra Head in the extreme south. These two coastal strips, where Portuguese and Dutch Christian influences were at their strongest, have from early days proved to be the areas where Methodism has flourished most. From these secure bases, Methodism has continually attempted to advance into less promising areas, usually with difficulty and with relatively meager success. In the first ten years, communications with London were difficult, and the missionaries were censured for over-enthusiastic expenditure. In 1821, therefore, one-third of the schools had to be closed, and the number was not made up until 1875. Ceylonese were employed as teachers, and the Ceylon ministry was gradually built up, beginning with W. Lalmon (Burgher, 1816), C. Wijesingha (Sinhalese, 1819), and J. P. Sanmugam (Tamil, 1825). In 1817 Lynch first visited Madras, which remained for several years part of the Tamil (later North Ceylon) District, which was separated from the Sinhalese (later South Ceylon) District in 1819.

Progress in the two districts was slow until the 1860's. The missionaries remained few, but the number of Ceylonese ministers grew steadily. Among North District missionary chairmen, P. Percival (Chairman 1837-51) was a Tamil scholar and educationalist, and J. Kilner (1860-75) an advocate of self-support and self-government. G. J. Trimmer (1890-1920) served in Ceylon forty-three years. In the south, D. J. Gogerly (Chairman 1838-62), who never revisited England and served forty-four years until his death in 1862 at the age of seventy, was "the greatest Pali scholar of his age." His pioneer researches into Buddhist philosophy—unknown in Europe—precipitated sharp Buddhist-Christian controversies, the most famous of which was the public debate at Panadura in August 1873, in which the main Christian speaker was David de Silva, a Sinhalese Methodist minister. A newspaper report of the debate led to the visit of Colonel Olcott (co-founder of the Theosophical Society), who lent support to the growing Buddhist agitation for schools and the restoration of their "lost rights." Gogerly was followed by R. Spence Hardy (1862-65), another Buddhist scholar, who imposed stricter Methodist discipline on the societies. A revival broke out in Colombo in March 1865, spreading elsewhere with beneficial results, leading to the establishing of work at Kandy in 1867 and among the Colombo Tamils in 1871. An Extension Fund, launched in 1874, enabled new stations to be opened in the remoter areas of the central highlands and the east and the south.

Between 1870 and 1900, Methodism followed the government and the Anglicans by opening secondary schools of high standard, including Wesley College, Colombo; Richmond College, Galle, to which was attached a theological institution; Kingswood College, Kandy, which began with a Ceylonese principal; Central College, Jaffna; and Methodist College for Girls, Colpetty, Colombo. Increasing numbers of educational missionaries were sent out, many of whom were outstanding men and women, who exercised a profound influence over their pupils. Between 1885 and 1905 the Southern District was divided into three—Colombo, Kandy, Galle. New work in both Colombo and the backward central highlands included the establishment of homes and industrial schools for destitute children. Campaigns were fought for total abstinence and social purity. In the neglected villages of the north, east, and center, women missionaries began social and medical work among mothers, and "Bible women" were trained to assist them.

The early twentieth century was a time of consolidation, and increased emphasis on the schools, though evangelism was still the primary objective. Changing theological convictions led to more liberal attitudes regarding Buddhism and Hinduism. There was the beginning of the movement toward the devolution of authority from the British Conference and toward increased responsibility for Ceylonese. This movement accelerated during the second World War when many missionaries left Ceylon. In 1950 the North and South Districts were amalgamated, and a single all-Ceylon District was inaugurated under a Ceylonese Chairman, S. G. Mendis. The British Methodist Conference transferred full authority in June 1964, when an autonomous Ceylon Conference was constituted, and F. S. de Silva was inducted as the first President of the Conference. He was succeeded in 1968 by D. T. NILES, for many years a well-known figure in the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the World Student Christian Federation. Upon the death of Niles in 1970, G. Denzil de Silva became President. The Conference meets annually and consists of fifty ministers and fifty laymen. The President is the chief executive officer of the Church and exercises overall pastoral and spiritual oversight.

The Ceylon Methodist Church today has 14,000 full communicants and a total community of 26,000. The rise in membership continues slowly, but fails to keep pace with the rapidly increasing population of the island. Adult baptisms average fewer than 100 each year. There are three District synods: South (Sinhalese, 6,500 members); North (Tamil, 3,000); and Central (Sinhalese, Tamil, and English-speaking, 4,500). There are 118 churches and twenty-four other preaching places. There are 120 children's Bible schools with 6,000 pupils. The thirty circuits are staffed by forty-four Ceylonese ministers (most of whom were trained at the United Theological College, Bangalore, South India, and hold the Serampore B.D. degree), ten supernumeraries, and seven British missionary ministers. There are 400 lay preachers. Women's work is done by two Ceylonese Sisters, eighteen deaconesses, and nine European missionary Sisters. The Colombo City Mission carries out a varied program of social work in the slums by which it is surrounded today. The church continues children's work in Girls' Homes at Badulla (Uva Province), Thummodara (Northwest Province), and Kalmunai (Eastern Province), and at the Boys' Industrial Home (formerly linked with the Wesley Press), Wellawatte, Colombo. There is an ashram-like women's center at Kalmunai, and small-scale medical work is done at Puttur, near Jaffna. The headquarters of the church's administration and the President's residence, together with Methodist College and one of the largest churches, are situated in Colpetty (Kollupitiya), Colombo.

Since 1940 the Methodist Church has been negotiating a church union scheme with the Anglicans, Baptists, Presbyterians, and the Jaffna Diocese of the Church of South India, on the basis of the historic episcopate. The other churches have all signified their first assent to the scheme, but the 1969 Methodist Conference failed by two votes to obtain the necessary seventy-five percent approval. The movement towards union is temporarily at a standstill. There is, however, a good deal of cooperation between the churches in the National Christian Council. A study center was opened in Colombo in 1951, and the present director is a Methodist minister who specializes in Buddhist studies and inter-faith dialogue. Another Methodist minister is Principal of the inter-denominational Theological College of Lanka, opened in 1963 at Pilimalalawa, near Kandy, to train ministers and deacons, using the national language as the media of instruction.

In 1956—the 2,500th anniversary of the Buddha's Enlightenment—a radical Sinhalese nationalist government was swept into power, and agitation against Christian schools came to a climax. Sinhalese was made the official language, and in 1961 the government took over most church schools. Methodism thereby lost 175 out of its 177 schools. The church decided to retain control of two Colombo schools—Methodist College (girls) and Wesley College (boys)—but the government makes no grants and does not allow fees to be charged, and so they are a heavy financial burden. The schools' handover has liberated ministers from a great deal of administrative work, but in some areas has severely weakened the church. In many villages Methodism had built up communities of Christians around its schools. Now, the teachers, in government service, are being gradually scattered—often to distant villages where there are no Christians. The circuit system is sometimes too rigid to keep these solitary dispersed teachers in fellowship with the church, and to equip them to seize their new evangelistic opportunity. In 1966, through Buddhist requests, Sundays were made working days and poya days (phases of the moon) were made the weekly holidays. All churches responded to this challenge by maintaining Sunday as the day of public worship—very successfully in the towns, but with difficulty in distant villages.

Always true to its evangelistic calling, Methodism began new work among the pioneer peasant cultivators in a government agricultural development area in the Gal Oya Valley, appointing a resident minister there in 1958, but no important break-through has been made. Other forward movements have been failures. The church remains strong among middle-class and lower-middle-class people, chiefly in the greater Colombo area (e.g. Moratuwa and Katunayake) and the Jaffna region. As with the church in the west most of its strength is spent in maintaining the present structure and organization. The weight of influence is with the middle-aged, whose outlook was formed in British times. The Conference is attempting to attract the young by revitalizing youth work. There is concern over the many members who do not regularly attend public worship or accept the duties of discipleship.

Many town churches worship in English, as well as in Sinhalese or Tamil, using the British Methodist Hymn Book and Book of Offices: services are virtually indistinguishable from services in Britain. The business of Leaders' Meetings, Quarterly Meetings, Synods and Conferences is also based on the British pattern. The Sinhalese book of public worship is the latest revision of one originally issued in 1819 by B. Clough, which was largely a translation from Wesley's Prayer Book. Most hymns are translations from English, set to familiar European tunes which are quite alien to the Sinhalese language. Most churches were built in western style, with pillars, pulpits and harmoniums. A new prayer book is at present being composed in intelligible contemporary Sinhalese, and greater attempts are being made to introduce oriental tunes which accord better with Sinhalese verse. Tamil has a richer heritage of music and dance, and the Tamil churches have for much longer made use of indigenous forms of architecture, drama and song for both worship and the presentation of the gospel.

There is full religious liberty today in Ceylon, and all children study at school their father's religion. There are fewer material advantages in becoming a Christian than in British times. This usually insures that most conversions today are genuine. Perhaps the Methodist Church has not yet re-orientated itself sufficiently after the loss of its schools. In a multi-religious, multi-racial society with wider educational opportunities than ever before—a society in which the population has increased by one-half in the past thirty years—the nation's primary objectives are to achieve self-sufficiency in food production, to raise living standards, and to provide opportunities of work for all (unemployment among graduates is an increasingly severe problem). The church needs to do much rethinking about its role and mission in such a society.

CHACON, CARMEN (1869-1889), Uruguayan teacher and missionary to Brazil, was born in San Ramon, Canelones, URUGUAY, on April 8, 1869. Her family had heard the Gospel through João Corrêa, a homeopathic doctor and lay preacher connected with the M. E. Church. Her mother, left a widow with six children, entrusted little Carmen to Corrêa and his wife, and they received her with real affection. On moving to MONTEVIDEO, they provided for her education, sending her to a school headed by Mlle. Teresa Calvet. Carmen, an intelligent and sensible girl, finished the course at the age of fourteen, and at once became assistant teacher in an evangelical school. In 1885, Corrêa was sent by the superintendent of the M. E. mission in Uruguay to open work in PORTO ALEGRE, Rio Grande do Sul. Carmen went with him and his family.

In October, 1885, Corrêa founded a school in that city, which he called the Colegio Evangelico Mixto (Evangelical School for Boys and Girls) and Carmen became his assistant. When he became seriously ill, Carmen took complete charge of this school which became the precursor of the Colegio Americano in Porto Alegre.

In 1889, however, Carmen came down with tuberculosis. She returned to her mother in Uruguay where she died at the age of twenty, on Nov. 18, 1889. "I have fought the good fight, I have kept the faith" were her last words. She was buried in the "Cemetery of the Dissidents," that is, of non-Catholics, in Montevideo. For one so young she left a peculiarly strong witness. In her memory, the teacher-training department of the Colegio Americano in Porto Alegre has been named the "Carmen Chacon Normal School."

CHADWICK, FRED A. PERMELIA (1893-1967), was born in Washington, Pa. May 12, 1893. She grew up as a member of the West Washington Methodist Church. She attended OHIO WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY where she earned her B.A. degree in 1919. In 1920 she continued her studies in the Kennedy School of Missions in Hartford, Conn.

In August 1920, Miss Chadwick sailed for Java under appointment as a missionary of the WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY of the M. E. Church. She was assigned to the Philadelphia Branch of the Society. She was first appointed as a teacher in the Bible Women's Training School in Bogor (Buiten-zorg), Java.

Upon her return to the field, after her furlough in 1927, she was appointed to evangelistic work among the women in Medan, Sumatra. In 1942, due to the occupation of INDONESIA by the Japanese, she was evacuated from Sumatra and returned to the United States, where she worked for the U. S. Government in preparing an English-Malay Dictionary for use by the U. S. military forces. In 1946 she returned to SINGAPORE, and a year later she was returned to Sumatra where she continued her evangelistic work among the Batak women of that area. In July of 1948 she returned to the United States on a health furlough and retired as a missionary in 1950.

In 1952 Miss Chadwick was employed by the State Department in Washington, D. C. as an oriental teacher and researcher. She retired from that position in December 1964, and went to live in the Brooks-Howell Home in ASHEVILLE, N. C., where she died Jan. 23, 1967.

Miss Chadwick was highly respected by her Indonesian and missionary colleagues. Her ability in the use of the Malay, Batak and Dutch languages helped greatly to make her an effective worker among the people whom she served.

CHADWICK, JOHN SHELBY (1871-1942), American educator, editor, writer, minister, received his A.B. degree in 1889, and the M.A. degree in 1891 from Southern University, Greensboro, Ala. He studied in the Biblical Department at VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY.

While he was teaching school at Hattiesburg, Miss., he answered the call to preach and received his license. He was admitted to the ALABAMA CONFERENCE in Eufala, Ala. in 1892 and his first appointment was Brent Circuit, later called Pensacola Florida Circuit. Because of health, he transferred to the NEW MEXICO CONFERENCE and served at Las Cruces, N. M. but for health reasons he discontinued his ministerial relationships. In 1896, he was admitted to the NORTH ALABAMA CONFERENCE where he retained his membership for forty-five years, and from which he served the church in many relationships. He was at various times pastor, district superintendent, editor of the Alabama Christian Advocate, and associate editor of the Christian Advocate (Nashville). He was Conference Sunday School Secretary, and during World War I was in Y.M.C.A. work while in the United States Army.

After health forced his retirement in 1934, he devoted his meager physical strength to writing for church publications. He was a man of unusual versatility, and though he labored in many different capacities and relationships, he performed each task with fidelity and efficiency. The high regard of his brother ministers for his wise judgment and strength of character was manifest by his election (although five years retired) as delegate to the UNITING CONFERENCE of Methodism, Kansas City, Mo. in 1939. He was elected a reserve delegate to the first GENERAL CONFERENCE of The Methodist Church, Atlantic City, N. J. in 1940.

CHADWICK, SAMUEL (1860-1932), British preacher, was born at Burnley, Sept. 16, 1860. Converted at the age of ten, he began to preach at sixteen and was a lay evangelist at twenty-one. He entered the Wesleyan ministry in 1883. He became a member of the LEGAL HUNDRED in 1902, followed THOMAS CHAMPNESS as editor of Joyful News in 1905, and became principal of CLIFF COLLEGE in 1913. He was elected PRESIDENT of the Wesleyan Conference in 1918. For many years he was a prominent advocate of the Cliff College traditions of lay evangelism and Christian holiness. He died Oct. 16, 1932.

CHAFFIN, ANNA BAIR (1883-), American missionary to KOREA, was born in Manning, Iowa, Sept. 26, 1883. She taught in local schools, attended college in Iowa, later received the B.A. degree from AMERICAN UNIVERSITY, Washington, D.C. and the M.A. degree from Teachers College, Columbia University.

Miss Bair married Victor D. Chaffin in 1911. After two years in the Methodist pastorate in NORTH DAKOTA, they sailed for SEUL, Korea, where they engaged in city and district evangelistic work under Horace G. Underwood.

Victor Chaffin passed away in 1916. Mrs. Chaffin accepted appointment by the Des Moines Branch of the WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY of the M. E. Church to the Woman's Bible Training School in Seoul. Thus began a lifetime given to the training of Korean women church workers, in the Bible School and Methodist Seminary. In 1950 she was named honorary president of the Methodist Seminary in Seoul in recognition of this work.

In 1931 Mrs. Chaffin was one of fourteen women ordained to the ministry of the Korean Methodist Church. Officially retired in 1952, she returned the next year to give three years as director of the work of the METHODIST COMMITTEE FOR OVERSEAS RELIEF. She presently lives at Robincroft, Pasadena, Calif.

CHARLES A. SAUER

CHAIRMAN OF DISTRICT. In English usage, this office has a long history, more especially in the WESLEYAN METHODIST CHURCH where the term was first introduced after the death of JOHN WESLEY. The Wesleyan Conference of 1791 divided British Methodism into districts, each consisting of a number of circuits, and appointed a minister in full connection as chairman over each. Until recently the chairman was also a circuit minister, but in the twentieth century a change came about, and the chairmen became "separated," normally not fulfilling a pastoral charge in addition to his chairmanship.

The duties of a chairman include the pastoral oversight of the Methodist ministers stationed in his district; he is also responsible for seeing that the rules of the connexion are obeyed in his district. The British Chairman of the District corresponds fairly closely with what was known in American Methodism as a "presiding elder"—now "district superintendent." In the non-Wesleyan bodies this office was not popular. (See also BRITISH METHODISM, ORGANIZATION OF).

N. B. H.

CHAKKO, SARAH (1906-1954), was an active, influential, and beloved associate member of the Methodist Church in India. "Chakko" is the Malayalam language form of the name "Jacob." Her basic membership was in the Syrian Orthodox Church of Cochin State in South India (now a part of Kerala State in the Republic of India). She was the second Indian principal of the ISABELLA THOBURN COLLEGE and the only woman President of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Miss Chakko's education began in her home, continued in a Hindu high school nearby, a government college for women in Madras (B.A.) and the University of Madras (M.A.). After teaching six years in Isabella Thoburn College, she took a second M.A. at the University of Chicago and studied for a year in the University of Michigan.

Before ascending to the principalship of the college, Miss Chakko had been a teacher, chief warden, and vice-principal. While her primary teaching field was Indian history, she also taught economics for one year and political science for another. During yet another year she was acting director of physical education. Her services outside the classroom, both on and off the campus, were numerous. For six years she was chairman of the Student Christian Movement of India, BURMA, and CEYLON. She served on the executive committee of the National Christian Council of India, was chairman of the board of governors of the Delhi University School of Social Work and was sent by the Student Christian Movement to CHINA on a mission of fellowship. In 1949 she spoke in many cities of the U.S.A. under the sponsorship of the Y.W.C.A. and the Methodist and Presbyterian churches. In 1950, when her furlough was due, she conducted for the World Council of Churches an arduous time-consuming study of the status and function of women in the church. She was at the time one of the elected Methodist representatives on the World Council's managing committee. Bishop G. BROMLEY OXNAM, who was then the President of the World Council said, "Miss Chakko has given superb leadership to the World Council during her leave of absence from Isabella Thoburn College." After her report to the World Council of Churches she was elected as one of its six presidents, the only layman in the group. Returning to her duties at the college, she was a few weeks later elected as president of the National Christian Council of India. From Dec. 26, 1952 to Jan. 9, 1953, the Ecumenical Study Conference and the executive committee of the World Council of Churches met in the Isabella Thoburn College.

The three years remaining to her were very full of service rendered and honors received unsought. She let no opportunity pass without witnessing to her Christian faith. "This College is built for the glory of God as revealed in Jesus Christ . . . This Christian approach to life, therefore, permeates the total educational program . . . We would like the students who come to us to learn these spiritual realities by group worship and group living," said Miss Chakko in a class day report at LUCKNOW. She seemed, like the first principal for whom the college is named, to have a presentiment that the end of her life was drawing near. "I think no one can understand the sense of urgency I have as though I had to accomplish a great deal in a very short time," she confided to a friend late in 1953. She died Jan. 24, 1954, just after having played in the first quarter of a staff-student basketball game.

CHALFANT CHURCH, COSHOCTON COUNTY, OHIO, U.S.A., the oldest congregation in the county, was built of logs in 1811. Located about five miles from Trinway and the nearest railroad station, it has been a circuit church throughout its history. The founder of the church, Mordecai Chalfant, was of French Huguenot descent. The present church, erected in 1893, is the third to stand on the same spot; it is an L-shaped gothic frame structure with spire and art windows. Nancy Jane Chalfant McConnell, widow of Methodist itinerant I. H. McConnell, mother of Bishop FRANCIS J. MCCONNELL, and grandmother of Bishop F. GERALD ENSLEY, was the most influential leader in the history of Chalfant Church and the rural community in which it stands. E. DOW BANCROFT, secretary of the Board of Lay Activities, said, "Largely because of this preacher's widow, seventeen have gone out from that country church and neighborhood to bless the world as ministers of the Good News." During her lifetime, members of Mrs. McConnell's immediate family gave more than 200 years of service to the Methodist ministry. In its first seventy years (1811-81), Chalfant Church sent out sixteen preachers, and Bishop Ensley says that during its history the church has produced no fewer than thirty ministers. Homer R. Chalfant says that more than sixty trained ministers, missionaries, evangelists, educators, agriculturalists, and ministers' wives have come from Chalfant Church, and despite the lack of historical records, he names forty of them.

Through the years Chalfant Church has stressed local and higher Christian education, evangelism, the assurance of salvation, stewardship, world service, and the social gospel. In former days when the church had preaching only twice a month, on off Sundays members would take their lunch to the church for an all day meeting. The church had 160 members in 1919, but the number had dropped to eighty-two in 1965. It is believed that for its size Chalfant Church holds the record in American Methodism for ministerial recruitment.

CHAMBERLAIN, BENJAMIN (1791-1868), American philanthropist and judge, was born in Mount Vernon, Me., on July 31, 1791, and died at Ellicottville, N.Y., Feb. 10, 1868. He was limited in his education, but had a vigorous understanding and made a vast fortune in the lumber business. This he resolved to devote chiefly to education. He early became a member of the M. E. Church and eventually gave to Randolph Academy, which later became the Chamberlain Institute, huge sums during his lifetime for buildings and expenses. He also gave heavily to ALLEGHENY COLLEGE at Meadville, Pa. His wife sympathized with his plans and surrendered her own claims that nothing might interfere with these philanthropic designs.

At that time the law of New York prohibited a man bequeathing more than one-half his property to any benevolent object, and also prohibited an academy from holding property the net income of which should exceed $4,000 annually. Judge Chamberlain, as he had become by this time, thought that as he had no children and his friends were well provided for, there would be no contest over his will. After his death, however, suit was brought by his brother and a large proportion of the property which he had deeded was taken away from the particular institutions which he had endeavored to help in perpetuity.

After the death of Judge Chamberlain, the Randolph Academy and Female Seminary, which had been opened at Randolph, N.Y., decided to change its name to Chamberlain Institute. The institution did inherit a large amount, in spite of the breaking of the will. This Institute then went under the annual conference of the M. E. Church in which it was situated, and though it suffered reverses from a disastrous fire, lived to perpetuate the Chamberlain name among Methodist educational institutions.

CHAMBERS, CURTIS A. (1924-), American E.U.B. minister, was born in Damascus, Ohio, on Sept. 24, 1924. Coming from a Quaker background in childhood and youth, he affiliated with the EVANGELICAL UNITED BROTHERS CHURCH in 1951 while attending Oberlin Graduate School of Theology. He holds the following degrees: Marion College (A.B., 1947); ASBURY THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY (B.D., 1950); Temple University (S.T.M., 1955 and S.T.D., 1960); and LEBANON VALLEY COLLEGE (D.D., 1967). He married Anna June Winn in 1947. They are the parents of four children.

Chambers was elected by the 1966 GENERAL CONFERENCE as executive editor of CHURCH AND HOME, official denominational magazine with a circulation of 225,000. He had served as associate editor of the publication from its beginning in 1964. From 1959 until 1965 he was editor of adult publications in the Board of Publication. Prior to this he was pastor of First Church, Cleveland, Ohio (1951-53) and Rockville Church, Harrisburg, Pa. (1953-59). He was a member of the EASTERN CONFERENCE (E.U.B.) and currently retains his membership in the Eastern Pennsylvania Conference.

A member of the Commission on Church Union, Chambers was co-editor of the Plan of Union which later became a part of the Discipline of The United Methodist Church in 1968. He was director of communications for the E.U.B. General Conference and also director of radio-

TV relations in the Joint Communications Staff for Methodist and E.U.B. General Conferences in 1966.

His other responsibilities included the following: secretary of the Department of Communication; member of the General COUNCIL of ADMINISTRATION; member of the Boards of Missions, Evangelism, Christian Education, and Program Council.

In the NATIONAL COUNCIL of CHURCHES he has served on the Committee on Audio Visual and Broadcast Education (1962-65) and the Commission on Educational Media (1965-66). In 1967 he was named a member of the General Assembly of the National Council.

The Board of Publication of The United Methodist Church elected him Assistant Editorial Director of General Church Periodicals in 1968 and then in 1969 the editor of Together magazine.

JOHN H. NESS, JR.

CHAMBERS, EDMUND (1882-1963), was born in Swindon, Wiltshire, England, Sept. 14, 1882. His early schooling was obtained in Great Britain. Later he attended WESLEY COLLEGE, Winnipeg, Manitoba, CANADA, and the University of Cracow in POLAND. In 1905 he migrated to Canada to serve as a missionary among Polish immigrants. In order to be more effective he went in 1910 to Poland for an intensive study of the language. For a time he served as a Y.M.C.A. secretary responsible for publications in Polish. After the First World War he accepted a position with the Methodist Mission in Poland. In 1923 he transferred his ministerial membership from the Manitoba Conference of the Methodist Church in Canada to the Poland Mission of the M. E. Church, South. He was accepted by that church as a full-time missionary on April 1, 1923.

After ten years of service in Poland he returned to America and served appointments in TENNESSEE at Strawberry Plains, Virginia Avenue in Bristol, and Coal Creek.

EDMUND CHAMBERS

In 1936 he was sent again to Poland as a missionary. There he served as a district superintendent, treasurer, editorial secretary, and administrator of properties of the POLAND Provisional Annual CONFERENCE. During the Second World War he was imprisoned by the Germans from early 1940 until September 1944. Then upon being exchanged he came back to the United States.

In 1946 Chambers returned to Poland for continued missionary service. When all foreigners carrying on religious activities were expelled from that country in 1949, he was transferred by the U.S. Board of Missions to its work in North Africa, where he served in the field of church extension and promotion. In May of 1952 he returned to the United States and accepted the retired relationship, April 30, 1953. He died in St. Petersburg, Fla., on April 4, 1963.

While studying in Cracow, Chambers married Bronisława Mazura of Cieszyn, Poland. She died the following year, 1912, in giving birth to a son, Stanley Edmund. When Edmund Chambers served as a chaplain with the Canadian troops in France in 1918, he was seriously wounded and returned to Canada. There he married Florence May Bradley, a concert pianist from Newfoundland. Mrs. Chambers resides in Blackfoot, Idaho.

Edmund Chambers made a substantial contribution to the development of the Methodist Church in Poland. He was responsible especially for the early Methodist publications in the Polish language, such as the Pielgrzym Polski, Spiewnik Metodystyczny, and Zycie Wesleya, a translation of Matthieu Lelièvre's biography of JOHN WESLEY. He also published several works in Belorussian. He was one of the Methodist pioneers who ably presented the Gospel to twentieth-century Poland.

CHAMPAIGN, ILLINOIS, U.S.A. First Church, the central city church of Champaign, had its informal beginning in West Urbana soon after the laying of the Illinois Central Railroad tracks, and a decade prior to the establishment of the University of Illinois. In 1858 P. N. Minear was appointed its first regular minister. Four years later a wooden church was erected. Membership rapidly increased and in 1868 a branch church was established, thus initiating a tradition of church extension which has continued.

By 1889 a new brick church was erected on the site of the present church. By the turn of the century, this building was replaced by a new stone edifice.

The spectacular development of religious education, in the decade following 1912, necessitated the addition of the Parish House in 1923.

In 1928, H. CLIFFORD NORTHCOTT began the longest pastorate in the history of the church, serving both church and community in many ways until his election to the episcopacy in 1948.

Donald R. Crocker followed Bishop Northcott, and it was during his ministry that First Church purchased a five-acre site in southwest Champaign for what has since become "Faith Methodist Church."

By 1957 rapid growth and change made necessary a program of physical expansion and increased activity. Thus yet another educational unit and the complete remodeling of the old church was undertaken in 1965, in order to serve the membership of approximately 3,600. The staff in Champaign has been expanded to more effectively serve local needs, and the international outreach of the church is partly represented by its "Minister Abroad," Henry Pressler in Jubbulpore, India. First Church, Champaign, has moved into its second century of service with vigor, enthusiasm and a determination.

CHAMPNESS, THOMAS (1832-1905), British preacher, was founder of the Joyful News Training Home and Mission, now CLIFF COLLEGE. He was born at Stratford, Essex, on July 19, 1832. He was sent as a missionary to SIERRA LEONE on entering the Wesleyan Methodist ministry in 1857, but ill health compelled his return in 1863. He was appointed district missionary at Newcastle and then Bolton, where he founded and edited JOYFUL NEWS, an evangelical weekly first published in 1883. The profits financed traveling lay evangelists from the winter of 1884-85. Champness was set apart by the Conference in 1889 to train and organize the then increasing number of these, with Castleton Hall, Rochdale, as the center. He retired in 1903 to Lutterworth, where he died on Oct. 20, 1905.

CHANNEL ISLANDS. Two Jerseymen temporarily in Newfoundland were greatly influenced by the preaching of LAWRENCE COUGHLAN. Returning to their homes, they began prayer and fellowship meetings in 1775. Preaching services started later, but the visiting preachers, Baptist and Independent seamen and soldiers, spoke no French. In 1783 a bilingual Methodist preacher, ROBERT CARR BRACKENBURY, was sent to Jersey, accompanied by ALEXANDER KILHAM, a young LOCAL PREACHER later to become "the first Reformer of Methodism." Brackenbury preached in both Jersey and Guernsey, and in 1785 asked THOMAS COKE for another French-speaking preacher for Guernsey. None was available. Jean de Queteville, a twenty-five-year-old local preacher, was sent to Guernsey in 1786, and he quickly established two French societies in private houses. Another preacher was added to the Jersey station the same year, but as his French proved to be inadequate, ADAM CLARKE went on to Guernsey to begin English work there. Both he and de Queteville were also well received on their visits to Alderney. Clarke moved to Bristol in 1789; Brackenbury left in 1790.

JOHN WESLEY, with Coke, paid a three-weeks' visit to the Channel Islands in the summer of 1787. It had not been his intention to remain so long, but stormy weather prevented his earlier return to England. He landed in Alderney first, his ship having put in there when the wind turned contrary, stayed overnight—there were five beds in his room—preached on the beach in the morning, and embarked for Guernsey, where he stayed four days. Wesley moved on to Jersey on August 20, remaining eight days, returning to Guernsey on August 28 en route for the mainland. He was obliged to remain in Guernsey a further nine days until the weather was favorable for the continuation of his journey. Needless to say, he spent the time in preaching and visitation.

Some local hostility was shown to early Methodists in the Channel Islands, as elsewhere. The militia, in which all able-bodied men had to serve, drilled on Sundays. When Methodist men refused to do this, asking to be allowed to exercise on some other day of the week, permission was refused. Disobeying the rule, some were fined, others imprisoned. In Jersey, the court closed the St. Helier preaching house, and only an appeal to the king and privy council prevented the introduction of an act which would have threatened the banishment of those who still refused to do Sunday drill. But, again as elsewhere, Methodism's strength increased in spite of the difficulties.

Because many islanders spoke only French, French and English societies grew alongside each other, developing into the separate "French" and "English" Wesleyan circuits in both main islands. English itinerant preachers stayed the customary three years, but the French pasteurs, with a limited area of connexional movement, served much longer. A mission to Normandy was sent from Guernsey as early as 1791; indeed, according to MATTHEU LELIÈVRE, French Methodism is really the offspring of the Channel Island Methodists. The first chapels were opened in 1789 (Guernsey), 1790 (Jersey and Alderney), and 1797 (Sark). The first SUNDAY SCHOOLS appeared in 1808 (Guernsey) and 1814 (Jersey). BIBLE CHRISTIANS, who began their Channel Islands work in 1823, were followed by the PRIMITIVE METHODISTS in 1832 and the METHODIST NEW CONNEXION in 1836.

The failure in 1873 of the Jersey Joint Stock Bank, some of whose officials were Methodists, put Methodism in that island in a poor light, and undoubtedly some ground was lost through this unfortunate if innocent event. Nevertheless, good growth was achieved throughout much of the nineteenth century as the total membership figures for the Channel Islands show. For ten-year intervals from 1800-80 Wesleyan Methodists numbered 795, 1,194, 1,699, 2,389, 3,217, 3,330, 3,200, 4,079, 3,250. Jersey's peak in 1870, when there were 2,435 Wesleyan Methodists on that island, has not been approached since.

Apart from the incident of the bank, a more cautious approach to religion began to be evident at about the same time, while the more comfortable living conditions of the later generations, together with the difficulties caused in "French" churches by the emergence of English as the primary language, no doubt contributed to a declining interest. In Guernsey, the peak membership figure was not reached until much later, the 1914 figure being 1,974, while post-Union statistics show Guernsey Methodism to be numerically stronger than that of the larger island. More efficient cross-channel transport at the turn of the century brought the start of the islands' tourist industry, together with some pressure for Sunday amenities for the amusement of summer visitors. Methodist opinion in the community has played a useful role in preventing excesses. In Guernsey public houses and filling stations still remain closed on Sundays!

METHODIST UNION in 1932 hardly affected Jersey, where the Wesleyan, United Methodist, and Primitive Methodist circuits continued their separate existence, though meeting in the same synod. Two circuits amalgamated in 1947, while a further union in 1960 brought the present single Jersey circuit into being. The Guernsey English circuit was formed at Union from the former Wesleyan English, United Methodist, and Primitive Methodist circuits; the Guernsey and Sark (French) circuit and the Alderney single station continued separately. Alderney was added to the Guernsey English circuit after the Second World War.

The outbreak of hostilities in 1939 marked the beginning of the most testing time in the history of the islands. In June 1940, when German military occupation was imminent, about thirty thousand Channel Islanders, chiefly from Guernsey, were evacuated to the English mainland for the duration of the war. The warmth and kindness with which they were received never died in their memory. Among them were many Methodists, for whom arrangements were made that they should be billeted, as far as possible, with English Methodist families. Mainland Methodism also provided clothing, footwear, and bedding to help these refugees who had left their homes bearing only the hand luggage permitted.

But two thirds of the population chose to stay on in the islands. German troops arrived on June 30 (Guernsey) and July 1 (Jersey). There was little actual ill treatment of islanders but many restrictions were imposed, and toward the end of the five years' occupation food and clothing were in short supply. Most churches were permitted to function normally, except that some schoolrooms were requisitioned. Because there was no fuel available for lighting churches, services were held in daylight hours. The churches provided constant inspiration for Methodists, as for others. German troops sometimes used the Methodist buildings for their own worship, and there are moving memories of the occasion when the last hymn of the Germans' service was shared by the early arrivals for the islanders' worship.

Channel Island Methodists have always been strong supporters of the Missionary Society. Even during the hard days of occupation missionary meetings were held and collections taken for overseas missions. No money could be transmitted to the Mission House until 1945, when no less than £4,443 was sent from the accumulated funds. A Methodist minister, John Leale, was a vital figure in Guernsey's wartime days, representing the case of islanders to the German authorities on countless occasions. Many other Methodists held responsible posts in the wartime administrations.

After the reunion of families at the liberation of the islands, Methodism settled to its postwar adjustments. A good deal of renovation was needed in the buildings. It was also seen that the majority of services must now be conducted in English, as returning young people had forgotten their patois after five years' absence. The evacuees also brought back fresh ideas from mainland churches, particularly for young people's movements, which were adopted into Methodist life.

The picture today shows Methodist work in the smaller islands of Alderney and Sark proceeding in a quiet but useful way. In the larger islands Methodism generally reflects the prosperity of the flourishing economy, based on the twin industries of horticulture and tourism. In Jersey, nearer the continental influences, the proportion of Methodists in the community is relatively small, whereas in Guernsey, with a larger membership within a considerably smaller population, Methodism is still a powerful factor in legislative and moral matters.

CHAO TZU-CHEN (1888-), Chinese theologian, was born in Chekiang province on Feb. 14, 1888. After studying at Sochow and VANDERBILT UNIVERSITIES, he returned to CHINA to teach in Sochow University, 1917-

25. In 1926, he became professor of philosophy in Yenching University, Peking, and in 1928, dean of the Yenching School of Religion.

He was one of the China delegates to the Jerusalem Conference of the INTERNATIONAL MISSIONARY COUNCIL in 1928 and to the Madras Conference of 1938. When the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES was organized in Amsterdam he became one of the six co-presidents, but when the Central Committee of the World Council approved United Nations intervention in the Korean War, he resigned in protest.

After going to Yenching University, Dr. Chao joined the Chung Hua Sheng Kung Hui, the Chinese branch of the Anglican communion, and was ordained by them. In 1952, he was subjected to strong criticism by Communist students, and when his explanation was deemed insufficient, the outcry against him was so strong that the Anglican bishop in Peking was forced to cancel his ordination. He has now been rehabilitated on the government books. When the Yenching Seminary merged with Nanking Union Theological Seminary in 1961, he was made a member of the board of managers of the reorganized school, but continues to live in Peking.

He has written many magazine articles in both Chinese and English. His books, all in Chinese, are these: The Philosophy of Christianity; Jesus' View of Life; Directions (a book of prayers); Fishing (a book of religious verse); The Christian Fellowship Hymnal; The People's Hymnal; and Life of Jesus.

CHAPEL and CHURCH. In the days of JOHN WESLEY the Church of England erected in certain localities plain church edifices for the accommodation of those parishioners who might reside a great distance from the parish church. These were denominated "chapels." They also erected what were termed parochial chapels, which were considered more or less dependent upon the mother church. Wesley called his meeting-places "preaching-houses," and instructed his followers so to do. In a handful of instances, however, where he was able to secure a building that had been episcopally consecrated, he used the term "chapel." This latter term, however, came increasingly into use in British Methodism after his death.

The Methodists in England up to this day speak of their houses of worship chiefly as chapels. At the introduction of Methodism in the United States, the houses of worship were also named in the same modest way as chapels, meeting-houses, etc. But when the Methodist Episcopal Church was organized as an independent body, free alike from the church and authority of England, it began to use the word "church" in the place of the former terms, and this has so far supplanted the word chapel, that in the Discipline and history of the Church the word chapel is seldom used. In some localities, however, especially where there are old buildings and isolated neighborhoods, the name "chapel" is often found. The Discipline for many years has not used the term, and "churches and parsonages" is the phrase by which property is usually listed.

CHAPEL AFFAIRS DEPARTMENT (British). All matters associated with the building, maintenance, and structural alteration of churches, Sunday schools, and ministers' houses in British Methodism are the concern of the Methodist Department for Chapel Affairs.

The British Conference has also given full administrative responsibility to this organization in legal matters relating to the formation of trusts for holding property, sales, leases, and the investment of funds that arise from the disposal of redundant buildings. Two ordained ministers, assisted by a considerable lay staff, undertake this work at offices in MANCHESTER. The affairs of the department are guided by the General Chapel Committee, which consists of ex-officio members, officials from other connexional departments, and thirty-two ministers and thirty-two laymen appointed annually by the Conference. Among this number are technical experts who aid in every possible way; and certain solicitors, valuers, and architects are also retained by the department for consultation and advice.

The regulations governing chapel affairs in British Methodism and the methods used by the department are the product of history and experience. Even in the time of JOHN WESLEY some curb had to be placed on the incurring of heavy debts for new chapels. The use of the schedule, the making of grants and loans, the insistence on the raising of a due proportion of the cost of any scheme before the work is done—all are features that developed long ago in the three churches which united to form the present Methodist Church.

The outstanding figure in the past was William Kelk, a Wesleyan Methodist minister who in 1855 became the first chapel secretary entirely set apart for this work. His pamphlet, Our Chapel Debts, marked him as suitable for appointment at a time of financial crisis. The regulations he subsequently drew up became the Magna Charta of chapel affairs. There were certain differences in procedure in the other branches of Methodism. Unification in method, based on William Kelk's ideas, took place at METHODIST UNION in 1932.

The work done evolves from the application of present regulations. Trustees must obtain the sanction of the committee in all cases of expenditure in connection with the erection, purchase, enlargement, alteration, or structural repair of Methodist trust property, the installation of organs, and also for all sales or leases. Every contract, conveyance, leasehold agreement, deed, and declaration of every kind has to be presented in draft form for inspection and approval. Plans of sites, new buildings, structural alterations, and structural extensions must be submitted with an application for consent to the expenditure. Grant aid can be secured in approved cases from the department's resources.

The funds available arise from trust subscriptions, Sunday collections, private gifts, and investments. British Methodism has also been fortunate over the years in that there have been some very generous benefactions from interested laymen.

The extensive building program of recent years has been made possible by grants from the JOSEPH RANK Benevolent Trust, government payments for war damage, and by the generosity of the Methodist people, including Methodists in the United States.

W. OLIVER PHILLIPSON

CHAPEL AID ASSOCIATION, LIMITED, was formed in 1889 to assist trustees in the British PRIMITIVE METHODIST METHODIST CHURCH by lending them money on mortgage, charge, promissory note, or other security for use in connection with chapels, halls, colleges, schools, houses, and other church property. As a limited company with a nominal share capital, it now serves the united Methodist Church. Money is received on deposit from private individuals and Methodist trusts. This is lent to other Methodist trusts on the basis of an equitable mortgage, the rate of interest usually being a little below the bank rate. The association has been able to make funds available to churches even when borrowing facilities from the banks have been limited. Directors are appointed by the Conference, and an annual report is made to the same body.

W. OLIVER PHILLIPSON

CHAPLAIN. This title from capellanus in the Roman Catholic Church meant originally a parson's assistant, or an ordained priest who might aid the parson in the discharge of his pastoral duties. The word capellanus originally meant anyone officiating in a capella, and there became capellani regii (Chaplains to the King), capellani episcopales (Chaplains to the Bishop) and so forth.

In the Church of England the title "chaplain" came to be applied to an ordained clergyman who attended the bishop in each diocese, and acted as his assistant in many minor and executive matters. In time the title was given to ministers who served with the armed forces, and eventually to those serving as ministers in prisons, hospitals, and the like, where the term is in common use today.

In British Methodism, official Methodist chaplaincy in the armed services in Britain seems to go back to about 1858, when the WESLEYAN METHODIST CHURCH obtained permission from the commander in chief to station a chaplain at Aldershot, then one of the principal centers of the peace-time Army. A committee to watch over the interests of Wesleyans in the Army was set up in 1859, and in 1865 this became the Army and Navy Committee, which is the ancestor of the present Royal Navy, Army and Air Force Board of the Methodist Church. In 1890 this Committee began to develop a network of Soldiers and Sailors Homes to provide an attractive alternative center of social life to both the barracks and the street; by 1914 more than forty such homes existed, none of which enforced a denominational test. At its peak in the second World War the Board was sponsoring nearly 600 cantons in all parts of the world. The number dropped almost to nothing by 1960, partly because of a general improvement in living conditions, and partly because of the greatly increased amenities of life in the British services in recent years. The Services now cater so well for the social welfare of their personnel that much of the work formally done by the churches and other voluntary bodies is no longer necessary. In the conditions of the Victorian and Edwardian world, however, they did much to raise the lot of the common fighting man.

Before 1914 the non-Wesleyan bodies had done little service chaplaincy work, chiefly because the number of their members in the services was small and very scattered. After the outbreak of that war, however, negotiation with the government led to the formation of the United Navy, Army and Air Force Board of the Baptist, Congregational, PRIMITIVE METHODIST and UNITED METHODIST CHURCHES (called the "United Board"). This United Board provided about 300 commissioned chaplains during the first World War and ran Soldiers' Institutes and Recreation Rooms in camps. This Board ran down quickly after the end of hostilities, and merged, as far as the Primitive Methodists and United Methodists were concerned, in the united Board of the Methodist Church in 1932. In the 1960's the majority of the commissioned chaplains of the Methodist Church served in the steadily decreasing number of overseas stations; Methodist soldiers in Britain are cared for by ministers in the civilian ministry. Queen's Regulations provide for this by authorizing the appointment of part-time or "officiating" chaplains, who have the oversight of specific barracks or camps in addition to their circuit duties. Most service personnel, however, find their way home at weekends, so that the work of these men is on a small scale, but visitation is encouraged by the authorities and Padres' instruction periods are readily arranged, mostly in working hours. At the present time the Royal Navy, Army and Air Force Board is closely related to the Home Mission Department and to the Missionary Society and there is a permanent chaplain secretary. There are about thirty commissioned chaplains, and about one hundred and fifty officiating chaplains. The Women's Services have become an integrated part of the Services and a small number of deaconesses have been set apart to act as chaplains' assistants.

Chaplains in Industry. With the increasing growth of great manufacturing and industrial organizations, the call has come within recent years for ministers to be set apart as chaplains to large industries, factories, and the like. In England, the Methodist Church now has about 200 ministers who act as industrial chaplains, and it also has the LUTON INDUSTRIAL COLLEGE where these men are trained. Such chaplaincy provides a special field of work and depends largely upon the support given it by the organization whose personnel it seeks to serve. The Commission on Chaplains and Related Ministries of the United Methodist Church in America similarly endeavors to sponsor and to look after this type of ministry.

In American Methodism, chaplains earned appreciation for themselves in both northern and southern armies during the Civil War (1861-65). The military chaplaincy became an established institution in the public mind, and also in the church mind, by the time of the Spanish-American War and then of the two subsequent World Wars.

The fact that the salaries and support of chaplains is paid by the government, and that when in military service they wear the uniform of officers, has been somewhat criticized by those who do not believe the church should countenance military activity in any way. Likewise, chaplains employed to help in great industrial corporations have been criticized as being in the pay of the controlling management. However, the Methodist Church has always felt that it had a duty to provide a ministry for men in the armed services, in prisons, or where there is need.

During the first World War, the M. E. Church appointed a National War Council; the M. E. Church, South, a War Work Commission; and the M. P. Church, likewise a War Work Commission. These endeavored to "meet the spiritual hunger and physical needs of youngsters in American camps and French trenches, bored lads in transports, and pain-racked boys in hospitals." Approximately 325 Methodist chaplains served "with the colors during the first World War."

Commission on Chaplains. In 1941, even before the United States was involved in World War II, the Council of Bishops of The Methodist Church created a Methodist Emergency Committee to explore the need for chaplains. In 1942 it established the Commission on Chaplains as a separate agency. This Commission had to operate then under the Council of Bishops as there was then the interim between General Conferences. Subsequently the GENERAL CONFERENCE itself defined and empowered in a more particular way this Commission.

The Commission then and since has developed standards for chaplains, and for approving chaplain candidates. In 1944 there were more than 1,300 Methodist ministers serving as chaplains of the armed forces, constituting the largest Protestant group in the U. S. Armed Forces. Bishop ADNA W. LEONARD, chairman of the Commission, was asked in 1943 by President Franklin D. Roosevelt to visit American troops and confer with chaplains in the field. In doing so, on the flight from England over Iceland the plane crashed and Bishop Leonard was killed.

The General Conference of 1948, after the war was over, formally established the Commission on Chaplains as one of the important agencies of the church. Offices were established in Washington, an executive secretary elected, and since the war emergency seemed over, the Commission continued to look after the increasing call for ministers to serve as chaplains in hospitals of the Veterans Administration, in prisons, in reformatories, mental institutions, and general hospitals. Theological seminaries began to offer courses in this field, and in other ways men who seem qualified have been trained for this particular type of service.

The requirements for the chaplaincy to industry—indeed for any chaplaincy—are somewhat specialized and not everyone is fitted for them. The Commission on Chaplains carefully tests all Methodist applicants who come before it and applies high selective standards.

In October 1969, in the midst of the Vietnam War, Together reported: "Currently there are more than 770 United Methodist chaplains, with 157 of these being civilian chaplains and the balance in the military." Our military chaplains serve in the Army, Navy, Marine Corps and Coast Guard. Our civilian chaplains minister in V.A. hospitals, other hospitals and homes, and in correctional institutions. In addition to the recruiting, screening and certifying of men, the Commission supplies printed materials and guarantees a man's pension in instances where his service does not cover this.

Each chaplain must make periodic reports to his commanding officer, to the Commission on Chaplains and Related Ministries, and in turn to his own bishop. Wherever possible, chaplains are expected to attend the sessions of their own annual conferences.

General secretaries of the Commission on Chaplains since its inception have been D. STEWART PATTERSON (1943-56) and JOHN RUSSELL McLAUGHLIN (1956-70), who served to the rank of major as chaplain of the U. S. Army Air Force, 1944-56. On his retirement in 1970, A. Purnell Bailey of the VIRGINIA CONFERENCE, who served to the rank of major in the U. S. Army, 1944-47, succeeded him.

The Book of Discipline in successive editions since 1944 has provided for the personnel of the Commission on Chaplains, described its responsibilities and duties, and outlined its work as it does that of other agencies of the church. The headquarters office remains in Washington, D. C.

CLOVIS C. CHAPPELL

CHAPPELL, CLOVIS GILLHAM (1882-), widely known American preacher, author and evangelist, was born at Flatwood, Tenn., on Jan. 8, 1882. He is the son of William B. and Mary Chappell and was educated at the Webb School in Bell Buckle, Tenn., at DUKE UNIVERSITY (then Trinity College), and at Harvard. He was given the D.D. degree by both Duke and CENTENARY COLLEGE OF LOUISIANA in 1920, and the Litt.D. by BIRMINGHAM-SOUTHERN COLLEGE in 1936. He married Cecil Hart on April 15, 1908.

Ordained to the ministry of the M. E. Church, South in 1908, he was pastor successively at Polytechnic, Texas; Gatesville, Texas; Epworth Church, OKLAHOMA CITY, Okla.; Highland Park, DALLAS, Texas; and was then transferred to the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE and stationed at Mount Vernon Place Church, WASHINGTON, D. C. There he became nationally known for both his preaching and writing. He served Mt. Vernon Place until he went to First Church, MEMPHIS, Tenn.; and then First Church, HOUSTON, Texas; First Church, BIRMINGHAM, Ala.; St. Luke's, OKLAHOMA CITY; Galloway Memorial, JACKSON, Miss.; First Church, CHARLOTTE, N. C., retiring from Charlotte in 1949.

Dr. Chappell's books have proved to be extremely popular among ministers because of their creative interpretation of Biblical life and themes. Among these are The Village Tragedy, 1921; Sermons on Bible Characters, 1922; More Sermons on Bible Characters, 1923; Sermons on New Testament Characters, 1924; Sermons on Old Testament Characters, 1925; Home Folks, 1926; and some twenty-seven more volumes. The Chappell books were published through the ABINGDON PRESS (and its forerunners, Cokesbury Press and Abingdon-Cokesbury) and during most of his ministry he produced one new book a year. Representatives of Abingdon Press have sometimes stated that Dr. Chappell "has the largest backlist of any author in the religious field today."

The Chappell writing is marked by a simplicity and clarity of style, and his sermonic writings are such that the outline usually falls open at the first reading. Having what one authority called a "creative mind," ministers far and wide have patronized each new book as it came from the press.

Dr. Chappell is an evangelistic preacher and has held numerous meetings over the United States in furtherance of what has proved to be a strong Gospel message. The illustrations he usually uses both in his writing and preaching are homely and extremely telling. After retirement from the active pastorate, he continues to preach and write, living in Waverly, Tenn.

CHAPPELL, EDWIN BARFIELD (1853-1936), American pastor and Sunday school editor of the M. E. Church, South, was born in Perry County, Tenn., the son of W. B. and Elizabeth Whitaker Chappell. Two of his brothers became outstanding Methodist ministers. After finishing his college preparatory work at Webb School for boys he entered VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY, graduating in 1879. In June 1880, he was married to Jennie Headlee. In 1883 he was ordained while pastor at LaGrange, Texas. His pastorates included churches in TEXAS, MISSOURI, and TENNESSEE. He represented his annual conference in seven GENERAL CONFERENCES of the M. E. Church, South, between 1898 and 1930. He distinguished himself as SUNDAY SCHOOL Editor of the Church, a position held from 1906 to 1930. Under Chappell's leadership, the Sunday school literature developed to a point where it stood at the top among the leading religious teaching materials of Protestantism. He was a brilliant writer. His books include Studies in the Life of John Wesley, The Church and Its Sacraments, Building the Kingdom, Evangelism in the Sunday School, and History of Religious Education in the M. E. Church, South. His leadership extended far beyond the confines of his own communion. He was president of the International Lesson Committee, and had much to do with the formation of the International Council of Religious Education. In this field, few leaders were of the stature of this man. He was awarded several honorary degrees by institutions of higher learning. He died at the home of a daughter in Atlanta, Ga., July 29, 1936.

CHAPPELLE, WILLIAM DAVIS (1857-1925), American bishop of the A.M.E. Church, was born in South Carolina, Nov. 16, 1857. He received some formal education in a northern Presbyterian mission school. Later he received an A.B. (ca. 1887) and A.M. (1895) from ALLEN UNIVERSITY and a D.D. (honorary, 1900) and an LL.D. (honorary, 1913) from Allen University and Campbell College, respectively. He was licensed to preach in 1888 and admitted to the SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE in 1885. In 1875 he married Eliza Ayers and four children were born to them. Following the death of his first wife in 1899, he married Rosine Palmer and they had two children. He held pastorates and was a PRESIDING ELDER in SOUTH CAROLINA, and was president of Allen University. While president he continued to serve as presiding elder of the Orangeburg district of his conference. He was elected to the episcopacy in 1912 from the presidency of Allen University and assigned to Arkansas, Oklahoma, and South Carolina between 1912 and 1925. Chappelle Hall at Allen University is named for him.

CHARGE, PASTORAL (U.S.A.). "Charge" is the old Methodist name for a station or an appointment, and has been so since early days. "Preacher in charge" was the way one was appointed to serve such a station. The Discipline of late years has provided that a pastoral charge shall consist of one or more churches "which are organized under and subject to the Discipline of the Methodist Church, having a single Pastoral Charge Conference and to which a minister is or may be duly appointed, or appointable as Preacher in Charge. A Pastoral Charge of two or more churches is called a Circuit."

"Charge," rather than parish, has been the Methodist name for a minister's area of work until within recent years, when the word "parish" has appeared in the Discipline as "an area of service with a membership and constituency of one or more local churches having a coordinated program and organization to fulfill a ministry directed to all the people of the area. It may include local churches of other denominations." (Discipline 1964, TMC, Para. 105.) The Discipline of 1968, UMC, continues the use of the word charge, notably in "charge conference" which takes the place of the old QUARTERLY CONFERENCE.

CHARLES, THOMAS (1755-1814), of Bala, WELSH CALVINISTIC METHODIST, was born Oct. 14, 1755, near St. Clears, Carmarthenshire, into a large farming family. He was educated at Llanddowror by a disciple of GRIFFITH JONES, and then at Carmarthen, where he joined a Methodist society. He was converted in 1773 under a sermon by DANIEL ROWLANDS of Llangetho. Going on to Jesus College, Oxford, he became acquainted with many more evangelical leaders, and was ordained deacon of the Church of England in 1778, and priest in 1780. He refused the offer of LADY HUNTINGDON'S chapel at Bath, and in 1783 settled at Bala as a freelance minister. Here he catechised the parish children in the Welsh Calvinistic Methodist chapel, from which he turned to preaching for them. Also, he itinerated over the whole of North Wales. He was probably the first to organize SUNDAY SCHOOLS in Wales (1789), by means of which a revival spread through North Wales from Bala in 1791. He published many tracts, including the catechism used by the Welsh Calvinistic Methodists (1789), and in 1803 established his own printing press at Bala. Although Calvinist in theology, he maintained friendly relations with the followers of JOHN WESLEY; and like Wesley he tried to preserve the affiliation of his own branch of Methodism with the Church of England, though unsuccessfully. In 1811 he followed Wesley's example in ordaining eight leading LAY PREACHERS, which action effectively separated the Welsh Methodists from the church. In 1801 he drew up the first definitive constitution of the Welsh Calvinistic Methodist Connexion. Thomas Charles died Oct. 5, 1814, worn out by strenuous labors.

CHARLES CITY COLLEGE, of German-American Methodist origin, was organized in 1868 by the Northwest German Annual Conference of the M. E. Church in Galena, Ill., as the North-West German-English Normal School. By 1880, college work and a theological course in German were established and the name changed to the German-English College of Galena. In 1887 the school came under the leadership of FRIEDRICH SCHAUB, who as professor, trustee and president served the college from 1883-1914. In 1890 the school was moved to Charles City, Iowa, and the name was changed. The first building was opened in 1893. Financial security was obtained, student enrollment increased, and eventually six buildings were constructed. By 1913 the collegiate work drew few students, the majority of whom were enrolled in business or music. Thus, the maintenance of collegiate status was difficult. A plan of merger with MORNINGSIDE COLLEGE, Sioux City, Iowa was effected in the fall of 1914. The Charles City assets were liquidated to form "The Northwest German Conference Fund of Morningside College" (about $100,000). The library, science and music equipment were moved and several faculty members joined the Morningside staff. In September 1958, the old Conservatory of Music was remodeled by the Alumni of Charles City College and renamed the Charles City College Building. A bronze plaque with the list of donors was dedicated as a visible memorial.

LOUIS A. HASELMAYER

CHARLESTON, SOUTH CAROLINA, U.S.A., has been closely identified with American Methodism from the beginning. While in GEORGIA both JOHN and CHARLES WESLEY visited Charleston several times. John Wesley's Collection of Psalms and Hymns was published in Charleston in 1737. Beginning in 1739, GEORGE WHITEFIELD visited Charleston on several occasions. JOSEPH PILMORE went as far as Charleston on his tour south in 1773.

Bishop FRANCIS ASBURY, JESSE LEE, and Henry Willis went to Charleston in February 1785, conducted services for two weeks, converted Edgar Wells, and established Methodism there. In 1785 the conference appointed John Tunnel to Charleston. The first Methodist church building, Cumberland, in the city was completed in 1787. The first session of the SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE was held in Charleston in 1787.

In 1791, WILLIAM HAMMETT, a dynamic Irish preacher who was a member of the British Conference and who had served several years in the WEST INDIES, came to Charleston with Bishop THOMAS COKE. On hearing Hammett preach, the Methodists in the city insisted that he be appointed as pastor, and he, though not a member of the conference, was equally insistent on the assignment. When Asbury refused, Hammett roundly condemned him, declared that he himself was being persecuted, and forthwith led a schism which drew away half the members of Cumberland Church. In time Hammett built two churches in the city, Trinity and St. James. He persevered in Charleston until his death in 1813, and soon afterward his two congregations took the initiative in returning to the Methodist fold.

The Charleston Methodist churches included a large number of Negro members from the beginning until the Civil War. As church edifices were erected they had balconies for colored worshippers. In 1818 some 4,367 of the 5,690 black members withdrew and tried unsuccessfully to form an African church. Some then returned, but others did not. Following the division of 1844, all of Charleston Methodism, including the Negro members, adhered South.

Notwithstanding the defection led by Hammett, the Cumberland congregation succeeded in building a second church called Bethel in 1798. In 1853 a new Bethel Church building was erected, and in 1866 the old edifice became Old Bethel Church in the South Carolina Mission Conference (ME).

In 1834, some 165 white Methodists in Charleston withdrew and organized a Methodist Protestant church, but in time the congregation affiliated with the Lutheran Church.

In 1860, the four churches in Charleston—Cumberland, Bethel, Trinity, and Spring Street (formerly St. James)—had 722 white and 4,323 colored members. The Cumberland Church burned in 1861. During the war all of the churches save Spring Street held joint services in Bethel Church. In February 1865, northern troops occupied Charleston. Soon afterward T. Willard Lewis, a member of the NEW ENGLAND CONFERENCE, came to Charleston and took possession of all the Methodist churches. Though opposed by the Southern pastors, Lewis, in a dramatic meeting in Trinity Church, appealed to the Negroes to go with him to "a church which makes no distinction as to race and color," and they followed almost to a man. In the summer of 1865, the preachers and members of the M. E. Church, South began demanding the return of their church property.

Since some Southern members had been attending Bethel Church, its building was regained without much difficulty. On Oct. 1, 1865, the army commander ordered the return of Trinity Church to its officers and members, but Lewis managed to hold Spring Street Church nearly two years longer.

In 1866, the M. E. Church organized the South Carolina Mission Conference (South Carolina Conference beginning in 1869), and at its first session the body reported 1,436 members in Charleston. The denomination developed no white churches in the city, but by 1871 there were three colored congregations with a total of 2,483 members.

Notwithstanding the loss of its Negro members, Southern Methodism in Charleston went forward and in 1885 its four churches reported 1,458 members. At unification in 1939 there were five churches with 4,579 members, while the M. E. Church reported five with 1,164 members.

Charleston Methodism furnished the first foreign missionaries sent out by the M. E. Church, South—CHARLES TAYLOR, a minister, and BENJAMIN JENKINS, foreman of the South Carolina Christian Advocate, who was ordained for the work. A farewell meeting for the two men was held in Trinity Church in January 1848, after which they sailed for Shanghai, China.

The Wesleyan Journal began publication in Charleston, Oct. 1, 1825, but after eighteen months it was merged with the Christian Advocate in New York to become the Christian Advocate and Journal. On June 25, 1837, the Southern Christian Advocate was established in Charleston with WILLIAM CAPERS as editor. It continued publication there until 1862, was moved to MACON, Ga., returned to Charleston in 1878, and later went to COLUMBIA, S. C., where it is now the South Carolina United Methodist Advocate.

In 1970, The United Methodist Church had five white and four Negro churches within the corporate limits of Charleston with 3,911 and 1,144 members, respectively. The property of the nine churches was valued at $3,082,214, and they raised $336,189 for all purposes during the year.

Bethel Church was projected by Cumberland Church in 1793 when the congregation decided to buy a site for a cemetery and another church in the city. In 1795, a half-acre lot in the northwest part of Charleston was purchased, and in 1797 they began work on a 40 by 60-foot edifice. In 1798 construction was far enough advanced for the South Carolina Conference to meet in the building. In 1806, an adjoining half-acre of land was acquired.

Built under the guidance of Bishop ASBURY, the first Bethel Church was a severely simple structure. It had galleries for Negro members, and a high pulpit with a sounding board above. On June 28, 1852, the cornerstone for the present impressive Bethel Church was laid, and the building, valued at $18,000, was dedicated Aug. 7, 1853. The old church was thereafter used for the class meetings of the Negro members.

Pursuant to Bishop Asbury's suggestion that the Methodists build parsonages, in 1803 Charleston Methodism erected one of the first Methodist parsonages in America on the Bethel Church lot. Arriving in Charleston before the house had been furnished, Asbury himself was the first preacher to occupy the parsonage, which has long since disappeared.

With 190 white and 1,235 colored members at the beginning of the Civil War, Bethel Church was important for Charleston Methodism during the conflict. The Cumberland Church burned in 1861, and in 1863 Trinity Church was badly damaged when Northern batteries bombarded the city. During the remainder of the war the members of the three congregations who stayed in Charleston worshiped together at Bethel Church.

During the military occupation of Charleston which began in February 1865, T. Willard Lewis, a member of the New England Conference, came to the city and took possession of the Methodist houses of worship for the M. E. Church. Soon after the war ended, the pastors and members demanded the return of their church property. Bethel Church was regained rather quickly because some of its members had worshiped there throughout the war, but more than two years passed before the last church building was recovered.

The Old Bethel Church edifice was given outright to the Negro members who withdrew to join the M. E. Church.

Bethel Church has undergone a number of renovations, including the removal of the slave galleries and the addition of facilities for education, but it remains essentially the same imposing structure which was erected in 1852.

In the burial ground adjacent to Bethel Church lie the remains of many men and women who were prominent in early Charleston Methodism. Among the fourteen ministers buried there, five of the earliest are commemorated on one stone, and of those five only one lived beyond the age of forty.

In 1866, Bethel Church had 276 white and no colored members. By 1900 the membership rose to 469, and by 1939 to 1,419. In 1970, Bethel reported 1,140 members, property valued at $589,265, and $63,768 raised for all purposes during the year.

OLD BETHEL, CHARLESTON, SOUTH CAROLINA

Old Bethel Church is one of the oldest buildings in the United States in continuous use as a Methodist place of worship.

In 1793, Cumberland Church, Charleston, which was only eight years old, decided to buy a lot for a cemetery and the launching of another congregation. In 1795, a half-acre lot which fronted on Manigault Street, later Boundary and now Calhoun Street, was purchased for 800 pounds. Construction on the new church called Bethel began in 1797, and the next year the SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE met in the building.

A parsonage was built on the Bethel lot in 1803, and Bishop Asbury was the first to occupy it. It is claimed that Negroes were the first persons to greet him there; they saw him sitting on the steps and offered their service, including the securing of food for him. The house has long since disappeared. In 1806, the church bought an adjoining half-acre of ground.

On June 28, 1852, the cornerstone for a new Bethel Church was laid and the building, valued at $18,000, was dedicated Aug. 7, 1853. The old church structure was then turned over to the Negro members for class meetings and other activities. It is said that because of the noise made by the Negroes in their meetings, the officers of Bethel Church assisted, probably in 1854, in moving the old edifice across the street. Since that time it has been known as Old Bethel Church, a house of worship for Negro Methodists.

The South Carolina Mission Conference (South Carolina Conference beginning in 1869) of the M. E. Church was organized in 1866, and Old Bethel Church became a part of it. A point on a circuit at first, Old Bethel became a station in 1875 with J. A. Sasporth as the preacher in charge. In 1877, the church reported 300 members; there were 315 members in 1900 and 198 in 1939. The peak membership was 450 in 1880. Though relatively small, Old Bethel has been an influential church in the annual conference.

Old Bethel has had a parsonage for many years, but it is not known when or how it was acquired. Prior to the division of the M. E. Church in 1844, a man named Magee bequeathed some property in Charleston to the denomination for missionary work. In 1965 that property was sold and the proceeds were divided between Old Bethel, Centenary, and Wesley Churches, the congregations of the South Carolina Conference, Central Jurisdiction, in Charleston.

The original Bethel Church pulpit from which Bishop Asbury and other church leaders preached is still in use in Old Bethel Church. A pipe organ was installed in 1919, and in 1950 the church built an addition at the rear. However, except for that new part and some necessary repairs, Old Bethel Church is essentially the same building that was erected in Charleston in 1797-98, and it has been used continuously since that time as a Methodist house of worship.

In 1970, Old Bethel Church reported 239 members, property valued at $101,250, and $13,857 raised for all purposes during the year.

Trinity Church was organized as a "Primitive Methodist Church" in 1791 by WILLIAM HAMMETT, an Irish preacher with a flare for oratory who came to Charleston with Bishop THOMAS COKE, and captivated the Methodists who then asked for him as pastor. When Bishop Asbury refused to appoint him, Hammett led a schism, drew away half the members of Cumberland Church, the only Methodist congregation in the city at the time, and built and paid for Trinity Church at Hassel Street and Maiden Lane. In 1816, following Hammett's death in 1813, Trinity, along with St. James Church which Hammett had also organized, united with the M. E. Church.

In 1844, Trinity Church reported 216 white and 1,864 colored members.

In the summer of 1863, Trinity Church was damaged when Northern batteries bombarded Charleston. Four shells passed through the building and one crashed through the roof to the basement below. The members who remained in the city then joined in union services at Bethel Church for the remainder of the war.

Early in 1865 when Northern troops occupied Charleston, representatives of the M. E. Church seized all the Methodist houses of worship in the city, and Trinity was designated as a church for the colored people who transferred practically en masse from the M. E. Church, South to the M. E. Church. However, on Jan. 10, 1866 the Trinity congregation regained possession of its property.

Since the Cumberland Church was destroyed by fire in 1861 and was not rebuilt, the members of that body, by quarterly conference action, finally united with Trinity Church, June 17, 1874.

A large plaque memorializing Bishop WILLIAM M. WIGHTMAN (1808-82) was erected on the west wall of Trinity Church. A native of Charleston, Wightman joined the SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE in 1828, edited the South Carolina Christian Advocate, 1840-54, and resided in Charleston throughout his episcopal career, 1866-82. His second wife, Maria D. Davis Wightman, was the first vice-president of the Woman's Missionary Society of the M. E. Church, South, and later served as president. Benjamin Jenkins, one of the first two foreign missionaries sent out by the M. E. Church, South, was a member of Trinity, and so was John Honour, one of the first two missionaries to the slaves in SOUTH CAROLINA.

In 1928, Trinity Church bought and moved into what had been the Westminster Presbyterian Church at 273 Meeting Street, the purchase price of $30,000 being only a fraction of the cost of erecting such a handsome structure at the time. Dating from 1838, the building, a legacy from the Greek Revival period, is a notable example of classic architecture. It is widely known for its hand carved doors and its old slave gallery.

In 1939, Trinity Church had 632 members. In 1970, it reported 454 members, property valued at $451,000, and $55,681 raised for all purposes during the year.

CHARLESTON, WEST VIRGINIA, U.S.A. There was Methodist preaching in the vicinity of what is now Charleston prior to 1789. In 1790 Jacob Lurton and Thomas Boyd were appointed to the Kanawha Circuit with JAMES O'KELLY as the PRESIDING ELDER, but apparently they did not go to that region. William Steel preached the first Methodist sermon in Charleston on Jan. 1, 1804. Prior to the organization of the M. E. Church, South, there was only one Methodist congregation in Charleston.

In 1847 the KENTUCKY CONFERENCE (MES) appointed John F. Vanpelt to Charleston, and a Southern church costing $8,000 was erected in 1858. The building was burned by the Union Army in 1863, and the congregation was without a pastor until 1866. In 1900 there were three Southern Methodist churches in Charleston with 652 members, and two Northern congregations with 602 members, but by 1939 the M. E. Church had nine churches with 4,602 members in Charleston to six churches with 2,962 members for Southern Methodism. At unification the Northern First Church name was changed to Christ Church, while the Southern First Church became St. Mark's. The Methodist Protestants had no church in Charleston. In 1969 The United Methodist Church had 14 churches in Charleston, with 7,468 members, property valued at $7,539,170, and a total of $714,300 raised for all purposes during the year. CHRIST CHURCH and St. Mark's were the largest congregations with 1,776 and 1,483 members, respectively.

Christ Church, dating from Jan. 1, 1804 when William Steel preached in Margaret Williams' log cabin home, is the mother church of Methodism in Charleston. A 16 by 24-foot log structure was built in 1824, which in 1834 gave way to a $5,000 brick church known as Asbury Chapel. RANDOLPH S. FOSTER, later bishop, served as junior preacher of the church in 1837-38. The West Virginia Constitutional Convention met in that church building in 1872. Also, the first free local schools were held in its basement. In 1872 the congregation relocated near the old state capitol and took the name of State Street Church. In 1911 the church moved again to Quarrier and Morris Streets and thereafter was known as First Church. In 1939 the name was changed to Christ Church. The number of members rose from 1,485 in 1940 to 2,545 in 1964, and the congregation seemed to be withstanding the membership attrition typical of so many downtown churches. However, in the five-year period from 1964 to 1969 membership declined nearly twenty-five percent. An education building which included a chapel, dining hall, and gymnasium was erected in 1955, and a parking lot was purchased. On July 19, 1969 fire destroyed the sanctuary and damaged the education building, the loss totaling $750,000. Plans for rebuilding were immediately projected. The church has had two long pastors, J. C. Hoffman (1937-55), and Truman W. Potter who began in 1955 and was still pastor in 1969. In 1969 Christ Church reported 1,776 members and $185,307 raised for all purposes.

CHARLESTOWN HYMNAL. (See HYMNODY, AMERICAN METHODIST, BRITISH METHODIST.)

CHARLOTTE, NORTH CAROLINA, U.S.A., the seat of Mecklenburg County and the largest city in the Carolinas (201,564 in 1970), is a Methodist center. However, in the early days Mecklenburg County was an "island of Presbyterianism" and Methodism was slow in gaining a foothold in Charlotte.

It is generally agreed that Harrison Church which still exists was the first Methodist society organized in Mecklenburg County. It is believed that Harrison became a preaching point on the Santee Circuit of the SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE in 1786. George Washington's diary says he had breakfast at Harrison's, May 28, 1791, before going on to Charlotte. Bishop ASBURY visited the Harrison Church, Nov. 14, 1808. The church's first building was of hewn logs and was probably erected between 1805 and 1815.

The second Methodist congregation in Mecklenburg County began in 1814 after some Presbyterians were excommunicated for attending a CAMP MEETING conducted by a free lance Presbyterian preacher. One of those turned out of the church, Margaret Kerr Martin, who lived seven miles north of Charlotte on Beatty's Ford Road, then opened her home for prayer meetings, and persuaded her cousin, David R. Dunlap, a physician and a Methodist, who had moved to Charlotte in April of that year, to lead the prayer services. Before the year was out a Methodist society was formed and a circuit rider began preaching at the Martin home once a month. So began Buck Hill, now Trinity Church.

In the summer of 1814, David Dunlap, mentioned above, invited William Terry, a circuit rider who happened to be passing through, to preach in Charlotte. One or more other itinerants also preached there during that year at Dunlap's invitation. Then in 1815, the South Carolina Conference formed Sugar Creek Circuit, named for the little stream which runs through Charlotte, and that circuit made Charlotte one of its sixteen preaching points. The preacher in charge was William B. Barnett, and his first sermon in Charlotte was delivered at the courthouse over the objection of a Presbyterian preacher named Samuel Craighead Caldwell. A Methodist society was formed in Charlotte in 1818, and Dunlap moved his membership and became the CLASS LEADER there. That was the beginning of Tryon Street, now First Church.

Calvary was the second Methodist church formed in Charlotte. It began as a prayer meeting in 1865. Tryon Street Church sponsored it as a mission for twenty years before it became a full-fledged church.

In 1880, E. M. Andrews, pastor of Tryon Street, announced at the district conference that the Methodists of Charlotte would soon launch a new church in the city. Between 1883 and 1896 the junior preachers at Tryon Street spent much of their time organizing new congregations, and in 1900 the M. E. Church, South had seven churches with a total of 2,376 members in the city. The new churches were: Epworth (now Wesley Heights), Brevard Street (now Memorial), Dilworth, Trinity, and Belmont Park.

Mecklenburg County was in the South Carolina Conference until 1870, and then it was a part of the NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE until the organization of the WESTERN NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE in 1890. Charlotte was host to the South Carolina and North Carolina Conferences three times each, and the Western North Carolina Conference met in the city seven times prior to unification and five times between 1939 and 1957. Since the latter date all of the annual conference sessions have been at LAKE JUNALUSKA.

Since 1870 there has always been a Charlotte District, but when the region was in the South Carolina Conference there was a Charlotte District only from 1853 to 1857. For many years before the division of 1844 and down to 1853, Charlotte was in the Lincolnton District. Between 1857 and 1870 the city was shifted about among four districts—Wadesboro, Lincolnton, Catawba, and Shelby.

Since unification in 1939, Charlotte has been the seat of an episcopal area and the bishop in charge has lived in the city. Bishop EDWIN D. MOUZON lived in Charlotte from 1926 until his death in 1937, and for the first eight years of that period was the bishop in charge of the episcopal district made up of the Carolinas. Bishop JOHN C. KING lived in Charlotte from 1915 until his death in 1922, but during that time he presided over the Western North Carolina Conference only in 1915.

The METHODIST PROTESTANTS organized in Charlotte in 1839, but 100 years later they had only one congregation in the city, Central Avenue Church with some 118 members. Following the division of 1844, the M. E. Church had no white congregations in Charlotte. However, in 1870 the denomination organized a Negro church, Simpson Memorial, and at unification that congregation and a mission brought 290 and 75 members, respectively, into The Methodist Church. At unification the M. E. Church, South had thirteen churches in Charlotte with 10,654 members.

The Woman's Division of the General Board of Missions established a Bethlehem Center in Charlotte in 1941. In 1948, the Western North Carolina Conference built the Methodist Home for the Aging, Inc. in Mecklenburg County, and in 1963 the Wesley Nursing Home with 250 beds was added to the home.

In 1942, a City Mission Society, now the Charlotte District Mission Society, was formed for the purpose of developing new churches where needed. By 1965 some twenty-three new congregations had been organized, and in that year Charlotte Methodism for the first time achieved numerical parity with the Southern Presbyterians, each denomination having about 31,000 members in the city.

Charlotte has three C. M. E. churches, a larger number of both A. M. E. and A. M. E. ZION churches, and some WESLEYAN METHODIST congregations.

In 1970, The United Methodist Church had forty-one churches in Charlotte, the strongest being Myers Park, First, Providence, Hawthorne Lane, Dilworth, and Hickory Grove. The forty-one churches reported 29,557 members, property valued at $16,600,000, and approximately $719,000 raised for all purposes during the year.

First Church dates from 1818 when a Methodist society of two men and four women was organized. There had been more or less regular Methodist preaching in the town since 1814 when David R. Dunlap, a physician, invited William Terry, a circuit rider, to conduct a service. In 1815 Charlotte became a preaching point on the Sugar Creek Circuit of the SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE.

In 1815 the people of Charlotte set apart a lot on Trade and Church Streets to be used by all denominations for religious purposes. A building was erected on the lot, and for a time the Methodists shared its use with the Baptists and Presbyterians, but in 1832 the Presbyterians secured control of the property. By 1834 the Methodists succeeded in erecting their own church on Seventh Street, and a contemporary referred to it as a "neat and comfortable house of worship." In 1859 the congregation relocated at Sixth and Tryon Streets where it came to be known as Tryon Street Church. At that time it had 123 white and 148 colored members. A new building was erected in 1891 at a cost of $30,000.

FIRST CHURCH, CHARLOTTE, NORTH CAROLINA

Between 1880 and 1900, Tryon Street Church took the lead in establishing five new congregations in Charlotte. Trinity Church was built on South Tryon Street in 1896 at a cost of $40,000, and it reported 234 members the first year.

In 1885 CHARLES J. SOONG, father of the famous Soong sisters in CHINA, was ordained as a Methodist minister in Tryon Street Church.

In 1893 Tryon Street was the first church in the conference to purchase a communion service with individual cups, and the files of the North Carolina Christian Advocate show that the church was both ridiculed and condemned for the innovation.

As Charlotte grew, both Tryon Street and Trinity Churches were in the downtown area and both were fairly strong congregations. Ten years after Trinity was established it had 513 members to 758 for Tryon Street. In time it became apparent that the two churches were covering the same field and appealing to the same constituency, so they decided to merge and form First Church. In 1926 a joint quarterly conference authorized the purchase of a new lot at Eighth and North Tryon for $140,000. A. L. Stanford, known as a church builder, who was beginning his second year as pastor at Tryon Street, led in building an impressive stone edifice at a cost of more than $800,000. Since the sale of the old church properties netted only about $325,000, it was necessary to borrow $500,000 to pay for the new structure. The two congregations were formally united as First Church, Oct. 28, 1927, Tryon Street bringing 1,609 members to 1,127 for Trinity. The first service in the new building was held Oct. 30, 1927, with Bishop EDWIN D. MOUZON as the preacher. First Church struggled with the debt for nearly seventeen years, during which time it paid out some $263,000 in interest. The dedicatory services were held March 9-19, 1944.

W. WALTER PEELE was appointed to First Church, Nov. 7, 1927, and served until May, 1938 when he was elected bishop. Among other prominent ministers who have served the congregation are G. Ray Jordan, CLOVIS G. CHAPPELL, LEE F. TUTTLE, and W. KENNETH GOODSON. Goodson was later elected bishop and Tuttle became executive secretary of the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL.

In 1970, First Church reported 2,444 members, property valued at $1,627,480, and $238,679 raised for all purposes during the year.

Methodist Home for the Aging and Wesley Nursing Center were built by the WESTERN NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE, the one in 1948 and the other in 1963. They are located on a 225-acre tract donated by the late E. A. Cole, a Methodist layman.

Two preachers, E. O. Cole (brother of E. A.) and C. M. Pickens advocated and worked for a conference home for the aged some ten years before it became a reality. In addition, Cole gave liberally of his own means and was influential in persuading his brother to donate the site. The home has 160 private rooms, thirty-six apartments, and more than twenty-five individual cottages. The six-story nursing center has about 275 beds. In 1970 the conference commission on world service and finance apportioned $170,000 to the churches for the support of both institutions.

The home serves able-bodied ambulatory patients over sixty-five years of age, while the nursing center ministers to the sick, disabled and infirm. Both exist to serve not just the affluent nor just the indigent. In so far as facilities and funds permit, they minister to all qualified eligible persons over sixty-five who seek admission. Priority is given to persons whose long-time continuous membership is in a United Methodist church within the bounds of the conference. "Life care contracts" are made with all who enter. Confidential financial assistance is given to those unable to pay, such help being limited by funds supplied by the conference and by income from an assistance trust fund.

Both the home and the nursing center hold membership in the National Association of Methodist Hospitals and Homes and in the American Association of Homes for the Aging. Also, the nursing home is a member of the American Nursing Home Association. Both institutions maintain high national accreditation.

In 1970, the home and the nursing center reported a combined daily census of 470 persons served by 376 employees, including 48 registered nurses and 110 nurses aids. During the year some 152 Methodists from the Western North Carolina Conference received confidential financial assistance totaling $196,858. Operating expenses for both facilities were $2,705,843. The property valued at more than $5,000,000 is free of indebtedness. Willard S. Farrow has been the administrator since 1960.

Myers Park Church, the second largest congregation in the Western North Carolina Conference, is the youngest of the stronger churches. The first pastor of the church, C. Excellence Rozzelle, was appointed Oct. 19, 1925, and six days later he conducted the first service for the new church in the chapel of Queens College, a Presbyterian school, and enrolled eighty-five charter members. The charter member list was closed December 31 with 151 members.

It is claimed that early in 1925, ten prominent business and professional men who were members of Tryon Street and Trinity Churches, anticipating rapid population growth in the Myers Park area, conceived the idea of launching a new church there, gained the approval of the presiding elder, J. B. Craven, and secured the college chapel as temporary quarters for worship services. In 1926 a lot at Queens and Providence Roads was purchased and a vacant store on the site was used for church services and activities until a sanctuary with a seating capacity of 750 was built in 1929. The church is known for its lighted window of the seven Christian virtues.

The membership grew steadily, passing the 1,000 mark in 1943 and 2,000 in 1956. As the membership increased the church plant was enlarged. The Luther Snyder education building was erected in 1938, the children's building in 1954, and the youth building in 1962. By 1965 the number of paid employees stood at thirty-one.

In 1970, Myers Park Church reported 2,976 members, property valued at $2,971,357, and $360,724 raised for all purposes during the year.

CHARLOTTESVILLE SEMINARY. (See NEW YORK CONFERENCE SEMINARY AND COLLEGIATE INSTITUTE.)

CHARTERED FUND, THE, founded in 1796, succeeded The Preachers' Fund established by the CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church in 1784, and is described in Answer to Question 72 in the Discipline published in 1785. The plan for The Preachers' Fund proved inadequate and on Aug. 1, 1796, Asbury sketched a more comprehensive plan later used by THOMAS HASKINS, treasurer of ST. GEORGE'S CHURCH, PHILADELPHIA, in drafting "The Articles of Association of the Trustees of the Fund for the Relief and Support of the Itinerant, Superannuated and Worn-out Ministers and Preachers of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States of America, Their Wives and Children, Widows and Orphans." This was The Chartered Fund which was unanimously approved by the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1796, and incorporated in PENNSYLVANIA on Jan. 18, 1797, after receiving the approval of Governor Mifflin.

The instrument contained ten articles, and provided "no sum exceeding $64 was to be applied in any one year to an itinerant, superannuated or worn-out single preacher; (2) no sum exceeding $128 to a married one; (3) no sum exceeding $64 to a widow; and (4) no sum exceeding $16 for the use of a child or orphan of an itinerant, superannuated or worn-out preacher."

The Chartered Fund has been continued through the years, and its assets at the present time are administered by the General BOARD OF PENSIONS. The interest only is distributed, and is designated "for the benefit of all the Annual and Provisional Annual Conferences in the Methodist Church the boundaries of which are within the United States, its territorial and insular possessions, and Cuba. . . ."

The General Conference since 1808 has been restricted by Rule number five (number six in UMC) under the RESTRICTIVE RULES from appropriating the produce of the Fund to any other purpose than for the "benefit of travelling, supernumerary, superannuated, and worn-out preachers, their wives, and children."

CHARTERHOUSE, John Wesley and. The Charterhouse, LONDON, was originally an almshouse, school and chapel founded in the seventeenth century by Thomas Sutton on the site of a Carthusian monastery established in the fourteenth century. Provision was made for forty boys who were to be the sons of gentlemen who could not afford an education of this kind for their children. The school now stands in Godalming, in Surrey, but in JOHN WESLEY'S time was still in London. Nominated by the Duke of Buckingham, the patron of Wesley's father, he was admitted as a foundation scholar or gownboy, on Jan. 28, 1714, and remained until 1720. He boarded at the school and his own account of these six years in his life may be found in the Journal (i, 465): "... outward restraints being removed, I was much more negligent than before even of outward duties, and almost continually guilty of outward sins, which I knew to be such, though they were not scandalous in the eyes of the world. However, I still read the Scriptures and said my prayers morning and evening. And what I hoped to be saved by was, 1) not being so bad as other people; 2) having still a kindness for religion; and 3) reading the Bible, going to Church, and saying my prayers."

This account is obviously colored by his later experience, but leaves no real justification for Tyerman's comment that while at Charterhouse he "lost the religion which had marked his character from the days of infancy . . . Terrible is the danger when a child leaves a pious home for a public school. John Wesley entered the Charterhouse a saint and left it a sinner" (Life and Times of Wesley, i, 21-2). Tyerman had no evidence for this beyond the passage from the Journal quoted above, and the judgment of V. H. H. Green (The Young Mr. Wesley, p. 55) that this is "absurd special pleading," seems reasonable. In fact, Wesley retained pleasant memories of the School, which he revisited annually; there is also documentary evidence of his having acted as a steward at a Founder's Day Dinner at Charterhouse in 1727; his first known letter was written to Ambrose Eyre, the treasurer of Charterhouse, on Nov. 3, 1721. Wesley also went to Charterhouse in the late 1730's to visit Jonathan Agutter, who had entered the almshouse on the nomination of the Bishop of London in 1733. Agutter was a MORAVIAN who stayed at Charterhouse until his death in 1762. Wesley used his room there as a place of retreat in 1738-40. A memorial tablet commemorating Wesley's association with the school was unveiled in 1937.

CHARTISM, and British Methodism. Disillusion with the results of the Reform Act of 1832 led to a more radical political movement among the working classes, expressing itself in the People's Charter in 1838. Political dissatisfaction was fanned by the unhappy consequences for many of the poor of the Poor Law of 1834, and there was widespread feeling that both acts expressed the political interests of the middle classes alone, and that the working classes must imitate their agitation for reforms to suit them. Hence the nationwide movement in favor of radical, democratic changes.

The movement affected Methodism because it was most active in areas where Methodism had made most progress in the generation after Wesley—the industrial North and Midlands. Men attracted by the prevalent democratic ideas were affected by religious and political motives; and WILLIAM GRIFFITH spoke for many when he said, "If I am a Chartist, my Bible has made me so." Chartist churches were set up; there were Chartist classes in some of the churches of the northeast. One of the main leaders and most eloquent advocates of Chartism was the ex-Wesleyan minister JOSEPH RAYNER STEPHENS, and another, less violent but equally sympathetic, the layman WILLIAM LOVETT. Methodist participation gave a quasi-religious character to the movement and distinguished it from many contemporary Continental movements that were more anticlerical and atheistic.

Methodists might join Chartist groups, but officially the Wesleyan Conference frowned upon all active participation in politics at this time; those who defied the "No-Politics Rule" might be disciplined or expelled from the society. Reasons for this opposition were many. There was real danger for any Christian movement which became too closely associated with agitation for political or social reform; many of the wilder advocates of Chartism seemed to be in favor of violent action incompatible with Christianity; membership of the Chartist societies might bring too close contact with unbelievers and turn Methodists away from their true aim of evangelism.

In 1848 Chartism collapsed and Methodism survived, but the upheavals in that period within the church, and an increasing alienation of many of the working classes from Wesleyan Methodism, were both partial consequences of official policy.

CHATHAM, NEW JERSEY, U.S.A., is a growing city in northern NEW JERSEY, begun originally by a group of settlers around Day's Bridge, which was a toll gate over the Passaic River in the early 1700's. George Washington, who established his headquarters at Morristown not far away during the dark days of the Revolutionary War, used to ride down to Chatham occasionally to visit his outposts who were watching the swamps and low mountains between themselves and the British during those discouraging days. After the Revolution a circuit rider came from Elizabeth and established Methodist meetings in the homes at Chatham, and about the turn of the century a small church was built not far from the toll gate. It was destroyed by fire and a new church replaced it in 1832 when it became a part of the Livingston Circuit.

Meanwhile, the Morris and Essex Railroad made Chatham a terminal point and its workmen added to the population of the community. Then the neighborhood developed into a resort area with a large hotel and golf course providing relaxation from PHILADELPHIA and NEW YORK CITY life. In 1870 the Chatham Church became a station charge, but late in the 1880's the balcony was weakened and the church was pronounced unsafe. A new church was then built in 1898.

Since the first World War the town has gradually taken on the character of a residential area with its population consisting largely of commuters who go to and from New York daily. There came a boom after the second World War and the church began to parallel the community in its growth by relocating and building a modern church and church school. Its membership in 1970 numbers 1,520, with property valued at $1,120,000, and $164,714 raised for all purposes.

CHATSWORTH, CALIFORNIA, U.S.A. First Church was established in 1888, one of the earliest Methodist churches in CALIFORNIA. Mrs. Ann Johnson, the first Anglo-Saxon woman to live in the San Fernando Valley, was instrumental in getting the church started. Services at first were held in the schoolhouse until the church building (which is now declared to be an historical monument by the Los Angeles Cultural Board) could be built in 1903, fifteen years later. The work was all done by men of the community who donated their labor and equipment. Supplies were purchased with financial assistance from the Conference, donations from local people, and funds raised by the LADIES AID SOCIETY. This latter was established in 1902 in order to assist in raising money for the building.

The church was then called the Chatsworth Community Church. It was the only church in Chatsworth for fifty years, and it ministered to all denominations. The building, being an architectural rarity and the only New England (Victorian) type of church architecture still standing in Southern California, was saved in January 1963 by action of the Los Angeles Cultural and Heritage Board. The church and property had been previously sold and the new owner gave the building to the Chatsworth Historical Society (which had been organized in the interim to make possible the preservation of the building), with the stipulation that it be moved.

The Oakwood Memorial Association of Chatsworth generously donated a plot on a section of the old stagecoach road in the park area, the only artery in the early days between LOS ANGELES and Santa Barbara. After several months of work in raising necessary funds, the building was moved in January, 1965, just as it was, across the fields for approximately a mile.

This engineering feat was featured on newscasts of all five major television stations and was noted by all the leading newspapers.

On its new location the building has been rehabilitated through the efforts of the Chatsworth Historical Society and made to conform to present-day codes (in plumbing, electricity and fire protection), but it still maintains its original architecture. It is now maintained by the Oakwood Memorial Association, in trust to the Society, so that no future disposition of the building can be made without the approval and consent of the Society.

It continues to serve the community as a wedding and funeral chapel and for other special services, but regular church services are no longer held. The chapel, adjoining the sanctuary, is used as a museum for the preservation of the early artifacts of the church and of the community.

The present Chatsworth First Church has been located since February, 1962 on a five-acre property about a mile from the original site. There is an enlarged plant, a chapel, and two large SUNDAY SCHOOL units. But elderly persons still look back with nostalgia to the happy years of fellowship and service in the old original building and are deeply grateful for its preservation.

CHATTANOOGA, TENNESSEE, U.S.A., manufacturing center, historic and scenic city, and an important link in the Tennessee Valley Authority public power system, is located on the Tennessee River in lower east TENNESSEE near the juncture of the ALABAMA, GEORGIA, and Tennessee state lines. A village and trading post called Ross's Landing was first established on the south bank of the river near Moccasin Bend in 1815 by John Ross, who was later to become principal Chief of the Cherokee Nation. The name was changed, and the city incorporated as Chattanooga on Dec. 20, 1839.

Methodism entered the Chattanooga area through an occasional circuit rider in the late eighteenth century, but it was not until after the separation of the Holston District from the WESTERN CONFERENCE, and formation of the TENNESSEE CONFERENCE in 1812, that organized work was undertaken. In 1824 the HOLSTON CONFERENCE was organized, and Chattanooga fell within the bounds of the new conference.

In 1817 a mission to the Cherokee Nation was established in what is now the eastern side of Chattanooga. First named the Chickamauga Mission, it was one year later changed to avoid confusion with a nearby community of the same name, and was called the Brainerd Mission in honor of David Brainerd, well-known pioneer missionary to the northern tribes.

Although it was not a Methodist enterprise, many Methodist circuit riders participated in the work of Brainerd Mission, and three were arrested along with the missionaries of Brainerd for violating oppressive restrictions applying among the aborigines and passed by the State of Georgia. The mission was closed in 1838 when the Cherokees were moved west by the Federal Government, and the evangelical denominations began to locate and construct their own places of worship. Brainerd Methodist Church, Chattanooga's second largest Methodist congregation, traces its heritage through several church buildings and a schoolhouse site back to the days following the close of the Brainerd Mission.

Historic Centenary Church evolved from the first organized group of Methodists in what is now Chattanooga. Wiley Memorial Church, a leading Negro congregation of the city, occupies the former location of Centenary at Fifth and Lookout Streets. There are thirty-four additional Methodist churches, with an aggregate membership of over 20,500 (1970).

THE UNIVERSITY OF CHATTANOOGA is a liberal arts institution founded in 1886 by the FREEDMEN'S AID SOCIETY of the M. E. Church. It is now a growing university governed by an independent board of trustees not organically related to The United Methodist Church.

Centenary Church, oldest church in the city, was organized in 1839. One of the ten founders was a Cherokee Indian woman. Centenary has had five homes on four sites. The first was built of logs in 1837 or 1838 as a community enterprise. The seats were puncheon benches, the floor the bottom of an abandoned flatboat. A spice mortar suspended from the outside of the stick and mud chimney served as a bell when struck with the pestle.

This cabin was deeded to the Methodists in 1847. Here they erected the "Pepperbox" Church, so called because of the square belfry. In 1870 the congregation built in the heart of the business district. Here in 1883 SAM JONES, the Georgia evangelist, held a revival. At the end of ten days the meeting had swept the town. One hundred forty-eight new members were taken into the church. The newspapers had treated him royally. His sermons had gone out over the wires of the Associated Press. Henceforth Sam Jones was a national evangelist.

American-directed Methodism celebrated its centennial in 1885. At that time the Methodists in Chattanooga built a new church at Eighth and Lindsay and named it Centenary. The next move was to the present site at McCallie and Lindsay in 1922.

The Ladies Aid Society of the church was organized in 1886. Many plans were used to raise money. One was a spelling-bee. The audience was weighed at the door and charged one-half cent for each pound over one hundred. From the work of this society a home was established for wayward girls, which became the Florence Crittenden Home. The Old Ladies Home (now Oak Manor), the Wesley Community Center, and the Bethlehem House were born in the hearts of these women. Today the WOMEN'S SOCIETY OF CHRISTIAN SERVICE raises all funds from personal pledges. Treasury books show annual receipts of over $9,000 from four hundred members.

Centenary's holdings today are valued over $1,500,000, with a membership above 2,400. Sunday school attendance runs to 900.

Centenary has contributed eight missionaries to the foreign field and fifteen ministers to Methodism. JAMES W. HENLEY served Centenary 1937-1944, and BACHMAN C. HODGE 1944-1956. In 1956 Hodge was made a bishop, and Henley was elected a bishop in 1960.

CHAUTAQUA INSTITUTION, in western New York, was founded in August 1874 by JOHN H. VINCENT and LEWIS MILLER as the Chautauqua Sunday School Teachers Assembly. The Assembly was authorized by the SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION of the M. E. Church in October 1873. At the time Vincent was secretary of the Union and editor of the Sunday School Journal, a magazine of instruction for Sunday school teachers. Lewis Miller, a member of First Church, AKRON, Ohio, was an inventor and manufacturer of farm machinery. He was also instrumental in developing the "Akron Plan" for church school buildings. He was an enthusiastic believer in a progressive Sunday school program of Christian education at graded levels for children, youth and adults. John Vincent was a strong promoter of the graded "Uniform" lessons for Bible study. Both men sensed the need for trained Sunday school teachers.

Lewis Miller was a trustee of the Chautauqua Camp Ground of the ERIE CONFERENCE held at Fairport (later Chautauqua). Summer camp meetings were held there from 1870 to 1873. Vincent was invited by Miller to visit the site and it was approved as a fine location for the Sunday School Teachers Assembly of 1874.

The Assembly plan called for two weeks as a training center for Sunday school teachers of all denominations. Some 200 persons completed the course; 1,500 persons attended the Sunday services. The Bible was the central book for study and all other courses related to it. From the beginning all denominations were invited to share in the program and in the leadership.

Response to and support of the Assembly grew; classes in other subjects were soon added; the length of the season was extended; a daily paper was published; cottages replaced the tents for homes and meetings; buildings were constructed. In 1878 the Chautauqua Literary and Scientific Circle was organized as an adult four-year correspondence course of study. There were 1,800 members in the graduation class of 1882. Chautauqua University was chartered in 1883. Classes in literature, science, religions, social studies, physical education, arts, crafts, music, drama, and history were added. In 1902 the Assembly was chartered as Chautauqua Institution, Chautauqua, N. Y.

It began with fifty acres of land; it now owns over 700 acres. Many buildings have been added, including the amphitheater seating 6,500 and Norton Hall seating 1,400 people. Many denominations have built social and religious centers on the grounds. Succeeding Bishop John H. Vincent, his son George E. Vincent became Principal of Instruction in 1898 and president of the Institution in 1907.

The Institution is governed by a board of trustees without relation to any specific church and continues to offer a wide program of instruction, entertainment and inspiration. Part of the summer school's instruction is under the direction of SYRACUSE UNIVERSITY and receives university credit.

Methodism has much of which to be proud in relation to Chautauqua Institution. The founders were both strong Methodist Christians. Many of the leaders and supporters through the years have been Methodists. For fifty years JESSE LYMAN HURLBUT assisted in the religious education program. Mary A. Lathbury wrote two hymns for use there: "Day is dying in the west" and "Break Thou the bread of life." Four Methodist buildings and organizations are in Chautauqua: Hurlbut Memorial Community Church, The Methodist House, the Methodist Missionary Home, and Fenton Memorial Home for deaconesses. The latter three are used only during the eight-week summer season; the church serves the entire community throughout the year.

Over 50,000 people annually attend the programs.

CHECOTE, SAMUEL (1819-1884), a Creek Indian preacher and statesman, was born in 1819 in Chattahoochee Valley in ALABAMA. He attended ASBURY MANUAL LABOR SCHOOL near Fort Mitchell. He went to the Indian Territory (now in OKLAHOMA) in 1829 with his parents, during the great and bitter removal. At the 1852 session of the INDIAN MISSION CONFERENCE, M. E. Church, South, Checote was admitted on trial, and in 1854 he was admitted into full connection. In 1867 he was elected principal chief of the Creeks, and was reelected in 1872 and again in 1879. Samuel Checote brought his tribe to its highest level of culture and progress. He rescinded the Creek Law prohibiting missionaries from work among his people, abolished the custom of plurality of wives, defeated efforts of the Congress to extend territorial jurisdiction over the Indian Nations, encouraged thrift and industry, and ardently supported education. He was appointed PRESIDING ELDER several times, and selected as delegate to the ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE which met in London in 1881. He died in 1884 and was buried in a private cemetery near Okmulgee, Okla.

CHEN WEI-PING (1876-1972), Chinese preacher and scholar, was born in Peking, Sept. 30, 1876. His father, converted by the London Mission, was a Christian before the first Methodist missionaries arrived in Peking. The London Mission willingly lent two of their most promising young men to the newly arrived Methodist missionaries to help them get a start on their evangelistic work, and thus Chen Ta-yung became one of the first Chinese preachers ordained in the North China Annual Conference.

His son followed him into the Methodist ministry, and in the fateful year of 1900, father and son were both Methodist pastors, the former in a small country church and the latter in the First Church, Peking. In that year, the Boxers murdered Chen Wei-ping's father, mother, and younger brother and sister. Five years later, when quiet had been restored, he asked to be appointed back to that country church, that he might preach the Gospel to the very people who had killed his family.

After studies in America in 1911-15, he became editor of The China Christian Advocate, and then in 1920, for four years he was evangelist-at-large throughout CHINA. In 1924 he was appointed professor of homiletics in Nanking Theological Seminary. From 1931 to 1945 he spent in government service, first as consul-general in Aus-TRALIA, and then as chaplain of the Army Moral Endeavor Association. He returned to teaching in 1945, this time in the Bible Teachers' Training School (for women) in Nanking. After 1949 his home was in Taipeh, Taiwan, where he was pastor of a church and preached every Sunday. He died Feb. 25, 1972.

CHEN WEN YUAN

CHEN WEN YUAN (1897-1968), Chinese bishop, was born in Foochow, CHINA on July 16, 1897, the only son of a Chinese Magistrate. Later the father retired from official life and went into business in JAVA, where he died when his son was only one year old. The family returned to Foochow where the son entered the Anglo-Chinese College. Under the influence of the President (later bishop) JOHN COWDY, he became a Christian, and was baptized by Bishop WILSON S. LEWIS.

After graduation from the Anglo-Chinese College, he made a brilliant record at SYRACUSE UNIVERSITY, U.S.A., where he secured his B.A. in 1918 and M.A. in 1919. On his return to Foochow, he became pastor of the Foochow Institutional Church, becoming a member of the Foochow Annual Conference in 1921. His great strength in the field of evangelism and with youth brought him to the pastorate of the large student "Church of the Heavenly Peace."

In 1927 he returned to the United States, entering DUKE UNIVERSITY for advanced work in psychology. In 1928 he specialized in this field in CAMBRIDGE, ENGLAND, and in BERLIN. He received his Ph.D. from Duke University in 1929.

Returning to Foochow in 1931, Chen taught psychology at the Fukien Christian University, soon becoming Dean, and later Acting President of the University. In 1936 he was elected Executive Secretary of the National Christian Council of China.

In 1941 Chen was elected bishop and assigned to the Chungking Area where he served until the communist take-over of China. Here he displayed unusual qualities of leadership and did much to guide the young churches of China during the difficult days of occupation and in conflict with the Japanese military leaders.

He became the voice of Methodism and of the Church at large in relief work and in the resettlement of the millions of displaced persons fleeing to West China before the onrushing invaders.

Although he was a bishop of the Methodist Church, Methodist leadership acceded to the urgent request of the National Christian Council to permit Bishop Chen to continue as Executive Secretary since he was the one man who knew the Church in China, and who could hold it together during trying and difficult days.

After the communist take-over in China, it became almost impossible to learn the whereabouts or activities of Bishop Chen. It is known that he was either imprisoned or under house arrest in the parsonage of the Da Chia Hang Methodist Church in Chungking. Reports seem to indicate that after two years his status was re-examined and he became a translator of German and English documents for the Government. His activity as a translator has been carried on in such widely separated areas as Chungking, Shanghai, and Manchuria. One early report indicated that he had a degree of freedom, but he was not permitted to engage in any church activities.

For many years no mention of Bishop Chen appeared in any communist government documents, nor did any substantiated report, via the "grape vine," come out of China. However, it was authoritatively reported in February 1969 that Bishop Chen died of cancer on November 8, 1968. A daughter, Mrs. Han-Sing Chen Liao, lives in the United States.

Bishop Chen wrote Religion and Personality, Psychology and Religion, China's Temperament and China, a Psychological Interpretation of Chinese Culture, and with Bishop CARLETON LACY, The Great Migration and the Church in West China.

CHERRINGTON, ERNEST HURST (1877-1950), American layman and Executive Secretary of the Board of TEMPERANCE of The Methodist Church, was born in Camden, Ohio on Nov. 24, 1877, the son of the Rev. and Mrs. George Cherrington. He succeeded CLARENCE TRUE WILSON as Executive Secretary of the Board of Temperance of the M. E. Church in 1936.

Cherrington became a prominent layman of the Methodist Church, and was elected to eight GENERAL CONFERENCES (1916-1944), as well as to the UNITING CONFERENCE in 1939.

In 1921, Cherrington received the degree of LL.D. from OHIO WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, and in 1922, the Litt.D. from OTTERBEIN COLLEGE. His honors were distinguished and many. While with the Board of Temperance he assumed active editorial leadership of The Voice, the magazine published monthly by that Board.

Before coming to the Board, Cherrington was general manager of the publishing interest of the Anti-Saloon League of America. While with the League he edited The Yearbook of that organization; and the six-volume Standard Encyclopedia of The Alcohol Problems was produced under his direction.

Much of Cherrington's service as Executive Secretary of The Board of Temperance was his successful effort to discharge the debt on the Methodist Building on Capitol Hill, WASHINGTON, D. C. This has for years housed the bishop of the Area, the district superintendents' offices, and other general offices of the church, and is a center of Methodist interests in the Nation's Capital.

In 1903 Cherrington was married to Betty Denny, and they had a son and daughter. He retired from the Board of Temperance in December 1948, and died on March 13, 1950. He was buried in the cemetery at Westerville, Ohio.

CHESTERFIELD, NEW HAMPSHIRE, U.S.A. Chesterfield Church, the mother church of NEW HAMPSHIRE Methodism, is located in the southeastern corner of the state about ten miles from Brattleboro, Vt. The first Methodist sermon in New Hampshire was preached near Chesterfield in 1772 by PHILIP EMBURY at the home of James Robertson who had heard Embury in NEW YORK CITY and invited him to come to Chesterfield. A class may have been formed at this time. JESSE LEE may have preached here in 1790, but the first permanent society at Chesterfield was formed in 1795. Some authorities say it was formed by Jesse Lee, who had organized a circuit for which the name of John Hill appears in the Minutes of 1794. In 1796 the Chesterfield Circuit was the only one listed for the state of New Hampshire. The present church building was erected in 1844.

FREDERICK E. MASER

CHESBROUGH, S. K. J. (1826-1907), was publisher and general treasurer of the FREE METHODIST CHURCH. As a layman at Pekin, N. Y. he authored the "call" for the first laymen's convention at Albion, N. Y., on Dec. 12, 1858. He was closely identified with the laymen's group that finally organized the "Free" church. He served as lay-pastor and later as publisher of The Free Methodist, Treasurer of the General Missionary Board, and Secretary of the General Conference. He was a capable businessman and effective soul winner.

BYRON S. LAMSON

CHESTER, England, a small county capital, was one of the earliest centers of Methodism in Northwest England. In 1747 JOHN BENNET came to Chester to seek out a religious society which was already meeting there. As a result of his work, a Methodist society was established which met from 1751 in a house in Love Lane provided by a Richard Jones. The society rapidly outgrew this limited accommodation, and in the following year gladly accepted the lease of a barn in St. Martin's Ash which could be conveniently adapted as a preaching place. In June of that year JOHN WESLEY paid his first visit to Chester and preached both in the newly acquired barn and in the open air near St. John's Church. He expressed pleasant surprise at the quiet and serious way in which his preaching had been received, but his pleasure must have been short-lived, for when he returned to Chester in the following month it was to find that a mob had spent two nights in pulling down the barn where he had preached. However, the spirit of the people was unbroken, and by the end of the year the place was again in use for preaching.

In all, John Wesley paid over thirty visits to Chester, often on his way to Ireland via Parkgate. His last visit was in 1790. The Minutes of Conference for 1763 list Chester as the tenth English circuit, though the phrase "Chester Circuit" is not used until the Conference of 1771. When the new Octagon Chapel was opened in 1765, its first minister, ALEXANDER MATHER, was designated assistant to the Salop Circuit. The erection of a new chapel was the result of the desire of Chester Methodists for a permanent building of their own. The barn at St. Martin's Ash was still adequate, though it lacked security of tenure. A piece of land was bought in Boughton, not far from Foregate, accessible via an avenue twenty-five yards long. The decision to build an octagonal chapel was, it is believed, because of John Wesley's own preference for this shape (see ARCHITECTURE).

In 1776 a preaching place was started in a room in Commonhall Street. Initially its purpose was to meet the needs of those who lived on that side of the city, but in time it became the center for those Methodists who wished to be entirely separate from the Church of England. Tension grew between those who worshipped in Commonhall Street and those who met at the Octagon, and after John Wesley's death a split took place. The two main points of difference were the desire of the Commonhall Street members to receive the Sacrament of Holy Communion from their own preachers, and their wish to hold services at the same time as those of the Church of England. In 1794 the Commonhall Street members built a chapel in Trinity Lane and styled themselves "Independent Methodists." A year later, following the PLAN OF PACIFICATION, the preachers at Trinity Lane were permitted to administer Holy Communion and to hold their services at church times, but they remained unappeared; and in 1797 when the METHODIST NEW CONNEXION was formed under ALEXANDER KILHAM, Trinity Lane was one of its original seven circuits. Not until 1806 did the Octagon hold its services at regular church times and allow Methodist preachers to administer the Sacraments.

Among those converted during the last years of the Octagon Chapel were William Moulton and Henry Bowers. Of William Moulton's family, three sons entered the Wesleyan Methodist ministry, and his grandsons included the famous Wesleyan minister and New Testament scholar, WILLIAM FIDDIAN MOULTON, and his brother Richard Green Moulton, Shakespearian critic and editor of the popular Modern Reader's Bible. Henry Bowers was a prominent man in the life of the city and was elected mayor in 1817 and 1827. Bitter opposition attended the first election, but he was promised that this would be withdrawn if he would resign as a Wesleyan local preacher. To this he replied, "No, I esteem it a much greater honour to preach the Gospel than to be Mayor of Chester, and I will make no such stipulation."

In 1810 it was felt necessary to build a new chapel, and in the next year a plot of land was purchased on St. John's Street. The new chapel was opened in September, 1812, and was substantially altered in 1911; in 1926 it was enhanced by the addition of a chancel, a memorial east window, and a new organ. In 1835 the Trinity Lane society moved into new premises in Pepper Street, where it remained until the chapel closed in the 1920's.

The first PRIMITIVE METHODIST to preach in the city is believed to have been a certain Joshua Reynolds, and in 1819 John Wedgwood came to Chester in the course of the "Cheshire Mission." His visit was followed in 1821 by Thomas Brownsword, and as a result a Primitive Methodist society began to meet in the home of Thomas Ellis in Steven Street. Later the society moved to a room in King Street, and eventually in 1824 the first Primitive Methodist chapel was opened in Steam Mill Street, though open-air missions continued to be held in various parts of the city. One drawback to the Steam Mill site was the unruly behavior of the neighbors. Doors would be kicked in, and shouting during the services was frequent. In 1855, during the ministry of Ambrose Kirkland, the quarterly meeting petitioned the mayor to give police protection to the services. At last the members felt bound to seek a quieter place, and in 1863 a chapel was built in George Street; in 1888 another move was made to a larger building on the other side of the same road. Meanwhile, as a result of a CAMP MEETING held at the Folly Field in 1864, a new Primitive Methodist society was formed, and began to worship in a building which had previously been used by the WELSH CALVINISTIC METHODISTS. In 1899 this society, which had become the head of a second Primitive Methodist circuit, built the City Temple in Hunter Street and made its home there. The process of subdivision was continued when a third Primitive Methodist circuit was formed on the basis of the Tarvin Road Chapel, opened in 1884.

Welsh-speaking Methodism (see WALES) in Chester had its origin in a small society class which met on the St. John's Street premises. This later became a separate society in the Holywell circuit, and in 1818 built a chapel in Hamilton Place; in 1884 the society moved to its home in Queen Street.

As was the case in so many areas, Chester was left at METHODIST UNION (1932) with too many chapels, not all of them ideally situated, and unable to mobilize their resources to cope with the new housing developments on the outskirts of the city. A process of rationalization has begun, however. In 1934 the City Road Chapel was changed into a central hall (see FORWARD MOVEMENT)—a new floor was installed at gallery level and the upper part was furnished with tip-up seats. In 1958 the St. John's Street and Hunter Street circuits combined to form the Grosvenor Park Circuit, and in 1963 this was joined to the George Street and Tarvin Road circuits to form the Chester Circuit. As a result of this amalgamation it proved possible to combine the St. John's Street, George Street, and Hunter Street societies in one, making the George Street premises a temporary home, while the St. John's Street premises were rebuilt to provide a worthy, modern home for the united society.

CHESTER, PENNSYLVANIA, U.S.A., is the oldest town in the state, having been settled by the Swedes in 1643, even before the grant of William Penn. For a time the place was called Upland. In 1682 William Penn held a provisional assembly in Chester. It was chartered in 1701 and was the county seat of Chester County until 1789, when Delaware County was organized.

Simpson states that it is strange that the Methodists did not form a class, or society, in Chester before 1810, for FRANCIS ASBURY and his men passed back and forth through that town almost more than any other. Chester was on the direct route from BALTIMORE and the South to PHILADELPHIA and NEW YORK. BOARDMAN and PILMORE early brought Methodist preaching to the place, when they stopped at the famed "Mrs. Withey's Inn." Asbury first visited Chester April 8, 1772, returning April 14 and then in October of the same year. In 1789 Thomas Coke preached in Chester, evidently in company with Asbury. Mary Withey had long been a seeker after faith. Asbury was called to preach her funeral sermon in 1810. Whatever retarded the actual organization of a class, society or charge until 1818 and on, Chester became a strong center of Methodist growth throughout the 1800's and to this present day. The first organization was known as Asbury, then Chester, and then Madison Street. Madison Street was indeed the "mother church" in that town, and today Chester is known in Methodist circles for its nine churches, endeavoring to share more fully in a common endeavor and witness.

In 1774 Chester, embracing several appointments, reported thirty-six members. Daniel Ruff and Joseph Yearbury were appointed to the charge, and at the end of six months exchanged with WILLIAM WATTERS and Philip Ehart. In 1775 the charge reported seventy-four members; in 1776, 104 members; and in 1780, 100 members.

On Thursday evening, May 13, 1965, those churches of the DELAWARE CONFERENCE, Central Jurisdiction, within the boundaries of the PHILADELPHIA CONFERENCE became members of that Conference. This included three Negro churches in the Chester area. The 1970 Conference minutes report as follows: Christ Church, 294 members; Community Church, 62; Grace, 138; Madison Street, 435; Parkside, 677; Providence Avenue, 440; St. Daniels, 1,005; Siloam, 165; and Trinity, 542.

CHEVY CHASE, MARYLAND, U.S.A. Chevy Chase Church is an English Gothic multi-color stone building located in an affluent suburban community, a mile north of the boundary of the nation's capital. In the autumn of 1912, thirty-one Methodists, led by Lucien Clark, began holding Sunday evening services in a two-room church provided at no cost by the Chevy Chase Baptist congregation. At that time Chevy Chase was an area of farms and scattered homes. In this setting the new First M. E. Church of Chevy Chase began to grow. It purchased the "little brown church" from the Baptists in 1913 for $3,960. Outgrown by 1934, EDWARD C. LATCH organized the construction of the original stone church. The architect and the builder were both members of the congregation. Resident Bishop EDWIN HOLT HUGHES dedicated this sanctuary costing $20,240 in 1935, and in 1939 the name was changed to Chevy Chase Methodist Church.

Clifford Homer Richmond, who served as pastor for twenty-five years, developed the rest of the plant. The original stone sanctuary was rebuilt and refurnished as a chapel in 1963, completing a quadrangle which left a memorial garden in the center. The present value of the plant is $1,381,670. Pastors have been: Lucien Clark, 1912-20; J. Luther Neff, 1920-24; A. S. Mowbray, 1924-26; Turnbull Spicknall, 1926-32; Edward C. Latch, 1932-

41; Clifford Homer Richmond, 1941-66; Elmer L. Kim-mell, 1966-

The church has grown apace with the community and there is energetic and enlightened lay activity. It supports a full-time missionary family in Brazil, mission schools, and relief activities at home and around the world. Because of its proximity to WASHINGTON, D. C., visitors from all parts of the U.S.A. and over the world worship here. Over the years Chevy Chase Church has included in its membership a Vice-President of the United States, Cabinet members, Senators, Representatives, and officials of other agencies of the government.

In 1970 the membership was 2,030, and the church raised for all purposes $192,364.

CHEW, RICHARD (1827-1895), British preacher, was twice president of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCHES' Annual Assembly—in 1867 and 1881. He was born at Ramsbottom, Lancashire, on Feb. 2, 1827, and entered the ministry of the WESLEYAN METHODIST ASSOCIATION in 1847. He spent most of his ministry in the north of England and was best known as an administrator. For thirty-five consecutive years he was a member of the Connexional Committee and did much to shape the policy of the denomination. He wrote the standard biographies of JAMES EVERETT and WILLIAM GRIFFITH. On his death, a memorial fund was raised to provide an annual college prize that still bears his name. He died in Sheffield on April 12, 1895.

CHIANG KAI-SHEK

CHIANG KAI-SHEK (1887-), military leader of Free CHINA now on TAIWAN (Formosa), was born on Oct.

31, 1887, at Fenghua, Chekiang Province, and was educated at the National Military Academy in Paoting, North China, and at the Tokyo Military Academy in Japan. At the latter he met Sun Yat-Sen and other Chinese revolutionary leaders. When the war to overthrow the Manchu Dynasty broke out, Chiang returned to China to participate.

He was sent by Sun to Russia to study military subjects and on his return to China he founded the Whampoa Military Academy at Canton to train officers. The Academy was staffed largely by Russians who later gave Chiang much trouble and he finally had to expel them. He became generalissimo of the Kuomintang or Nationalist forces and conquered several provinces and strategic forces. He then encountered reverses and schisms which caused him to retire. He later returned to command but the ranks were hopelessly split and at one time he was held a prisoner by some of his own officers. When the Japanese made war on China in 1937, Chiang was able to unify the forces against them, but he was driven westward to Chungking.

In December 1927, Chiang married Mayling Soong, youngest daughter of CHARLES J. SOONG, who had been a Methodist pastor and whose wife was a devout Christian. Chiang had been a Buddhist and had previously married a child bride, arranged by the families according to Buddhist custom. He was converted to Christianity under the influence of Mayling Soong, her mother and their pastor, Z. T. KAUNG, who later became a Methodist bishop. Kaung baptized him and received him into the membership of the M. E. Church, South, but he declined to perform the wedding ceremony because of the previous marriage. On Dec. 1, 1927, the religious ceremony was performed by David Yui, a secretary of the Y.M.C.A., and there was a civil ceremony according to Chinese rites.

In 1934 this distinguished Methodist layman launched the New Life Movement which was placed under the direction of an American-trained Chinese leader and which was designed to reform the manners and customs of the people according to a pattern partly Christian and partly Confucian.

Chiang occupied the most important positions in the Kuomintang party and in China, including the presidency of the Executive Yuan, the Supreme Policy Council, and was twice elected President of the Republic of China. When the Communist regime took control in 1949 his government was forced to move to Taiwan. He retired but was elected to the Presidency again in 1954 and reelected in 1960 and 1966.

He is the author of China's Destiny, The Collected Wartime Messages of Generalissimo Chiang Kai-Shek, and Soviet Russia in China.

MADAME CHIANG KAI-SHEK

CHIANG KAI-SHEK, MADAME (1899-), née Mayling Soong, Chinese leader and notable Methodist, was born on March 7, 1899, at Hongkew, China, the daughter of CHARLES J. SOONG. Early in her life she came to the United States with her sisters and attended WESLEYAN COLLEGE at Macon, Ga. She graduated from Wellesley College in Massachusetts and received honorary degrees from ten American institutions. She was also made an honorary Fellow of the Royal College of Surgeons in Great Britain. She married Generalissimo CHIANG KAI-SHEK in 1927, after he became a Christian, and shared with him the honors and rulership of her native country.

In 1942 she returned to America and was the guest of President Roosevelt at the White House in Washington and made a triumphant tour of several cities. At her appearance in New York City she spoke to a near-record audience in Madison Square Garden and was introduced by Governor Dewey.

Madame Chiang was the first woman to be decorated by the National Government in China, and she was the recipient of the highest military and civil decorations and six awards and medals in the United States. She was the first Chinese woman member of the Child Labor Commission, founder of the Moral Endeavor Association, secretary-general of the Chinese Commission on Aeronautical Affairs, director-general of the New Life Movement, founder of schools for the orphans of soldiers, and she held positions of distinction and leadership in numerous other organizations and government agencies in the Orient and America.

Her writings include China in Peace and War, China Shall Rise Again, This Is Our China, We Chinese Women, Little Sister Su, Sian, a Coup d'Etat, and numerous articles in magazines and encyclopedias.

ELMER T. CLARK

CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, U.S.A., largest city in ILLINOIS and greatest railroad center in the United States, was founded as Fort Dearborn in 1804. In 1825 JESSE WALKER, Methodist missionary to the Indians, visited Chicago, then a group of small cabins under the protective guns of the fort, and he subsequently made occasional visits there. In 1830 he wrote to Bishop R. R. ROBERTS, "I have hopes that Chicago will yet receive the gospel." His hopes and labors soon bore fruit. On June 14, 1831, Walker, assisted by Stephen R. Beggs, organized a Methodist class of eight persons and appointed William See, a local preacher, as leader. Thus began the first religious society in Chicago, which in due course became the First Methodist Church.

Five successive buildings have housed this church. With the passing of the pioneer period, there was added to the small congregation a group of energetic and far-seeing young men seeking a career in the rapidly growing frontier town. These saw the importance of the First Church in the center of the business district and they erected an income-producing building with facilities for the church's activities. They also decided to use the surplus income to develop Methodism. As a result of this statesmanship, Methodism took the lead of Protestantism and held this lead many years. When the Temple building was begun in 1922, First Church had aided in the development of almost every Methodist church in Chicago in the amount of one million dollars in assistance. Each new church drained off members from the First Church, thus keeping it small in membership as compared with some of its offspring churches.

The first ring of Methodist churches around the business center gave way in time, under pressure of business expansion and foreign immigration, to another ring of churches, and by 1900 important Methodist churches appeared in the suburbs.

By 1925 many Negroes from the South began to reach Chicago and in due course there was a large Negro population. Many white Methodist churches were overwhelmed by the Negro invasion and Negro or biracial Methodist churches developed.

First Church projected and aided in the development of numerous agencies.

Chicago has always been a great Methodist headquarters since the middle of the last century. The Western Christian Advocate was published there for awhile, and the Western Book Concern while credited to CINCINNATI had its larger office in Chicago. At unification of American Methodism in 1939, it was decided that the Board of Hospitals and Homes, the Board of Lay Activities, the Council on WORLD SERVICE AND FINANCE with its treasurer, and the Board of PENSIONS should all be located in Chicago. These for a time were housed in the 740 Rush Street Building which originally had belonged to the Book Concern. Within recent years this building has been sold and these general offices have been moved to EVANSTON, a few miles to the northward up Lake Michigan, and itself an integral part of the Chicago Area.

The 1970 Minutes of the NORTHERN ILLINOIS CON-

ERENCE show that the number of Methodist churches in Chicago has increased to almost one hundred, and there are 50,000 members in these, in addition to numerous churches and their large memberships in the adjacent suburbs.

ALMER PENNEWELL

Bethany Home began in a prayer service of the Chicago District of Swedish Methodist ministers seventy-six years ago at Donovan, Ill. For a long time previous to that, Swedish Methodists in Chicago felt the need of a Home to care for the aged and needy friends within the church. On Nov. 5, 1889, the Home was incorporated. During the first year of operation the Home was located in a rented house in EVANSTON, Ill., where fifteen persons were cared for.

John R. Lindgren, an Evanston banker, is recognized as the Home's first benefactor, and Alfred Anderson as its first superintendent. Largely due to their efforts the Home came into being.

After one year in Evanston, property was purchased in the Ravenswood area of Chicago; and in 1893 a new Home was erected and dedicated on the site where it has continued to exist, though the original building has long since gone. Additions have been made to the Home building complex in 1920, 1925, 1954, 1961, and 1965. As early as 1930, Bethany Home had gained the reputation of being the largest institution of its kind among the Swedes in America, and according to N. Davis, then secretary of the Board of Hospitals and Homes of The Methodist Church, "the largest of its kind within Methodism."

The Home has through the years expanded especially under the superintendency of B. W. Selin, and presently has the capacity to care for 415 persons. The Board of Directors of Bethany Home also govern the operation of the Bethany Methodist Hospital and Bethany Terrace, the latest branch of service to the sick and the aged. The Terrace is located at Morton Grove, Ill., and is in its first year of operation. In time it is expected the Terrace will be able to give care and help to more than 250 people. Total assets of the corporation at present amount to nearly $12,000,000. Bethany is under the Northern Illinois Conference of the United Methodist Church.

T. LENNARD EIDE

Bethany Methodist Hospital is a 195-bed general hospital located on the Chicago north side. It is an institution of the Northern Illinois Conference of The United Methodist Church, but it had its origin in Swedish Methodism. Alfred Anderson, the first superintendent of Bethany Home, in his fourth annual report, advocated the expansion of the Home to provide hospital care for invalids and others who needed medical care. At that early date two rooms were set aside in the Home for this purpose, one for men and one for women. Some critical operations are said to have been performed in that early "hospital." Year by year it was reported by the superintendent of the Bethany Home that they were attempting to provide for the need of sick residents "temporarily." When the central building of Bethany Home was completed in 1927, a floor was set aside for a hospital of twenty-five rooms, fully equipped to do all kinds of hospital work.

In 1948, construction was begun on a one-hundred-bed hospital wing to carry on the ministry of healing. Bishop J. RALPH MAGEE dedicated the building in 1949. Two further additions have been made: The Bohman Memorial in 1959, and the Ehrenpreis Pavilion in 1963—the latter being a forty-bed geriatric section. Bethany Methodist Hospital today enjoys the reputation of being modern and efficient and is accredited by the Joint Commission of Hospital Accreditation. A training program for practical nurses is conducted in cooperation with the Council on Community Nursing, and the Chicago Board of Education. B. W. Selin is the administrator. The Hospital's Board of Directors also govern the operation of the Bethany Home.

CHICAGO TEMPLE

The Chicago Temple, or First Church, worships today in a skyscraper edifice in downtown Chicago whose uplifted cross dominates the skyline of the city's famous "Loop." The church was founded by the fabled Jesse Walker, who first arrived at Fort Dearborn, Chicago's predecessor at the point where the Chicago River flows into Lake Michigan, on a summer day in 1825. He came at the express invitation of Captain John Whistler, military commander of the Fort. Walker described the spot then as "a far away, dreary place."

Though this Methodist circuit rider preached at the Fort on that first visit, as he did again in 1828, he did not formally organize a church until June 14, 1831, when he established the first religious congregation of any faith or denomination in the area. Jesse Walker remained for two years as the first pastor of the church.

From that time to the present the story of that congregation is the story of Chicago. The church survived the impact of the Blackhawk Indian War and the cholera epidemic that followed. Its people shared with the village the blow of the financial panic of 1837, when many settlers despaired of the pioneer venture entirely. It grew with Chicago, and when its third building was burned in the Great Fire of 1871, the congregation rebuilt its church on the smoldering ashes as a significant part of the city's revival.

First Church has been a "mother church." Among her early members were Mayor Augustus Garrett and his wife ELIZA GARRETT, JOHN EVANS, Orrington Lunt, and Grant Goodrich. From the leadership of these and others came NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY, with Evans as its first president; GARRETT THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, established by Mrs. Garrett's will, which originally provided that three of the school's five trustees were to be members of First Church; Chicago Wesley Memorial Hospital; The Methodist Old People's Home of Chicago; and The Methodist Children's Home of Lake Bluff.

In 1859 the congregation built its first combined church-commercial building, and provided that all net income from the commercial operation was to be channeled into "church extension" for the Methodist church in Chicago, a policy that has been strictly followed ever since. As a result, over the years more than 200 other Methodist churches of the city have received both members and money from The Temple—the money in excess of two million dollars.

At the close of the second decade of this century, John R. Thompson became pastor of The Temple and immediately began work on his dream of a church spire whose cross would literally "tower o'er the wrecks of time." At the time of its dedication in May 1924, the present 568-foot tall Chicago Temple Building was the world's tallest man-made structure, and remains today the world's tallest church.

In 1942 CHARLES RAY COFF became pastor of the church, and it was during his period of leadership that the world famous "Chapel-in-the-Sky" was created high in the spire of the church. ROBERT BRUCE PIERCE, present pastor, was appointed to The Temple in 1961. In 1970 the membership was 1,169, and the property was valued at $6,635,000.

The Methodist Old People's Home Corporation began caring for the aged in 1893, incorporating in 1898. Its Home on Foster Avenue is the oldest of its kind in Chicago.

In February 1892, a deaconess visiting in one of the tenements of Chicago encountered an ailing, destitute woman of eighty about to be turned out on the street. She was taken for care to the Deaconess Home, and thus the tradition of the Methodist Old People's Home began.

With the exception of the period from 1914 to 1931, when a minister's widow, Mrs. W. A. Phillips, was superintendent, the Home has grown under the guiding hand of deaconesses—Isabelle A. Reeves (1896-1914); Minnie Willmarth (1931-1943); and Lucile McCormick (1943-1966).

The first group of fifteen residents, solely dependent on the Home for support, lived in Bush Hall, dedicated in 1901 and given by William Bush. From the original "family," the Home has grown to house about 180. It became the largest Home of its kind in The Methodist Church by 1952.

In 1962 the Corporation purchased, from Pick Hotels Corporation, The Georgian in Evanston, Ill. It was converted to a Home in 1964, and by fall of 1965 was filled to capacity with 208 persons.

Both Homes are affiliated with the Northern Illinois Conference of The United Methodist Church, but are open to persons of all religious faiths. Admission to either Home is open to those to care for themselves. Both Homes, however, have well-equipped health centers with nursing staffs to care for the ill and senescent. The Corporation owns property, buildings, equipment and endowment with a total (1966) value of more than $8,000,000. Corporate offices are at 1415 Foster Avenue, Chicago, Ill. 60640.

Quinn Chapel, A.M.E. Church, the second Methodist church in the city of Chicago and the fourth church of any kind there, began as a prayer group in 1844 in the home of John Day in Brown's Alley between Lake and Randolph Streets. By 1845 the group had become a small religious society and met in a schoolhouse on Madison near State Street. Beginning in 1846 the "society" met in the home and under the leadership of Madison Patterson, an exporter. This was on State Street near Van Buren. They worshipped here until they could afford to purchase one-half of a Baptist (white) church located on the corner of LaSalle and Washington Streets. This one-half of a church was moved from LaSalle and Washington and placed on a lot which the society had purchased on Wells Street between Jackson and Van Buren.

In 1847 Bishop WILLIAM P. QUINN sent George Johnson of the New York Annual Conference as a missionary to the Chicago region. With the assistance of Phillip Ward he officially organized the Quinn Chapel A.M.E. Church. The first members of this society were: John Day, Rachel Day, Matilda Lucas, Mary Jane Randall, A. T. Hall, Maria More, and Edward Gordon. Madison Paterson, one of the oldest preachers in the Iowa Annual Conference and the first Negro licensed to preach in Chicago, was of great service in nurturing the young society. During the pastorate of John A. Warren (1852-1855), Quinn moved to Jackson and Dearborn and there built the church that was destroyed in the great Chicago fire of 1871. Another fire in 1873 destroyed the rebuilt church. During the pastorate of E. C. Joiner (1877-1879), a brick church was built on Fourth Avenue at Van Buren. In 1889 John T. Jenifer was appointed to Quinn. Under his leadership the people purchased the lot and built the church (1890) in which the present congregation worships.

Wesley Memorial Hospital is a 700-bed general hospital, located a mile north of Chicago's "Loop" and a block from Lake Michigan. Wesley Hospital, forebear of the present institution, was founded in 1888 by a group of Methodist ministers, deaconesses, and doctors who saw the need for medical ministry to the needy poor. Dr. Isaac Danforth, the hospital's first chief of staff, was then given three rooms in the Chicago Training School where Methodist missionaries and deaconesses were trained. Deaconess LUCY RIDER MEYER, who taught the young ladies, then was accorded facilities to care for patients, and nursing was placed on the curriculum. On Christmas Day, 1888 the first patient, an impoverished Negro woman with rheumatic fever, came to Wesley for help.

Since then Chicago Wesley Memorial Hospital has outgrown three homes, has consolidated with two other hospitals, and has brought relief and comfort to more than 700,000 patients.

The Hospital is a non-profit corporation guided by the approximately 475 members of the Wesley Society, including the 160 Methodist ministers of the three Chicago districts of the Northern Illinois Conference. This society elects a thirty-nine-member Board of Trustees. Two-thirds of these trustees must be Methodists, including the resident bishop.

Wesley's medical staff presently numbers 210 doctors, ninety of whom maintain offices in a building adjoining the hospital. Chicago Wesley is an affiliate of NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY Medical School. Annually approximately sixty-five resident and thirty-three intern physicians receive their training at Wesley, as do junior and senior clerks in the medical school. About 250 student nurses are enrolled in the hospital nursing school. It also has schools of medical and radiological technology. Total employees number about 1,550—of these 230 are registered nurses.

The present hospital building was completed in 1941. Dedicator services were held on December 7, 1941, and an hour later the news of Pearl Harbor was announced. Within six months the top floors of the hospital were taken over by the United States Navy. A $6,000,000, five-story addition to the twenty-story 1941 building was completed in 1959.

Wesley, on a twelve-month basis, exceeds ninety percent of total bed capacity. The number of patients served yearly is over 21,000 including about 2,000 newborn babies. Approximately ten percent of the patients enter under the hospital's free bed program. Patient days exceed 217,000 annually. The hospital has nineteen operating rooms and nearly 17,000 major operations are done yearly. Emergency room calls number in excess of 25,000. The total valuation of the hospital, its properties, and endowment funds is approximately $20,000,000 (1966).

Five separate volunteer groups help with the work of the hospital, including approximately 1,000 ladies in the Wesley Auxiliary, representing the Northern Illinois Conference Women's Society of Christian Service. A full-time Methodist Chaplain helps serve the spiritual needs of Wesley patients. A lovely nondenominational chapel seating fifty was a gift of the Auxiliary to the patients.

CHICAGO GERMAN CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church was formed in 1872 by dividing the Northwest German Conference. It continued the work begun by Philip Barth in Chicago in 1846.

The first session of the new conference was held in the Maxwell Street Church, Chicago, Sept. 19, 1872. Thirty-six ministers were present with Bishop MATTHEW SIMPSON presiding. The conference included northeastern ILLINOIS, WISCONSIN, and parts of MICHIGAN and INDIANA. The concentration of work was in CHICAGO and MILWAUKEE. In 1872 there were forty-eight itinerant preachers, forty-four local preachers, three districts, and 5,149 members.

In 1924 the Chicago German Conference was reunited with the Northwest German Conference to become the Chicago Northwest Conference.

CHICKASHA, OKLAHOMA, U.S.A. Epworth Church. About 1891 J. J. METHVIN, an early day missionary to the OKLAHOMA Indians, saw the strategic importance of Chickasha, located in the center of the present state of Oklahoma and on the Washita River, and urged the PRESIDING ELDER to start Methodist work in that location.

J. K. Florence was the first man appointed to the Chickasha charge, succeeded by G. W. Myatt. A. B. L. Hunkapiller was the leader of the flock that built the first small one-room building in the 1890's. The growth of the congregation brought into being the plan for another and larger sanctuary which was started in 1904 and completed in 1905. The sanctuary was enlarged in 1923 and another educational building was constructed in 1928. A beautiful new sanctuary was built in 1954, and an additional educational building, providing office space and a WESLEY FOUNDATION Center, was completed in 1962. The indebtedness was lifted in 1967 and an increased program of missionary and social service and continued physical improvement was begun.

Oklahoma College of Liberal Arts is located in Chickasha and Epworth Church is the center for Methodist student activities, study and worship. Two missionaries in the PHILIPPINES are presently supported by the church, which reported a membership of 1,810 to the 1970 OKLAHOMA CONFERENCE.

CHILDERS, MARVIN A. (See JUDICIAL COUNCIL.)

CHILDREN'S DAY. For many years before Union in 1939, the M. E. Church observed an annual Children's Day, on which a collection was taken in the Sunday school to be used as a loan fund for "needy students who are members of the Methodist Episcopal Church" (Discipline, 1936, Par. 1265.3). The M. E. Church, South took an offering for the student loan fund on an annual College Day (Discipline, 1938, Par. 455.8).

The UNITING CONFERENCE of 1939 continued both these days, pending further study. In 1944 the GENERAL CONFERENCE merged the former Children's Day and College Day into a new Methodist Student Day, on which an offering was authorized for the Student Loan and Scholarship Fund.

In 1952 the General Conference re-established Children's Day for optional observance (on the first Sunday of National Family Week) "for the purpose of emphasizing the responsibility of the church for our children, the same to be observed without a church-wide offering" (Discipline, 1952, Par. 235.6 and 1964, Par. 250.6).

CHILE, a country on the west coast of South America, occupies a coastal region on the slopes of the Andes from the crest of the Cordillera to the sea, never wider than 250 miles. On the other hand, Chile's length is some 2,600 miles, from a hot desert frontier with Peru to the Straits of Magellan and beyond. Chile owns half of Tierra del Fuego and has Antarctic claims extending to the South Pole. The area is 286,000 square miles and the population in 1963 was 8,190,000.

The country's three climatic zones in turn determine the economy and living conditions. The northern third is hot and arid, much of it desert. But here are found nitrate deposits that account for three quarters of Chile's exports. Chile is also one of the world's largest producers of copper, and iron is found in this region. Here the population is sparse, being concentrated in mining towns and other settlements. Antofagasta, port for much of the mineral shipment, is the principal city of the north.

The central third of the country, where more than three quarters of the Chilean people live, is characterized by fertile valleys and intensive agriculture. Fruits, cereal grains, potatoes, and sugar beets are among the products. Some 250,000 acres of grapes supply Chile's substantial wine industry. The central region also has most of Chile's manufacturing, now developing rapidly under government encouragement. The largest cities are in this zone: SANTIAGO, the capital (1,914,000 in 1965); Valparaiso, the chief port (267,000 in 1965); and CONCEPCION (167,000 in 1965).

The southern third is a land of mountains and fjords, rich in forest resources but largely inaccessible. Where harbors provide access from the sea, the forests are exploited, but the southern region has few towns and few roads. Puerto Montt is the gateway city to the south. Southern Chile also includes Punta Arenas, the world's southernmost city and site of the most southern Methodist church.

The population of Chile is largely of European origin, with some Mestizos (mixture of European and Indian) and a few Indians. Spanish settlement and government came by way of Peru. In 1536 Diego de Almagro entered the region from Peru in behalf of Francisco Pizarro. The conquest was complete by 1540. Independence was achieved in 1818 as a part of the general independence movement in South America.

Chile has been involved in a long series of border disputes with ARGENTINA, sometimes erupting into open warfare. The War of the Pacific (1879-83) against BOLIVIA and Peru won for Chile her two northern provinces and most of her nitrate wealth.

A republic in form, Chile has been ruled by strong men at times, but has a healthy democratic tradition. Recent history has been marked by peaceful elections and stable governments. The Catholic-oriented and mildly socialist Christian democratic movement has been quite successful.

Along with Spain's other colonies, Chile inherited a dominant Roman Catholic Church, but Protestants (803,000 in 1961) account for 10.8 percent of the population

—the highest percentage in all Latin America. This comparatively high rate is due in large part to the phenomenal growth of the Pentecostal movement in the twentieth century.

In 1877 WILLIAM TAYLOR (later bishop) began his controversial plan for self-supporting missions on the west coast of South America, apart from the work of the Board of Missions of the M. E. Church, already active east of the Andes. Like the Spaniards, he entered Chile from Peru. The first city of present-day Chile that he visited, IQUIQUE, was in fact a part of Peru then. He visited other settlements near Iquique and next Antofagasta, then a Bolivian port, and on into what was already Chile. He went to Valparaiso, Concepcion, and Santiago, among other places.

Taylor solicited subscriptions from seamen aboard foreign ships, with the idea of sending port chaplains; and from English-speaking businessmen and mine operators, with the idea of establishing schools. Returning to New York early in 1878, Taylor arranged to send six preachers and three teachers to points in Peru and Chile. The first party, which sailed by steamer for lack of funds, included IRA HAYNES LAFETRA, one of the principal founders of Methodist work in Chile.

At Iquique, J. W. Collier and his sister Edith found that the gathering War of the Pacific prevented work, and so moved to Valparaiso. After the peace, James P. Gilliland was able to work at Iquique, establishing in 1884 the school that continues to this day and is widely respected in Chile.

Taylor's appointees to Antofagasta, the Rev. and Mrs. Alexander T. Jeffrey, started a school in September of 1878 and began holding services, only to be driven out when war was declared in the following February.

At Copiapo, Lucius C. Smith built on ten years of work by a Wesleyan local preacher from England. Smith conducted services in both English and Spanish before moving to Santiago. The Rev. and Mrs. Harry B. Compton arrived at Copiapo in 1883, later transferring to Coquimbo. Work at Copiapo was abandoned in 1888.

Other men sent by Taylor had begun work in central Chile, LaFetra among seamen at Valparaiso, and others going to Santiago and Concepcion. They were joined by missionaries displaced by war in the north, so that the educational and evangelistic work began in more strength in this region.

At Concepcion, William A. Wright, Sarah Longley, and Lelia H. Waterhouse arrived to start an English school, but found that those who had offered subscriptions to

CORONEL METHODIST CHURCH, NEAR CONCEPCION, CHILE

William Taylor had cooled toward the project. But, as Miss Waterhouse told an English mother, "We have come to stay." They soon had established schools for both girls and boys, serving not the English business community but the poor families. These schools became Concepcion College and Colegio Americano, which flourished until destroyed by earthquake in 1939.

LaFetra moved from Valparaiso to reestablish services in English in Santiago, and in 1880 three young women arrived to start a school. Adelaide Whitefield, who soon became LaFetra's wife, founded with his help what is now Santiago College. In 1883 Lucius C. Smith, by now a refugee from the north, inaugurated Methodist services in Spanish in Santiago. Soon a mob raided his rented hall and burned Bibles and hymnals, but Smith escaped and continued services at another location.

Most of Taylor's missionaries were young and inexperienced, and they lacked organized backing. They were expected to support themselves, which meant that most of their energies went into schools—and those who could pay tuition were mostly English-speaking business families or upper-class Chileans. About half of the places to which Taylor sent missionaries were soon in the battle zone of the War of the Pacific, and all ports were in jeopardy.

Sensing a need to provide organization for themselves, ten of Taylor's missionaries met in Santiago in 1880 and elected LaFetra president of their conference of missionaries. From this they gradually developed their own field organization. By 1881, Taylor had sent thirty-three men and women to the west coast of South America. Of these three had died and seven had returned home.

Then came Taylor's dramatic rise, at the General Conference of 1884, from layman to clergyman to bishop. Having elected Taylor a missionary bishop for Africa, the General Conference was obliged to legitimize his long-controversial methods. He then organized a "Transit and Building Fund Society" as a home base for the mission. The General Conference provided that such a mission could become a district of an annual conference in the U.S.A. and after an 1889 visit by Bishop JOHN M. WALDEN, the work became the Chile District of the CINCINNATI ANNUAL CONFERENCE, with James P. Gilliland as PRESIDING ELDER.

The General Conference of 1892 merged Taylor's missions with the previously established work of the Board of Missions, centered in BUENOS AIRES. The South America Annual Conference was organized in 1893, with Chile as one of six districts. By that time there were in Chile forty-three missionaries, eighteen full-time Chilean workers, and twenty-five part-time teachers. There were six Methodist societies and three unorganized congregations with 900 adherents. There were six boarding schools and two day schools. Property included five school buildings, two chapels and parsonages, and a printing plant. The era of the pioneers was over.

The early years of the twentieth century saw the extension of the church into all parts of the country and out from the urban centers into smaller communities. In 1901 the Chile District became an annual conference, adding to its consciousness as a national church.

During the period of growth there was also extension of institutional work, including the EL VERGEL AGRICULTURAL INSTITUTE at Angol, founded in 1919; the Sweet Memorial Training School, founded in 1926 and closed in 1962 to make way for an interdenominational center for theological study; SWEET MEMORIAL INSTITUTE community center, and day nursery, founded in the 1920's; and the Nueva Imperial Medical Center.

The years of growth also brought theological controversy and division of the church in 1909, when the Methodist Pentecostal Church was formed with congregations that broke away under influence of the Holiness movement.

The Chile Annual Conference was supervised from the United States for many years, but the growing strength of the church and rising national leadership, as in all of Latin America, brought increasing self-direction. In 1920 the Chile Conference passed a memorial to the General Conference of the M. E. Church proposing division of the work in Latin America into two episcopal areas and the creation of a Central Conference to deal with matters of mutual concern. The General Conference of 1924 approved the latter request, and the first session of the LATIN AMERICA CENTRAL CONFERENCE was held in PANAMA that same year. Not until 1932, however, was the Central Conference permitted to elect bishops. In that year also the work was divided into two areas, with Bishop GEORGE A. MILLER being asked to continue in the Pacific Area. Four years later ROBERTO ELPHICK became the first Chilean to be elected a Methodist bishop, and he served until 1940. Since 1932 headquarters for the Pacific Area have been moved back and forth between Santiago and LIMA, PERU.

In 1962 a second Chilean, PEDRO ZOTTELE, was elected bishop. He returned the episcopal headquarters to Santiago from Lima, and supervised (1962-69) an area extending from Punta Arenas, Chile to Punta Arenas, Costa Rica.

The Chilean Methodist Church in 1965 had 4,923 members in full connection, 2,665 probationary members, sixty-six churches, seventy mission points, and 100 church schools. The church schools enrolled 6,477. The work was in the care of thirty-three national pastors and thirty-eight missionaries.

Methodist influence in Chile is magnified by schools and social services. Places in the top Methodist secondary schools are sought as among the best educational opportunities in Chile. The farm at El Vergel, and especially its Bullock Museum, are considered national agricultural and archaeological assets and are listed in official guide books. Newer projects of social service and community development also are making an impact upon Chilean society beyond Methodist numbers.

Along with the emphasis upon education which has marked Methodist work since Taylor's first visit, the church is noted for its social witness. Evangelicals of Chile have a pietistic tradition. Because of its Social Creed and its insistence that Christianity must speak to the social order, Methodism holds a distinctive place.

Trends in the mid-1960's began to point to a strengthening of the social witness and further development of national leadership in the church. Also noteworthy was the beginning of dialogue with the Roman Catholic Church, which in time may have far-reaching import.

Earthquakes in Chile have involved the church in massive programs of relief and reconstruction and provided the occasion for intercontinental assistance. Chile is the southeastern tip of the "earthquake horseshoe" that circles the Pacific Ocean. The country experiences several tremors each year and occasionally severe earthquakes that cause millions of dollars of damage and kill or injure hundreds of persons.

The quake of Jan. 24, 1939 affected 62,000 square kilometers inhabited by 1,100,000 persons in sixty-three cities, towns, and villages. Especially affected were the Methodist churches in Concepcion, Talcahuano, Chillan, Angol, and Los Angeles. From other parts of Chile came relief in the form of food, clothing, and money for help in reconstruction. Donations were also received from churches in the United States, making possible reconstruction of the church building in Concepcion and repairs to churches and parsonages elsewhere in the affected area. Concepcion College, one of the schools begun by William Taylor in the first days of Methodism in Chile, was totally destroyed by the 1939 quake and was not rebuilt.

In May 1960 the entire area from Chillan to Puerto Montt was shaken by three severe quakes in a two-day period. Along the coast tidal waves did even more serious damage. The COUNCIL OF BISHOPS in the United States at once sponsored a special offering for relief in Chile and the Pacific Basin. The offering amounted to $885,000 for direct relief and reconstruction of church buildings, parsonages, schools, and social centers. Direct relief work was done in Chile by the METHODIST COMMITTEE FOR OVERSEAS RELIEF, using missionaries as agents. The larger part of emergency work on behalf of Protestant churches was done, however, by Church World Service—an interdenominational relief agency of churches in the U.S.A., toward which Methodists contribute a substantial portion of funds. The special offering from the U.S.A. was supplemented by gifts from Latin American Methodists, including those areas of Chile not affected.

Completely new church buildings were erected by means of the relief funds in Chillan, Coronel, Talcahuano, Los Angeles, Curanilahue, Angol, El Vergel, Tome, Valdivia, and Puerto Montt. Major repairs were financed for churches in six other places. The fund made possible new parsonages to replace those destroyed at nine places; educational facilities for eleven congregations; and social centers (in connection with a community development program) were built in Valdivia, Coronel, and Puerto Montt.

In March 1965 an earthquake shook the central area of Chile, affecting particularly the city of Valparaiso. A new church building was required at La Cruz, and repairs were provided for seven other churches.

The Methodist Church in Chile has remained undaunted by the earthquakes, which have devastated its buildings and brought economic hardship to its members. The church's gratitude for aid from churches and friends around the world is paralleled by its continued effort to reach economic self-support.

Pentecostal Movement in Chile is an offshoot of Methodism that has become the largest element in Chilean Protestantism, and colors the entire relationship between Evangelicals and the rest of society in Chile.

The origin of the movement is traced to the thought of W. C. Hoover, a North American Methodist missionary who was pastor of the Methodist church in the port city of Valparaiso. Around 1909 Hoover became impressed by the Pentecostal experiences of Christian groups in India and northern European countries. He began a series of revival meetings which featured prayer, Bible studies, and gospel singing—following a pattern suggested by correspondents of Hoover in other countries. After several years of prayer meetings, participants began to have the "Pentecostal experience."

From Valparaiso the movement spread rapidly among Methodists, creating astonishment and confusion among the leadership. Two years later the authorities of the Methodist Church in Chile, under strong pressure from North American missionaries, expelled the Pentecostals as people without discipline and teachers of false doctrine. Those who were expelled organized themselves as a church and continued their meetings in homes.

The new church grew steadily because of its evangelistic zeal, but this very zeal made it the subject of persecution from the state church (Roman Catholic). In 1925 a new constitution of the country declared separation of church and state. As a consequence, persecution diminished and Pentecostals enjoyed more freedom for their open-air meetings, lay preaching, and other activities. But despite their new freedom, the rate of growth diminished.

During the depression years of the early 1930's they received a new thrust and again spread rapidly—not only in Chile, but also in Argentina, Bolivia, Peru, PARAGUAY, and URUGUAY. Since that time Pentecostal membership has increased by a hundred percent every ten years.

Unfortunately, the movement has gone through many divisions, and today there are more than twenty distinct Pentecostal denominations in Chile, several retaining the word "Methodist" as a part of their names. The denominations, and a number of independent local churches, all share the same background and pattern of life and worship. About six percent of the population of Chile belongs to these churches.

From the social point of view the Pentecostals are characterized as being a church of the proletariat, in the sense that they have reached the poorest class of the population. At the same time, these are indigenous national groups. Though the founder was a North American and the main branches use the old structure of the Methodist Discipline, the movement grew in Chilean soil and was promoted under Chilean leadership without help from the outside. It is a self-supporting church, practicing tithing.

Another characteristic is that the Chilean Pentecostal churches place all their emphasis and energy upon the proclamation of the Gospel. As soon as a person becomes a Pentecostal, he is expected to proclaim what Jesus has done in his life, without any requirement of theological training. A fourth characteristic is a strong emphasis upon the experience and guidance of the Holy Spirit through external manifestations. This conditions many aspects of the Pentecostal's daily life, but especially his way of worship. Services are highly emotional and enthusiastic, many not having any specific order at all. Body movements and "speaking in tongues" are frequent expressions of the worshipping Pentecostal.

The presence of the Pentecostal movement has influenced all of the religious life of Chile. It has been a healthful influence upon the lower classes of the population, for Pentecostals are generally recognized as conscientious and responsible workers, sober people with a deep sense of joy and confidence in their daily life.

Some Roman Catholic leaders have acknowledged the Pentecostal presence as a challenge for renewal of that church. Even before the Second Vatican Council, some Roman Catholic leaders had recognized the validity and authenticity of the Evangelical faith as expressed by Pentecostals. Much of the new emphasis upon the use of the Bible in the Roman Catholic Church in Chile can be attributed to the challenge that was brought by the presence of this indigenous Evangelical church.

At the same time, the Pentecostal churches have obliged the "historic and traditional churches," such as Methodist, Presbyterian, Anglican, and Lutheran, to revise again and again their strategy in Chile. These have been forced to explore seriously the ways of becoming better identified with the national life. The Pentecostal churches have brought a new reform in the spiritual, moral, cultural, and social life of Chile.

Student Work. Chilean university centers have long been a negative setting for the developing faith of an Evangelical student. An atheistic scientism (positivism) became the dominant intellectual climate in the nineteenth century in all centers not controlled by the Roman Catholic Church, mainly as a reaction against the conservatism and authoritarianism of that church. This climate lingers today, though largely merged with Marxism.

Protestantism in Chile is most visibly represented by Pentecostal sects, whose low cultural level and strange manifestations have resulted in amused contempt for the Evangelical faith. A resurgent Roman Catholicism adds difficulties for the unprepared Protestant student. The need for helping Methodist students to give a positive witness to their faith in such surroundings led the Chile Annual Conference to institute its program of student work.

The program began in 1943 with the appointment of the Rev. and Mrs. RAYMOND VALENZUELA to work among students in the University of Concepcion. In 1958 a residential center for students was opened. The "Hogar Universitario Metodista de Concepcion" gives room and board to over a score of young men and women and serves as a center for spiritual and cultural activities.

In 1965 a second hostel for sixteen students was opened in Santiago to serve those who attend the nation's principal university, the University of Chile. In 1966 a third hostel was opened in Temuco, receiving fifteen students. The Methodist pastor in Temuco has been acting as director.

In addition to the hostels, the Board of Student Work of the Chile Conference offers loans and scholarships to deserving and needy students. The Student Christian Movement of Chile is an affiliate of the World Student Christian Federation. Financial assistance for student work is given by the World Division of the United Methodist Board of Missions.

of the CHILE CONFERENCE to ask the 1968 GENERAL CONFERENCE to grant it autonomous status. The request was granted and permitted the formation of an independent national Methodist Church of Chile provided certain conditions could be met. (See Par. 647, Discipline, UMC, 1968.)

This church came about in an organizing conference held in SANTIAGO, Chile, January 27-February 6, 1969, in connection with the meeting of the LATIN AMERICA CENTRAL CONFERENCE; and the coming into being at the same time of the COUNCIL OF LATIN AMERICAN EVANGELICAL METHODIST CHURCHES. Cooperating in this were the representatives of seven countries which had until then comprised the Central Conference, namely, CHILE, ARGENTINA, URUGUAY, BOLIVIA, PERU, PANAMA, and COSTA RICA, plus delegations from the three autonomous Methodist churches of MEXICO, BRAZIL, and CUBA. The organization of these several church bodies into the Council is narrated elsewhere, but the Chile delegation, representing what was then the Chile Annual Conference, met by itself and formed its own organization.

RAYMOND A. VALENZUELA, a Christian education executive and U. S. missionary to Chile, was elected bishop to head the 10,000-member Methodist Church of Chile. His election followed and was an integral part of the organizing conference which had just adopted a new constitution, a doctrinal statement, and a formal declaration of autonomy.

The new church is presently in the process of moving forward in cooperation with the other Latin American Methodisms. It will maintain and continue ties with The United Methodist Church in the U.S.A. and with that church's Board of Missions. Bishop Valenzuela assumed his duties following his consecration as bishop, which is to be for a four-year term.

CHILICOTHE, MISSOURI, U.S.A. The first Methodist preaching at what is now Chillicothe was in 1833 in the home of John Graves, a friend of ministers. A courthouse erected in 1837 probably served for a time as a preaching place. The MISSOURI CONFERENCE appointed Reuben Aldridge to Chillicothe in 1839, and the next year the circuit reported 253 members. Following the division of 1844, the church at Chillicothe adhered South with the Missouri Conference. In 1846 Daniel Penny was appointed to the charge, and the church in Chillicothe had seven members at that time. A church building was erected in 1855, and Chillicothe became a station in 1857. In that year it had 170 members. The church building burned in 1863, and another was erected in 1866. A new edifice known as Elm Street Church was built in 1902.

The M. E. Church began work anew in Chillicothe in 1862. The next year T. B. Bratton was appointed to Chillicothe, and the following year he reported thirty-four members. In 1864 the congregation purchased a building from the Presbyterians. At the first service the preacher, fearing a disturbance by persons opposed to the establishment of a Northern Methodist church in the community, placed two pistols on the pulpit as he began the service. In 1866 the church reported seventy-nine members, sixty-five probationers, and five local preachers. Ten years later the church had 136 members to 271 for the M. E. Church, South in Chillicothe. In 1903 the Northern church erected a new building costing $22,000. At unification in 1939 the Northern church was called First Church, and it reported 540 members to 686 for the Elm Street Church. In 1955 the two congregations merged to form the Methodist Church of Chillicothe, and plans were projected for a new building which was occupied in 1960. In 1969 the church reported 1,448 members, property valued at $490,473, and $60,492 raised for all purposes. In the same year the Chillicothe Charge, composed of Liberty and Pleasant Grove Churches, reported 139 members in the one and 183 in the other congregation.

CHILICOTHE, OHIO, U.S.A., settled in 1796, and capital of the Northwest Territory 1800-03, was a point on the historic Methodist Scioto Circuit established in 1800. In 1806 JAMES QUINN, preacher in charge, called a meeting of the Chillicothe church trustees, EDWARD TIFFIN (first governor of Ohio) and THOMAS SCOTT (chief justice of Ohio), to formulate plans for erecting a church building. BISHOP ASBURY preached to about 500 people in the new church in September, 1807, and in succeeding years a number of annual conferences were held there. The building burned in 1820 and was replaced. In 1822-23 Quinn again served as pastor. Another building was erected in 1840. In 1843 Chillicothe reported 640 members. The next year the town had an Eastern Church with 344 members and a Western Church with 222. In 1851 the two congregations were called Main Street Church and Walnut Street Church. In 1890 the name of the former was changed to Trinity. The 1851 OHIO CONFERENCE Minutes show a German language church in Chillicothe with seventy-nine members. In 1864 when the church had 120 members, it became a charge in the newly formed CENTRAL GERMAN CONFERENCE. The German church continued until about 1915. In 1939 Trinity Church reported 1,220 members and Walnut Street Church 830. In 1969 Walnut Street Church had 1,553 members and property valued at $876,000, while the statistics for Trinity Church were 1,420 members and property worth $466,000.

CHIMMAN LAL was an early convert from the Sweeper community in the Budaun District of INDIA and a noted writer of Hindustani Christian hymns (bhajans). A British government official befriended him and helped him to qualify as a primary school teacher. He obtained tracts from the pioneer missionary, JAMES L. HUMPHREY. Chimman Lal was converted and quickly began to bring others to Christ. When the Bareilly Seminary was opened in 1872, he entered its first class. He joined the Northwest India Conference at its first session. He composed many bhajans in Hindustani and lived to see tens of thousands of Sweepers come to Christ.

CHINA, in eastern Asia, is the oldest, most populous, and one of the largest countries on earth. It has a total area of about 3.7 million square miles and an estimated population of 742 million. Its traditions date back 5,000 years. The most famous of the imperial dynasties are the Chou, Han, Tang, Sung, Yuan or Mongol, Ming and Ch'ing or Manchu. A republic was established in 1911 with Sun Yat Sen as President. After a chaotic warlord period, the Kuomintang (Nationalist Party) set up a stable government in 1927 under the leadership of CHIANG KAI-SHEK. This government made great progress in unifying and modernizing the country in the decade from 1927 to 1937, but the war with JAPAN (1937-45) sapped its strength and it was overthrown by the Communist armies in 1949. On Oct. 1, 1949, the People's Republic of China was formally set up in Peking. The Nationalist Government under Chiang Kai-shek has continued its existence on the island of TAIWAN (Formosa).

Christianity in China. Prior to the Ming Dynasty (1368-1644), there had been three protracted but abortive efforts to establish Christianity in China, two by Nestorians and one by Roman Catholics. The former gained a foothold in China during the Tang Dynasty (A.D. 618-907) but lost it before the end of that dynasty. Again during the Yuan Dynasty (1279-1368) both Nestorians and Roman Catholics established churches in various parts of the empire, but these were blotted out by the resurgence of a vigorous isolationist nationalism in the succeeding Ming Dynasty.

In 1583 an Italian Catholic priest, Matthew Ricci, succeeded in establishing residence in China, and the modern Christian occupation of China dates from that event. Catholic missionaries were able, even during a period of active persecution in the eighteenth century, to maintain their work without serious interruption. This church had a total constituency of about three million members by 1949.

Protestant missionary work in China began in 1807, with Robert Morrison of the London Missionary Society, but the modern missionary occupation of the country did not really get under way until after the Opium War and its conclusion in the Treaty of Nanking in 1842, which opened to foreign residence the five ports of Canton, Amoy, Foochow, Ningpo and Shanghai. All restrictions against foreigners residing in the interior had broken down by 1860, and thus missionaries were able to begin work in one after another of the great cities throughout China. Besides establishing Christian churches they built modern universities and hospitals, many of them on an interdenominational union basis, thus emphasizing the essential unity of the otherwise apparently fragmented Protestant approach.

For a considerable period western medicine was misunderstood and regarded with superstitious fear; it was therefore attacked. Towards the close of the nineteenth century, and in the early decades of the twentieth, however, the fall of the Manchu dynasty and the revolution of 1911 were followed by a complete change of attitude towards what was western. The revolution, largely inspired by overseas Chinese, brought a turning away from the golden age of the past, and a recognition that future progress required modern scientific knowledge and training. There was a considerable development of work by American and British missionary societies. Some hundreds of Christian hospitals were built; nurses' training schools were developed; a famous medical school was set up with American funds in Peking, and hundreds of high schools were developed. Americans were largely responsible for the establishment of university colleges, and in these British missionary societies cooperated by contributing missionary staff. In the early twentieth century, ministerial training was reorganized on cooperative lines. By 1949 the number of Protestant communicants in the country totalled about one million.

Christian churches and church members in China have had an increasingly difficult time under the Communist government. Missionaries were all forced to leave the country; the National Christian Council was replaced by the China Christian Three-Self Patriotic Movement, a puppet organization of the government; many church activities were prohibited; and all schools and hospitals were taken over by the government.

Supporting missionary societies recognized that in the interests of the Chinese churches themselves, all links with those churches must be severed. Partly as a result of this policy, and also because the new regime did not undertake direct persecution of the churches, Protestant churches fared better, between 1949 and 1959, than did some other branches of the Christian church. Economic and ideological pressures were particularly intense in the rural areas, but during this period, public worship continued in the cities and towns, and a modified structure of church organization continued to operate. In 1958, however, many church buildings were converted to secular use, and from 1966 onwards, as a result of the activity of the Red Guards, what was left of organized Christianity was destroyed, and public worship came to an end. The anti-religious activities of the Red Guards were not directed solely against the Christian church, but also against Confucian temples, Buddhist monasteries, and Muslim institutions.

Methodism in China. Methodist missionaries from three countries—the United States, Great Britain and Canada—have worked in China, and it will be convenient to discuss their work under those headings. Another section will describe the work of the EVANGELICAL UNITED BRETHREN CHURCH in China.

From the United States. The first Methodist missionaries to arrive in China were from the M. E. Church. JUDSON DWIGHT COLLINS and MOSES C. WHITE arrived in Foochow in 1847. They were reinforced the following year by Henry Hickok and ROBERT S. MACLAY, and it was Maclay who guided the young mission throughout that first generation. From Foochow the work spread to other centers in Fukien province, and ultimately four annual conferences were organized—Foochow, Hinghwa, Yenping, and South Fukien, each representing a different dialect area. Maclay had a vision of Methodist work extending westward through Kiangsi and Hunan provinces to Szechuan and even to Tibet, and as a first step toward this expansion, VIRGIL C. HART was sent to Kiukiang in 1867. But the following year westward expansion was temporarily sidetracked in favor of getting a foothold in the north. H. H. LOWRY and L. N. WHEELER were sent from Foochow to Peking in 1869. Maclay in the south, Hart in the Yangtze valley, and Lowry in the north were the builders of the M. E. churches in China during the middle of the nineteenth century. Kiukiang and Nanchang became the centers of the Kiangzi Annual Conference, and Nanking, Wuhu and Chinkiang the centers of the Central China (later called Mid-China) Annual Conference. After a first unsuccessful attempt by Wheeler and F. D. GAMEWELL, Hart and Spencer Lewis succeeded in establishing the church in Szechuan, and this later became the West China Annual Conference. In the north, development from Peking resulted in the formation of two annual conferences, North China and Shantung. By the year of American Methodist union (1939), this church had eight annual conferences, three in Fukien (the South Fukien Annual Conference had by this time been transferred to the Church of Christ in China), three along the Yangtze River and two in the north.

FIRST CONFERENCE IN CHINA

The M. E. contribution to educational and medical work was also noteworthy. Only one institution of college grade, Huanan College for girls in Foochow, was wholly Methodist in control, but an active share was taken in these institutions: Fukien Christian University, Foochow; University of Nanking; Ginling College for girls, Nanking; Yenching University, Peking; Shantung Christian University, Tsinan; and West China Union University, Chengtu. In theological education, besides the wholly Methodist Peking Theological Seminary, the church participated in the following union institutions: Yenching School of Religion, Peking; Nanking Theological Seminary; West China Theological College, Chengtu; Cheeloo School of Theology, Tsinan; and Union Theological Seminary, Foochow.

The M. E. Church, South, in contrast to the M. E. Church, concentrated all their work in one area, the lower Yangtze region, centering in the great metropolitan centers of Shanghai and Soochow. In 1848 CHARLES TAYLOR, physician, and BENJAMIN JENKINS were sent to Shanghai. YOUNG J. ALLEN, most famous of the early missionaries, arrived in 1860. He was a scholar and devoted much attention to the publication of literature. In Soochow the mission established Soochow University, and ultimately had residence stations in Sungkiang, Changchow, Changshu, Nanziang, and Wusih, all in Kiangsu province, and in Huchow and Huchen in Chekiang province. This annual conference was known as the China Conference of the M. E. Church, South, and after unification as the East China Annual Conference of The Methodist Church. Its outstanding church was the Moore Memorial Church in Shanghai. The Southern Church was also one of the constituent elements in the union Nanking Theological Seminary.

Later on the M. P. CHURCH entered the field, taking over a 500-square mile area of southern Chahar province, with Kalgan as the center, from the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. By 1935 they had fourteen organized congregations and about 2,400 communicants. In the unifying Central Conference session in Shanghai in 1941, the Kalgan Mission Conference of the M. P. Church entered the union as the Kalgan Provisional Annual Conference. This unified American Methodist church took as its name in Chinese, the Wei Li Kung Hui.

Evangelical United Brethren. A mission of the United Brethren Church was opened in 1889 in Canton. The first missionaries were Austia Patterson (Shumaker) and Lillian Shaffner. They opened a day school for girls and a street chapel from which the Gospel was preached daily to passing crowds.

Lovinia Halverson, the first medical missionary, arrived in Canton in 1891 and was followed a year later by REGINA BIGLER, who gave herself to this work for forty-five years and became known as "the Beloved Physician of South China."

Meanwhile, the United Evangelical Church in General Conference session in 1898 took decisive steps toward the founding of a foreign mission. Hunan, China was named the place and on Jan. 12, 1900, the Rev. and

Mrs. C. NEWTON DUBS were appointed the missionaries. A street chapel was opened in Changsha in 1902 and six months later a dispensary was established. The following year the first five Chinese converts were organized as a congregation.

At about this time the Evangelical Association voted to establish a mission in China. In the fall of 1904 their first missionaries, C. E. Ranck, A. H. Butzbach, and E. F. Kellhofer settled in Ichang to learn the language. The following year they began work at Yuanling, in western Hunan. There evangelistic, educational and medical programs were launched.

While the United Brethren became an integral part of the Church of Christ in China in 1919, the United Evangelical and the Evangelical Association came together in 1922 and subsequently joined forces in Hunan to meet the rising opposition of nationalism which set off violent anti-foreign and anti-Christian youth movements. The missionary enterprise in Hunan became very hazardous in 1937 when the Japanese war lords engaged in an incident to "chastise China."

When the United Brethren and the Evangelical Churches came together in 1946, the two streams of missions in China became known as the Central China Mission and the South China Mission. Rehabilitation and ecumenical advance became the key words of the church leaders. In 1948, with the Central China Mission united with the Church of Christ in China and few missionaries in both missions left in the wake of the rush of Communism, the indigenous Chinese leadership developed through the schools of the church took on additional responsibilities. By the fall of 1950, there was complete withdrawal of the mission staff of the E.U.B. Church. The last word was, "But the Christian Church is there."

The FREE METHODIST CHURCH of North America also developed a church in China. The founder of this enterprise was CLARA LEFFINGWELL of Canada, who went to China first as a missionary of the China Inland Mission. Then, in 1905, she and seven others were sent out to Honan province by the Free Methodist General Missionary Board. By 1934 this church had six resident mission stations and twenty organized churches. Their church was called the Hsun Li Hui.

From Great Britain. China was one of the most important fields of British Methodist missionary work. The Wesleyan METHODIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY stationed its first minister in Canton, South China, in 1853, but GEORGE PIERCY, a local preacher, had already begun work there in 1851. After 1860 JOSIAH COX extended the work of this mission to Central China, to the provinces of Hupeh and Hunan, and it was here that DAVID HILL began in 1865 one of the most noteworthy missionary careers of the century. The most important educational work was in these union institutions: Canton Christian College (later Lingnan University), Canton; Central China College (later Hua Chung University), Wuchang; and Canton Union Theological College, Canton.

The Wesleyan work, organized in the three districts of South China, Hupeh and Hunan, included hospitals, nurses' training schools, middle schools, city churches and considerable rural work. Wesleyans shared in union theological colleges in Canton and Central China, in Lingnan University (Canton Christian College) and Hua Chung University in Wuchang.

The UNITED METHODIST FREE CHURCHES' Mission began work in Chekiang province in 1864, taking Ningpo and Wenchow as its residence centers. Its most distinguished missionary was W. E. SOOTHILL. A strong rural church was established in these two districts.

The METHODIST NEW CONNEXION began work in Tientsin in 1860, under the leadership of W. N. HALL and John Innocent. The work spread out through Hopei province and southward into Shantung, where they shared in the organization of Shantung Christian University (Cheeloo) in Tsinan. This was the only place in China where the British and the American Methodist mission fields overlapped.

The BIBLE CHRISTIANS, another Methodist group in England, began work in 1883 in southwest China, especially among the aboriginal tribes of Yunnan and Kweichow. SAMUEL POLLARD made here an outstanding contribution by creating a written language and a literature for the Miao tribe.

These three churches united in Great Britain in 1907 to form the United Methodist Church, and this, of course, united the mission work described above. A further union of this church with the WESLEYAN METHODIST CHURCH took place in 1932, to form the Methodist Church (British). Its Chinese name is the Hsun Tao Hui. The PRIMITIVE METHODIST CHURCH, which also participated in this second union, had no work in China.

By 1949 British-related Methodism consisted of the districts of South China, Yunnan, Ningpo, Wenchow, Hupeh, Hunan, and North China. It was responsible for 607 places of worship, 21,175 full members and a total community of almost 58,000.

During the period 1937-40, several conversations took place between bishops of the American-founded Methodist Church in China and representatives of the British-related Methodist districts. However, the declaration of the second World War and the subsequent establishment of a communist regime prevented the formation of a single unified Methodist Church in China.

From Canada. The Canadian Methodist Church called upon the Methodist Episcopal veteran Virgil C. Hart to help open up work in Szechuan province. The first party of missionaries arrived in 1892. With their main centers in Chungking and Chengtu, they also established residence centers in a number of other cities throughout the province. The outstanding union institutions in which they participated were West China Union University, with its medical school and hospital, and West China Theological College. In 1925, following the union of churches in Canada, this annual conference was reorganized and by 1934 it had become officially a part of the Church of Christ in China. This church was organized in 1927, as a union of churches with Presbyterian, Reformed Church, or Congregational background for the most part, although, as noted above, two other Methodist units had also joined it. This union church was known as the Chung-hua Chi-tu Chiao-hui. (See also WEST CHINA MISSION.)

CHINESE MISSIONARY SOCIETY. When the PACIFIC CHINESE MISSION of the M. E. Church was at its peak at the turn of the century with many Methodist Chinese missions along the Pacific Coast, Chinese converts organized a native Chinese Missionary Society in or about 1900 with the aim of establishing Methodist missions in the land from whence they came, namely Kwangtung Province, whose provincial capital is Canton City. In 1901 the first local Chinese preacher, Kwai Yue, volunteered to go to China. He was commissioned by the native Missionary Society to start a work in Canton with $2,000 capital fund. Yue sailed for CHINA and started in Canton City the first mission sponsored by the members of the Pacific Chinese Mission. From the start it was a success and soon had a large congregation. Chinese returning to their homeland from America made this their home church.

In 1905 BISHOP BASHFORD, while in China, ordained Kwai Yue to the elder's orders. Yue labored there for fourteen years until his death in 1915. During this time three other mission stations were established: Ho Nam, across the Pearl River from Canton City; in the town of Som Bot in Toyshan District; and in the town of Ngo Kai in the Chungshan District. These four missions were supported financially by the native Chinese Missionary Society, helping with the purchase of properties and the sending of annual support toward the salaries of workers. While the native Missionary Society functioned, it was customary to hold an annual meeting at the close of the Pacific Chinese Mission Conference, and at these meetings reports from China were read and funds were collected and sent to the four mission stations. There was also a native Women's Missionary Society as an auxiliary which solicited funds and helped with support of women workers and teachers in these four missions.

The Methodist missions in Kwangtung flourished and Chinese preachers were trained and ordained to carry on the work of these churches in China. In 1915 one of the products of the Pacific Chinese Mission, Caroline Lee, a teacher in the San Francisco Chinese church and a graduate of the State Normal School, sailed for China to work in the Canton City Mission. She labored there for years until her retirement, when she returned to her native country. Again, in 1919, one of the local Chinese ministers, Theodore Chow, left the San Francisco Chinese Church and became the minister of the Methodist mission which had been founded by Yue. Under Chow the church grew, and the native Chinese Missionary Society sent funds to purchase a new property and helped build a new church.

In the late 1920's, as the Chinese work of the Pacific Chinese Mission dwindled, it became more difficult to continue raising funds for the missions in China; and since the offspring had become stronger than the parent body, it seemed pointless for the Society to continue what had become feeble support. Finally when JAPAN invaded China, and it was no longer possible to communicate across the ocean, the native Chinese Missionary Society disbanded. Thus ended a brief but brilliant chapter in missionary work in the history of the Pacific Chinese Mission.

CHINOOK, MONTANA, U.S.A. The first preaching service held in Chinook was by Church Extension Secretary WILLIAM ANSON SPENCER on July 2, 1889. The church was organized in March 1891 by W. W. VAN ORSDEL, who preached his first sermon in Chinook, Oct. 5, 1890, and by George Logan of Fort Benton, whose charge extended to the Dakota line. R. A. Armstrong began the building in 1893. Cornerstone-laying was July 18, 1893, by "Brother Van." The first meeting in the new church was a quarterly conference on March 31, 1894. Formal opening was the following day. The bell was received in December 1895, and the building was dedicated Aug. 2, 1896 by Van Orsdel, assisted by W. J. Gamble, S. G. Noble, J. A. Martin, and S. Davis. The parsonage was built during Gamble's pastorate in 1897-98. In 1901 the north wing was added to the church. Maddux church, built in 1901 in the Bear Paw Mountains, was served by Chinook pastors. Pastors serving the longest terms were J. A. Hill and Edwin Dover, each twelve years, and George C. Lee and John F. Reagan, each five years. The H. D. Riegel home in Chinook was Van Orsdel's headquarters for his last six years (1913-19), Miss Leafy Riegel being his secretary.

CHITAMBAR, JASHWANT RAO (1879-1940), the first citizen of INDIA to be elected a Methodist bishop, was born at Allahabad, Uttar Pradesh, India, on Sept. 5, 1879. His father, a Maharashtrian Brahmin, migrated to northern India to escape persecution after being disinherited because of his conversion to Christianity. In the United Provinces (Uttar Pradesh), he became a Methodist school teacher and minister.

The future bishop married Satyavati Singh, daughter of a Kshatriya of Rajputana, a non-commissioned army officer, who likewise was disowned by relatives following his conversion. Both the bishop and his bride had made notable academic records in Methodist colleges and earned degrees from Allahabad University. They went together to the Bareilly Theological Seminary, where most of their fellow students had not even completed high school courses.

Jashwant Chitambar was admitted to the NORTH INDIA CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church in 1907. His appointments included: pastor, Central Church, LUCKNOW; headmaster, Centennial High School, Lucknow; district superintendent, Eastern Kumaum; secretary, All India EPWORTH LEAGUES; and principal, Lucknow Christian College. He was one of the organizers of the National

J. R. CHITAMBAR

Missionary Society in India, and a delegate to the World Missionary Conference at Edinburgh in 1910, out of which grew the INTERNATIONAL MISSIONARY COUNCIL. He was a master of the Urdu and Hindi languages and a preacher of note.

Distinguished in appearance, aristocratic in manner, wearing Indian garb, Bishop Chitambar attracted attention wherever he went in his homeland or abroad. A fervent spirit and a keen sense of humor enriched both his public ministry and his personal contacts.

He was taken ill on his return from the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1940, in Atlantic City, and died in Jubbulpore, Sept. 4, surrounded by the family gathered for a birthday celebration the next day. Burial was in Jubbulpore.

CHITWOOD, JOHN HENRY (1900-1966), American minister, member of the Judicial Council of The Methodist Church, and leader in the NORTH ALABAMA CONFERENCE, was born at Fort Payne, Ala., on Aug. 19, 1900. His parents were Reuben H. and Jennie Bell (Horton) Chitwood. Brought up in a strong Christian home, he graduated at BIRMINGHAM-SOUTHERN COLLEGE with a B.A. degree in 1929. He was honored with the D.D. degree by this college in 1941 and the same degree in 1937 from ATHENS COLLEGE in Alabama. Licensed to preach at Hanceville in 1929, he joined the North Alabama Conference in 1923, in which conference he was destined to serve until the day of his death. As pastor, he served many of the strong churches of the Conference including Central, Decatur; Central Park, BIRMINGHAM; McCoy (the college church), Birmingham; and then as district superintendent of the Birmingham district. But it was at TUSCALOOSA, First Church, where he was destined to serve longest. Tuscaloosa being the seat of the University of Alabama, Chitwood often had a large contingent of students from the University to hear him each Sunday.

Henry Chitwood, as he was usually called, early came to be a leader in his Conference and was elected to the GENERAL CONFERENCE for six consecutive quadrenniums—the leader of his delegation in two of these. He was put in strong nomination for the episcopacy at the Jurisdictional Conference of 1956 and again in 1964, and was elected to the JUDICIAL COUNCIL at the 1964 Conference. His election was as an alternate, but upon a vacancy in the Council shortly thereafter, he assumed active membership in it and made a notable contribution. Chitwood married Mary Lynn Jones on July 16, 1921, and to them were born two children who lived to survive their father. He was reappointed for the ninth year (and in his second pastorate) at First Church, Tuscaloosa, at the 1966 session of his Conference, but shortly after that he was taken ill. To his friends before his death he said, "I have preached to, and admonished others for forty-five years who were facing similar experiences to this one I now face. I said to them that God our Heavenly Father would be as near as their pain and need. . . . that He would not fail them. . . . and now I am in a similar place. . . . I know Him who kept them, and He is able and He will keep me." Henry Chitwood died on Thanksgiving morning, Nov. 24, 1966, and his bishop and close friends among the brethren participated in paying him honor at his funeral. He was buried in Elmwood Cemetery, Birmingham. (See also JUDICIAL COUNCIL.)

Who's Who in The Methodist Church, 1966. N. B. H.

CHIVINGTON, JOHN MILTON (1821-1894), American preacher and controversial military figure, was widely known on the frontier as "the Fighting Parson." Born to Isaac and Jane (Runyon) Chivington in Warren County, Ohio, Jan. 27, 1821, he began his career as a carpenter's apprentice. Converted at a revival in 1842, he spent two years in home study under direction of his bishop, was ordained, and stationed at Zoar Church in the Goshen District of the OHIO CONFERENCE. Serving in ILLINOIS and MISSOURI, he was made missionary to the Wyandot Indians in 1853 at the settlement which became KANSAS CITY. Many Wyandots had become Methodists at the WYANDOT MISSION, Upper Sandusky, Ohio, and welcomed his active leadership which soon resulted in a log church.

The Kansas-Nebraska Act of 1854 gave voters of those states the option of being "free" or "slave," and John Chivington, an ardent abolitionist, became embroiled in the resultant guerilla warfare while pastor at St. Joseph, Mo. Insight into the fratricidal strife is afforded by his brother, Lewis, who sided with the South and as a colonel in the Confederate forces was killed in 1861 in the Battle of Wilson's Creek.

John Chivington became "the Fighting Parson" when a pro-South organization, identified by a wisp of hemp in their coat lapels, warned him not to preach. But he was in the pulpit on the proscribed Sunday with loaded handguns on either side of the open Bible. "By the Grace of God," he announced, "and these two revolvers, I am going to preach here today." He did so, uncontested. After a term as presiding elder of the OMAHA, Nebraska, District, he was sent to DENVER, booming since the 1858-59 gold discoveries, and put in charge of the Rocky Mountain District. Always a man of action, Chivington, burly, big, and bearded, refused appointment by Governor Gilpin as chaplain of the First Colorado Volunteers. Eager "to strike a blow in person," he was made a major.

At La Glorieta Pass, near Santa Fe, N. M., Union forces clashed with Confederates under General Sibley seeking to take Denver and cut communication lines to CALIFORNIA. With a small force, Major Chivington got over some precipitous cliffs to flank the invader and burn the supply train. It was a brilliant maneuver and probably pivotal for the Civil War in the west.

As Colonel, Chivington led a punitive expedition against the Cheyenne Indians in 1864. This has been variously referred to as the Sand Creek "Battle" or "massacre." Humanitarian considerations were involved in the effort to discredit him, but so were other factors such as dislike of his dual ministerial-military role, organizational politics, jealousy, and the loss of profits by Indian traders. Three court martial hearings resulted in no official action. Criticized in the east, he was a hero in the west.

John Chivington was an active Mason, and in 1854 became first master of the first lodge in Kansas. In 1857 he helped form the Grand Lodge of Nebraska, and in 1861 was elected first Grand Master of Colorado. Following his military service, he engaged in freighting and newspaper work and held several minor public offices. A marriage contracted with Martha Rollason in 1840 ended in divorce; in 1873 he married Isabella Amzen and was the father of four children. Until his death, Oct. 4, 1894, in Denver where he is buried, he remained an active and generous supporter of the Methodist Church.

CHOI, PYUNG HUN (1858-1927), noted Korean scholar and clergyman, was born in Potin, North Choon-Chung Province, Korea. Of a distinguished line of Korean ancestry, he sought government office through the annual public examinations in the Chinese classics, only to learn that appointments were based on money rather than merit.

At the age of thirty he became language assistant to GEORGE HEBER JONES, a newly arrived Methodist missionary. He determined not to accept Christianity but to use the opportunity to compare Christian scriptures with the writings of Confucius, Buddha, and Mencius. After four years he accepted baptism, and was soon licensed to preach, and became associated with HENRY C. APPENZELLER in editing the Christian Advocate, with Jones in editing the Theological World, and with the board of Bible translators in translating the Old Testament.

Publication of Christian books was made difficult by the fact that there was no type available in the native Korean script. Choi, noted for his calligraphy, was sent to JAPAN in 1898 to supervise the molding of ten fonts of type in Korean "Unmoon." This made possible the printing of Christian literature in writing suitable to the masses who were untutored in the complicated Chinese characters.

In 1902 he was appointed to First Church, SEOUL, the church attended by the official and educated classes. After twelve years in this pastorate he became district superintendent, first of the Chemulpo and then of the Seoul District. In 1923 he gave up the burdens of administration to take the chair of Chinese Literature and Comparative Religions at the Methodist Theological Seminary and continued his writings. He passed away May 13, 1927, in Seoul.

S. D. CHOWN

CHOWN, SAMUEL DWIGHT (1853-1933), general superintendent of the Methodist Church in CANADA, was born in Kingston, Ontario. His grandparents emigrated from England in 1832 because of economic necessity. His father and uncles, successful tinsmiths, left Anglicanism for Methodism under the preaching of James Caughey.

Samuel D. Chown served in the army during the Fenian Raids, later attended the military college at Kingston and received a Queen's commission. Upon his discharge from the service he worked for a time in the family business which had now broadened from tinsmithing to general hardware.

Chown had earlier been deeply moved by the preaching of Edward B. Ryckman and in 1874 he was accepted on probation by the WESLEYAN METHODIST CHURCH. While on probation he attended VICTORIA UNIVERSITY for two years, 1876-77. In 1879 he was ordained and received into full connexion.

Chown's pastoral career between 1879 and 1902 consisted of two phases. The first, 1879-91, was marked by service in relatively small centers and by a strong emphasis upon social reform; the second phase, 1893-1902, was marked by service in urban charges and by a strong emphasis upon the administrative aspect of the church's life.

From 1885 onward, he served on several circuits in eastern Ontario and was active in temperance work at the Conference level. Chown's temperance activities were such that by 1891 he was recognized as a leader in the field; he had reached the height in social reform work, as it was then understood. In this he gained an insight into the strengths and limitations of cooperative church activities.

Chown was stationed in MONTREAL, 1893, and in TORONTO from 1894 to 1902. While in Toronto, he served in Carleton Street Church, 1894-96; Wesley Church, 1897-99; and Broadway Tabernacle, 1900-02. This phase of his career was marked by a wide range of activity in church administration in which he became aware of the broader problems of EVANGELISM. By the end of the decade he was well versed in the mechanics of Methodism and was well known in Methodist circles.

During its first century in Canada, Methodism had been characterized by a number of unions and reunions as the members of the various branches had sought a form suited to meet the problems of evangelism and, to a lesser degree, of social reform. By 1884 all the Methodists were united, but many problems of evangelism remained unsolved; hence the invitation to discuss union issued in 1889 by the Anglicans to the Presbyterians and Methodists met with eager response. The talks encouraged the Methodists to undertake a serious quest for satisfactory union principles and to seek an interdenominational solution for the problems of evangelism. In particular the experience of 1889 led the Methodists to insist that all "essential truth," both Biblical and experimental, must be preserved. The Methodists spent the next decade searching for a satisfactory mode of application for these principals. Organic union involving a broad selection of denominations was attempted but failed to gain support. Cooperation involving a narrower group of denominations was attempted and met with only limited success. It became evident that the first choice would have to be compromised by the practicality of the second. The actual work involved fell, in part, to S. D. Chown during the next phase of his ministry.

In 1902 the Methodists decided to make a new provision for dealing with social reform problems. The General Conference established a department to integrate such activities, to develop new techniques and programs, and to act as liaison between the Methodist Church and other organizations having similar interests. Chown was elected as the first general secretary of the department. During his term, which lasted until 1910, the department made remarkable advances. Initially he was influenced by the social reform ideas of Alexander Sutherland, but in the latter years Chown applied his own creative views on social reform.

While engaged in social reform work he was also active in Methodism's efforts to solve the problems of evangelism. The Presbyterian, Methodists, and Congregational churches appointed committees to explore the possibilities of organic church union. The Joint Committee on Church Union met on five occasions between 1904 and 1908 and prepared a "Basis of Union," which they felt preserved "essential truth" while preparing for a united church specifically designed to undertake the evangelization and social reformation of Canada. The actual work was carried on by subcommittees on doctrine, polity, ministry, administration, and law. Chown's contribution was made in the subcommittee on administration. The Basis was approved by the General Conference in 1910. Thus, in eight years, Chown had made significant contributions to the solution of the two most pressing problems of Methodism.

In 1910 he was elected to the office of general superintendent. His task was to assist and to counterbalance the aged and conservative General Superintendent ALBERT CARMAN.

Chown was faced with three problems: first, to resolve the relationship of Canadian Methodism with the ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE in view of the impending union with non-Methodist parties; second, to gain and maintain Methodist support for the proposed union; and third, to prevent any developments which might jeopardize the union plans. Chown presented the case for union so effectively to the Ecumenical Methodist Conference in 1911 that little remained to be done; the United Church remained within its membership after the consummation of union in 1925.

By 1912 polls had been taken at all levels of the Methodist Church; the successful presentation of the case for union was reflected in the strong support accorded to it; unfortunately disruption within the Presbyterian ranks prevented the early consummation of union and, during the succeeding years, Chown was called upon repeatedly to rekindle Methodist enthusiasm. In these years he was faced with the delicate task of furthering the union cause without crippling the Methodist programs of evangelism and social service. To this end he undertook a public relations program designed to show that Canadian Methodism was theologically sound, was active in furthering the mission of the church, and was socially responsible. To this last end, he did extensive work in support of the Canadian war effort during the years 1914 to 1918, though he subsequently became an ardent pacifist. The success of Chown's work in this period was reflected in the union of 1925. Recognition of his service over the years by others was evidenced by the award of honorary doctorates from Victoria University, MOUNT ALLISON UNIVERSITY, OHIO WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, and KNOX College, and by the naming of a mountain in the Canadian Rockies in his honor.

Chown's most dramatic contribution was yet to be made. Before a ballot was taken to elect the first moderator of the new United Church of Canada, he urged the council to elect the Presbyterian G. C. Pidgeon as an evidence of their unanimity of spirit in this new venture. This was done. Chown spent the remaining eight years of his life serving on all those committees in which he believed he could do effective work. In 1930 he published The Story of Church Union in Canada, in which he recorded many of the facts and events related to the union, in the hope that it would explain the event to outsiders and possibly mollify the dissident elements. On Jan. 30, 1933, he died after a short illness and was buried in Toronto, Ontario.

CHRISTCHURCH, NEW ZEALAND. Central Mission has a history of early failure and later success. The Conference of 1916 resolved that "the Christchurch Central Mission be discontinued." Since then the area in which the Mission Church was placed has become almost entirely industrialized, and the building has been leased to a business firm.

In 1951 the Central Mission was revived, upon the basis of a mission carried on for some years by a minister who had been a Congregationalist. A superintendent minister, W. E. Falkingham, was appointed, and now the mission is a strong social force in the city. It represents the care of the combined Methodist churches for the sick, the aged, the destitute, and the young Maori lads brought by the government to the city as apprentices in various trades.

The headquarters of the mission gather around what was formerly the Central Primitive Methodist Church in Cambridge Terrace. There are two ministers and a deaconess with an office and out-of-door staff. The mission office is the center of an interchurch "Life-Line" telephone counseling service.

Several important institutions have been developed under the control of the mission:

Wesley Lodge. In 1952, a magnificent property was bought for £19,000 to serve as a home for the aged. It is near the center of the city, alongside the Avon River and Hagley Park, and comprises an acre of land set out in lawns and gardens. Thirty elderly people were accommodated there in 1966.

Wesley Hospital. In 1957, this hospital was built and opened in the grounds of Wesley Lodge. It has twenty-two beds, and more than six hundred patients have received the blessing of expert and loving care. A system of "short-term" beds (for twenty-eight days) affords much-needed temporary relief to the relatives of elderly folk for whom they have been caring in their own homes.

Rehua Maori Hostel. This hostel, first established for Maori girls, is now a hostel for Maori boys who work in the city. It is the largest of its kind in New Zealand; it stands in two acres of land on a central site and accommodates fifty boys, together with the staff. The influence of the hostel reaches out over the many tribes of the Maoris.

Rehua Recreation Hall and Meeting House. This has been built in the grounds of the hostel to serve not only as a recreation hall, but as a point of contact with the Maoris. No other Maori meetinghouse in the South Island so faithfully expresses Maori art. Hostel and house together have given the Methodist witness a new power both among Europeans and Maoris in this part of the island. The meetinghouse can accommodate two hundred people.

Wesley House, Picton. A beautiful lodge has been opened in Picton, 240 miles north of Christchurch, on the upper reaches of Queen Charlotte Sound. There are accommodations for fourteen elderly folk. Considerable extensions were planned in 1966.

Deaconess House, Latimer Square, is the training center for deaconesses throughout NEW ZEALAND Methodism.

The first training center was also in Christchurch—in St. Asaph Street—the site having been secured through the good offices of some Methodist laymen connected with Durham Street Church, in July, 1907. The first superintendent was Sister Mabel Morley.

After sixteen years, the present commodious house was purchased and dedicated on June 16, 1923. Sister Ruth Fawcett was then in charge.

The fields of service for which young women prepare themselves are city missions, overseas missions, and Maori work. Those preparing for work among the Maoris have lectures on Maori language and etiquette.

The 1966 superintendent of the house was Mrs. G. E. Gauntlett, while W. A. Chambers was warden of the Deaconess Order. In 1966, the Presbyterian and Methodist Churches began exploring the possibility of training their deaconesses together.

DURHAM STREET CHURCH, CHRISTCHURCH, NEW ZEALAND

Durham Street Church, built to seat a thousand people, has been called "the Cathedral of New Zealand Methodism." It is the third central church building in the city. The first, in High Street, was opened in 1853. Several times enlarged, it was replaced in 1859 by a larger structure. Under the ministry of JAMES BULLER, it was decided to build again, this time a building to command the attention of the community. The half-acre of land and the building cost £12,000. There was a debt of £3,000 and interest was at the rate of 15 percent, the then current rate. Later, a gallery was added at a cost of over £1,000, and in Buller's second term a Sunday school structure was built at a cost of £3,000.

During its history the church has seen several revivals, under "California" Taylor, Thomas Cook, William Baumber, and others. Its pulpit has been served by some of our finest preachers. Its choir has been among the best in the country and in 1966 had sixty members. Its recorded music has brought in substantial sums for its library. It has been a mother of churches throughout Canterbury and Westland, and it is the strongest Methodist Church in the land.

shrubs, with accommodation for seventy boys and girls, apart from staff. The management of the home is in the hands of a master and matron—husband and wife—with an assistant matron, acting under the guidance of a board composed of thirty members, ministerial and lay. A full-time gardener cares for twelve acres of ground, grows vegetables, and tends poultry and cows.

The annual reunion of former occupants of the home brings people from far and near, testifying to the affection they have for the place and their indebtedness for the opportunities it provided.

The board has recently developed the policy of dividing the children into family units within the home, and a number are being cared for in foster homes. In 1966 plans were started for the erection of a separate family home.

CHRISTDAS, CHANDA (1909-), is executive secretary for INDIA and NEPAL in the Methodist Board of Missions in New York. She was born in Hyderabad State, India, on April 15, 1909. She says, "I was educated entirely in Methodist institutions." A friend says that "she learned much in institutions but even more in extra-curricular activities and life situations." She completed high-school studies in the Stanley Girls' High School, Hyderabad; her B.A. studies in ISABELLA THOBURN COLLEGE; her M.A. in George Peabody College, NASHVILLE, Tenn.

She served first as a teacher in the primary department of the Stanley Girls' School. In 1939, she was appointed principal of the Mary A. Knotts School at Vikarabad, and from then, without a break until 1962, she served as principal of one or another of the girls' schools of the HYDERABAD CONFERENCE. During those years she acquired a reputation as an able administrator of academic work, and of finance and discipline. She served also as a member of the executive board and of the interim committee, and as conference president of the Women's Society of Christian Service and vice-president for West Asia in the World Federation of Methodist Women.

She was a delegate to the East Asia Christian Conference at Kuala Lumpur in 1959; to the WORLD METHODIST CONFERENCE at OSLO in 1961; to the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES in Delhi in 1961; to the Latin American Consultation in 1962; and the Asia Consultation at Port Dickson, Malaya, in 1963.

She was made the first Indian central treasurer for India in the Woman's Division of the BOARD OF MISSIONS, serving from August 1962 to December 1964, when she was appointed as the first Asian Executive Secretary of the Board of Missions.

CHRISTENSEN, JENS JOACHIM (1845-1904), Danish pastor and strong preacher, was born at Hornstrup, Jutland, on March 26, 1845. His parents were Christian Jochumsen Christensen, and his wife, Birthe Madsdatter. His home was a devout Methodist home. While a young man, Christensen entered the way of God. Having become a local preacher, he began his studies and in 1867 he had his first appointment as a helper in Vejle and surroundings. He served many of the largest congregations of the country, and as a leader of the congregation and a preacher of the gospel will be long remembered. Everywhere people crowded around his pulpit, and scarcely has there ever been a greater preacher in the Danish Methodist Church.

In 1890 he was appointed superintendent by Bishop CHARLES H. FOWLER. During Christensen's time, the church made much progress, and at several places in the land there were great revivals. Church buildings had to be enlarged, and several new ones were erected.

In 1872 Christensen married Karoline Jorgensen, from the vicinity of Vejle. He died at Svendborg on July 29, 1904.

CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE, THE. (See ADVOCATE, CHRISTIAN.)

CHRISTIAN CITIZENSHIP DEPARTMENT, a department of the Methodist Church of Great Britain with particular responsibility for "the effective presentation of the Christian social witness."

The department stems from the committees which were established in all branches of Methodism during the vigorous social and political temperance movement toward the end of the first half of the nineteenth century. In WESLEYAN METHODISM after a period of joint consultation, the Temperance Committee merged with the Social Purity Committee and the Lord's Day Observance Committee to form the Temperance and Social Welfare Committee. At METHODIST UNION in 1932, similar departments in the PRIMITIVE METHODIST and UNITED METHODIST CHURCHES combined with this committee, which became the Temperance and Social Welfare Department.

The terms of reference then approved by the Conference, which still obtain, are:

The subjects within its purview, in addition to the Temperance Movement, shall embrace Social Questions, including Industrial Welfare, Gambling, Public Health and Social Purity, the Christian Observance of Sunday, World Peace and International Relationships, the preparation for and practice of Christian Citizenship, and the maintenance of the Christian ideal in social life.

The department was given its present name in 1950.

The many sided work is undertaken by six standing committees: Temperance, Gambling and Leisure, Moral Welfare, Social Reconstruction, International Relations, and Christian Citizenship. The last is primarily an administrative committee, dealing with publicity and propaganda material and details of internal organizations. The METHODIST RELIEF FUND is administered by the International Relations Committee.

On particularly complex and technical issues, e.g., housing law, policy on nuclear weapons, care of the mentally handicapped, working parties undertake essential research and report to the appropriate standing committee. All standing committee business is reviewed by the executive committee, elected from a widely representative general committee appointed by the Conference.

The department has a dual responsibility. One aim is to provide information and judgments on social issues to the church, so that the essential importance of "social righteousness" is not forgotten in our witness. The other is to convey the judgments, opinions and suggestions of Methodism on social issues to the government and the community.

As it is an official department, there are district, circuit, and local church committees through which information and judgments are channeled. The third Sunday in November is observed as Christian Citizenship Sunday. In addition, over thirty thousand Methodists have individually accepted the affirmation of the Order of Christian Citizenship, annually renew their subscriptions, and receive the quarterly magazine The Christian Citizen.

The external responsibility is increasingly being fulfilled by participation in socially directed organizations, rather than by resolutions formally submitted to the government. There is active cooperation with the Social Responsibility, International, and Inter-Church Aid Departments of the British Council of Churches. There is official representation on the Temperance Council of the Christian Churches, the Churches Council on Gambling, the Public Morality Council, the National Council of Social Service, and similar bodies. The secretaries are personally involved in such organizations as the Advertising Inquiry Council, the Home Office Select Committee on Cruelty to Animals, and the London Foundation for Marriage Education.

Official action, e.g., in consultation or discussion with government departments on proposed legislation, is in harmony with the expressed judgments of the Conference Declarations on Social Issues, an impressive volume of pronouncements kept continually under review. When new issues arise, not so covered, the department prepares a special resolution for the approval of the Conference.

In effect, this is service at the frontier between the church and the world. The purpose is to give practical effect in particular situations to the command that we love our neighbors as ourselves.

CHRISTIAN EDUCATION, DEPARTMENT OF (New Zealand), continues on a wider basis the work formerly known as the Young People's (or Youth) Department, which was established in Auckland in 1919. The first organizing secretary was Charles H. Olds, and he was succeeded in 1922, by Edgar P. Blamires, who held office for seventeen years. In 1931, the headquarters of the department was transferred to Wellington, where it was administered by the youth board, and was responsible for the supervision, maintenance, and development of the whole youth work of the church.

In each district there was a District Youth Council consisting (as did the board) of representatives of Sunday schools, young women's and young men's Bible classes, laymen, and ministers. In each church provision was made for a local youth council guiding and coordinating all children's and youth work.

In 1939, Clifford T. Symons came from South Australia as senior youth director, to implement—along with two assistant directors—important new lines of policy, chiefly the establishment of the Christian Youth Movement, Methodist. Among subsequent directors have been W. E. A. Carr, A. J. Johnston, R. H. Allen, and Wilfred F. Ford, assisted by two field directors.

In the 1950's, Conference appointed a special committee to examine the church's program of Christian education in the local church, with the result that the 1957 Conference reconstituted the Youth Department as a Department of Christian Education, responsible for guiding the church's policy and supervising the program of Christian education for all ages. This includes provision of a curriculum and lesson materials (in cooperation with Presbyterian and Methodist churches of New Zealand and Australia), weekly family worship for all ages, CHRISTIAN YOUTH MOVEMENT (Methodist), teacher and leader training courses. It helps existing adult groups make better use of their program and provides a specialist book center, the Epworth Bookroom, Wellington.

In recent years, Christian education for all ages has been organized under the department by district education councils in each synod, and local education councils in the circuits. At both district and circuit level, separate C.Y.M.M. councils guide the work among the fourteen to thirty age group.

Epworth Bookroom (Wellington). The Youth Department, forerunner of the present Department of Christian Education, had a trading section. This section supplied lesson material and youth work aids to local churches. By decision of the 1953 Church Conference the section was expanded to form the Epworth Bookroom. The bookroom continues the work done by the trading section of the department, and in addition stocks a wide range of general theological, biblical, devotional, and other religious books.

Turnover increased rapidly from £7,000 in 1952-53 to £17,000 in 1958-59. The larger part of this turnover consists of lesson material. The profit is devoted to improving the standards and methods of work in the Christian education program of the local churches.

The bookroom is an arm of the Department of Christian Education, and is controlled by the Board of Christian Education. Its premises are in the grounds of Wesley Church, Taranaki Street, Wellington.

WILFRED F. FORD

CHRISTIAN EDUCATION MOVEMENT, THE, a financial campaign for the schools and colleges of the M. E. Church, South, ordered by the GENERAL CONFERENCE of that church in 1918 and carried out in 1920-22. The campaign objective was $34,000,000, an enormous sum at that time, of which $10,000,000 was for SOUTHERN METHODIST UNIVERSITY and EMORY UNIVERSITY, and $1,000,000 was for a Christian Workers Aid Fund, to aid, through loans and gifts, worthy students preparing for Christian service.

Bishop JAMES CANNON, Jr., was chairman of the Commission of eighteen members which conducted the campaign, and J. H. REYNOLDS, President of HENDRIX COLLEGE, was the Director-General. The Commission took over the organization and staff of the MISSIONARY CENTENARY which had conducted a campaign for home and foreign missions during the first two years of the 1918-1922 quadrennium.

It was decided by the director-general and publicity committee that since the Missionary Centenary had circulated so much literature, the materials of the Educational Movement should be most attractive to compel attention. The result was the finest body of printed matter ever issued. The Christian Education Magazine was published on a monthly basis, and this, and all other literature, was printed in color and lavishly illustrated.

A preliminary survey of the assets and detailed needs of the institutions to be helped was made and published. This showed that the approved askings totaled $25,150,000, that needs unprovided for were $7,630,000, and the total campaign objective as listed by the institutions themselves was $32,680,000. This did not include the aid funds.

Connectional interests, in addition to the two universities and aid fund, were SCARRITT BIBLE AND TRAINING SCHOOL (then located at Kansas City); VASHTI Industrial Institute at Thomasville, Ga.; BREVARD Institute (now COLLEGE) at Brevard, N. C.; and EMORY (Academy) at Oxford, Ga. Vashti and Brevard were then operated under the auspices of the Women's Missionary Council of the Board of Missions (MES).

A total of eighty-six institutions were listed in the survey: five universities and connectional institutes, twenty-six colleges, twenty-eight junior colleges, and twenty-seven academies; of these, forty-eight were later discontinued, changed their status, or severed their relations with the Church.

The field organization and methods of the campaign were similar to those used in the Missionary Centenary. Because people were still paying on their Centenary pledges (which ran for five years), the Christian Education Movement was not as successful as the previous campaign. However, at the General Conference of 1922, it was reported that $18,000,000 had actually been collected. This was considerably more than had ever been given for educational purposes in the Church up to that time and meant much to the educational work and ideals of the Church.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR (British). The movement was introduced into Great Britain at Crewe in 1888. It became the Connexional Young People's movement of the PRIMITIVE METHODIST CHURCH, and so the equivalent of the WESLEY GUILD of the WESLEYAN METHODIST CHURCH, and the LEGION of SERVICE of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH. For a generation it succeeded admirably, and in 1933, just after the formation of the Methodist Church, the Christian Endeavor reported 2,559 senior branches with 69,321 members, ninety-nine intermediate branches with 2,003 members, and 1,408 junior branches with 39,516 members. (The Wesley Guild at the same period had about 230,000 members.) Thirty years later the number of Junior Christian Endeavors had dropped to 220 with 3,174 members, and there were only 344 senior branches with 5,382 members, but the position of the intermediate group had not altered greatly. The world had changed, although not all Methodism had changed with it, and the Youth Club had become the main center of youth work, and there were now more than 3,000 Youth Clubs with a membership of more than 100,000. (The run-down of the Wesley Guilds had not been quite as complete: the total membership in 1933 was something over 60,000.) It has also to be remembered that the total membership of the Methodist Church in 1933 was 835,337, while the equivalent figure in 1963 was 719,286. It is perhaps one of the lessons of denominational history that youth work has to be renewed from one generation to another if it is to be kept alive, and that over-attachment to the organizations of the past rarely serves the future efficiently.

CHRISTIAN EXPERIENCE. (See EXPERIENCE, CHRISTIAN.)

CHRISTIAN GUARDIAN, THE, Canadian weekly, was one of the most influential newspapers in the pioneer days of Upper CANADA (now Ontario). Its motto, "Liberty and Equal Rights," embodies its raison d'être, the concern of the underprivileged Methodists of that day, the explanation of its amazing early popularity, and was a portent of its tumultuous future.

The Guardian was founded at York, in 1829, by the new Methodist Episcopal Church in Canada. Within two years its circulation had reached three thousand, and it flourished under the same name for ninety-six years. After the great church union of 1925 it continued along with its editor in the same office, and was printed by the same Ryerson presses, but in deference to other uniting communions the name was changed. It is the proudest boast of the present United Church Observer, with a circulation of 333,000, to be the old Guardian under another masthead.

The Christian Guardian was born out of controversy; it flourished in religious and political debate. When its battles were won, as they usually were, it continued to fight for the causes of evangelical Protestantism with a deep concern for individual liberty and social justice.

The Guardian's first ten years were so colorful, its first editor, EGERTON RYERSON, so outstanding, and the issues championed so important to Canadian political as well as ecclesiastical history, that it is tempting to concentrate on them to the neglect of the century and a quarter to follow. Moreover, the principles enunciated by Ryerson and the traditions laid down in those early days have determined policy subsequently. There is indeed such magic in Ryerson's name in the United Church that the venerable authority is not likely to be questioned.

In 1829 Canadian Methodism was in a beleaguered position. Independence from the Methodist Episcopal Church (U.S.A.) had been sought and obtained during the previous year, in part to negate the aspersions of disloyalty to which the Conference was exposed. But the Methodists were still confronted with civil disabilities, the suspicion of the colonial government, and the avowed determination of that government and the Church of England to strengthen the latter's authority over the religious, social, and educational development of the colony. Thus the Conference decided to establish a weekly paper "of a religious and moral character, to be entitled The Christian Guardian," whose function was to explain

Methodist doctrines and polity and "more especially to fight the battles . . . for equal rights and for religious equality."

To this end the Conference allocated $700 to purchase equipment and issued stock worth $2,000 as working capital. Egerton Ryerson, "the boy preacher," then twenty-six, who had already effectively defended his brethren against the onslaught of the Anglican Archdeacon of York (Toronto), was elected editor, a post which he held intermittently until 1840. As such, he kept his own accounts, performed many pastoral duties, and wrote voluminously.

Many years later Ryerson succinctly described his editorial labors:

During the first decade, . . . the characteristic work of The Guardian (apart from the spiritual work of the Church) was the defence of civil and religious liberty, the equality before the law of all religious persuasions and, by sequence, the local internal self-government of Canada by the people themselves; the establishment of an educational institution of high character upon Christian principles, without any denominational test either for professors or students; and questions of Church polity against High Church pretensions; the suppression of a democratic local rebellion, and the earnest discountenance of, and appeal against, subsequent high-handed leaders of a then ascendant party to treat and proscribe all reformers, though loyal as themselves, as enemies of their country. (Pierce, Chronicle, p. 264.)

Inevitably, Ryerson's blunt editorials and the letters which he contributed during his missions to England on behalf of his church, occasionally aroused the ire of his brethren and their followers, especially after the 1833 union with the more conservative English Wesleyans. His first successor, JAMES RICHARDSON, thought him too cautious; the second, EPHRAIM EVANS, fumed quietly over Ryerson's radicalism, occasionally delivering a deft insult such as putting one of his articles on the front page—which, because it often became tattered and splattered in the mails, was not read by one out of fifty. But, whatever the opinions of his associates, The Guardian, once described by the governor as "the only decent paper in Upper Canada," was a source of immense political, intellectual, and religious stimulus, to literate and illiterate alike in the Methodist community, and in the province generally. No Methodist was indifferent to The Guardian.

Eleven editors held the chair in succession to Ryerson and adapted the tradition which he had established to the changing circumstances of church and society. Among these, two held office for long periods, and in their respective ways, exercised great influence: E. H. DEWART, editor from 1869 to 1894 and a vigorous opponent of the 1883 union; W. B. CREIGHTON, editor from 1906 to 1925 and for eleven years thereafter editor of The New Outlook.

As persons elected by the Conference or General Conference, the editors were responsible to the Methodist Church and were expected to champion its causes. In several instances, however, The Guardian freely interpreted this function. Dewart, once a radical, became the defender of theological and institutional conservatism, and was dismissed eventually "for making the Guardian the exponent of his personal opinions rather than reflecting the judgment of the Church."

As Dewart's biographer admits, he became autocratic and intolerant in office, but fundamentally he was moved by this principle: "Let us change editors if they do not please us, but while they are editors let them reign as monarchs." He shared Ryerson's conviction that "to be the mere scribe of the opinions of others and not to write what we think ourselves, is a greater degradation of intellectual and moral character than slavery itself." The editor, he believed, should not be "an organ-grinder turning out the tunes which others have composed. The editor who will in the end render the most abiding service is he who has strong personal opinions on great questions and problems and seeks not only to express but also to form public opinion."

Among the subjects most calculated to arouse trouble for The Guardian, politics always had a high place. Ryerson's candid description of the ultra-tory as "a lordling in power, a tyrant in politics and a bigot in religion"; of the whig as similar, but moved by expediency; of the radical "as a conceited, hollow-headed declaimer" produced a fierce outcry. The culprit was obliged to move that "The Guardian shall not be the medium of discussing political questions." The prohibition was not effective, for almost a century later Creighton was described as "a most blatant Grit (Liberal)," a "most pestiferous Tory," and subsequently as a socialist.

In contrast to Ryerson and Creighton, whose political views irritated many, others found it difficult if not impossible to follow Ryerson's policy of letting the enemy have his say. WELLINGTON JEFFERS, who reigned as the editor from 1860 to 1869, seemed austere, conscious of what was due to him as a leader in ecclesiastical affairs, not easily approachable, quickly roused to anger, very certain of the correctness of his own judgments and resentful of contradiction, unwilling to conciliate his opponents, indifferent to and perhaps contemptuous of those little artifices whereby loving disciples are won from the ranks of juniors . . .

Even so, he was a great preacher and conference debater. "Jeffers is up," was a cry through the corridors that brought indifferent members of Conference back to their seats. He fought with Ryerson over secular education, whereas theologically he was a liberal, who shocked the old and cheered the young by questioning the doctrine of eternal punishment.

In contrast, W. B. Creighton, the last and one of the greatest editors of The Guardian, was an approachable person, whose voice was so poor that he rarely preached and did not enter debates. "Whether subscribers agreed with the editor or not, they never had any trouble finding out just where he stood. And in the main, while some bitterly attacked him for his boldness, the majority of his readers respected his honesty and admired his courage." If "any man had a grievance against the Editor, . . . he was reasonably certain to get his effusion printed." To him, the supporters of church union owed an immense debt, as did those who believed that the church should uphold integrity and social justice.

Creighton's years as editor marked the transition from The Guardian to The Observer, the official organ of The United Church of Canada, in which are embodied some of the characteristics of the earlier journal.

There is one thing in which modern editors differ from the earlier ones. Ryerson never liked to let anything go unanswered. It was his God-given duty to jump on errors, to destroy untruths with truth, for they might otherwise be believed, grow and spread. Consequently The Guardian was often on the defensive and engaged in major battles which were not very important. In contrast, there now seems to be a conviction that the average man can sort out truth and untruth, and weigh the serious and the famous for himself. He needs information and explanation more than opinion.

Through the nineteenth century The Guardian devoted much of its space to waging war on evil and fighting immorality—especially intemperate drinking in high places—and praising and publicizing the small works of congregations in local places. Similarly one British churchman, after reading The Observer for some years, came to the conclusion that "The United Church is full of alcoholics burning church mortgages."

Until recently it was edited chiefly for "in" churchmen. The evils of the world were condemned, but the weaknesses of the church were not re-exposed by the church's own presses. Now, however, The Observer sees itself more commonly as the loyal opposition of the church itself. The United Church, as the largest and most broadly based Protestant church in Canada, is no longer an underprivileged foe of establishment. It has its own privilege and establishment. There are many critics of the world, the flesh, and the devil outside the religious press, and inside the modern church there are image makers and public-relations experts. In this new situation the grandchild of The Guardian sees its role less as a crusading, opinion-making organ of the church, and more as a medium of information. The whole church must be armored with fact and strengthened with judgment for its crusades.

Readership is now more than ten times what it was in the most glorious days of the past. The paper goes not only to the ministers and leading laymen and Sunday school teachers, but to all sorts of indifferent members and adherents on the fringes of the congregations. The inner core is kept informed and indoctrinated with vast quantities of propaganda materials from numerous boards.

The right of the editor to express his opinion and to prophesy is even more jealously guarded than at many times through the century. Every two years he appears before the General Council to which he is responsible; and regularly he attends the meeting of the council's executive to whom he is responsible in the meantime. They may criticize, rebuke, and advise. If, however, the council presumed to instruct an editor how to do his job, or told him what to put in the paper, a self-respecting editor should resign.

But basic as is this right to prophesy is the right of the people of the church to information about their church—whether that information is bad or good. Today, as always, the editor interprets this as a right of his readers to receive information undistorted and unmanaged.

The basic editorial aim that appears to have guided good editors through the years is that the editor of a Methodist or United Church official organ should not be too official. Rather he must be responsible to the church that appoints him, and which has the right to rebuke or fire him. His responsibility and loyalty sometimes may be best discharged by being critical of the church and exposing its weaknesses.

His first duty is to let his readers know the facts about the situation in the church of Christ at home and abroad, in the nation, and in the world. But the publication does not fulfill its task simply by reporting; it needs to explain, to give background, and to advise.

The temptation of The Guardian through the years seems to have been to overestimate the interest and knowledge of its readers and underestimate their intelligence. It sometimes tried to manage their minds for what it believed was the best cause. The temptation which now has to be resisted in a large and affluent church is to become a promotion medium for fine church programs, and to manage the readers for good causes.

The principles on which The Guardian was founded still prevail. The causes of liberty, justice, and the application of the Gospel are still relevant concerns of The Guardian's descendant. In this generation the battle is not for the liberty and equal rights of the United Church, but for those who are disinherited, and discriminated against outside the United Church. Ryerson saw the Gospel as the way to flee the wrath to come. It could be interpreted now as the way to flee the wrath that is.

CHRISTIAN HERALD. A publication of the African Methodist Episcopal Church. (See AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, Publications.)

CHRISTIAN INDEX, THE, is the official publication of the C. M. E. Church and one which has had enormous influence in that denomination. It was published in Jackson, Tenn. until 1970, when the editorial and printing offices were moved to Memphis, Tenn.

The Index dates from 1867, with Samuel Watson, minister of the M. E. Church, South as founder and first editor. It is the second oldest Negro periodical in the United States, and was published more than a year prior to the organization of the C. M. E. Church.

At the first General Conference the paper was adopted as the official organ of the denomination, and Samuel Watson was elected editor. At a called session of the General Conference in March 1873, E. B. Martin was elected editor. In September of that year, Martin resigned and J. W. Bell became editor. His editorial career was quite brief, and in January 1874, Alexander Austin was made editor. Austin served only six months, and then W. P. Churchill, who was serving as book agent of the publishing interests, assumed the editorship. At the General Conference in Louisville, Ky., in August 1874, Churchill was elected editor and served until the General Conference met in Jackson, Tenn. in 1878, at which time C. W. Fitzhugh was elected editor.

Fitzhugh vacated the editorship in June 1881, and W. T. Thomas succeeded him. When the General Conference met in Washington, D. C. in 1882, Thomas was retained as editor. At that General Conference it was voted that each travelling preacher and local preacher should be required to subscribe for The Christian Index.

At the General Conference of 1886 in Augusta, Ga., F. M. Hamilton was elected editor. In 1890 at the General Conference in Little Rock, Ark., Hamilton resigned, and R. T. BROWN served as editor until a meeting of the General Board in 1893, at which time M. F. Jamison, then serving as secretary of the Church Extension Department, was made editor.

Following Jamison, editors have been: C. H. PHILLIPS, 1894-1902; R. T. Brown, 1902-11; A. J. Cobb, 1911-14; J. A. HAMLETT, 1914-22; G. C. Parker, 1922-34; J. C. Colclough, 1934-38; LUTHER STEWART, 1938-46; E. P. MURCHISON, 1946-58; N. S. CURRY, 1958-62; M. C. Merriweather, 1962-66; and the present editor, John M. Exum, who was elected in 1966.

It can be seen in the early years of the paper that the many changes in editorship might indicate something of the travail of spirit the paper had in its struggle for existence. Nevertheless, it has had a continuous unsuspending record of publication, and celebrated its centennial in 1967.

As the official organ of the church, The Index has been the symbol of the unity of the denomination. It has always served as a champion for free speech and the free exchange of ideas and plans with regard to the program and mission of the church. It has been primarily a religious magazine, has even courted criticism, and is always striving for peace and unity, never compromising in its stand for right and righteousness. The record shows that its editorials have been timely and relevant, interpreting to its readers important news of the denomination and the world. The Christian Index has been a member of the Associated Church Press for more than fifty years.

CHRISTIAN LIBRARY, JOHN WESLEY'S, consisted of fifty volumes published between 1749 and 1755. It contained "Extracts from, and Abridgments of, the Choicest Pieces of Practical Divinity," and included works of the early fathers and Catholic and Protestant divines, especially of the Puritans. The series is one of the best examples of Wesley's passion for abridgment and his desire that his preachers and people should read widely. (See also DEVOTION, THE LIFE AND LITERATURE OF.)

CHRISTIAN MASS MOVEMENTS. (See INDIA.)

CHRISTIAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH is a Negro body of American Methodism which was originally organized under the name Colored Methodist Episcopal Church. Its history and work give it a distinguished place in American Methodism.

At the beginning of the Civil War, the M. E. Church, South had approximately 207,000 Negro members. These were allowed to have their own meetings, with restrictions. Because of dissatisfaction and demoralization, many of these left to join Negro Methodist bodies already established, or to unite with the Northern Church. As a result, the Negro membership in the Southern Church had dwindled to about 78,000 by the end of the war.

The Negro members sent a commission to the GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church, South, meeting in NEW ORLEANS in 1866, mandated to express their needs and wishes for a separate organization of their own. It is notable that the Negro members did not rebel as others did, but sought a legal and constitutional separation. This caused criticism from their fellow Negroes. The General Conference appointed a committee to consider the request.

In 1870, the next session of the General Conference decided to provide for the organization of the Negroes into a separate body of Methodism if they so desired. Property held by trustees of the M. E. Church, South for use of the colored members was to be turned over to them; five annual conferences were organized among the Negro members, and these expressed their desire for status as an independent ecclesiastical body.

On Dec. 15, 1870, the first General Conference of the new organization was held at JACKSON, Tenn., and was presided over by Bishops ROBERT PAINE and HOLLAND N. McTYEIRE of the mother group. The minutes of the General Conference of the M. E. Church, South were read, stating the request of the Negro members and indicating its willingness to assist. Steps were then taken to secure the new body. A secretary and an assistant were elected. The name Colored Methodist Episcopal Church was chosen. Committees were appointed, a publishing house created, and THE CHRISTIAN INDEX established as the official organ of the denomination. The body adopted the DISCIPLINE of the mother church, with certain necessary changes, and its own doctrinal statements. Nine annual conferences were created, and funds to be raised by each were assigned.

Elected to the office of bishop were WILLIAM HENRY MILES of KENTUCKY and RICHARD H. VANDERHORST of SOUTH CAROLINA, who were duly consecrated by Bishops Paine and McTyreire. The next General Conference was set for 1874, or at the call of the bishops.

Bishop Vanderhorst died shortly, and the work became too heavy for Bishop Miles. The second General Conference was called and met on March 19, 1873, at Trinity Church in AUGUSTA, Ga. Here the first EPISCOPAL ADDRESS was delivered by Bishop Miles, in which he outlined the future work of the denomination. His recommendations were adopted, and the educational, missionary, and publication work was put into operation. At this conference ISAAC LANE, LUCIUS H. HOLSEY, and JOSEPH A. BEEBE were elected and consecrated bishops.

The third General Conference was held in 1874 in LOUISVILLE, Ky., and much progress was reported. Fifteen annual conferences had been organized. There were 600 travelling preachers and 75,000 members. The greatest hindrance was the lack of a trained clergy. Two important plans were made at this session: first, for a school to train clergy and laity; second, for assessments to pay the salaries of the bishops.

Discouragement plagued the meeting of the fourth General Conference in 1878 at Jackson, Tenn. Plans for an educational institution had failed, and the publishing house and The Christian Index were not self-supporting. A lack of financial resources pervaded the general work of the church. Steps were taken to correct the note of discouragement. The next General Conference, meeting in Augusta, Ga. in 1882, required all clergy to subscribe to The Index as a means of making it financially secure. It was at this meeting that the work of the church took on its departmental form. In 1886 the General Conference took great measures in the field of education. It organized PAINE COLLEGE in Augusta, Ga.; LANE COLLEGE in Jackson, Tenn.; PHILLIPS COLLEGE in Tyler, Texas; HAYGOOD SEMINARY in Washington, Ark.; and two schools at Booker City and Tuscaloosa, Ala. Relations were also established with other Methodist bodies.

The C.M.E. Church continued to receive help, financial and otherwise, from the members of the M. E. Church, South. This was especially true in regard to its educational work and Lane and Paine Colleges. Expansion was made into the north and west with the establishment of mission annual conferences, as Negroes migrated in that direction.

In 1910 the General Conference revised the Discipline and improved the ministerial course of study. The period from 1910 to 1914 was one of division, confusion, and dissatisfaction, and was marked by the death of many of its clerical leaders. An appellate court was created in 1914 for the trial of clergy. The Woman's Missionary Council was officially recognized by the General Conference in 1918, and has ever since been active in the work of missions and education.

At the meeting of the General Conference in 1954, the denomination recognized the inconsistency which existed between the racial designation in its name and the message of Christian principles. A recommendation was therefore passed to change the name to Christian Methodist Episcopal Church, or to some other name with the same initials. The change became official on Jan. 3, 1956, after a vote by the annual conferences, and the name Christian Methodist Episcopal Church was assumed by the group.

The work of the C.M.E. Church is maintained by boards or departments, each presided over by a bishop assigned as chairman by the College of Bishops. General secretaries of these departments are elected every four years by the General Conference. Missionary work consists of building churches and supporting mission fields. The church extension division assists in building church plants and in the paying of building debts. The publishing house was moved from Jackson to MEMPHIS, Tenn. in 1970, and continues to operate, and The Christian Index is still the official publication, to which has been added The Eastern Index. Women channel their work primarily through the Woman's Missionary Council. Collins Chapel Connectional Hospital in Memphis, Tenn. is maintained for the treatment of its clergy and laity at a minimal cost. A school for the training of nurses is operated there. In the area of Christian education, Sunday schools are held, youth are organized, and leadership training is conducted.

It is in the field of higher education that the C.M.E. Church has distinguished herself. Six major institutions are now operated: Paine College, Augusta, Ga.; TEXAS COLLEGE, Tyler, Texas; Lane College, Jackson, Tenn.; MILES COLLEGE, Birmingham, Ala.; Mississippi Industrial College, Holly Springs, Miss.; Phillips School of Theology, Atlanta, Ga., on the campus of the Interdenominational Theological Seminary. Of these institutions, two are of historic importance. Paine College is the result of a joint effort of the C.M.E. Church and the M. E. Church, South, for the education of Negro youth. Its trustees, officials, and faculty are of both races. The college stands as a tribute to a successful experiment in bi-racial cooperation. Lane College was founded largely by the efforts of Bishop Isaac Lane, who nursed it through periods of discouragement and defeat. It is a memorial to the desire of the members of the denomination for the education of their race through institutions of learning in spite of great obstacles including the lack of financial resources.

The C.M.E. Church has been an active participant in world-wide ecumenical and interdenominational movements. Church leaders have joined with Protestants and Catholics in interfaith dialogue and fraternalism to express the oneness in Jesus Christ. Delegates have been sent to such worldwide meetings as the World Sunday School Convention in London, England in 1889, and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

The church has a long record of service and participation in the FEDERAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES created in 1908, and its successor, the NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES created in 1950. The AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY, the World Council of Christian Education, the Home Missions Council, and the National Fraternal Council of Churches are among the many interdenominational groups receiving financial support from the C.M.E. Church.

There was a delegation from the C.M.E. Church at the First ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE in London, England in 1881. Delegates have been active in the eleven subsequent conferences of this world-wide body of Methodism.

In 1967 the C.M.E. Church joined the current CONSULTATION ON CHURCH UNION. This is a concrete example of the church's continuing concern to work toward the building of broken humanity into oneness in Jesus Christ. (See also NEGRO METHODIST UNION NEGOTIATIONS.)

RALPH G. GAY

CHRISTIAN PERFECTION is a term used by Methodists to denote a state of GRACE characterized by a heart cleansed from sin and filled with perfect love. JOHN WESLEY describes it as "loving God with all our heart, mind, soul, and strength," and continues by saying "This implies that no wrong temper, none contrary to love remains in the soul; and that all the thoughts, words and actions are governed by pure love." (Works, XI, 394) Elsewhere he writes, "Entire sanctification, or Christian perfection, is neither more nor less than pure love; love expelling sin, and governing the heart and life of a child of God." (Letters, V, 223) This is usually regarded as one of Methodism's most distinctive doctrines. For Wesley the doctrine of Christian perfection is the essential heart of Methodism and the chief thing for which it stands. In 1790, a year before his death, he wrote that Christian perfection is "the grand depositum which God has lodged with the people called Methodists; and for the sake of propagating this chiefly He appeared to have raised us up." (Letters, VIII, 238) This doctrine has had a large place in the history of Methodism, and is the major emphasis of many of the denominations which are offshoots of Methodism.

While this doctrine is characteristic of Methodism, Wesley's teaching on this subject has not always been correctly understood and interpreted. Indeed, many interpretations foreign to traditional Methodist teaching have abounded. The doctrine of Wesley, JOHN FLETCHER, and other Methodist "spokesmen" has not claimed any perfection which is not subject to the limitations of human life. The Christian is never immune to mistakes caused by ignorance or infirmities. Moreover, a spiritual experience which admits of no further growth is foreign to traditional Methodist teaching. It is also incorrect to assume that Wesley teaches that the faith of any one moment secures a lifetime state of sanctification or perfection. Nor does Methodism teach that Christian perfection consists of merely being sincere, or of the utmost in human endeavor. These factors are implied; but Christian perfection is a gift of God, resulting from grace alone.

Methodism does not teach that Christian perfection is a state of freedom from temptation and probation. It is not "sinless perfection." Wesley rejects this term as being less than accurate because of mistakes and defects in the performance of the best Christians. Nevertheless, Wesley does not regard mistakes and acts less-than-absolutely-perfect to be sin, because they do not involve man's will. In this regard, it is necessary to understand Wesley's view of sin. He regards sin as "a willful transgression of a known law of God." (Works, XII, 394) This view of sin does not properly regard "mistakes" of ignorance, bodily infirmity, etc., as sin. While some traditions within Christendom regard any act which falls short of absolute conformity to God's will as sin, Wesley does not. However, he is realistic enough to recognize that the involuntary transgressions of the best men continually need the atonement. Because all Christians are liable to these involuntary "transgressions" Wesley states, "sinless perfection is a phrase I never use." (Works, XI, 396)

Yet, while Methodism does not teach that man can become infinite or absolutely perfect, Methodism has taught that man may be a partaker of God's nature (2 Peter 1:4) and that man may share in God's holiness (Hebrews 12:10). That is, in some measure the Christian may reflect God's nature as Christ is formed within him.

Wesley differs from some traditions within the Christian church in that he holds that Christian perfection, sometimes called "entire sanctification," is a separate work from that of regeneration, and distinct from the NEW BIRTH. Wesley writes, "... the new birth is not the same with sanctification . . . This is a part of sanctification, not the whole; it is the gate to it, the entrance into it." (Works, VI, 74) The regenerate Christian is a babe in Christ and by no means is fully grown. The process of maturing Wesley calls sanctification. While the young Christian is forgiven, and set apart for the service of God as a member of His kingdom, he is not yet "entirely sanctified." Though justified, he still has ORIGINAL SIN which is the source of all sinful acts. Thus there is a tension in his Christian life. (Luther describes this as being at once righteous in Christ and sinful in oneself; and teaches that this tension must remain until death.) Wesley believes that a deeper work of God's grace, entire sanctification, is available for all Christians. This deeper work of grace removes original sin and brings the believer into a life of holiness, or Christian perfection. The "perfect" Christian loves God supremely and is enabled to avoid any intentional violation of God's commandments of which he is aware. To be sure, the most mature Christian needs daily to pray, "Forgive us our trespasses" because his perfection is not absolute and his deeds are continually subject to mistakes and errors of judgment. Thus there is always a place for "growth in grace."

Wesley regards Christian perfection as both gradual and instantaneous. It is gradual in that the Holy Spirit may take time to prepare the heart for a dwelling place for God, and it is "instant" when the sanctifying work is actually consummated. Wesley declares, "Although we may by the Spirit, mortify the deeds of the body," resist and conquer both outward and inward sin; although we may weaken our enemies day by day; yet we cannot drive them out. By all the grace which is given at justification we cannot extirpate them. Though we watch and pray ever so much, we cannot wholly cleanse either our hearts or hands. Most sure we cannot, till it please our Lord to speak to our hearts again, to speak the second time, "Be clean;" and then the leprosy is cleansed. Then only the evil root, the carnal mind, is destroyed; and inbred sin subsists no more." (Standard Sermons, II, 390-91) Sanctification is contrasted with justification. The latter is an act described in forensic terms, indicating what God does for man when man's sins are forgiven and he is pardoned by God's grace. Christian perfection, or entire sanctification, completes the inward change wrought in regeneration, and is what God does in man by way of the impartation of grace which effects a real change in man's nature.

At this point Wesley differs from Luther and the Reformers. Luther and many of the other Reformers regard perfection as only a perfection of faith. That is, the believer can never be made actually righteous; he may only be accounted so. This is the doctrine of imputed righteousness. While Methodism does embrace a doctrine of imputed righteousness, she also teaches the doctrine of imparted righteousness; that is, by the grace of God man can actually be made righteous. Christian perfection is the power of the indwelling Christ to transform the nature of man so that he is enabled to do God's will.

As to the nature of this righteousness, it is both positive and negative. Negatively, the believer is cleansed from sin; and positively, his heart is filled with love. Traditional Methodism has taught that Christian perfection brings freedom from "evil thoughts and tempers," affirming that one may be delivered from original sin. On occasion Wesley's enthusiasm for the holy life, which results from the full indwelling of Christ, led him to make statements which some have felt tended to shift the emphasis from Christ to the Christian or his "experience of grace." However, Wesley teaches that any righteous act is the result of Christ's indwelling presence, and is not to be sought as an end in itself. Any concern for perfect acts which fails to keep a continuous relationship with Christ central is not characteristic of Wesley's teaching. Christian perfection is given to man by God's grace and it should never be separated from the indwelling Christ. It is not a property of man, it is the continuous gift of God. Christian perfection is possible only as the Christian, moment by moment, depends upon Christ and His work. At any time Christian perfection may be forfeited by unbelief.

Christian perfection is full devotion to Christ which is to be expressed in every act. Wesley emphasizes the element of devotion more than that of performance, the former being the central element of his teaching. Wesley does not reach absolute perfection; he teaches a perfection of love. The question arises as to whether it is possible to fulfill the law of love perfectly. Wesley teaches that Christian perfection enables a Christian to fulfill this standard insofar as his motives and actions are prompted by God's indwelling love. By divine grace a Christian can be enabled to keep the law of love. In this area he may be said to be "perfect." The mistakes and defects in performance which are the natural result of human infirmity do not allow the Christian to fulfill, in an absolute degree, every command of God. But this imperfect performance is a result of "mistakes and human infirmities," not wrong motives. Wesley observes, "A thousand infirmities are consistent even with the highest degree of holiness, which is no other than pure love, an heart devoted to God, one design and one desire." (Letters, V, 6) The Christian is not able to fulfill absolutely every commandment in the highest way and in a perfect manner, as would an unfallen man. But Christ does not require a perfect degree of performance as a requisite for salvation. The Christian is to live under the law of faith. Faith working by love is all that God requires of man. Love is the end of the commands of God. This love includes loving God with all our heart, mind, soul, and strength; and our neighbor as ourself. God's law is fulfilled in a relative and subjective sense. The principal characteristic of Christian perfection is perfect love. When Wesley was asked if he had ever seen a perfect Christian who was free from sin, he responded that in the sense in which he used the word he had seen hundreds.

The nature and limitations of language have necessitated the use of such terms as "slay," "erase," "root-out," "consume," "remove," "take away," "destroy," etc., particularly in the hymns of CHARLES WESLEY. These terms have caused some to interpret Wesley as teaching that sin is a "material thing" or an "entity" to be substantialized. However often the Wesleys and others may have seemed to substantialize sin, in actual fact they did not do so. Such verbs as "destroy" are meant to be descriptive; they are not to be taken literally. The sinful nature is "enmity against God," and this implies that sin is an improper relationship to God, not a thing or a substance. Wesley insists, "Nothing is sin, strictly speaking but a voluntary transgression . . ." (Works, XII, 394) That is, sin is a wrong relationship to God. Christian perfection does not imply the removal of a substance but rather the redirection and reorientation of the affections and will so that one's love is "perfect" toward God and man.

Christian perfection is not solitary or mystical, it is practical. Methodism has always emphasized social concern and action. Perfect love is a gift given for the purpose of serving one's fellowman. Wesley insisted that there is no holiness but social holiness, and to turn religion into a solitary state is to destroy it. True religion, says Wesley, is "faith working by love." (Explanatory Notes Upon the New Testament, London, 1950 ed., p. 862.)

An enduring testimony of Methodist teaching on Christian perfection is seen in the hymns of Charles Wesley. Charles was at one with his brother John in stressing man's call to sanctity. Charles Wesley's hymns are sung wherever Methodists gather for worship. Indeed, many of them have permanently found their way into the hymnody of Christendom. Wesley quotes his brother's and his own verses as determinative for Methodist doctrine in his Plain Account of Christian Perfection (final ed. 1777, Works, XI, pp. 354-55), to show that since his early days in SAVANNAH he had not changed his attitude as to the ideal for the Christian life. "In the beginning of the year 1738, as I was returning from (Savannah), the cry of my heart was,

O grant that nothing in my soul
May dwell, but thy pure love alone!
O may thy love possess me whole,
My joy, my treasure, and my crown!
Strange fires far from my heart remove;
My every act, word, thought, be love!

In 1739 my brother and I published—

Eager for thee I ask and pant,
So strong the principle divine,
Carries me out with sweet constraint,
Till all my hallowed soul be thine;
Plunged in the Godhead's deepest sea,
And lost in thine immensity!

To these might well be added the lines which accompany them in Wesley's Hymns.

I want the Spirit of power within,
Of love, and of a healthful mind;
Of power, to conquer inbred sin,
Of love, to thee and all mankind,
Of health, that pain and death defies,
Most vigorous when the body dies.
(Poetical Works, 1, 307.)

Representative Methodist theologians traditionally have insisted with Wesley that this doctrine is not a "Methodist invention," but that it is well supported in Scripture and in the history of Christian thought. It may be fairly claimed that the Scriptures do not teach the necessity of willful transgression of God's commands. Indeed the central theme of the Gospel is the redemption of man from sin. John Fletcher, sometimes styled "the systematic theologian of the Evangelical Revival," points out that the term "perfection" has always had a legitimate place in thought and language. He shows, for example, that the word "Trinity" never occurs in the Bible, but the word "perfection" with its derivatives occurs as frequently as most words in the Scriptures, and not seldom in the same sense in which Wesley and himself use it. (Fletcher's Works, VI, 127)

Wesley insisted that his teaching on Christian perfection was Scriptural. He declares, "I therein build on no authority, ancient or modern, but the Scripture. If this supports any doctrine, it will stand; if not, the sooner it falls the better. Neither the doctrine in question [Christian perfection] nor any other is anything to me, unless it be the doctrine of Christ and His Apostles." (Letters, III, 157)

WILLIAM E. SANGSTER in his study of Wesley's doctrine of perfection, The Path to Perfection, pp. 37-52, outlines some thirty principal texts which Wesley and others have used as a basis for this doctrine. (Ezek. 36:25, 26, 29; Matt. 5:8, 48, 6:10; Rom. 2:29, 12:1; I Cor. 3:17 f., 7:1; Gal. 2:20; Eph. 3:14-21, 5:26, 27; Phil. 3:15; I Thess. 5:23; Titus 2:11-14; Heb. 6:1, 7:25, 10:14; John 8:34, 17:20-23; I John 1:5, 7, 8, 9, 2:6, 3:3, 8-10; James 1:4) Wesley, and the other leaders of the Evangelical Awakening who preached this doctrine, felt themselves to be within the basic framework of the tradition of the Christian Church. For example, the Anglican Book of Common Prayer offers this petition: "Cleanse the thoughts of our hearts by the inspiration of thy Holy Spirit, that we may perfectly love thee, and worthily magnify thy holy name."

The Old and New Testaments teach that man can be and should be pleasing to God. Nowhere does the Bible caution against expecting too much as a result of divine grace working in the heart of man. But there are frequent exhortations in the Scriptures urging the Christian not to fall short in his expectation of, and experience of, the deliverance from sin. Wesley, and those in his tradition, insist that the only standard for the Christian life must be the Scriptures. Methodism teaches that man's lower standard of attainment must never be substituted for God's higher standard which through grace is possible for all men. Christians may pray with expectation, "Hallowed be Thy name; Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven." (Matthew 6:10) (For later theological developments and controversies see HOLINESS and HOLINESS MOVEMENTS.)

CHRISTIAN STEWARDSHIP ORGANIZATION (British). Interest in this subject within British Methodism began in 1959 when the Conference appointed a special committee to study how the principles of Christian STEWARDSHIP could be implemented in the life of the church. On the committee's recommendation, the 1960 Conference established the Christian Stewardship Organization, charging it to engage in an educational program in Christian stewardship, and, when requested, to promote campaigns within the connection. The organization has been integrated with the Department of Connexional Funds and has a ministerial secretary. It has achieved considerable success in mobilizing for the service of the church latent resources of time, talents, and money.

CHRISTIAN YOUTH MOVEMENT, METHODIST, in New Zealand, has its origins in the autonomous Young Women's and Young Men's BIBLE CLASS MOVEMENTS which were a feature of the church's youth program since 1904. In 1939, these movements were coordinated in the C.Y.M.M. administered by the Youth Board of the Conference.

The C.Y.M.M. embraces all young people in the Church from cradle roll to the senior youth groups, and as such emphasizes the unity of the church's family. Effective membership in the C.Y.M.M. begins when a young person in early teens graduates from Sunday school to Bible classes.

The first national officers of the C.Y.M.M. were appointed in 1959, and this was seen as the first step toward a self-governing youth movement.

An unusual and important feature of C.Y.M.M. is the Order of St. Stephen. This order provides members of the movement with the opportunity of giving a year's full-time unpaid service to the church. Candidates serve where the church considers they can best be used. At the end of the year they are admitted as members of the order.

Office assistance, carpentering, pastoral and youth work are some of the fields in which this service has been given. In the early 1960's the work of the Youth Department was broadened and renamed the Department of Christian Education.

CHRISTLICHE BOTSCHAFTER, DER, the official church paper of the Evangelische Gemeinschaft (EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION), was authorized by the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1835, following a period of heated opposition. Opponents felt that a church paper might make the denomination proud and worldly-minded and too much importance might be attached to literary attainment. Some suggested that no periodical could hope to be better than the Bible anyway. One rule stipulated that 700 subscriptions must be secured before the monthly paper could be released. This guarantee was obtained prior to the first issue, dated January, 1826, by a denomination that numbered about 7,000 adherents. Later it was issued semi-monthly and then weekly.

Religious papers were not usual among German churches, and Der Christliche Botschafter was one of the first German church papers to be published in the United States. At the time of its demise in 1946, it was the oldest German-language religious periodical in America. The Evangelical Association learned to know itself better through this paper, as it served as a medium for reporting events, announcing circuit and conference activities, deaths and other events of interest as well as through religious articles. ADAM ETTINGER, the first editor, continued to serve the York Circuit which was some distance from New Berlin, Pa., where the publishing house was located. After a year he resigned and was succeeded by WILLIAM ORWIG, who later became a bishop.

When the publishing house was moved in 1854 to Cleveland, Ohio, the Botschafter, as it was fondly called, was published in that city. Throughout the nineteenth century it exerted a strong influence upon the Evangelical Association. However, with the change from German to English which was effected in many churches of the denomination, the English paper, Evangelical Messenger, first issued in 1848, became more influential. The first World War sounded the death knell for the German language within the church. Der Christliche Botschafter, issued from Harrisburg, Pa. after 1934, struggled along until the time of union with the United Brethren in Christ. After 111 years of service to the church it was discontinued in January 1947.

CHRISTLICHE VEREINSBUCHHANDLUNG, Zürich, Switzerland, is the publishing house of the SWITZERLAND Annual Conference. Up to 1889 the Methodist ministers working in Switzerland sold books and distributed tracts sent from the Traktathaus, the Methodist publishing house in BREMEN, GERMANY. This took such effort that in 1890 a book shop was opened in ZÜRICH, Hans Jakob Breiter being the first book agent. At the 1892 conference of the M. E. Church in Switzerland, it was resolved to establish a regular publishing society with a book shop bearing the name "Christliche Vereinsbuchhandlung." The printing office in Bremen remained the property of both conferences, the Germany Annual Conference and the Switzerland Annual Conference. The first manager in Zürich was C. A. Schmidtmann.

During the same year the present and quite representative building was erected at Badenerstrasse 69 in a good commercial location. The new book shop attracted more and more people. Printing facilities were installed. In 1894 the first issue of the Schweizer Evangelist was published. It is still the official weekly paper of the Methodist Church in Switzerland. The printing and editing of religious tracts was and is one of the specialties of the house. Yearly there are three million copies issued.

In 1936 the Gotthelf Verlag, a private religious editing firm, was taken over and thus a new impulse given to the editing of religious and general literature. By adding new branches the religious influence of the publishing house was increased. Today there are three book shops in Zürich and one each in Winterthur, Biel, and Wädenswil.

Under the able direction of Ernst Ryser, the present manager of the publishing firm and conference lay leader of the Swiss Methodist Church, sixty employees endeavor to make the Christliche Vereinsbuchhandlung an institution by which the good news of Jesus Christ, the Savior of mankind, is spread throughout the country.

CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE, THE, was the conference which organized the Methodist Episcopal Church in America in 1784. It is commonly called the Christmas Conference because it met during the Christmas season of that year. The conference was called at the instance of FRANCIS ASBURY and agreed to by THOMAS COKE after their first meeting in BARRATT'S CHAPEL, Delaware, Nov. 14 of that year. The Journals of Coke, Asbury, EZEKIEL COOPER, and THOMAS WARE, and further accounts by FREEBORN GARRETTSON and others, describe in detail many important events connected with the importance of the Conference and its activities. These may be referred to, as well as all histories of American Methodism, for a complete evaluation of this supremely important meeting.

Whatever may have been the intention of John Wesley regarding the founding of a church in the newly freed colonies—and most American authorities feel that he did intend to found a church—he did not look for the calling or creation of an American governing conference. "Wesley never intended to originate an American General Conference," states BISHOP TIGERT, ". . . upon this fact proper historical emphasis has not, as yet, been placed." Francis Asbury, however, while surprised "and shocked" at the news which Coke brought him that Mr. Wesley intended him to be ordained as a superintendent immediately, demurred against accepting such an ORDINATION unless and until the American preachers themselves should elect him to such a position. He realized that a superintendency transferred to him by John Wesley's fiat alone would not be sufficient to control and manage the growing Methodist connection in America. "If the preachers unanimously choose me, I shall not act in the capacity I have hitherto done, by Mr. Wesley's appointment." Coke was surprised at Asbury's hesitation and demurrage, but agreed to the calling of a conference. Freeborn Garretson was sent out immediately "like an arrow" to call such a conference to meet in BALTIMORE on Christmas Eve, 1784.

On December 17, four of the founding fathers of the Methodist Church in America—Asbury, Coke, WHATCOAT, and VASEY—gathered at PERRY HALL, twelve miles or so from Baltimore, for a week of planning. "We began to prepare for our conference," Whatcoat wrote, "and to consider some of our rules and minutes as necessary to the helping forward of the Lord's work in our connection." Asbury's and Coke's Journals both deal with the Perry Hall meetings also.

On Friday, the 24th, the group rode into Baltimore to the place set at LOVELY LANE CHAPEL, down near the harbor. Coke said that "near sixty" preachers were present. NICHOLAS SNETHEN is said to have estimated "three score or more." No one knows exactly how many were in the Christmas Conference, but somewhere between sixty and seventy is the usual estimate.

The Christmas Conference took epochal action. First and foremost it organized a church: "We agreed to form a Methodist Episcopal Church" states the Journal of Thomas Ware. The name "Episcopal" is said to have been suggested by JOHN DICKINS.

Pursuant to this plan, the conference elected Asbury to be a superintendent, and received Coke as such also. Twelve of the ministers were elected "ELDERS" by the conference—a term Wesley substituted in place of "priests" in the Forms of Ordination he sent over. These men were ordained as such during the conference sessions. Asbury seems to have been ordained a deacon, an elder, and a superintendent upon three successive days with Wesley's abridgment of the Ordinal of the Church of England used as a ritual. The like ceremony has been so used ever since in American Methodism. (See Ritual.)

The conference received and formally adopted an abridgment of the English Book of Common Prayer, which Wesley called The Sunday Service, which was intended to be a strong connective bond and guiding symbol. The question and answer here are historic:

"Ques. 3: As the ecclesiastical, as well as civil, forces of these United States have passed through a very considerable change by the Revolution, what plan of church government shall we hereafter pursue?"

"Ans. We will form ourselves into an Episcopal Church under the direction of superintendents, elders, deacons, and helpers, according to the Forms of Ordination annexed to our Liturgy and the form of Discipline set forth in these Minutes."

The mention of Minutes in the above citation indicates that already the American fathers were building their own kind of organizational DISCIPLINE, which was destined to become all inclusive and all directive in the ongoing of the church. In fact, the guiding book of American Methodism in a short while came to be known as the Discipline, as The Sunday Service was discarded within the next eight years.

The Christmas Conference ran apparently until January

2 or 3, as "immediately after the conference," on January 3, Asbury and Coke are reported as drawing up a plan for a proposed college which was to be built at Abingdon, Md., and made plans for raising funds for the school.

The Christmas Conference cannot be considered exactly a General Conference in the sense in which that term came to be applied later, certainly by 1792. The 1784 Conference was, however, "general" in that all the preachers who could find their way to Baltimore were summoned to and members of it, and the entire sovereignty of American Methodism was taken over by the Christmas Conference as it proceeded to organize itself and its people as a Church. While it acknowledged Wesley's leadership and formally agreed to be subject to him, the truth is—and soon became clear—that the sovereignty had moved from England to America. That sovereignty rested no longer in the Founder of Methodism, nor in the superintendents elected on the American side, but in the body of all the traveling preachers who were in full connection with each other and the new church in American Methodism. In fact, three years later, when Wesley sent Coke over with a request that Richard Whatcoat be elected a bishop, the Conference of 1787 refused, and struck out of the Minutes the declaration of the Christmas Conference that they should obey Wesley in his leadership. This is known as "striking Mr. Wesley's name off the Minutes"—but this of course was three years later.

When the Christmas Conference adjourned, it had organized a church; named such church; elected its superintendents; ordained a ministry; accepted a liturgy; and went forward from that time "conquering and to conquer" as one authority expressed it. CHRISTOPHER, RALPH GRIFFIN (1787-1839), American pioneer minister and one of the four original PRESIDING ELDERS of the ALABAMA CONFERENCE established in 1832, was born Oct. 10, 1787, near Boyd's Ferry, Va., in Hanover County. In 1805 or 1806, he was converted under Britton Capel in Abbeville District, S. C., and in 1808, he joined the Methodists at Burke's Camp Ground in Greene County, Ga. He joined the SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE in 1810 and served until 1821 when he located and began to practice medicine. In 1822 Christopher married Anne Tilman Chiles. The next year he moved near Greensboro, Ala., where he organized the Greensboro Church.

In 1830 he joined the MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE which then served Alabama. He was the presiding elder of the Coosa District when the Alabama Conference was formed in 1832. In 1835 he superannuated, but in 1837 he was appointed Conference Agent to aid in raising supplies to build parsonages. In 1838 he was appointed to Livingston, Ala., and in 1839 he was supernumerary at Winchester, Miss. Christopher died Oct. 13, 1839, and was buried at CHUBB, JAMES (1749-1826), born in St. Germans, Cornwall, England, on Feb. 2, 1749, was converted in 1774 during a Christmas LOVEFEAST at St. Austell. He met with hostility at home, but became a Methodist class leader, and occasionally served as a LOCAL PREACHER. In 1778 he entered the Excise service at Liskeard, whence he went to Plymouth Dock for the first time to hear JOHN WESLEY preach. His duties took him to many parts of the country, especially in South Wales, but in 1784 he came to BRISTOL. Here he found both a wife (Elizabeth Wensley) and a fruitful sphere of influence. He became a leading member of the NEW ROOM. In 1786 he was instrumental in founding the STRANGERS' FRIEND SOCIETY in Bristol—a society strongly supported by Wesley, which continues to carry out a useful ministry to the poor, its headquarters again in Wesley's New Room. Chubb also accompanied THOMAS WEBB as he begged subscriptions from house to house for building Portland Street Chapel, opened in 1792.

Like many early Methodists, Chubb faithfully kept a journal recording not only the details of his personal life, but the names of the people whom he met (including occasions when he entertained John Wesley), notes about the sermons he heard, and many artless comments which enable us to visualize the life of a devout middle class Methodist of the period. He died in retirement at Liskeard in 1826. The four volumes of his journal were secured for Methodism by Stanley Sowton, the first two being at Wesley's Cottage, Trewint, the other two at the New Room, Bristol.

KEEBLE, he entered the Wesleyan Methodist ministry in 1900, and was trained at Didsbury College, Manchester, 1901-4. He joined PETER THOMPSON'S EAST END MISSION in Stepney, London, in 1906, and devoted the rest of his life to the London poor. Chudleigh became superintendent of the East End Mission in 1919 and greatly extended it; he was a pioneer in film evangelism. He died on February 21, 1932.

CHUNG, CHOON SOO (1874-1951), third bishop of the Korean Methodist Church, was born in Tew-san-ri, North Choon Chung Province, central KOREA, Feb. 11, 1874. His early education was in the Chinese classics.

In 1904 he drifted to Wonsan where the Korean revival was starting. Soon after baptism he became a local preacher and was one of the leaders in the 1907 revival that swept the peninsula.

After study in the Methodist Bible Institute in SEOUL, he was graduated from the Methodist Seminary in 1912, and was a member of the first class of elders ordained by the M. E. Church, South in 1915.

In 1919 he was one of the thirty-three signers of Korea's famous Declaration of Independence. He held pastorates in Seoul, Songdo, Wonsan, and Pyengyang, and was presiding elder of the Choonchun and Chulwon Districts. He was one of the three Korean delegates from his denomination on the Commission which organized the Korean Methodist Church in 1930.

Elected bishop of the Korean Methodist Church by the Board of Trustees in October 1939, he filled the unexpired term of the late Bishop CHONG WOO KIM, but his brilliant record soon went into eclipse. The Japanese police set aside the church constitution in 1941, and he was named director-general of the new church organization set up on military lines with full power to suspend or dismiss any minister.

Kept in control in spite of church opposition, he sought seclusion in the Roman Catholic Church soon after the Japanese War ended. During the mass displacement of Koreans after the Chinese Communist invasion of 1950, he died in a war refugee camp on Dec. 27, 1951, and was buried not many miles from the site of his birth.

He was a prolific writer; among his best known books were The Early Methodist People (Femley-Hartly Lecture, 1948) and More About the Early Methodist People (1949). CHURCH, LOCAL. A connective body of persons who have professed their faith in Christ, have been baptized, have assumed the vows of membership in The United Methodist Church, and are associated in fellowship as a local United Methodist Church in order that they may hear the Word of God, receive the Sacraments, and carry forward the work which Christ has committed to his Church. Such a society of believers, being within The United Methodist Church and subject to its Discipline, is also an inherent part of the Church Universal, which is composed of all who accept Jesus Christ as Lord and Savior, and which in the APOSTLES CREED we declare to be the Holy Catholic Church.

A local church may be either a station, or a church on a circuit, as may be decided by the appointive power.

NORTH CENTRAL COLLEGE (D.D., 1957). He is married to the former Marietta Storey of Washington, Ill., and they have three married daughters.

He served pastorates in ILLINOIS at East Peoria, 1931-34; Villa Park, 1934-41; and Shannon, 1941-49. From 1949 to 1961 he served the ILLINOIS CONFERENCE of the E. U. B. Church as conference superintendent, and following that date to 1968 he was the Executive Secretary of the General Council of Administration.

Dr. Church has been a member of the General Board of the NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES since 1961, and has served on many of its program boards and committees. He was a delegate to the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES Assembly at New Delhi, India in 1961, and UPPSALA, Sweden in 1968. He also serves as a member of the Advisory Committee of the AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY, a director of Religion in American Life, and a director of The Minister's Life and Casualty Union.

He represented his conference as a member of the GENERAL CONFERENCES of 1950, 1954, and 1958, and was a member of most of the major program boards and agencies.

In The United Methodist Church he was elected General Secretary of the PROGRAM COUNCIL in 1968, and holds his membership in the NORTHERN ILLINOIS CONFERENCE.

CHURCH BUILDING AND LOAN FUND, New Zealand, was established by the Conference of 1882, with a capital of £10,000. Its 1966 capital was £140,000. Its object is to advance to church trusts interest-free loans to assist in the erection of churches, halls, and parsonages, and in the liquidation of debts on church property.

It is administered by a committee in Christchurch which has to approve of plans and specifications for all proposed erections of, and alterations to church buildings; sanction purchases, sales, mortgages, and leases of property; and approve of loans and grants from the funds under its control.

A given trust must qualify for a loan by having raised an amount equivalent to the sum requested by way of loan. The term of the loans is usually for ten years. No "frozen" money is held by the committee. As the money is repaid by trusts, it is immediately built into new loans. Loans are advanced only for work previously approved by the committee.

Such a large amount of interest-free loan money saves the church every year large interest payments which otherwise would have to be met.

From a subsidiary fund called the Church Sites Fund grants are made to assist in the purchase of new sites for church properties.

CHURCH CONFERENCE, ANNUAL (U.M.C.), a conference which may be held in any CHARGE, when the DISTRICT SUPERINTENDENT so authorizes at the request of the ADMINISTRATIVE BOARD of a LOCAL CHURCH. When such a conference is ordered, it is in reality the CHARGE CONFERENCE opened up to include all local church members present. The regulations governing the call and conduct of the regular charge conference apply to the Annual Church Conference when it is convened.

Traditionally an Annual Church Conference was convened in the Methodist Episcopal and Methodist Protestant Churches (before 1939) in order to have their Annual Church Conference elect officers for the year, rather than allowing such elections to remain in the QUARTERLY CONFERENCE—as the Charge Conference was then called. Many local churches which had been connected with the Methodist Episcopal Church—and practically all of them formerly connected with the Methodist Protestant Church—continued to elect their STEWARDS and TRUSTEES in this way in The Methodist Church, and not through the Quarterly Conference.

It is held by many that the election of church officers through a Church Conference, in which every member of the church votes, and not reserving such elections to the Quarterly Conference, provides a much more democratic process. The present Annual Church Conference enjoys well nigh all powers of a regular Charge Conference today—not simply electoral ones. The GENERAL CONFERENCE may be expected from time to time to change regulations affecting the rights, privileges and duties of the Annual Church Conference.

CHURCH OF ENGLAND. (See ECUMENICAL MOVEMENT.)

CHURCH EXTENSION, BOARD OF. For many years during the growth of the M. E. Church in America there was still a need for some systematic process by which feeble congregations could be assisted in the erection of churches. The English Wesleys established a CHAPEL AFFAIRS DEPARTMENT which proved of great service to them, and similar associations were being organized in other great denominations. This want in America led the GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church, in 1864, to authorize the establishment of a "Church Extension Society." This was incorporated in PENNSYLVANIA, March 13, 1865, with its central office in PHILADELPHIA, and SAMUEL Y. MONROE was its first secretary. Upon his sudden and untimely death, A. J. KYNETT, who had been a member of the General Conference, and had been active in securing the authorization of the society in the General Conference, was appointed to fill the vacancy. He was subsequently reelected "Church Extension Secretary," as he was commonly termed, for a long number of years.

In 1872 the society, as it had been, was organized into a Board of Church Extension, the members of which were to be elected quadrennially by the General Conference. The General Conference also provided that there should be collections on behalf of the Board. Special donations, and bequests came in from time to time to add to this sum. All funds were apportioned by the proper committee of the General Conference to the several annual conferences, and under the action of the respective conference committees these were distributed to the most needed churches within their territory. Local churches were stimulated to do their own part, and quite often gifts of money were made and loans advanced to local churches under stipulations that they themselves should do much, or a great part, of their own building work.

In the M. E. Church a loan fund also was provided whose capital was to be kept intact, and whose use was to be for the benefit of embarrassed churches which agreed to repay at such time and in such installments as were specified and agreed to.

Bishop MATTHEW SIMPSON stated that a large portion of the help thus granted by the loan fund was to feeble societies in the west, and to small churches among the colored people in the south. This loan fund was the recipient of a great many contributions from benevolent persons. The colorful C. C. McCABE, who became Assistant Secretary of the Board of Church Extension and in time a bishop, succeeded in raising great funds, and his battle cry, "We are building two a day," became a slogan well known over the entire church.

A similar board was created in 1882 in the M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH. A Board of Missions was created by that Church at its organization in 1845-46, but the need to assist in the building of local homeland churches called for the creation of a special agency in the Church South. Its Board of Church Extension established headquarters in the city of LOUISVILLE, Ky., eventually erecting there a large and impressive office building such as the M. E. board had put up in Philadelphia. This Board was given authority to raise and administer a loan fund also, which it was mandated to hold separate from funds raised for general distribution. Careful regulations were provided for the administration of the Board, and with changes allowed for from time to time as the years went by. In the Southern Church Board of Church Extension there was a Woman's Department of Church Extension which aided and helped in gathering funds, and whose general secretary was empowered to see that each annual conference should organize parsonage societies in the various charges.

The two respective Boards of Church Extension remained as administrative agencies of the two churches until their union in 1939 when, in the reorganization of the church, these two Boards became united under and a part of the BOARD OF MISSIONS AND CHURCH EXTENSION OF THE METHODIST CHURCH. The office buildings in the cities of Philadelphia and Louisville, with their respective staff in each, continued to remain and to administer many matters which they of necessity had to look after, while gradually bringing all their organized home mission work under the one centralized control of the Board of Missions.

In 1952 the General Conference correlated certain of its boards and agencies and the Board of Missions and Church Extension, as it had been up to that time, became simply the Board of Missions. The Church Extension work was incorporated into and taken over by the Division of National Missions of the General Board. Complete disciplinary directions have always been given regarding the composition, duties and responsibilities of these various Boards, and the current book of Discipline ought to be referred to for all matters having to do with the structure or work of such agencies.

At the union of The Methodist Church and The E.U.B. Church in 1968, an even greater co-relation was called for. In general, however, the pattern of administrative procedure as it was in The Methodist Church continued to be followed. The current Discipline of The United Methodist Church must be referred to for all legislation and organizational procedures treating of present church extension moves.

CHURCH GOVERNMENT (Church Polity). The Methodist Church has always held, with most theologians and church historians, that there is no prescribed form of church government given in scripture which must or should of necessity be followed. There are, however, general principles and facts set forth in the Bible which have given guidance to the Church in all ages. In the Mosaic economy prescribed for the Jewish Church, there was a definite type of polity which was to be followed, and this in general was followed until the time of the New Testament. But when the Christian Church came into being under the overarching leadership and guidance of the Holy Spirit, we do not find that any one special type of church government was definitely called for. An English scholar of some note stated that in the New Testament one could find Congregational, Episcopal, and Presbyterian forms of church government followed out in different places and in different ways.

JOHN WESLEY, who as a youth entertained the doctrine that EPISCOPACY was the only authorized form of church government given by Divine inspiration, very early in his public life abandoned that theory. After having read Stillingfleet, he stated that he believed the author had unanswerably proved that neither Christ nor his Apostles prescribed any particular form of church government. Wesley stated that he thought the reason for this was "without doubt because the wisdom of God had regard to this necessary variety. Was there any thought of uniformity in the government of the Churches until the time of Constantine? It is certain there was not, and would not have been then had men consulted the word of God only."

Wesley did, however, believe the episcopal form of government to be altogether in harmony with the teaching of the New Testament and the practice of the early Christian Church. In line with this view, he seems to have recommended to the Methodists in America that they adopt an episcopal form of government, since he sent to them forms for ordination for the perpetuation of a ministry of SUPERINTENDENTS, ELDERS and DEACONS which pattern was exactly (save in the names only) similar to the three-fold ministry of the Church of England. In his Preface to the Sunday Service, which incorporated these forms for ordination, he stated that he felt that the Church of England was the best constituted national church in the world. At the CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE, therefore, which received this message from Wesley, it was decided that the Methodists in America would organize an Episcopal Church and would be guided by the Liturgy (Sunday Service) sent over by John Wesley, which itself was an abridgment of the Prayer Book of the Church of England. "We agreed to form a Methodist Episcopal Church," states the Journal of THOMAS WARE, a prominent Methodist participating in the Christmas Conference. In answer to the question, "What plan of church government shall we pursue?", the answer was, "We will form ourselves into an episcopal church, under the direction of superintendents, elders, deacons and helpers according to the forms of ordination annexed to our liturgy and the form of discipline set forth in these Minutes." (Harmon's Organization, p. 16.) The Methodist Episcopal Church in America then forthwith organized, and The United Methodist Church of the present day, which is the successor and extension of the original Methodist Episcopal Church, is an episcopal church, although the polity it pursues is in some respects quite different from that pursued by other episcopal churches.

Other Methodist churches of the world, those Methodism is unimpeachable, have adopted more of a congregational or sometimes a presbyterian, rather than an episcopal form of church government. No British-based Methodism—except in Canada for a time—has ever taken bishops for its executive officers. Also, even in The United Methodist Church (U.S.A.), the presbyterian influence is quite decided, as the elders form the nucleus of all the annual conferences, and have a tremendous voice in the ongoing of the church. Congregationalism, too, expresses itself in the many ways by which a local church by congregational vote or lay representation may determine various matters of local procedure which have to do with the ongoing of its own establishment, local plans and the like.

RICHARD WATSON, the Methodist theologian, states that "all agree in admitting that there was no model prescribed in the New Testament for a Christian Church . . . and that it was a branch of the liberty of the disciples of Christ, or one of their privileges, to choose the polity which seemed to them best adapted for extending the power and influence of religion."

The United Methodist Church holds in its 22nd ARTICLE OF RELIGION that Rites and Ceremonies of Churches have always been different and "may be changed according to the diversity of countries, times, and men's manners, so that nothing be ordained against God's word." This Article goes on to say that "every particular church may ordain, change or abolish rites and ceremonies, so that all things may be done to edification." While this Article deals with rites and ceremonies particularly, something of polity is also somewhat involved in these.

Methodism has always regarded deep spirituality and the certainty of God's acceptance as of more value than forms of church polity or ritualistic procedure. It has from the beginning called with more earnestness for true piety than ever it has for any type of ceremony or form of church government. While holding firmly to its own church discipline and polity, it is ready to fellowship with and unite in holy enterprises with evangelical Christians of every name, and of every form of church government. The great ecumenical movement of the present day finds Methodism enthusiastically ready to join hands with every Christian communion in furtherance of advancing spiritual holiness over all lands.

It should not be inferred from the above that Methodist churches look upon church government or polity as being nonessential. Some sort of organized form of activity must be had if there be any corporate action at all on the part of a church or society. The Holy Club had its rules, the early Methodist societies had their General Rules and discipline, and the church itself must have its own discipline and procedures if it is to fulfill its mission. It is for every Christian to be fully persuaded in his own mind as how best he may serve God, and where a polity of proven worth has been established by any group of Christians, let that polity be respected not only by outsiders, but most of all by those who themselves when they join in its fellowship are expected to conform to it. CHURCH AND HOME, official paper of the E. U. B. Church, was the successor to The Telescope-Messenger and Our Home. It was first issued in January, 1964 as a semi-monthly, to conserve the best of the two former papers although not to be merely a combination of the same.

The Telescope-Messenger was formed at the time of union in 1946 by uniting the Religious Telescope of the United Brethren in Christ and The Evangelical-Messenger of The Evangelical Church. The first issue was released from Harrisburg, Pa. in January, 1947. It served the church effectively under its one and only senior editor, JOSEPH W. KRECKER, until December, 1963.

With the advent of The Evangelical United Brethren Church a monthly family magazine, Our Home, was inaugurated from Dayton, Ohio to promote Christian living in the homes of the church. This was a new publication, not having had any counterpart in either former denomination. Subscription rolls were never very large during its seventeen years.

Church and Home was published in Dayton, Ohio, first as a semi-monthly and later monthly. Due to an extensive promotional campaign it attained a circulation of more than 225,000 in 1966 from a membership of 750,000 persons. Krecker served as its executive editor until his retirement in 1967, when CURTIS CHAMBERS succeeded him. Its last issue was released February, 1969, when it became merged with Together magazine, following the formation of The United Methodist Church. The merged publication continued under the title Together, but a few months following the merger, Curtis Chambers became editor of the combined publication.

CHURCH METHODISTS. The last of many attempts to regard Methodism as a subordinate ally of the Church of England occurred in 1824, when MARK ROBINSON, a linen draper of Beverley, Yorkshire, put forward a scheme for making Methodism a sort of minor order within the Church of England, episcopally recognized and locally subject to the parish clergy. The scheme was reminiscent of THOMAS COKE'S LICHFIELD PLAN (1794). Receiving some unofficial Anglican support, but none from Methodism, a small society was formed, taking the title of Church Methodists, and in 1824 a chapel was opened at Cherry Burton. Beyond this rural parish, however, the movement never spread. By the time the scheme had been developed and published, the group had dwindled into nothingness. The proposals were conclusively answered by two laymen, Dr. Sandwich and Charles Welch, both of Hull, and by RICHARD WATSON in the Wesleyan Methodist Magazine of 1824.

CHURCH MUSIC SOCIETY. (See MUSIC SOCIETY, METHODIST CHURCH.)

CHURCH OF THE NAZARENE, THE, is one of the larger of the holiness bodies, as the Yearbook of American Churches terms it, in the U.S.A. It looks back to the Methodist movement for the main theme of its doctrinal emphasis.

At the 1866 CENTENNIAL celebration of Methodism in America, JOHN C. McCLINTOCK declared that CHRISTIAN PERFECTION was the central theme of the Bible. Thus, the stage was set for what historians now term the Holiness Revival of the nineteenth century. Under the able leadership of such men as RANDOLPH S. FOSTER, Methodist bishop, the renewed emphasis on the holy life reached ever-growing proportions in the Methodist Church and spread to all parts of the United States. Periodicals were founded, and the effect began to be felt in other denominations. The central concern that united the movement was the preaching of what was termed the Wesleyan doctrine of entire sanctification, which was interpreted as a second, definite, and instantaneous work of GRACE by which the believer was freed from ORIGINAL SIN and made perfect in love.

In its early stages the movement was carried along by individuals, local camp meetings and small associations. The associations grew in size and by the 1880's became the dominant influence. By 1880, however, some people felt that the older denominations were becoming so hostile to the holiness emphasis that they were compelled to withdraw. No large group ever broke away at any one time; rather, many small isolated groups and congregations sprang up all over the country. About the turn of the century these groups began to seek a wider fellowship by way of mergers. The Church of the Nazarene is the product of a set of such mergers.

PHINEAS F. BRESEE is looked upon as the founding father of the Church of the Nazarene. By 1895 this former Methodist pastor led in the organization of the First Church of the Nazarene, which superseded the Penial Mission in LOS ANGELES, where he had been preaching for a year. Coincident with Bresee's efforts, the Association of Pentecostal Churches was formed in New York. In 1896 this group united with the Central Evangelical Association representing New England. In October 1907, the Association of Pentecostal Churches and the First Church of the Nazarene merged to form the Pentecostal Church of the Nazarene. On Oct. 13, 1908, the Holiness Church of Christ united with the Pentecostal Church of the Nazarene in a joint meeting at Pilot Point, Texas, and they retained the name of the latter group. This date is accepted as the official beginning of the Church of the Nazarene. In 1915 the Pentecostal Church of Scotland united with the Pentecostal Church of the Nazarene.

In 1919 the word "Pentecostal" was dropped to avoid confusion with the "tongues" sects. During the years other groups have united with the Church of the Nazarene, including the Laymen's Holiness Association (1922); the International Holiness Mission, an English group (1952); the Calvary Holiness Church, also English (1955); and the Gospel Workers Church of Canada (1958).

The Church of the Nazarene, which keeps in essence JOHN WESLEY'S ARTICLES OF RELIGION and GENERAL RULES, looks upon itself as firmly Wesleyan in doctrine and practice. They have, however, added statements beyond Wesley on the plenary inspiration of scripture, regeneration, entire sanctification, divine healing, and eschatology, and have changed completely Wesley's article on the Church. Their major emphasis is upon the "second blessing" of entire sanctification and the personal holiness of the believer.

Organization. Government in the groups which formed the Church of the Nazarene was of all types: congregational, representative, and episcopal. The final outcome was a representative government. The highest law-making body is the general assembly, which is composed equally of ministerial and lay delegates elected by the district assemblies. A general board, elected by the general assembly, has oversight of specialized general assembly concerns: evangelism, missions, publications, education and ministerial benevolences. The general assembly, presided over by the general superintendents who are elected quadrennially, has final authority in all matters, except changes in the constitution. Such changes must also be voted upon by the district assemblies. The district assembly orders the work of the district and has direct supervision over the local churches and ministers. The local church calls its pastor and conducts its own affairs in line with general assembly guidelines.

Education has been a concern of the Church of the Nazarene almost from its beginning; Bible colleges were formed at the turn of the century. Real impetus came in 1923 when six educational zones were created (changed to eight in 1964) with the intent of having a college in each zone. At present the following colleges are in operation: Eastern Nazarene College (Eastern Zone); Trevecca Nazarene College (Southeast Zone); Olivet Nazarene College (Central Zone); Bethany Nazarene College (West Central Zone); Pasadena College (Southwest Zone); Northwest Nazarene College (Northwest Zone); Nazarene Junior College A (N.J.C.A. Zone); and Nazarene Junior College B (N.J.C.B. Zone). Outside the United States there are five institutions: Canadian Nazarene College, British Isles Nazarene College, Australian Bible College, South African Bible College, and a Bible college in Frankfurt, Germany. In addition there is the Nazarene Theological Seminary at Kansas City, Missouri.

Missions began in what was to become the Church of the Nazarene as far back as 1897 when Mr. and Mrs. M. D. Wood, Miss Carrie Taylor, Miss Lillian Sprague and F. P. Wiley sailed for India. The work has grown until at present there are over twenty-five mission fields on six continents with a reported membership of above 60,000. The work is directed by the Department of World Missions of the General Board.

Publishing Interests. Publications began in the Church of the Nazarene in 1896 with the monthly Nazarene Messenger. Early in 1900, the Nazarene Publishing Company was founded to carry on the work of the growing denomination. After the 1908 mergers, plans were begun to establish a centrally located Nazarene Publishing House, which was done in 1911. The new publishing house is now the largest publisher of holiness literature in the world. It won the appreciation of The Methodist Church in 1944 when it published by amicable and helpful arrangement the Daily Christian Advocate for the GENERAL CONFERENCE then meeting in KANSAS CITY.

Three current periodicals have denominational authority: The Herald of Holiness, a weekly news magazine; Other Sheep, a mission periodical; and Conquest, a magazine for youth.

Ecumenically the Church of the Nazarene is a member of the National Holiness Association and has a fraternal relationship with the Division of Christian Education and the Department of Broadcasting and Films of the National Council of Churches.

Membership of the church is above 400,000.

CHURCH SCHOOL (U.S.A.). The program of the LOCAL CHURCH for instructing and guiding its entire constituency in Christian faith and living is usually referred to under the head of "the Church School." This includes the SUNDAY SCHOOL and certain other activities such as the Methodist Sunday Evening fellowship, weekday programs and plans, and home extension services. These vary from time to time, and the present Disciplines must be consulted to ascertain exactly how these are at present managed in the various Methodist churches.

CHURCH OF SOUTH INDIA. On Sept. 27, 1947, one month and twelve days after the start of Indian independence, the Church of South India was inaugurated. The new Church resulted from twenty-eight years of negotiation and brought together the four South India Dioceses of the Church of India, Pakistan, Burma, and Ceylon, of the Anglican Communion; seven Church Councils of the South India United Church (the result of an earlier union of Congregational, Presbyterian and Reformed Churches related to churches of varied names in the United States, the British Isles and Continental Europe), and the four South Indian Districts of the Methodist Church (British Conference).

The new Church incorporated in its polity important features of each of the uniting Churches. From the Church of India, Pakistan, Burma, and Ceylon, it received the episcopate, and from the South India United Church and the Methodist Church, it received Presbyterian and Congregational elements. It began with fourteen dioceses and a baptized Christian community of slightly more than one million, of whom communicants or full members numbered about 335,000. Of the first bishops, three were former Methodists, one a former Presbyterian, three former Congregationalists, and seven former Anglicans.

Apart from one Church Council of the South India United Church which delayed entry for two years, the only considerable body of dissidents in any of the uniting Churches was the Archdeaconry of Nandyal (in the Dornakal Diocese) associated with the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, which made it plain that it could not support work in South India on the same basis as before. A community of approximately 25,000 obtained permission to continue in the Church of India, Pakistan, Burma, and Ceylon. It was later constituted as a separate Diocese, its first bishop being a Presbyter of the Church of South India released for the purpose.

The ministers of the several uniting Churches were all recognized as ministers of the Word and Sacraments in the new Church on their acceptance of the Basis of Union, without supplemental ordination. The new bishops were consecrated in a service immediately following the service of Inauguration, in which those already bishops of the Church of India, Pakistan, Burma, and Ceylon, together with Presbyters and laymen from the other uniting Churches, laid hands upon their heads. It was agreed that local congregations would not be required to accept as their pastors any men concerning the validity of whose orders they were doubtful.

The Methodist Church of the British Connexion enthusiastically accepted the union. Of the six hundred members of Conference in Great Britain, only five or six voted against it, and the South India Provincial "Synod marched into Union without a single deserter from the ranks," as the veteran missionary E. W. Thompson commented at the first public meeting of the new Church in Madras. The Methodist Church of Southern Asia (Southern Asia Central Conference [now UMC]), however, did not participate in the negotiations which led to the organization of the present Church of South India. This was partly a matter of geography, in that only two of the eleven annual conferences of this Church in India are in South India. Further, it was clear that to bring in this Methodist Church (American based) with its particular form of episcopal polity, would delay the achievement of Union, since it would introduce a type of episcopacy other than that of the Anglican tradition. The issue was frankly faced in conversations between leaders of the two Methodisms and of the other Churches involved and it was decided, at that stage, to avoid this complication.

There has been a steady growth in numbers, despite many circumstances adverse to Christianity in modern India. The Churches associated with the Basel Mission have entered into union and negotiations for union with the Lutherans of South India are well advanced. The Church of South India has been active in missionary work both within India and beyond in Papua and Thailand. Perhaps the chief fruit of union, and that which has had greatest effect in the Christian world, has been in the field of forms of worship. The C.S.I. Liturgy of Holy Communion, built from first principles and embodying the treasures of all the traditions of the new Church, has had wide creative effect in present-day liturgical practice.

CHURCH SURVEY REPORT. (See METHODISM IN THE UNITED STATES.)

CHURCH TRIALS AND TRIAL LAW. In early Methodist societies before a church organization was contemplated, matters affecting the character of members and their worthiness to continue as members were settled in a summary way by each local society affected. JOHN WESLEY himself "turned people out," and purged his societies in England of those whom he felt did not properly belong. In early America the preachers had the right to receive or exclude members in almost as summary a fashion. But as the societies grew in membership, and especially when the M. E. Church in America was organized, something more of due process was called for before a member could be publicly reprovved or expelled. For it was one thing to exclude a person from a little religious society which was not a church, and something else entirely to exclude a person, who had once been received into the church, from the Sacraments and fellowship of a great over-arching ecclesiasticism. By the year 1789 in America, regulations had to be formulated outlining what was to be done when a person was accused of some infraction of Methodist law, or some serious break in the Methodist Discipline. Did such forfeit his church membership?

From 1789 to 1800 the pastor and the society before whom the accused was to be brought were considered coordinate in responsibility for delivering a verdict. After 1800, however, this plan was changed, so that the sole responsibility of the verdict was left with a committee or with the whole society. From that day until now no pastor has ever had the right to dismiss or expel a member by himself alone. Pastors of course have often been instrumental—and should be—in having an accused person brought before the church authority when the situation warrants this.

In 1808, when the delegated GENERAL CONFERENCE was created, one of the Restrictive Rules which was adopted to curb the all-embracing powers of that Conference was one—then Number 5—"They (the General Conference) shall not do away the privileges of our ministers or preachers, of trial by Committee, and of an appeal; neither shall they do away the privileges of our members of trial before the Society (changed to Church later), or by a Committee, and of an appeal." This rule—now Number 4—is in the present Discipline and except as shown above is the exact language of 1808. This fixed firmly in the Constitutional esse of the church the right of every member to claim a fair trial if ever there be need. The United Methodist Church continues this right.

"Church trials are to be regarded as an expedient of last resort," states the Discipline. "Only after every reasonable effort has been made to correct any wrong and adjust any existing difficulty should steps be taken to institute a trial. All trials should be conducted in a consistent Christian manner by a properly constituted court, after due investigation. The administration of oaths shall not be required." (Para. 1720, Discipline, UMC, 1968.)

Offenses. "A bishop, traveling elder, or local preacher shall be liable to accusation and trial upon any one or more of the following charges: (1) Immorality, crime, or other imprudent and unchristian conduct; (2) Habitual neglect of duties as a member or officer of the church; (3) Disobedience to the order and discipline of The United Methodist Church; (4) Disseminating doctrines contrary to the established standards of doctrine of the church; (5) Unministerial conduct or maladministration in office. A lay member of the church shall be liable to accusations and trial upon any one or more of the charges set forth in sub-sections 1, 2, 3, and 4." (Para. 1721.)

The Discipline outlines the trial procedures which are to be followed with reference to lay members, deacons, local preachers, traveling preachers (deacons or elders), and bishops. In all cases the disciplinary regulations are to be followed out exactly.

A great deal of carefully worded disciplinary matter is to be found in successive Disciplines dealing with trial law. The Discipline itself must be referred to in its current edition to find the exact procedures to be followed. In general the practices of English common law are followed out in so far as possible by the church courts. Careful records are to be made of all proceedings, the accused has the right to call to his assistance a person or persons as counsel, appropriate notice must always be given to the accused in advance, and a bill of charges furnished him in sufficient time for him to prepare a defense; and an appeal is allowed if the verdict is adverse. Such appeal in The United Methodist Church must go to the Jurisdictional Committee on Appeals, which has the final word. It may throw out the trial, reverse the decision, or reaffirm it—after the manner of appellate courts.

Trial of Laity. The above general treatment refers to all trials which may be had in Methodist courts, whether the accused be clerical or lay. However, the trial of a lay person by a Methodist church court has not taken place so far as can be ascertained within this present century. Lay persons who are formally accused by their fellows in the usual Protestant church withdraw their membership at once, often expressing great anger that they are being adversely judged by those whom they had considered their brethren. They scorn to stand trial, taking refuge after formal accusations seem pending, by withdrawing or joining some other church. It is possible in The United Methodist Church, however, to try an accused person in his or her absence, after proper notice has been served on such person, whether or not the person elects to be present. Naturally, no church court has the power to affect a person in any other way than in his relationship to the church. No church court in a free land can fine a man or send him to prison. But it can censure, it can reprimand, it can suspend, and it can as a last resort, expel.

The power of church courts to censure or expel a member even though a person may feel aggrieved and undertakes to sue for defamation of character, is not questioned by the civil courts, if the church court has acted in line with its own established processes. "In the United States," observed Judge HENRY WADE ROGERS (the jurist whose presidency of the Committee on Judiciary of the M. E. Church was recognized as authoritative and commanding), "all questions relating to faith, practice, discipline of the church, and of its members belong not to the civil courts but to the ecclesiastical tribunals to which the members of the church are subject, and the decisions of those tribunals are final." Civil courts take the position that persons joining a church have made a contractual agreement with that church to be bound by its laws and processes. If those processes are properly followed out by the church, the civil courts will not take jurisdiction over alleged inequities.

Trial of Preachers. In the case of ministers who are accused of some infraction of disciplinary law or of unministerial conduct, or worse yet of immorality, a trial must be sustained by the accused, or he will automatically lose his ministerial office and membership. Each annual conference appoints a Committee of Investigation consisting of five ministers, nominated by the bishop, and this committee acts, if and when it must, as a grand jury, empowered to investigate reports or serious accusations brought against any ministerial member of the conference.

Careful regulations are prescribed for the conduct of the Committee of Investigation and also outlining the rights of the one who is accused. If, after following through the carefully outlined disciplinary processes, the Committee on Investigation feels that a formal trial is necessary, it brings in a bill of specifications, and a trial court must be set up by the conference, after the presiding bishop has appointed a traveling elder of the conference to be counsel for the church.

Thirteen effective elders at present constitute the trial court, which is to be presided over by the bishop, or some other bishop or district superintendent whom the president of the conference shall have appointed. (Discipline, UMC, 1968, Para. 1740.5.) Such trial court has full power upon conviction of the accused by a vote of nine or more of the thirteen to expel him from the ministry and membership of the church; to depose him from the ministry; to suspend him from his office in the ministry; or to fix a lesser penalty. Its findings are final, subject to appeal to the Committee on Appeals of the Jurisdictional Conference.

Regulations in the Discipline outlining and directing all sorts of matters connected with the trial of ministers have grown enormously of late years. In each such trial much is at stake, and frequently appeals are based on minor matters of technicality and the like.

"There is a profound difference in the spirit that pervades church law and that underlying civil law. In civil law, no penalty or blame can attach to one who is not proved guilty of an overt act. A man may intend to steal and plan to commit murder, but unless he does these things or threatens in a tangible way to commit such actual breach of peace, civil courts can take no notice. The law cannot deal with intent unless intent is made clear by an outward act. But the church in administering its discipline is vastly concerned with intent, for intent is part and parcel of a person's own spiritual attitudes." "The Church," a minister once observed, "is trying to prove or disprove the existence of sin in a person being tried, and not some one special outward expression of it."

Naturally church courts face a great difficulty when they attempt to enter into the realm of intent and attempt to find out what a person wills to do. But church courts will fail their ideal duty if they proceed entirely by judging all matters only by outward acts.

Trial of a Bishop. If a bishop should be charged with actions affecting his administration, or if it be a disciplinary violation, he is usually faced by the party or parties who feel themselves injured, before the Committee on Episcopacy of the Jurisdictional Conference. This committee must pass the character of each bishop at its quadrennial sessions and if there appear to be well-founded charges dealing with the bishop's maladministration, the Committee on Episcopacy usually hears such charges and gives the bishop an opportunity to reply. If the complaints are well founded the Committee so reports to the Jurisdictional Conference which may then take whatever action it feels necessary.

If, as has happened in three or four instances, a bishop has charges of immorality brought against him, disciplinary procedures are outlined whereby these charges, brought by certain elders, must be tried by a court of elders. Bishops, in case of an adverse decision, have the right of appeal to the Judicial Council after thirty days' notification in advance of one's decision to make such an appeal.

All matter of regulations having to do with notices, testimony, records, obtaining of counsel and appeals are to be found in the Discipline, as well as what is to be done in proceeding against lay members; deaconesses; local preachers and accepted supply preachers; traveling preachers, and bishops. These different classes have from time to time been treated somewhat differently in the matter of trial law. The Discipline must always be referred to for germane regulations.

The church was not created to be a penal institution nor even a disciplinary organization, but a brotherhood whose ideal is to be that "of the saints in light," the Body of Christ. Punishment is no part of its idealistic on-going. It is somewhat like the ordinary family which must needs from time to time administer discipline to its members, but no family worthy of the name thinks of discipline and punishment as anything but an unlovely process which must be put into effect from time to time—and to the grief of all concerned. So with the church. Discipline it must have, and it cannot be the church if it continues to hold within its membership those whose life and conduct affront everything the church stands for, and who in heart and life do not properly belong. At best, however, church trials are horrible affairs and happy is the conference which never has to try one of its members, and happy is the local church whose members live above all reproach.

CHURCHEY, WALTER (1747-1805), British Methodist, was born at Brecon, Wales, on November 7, 1747. He became a not over-successful attorney; he was converted to Methodism, perhaps through the influence of THOMAS COKE, who also came from Brecon. From 1771 Churchey frequently corresponded with John Wesley, and claimed to have originated the idea of the ARMINIAN MAGAZINE, which John Wesley started in 1778. Although Churchey was exaggerating, a letter from John Wesley to him on October 18, 1777, shows that Wesley did consult him about the idea. Churchey wrote large quantities of religious verse, of no distinction. After Wesley's death in 1791 he became a millenarian, of the school of Richard Brothers. His publications included Poems and Imitations of the British Poets (1789); Lines on the Death of John Wesley (n.d., probably 1791); An Elegy to the Memory of William Cowper (Hereford, 1800); An Essay on Man upon Principles opposite to those of Lord Bolingbroke (1804); and An Apology by Walter Churchey for his public Appearance as a Poet (Trevecca, 1805). That he is mentioned in the Dictionary of National Biography is perhaps an unnecessary tribute to his thirst for fame. He died at the Hay, near Brecon, Dec. 3, 1805.

JOHN KENT

CHURCHWARD, CLERK MAXWELL (1888-1968), Australian minister, educator, and noted linguist, was born on Dec. 20, 1888, at ADELAIDE, SOUTH AUSTRALIA. He was the son of Samuel and Emily Emma Churchward. He was educated at Prince Alfred College, Adelaide, and when he matriculated he entered Queen's College and attended the University of Melbourne. Intent on entering the ministry of the Methodist Church, he served as a home missionary in South Australia at Yondoit in 1909, at Brim in 1910, and Cobram in 1915. He was a probationer at Numurkah and in 1916 was appointed assistant tutor at Leigh College, Enfield, New South Wales. He served in the A.I. Forces, 1916 to 1919. At the request of the NEW SOUTH WALES CONFERENCE he was ordained in Kent Town Church and returned as a Chaplain of the Forces in 1919. He was then stationed in the Culgong Methodist circuit.

On May 17, 1921, he married Marjorie Shaw of Strathfield, New South Wales, in Baker Hall, Davuilevu, Fiji. The following sixteen years he was a missionary in FIJI. He was soon recognized as a linguist of international standing. In 1926 he received the M.A. and in 1941 was awarded the Litt.D. by the University of Melbourne. In the course of his work he contracted filaria, and although this was in a mild form he nevertheless found it a severe handicap.

In 1944 he was sent to Milingimbi, Northern Territory, and engaged in translation work. From 1946 to 1961 he was employed by the Government of TONGA in linguistic studies, returning in that period for one year to William Street Mission, SYDNEY. In 1966 he was invited by the Government of Fiji to continue linguistic research. He had revised and completed his translation of the New Testament when he contracted pneumonia and died in Fiji on Feb. 24, 1968.

Churchward was a person of deep spiritual conviction who believed in the primary indefeasible values of individual human personality. He was a brilliant, unassuming scholar and his major works are: Rotuma New Testament (1930); Rotuma Grammar and Dictionary (1940); Rotuman Hymn Book, including Psalms 23 and 72, Te Deum, Baptismal Service, Holy Communion, Marriage Service, Burial Service and Catechism; Tales of a Lonely Island (1939); Wesley Bi-Centenary Fijian Hymnal (1938); A New Fijian Grammar (1941); Tongan Grammar (1953), and Tongan Dictionary (1959).

CIEMAL. (See LATIN AMERICAN EVANGELICAL METHODIST CHURCHES, COUNCIL OF.)

CINCINNATI, OHIO, U.S.A., from 1834 called the "Queen City of the West," dates from 1788 when a settlement was founded on the banks of the Ohio River called Losantiville, "A City Opposite the Mouth of the Licking River." This name was soon changed to Cincinnati in honor of the "Society of the Cincinnati," a commemorative organization of Revolutionary War officers. Incorporated as a village in 1802 and a city in 1819, with a population of 10,823, it has grown rapidly into the outstanding industrial, commercial and cultural center of today, numbering a population of 502,550 in Cincinnati and 1,268,479 in the metropolitan area.

Methodism antedates the incorporation of the city by thirty-one years. The historian records that in 1788 "Methodism came riding into Cincinnati on horseback in the person of the Reverend JOHN KOBLER . . . Kobler received scant welcome. For the next few years, the New Lights, a revivalistic sect, dominated the OHIO-KENTUCKY frontier, but after JOHN COLLINS, a backwoods licentiate, organized a class of twelve members in 1802, the Methodists gained rapid headway." From the class organized by Collins in 1803 sprang the "Old Stone Church," now

Wesley Chapel, the first building of which was erected in 1806, six years before the organization of the Ohio Conference. The conference had its beginnings in 1812 when the first session was held in CHILICOTHE with Bishop FRANCIS ASBURY presiding. From these early beginnings, Cincinnati Methodism has grown to its present strength with fifty-four churches in Cincinnati proper and a total of seventy-one churches in the Cincinnati District with a membership in 1970 of 35,068.

Other Methodisms in greater Cincinnati at present are: A.M.E., thirteen; C.M.E., six; FREE METHODIST, two; WESLEYAN, one. Accurate statistics on these churches and their outreach can be obtained by reference to the journals of the separate organizations.

In addition to the growth and development of individual congregations, the following dates and incidents illustrate the high points in the life of Methodism in the city.

In 1820 the GENERAL CONFERENCE established the Cincinnati branch of the Methodist Book Concern. 1825 saw the beginnings of the M. P. CHURCH, with services held in the old Cincinnati College. The first building to house this congregation was built in 1842 at Eighth and Mound Streets, where they worshipped until 1908 when the church was relocated in Hyde Park, where it stands today as the North Hyde Park Church. In 1829 the OHIO CONFERENCE of the M. P. Church was organized in Cincinnati, and included all territory west of the Allegheny Mountains.

The Western Christian Advocate was established by the General Conference of 1834, with THOMAS A. MORRIS as editor. An act of the OHIO CONFERENCE (ME) in 1835, which started the movement leading to the establishment of the German Methodist Church in America and in Germany, took place when WILLIAM NAST was appointed a missionary to the German-speaking people in Cincinnati. In 1838 the first German Methodist society was founded by Nast and that same year the Christian Apologist was established with Nast as editor. Four years later, in 1842, Nast Memorial Church (now Nast-Trinity), the historic church of German Methodism, was founded. Later Nast went from Cincinnati as a missionary to GERMANY and began the movement eventuating in the birth of German Methodism in that country.

Old Trinity Church, dating back to 1837, was the scene of many important events, notably the founding of the FREEDMEN'S AID SOCIETY in 1866 with J. M. WALDEN (later bishop) as head; and in 1880 the organization of the NATIONAL WOMAN'S HOME MISSIONARY SOCIETY with LUCY WEBB HAYES, wife of U. S. President Rutherford B. Hayes, as its first president.

In 1888 the Elizabeth Gamble Deaconess Association was established with ISABELLA THOBURN as the first superintendent, and in 1889 this group founded Christ Hospital on York Street, which four years later was moved to Auburn Avenue. By mutual agreement in 1896, seven German-speaking deaconesses were excused from the Elizabeth Gamble Deaconess Association to establish the German Deaconess Home under the leadership of Dr. Christian Golder, with Louise Golder the first superintendent. Out of this German Methodist background developed Bethesda Hospital and Deaconess Association which has operated through the years the Bethesda Deaconess Home (1896), Bethesda Hospital (1898), and Bethesda Home for the Aged (1915).

The Methodist Home for the Aged, founded earlier in Yellow Springs, was moved to College Hill in 1908, where it still serves an increasing number of persons. With the opening of Wesley Hall in 1949, a third facility for ministering to the elderly came into being.

Rounding out the institutions of Methodism in the city, GOODWILL INDUSTRIES was incorporated as a Methodist institution in 1918. In 1920 Wesley Child Care Center was founded by the Woman's Society of Christian Service. In 1934 Cameron Church for the Deaf was organized and named in honor of Virginia Cameron, deaconess. In 1940 the Woman's Division of Christian Service located its Literature Headquarters at 420 Plum Street. This was moved to Reading Road in 1954, and with the reorganization of the BOARD OF MISSIONS in 1964, the name was changed to the Service Center.

Allen Temple A.M.E. Church grew out of Wesley M. E. Church in Cincinnati under circumstances similar to those that gave rise to the Bethel churches in Philadelphia and Baltimore. As the number of Negroes increased in Wesley, the white members began to object to their presence and they soon began to crowd them out. This situation caused certain Negro leaders in Wesley to seek separation. With the aid of sympathetic whites a lot near Deer Creek was given to them upon which they constructed a small building in which to worship. James King, a slave preacher whose owner lived in KENTUCKY and allowed him to "hire his time," was the first pastor at Deer Creek. During 1823, King and a fellow member, Philip Broadie, were refused Holy Communion with whites at a Methodist camp meeting. This incident climaxed their dissatisfaction with the M. E. Church. Meanwhile, Isaac Jones, one of their number, went to Baltimore, Md., to marry. There he heard of the A.M.E. Church. Later the small group at Deer Creek decided to unite with "Richard Allen's Church." On Feb. 4, 1824 they were organized with Philip Broadie, a local preacher, as pastor. Their first building was located on North Street near New, then at Seventh Street, east of Broadway. In 1832 they erected a structure on Sixth Street, east of Broadway, and named it Bethel. In 1854 Bethel was replaced with Allen Chapel, and in 1870 a new edifice was purchased and called Allen Temple. Three former pastors have been elected to the episcopacy: JAMES A. SHORTER, BENJAMIN W. ARNETT, and ISAAC N. ROSE.

Bethesda Hospital was begun at the initiation of the deaconesses of the German Methodist Church, as it was then, in the Spring of 1898. In that year, under the leadership of Christian Golder, seven deaconesses who had been released from the Elizabeth Gamble Deaconess Home to organize the Bethesda Hospital and Deaconess Association, acquired their first hospital building.

Before that as the private hospital of T. A. Reamy, the first Bethesda Hospital had twenty beds. In the beginning all patient care was given by deaconesses. Bethesda grew, prospered, and matured in its service to the community. In 1926 a new Medical and Surgical building was dedicated, with 159 patient beds.

In 1898 the first School of Nursing was opened with an enrollment of ten students, all deaconess candidates. In 1915, the school was reorganized and students who were not deaconess candidates were admitted. In 1951, Draher Hall, a modern, comfortable dormitory for students was opened. It was named after Minnie Draher, who served as Director of the School of Nursing from 1905 to 1942.

At Bethesda the department of Medical Education is responsible for the development of young doctors during their internship, and additionally, the Hospital conducts an approved School of Medical Technology.

In 1901 the first Bethesda Maternity Hospital opened in a small house with six patients. The Maternity Hospital soon outgrew its facilities and in 1913 a new Maternity Hospital with sixty beds was opened. In the summer of 1960, a new obstetrics department opened in the new pavilion. More than 4,500 babies are born here annually. In 1960 a $4,000,000 new pavilion was opened.

Presently, Bethesda is a 351-bed, general, non-profit, community hospital, incorporating the major medical specialties. The institution is approved by the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals. More than five hundred of the area's finest physicians comprise the medical staff.

Calvary Church may rightly be called "a church on the move." From its organization in 1870 until the present, this congregation has had six changes of location and five changes in name.

Emerging as they were from the blight of slavery, the Negro Methodists in Cincinnati of the post Civil War period were faced with the choice of remaining with the church and being subjected to the indignities that were their lot at this time; or withdrawing and setting up a new denomination; or remaining with the M. E. Church, but organizing their own congregation where, with human dignity, they could engage in worship. The third choice was made by a group of loyal Negro Methodists who, as "free men of color," had settled in Cincinnati in the early 1800's. Encouraged by the efforts of R. S. Rust and JOHN M. WALDEN and their work with the FREEDMEN'S AID SOCIETY, this group met in the home of William and Amelia Beckley and effected the organization of what is now known as Calvary Church.

With faith, courage, and an almost incredible hope for their future as worthy members of the M. E. Church, they succeeded in buying a building on New Street just off Broadway, and in 1871 became a charge of the CINCINNATI CONFERENCE. Transferred first from the Cincinnati to the WASHINGTON CONFERENCE, the New Street Church was admitted to the LEXINGTON CONFERENCE in 1873.

In 1876 the congregation moved from New Street to West Seventh Street between Plum and Central Avenue. The interval between 1879 and 1893 saw a succession of five pastors. With the appointment of H. W. Tate and the expansion of business in the Seventh Street area, the congregation moved to West Ninth Street near Freeman Avenue, where it remained until 1902. Then, again on the move, the Ninth Street congregation acquired property at Park Street and Carlisle Avenue, where it became the Park Street Church.

From 1902 to 1925 Park Street, under the pastorate of able and dedicated leaders—D. E. Skelton, P. T. Gorham, T. L. Ferguson, and B. F. Smith—grew in membership, in Christian service, and exerted a spiritual influence known and felt throughout the city. This spiritually engendered momentum was continued in the unusually long pastorates of David D. Turpeau, Robert G. Morris, and Solomon W. Bankhead. The need for a better and larger physical plant was met when the Park Street congregation, with Closter Bryant as pastor, moved in 1925 into the old St. Paul Church at Seventh and Smith Streets. Bishop MATTHEW W. CLAIR, SR. preached the dedicatory sermon, and the church became known as Calvary.

For thirty-five years Calvary continued its ministry at Seventh and Smith Streets, but a changing Cincinnati with its urban renewal projects and its planned expressways made it necessary to vacate that property in 1960. Calvary again relocated in old Trinity Church, 118 West Ninth Street in downtown Cincinnati, on Feb. 28, 1960. It was in this Trinity Church that the Freedmen's Aid Society was established on Aug. 7, 1866.

In 1965, with dissolution of the Lexington Conference, Calvary became a member of the OHIO CONFERENCE, the same conference in which it was born. In 1970 its membership is 662.

Christ Hospital is a 600-bed general hospital—a well-known and very familiar institution to people not only in Cincinnati, but throughout the states of OHIO, INDIANA and KENTUCKY.

The Hospital had its beginning in 1889. Its founding was truly a reenactment of the Good Samaritan story. The Elizabeth Gamble Deaconess Home Association, a Methodist organization, had been in existence about one year. One of the deaconesses was on her way home from work with the needy in the city. It was a cold, rainy day in March. Suddenly she heard a woman weeping; turning, she saw her seated on the curb. The woman was very ill and apparently without anyone to care. She had walked across the bridge over the Ohio River from Kentucky seeking help, but did not know where to go. The deaconess picked her up, assisted her to the Deaconess Home on York Street, and these devoted women provided care for this needy woman. The woman died, but not without friends to care.

The next week, an appeal was made to the Board of Trustees of the Deaconess Home Association for permission and funds to start a hospital. Both were granted. With this, a ten-room house was purchased and a hospital was born. The first name given was Christ's Hospital, and later this was changed to The Christ Hospital.

The Hospital has grown from this humble and compassionate beginning to the fine medical center that it is today, with 600 beds and 150 more now under construction which when complete will give a complement of 750 beds.

The Hospital is furnished with the finest medical equipment along with a two-million-volt X-ray machine used extensively in treatment of cancer. The staff is well trained, many of the specialists being professors on the staff of the College of Medicine of the University of Cincinnati.

The Hospital has an up-to-date educational program for interns, residents, nurses, X-ray technicians, intravenous technicians, laboratory technicians, and an annual workshop for the clergy on pastoral care and counseling.

From this humble beginning came not only a hospital, but an outstanding School of Nursing with 200 students enrolled. The School of Nursing cooperates with the University of Cincinnati in its training. The sciences are taught at the University; the students receive their nursing arts and teaching at the School of Nursing.

Another important institution has emerged since the founding of The Christ Hospital—The Christ Hospital Institute of Medical Research. This institution has made a world-wide contribution in various areas of research.

CHRIST HOSPITAL, CINCINNATI, OHIO

The desire of the hospital is to keep the compassion of its original founder at the center of its service to humanity.

Hyde Park Community Church is located in a residential area, but with a metropolitan constituency. The church resulted from a merger in the 1920's of three congregations, and so the word "community" was added to the name.

The present sanctuary, completed in 1927, has a rich variety of symbolism incorporated in its structure and design. Many distinguished ministers have served as pastor of Hyde Park. Earl Hoon was minister in 1927 when the first building was erected, and Lynn Radcliffe brought considerable stature to the church during a thirteen-year pastorate (1948-61).

An expansion program was initiated in 1964 and completed on May 15, 1966, with Bishop F. GERALD ENSLEY preaching the sermon of consecration. This improvement project, costing in excess of one million dollars, provided additional classroom facilities, an office wing, a chapel of rare beauty, and a parking lot. Emerson S. Colaw was pastor during the time of construction.

With a membership of 2,500, coming from all parts of the city, the church's program is geared to meet a heterogeneous constituency.

EMERSON S. COLAW

Methodist Home on College Hill, the first home for the aged in Ohio, was incorporated on Aug. 4, 1899, under authority from the five annual conferences in Ohio. The Home grew out of the conviction of Henry C. Weakley that the church ought to provide care for those elderly persons who were alone and unable to provide against the infirmities of old age, and to him credit should be given for the vision and energy that launched this benevolent enterprise.

A frame building with fourteen acres of ground was purchased in Yellow Springs, Ohio, and by the end of 1899, thirty-four persons had been received as members. On Nov. 9, 1902, fire destroyed the buildings. The people, all unharmed, were then transferred temporarily to a building in Granville, Ohio. Mrs. and Mrs. Obed J. Wilson gave twenty acres of land on the brow of College Hill, Cincinnati, and a home of concrete, brick and steel, so as to be fireproof, was planned and designed to serve 300 people. The Wilsons further evidenced their deep interest by providing $70,000 for the erection of the Chapel and the North Wing. Another generous gift from Mrs. Amanda Whetstone, in memory of her husband John Whetstone, made possible the completion of the eighty-room Whetstone wing.

On June 2, 1903, ground was broken on the new site but labor troubles, increased costs, and lack of money delayed the project so that the building was not completed until 1908. Forty elderly persons made the train trip from Granville to Cincinnati to open the Home that year. Due to lack of financial support over 100 rooms remained vacant for eight years.

C. Lloyd Strecker became General Manager in 1921, and under his leadership the south wing of the home, since renamed Strecker Wing, was built and dedicated in 1939. It contains seventy-five rooms. Strecker died in 1946 and was succeeded by Richard E. Scully, founder of GOODWILL INDUSTRIES in Cincinnati. He built on the achievements of the past, erecting Greeno Hall, which was named for Edward W. Greeno, member of the Board of Trustees for thirty years and president for twenty-five years. An imposing structure of three stories, providing forty-three rooms and apartments, it was dedicated in 1950. In 1952 a new dining room and kitchen were built on the first floor. During Scully's ten-year administration, the capacity of the Home increased from 200 to 300 members, and thirty-two adjacent acres were purchased.

In December 1956, William A. Boehnker became manager of the Home and Harold E. Scheele, assistant manager. Emphasis was now laid upon improvement of services. Part-time workers in physical and occupational therapy were added to the staff. In 1959 the Board of Trustees decided to erect a new wing to provide rooms better designed for efficient nursing care of the elderly. The Garrison Health Center provides seventy-four single rooms, ten double rooms, three four-bed wards, and a medical clinic on the second floor. The building itself cost $1,775,000, and was dedicated in June, 1962.

The Methodist Home, now in its seventy-first year of service to elderly people, ranks as one of the fifteen largest Methodist homes in the U.S.A.

Westwood Church. The congregation had its beginnings in 1818 as a class meeting held in the homes of Lawson Wedding and Dr. Richard Kendall, physician and local preacher. A log church was built through the efforts of a faithful group who continued evangelizing all newcomers. A frame church was built in Cheviot, Ohio in 1842. The present Gothic structure was built of Indiana limestone in 1896. The cornerstone of the sanctuary was laid on June 14 of that year, at the corner of Beechwood and Elmwood Avenues in the Westwood suburb.

James N. Gamble, president of Proctor and Gamble Company, had made a donation of $25,000 toward the erection of a new church on condition that the remaining $25,000 be raised by the congregation by subscription only, without the aid of festivals, bazaars, or other extraneous means. The required amount was duly raised.

Two additions for educational purposes were made in 1926 and 1952, known as Epworth Hall and Eckel Hall. Extensive changes in the chancel area of the sanctuary were made in 1963.

From pioneering beginnings in 1818, the congregation in 1970 has a membership of 2,529 members, a staff of four ordained ministers, twelve lay employees and a missionary family serving in Africa. One-third of the annual budget is set aside for benevolences. The congregation was responsible for the beginning of seven churches in the Western Hills area and has now concentrated on a missionary extension into the inner city.

Easter services were televised to the entire nation in 1965 over 158 stations, the first time an Easter service originating from a Methodist church was seen and heard in every state in the continental United States.

CINCINNATI CONFERENCE (ME) was organized at Xenia, Ohio, on Sept. 22, 1852 with Bishop EDMUND S. JAMES presiding. It was formed by dividing the OHIO CONFERENCE. Its territory was southwest Ohio.

The KENTUCKY work, which had been a part of the Ohio Conference, was also set off as a conference by the 1852 GENERAL CONFERENCE. For convenience the Kentucky preachers met with the Cincinnati Conference brethren in their first session in 1852, and the proceedings were printed in the General Minutes as those of the "Cincinnati and Kentucky Conference." But legally there was no such body; there was a Cincinnati Conference and a Kentucky Conference. The gathering at Xenia was a combined session of the two conferences.

In 1853 the Cincinnati Conference reported nine districts, 103 charges, 170 preachers, and 32,563 members. Three of the nine districts represented the German work of the region—the Cincinnati German Mission District, the Pittsburgh German Mission District, and the North Ohio Mission District. The three districts reported 3,274 members in 1853. This work was set off as the CENTRAL GERMAN CONFERENCE in 1864.

The FREEDMEN'S AID SOCIETY of the M. E. Church was organized in CINCINNATI in 1866, and the Cincinnati Conference was the first in the church to recognize it. The 1867 journal reported over $3,200 raised for the society.

The 1866 journal reported women's colleges at Cincinnati, Hillsboro, Springfield, and Xenia which received conference approval along with OHIO WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY at Delaware.

In 1912 the Cincinnati Conference supported the Christ Hospital and the Methodist Home for the Aged in Cincinnati, and it recognized Hillsboro Female College along with Ohio Wesleyan University. The journal took note that the Methodist Home for Children near Columbus was beginning its important work.

In 1912 the Cincinnati Conference reported four districts, 171 charges, 56,394 members, and property valued at $3,503,020. In 1913 the conference was merged with the CENTRAL OHIO CONFERENCE to form the WEST OHIO CONFERENCE.

CIRCUIT. Two or more local churches or societies which are joined together for pastoral supervision. In American Methodism these together constitute one pastoral charge. (See CHARGE, PASTORAL.) In the growth of American Methodism circuits in which there are for a time two or more churches, are usually bracketed together into a "charge," until each of the several churches of such a circuit become strong enough to become Stations, and thus have a preacher-in-charge all their own. (See also STATION.)

In British Methodism and its offshoots the circuit is normally served by several ministers, one of whom is designated the superintendent minister—in Wesley's day his "assistant," the others being "helpers." (See also BRITISH METHODISM, ORGANIZATION OF and CIRCUIT PLANS, CIRCUIT QUARTERLY MEETING, and CIRCUIT STEWARDS.)

FRANK BAKER

CIRCUIT PLANS, one of the most familiar institutions of British Methodism, date from the days of Wesley. In their earliest form they were handwritten, existing often in one copy only, which was posted in the superintendent's house for consultation by the preachers. These plans gave no more than the initials of the preachers appointed to preach at the several chapels of the circuit for a period of weeks, set out in tabular form. By the turn of the century they were printed for wider circulation, but still as a rule contained no more than the names of the chapels, the hours of services, and the surnames of the preachers, usually for the quarter. Early in the nineteenth century the plan developed; normally each preacher was given a number, which stood in the appropriate place in the table instead of his name. At this time also the plans began to give general circuit information, though still keeping to the form of a broadsheet printed on one side, special collections or occasions being indicated by abbreviations after the preacher's number.

Late in the century names instead of numbers became normal again, and the plans began to appear in booklet form, which in addition to giving the Sunday and weekday appointments served as a circuit directory, with names of circuit and society officials. Being the entire responsibility of the superintendent, they varied in form and content from circuit to circuit.

The earliest recorded plan is a London plan in Wesley's handwriting, though CHRISTOPHER HOPPER claimed to have devised the idea. Wesley's plan is for one week only in 1754 and is reproduced in Stevenson's City Road Chapel. The "Society of Cirplanologists" compiled in 1960 a register of all known extant plans up to 1860, giving their present whereabouts. The earliest is a Leeds plan of 1777. There are some thirteen hundred plans recorded in every branch of Methodism.

CIRCUIT QUARTERLY MEETING, a British Methodist institution which arose in 1748 as a device for insuring that the individual Methodist SOCIETIES should be "more firmly and closely united together." The idea was put forward by JOHN BENNET on the basis of Quaker precedents, and he cooperated with WILLIAM GRIMSHAW, who conducted the first Quarterly Meeting at Todmorden Edge on Oct. 18, 1748. The 1749 Methodist Conference made the holding of Quarterly Meetings one of the responsibilities of the ASSISTANT, and Bennet was charged with encouraging their growth.

The Circuit Quarterly Meeting was a gathering of STEWARDS and LEADERS from the societies composing the CIRCUIT, meeting under the chairmanship of WESLEY or one of his preachers. It was charged with the responsibility of coordinating the finances and spiritual activities of the societies as a whole, including especially the support of the preachers stationed in the circuit. The financial affairs were largely delegated to CIRCUIT STEWARDS or "general stewards"—this latter term being used for those first appointed and continuing the normal title throughout Wesley's lifetime. All branches of British Methodism have laid great stress on the Circuit Quarterly Meeting as a vital link between the local societies and the annual conference, having major responsibility for inviting ministers to the circuit, for the oversight of the varied aspects of the Work of God therein, and the highest official court of which most Methodist laymen may expect to become members.

CIRCUIT STEWARDS (in British Methodism). As early as 1746 England and Wales were already divided into seven Methodist CIRCUITS, and although the itinerant ASSISTANTS were responsible to Wesley for the conduct of all circuit business, including finance, laymen were appointed to assist with the administration of the circuit. The stewards were originally charged with the collection and expenditure of funds, chiefly to meet the expenses of itinerant preachers. The stewards were members of the CIRCUIT QUARTERLY MEETING, to which they reported their activities. The choice and appointment of circuit stewards was originally in the hands of JOHN WESLEY or his Assistants. In the WESLEYAN METHODIST CONNECTION this situation remained virtually unchanged down to Methodist Union in 1932. In the non-Wesleyan churches the office of circuit steward was not normally discontinued, but the principle of election by the members was applied, so that the usual practice was for the circuit quarterly meeting to elect the circuit stewards by a majority vote. This practice was carried over into the Methodist Church in 1932, when Superintendent ministers in the Wesleyan tradition finally lost the right, or, as they often thought of it, the obligation, to nominate to the Stewardship. Under the existing constitution, the December Quarterly Meeting elects two stewards, who remain in office for one year, and are eligible for reappointment. In some circuits the office changes hands regularly, and in others the same individual may remain a steward for many years. The stewards are still responsible for the circuit finances, and for the material well-being of the ministers stationed in the circuit. They are ex-officio members of the District Synod. In the nineteenth century they gradually became responsible for the invitation of ministers to serve in their circuit, although the invitations are made on behalf of the Quarterly Meeting. Under the existing rules, however, there is an official Circuit Invitation Committee, composed of the Circuit ministers, the Circuit stewards and such other members as are appointed by the June Quarterly Meeting, and this Committee makes recommendations to the Circuit Quarterly Meeting. At one time in the nineteenth century the Circuit Steward was commanded by the Wesleyan Conference to provide for an annual tea meeting of the members of the societies in the circuit, but this duty seems to have lapsed. CITY ROAD CHAPEL. JOHN WESLEY's Chapel in City Road, London, opened by him in 1778, and regarded as the Cathedral of World Methodism. (See LONDON, Wesley's Chapel.)

CLAFLIN, LEE (1791-1871), American lay leader, industrialist, banker, and philanthropist, was born in Hopkinton, Mass. Nov. 19, 1791.

As a boy, Clafin was apprenticed to learn the tanning business. Upon coming of age, he began his own tannery in Milford, beginning what was to be a highly successful business career. From the tanning business he went into the manufacture of boots and shoes, transferring his factory to Hopkinton.

As his business prospered, Lee Clafin founded and became president of the Milford and Hopkinton Banks. Turning his interest to government, he was elected to the Massachusetts House of Representatives in 1834. Later he was elected to the upper house of the legislature.

Lee Clafin was active in the work of the M. E. Church from the age of sixteen, when he united with the church. He generously and actively supported its projects at home and abroad. He was deeply interested in the need to bring about reforms and was active in efforts to abolish slavery. His home was a "station" on the famed "underground railroad" which aided slaves in escaping to Canada. At the close of the War Between the States, he saw the need for setting up educational opportunities for the freedmen. He furnished the necessary funds to purchase a school in Orangeburg, S. C. Through his generosity, CLAFLIN COLLEGE, an institution of the M. E. Church, was made possible.

Lee Clafin is credited with many accomplishments, but his most far-reaching good was achieved in 1869, when he joined forces with three fellow Methodists, ISAAC RICH, JACOB SLEEPER, and WILLIAM F. WARREN, in establishing BOSTON UNIVERSITY. Signing of the university's charter was an occasion of special significance for Clafin, for his son, WILLIAM CLAFLIN, signed the historic charter, as governor of Massachusetts.

Lee Clafin died Feb. 23, 1871.

CLAFLIN, WILLIAM (1818-1905), American layman, business leader, and public servant, was born in Milford, Mass. on March 6, 1818. He was the son of LEE CLAFLIN, also a noted leader among the laity of the church. After completion of preparatory work at Milford Academy, Clafin entered Brown University in 1833. His own illness and the illness and death of his mother in 1835 compelled him to cut short his university studies.

In 1844 he joined his father's boot and shoe manufacturing firm. In addition to successfully managing his father's business, Clafin achieved equal success in his own business ventures. He was founder and president of the Hide and Leather National Bank, Boston, and organized two other banks—New England Trust Co. and Five Cent Bank.

Turning his attention to political issues of the day, Clafin supported the anti-slavery cause, helped to establish the Free Soil Party, and served several terms in the Massachusetts State Legislature. He was elected President of the State Senate in 1861. Clafin was an early member of the Republican Party and was an influential delegate to every National Convention from 1860 to 1872. He was chairman of the 1868 Convention which nominated Gen. U. S. GRANT for president.

Clafin served three terms as Lieutenant-Governor of Massachusetts, and in 1868 was nominated for Governor by acclamation, winning election by a wide margin. From 1877 to 1881 he served as Representative in the U.S. Congress.

He was a trustee of Wellesley College, Mount Holyoke College, and New England Conservatory. He was also trustee and chairman of the board of BOSTON UNIVERSITY. This held special significance for Clafin, for he had been Governor in 1871 when his father and two other sponsors petitioned for the charter that created Boston University. He and his wife provided the student body of the Methodist institution with many opportunities for cultural enrichment.

William Clafin, one of the outstanding leaders produced by the M. E. Church during the nineteenth century, died on Jan. 5, 1905.

CLAFLIN COLLEGE, Orangeburg, S. C., was chartered in 1869 as Clafin University. It was started by the FREEDMEN'S AID SOCIETY of the M. E. Church, and was named in honor of LEE CLAFLIN, the philanthropist of Massachusetts, whose generous gifts made the school possible. South Carolina Agricultural and Mechanical College operated in conjunction with Clafin College until 1896 when it became part of the state's program of higher education.

The college charter states that no instructor would be required to have any "particular complexion or to profess any particular religious opinions as a test of office," and that students would be admitted without respect to race, complexion, or religious opinions. For many years Clafin has been the only accredited private college in South Carolina historically devoted to the education of Negroes. Degrees granted are the B.A., B.S., B.S. in Education. The governing board has twenty-one members nominated by the South Carolina Conference (1866) of The United Methodist Church and elected by the board. Ownership of the college and its holdings is vested with the General Board of Education of The Methodist Church.

CLAIMANT, CONFERENCE. Conference Claimant has become a term in common use in American Methodist records, and has reference to those who have a claim upon, or are the responsibility of the General Church or possibly of an Annual Conference for such support as it may be able to grant them. The widows of ministers, orphan children of ministers (up to a certain age), and superannuated ministers, are usually classed as Conference Claimants, and the Church feels responsible for providing for the support of these, or for giving such assistance as it can.

It is to be noted that the "produce" of the METHODIST PUBLISHING HOUSE, from the days of the original Book Concern, has always been utilized "for the benefit of the traveling, supernumerary, superannuated and worn out preachers, their wives, widows and children." (Paragraph 9.5, 1964 Discipline). This is the language of the sixth Restrictive Rule, which forbids the GENERAL CONFERENCE to take any of the proceeds (net gain) of the Publishing House and use them for any other purpose than for these various classes of Conference Claimants whom it thus enumerates.

Each Annual Conference endeavors to provide for its claimants by setting aside a portion of its budget each year, allotting this to each claimant through an agreed upon formula. This is usually based on "years of service." There is a vast deal of pension legislation in each issue of the Discipline, and the rights and privileges of the claimants on the general church are carefully outlined throughout.

CLAIR, MATTHEW WESLEY (1865-1943), bishop, was born at Union, W. Va., Oct. 21, 1865, the son of Anthony and Ollie (Green) Clair. Converted at fifteen, he was licensed to preach while a member of Simpson M. E. Church, Charlestown, and while serving as a dishwasher at Hale House in that city. He was graduated from Morgan College, Baltimore, in 1889, and was later honored with the D.D. and LL.D. degrees by that institution. Howard and WILBERFORCE Universities also gave him honorary degrees. He married Fannie Walker on Nov. 12, 1889, and they had five sons. She died Feb. 27, 1925, and on Nov. 2, 1926 he married Eva F. Wilson.

Admitted to the WASHINGTON CONFERENCE on trial in 1889, Clair was ordained elder in 1893. His appointments were: Harper's Ferry, W. Va., 1889-93; Staunton, Va., 1893-96; Ebenezer Church, Washington, D. C., 1896-97; presiding elder, Washington District, 1897-02; ASBURY CHURCH, WASHINGTON, 1902-19; district superintendent, Washington District, 1919-20. While at Asbury he led in erecting a new building that would seat 1,800. In 1890 he edited the Banner, a conference paper.

A member of the 1904, '16, and '20 GENERAL CONFERENCES, Clair was elected bishop by the 1920 gathering and was immediately assigned as the church's episcopal leader in MONROVIA, LIBERIA. Traveling by hammock with African carriers, he traversed jungle and veldt and preached to the natives through Glebe and Mano dialect interpreters. The president of Liberia appointed him to the national board of education. Also, he served as a member of the American Advisory Commission of the Booker Washington Agricultural and Industrial Institute of Liberia. After eight years in Liberia, Clair served two quadrenniums as the presiding bishop of the Covington, Ky. Area and then retired. During his career he was a member of the American Geographic Society, a member of the FEDERAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, and a trustee of Morgan and PHILANDER SMITH COLLEGES. He led the public prayer on Oct. 15, 1924 when President Calvin Coolidge dedicated the statue of FRANCIS ASBURY in Washington, D. C. Thus far in the history of American Methodism, Clair is the only bishop to have a son, MATTHEW W. CLAIR, JR., to become a bishop.

Bishop Clair said, "The Negro has survived mainly because of his spiritual nature. Religion is his greatest help in his upward struggle. He turns to the church as the plant to the sun." As one of the two first Negro bishops elected by the M. E. Church, Clair was, according to Bishop NOLAN B. HARMON, "a man of great strength and sagacity." Bishop Clair died June 28, 1943 in Covington, Ky., and was buried in Washington, D. C.

CLAREMONT, NEW HAMPSHIRE, U.S.A. is situated in the Connecticut River Valley in Sullivan County and on the Boston and Maine Railroad near the recreational areas of Lake Sunapee and Mt. Sunapee, and was an early Methodist preaching place. One authority credits a Rev. Mr. Daniels (the first Methodist preacher who died in New England and who is buried in the adjoining town of Unity) as the preacher of the first sermon about 1795. Another authority credits the eccentric LORENZO DOW as the first preacher in 1796, when he was nineteen years old. He preached in that part of the area called Puckershire. In the winter of 1798 Dow preached once in four weeks in the Green Mountain District. This resulted in some conversions and the formation of a class at the home of Eliphalet Robertson, who was sometimes a class LEADER.

The Church Society was organized in 1801 and was included in the Hanover Circuit with Enfield, Canaan, Springfield, Grantham, and Unity. On May 7, 1801 receipts for the quarter from all churches of the circuit totalled $22.58, a large share of which went to Thomas Branch, one of the pastors on the circuit. Two more preachers were assigned to the circuit in 1803, and in 1804 the circuit reported 176 members. In 1806 Caleb Dustin labored here successfully. From this time to 1815 meetings were held at private homes and wherever else they could find accommodations. In that year the Methodists, Universalists, and Baptists united in erecting a meeting house on the spot where Trinity Church now stands.

During 1821 the Baptists and Universalists sold their share to the Episcopalians, who after investing considerably in alterations and repairs, refused to allow its use to the Methodist quarterly conference, Aug. 18, 1821. Whereupon Daniel Chase, a Universalist and the owner of the Sullivan House, offered the use of a large new horse barn just completed for the meeting, and the dance hall for the love feast. Both were gratefully accepted.

In 1826 Austin Tyler gave land on Sullivan Street for the church building which was dedicated in December 1829, with B. R. Hoyt preaching the sermon. On Sept. 16, 1838, it was "voted to proceed in the building of a house as soon as four hundred dollars should be raised." This refers to the proposed parsonage.

So prosperous had the society become that on Feb. 23, 1852, it was voted to build a new church. Subscriptions were secured to the amount of $2,484.30. The old chapel was sold for $650, and the parsonage for $1,191. With the pew rent voted to go toward the preaching, the society was able to pay $5,601.76 for the new building completed for dedication Jan. 25, 1853, by Bishop OSMON C. BAKER. The membership then was 281. Between 1870-71, $2,700 was paid for a house, barn, and well. In 1880 a chapel was built by Mrs. Julia Eastman in loving memory of her late husband, Hon. C. R. Eastman, who had been a faithful and active member. During the pastorate of N. M. Bailey two women, Mrs. Ann Perkins and Mrs. Melissa Fitch, were first elected to the Board of STEWARDS for a period of five years.

In 1891, during C. U. Dunning's pastorate, the church was remodelled. Under the pastorate of Frederick J. Andrews in 1930, the present Gothic structure of fieldstone was completed and presented for dedication. A parsonage was acquired the same year. Since the NEW HAMPSHIRE CONFERENCE was organized in 1829, its annual sessions have been held here seven times. The 1970 statistics include 644 members, 240 church school members, and value of property, $463,314.

CLARK, ALEXANDER (1834-1879), American minister, editor, and writer, was born March 10, 1834 in Jefferson County, Ohio. His outstanding achievements in these fields brought him recognition from MOUNT UNION COLLEGE and OTTERBEIN UNIVERSITY, both of which presented him the honorary M.A. degree, and OHIO WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, which conferred the honorary D.D. degree upon him.

Alexander Clark began his career as a writer and editor, establishing in the early 1850's a periodical called School Visitor. It later became Schoolday Magazine and was finally combined with Saint Nicholas Magazine.

In 1861 Clark was ordained in the M. P. Church and was stationed in New Brighton, Pa. This pastorate was followed by appointments to churches in Philadelphia, Cincinnati, and Pittsburgh.

In 1870 his talents as an editor were responsible for his being named to the editorship of The Methodist Recorder and Our Morning Guide, the official publications of the M. P. Church. He held this editorial position until his death.

He was a fraternal delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church, South in 1874, and in 1876 he went in the same capacity to the General Conference of the M. E. Church. Also, in 1876 he attended the British CONFERENCE as a fraternal representative of the M. P. Church. He was a delegate to four General Conferences and numerous Conventions of his denomination.

Clark was a well-known author as well as editor. He wrote four books with religious themes, a book describing his travels in Europe, and a volume of poetry.

He died July 6, 1879 at the residence of Georgia's Governor Colquitt.

ELMER T. CLARK

CLARK, BADGER (1883-1957), poet of the American West honored as the Poet Laureate of SOUTH DAKOTA, was born Charles Badger Clark, Jr., on New Year's Day, 1883, at Albia, Iowa. His parents were Mary Ellen (Cleaver) and Charles Badger Clark, who entered the Methodist ministry in 1864. When Badger was three months old, his father, who still suffered from wounds received as a Union volunteer fighting at Vicksburg, led his family to a prairie homestead in Aurora County, Dakota Territory. The future poet spent his early years there and at parsonages in Mitchell, Huron, and Deadwood, where his handsome, rich-voiced father is celebrated as the parson who buried Calamity Jane, picturesque Black Hills character remembered kindly by old-timers because she had nursed miners during a small-pox epidemic. Three years after Badger's mother's death in 1901, his father married Rachel Anna Morris, a charming, cultured woman who exerted a lasting influence on the boy's life.

"Charley" Clark, as he was then known, spent the 1902-03 school year at DAKOTA WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, and then joined a colonization party going to CUBA. It failed but he stayed on. Though an innocent bystander during fatal gunplay, he was put in irons and languished a few weeks in prison from which one of his father's parishioners, Congressman Even W. Martin, helped win his release.

By 1905 he was back in South Dakota, working on a surveying project in the Bad Lands, after which he did newspaper work at Lead, turbulent mining town in the Black Hills. When tuberculosis struck, he went to the Southwest and was lucky to find light work on a cattle ranch near Tombstone, Ariz. In his spare time he scribbled poetry, and soon began to earn a name for himself as his verse was published by various editors. Restored to health by 1910, he returned to the Black Hills, rejoining his parents at Hot Springs, where his father was chaplain at Battle Mountain Sanatorium. Later he moved to Custer State Park, where he built his own cabin, called "Badger's Hole," and continued to write, to lecture, and occasionally to preach.

In 1915 he hesitantly offered Sun and Saddle Leather, a 56-page volume bound in antique boards. It met a slow then a mounting response. Enlarged by adding Grass Crown Trails (1917) and other poems, it reached its fifteenth edition in 1962, with proceeds going to Dakota Wesleyan, his alma mater, for Badger Clark Black Hills College Memorial Scholarships.

Badger Clark's best-loved poem is "A Cowboy's Prayer," written for his mother, while he himself was a lonely cowpoke in Arizona. Also widely recited and sung around Western campfires is "The Glory Trail," sometimes called "High Chin Bob," which the magazine Poetry once presented as an example of especially worthy American cowboy folklore. Regarded by Badger Clark himself as his finest verse is "The Job," originally published in The Christian Century; others might choose "I Must Come Back," which appeared in The Rotarian. Both glow with religious insights and light up Christian convictions.

Badger Clark never married. Honorary degrees were given him by Dakota Wesleyan and South Dakota State University. He died Sept. 26, 1957, and is buried at Hot Springs, S. D. Badger Hole has become a literary shrine in Custer State Park. Here admirers of his poetry and tourists come to see his rustic home, where he scorned all modern conveniences, even electric lights. The rooms are maintained immaculately, just as he left them.

CLARK, DAVIS WASGATT (1812-1871), American bishop, was born at Mt. Desert, Me., Feb. 25, 1812, and was named for his grandfather Davis Wasgatt, who was a soldier in the Revolutionary War. Clark was converted at sixteen, and he and his mother were two of the thirteen members who formed the first Methodist church in his home community. Educated at Maine Wesleyan Seminary and WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, he was graduated from the latter in 1843. Wesleyan conferred the D.D. degree on him in 1851. He married Mary J. Redman in 1839, and they had two sons and two daughters.

Admitted to the NEW YORK CONFERENCE in 1843, Clark was ordained elder in 1845. He served five charges in NEW YORK and its environs, and in 1853 became editor of the Ladies' Repository, serving in that capacity until 1864 when he was elected bishop. A man of zeal and conviction, Clark was strongly opposed to slavery. Following the Civil War, he presided at the organization of a number of annual conferences of the M. E. Church in the southern states. As president of the FREEDMEN'S AID SOCIETY, he labored for education in that region. His episcopal duties took him to CALIFORNIA and OREGON as well as to the northern and eastern states. He was the author of several books, including Life and Times of Bishop Hedding, Mental Discipline, and Man All Immortal. In April, 1871, he became ill while presiding over the New York Conference, returned to his home in CINCINNATI, and died there on May 21 that year.

CLARK, ELMER TALMAGE (1886-1966), American editor and missionary secretary, was born in Randolph County, Ark., on Sept. 9, 1886. He was taken by his parents to Thayer, Mo. in 1895 and was reared there. He was educated at HENDRIX COLLEGE, BIRMINGHAM-SOUTHERN COLLEGE (B.A.), George Peabody College for Teachers (M.A.), Temple University (B.D. and Th.D.), FLORIDA SOUTHERN COLLEGE (LL.D.), and SOUTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY (Litt.D.).

Clark joined the ST. LOUIS CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church, South in 1909, and served pastorates at Stephan Memorial Church in St. Louis; Oran; New Madrid; University, Christy Memorial, and Shaw Avenue Churches in St. Louis, and Centenary Church at Cape Girardeau, Mo. In World War I he was correspondent for the New York Tribune, in which capacity he visited England, Scotland, Ireland, France, and Italy and was attached to the Twenty-eighth Division of the American Army on the fighting front in the Lorraine-Metz-Toul areas.

In 1918 he became publicity and promotion director for the Missionary Centenary, a movement which raised more than $50,000,000 for home and foreign missions, and at the close of that campaign he served in a similar capacity for the Christian Education campaign which raised around $25,000,000 for the schools and colleges of the church.

Following these financial campaigns he became editorial secretary of the Board of Missions and editor of World Outlook, and when Methodist Unification was achieved in 1939, he was transferred to NEW YORK CITY in the same editorial capacity.

In 1948 he was elected executive secretary of the Association of Methodist HISTORICAL SOCIETIES. At OXFORD, ENGLAND in 1951, he was elected secretary for the Western Hemisphere of the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL. He founded and edited World Parish, the bulletin issued jointly by these two organizations. In 1952 he resigned his office in the Board of Missions and moved to LAKE JUNALUSKA, N. C., where he secured the erection of the World Methodist Building and carried on the work of both the Historical Association and the Council. He organized and promoted World Methodist Conferences at Lake Junaluska in 1956 and at OSLO, Norway in 1961. At Oslo he became Secretary Emeritus of the Council.

Clark was fraternal delegate to the General Conference of the Methodist Church of BRAZIL in 1942 and was awarded a gold medal by the Conference. At Oslo in 1961 he received a citation from the World Methodist Conference, a gold medal from the Northern European Area, and a decoration from World Outlook.

In 1923 he married Mary Alva Yarbrough of Nashville, Tenn., and in the years that followed she worked closely with him and accompanied him on his extensive travels for the church.

He was the author of more than fifteen books, the most important being Social Studies of the War, The Psychology of Religious Awakening, The Small Sects in America, An Album of Methodist History, and The Warm Heart of Wesley. He was editor-in-chief of The Journal and Letters of Francis Asbury, twenty-seven mission study books, being the author of five of these, and thirteen volumes of The Missionary Year Book. He contributed articles to Encyclopaedia Britannica and other reference works. His last literary production was Methodism in Western North Carolina, published in 1966. He began the compilation of this Encyclopedia of World Methodism and amassed material for it until he retired in 1963, turning the supervision and manuscript material over to the present editor.

In retirement the Clarks lived at BIRMINGHAM, ALABAMA in the winter and at their beautifully situated house, "Amen Corner," at Lake Junaluska, N. C. in the summer. Clark died at Birmingham, Aug. 30, 1966. The College of Bishops of the Southeastern Jurisdiction paid him this tribute in a telegram to his wife:

"Elmer has been a symbol of true Methodism to the Bishops of the Southeastern Jurisdiction through the years. His deep devotional life, his knowledge of the church of the present and of the past, his faith in the future and his boundless capacity for friendship have endeared him to us all and commanded our profound respect. His passing is a grievous loss to the entire church."

CLARK, HOMER J. (1803-1875), American pastor, educator, and editor, was born Dec. 23, 1803 at Mt. Holly, Vt. He taught one year at Madison College, Uniontown, Pa., and beginning in 1834 was associated some fourteen years with ALLEGHENY COLLEGE, MEADVILLE, PA., serving at different times as vice-president, president, and agent. In 1852 he became editor of the Pittsburgh Christian Advocate, serving ably for four years. Then followed four-year tours of duty as presiding elder of the Pittsburgh and Steubenville districts. CLARK, JAMES LEVAN (1869-1957), American minister and educator, was born Feb. 10, 1869, in Mackville, Ky., the son of William D. and Mary (Hall) Clark. He attended Center College, won the A.B. degree at KENTUCKY WESLEYAN (1896), and had one year of theological study at VANDERBILT. In 1913 Center awarded him the D.D., and both Kentucky Wesleyan and Georgetown (Kentucky) gave him the LL.D. He married Blanche Fronk, Aug. 25, 1896, and they had three sons and two daughters. After teaching school several years, he joined the KENTUCKY CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church, South in 1896. Following three pastoral appointments, he was assigned to the Covington District, 1908-11, and for the next eight years was president of Kentucky Wesleyan, where he led in adding dormitories, classrooms, and a library. Returning to the pastorate in 1919, he served four churches and four districts before retiring in 1942. The churches were Mt. Sterling (1919-21), Somerset First (1921-24), Paris First (1930-33), and Shelbyville Centenary (1933-36), and the districts were Covington (1924-28), Danville (1928-30), Shelbyville (1936-37), and Lexington (1937-42).

Clark was a delegate to seven GENERAL CONFERENCES between 1910 and 1940, including the 1939 UNITING CONFERENCE. From 1914 to 1930 he was a member of the General BOARD OF EDUCATION (MES). The 1930 General Conference named him to the Commission which directed the organization of the Methodist Church of BRAZIL. He served twenty-five years as secretary of the Kentucky Conference, and at one time was vice-chairman of that body's board of missions. After retiring in 1942, he served ten years as full time chaplain at the Good Samaritan Hospital in Lexington. He died Dec. 25, 1957, and was buried in Winchester, Ky.

CLARK, JOHN (1797-1854), early American western missionary, was born July 30, 1797, at Hartford, Washington Co., N. Y. Apprenticed for a time to a tanner, he went on to teach school. Converted in 1817, he received an exhorter's license, and a local preacher's license in 1819.

In 1820 he was admitted on trial in the NEW YORK CONFERENCE. He preached in northern NEW YORK and VERMONT with marked ability. He married Sarah Foote in 1823. In 1828 he became PRESIDING ELDER of the Plattsburg District.

In New York in 1831-32, he met Canadian Indians converted by the Methodist Mission under WILLIAM CASE. He was at the 1832 GENERAL CONFERENCE in PHILADELPHIA, where a committee on missions recommended an extension of work with the Indians to the northwest. Clark offered himself to the Board as a missionary to Green Bay, and was sent out that year by the New York Conference.

In 1833 he built the Indian Mission at Sault St. Marie. He then established the mission at Kewawenon and others in WISCONSIN and MINNESOTA. In 1836 he was transferred to the ILLINOIS CONFERENCE and made presiding elder of the CHICAGO District which then extended north to include the Indian missions at Green Bay and Oneida West. He felt his heart drawn toward the newly freed Republic of TEXAS in 1841, and moved there to become presiding elder of the Rutersville District. Clark was peculiarly fitted for the work on this new frontier, filled with danger from marauding bands of Mexicans. He was elected delegate to the 1844 General Conference. At that historic conference when the vote was taken which divided the M. E. Church, Clark voted with the Northern majority.

The TROY CONFERENCE requested that Clark be transferred back, and he served as presiding elder of the Poultney, Troy, and Albany Districts. In 1852 at the request of leading members, he was transferred to the ROCK RIVER CONFERENCE and appointed to the Clark Street Church, Chicago. There he influenced Mrs. ELIZA GARRETT to give $100,000 for the founding of a seminary in the midwest, GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE. In the cholera epidemic of 1854, Clark gave himself unstintedly to assist cholera victims, and he died of the disease on July 11, 1854. He was buried in Aurora, Ill. At his funeral J. V. Watson, editor of the Northwestern Christian Advocate, gave an address embracing a sketch of his life and unique ministry.

CLARK, LABAN (1778-1868), pioneer American minister in the M. E. Church, was born July 19, 1778, at Haverhill, N. H. His parents were Congregationalists, and his doctrinal instructions were Calvinistic. However, in 1799 he was converted and joined the M. E. Church. He was licensed as an exhorter in 1800 and immediately put to work by his PRESIDING ELDER. In 1801 he was received on trial in the NEW YORK CONFERENCE at the old JOHN STREET CHURCH. He had traveled 340 miles on horseback in order to get to the conference.

In 1803 he was sent as a missionary to LOWER CANADA. After this he filled important appointments in NEW YORK, MASSACHUSETTS and CONNECTICUT. He served a number of terms as presiding elder. In 1832 he was appointed agent for the WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY just then beginning its work. He became one of the principal founders of Wesleyan and took an active part in the formation of conference academies. He was one of the founders of the MISSIONARY SOCIETY of the M. E. Church while he was pastor in New York in 1819. He was a recognized leader of his conference, and in the GENERAL CONFERENCE he always took a prominent part. It is said that in his debate he was argumentative, but always practical.

He died at Middletown, Conn., on Nov. 28, 1868.

CLARK, MARY HELEN (1902-), American missionary to BRAZIL, was born in Paris, Ky., Feb. 19, 1902. She received her B.A. from KENTUCKY WESLEYAN COLLEGE and the M.A. from Columbia University. During furlough years she did graduate work at the University of Kentucky, SCARBUTT and Peabody Colleges, and Cambridge University, England. She taught in the public schools of KENTUCKY and FLORIDA before going to Brazil as a missionary in August 1928.

Miss Clark served at Bennett College, RIO DE JANEIRO, and at the ISABELA HENDRIX COLLEGE in BELO HORIZONTE before being transferred to the Colegio Americano in PORTO ALEGRE, Rio Grande do Sul. After teaching five years, she was appointed principal of Colegio Americano, in which position she remained until retirement.

Her administration was able and brilliant, giving to the Colegio Americano an enviable position of esteem and prestige in the city and the state. In addition to educational work, she took the lead in community service at the time of the disastrous floods of 1964 when the school took in, fed, clothed, and helped to re-establish over 100 victims.

She returned to the U.S.A. in early 1968, and presently lives in Nashville, Tenn. After her departure the City Council of Porto Alegre conferred on her the highest honor in its power—the title of "Citizen of Porto Alegre."

CLARK, WESLEY O. (1899-), American E. U. B. layman, was born in Spartanburg, Ind. on Jan. 14, 1899. For twenty-six years he served as treasurer of the denominational BOARD OF MISSIONS. In addition he was general church treasurer for the former Church of the United Brethren in Christ and all of its boards from 1941 until 1946 when The EVANGELICAL UNITED BRETHREN CHURCH was formed.

Early in his business career he spent twelve years in the banking business in Dayton, Ohio. Later, from 1933 to 1936, he served as cashier for the secretary of state for the State of Ohio in Columbus. From 1936 to 1941 he was treasurer of OTTERBEIN COLLEGE, Westerville, Ohio.

Clark attended Ohio State University and Miami-Jacobs Business College in Dayton, Ohio. INDIANA CENTRAL COLLEGE awarded him an honorary LL.D. in 1951.

An active layman in local church, community, and general church affairs, Wesley Clark served sixteen years as an officer in the national men's organization of the church; eight years as vice president and eight years as secretary. He served for ten years as treasurer of GOODWILL INDUSTRIES in Dayton.

Granted retirement by the 1966 General Conference of The E. U. B. Church, Clark continued his service as treasurer of the Board of Missions by its request until the formation of The United Methodist Church in 1968. He resides in Dayton, Ohio.

CLARK, WILLIAM H. (1854-1925), American FREE METHODIST bishop, was born in Racine, Wis., April 8, 1854, and his childhood was spent on a farm near Alton, N. Y. His father was a Baptist. William Clark was converted at the age of nineteen in a Free Methodist revival. He felt called to preach and joined the Susquehanna Conference of the Free Methodist Church in 1876. His father became a minister in the same conference.

Clark served as pastor and district elder until elected bishop in 1919. His writings, few in number, contain almost perfect sentences. As in preaching, his choice of words was almost faultless. A superb preacher, occupied with great truth, he exalted Christ, the Savior of men and Lord of the Universe. His sermons were profound, beautiful and uplifting. He died at his home in Rome, N. Y., Nov. 8, 1925.

CLARK COLLEGE, Atlanta, Ga., was established in 1869 by the FREEDMEN'S AID SOCIETY of the M. E. Church. It was named Clark University for Bishop DAVIS WAGGATT CLARK, first president of the Freedmen's Aid Society and one of the leaders in the promotion of educational and religious work for Negroes. In 1880, the college acquired a tract of land consisting of 450 acres on the south side of the city, where the university remained for sixty years.

In 1941, the college became a part of the Atlanta University Center, which consists of six independent institutions on contiguous campuses. The education plant, with its commodious and serviceable buildings, was made possible largely through the generous grants of Mrs. HENRY PFEIFFER, the General Education Board, and the Rosenwald Foundation. The Interdenominational Theological Center, a professional school for the training of clergymen and religious leaders, is formed by four theological schools, chief of which was GAMMON THEOLOGICAL SCHOOL, formerly the theological department of Clark University. The degrees granted are the B.A., B.S., and B.S. in H.E. (Home Economics). The governing board has thirty members, three fourths of whom are Methodists; eleven elected by the General Board of Education of The Methodist Church, the remaining members by the board itself.

JOHN O. GROSS

ADAM CLARKE

CLARKE, ADAM (1760?-1832), preacher, Oriental linguist, Bible commentator, and one of the finest gifts of IRELAND to British and world Methodism, was born near Maghera, County Londonderry, but spent most of his youth at Ballyagherston, midway between Coleraine and Portstewart, in that same county in the north of Ireland. His father, a sizar of Trinity College, DUBLIN, was a local schoolmaster who cultivated a small farm to eke out his livelihood.

In 1779, Adam Clarke was converted under Methodist preaching. His influence for good attracted the attention of John Bredin, then a Methodist preacher in Londonderry, but formerly a Roman Catholic schoolmaster. On July 19, 1782, Bredin sent Clarke to preach his first sermon at New Buildings, about three miles from the city. The text was I John 5:19. It was Bredin who felt convinced that the young man was called to the Christian ministry, and his strong recommendation led to a summons to KINGSWOOD SCHOOL and a direct commission by JOHN WESLEY in September of that same year to go as an itinerant preacher at Trowbridge on the Bradford-on-Avon circuit, which covered a great part of the counties of Wiltshire, Dorset and Somerset, England.

So successful was his ministry that at the CONFERENCE of 1783 Adam Clarke had the unique distinction of being received into full connection after a probation of less than one year. From then on he followed an amazing career as an itinerant Methodist preacher, who combined in a wonderful way evangelism with learning, simplicity with high society, and local pastoral care with wide connexional responsibility. He who faced hostile mobs in his early preaching days became one of the greatest scholars of his age. He received academic honors from Aberdeen University, and was elected a member of the Royal Irish Academy as well as of many other learned societies.

His chief reputation was as a linguist, particularly in Oriental languages, in addition to Latin, Greek and Hebrew. He was a specialist in Arabic, and the total number of languages he knew cannot now be determined. Including dialects, it is put at least twenty. The British and Foreign Bible Society made much use of his skill. He translated the obscure Coptic inscription on the Rosetta Stone which had baffled all other eminent scholars. Over many years from 1808 he was entrusted by a Royal Commission with the task of collecting and arranging from the archives of the United Kingdom the documents known as Rymer's Foedera, that is all State papers from the Norman Conquest to the accession of George III.

Besides many other publications, his magnum opus was the famous multi-volume Commentary on the Bible. Over and above all his other great responsibilities, he was engaged on this from May 1798 until March 1825. "The vastness of planning and writing this great work by one pair of hands and one brain should be appreciated" (J. B. Ewens). The Commentary had a large sale in both Britain and America; 11,800 copies had to be printed to meet the first demand, and it remained the standard work in this field for many years. As it was written before the effective beginning of modern textual study and historical criticism, it has no great value for the scholar of today. Yet it remains a landmark in the history of Biblical study, for Adam Clarke combined profound learning with simple exposition in a way few other commentators have done. He continued the tradition established by John Wesley in his Explanatory Notes upon the New Testament in using the best of scholarship of the time. In some ways he was ahead of his time, for example in suggesting that the Song of Solomon does not properly belong to Holy Scripture, and that Judas would eventually be saved. Writing of the Song of Solomon, he is candid enough to say it was a book difficult to interpret in a spiritual way, and he maintained he could see in it nothing of Christ and His Church, and nothing that appeared to have been intended to be thus understood. He was severely criticized for these and other "modern" views.

Criticism also arose over his attitude to the doctrine of the Eternal Sonship of Jesus Christ (Luke 1:35). Even as a young man he could not be persuaded of this, and on this point he was never regarded as orthodox. After his death there was an unseemly wrangle in the British Conference over his official obituary. Eventually, as printed in the Minutes of Conference, this obituary contained no mention either in disparagement or praise of this Commentary. Beyond all the criticism that was and can be made, however, it was a noble and unique work; it had immense and widespread influence, for Adam Clarke had a warmth of approach and a way of making the meaning of the text so clear that it can still be read with spiritual, if not scholastic, profit.

It was above all as a preacher of the gospel of the love of God for sinful man that Adam Clarke himself preferred to be remembered. He travelled many of the important circuits of British Methodism. In his early ministry his ability to speak French led to his appointment to the CHANNEL ISLANDS (1786-89), where he was followed by his old mentor, John Bredin, and in later years, while still on circuit in LONDON, he had oversight of mission work in the SHETLAND ISLANDS.

He never forgot Ireland. He visited it on more than one occasion. His one appointment there was to Dublin in 1790, and he took advantage of this to attend several courses in the medical school of Trinity College. He founded the branch of the STRANGERS' FRIEND SOCIETY still in existence in that city. Concerned for the children of the poor in his native Ulster, he founded in 1831 six mission day schools. Portrush Church is today on the site of the first of such schools. Worshipers are summoned by Clarke's "Moscow Bell." This bell was presented by the Emperor Alexander of Russia to the Duke of Newcastle, British Ambassador, who gave it to Clarke. At neighboring Portstewart, the Methodist church is built on the site Clarke purchased in the hope that he could erect there a home for his retirement.

He never achieved that hope. His constant industry and his restless activity precipitated his death, for he was not able to resist an attack of cholera at the age of seventy-one. He was buried next to his hero, John Wesley, in the graveyard at City Road, London.

Despite criticisms made of him and of some of his beliefs, no one, apart from Wesley himself, won so much affection inside Methodism and so much regard outside its bounds. He was President of the British Conference three times, and of the Irish Conference four times. He was one of those most concerned with the PLAN OF PACIFICATION in 1795, and perhaps more than to any other person it was due to Adam Clarke that Wesleyan Methodism was held together in the difficult and troublesome period after the death of John Wesley, and thus was able to become a powerful connectional church in the nineteenth century.

CLARKEBURY INSTITUTION is situated in the Mgwali Valley, Tembuland (part of the Transkei), SOUTH AFRICA, where a mission was founded in 1830 by Richard Haddy under the direction of WILLIAM SHAW. In the next twenty-five years it was served by a succession of missionaries, the last of whom, J. S. Thomas, was murdered by cattle raiders in 1855. The station was left vacant until PETER HARGREAVES arrived in 1857 to commence a ministry which lasted until 1881. Hargreaves laid the foundations of Clarkebury's future greatness and, in particular, established the Educational Institution for African youths in 1876. The Tembu people contributed £1,000 towards the initial cost of £1,500. The Institution combined elementary education and instruction in such trades as carpentry, shoemaking, blacksmithing and printing. Outstanding among subsequent governors were H. W. Davis (1882-98) and A. J. Lennard (1899-1924). The standard of teacher training was progressively improved; the Dalindyebo Secondary School was opened in 1927; and in 1929 girls were admitted to the Secondary and Teacher Training Schools. The Schools were taken over by the Government in 1956 in terms of the Bantu Education Act of 1953, but the church retained control of the hostels which at present house 593 boarders. A high percentage of Clarkebury pupils has entered the Methodist ministry and others have taken their place in the professions and trades.

CLARKSBURG, WEST VIRGINIA, U.S.A. First Church had its beginning after FRANCIS ASBURY held a QUARTERLY CONFERENCE in Clarksburg on July 11, 1788. It was a log church building with a clapboard roof and windows covered with greased paper. As conditions in the town improved, Thomas Beck, pastor, urged the congregation to build a larger and better building. This came to be a rectangular room of brick having a gallery for the Negro membership. In 1861 the Union Army used the church building as a barracks and such services as were held were conducted in the county courthouse.

With the coming of the Civil War the Clarksburg congregation split so that the charter membership of the M. E. Church, South was made up largely of former members of the local M. E. Church. The Southern Methodists formed a "class" in Clarksburg in 1847 and organized a church in 1850. Their first building was completed in 1856. In 1922 the Southern church was named St. Paul's M. E. Church, South.

In 1888 the M. E. Church built a new structure, Goff Centenary Chapel. This building continued in use until 1906 when the membership increased and took on new vigor. A Hummelstone building with a green tile roof was erected and dedicated as First Church, Sunday, Oct. 10, 1909. A landmark in Clarksburg, it served until Sept. 4, 1951, when it was destroyed by fire. While a new structure was being planned and built, the First Church congregation worshipped in Robinson Grand Theater and church school classes met in many locations throughout the city.

The present Gothic structure was completed in 1956 at a cost of $1,250,000, and was dedicated by Bishop Fred G. Holloway, Oct. 9, 1966.

John E. Hanifan served the church for nineteen years (1937-56), including the period of the fire and reconstruction. Jewelled stained glass windows and a hand-carved wooden reredos were placed in 1965. A fifty-stop three manual pipe organ was installed in 1967, and was consecrated on Sunday, April 20, with Dr. George Markey at the console.

In 1965 the congregations of St. Paul's Church and First Church united, creating an even stronger, more vigorous church. In 1970 there were 1,641 members and a staff of four ministers. The St. Paul's building is used for the church operated counseling service, a clothing center, and the "Coffee House" serving high school and Salem College students.

CLASS LEADERS were appointed by Wesley in 1742, first to collect the contributions of members of the society living in their area, and later to exercise pastoral responsibility over these members as they gathered in weekly CLASS MEETINGS. Collectively they formed the nucleus of the LEADERS' MEETING of the society. This office, filled both by men and women from the outset, continues to the present day in British Methodism.

CLASS MEETINGS in British Methodism must not be confused with BAND meetings, from which they differed in the following respects: (1) The classes were designed for those seeking salvation, the bands for those who had found it. (2) While, in JOHN WESLEY'S view, "meeting a class" was a condition of continuance in the United Society's membership, "meeting a band" was not. (3) In the typical class there was none of the extensive segregation and grading of the band system, in which men were separated from women, the married from the unmarried, the ordinary band members from the "penitents," and both these from the "select company" of those approaching perfection. (4) Whereas numbers in classes varied, they were generally larger than the five to ten members of the more intimate band meetings. (5) The class arrived by accident, the band by design, John Wesley deliberately introducing the latter into the BRISTOL society on April 4, 1739, having proved the worth of this MORAVIAN institution both in GEORGIA and in the FETTER LANE Society in London.

Classes were first formed on February 15, 1742, as a means of paying off the debt of £150 on the ill-constructed New Room in Bristol. A Captain Foy suggested that every member should contribute a penny a week. When it was pointed out that some could not afford it he made the famous offer: "True, then put ten or twelve of them to me. Let each of these give what they can weekly, and I will supply what is wanting." Others made the same offer, and the whole society was divided into companies or classes under the various leaders whose task it was to collect the pennies and bring them to the steward weekly. The word "class" had nothing to do with schooling, but was taken from the Latin classis, which could indicate a group of Christians summoned for assessment (see COLLECTIONS).

From being a financial expedient the class became also the long-sought answer to the need for better pastoral oversight for the increasing numbers of Methodists. One of the leaders informed John Wesley that during his peace-collecting he had found one member quarreling with his wife, and another the worse for drink, whereupon Wesley required the class leaders not only to collect pennies but also to inquire into the behavior of each member.

Finally, the financial expedient developed into the meeting of the class. For their mutual advantage it was decided that the class members should together visit the leader every week instead of the leader calling on them. Wesley lists the benefits derived from this institution:

Advice or reproof was given as need required, quarrels made up, misunderstandings removed: And after an hour or two spent in this labour of love, they concluded with prayer and thanksgiving. . . . Many now happily experienced that Christian fellowship of which they had not so much as an idea before.

Such was the success of this "little prudential regulation" that it was soon part and parcel of Methodism everywhere. "Class money," which became a penny a week plus a shilling a quarter, was devoted to the needs of the poor and the propagation of the Gospel. The amounts subscribed were entered by the leader in a "class book" (first called a "class paper") together with other information about the members which might be of help to the preacher when he came to the quarterly examination of their spiritual state. The "class ticket," given to those who passed this test, though it did not indicate so high a standard of spiritual attainment as a band ticket, nevertheless served as a letter of commendation, a countersign for entrance into the meetings of the society.

The causes for the decline of the class meeting, which set in later than that of the bands, included a shortage of suitable class leaders and a stereotyping of the religious experiences retailed week by week. Many, well content to come to Sunday worship and Holy Communion, had no desire to lay bare their souls in a small company. In the second half of the nineteenth century it proved impossible in most parts of world Methodism to make "meeting a class" the sine qua non of society membership, and in the twentieth century attendance at class has become the exception rather than the rule. There are signs however, that the modern "house group" is reviving much that was sound in the class meetings, while counteracting their tendency to excessive introspection by its emphasis on Bible study.

In American Methodism class meetings were adopted at an early date, but they were never so strictly a test of church membership as in England. The sessions followed the order that had been proposed by Wesley. The leaders were virtually sub-pastors being appointed by the pastors and acting under them. They not only held the class meetings but also visited the sick, met the pastors and the stewards, collected and paid over the funds from the classes, and reported on members needing or desiring the services of the pastors in their homes. Bands were also formed, but they do not seem to have developed into much importance.

The Minutes of the CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE, published in 1785 as a "Form of Discipline" of the Methodist Episcopal Church in America, included provisions for classes and leaders. They enjoined strictness in admitting strangers to the society. "At every other Meeting of the Society in every Place, let no Stranger be admitted," ran the rule. "At other Times they may: but the same Person not above twice or thrice. In order to this, see that all in every Place shew their Tickets before they come in. If the Stewards and Leaders are not exact herein, employ others that have more Resolution." This same care was enjoined with reference to the love feasts. Strangers were to "be admitted with the utmost Caution," and the same person was not to be admitted more than twice unless he became a member.

Directions for classes and their leaders were included in the Disciplines which followed, and were expanded from time to time as late as 1880 in the M. E. Church. During this period the class meetings and leaders were regarded with considerable seriousness. In February 1838 the following appeared in the quarterly conference record at New Madrid, Missouri:

Question: Are there any complaints?

Answer: There is. (1). Against Brother Howell for not attending his class faithfully. (2). Against Brother Michel for not attending to the delinquency of Brother Howell.

By the beginning of the twentieth century, however, class meetings had become exceptional among American Methodists. When in the next decade some pastors of large churches found it expedient to divide their congregations into geographical groups under lay sub-pastors, they chose to call the groups "units." The 1920 General Conference of the M. E. Church endorsed this method as a partial revival of a revered Methodist practice by inserting "or units" in the regulations about classes which had been retained in the Discipline. At Unification in 1939 these regulations and those still left in the Discipline of the Methodist Protestant Church were dropped (the Church South had deleted them in 1934). Besides the historical description in the GENERAL RULES, however, there was carried over in the list of pastoral duties that "to form classes"—assumed by most readers to refer to the church school but actually a vestige of the time when all Methodists were expected to testify in the class meeting.

CLASS TICKETS or MEMBERSHIP TICKETS were small cards used in early Methodism both in England and America to identify members of the Methodist SOCIETIES. They were first issued only to members of the BANDS, but later to every acceptable member of the societies. Originally the tickets bore simply a date, a scripture text and the member's name. Later they became a little more elaborate and included also the name of the preacher or minister issuing the ticket and sometimes the name of the society or church. In England they were issued by JOHN WESLEY or one of his ASSISTANTS; in America by the CIRCUIT preacher. As early as 1741 Wesley was issuing these identifying tickets, probably in his own handwriting, at Bristol.

Simpson writes of a later development: "Mr. Wesley himself decided, in 1743, to meet and talk with every member once in three months. If judged to be fit and proper, every member received a ticket." Apparently from then on the tickets were issued quarterly. At the Conference of 1747 some of the Assistants were selected by John Wesley to write the new lists of members and were empowered to renew the Quarterly Tickets. Two years later the Conference defined more clearly who were the "Assistants" and empowered them "to deliver new tickets" and "to take in or put out of the Society."

In 1765, at the Conference at Manchester, it was decided that the membership tickets should be uniform everywhere.

The oldest extant ticket of American Methodism is in the archives of the Rose Memorial Library at DREW UNIVERSITY and was issued Oct. 1, 1769, to Hannah Dean, a member of the JOHN STREET Society, New York, by ROBERT WILLIAMS. There are two interesting references to membership tickets in the records of the CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE in 1784. In answer to the question, "How shall we prevent improper persons from insinuating into the Society?" the Conference responded, "Give tickets to none till they are recommended by a Leader with whom they have met at least two months." Again, in answer to the question, "Should we insist on the rules concerning dress?" it was stated ". . . therefore give no tickets to any, till they have left off superfluous ornaments . . . Allow no exempt case, not even of a married woman. Better one suffer than many. Give no tickets to any that wear high heads, enormous bonnets, ruffles or rings."

In 1820, apparently the tickets were issued to include Love Feasts in particular, for Emory writes "After 'tickets' was inserted 'for the admission of members into love-feast.'" Coke and Asbury explained the value of the tickets thus:

This is of no small moment for the preservation of our discipline and the purity of our church. To admit frequently unawakened persons to our society meetings and love-feasts would be to throw a damp on those profitable assemblies, and cramp, if not entirely destroy, that liberty of speech which is always made a peculiar blessing to earnest believers and sincere seekers of salvation. Besides, this regulation affords the preacher who holds the office now under consideration an opportunity of speaking closely to every person under his care on the state of their souls. (Emory, p. 304.)

Simpson adds that, "This quarterly ticket, with the member's name written upon it, and signed by the minister, enables such an one to obtain everywhere the privilege of membership."

FREDERICK E. MASER

CLAY, CHARLES WESLEY (1907-), American second generation missionary to BRAZIL, was born in Hickory, N. C., on May 31, 1907. His first trip to Brazil was as a boy of six, when his father—John Wesley Clay, a layman and printer—was asked to modernize and equip the Methodist publishing house (Imprensa Metodista) for the Church in that country. After receiving elementary education in Brazil and in NORTH CAROLINA, Charles Clay received his A.B. from DUKE UNIVERSITY in 1929, and his B.D. in 1932.

He was then received into the WESTERN NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE (MES) and served pastorates in that state. On Dec. 30, 1932, he married Helen Witherspoon of Rock Hill, S. C. In 1934, he was ordained deacon by Bishop PAUL B. KERN; in 1936, he went to Brazil as a missionary and was ordained elder that year by Bishop CESAR DACORSO.

Charles Clay served in many capacities—as pastor, as Bible teacher at the Instituto Granbery, and as head of its religious education department. He was secretary of Christian education and social action for the Methodist Church of Brazil, 1938-41. In Piracicaba in 1941, he helped organize and conduct the first Young Peoples' Conference of the Methodist Church of Brazil.

In 1942 he was appointed to open a work in Victoria, capital of the state of Espirito Santo, where he remained for seven years, developing greatly the work there. Among other duties, he conducted a weekly radio program, wrote a weekly newspaper column, and worked among the penitentiary inmates. During this time, he was also district superintendent, traveling over parts of three states, by truck, bus, freight train, horseback, and on foot, through jungles and areas just being settled. He directed the construction of several churches and parsonages.

One of Charles Clay's most important contributions has been the founding in 1944 of the Instituto Rural Evangélico at Itapina. Before this there was an almost total lack of educational facilities for rural youth and adults, and Clay started a school where young people, especially Protestants, could receive a practical Christian education and learn agriculture at the same time to support themselves. The first years of the center were truly difficult, but the school became firmly established and has produced a large number of Christian workers for rural communities.

From 1946-50, Charles Clay was secretary of social action for the Methodist Church of Brazil; from 1950-65, secretary of Christian education, involving the overall supervision of the entire educational program of the Methodist Church, including leadership training for laymen and pastors. He founded two magazines, one for men and one for teen-agers, and promoted regional and national conferences for youths, adults, and pastors.

He has also written many articles and six books, one being a Manual for Christian Workers in Rural Areas. This he wrote in collaboration with J. B. Griffing, formerly with the Rockefeller Foundation in Brazil. In July of 1965, the General Conference asked Clay to continue in this position, but he decided to return to the pastorate. He was then appointed pastor of the Central Methodist Church in Brasilia, as well as superintendent of the missions surrounding the new capital. There are six organized churches and twelve preaching points.

Helen Clay, his wife, has also worked tirelessly, especially with the women of the church on local and national levels. After leaving Brasilia, Clay was appointed to Juiz de Fóra, Minas Gerais, where he now resides (1969).

CLAY, IONE (1892-), an American missionary to MEXICO and CUBA, was born June 13, 1892, in Dublin, Texas. Her first missionary service was in Cienfuegos, Cuba, 1922-23, but from 1923 to 1925 she taught in a church school in Monterey, Mexico. Returning to Cuba, she became director of Colegio Buenavista across the street from CANDLER COLLEGE in Marianao, Havana. This was the newest girls' school of the Methodist Church, founded in 1919 by Miss Belle Markey.

Under Miss Clay's leadership the school grew from 165 students to an enrollment of 675 and was recognized as one of the leading private schools for girls in the island. Its main purpose was the training of Christian teachers. During her administration three buildings were constructed. Retiring in 1955 after thirty-four years of service she returned to her native home in Dublin, Texas.

CLAYBORN, JOHN HENRY (1881-1954), an American bishop of the A.M.E. Church, was born in Spring Hill, Ark. on Dec. 2, 1881. He was the son of Dave and Martha Clayborn. He attended PHILANDER-SMITH COLLEGE, SHORTER COLLEGE, and Jackson Theological Seminary—all in ARKANSAS. He was licensed to preach in 1903, ordained DEACON in 1904 and ELDER in 1906. In 1902 he married Lula B. Mitchell. There were six children. He was a pastor and a presiding elder in Arkansas, editor of the Southern Christian Recorder and president of Shorter College in Arkansas before his election to the episcopacy in 1944. He was then assigned to West Africa from 1944-46, and to the Second, Twelfth (South and Southeast) and Thirteenth (Tennessee and Kentucky) episcopal districts of his church from 1946-54. He died on June 17, 1954. Bishop Clayborn was the only A.M.E. Bishop who served in Africa during World War II. He was also the first A.M.E. Bishop to fly there.

CLAYTON, JOHN (1709-1773), member of the HOLY CLUB, was the son of a Manchester bookseller. He matriculated at Brasenose College, Oxford, on July 17, 1725, at the early age of fifteen, graduated B.A. in 1729, and proceeded to M.A. in 1732. In this latter year he met JOHN WESLEY and accepted his invitation to join the Holy Club. It was on Clayton's suggestion that the group began to observe the "stations" or "stationary fasts" every Wednesday and Friday in imitation of the primitive church.

In 1733 Clayton returned to Manchester to become chaplain of the Collegiate Church, of which he was elected Fellow in 1760. Through Clayton, Wesley came to know the Manchester Non-Jurors John Byrom and Thomas Deacon, assisting the latter in his Complete Collection of Devotions (1734). A coolness developed between Wesley and Clayton from 1738 onward, as Wesley's enthusiasm for Non-Juring practices waned at the same time as he grew more ready to undertake unorthodox experiments in evangelism. Clayton died on Sept. 25, 1773.

CLEARWATER, FLORIDA, U.S.A. First Church is a 3,000-member congregation in a beach resort on Florida's west coast. Methodist preaching began in the vicinity about 1857, and the first church building was erected in 1885. A new sanctuary was built at Fort Harrison Avenue and Turner Street in 1921. A youth building was constructed in 1942, and ten years later a new colonial style sanctuary was erected. In 1961 Wesley Hall, an education building for children, was erected. Clearwater became a station in 1911, and two years later the church reported 232 members. In 1939 it had 691 members, 1,070 in 1950, and 2,453 in 1960. In 1970 First Church reported 3,085 members, property valued at $1,249,071, and $218,504 raised for all purposes.

CLEGG, W. LEMUEL. (See JUDICIAL COUNCIL.)

CLEMENT, EMMA CLARISSA WILLIAMS (?-1952), American Negro woman of poise and judgment, became nationally known through her sons and daughters. She was a daughter of John and Abbie Williams, one of three children, and was born in Providence, R. I. She attended the public schools of that city and later attended and was graduated from LIVINGSTONE COLLEGE, Salisbury, N. C. This school was chosen for her higher training since the first president of that institution made frequent visits to her home city and often stayed in John and Abbie Williams' home.

On the same day (May 25, 1898) that Emma Clarissa Williams graduated from Livingstone, she married George C. Clement, A.M.E. Zion preacher. Clement at that time was the minister of Soldiers Memorial Church, Salisbury, N. C. Later he was elected Editor of the denominational weekly, The Star of Zion. From this office he was elected a bishop of the church.

Emma Clarissa Clement was widely known because of her selection as "American Mother of the Year" in 1946. Every child born to George and Emma Clarissa Clement graduated from Livingstone College. Many went on to other institutions as well. Her daughter, Abbie Clement Jackson, one time Executive Secretary and later President of her denomination's Woman's Home and Foreign Missionary Society, served also as a Vice President of the NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, and held the same office in the North American section of World Methodist Women. Her son, RUFUS EARLY CLEMENT, formerly Dean of Livingstone College and Louisville Municipal College and later President of Atlanta University, was held in high esteem over the South. A daughter, Ruth Clement Bond, spent much time abroad in at least eighteen different countries, much of this under the A.I.D. program. Another son, George Williams Clement, was head of the Public Relations bureau of the Mammoth Life Insurance Company, Louisville, Ky. Other children are Frederick Albert Clement, James Addison Clement, presently minister of Varick Church, Philadelphia, and a Lt. Col., retired, U. S. Army Chaplain's Corps; and Emma Clement Walker, instructor in English, Tuskegee Institute.

Mrs. Clement's selection as Mother of the Year in 1946 was widely applauded as just and appropriate. She died Feb. 6, 1952.

DAVID A. BRADLEY

CLEMENT, RUFUS EARLY (1900-1967), American Negro leader and university president, was born in Salisbury, N. C., on June 26, 1900, the son of George Clinton and EMMA CLARISSA (WILLIAMS) CLEMENT. His mother became American Mother of the Year. Rufus Clement was educated at LIVINGSTONE COLLEGE, A.B., 1919, and LL.D. 1956; GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE, B.D., 1922; NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY, A.M., 1922, and Ph.D., 1930; the University of Liberia gave him the D.C.L. degree in 1956, and he received numerous honorary degrees from other institutions, including an LL.D. from Manhattanville College of the Sacred Heart. He married Pearl Anne Johnson on Dec. 23, 1919, and their daughter was Alice Clarissa (Mrs. Robert P. Foster).

He became instructor in history at Livingstone College, 1922-25; professor of history and dean there, 1925-31; the Dean of Louisville Municipal College for Negroes at the University of Louisville, 1931-37. At that time, he became president of Atlanta University in Atlanta, Ga., and thereafter took a prominent part, not only in educational circles in Atlanta, but in business circles as well. He was director of the Citizens Trust Company and elected a member of the Atlanta Board of Education in 1954, the first Negro to serve in such a capacity in Atlanta.

He was a delegate to the WORLD METHODIST CONFERENCE, Oxford University, 1951, being a lifetime member of the A.M.E. Zion Church. He served as trustee of Livingstone College, Morehouse College, and of Spellman College; was a member of the United States State Department Council of African Affairs; vice chairman of the Georgia Committee on Inter-racial Cooperation; on the executive committee of the Southern Regional Council; and was the recipient of the Alumni Award of Merit from Northwestern University, 1948. He was a member of several other professional and civic associations of the state and nation, and became widely known for his influence and leadership, not only in his own institution, but in the wider affairs of his state. Upon his sudden death Nov. 7, 1967, The Atlanta Journal said of him, "Dr. Rufus E. Clement for more than three decades was an integral force for better education and a better community in Atlanta. His death Tuesday was a great loss to the city. . . . In 1953 Atlanta showed its respect for Dr. Clement by electing him to its Board of Education, the first Negro to serve there. . . . His life ends at a time when new light has broken through, in substantial part because of men like himself."

CLEMENTS, EUSTON EDGAR (1876-1962), an American missionary to CUBA and leader of the church there, was born in Montgomery County (now Wheeler), Ga., on March 5, 1876. He was educated at Emory College, Oxford, Ga., graduating with the class of 1896. He joined the SOUTH GEORGIA CONFERENCE in 1897 and a few months later, on June 15, 1901, he went to Cuba as a missionary. He served as pastor of the American congregation at Havana, at Santa Clara, at Cardenas, at Matanzas, and at the Central Church, Havana. He was superintendent of the Havana District, principal of the Candler College, of Pinson College at Camaguey, and was in the Central Methodist School at Havana for another term. He was the Dean of the Seminary at Havana for twelve years and Mission treasurer for 34 years.

E. E. Clements married first Estelle Harvard on Oct. 10, 1900, a native of Georgia and a graduate of LaGrange College in that state. The young couple went to Cuba shortly after they were married where they labored together until 1918 when Mrs. Clements died. E. E. Clements married a second time on June 21, 1923, Mrs. Manelle Forster Caperton (who had been born in Pilot Grove, Mo. on April 26, 1889) and was the widow of John Franklin Caperton (born Sept. 2, 1885, Itasca, Texas) who also had served under the General Board of Missions of the M. E. Church, South. Mrs. Caperton had herself gone to Cuba as a missionary under the Woman's Missionary Council of the Church, South, in 1914, and there married John Caperton, who died in 1921.

E. E. Clements retired in 1943 after completing forty-two years of service, always holding two or three appointments concurrently—even in the district superintendency (or presiding eldership as it was) for a total of twenty years. He was the legal representative in Cuba for the Board of Missions of the M. E. Church, South, and the clerical delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCES of that Church of 1914, 1918, 1922, 1926, and to the UNITING CONFERENCE in 1939. He died on Oct. 4, 1962, and was buried in Birmingham, Ala. He left a deep impress upon Cuban Methodism and continues to be held in reverence by those who remember his life and work there.

CLEVELAND, OHIO, U.S.A. The first Methodist society in what is now Cleveland was organized in 1818. It later became Brooklyn Memorial Church. The Cuyahoga Circuit which included the Cleveland area was formed in 1818. In 1823 Cleveland was a remote point on the Hudson Circuit, Portland District, OHIO CONFERENCE. The PITTSBURGH CONFERENCE was created in 1824, and its Ohio District included the Hudson Circuit. In 1827 the Cleveland Circuit was formed with John Crawford and C. Jones appointed to travel it. Crawford organized a class of seven members in Cleveland. In 1830 Cleveland became a station with B. O. Plimpton as pastor, and at the end of the year the charge reported thirty-five members. The church had 120 members in 1836. In that year the Erie Conference was created, and eastern Ohio including Cleveland was in that conference until the organization of the EAST OHIO CONFERENCE in 1876.

First Church, Cleveland, was incorporated in 1839, and a church building was erected in 1841. It was replaced in 1874 with a $150,000 edifice with a seating capacity of 1,500. In 1876 First Church had 484 members, and in that year there were seven other congregations of the M. E. Church in the city with a total of 1,268 members. First Church has continued through the years. In 1920 it reported nearly 2,000 active members. In 1970 it had 226 members and property valued at $4,001,300.

Euclid Church started as a prayer meeting at Dean's Corners in 1818. A building was erected in 1827, and ten years later a new church was built at 105th Street. Known as the East Cleveland Church beginning in 1875, the congregation moved to East 93rd Street in 1884 and took the name of Euclid Avenue Church.

Epworth Church began as a Sunday school in 1875. It was called Prospect Street Church and then Central Church. In 1889 the EPWORTH LEAGUE was organized in Central Church, and three years later Central changed its name to Epworth Memorial Church. A new building was erected in 1891. In 1920 Epworth Memorial and Euclid Avenue Churches merged to form Epworth-Euclid Church. At the time of the merger Epworth had 1,839 members and Euclid Avenue 556. In 1970, Epworth-Euclid Church reported 1,100 members and property valued at $4,624,000. The church edifice is regarded as one of the most beautiful in America.

In 1886 the Cleveland Missionary Society was founded. Now known as the Methodist Union, Incorporated, it is composed of representatives from each church in the Cleveland District, and it is responsible for the organizational functions of the denomination in the district. Methodist institutions in greater Cleveland include St. Luke's Methodist Hospital; the Children's Home in Berea, Ohio; the GOODWILL INDUSTRIES; the West Side Community House; and BALDWIN-WALLACE COLLEGE. The West Side Methodist Parish, composed of four churches, ministers to the Spanish-speaking people in the area.

Cleveland was the headquarters of the EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION. In 1854 that denomination moved its publishing house from New Berlin, Pa., to Cleveland, and thereafter as new general church boards were created, they also were domiciled in Cleveland. After the merger of the Evangelical Association with the United Evangelical Church in 1922 to form the Evangelical Church, the offices in Cleveland were continued along with those in Harrisburg, Pa., which had been the headquarters city of the United Evangelical Church. Following the union of the Evangelical Church and the United Brethren Church in 1946 to form the EVANGELICAL UNITED BRETHREN CHURCH, all general church boards and offices, save a publishing plant at Harrisburg, Pa., were moved to Dayton, Ohio.

In 1970 there were five congregations of the former Evangelical United Brethren Church in Cleveland proper. They reported a total of 1,202 members and property valued at $1,369,994. Calvary Church with 438 members was the largest of the five.

In 1970 there were some fifty-eight congregations of the former Methodist Church in the Cleveland District, about half of them in the city proper. Lakewood, Rocky River, and Christ Churches were the largest with 3,570, 2,689, and 2,107 members, respectively. Some fifteen other churches in the district had memberships ranging from 1,017 to 1,932. In 1970 the Cleveland District reported a total of 45,405 members, property valued at $37,996,211, and $4,054,060 raised for all purposes.

Christ Church, located at West 138th Street and Lorain Avenue, was formed in June, 1938 when Bethany and West Park Churches united. In 1937 the one church had reported 252 members and the other 464. Bethany, which began as a Sunday school in a wigwam at 86th and Lorain in March, 1893, was a charge in the CENTRAL GERMAN CONFERENCE until that body was absorbed by the overlying English-speaking conferences in 1933. At the time of the merger of the congregations, Bethany was located at 91st Street and Willard Avenue. West Park Church, an English-speaking congregation from its beginning, started as a mission in a storeroom and saloon at West 143rd and Lorain in August, 1908. The congregation bought lots at 138th and Lorain in 1925 and soon constructed a basement church, but because of the economic depression was unable to complete it. W. W. Dieterich, district superintendent, promoted the merger of the two congregations in 1938, and in November, 1939, Christ Church occupied its present Gothic sanctuary. The congregation grew steadily, passing the 1,000 membership mark in 1943, 1,500 in 1950, and 2,000 in 1960. In 1956 the sanctuary was enlarged, and a chapel, fellowship hall, and more church school rooms were added. In 1970 Christ Church reported 2,073 members, property valued at $639,500, and $85,746 raised for all purposes.

Cory Church began in 1875 in the home of James

Hankins, 2336 East 36th Street. First known as Union Chapel Mission, it was later named for J. B. Cory, a member of the EAST OHIO CONFERENCE who under appointment as city missionary befriended the mission. The church moved to 2224 East 37th Street in 1892 and to 3500 Scovill Avenue in 1911. In 1947 the congregation acquired the spacious Jewish Center and Synagogue at 1117 East 105th Street, a complex which has a sanctuary seating 2,300, a concert hall with 900 seats, 43 rooms, a gymnasium, a swimming pool, and two kitchens. Reporting 104 members in 1900, Cory Church had 700 by 1920, 1,400 by 1940, and over 2,300 in 1960. Able men from the former Central Jurisdiction served Cory Church as pastors. Eleven men from its membership have gone into the ministry. During its history Cory Church has sponsored the organization of six other congregations in Cleveland—Calvary, East Side Mission, Mount Pleasant, St. Matthews, St. Paul, and Werner—and all except Calvary Church are still in existence. In 1970 Cory Church reported 1,205 members, property valued at $1,022,000, and $76,928 raised for all purposes.

Rocky River Church, located some eight miles from downtown Cleveland, began as a small rural congregation. It first appeared in the list of conference appointments in 1912. The next year it reported ninety-nine members. Ten years later it had 155 members. As the rural area became a suburban community, the church membership grew, reaching 650 by 1938 and 1,500 by 1950. Since World War II, the congregation has erected a colonial style sanctuary and an education building. Notwithstanding the size of its membership, Rocky River Church endeavors to maintain a friendly family type of congregation. In the church school there is team teaching in classes for all ages. Also, a world-wide missionary emphasis is maintained. In 1970 Rocky River Church reported 2,591 members, property valued at $1,376,195, and $254,708 raised for all purposes.

M. RICHARD DRAKE

St. James A. M. E. Church, began in 1887 as a mission composed of eight persons from the St. John A. M. E. Church, the first Negro church of any denomination in Cleveland, and the mother of several A. M. E. churches in the city. P. Ransom, a minister, organized the St. James Church at a prayer meeting in the home of James and Rosebud Johnson on Jan. 24, 1887.

St. James' first house of worship was located at Cedar Street and Hudson Avenue. Then in 1926 the congregation purchased the old Trinity Congregational Church. This building was badly damaged by fire in 1938, but was rebuilt in one year under the leadership of Joseph Gomez. Three of St. James' pastors have been elevated to the episcopacy: C. RANSOM (1924), D. ORMONDE WALKER (1948), and JOSEPH GOMEZ (1948).

CLEVELAND, TENNESSEE, U.S.A., Broad Street Church. It is claimed that the first Methodist preaching in the vicinity of what is now Cleveland was conducted in a log schoolhouse erected by a preacher named Price while the region was still regarded as Indian territory. Broad Street Church has purchased the old structure and will preserve it for its historical significance.

The town of Cleveland was established in 1836, and in that year the HOLSTON CONFERENCE appointed Charles K. Lewis to the Cleveland Circuit which included Bradley, Polk, and James Counties. In 1837, Lewis organized a Methodist church of about twelve members in the courthouse at Cleveland. In 1840 the congregation erected a frame church. In 1845 the church adhered South, and in 1849 it erected a brick building at what is now Second and Church Streets. In October, 1849 the Holston Conference (MES) met in the new church. At that time the Cleveland Circuit reported 1,042 white and forty-nine colored members. In 1855 Cleveland became a station church, and the next year it reported 120 members. During the first part of the Civil War the Confederate Army used the church building as a hospital, and in the latter part of the conflict, the Federal troops stabled their horses in it. Badly damaged from such use, the building was torn down in 1866. From 1863 to 1867 the Southern Methodists arranged to hold their worship services in the Cumberland Presbyterian Church. During that time a great revival swept the community, effecting 141 conversions.

In June, 1865, the M. E. Church organized a Holston Conference covering about the same territory as the Holston Conference of the M. E. Church, South. Two months later some members of the Southern church in Cleveland withdrew and organized what came to be known as First M. E. Church. First Church reported seventy-five members in 1866. The congregation erected a church building in 1872 and built again in 1910. In the latter year the church had 246 members.

In 1867 the Cleveland M. E. Church, South erected a new building at Broad and Central, and since that time it has been known as Broad Street Church. The present church edifice was built in 1893. In 1922 an education building was added. A chapel, dining hall, and social hall have been built since World War II. Broad Street Church has sent five men from its membership into the ministry, and one, JAMES ATKINS, licensed in 1870, was elected bishop in 1906. Nine sessions of the Holston Conference (MES) were held in Broad Street Church.

In 1970 Broad Street Church reported 963 members and property valued at $870,081, while First Church had 606 members and property worth $410,500.

CLIFF COLLEGE, British Methodist college for laymen, offering tuition in Bible studies, theology, and evangelism, is situated in the Peak District, Derbyshire. The college was founded in Bolton in 1884 by THOMAS CHAMPNESS from the income of the evangelical weekly Joyful News. He moved to Rochdale in 1886 and established Castleton Hall there in 1889. The college was originally called the Joyful News Training Home and Mission. The WESLEYAN METHODIST CONFERENCE released Champness in 1889 to organize the work and gave him an assistant minister. Champness retired in 1903, and the Wesleyan Home Mission Department transferred the college to Hulmecliffe Hall near Bakewell, Derbyshire. Thomas Cook was made principal; his most distinguished successor was SAMUEL CHADWICK.

The college course is basically of a one-year type, and about a quarter of the students enter the Methodist ministry. Since its foundation the college has been the chief center in Britain of the Methodist holiness tradition. In the early years of the century, when biblical scholarship and evangelism seemed to be in conflict, the college received criticism as obscurantist, but both JAMES HOPE MOULTON and WILLIAM FIDDIAN MOULTON were connected with the college. The college seeks to unite positive scholarship with the best in evangelism. The college is well known for its Whitsuntide open-air meetings, and for the Derwent youth convention held annually in August.

CLIFTON, GEORGE (c. 1704-1789), nicknamed "Honest Munchin," a former prize fighter who was a leading member of a mob attacking JOHN WESLEY in Wednesbury in October, 1743. He was one of several who were apparently won over by Wesley's obvious courage and faith, and sought to protect him from their former allies, the mob of Walshall. CHARLES WESLEY accepted Clifton as a member on trial of the Methodist society, and when asked what he thought of John Wesley "Honest Munchin" replied: "Think of him! That he is a mon of God; and God was on his side, when so many of us could not kill one mon."

CLINTON, GEORGE WYLIE (1859-1921), a bishop of the A.M.E. Zion Church, was born in Cedar Creek Township, Lancaster Co., S. C., March 28, 1859. He was the son of Jonathan and Rachel (Paterson) Clinton. His father died when he was two years old, and he was reared by his grandparents until he was sixteen. He was educated in the schools of Lancaster County and the University of South Carolina. In 1876 Governor Wade Hampton forced all Negro students to withdraw from the University, and Clinton returned to his grandparents. He became a clerk in the office of C. P. Pelham, Auditor of Lancaster County, and at the same time began to study law in the offices of Allison and Connors, Lancaster County. He also began a study of the Bible; and, giving up his interest in law, he joined the South Carolina Conference in 1881. Appointed to Chester, S. C., he completed his college courses at Brainard Institute located in the same town. He served acceptably in several of the churches of the Conference, later being appointed to the John Wesley Church in Pittsburgh, Pa. A writer for many Negro newspapers and periodicals, he was influential in the founding of the A.M.E. Zion Quarterly Review of which he became editor. In 1892 he was elected editor of a weekly church paper, the Star of Zion, and in 1896 he was elected a bishop. On May 30, 1899 he married Annie M. Kimball. She died after a short time; and on Feb. 6, 1901, he married Marie L. Clay. He was a member of the ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCES of 1891, 1901, and 1911. He was a Trustee of LIVINGSTONE COLLEGE; Atkinson College; and Dinwiddie Institute. He was a member of the American Negro Academy; the International Sunday School Association; and was President of the Negro Young People's Religious and Educational Congress. He was a lecturer at Phelps Hall Biblical School, Tuskegee Institute, Alabama, and the author of two books: Three Alarm

Cries and Christianity Under Searchlight. He received the A.M. degree from Livingstone College in 1893 and a D.D. and an LL.D. from WILBERFORCE UNIVERSITY in 1894 and 1906.

CLINTON, JOSEPH JACKSON (1823-1881), a bishop of the A.M.E. Zion Church, was born Oct. 3, 1823, in Philadelphia, Pa. He received his early education in Mr. Bird's School in that city. Later he attended Allegheny Institute. He was converted at the age of fifteen and was licensed to preach two years later. He became a traveling minister in 1843 and in 1845 was ordained a deacon. The following year he was ordained an elder. In 1856 he was elected one of the Superintendents, the designated name then for those who are now called bishops. As was the custom of election or reelection every four years, Superintendent Clinton was returned to office in each of the following General Conferences until 1880, when the decision was made to elect General Superintendents (to be called Bishops) for life. He, along with the others then on the Board of Bishops, was so elected.

However, he was able to serve but one year following the change of rules, for he died in Atlantic City, May 24, 1881. His was the most fruitful period in the entire history of the denomination, for under his guidance no less than eleven annual conferences were organized as he supervised the work of such missionaries into the South as J. W. HOOD, Deacon Hill, Singleton T. Jones, J. J. MOORE and Wilbur Strong.

CLIPPINGER, ARTHUR R. (1878-1958), American U. B. preacher and bishop, was born in the village of Lurgan, Franklin Co., Pa. on Sept. 3, 1878, the son of Harry R. and Harriet (Gillan) Clippinger. The family, through several generations, were staunch members of the United Brethren in Christ.

As a farm boy he gave himself to religion and the church at an early age. He became a public school teacher at eighteen in which year he was also elected Sunday School superintendent. His ministerial license was granted by the Pennsylvania Conference in 1903. He served two churches as minister before he entered Yale Divinity School in 1907, graduating in 1910. In 1907, Arthur Clippinger married Bishop J. S. MILLS' daughter Ellen.

Recognized as a scholar, an organizer and a builder, he was appointed in 1910 to the pastorate of the Summit Street Church in Dayton, Ohio. In this church he was ordained in 1911. He led the growing congregation, closely related with the Seminary, in the erection of a new building changing the name to the Euclid Avenue Church. In 1918 the MIAMI CONFERENCE elected him superintendent, and in 1921 he was elevated to the office of bishop. He served the church and the central area in this capacity for almost thirty years, retiring in 1950. He served on nearly all the boards of the departments and agencies of his denomination and was a member of the FEDERAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. As an able administrator and executive, he was fair-minded and sympathetic toward those under his charge.

He died in Dayton, Ohio, on July 18, 1958.

CLOUDY BAY, early New Zealand Wesleyan mission station, situated on Ngakuta Bay, at the head of Cloudy Bay, Port Underwood, was founded by SAMUEL IRONSIDE on Dec. 20, 1840. Situated on Cook Strait near the northeast tip of the South Island, it was the second Wesleyan mission station to be founded in that island.

At first the work was strikingly successful; and by January, 1843, Ironside was able to report the construction of sixteen chapels, with thirty local preachers, six hundred members, and fifteen hundred hearers.

A clash between armed Maoris and a group of New Zealand Land Company agents illegally surveying the Wairau Plain occurred at Tua Marina on June 17, 1843, resulting in the death of twenty-two Europeans.

Fearing reprisals, virtually the whole Maori population of the Cloudy Bay area fled to Kapiti Island. Ironside was withdrawn, and a salaried schoolteacher was sent to look after the property, and to minister to the few remaining Maoris. Within a few years, the place was abandoned entirely.

A cairn and memorial tablet, dedicated in 1960, marks the site of the mission church known as Ebenezer Chapel in the center of the original mission area.

CLOWES, WILLIAM (1780-1851), British Methodist, co-founder, with HUGH BOURNE, of the PRIMITIVE METHODIST Connexion, was born at Burslem, Staffordshire, March 12, 1780. A potter by trade, Clowes had a somewhat dissolute youth, but became converted at a LOVE FEAST following Methodist preaching in Burslem Chapel. He began to take appointments as a LOCAL PREACHER and came into contact with JAMES CRAWFOOT and later LORENZO DOW. Clowes attended the first camp meeting on Mow COP, May 31, 1807. In 1810 his name was removed from the list of local preachers because of his participation in these meetings. He became leader of a new movement at Tunstall, and his followers were known as "CLOWESITES." Ultimately the "CAMP MEETING METHODISTS" under Hugh Bourne and the "Clowesites" coalesced to form the beginnings of the Primitive Methodist Connexion.

From 1810-18, Clowes was engaged in missionary labors, advancing into Cheshire and Lancashire, and moving on into Derbyshire. In 1816 he entered Nottinghamshire and Leicestershire, and then moved northward into Lincolnshire. In 1819 began his important mission to HULL. From there he pressed northward to YORK, with further extensions to LEEDS and Ripon. In 1822-23 he moved northward to Durham and Newcastle and westward to Cumberland. In 1824 he opened the work in London, from thence westward to Cornwall. For the next fifteen years he traveled widely confirming the churches. He superannuated in 1842. He was three times president of the Primitive Methodist Conference (1844-46). His labors in the closing years were mainly confined to Hull. He died on March 2, 1851, and was buried in the Spring Bank Cemetery. A man of profound faith and great spiritual power in preaching, he was the outstanding evangelist of Primitive Methodism in the early years.

COBB, GEORGE T. (1812-1870), American businessman, philanthropist, and United States senator, was born in Morristown, N. J., Oct. 13, 1812. During his early life he demonstrated judgment and skill in business, and as his means increased, bestowed his wealth freely upon and within his church. He was several times a member of Congress and served in the New Jersey Senate. He gave generously for public buildings. The beautiful church in Morristown, N. J., was erected largely under his supervision and through his liberality. Bishop MATTHEW SIMPSON said, "Integrity of the purest type, keen insight into public measures, knowledge of human nature, and philanthropy of princely kind, were among his leading characteristics," adding that at the time of his death he was unquestionably the chief statesman of New Jersey. In 1876, Cobb's widow, his daughter (Mrs. William B. Skidmore) and his niece (Ella Wandell) emulated and continued his philanthropy by giving $40,000 to endow a chair of New Testament in DREW THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, a large sum for those days. Cobb died in a railroad accident near White Sulphur Springs, Va., Aug. 6, 1870.

COCHABAMBA, Bolivia, is located in a high, fertile, densely populated valley of the eastern Andes and is an important agricultural center. It is the second largest city in BOLIVIA, with a population of more than 80,000. It is the center of the national airline and has rail connections with Oruro and LA PAZ.

Cochabamba is the headquarters of the Central District of the BOLIVIA CONFERENCE. The Church of the Savior was organized there in 1941 and occupies a fine building with a good educational building and parsonage. The community itself raised the funds for these buildings, though the pastor is a missionary of the Division of World Missions of The United Methodist Church. A Union Church for English-speaking people also meets in the Church of the Savior.

Bethel Church, Emanuel Church, and a mission post maintained by the Church of the Savior, are other centers in Cochabamba, as well as the institutions listed below.

American Institute is a Methodist school. Not long after the establishment of the American Institute in La Paz

(now Colegio Evangélico Metodista), citizens of Cochabamba began to seek better educational opportunities for their children and asked the Ministry of Education to allow Methodists to open a school. The government extended the invitation, and classes were begun in 1912.

Assigned to the task was John Washburn, a missionary who formerly had been director of the American Institute in La Paz. Religious teaching in the school was forbidden, but teachers and missionaries found it possible to extend a Christian influence through personal contacts with the children. The law subsequently was rescinded and today there are classes in religion and voluntary chapel services.

Washburn had 250 students during his first year, but the quarters were inadequate. The school was shifted from one building to another for more than thirty years until in 1945 a campus of twenty-five acres was acquired. Adequate classrooms and dormitories have since been built there.

Like its sister school in La Paz, American Institute in Cochabamba helped to develop new ideas and methods for the schools of Bolivia. It encountered frequent opposition because of its efforts at educational reform, but other schools gradually adopted ideas pioneered by the American Institutes: the semester system, coeducation, curriculum revision, and a sports program.

In 1966 the elementary, secondary, and commercial schools enrolled about one thousand students. Bolivians comprised most of the faculty, and the director was MARIO SALAZAR.

Paul Harris Crippled Children's Home is a home and vocational center in Cochabamba. Rotary Club members at a convention in the mid-1950's decided to establish a rehabilitation center for disabled children. Since this civic organization does not administer institutions directly, the Cochabamba club was asked to find property and offer administration to a religious body. The Methodist Church was chosen.

The home was named for the founder of Rotary International, Paul Harris. It began to function in 1960 with two or three lame boys. The number has increased since to a present capacity of twenty-four children. Through efforts of the local Rotary Club, a section for girls was opened in 1965.

A board of managers consists of Rotarians and Methodists. The director and staff generally have been Methodists. Both organizations contribute to its support, though by contract it is the church's responsibility. The Bolivia Conference resolved not to ask the Board of Missions for funds. While some Methodists in the U.S.A. do make contributions, the above policy continues. It is an institution of the Bolivian church.

The purpose of the home is vocational training rather than physical rehabilitation. The emphasis is placed on providing the children with a means of earning a livelihood once they are old enough to become independent. They learn such crafts as weaving, use of a knitting machine, making lamp shades, carpentry, and carpet making. The children receive religious instruction and are encouraged to attend a nearby Methodist church. The director (1966) is L. B. SMITH.

COCHRANE, HARRY HAYMAN (1860-1946), American mural painter, whose "Man on Horseback" honors Bishop ASBURY, was born at Augusta, Me., April 6, 1860. He was the son of Major J. H. Cochrane, an artist who was employed at WASHINGTON, D. C., by the U. S. government as a supervising architect. His mother died early, and he was reared by his paternal grandfather at MONMOUTH where he lived most of his life.

Cochrane's talent showed while a student at Monmouth Academy, and he was doing portraits at eighteen. He studied at the New York Art School and Chicago Art Institute. Drawn to photography, he worked in a New York photoengraving plant and was co-inventor of the Stanley Dry Plate. Traveling in the Near East, he sketched and secured data later used in murals of biblical scenes. His paintings are found in more than 150 churches and Masonic lodge halls throughout New England.

His home church, Monmouth United (Methodist-Congregationalist), has a canvas that brought him national attention. It is "The Man on Horseback," depicting in classic and romantic style Bishop Francis Asbury on a horse crossing a river, with his saddlebags bulging and a book in hand. This was reproduced on the cover of Together, November, 1959, commemorating 175 years of American Methodism. It also has been reproduced in Life and other magazines as an outstanding example of this form of art.

Cochrane was a delegate to the 1912 M. E. GENERAL CONFERENCE, served in the state legislature, and was a 33d degree Mason. In 1914 Bates College awarded him an honorary M.A. degree. He was married twice. He died Sept. 20, 1946 and is buried in the family plot at Monmouth.

LELAND D. CASE

COE, WILLIAM GWYNN (1832-1877), American minister of the Old BALTIMORE CONFERENCE, son of Alexander B. and Ellen T. Coe, was born in Baltimore, Md., April 15, 1832. His parents were Roman Catholics and sent their son to St. Mary's College to be trained for a priest in the Catholic Church. At the age of nineteen he was appointed Clerk of the Court of Common Pleas in place of his father.

He was attracted by Miss Anne Armstrong and sought a date with her on Dec. 31, 1852. She told him she was going to a "WATCHNIGHT" service that evening. The result was, he took Miss Armstrong to the service. That service turned his mind and heart toward Protestantism. Later he visited HENRY SLICER to talk with him about what he had heard at the service. Slicer talked with him plainly about religious beliefs and emphasized salvation by faith, and Coe was converted at that meeting.

Coe and Miss Armstrong were married May 4, 1853. They had twelve children, two of whom, Henry Slicer and W. P. C. Coe, followed their father into the Methodist ministry.

William G. Coe joined the Baltimore Conference in 1854 and spent fourteen years on CIRCUITS and seven on two districts. He was a delegate to one GENERAL CONFERENCE. For eleven years he was statistical secretary of the Baltimore Conference. Washington and Lee University conferred on him the D.D. degree.

Coe's pulpit ability and capable administration marked every period of his work. He crowned his career with supreme love and loyalty to God. This brought to him an overflowing love and zeal for the salvation of all men.

The last record in his diary is: "In Lewisburg [W. Va.] at home." On March 29, 1877, with his last breath he said: "Let's make haste and cross over this Jordan."

THOMAS COKE

COKE, THOMAS (1747-1814), British preacher and American general superintendent, was one of the most able and energetic lieutenants of JOHN WESLEY, and was unique in expressing the universalism of Wesley's message in active missionary work far and wide overseas from England and Wales, with a fervent passion to win the world for Christ. He was born in Brecon, Wales, on Sept. 9, 1747, of well-to-do parents. He went to Jesus College, Oxford (B.A., 1768; M.A., 1770; D.C.L., 1775), was elected bailiff of Brecon in 1770, and was ordained deacon in 1770 and priest of the Church of England in 1772. His curacy in South Petherton, Somerset (1771-7) was marked by increasing Methodist enthusiasm. On Aug. 13, 1776, he met John Wesley at Kingston St. Mary, and on his expulsion from his parish the following year, he joined the Methodists. As Wesley's trusted ASSISTANT, he was active in the settlement of chapels on the "Conference plan" and in drafting the DEED OF DECLARATION.

Wesley sent him to IRELAND in 1782 to preside over the first regularly constituted annual conference in that country. He presided every alternate year with Wesley himself from then until the latter's death, and afterwards, so much had he endeared himself to Irish Methodism, that he presided over the conference in that land every year except two from 1792 to 1813.

In 1784 he set out on the first of nine voyages to America, having been "set apart" in that significant ordination by Wesley to superintend Methodism in the new United States after the War of Independence (see below Thomas Coke and American Methodism). He presided over the historic CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE of that year, when ASBURY was "consecrated" and the Methodist Episcopal Church was formed. He watched over the growth of this new church. He and Asbury signed the congratulatory address to George Washington on his inauguration as President, April 30, 1789. Coke's skill and wisdom were particularly seen when presiding over and guiding the first GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1792, when it established itself as the supreme governing body of the M. E. Church. He undertook many episcopal tours, and his last visit to America was in 1803.

His consuming missionary zeal was expressed in his 1784 Plan of the Society for the Establishment of Missions among the Heathen. A trans-Atlantic journey intended to establish missionaries in NOVA SCOTIA was diverted by gales, and Coke landed in Antigua, West Indies, on Christmas Day, 1786. The opportunities he saw in the Caribbean so thrilled him that beyond spending his own not inconsiderable fortune, he begged almost from door to door for extra funds to place missionaries in island after island. Work was begun in GIBRALTAR and SIERRA LEONE, and his inspiration and financial help led the 1799 Irish Conference to separate three Irish-speaking general missionaries in their land (see IRELAND).

At home in Britain, he played an active part in church affairs after the death of John Wesley. He established home missionary circuits, inspired vernacular missions in his native Wales and among French prisoners of war. He was associated with ADAM CLARKE and others in an abortive plan for a Methodist Episcopal Church in England. He served repeatedly as Secretary of the CONFERENCE, and was elected President in 1797 and 1805. Among his numerous publications, the most important were a Commentary on the Bible (1801-7) and a History of the West Indies (1808-11).

He had long turned his eyes to INDIA and the East, and in 1813 came the opportunity when an Act of the British Parliament allowed missionaries to enter the regions governed by the East India Company. So at LEEDS that year, despite the difficulties and stringencies of the then continuing Napoleonic War, he dragged from a reluctant Conference permission for six preachers to accompany him (see JAMES LYNCH) and one to go to SOUTH AFRICA. He did not see the fulfillment of this journey. On the morning of May 3, 1814, he was discovered dead in his cabin, and his body was buried in the Indian Ocean.

His wide influence is remembered everywhere in Methodism, as in the name "Cokesbury" in America, and in the Coke Memorial Church in Warrenpoint, Ireland, where he preached his last sermon in that country he loved so much. In South Petherton parish church are choir and clergy stalls given in 1935 by Methodist laymen to the memory of the curate who was jeered as he left the parish 158 years previously. Above all Thomas Coke is alive still in the MISSIONARY SOCIETY which became an integral part of the church just a year or two after his death, largely because of what he himself had begun.

JOHN A. VICKERS
FREDERICK JEFFREY

Thomas Coke and American Methodism. In February 1784, John Wesley invited Coke to his study at CITY ROAD CHAPEL in LONDON, where they discussed the plight of the Methodist societies in the newly freed colonies—soon to be the United States of America. According to SAMUEL DREW's account of this conversation (which might have been given to Drew by Coke himself), Wesley "wished Dr. Coke to accept ordination from his hands, and to proceed in that character to the continent of America, to superintend the societies in the United States" (Life of Coke, pp. 63-64). Coke's letter to Wesley written the following August, however, indicates that Wesley had suggested Coke's going to America to ordain the Methodist preachers there by virtue of the authority Coke already had as a presbyter of the Church of England—the same ordination as Wesley's. But, as the letter shows, Coke feared he would not be accepted and requested "authority formally received from you" (Etheridge, pp. 102-3). Whatever the case, this February meeting seems to have been an exploratory discussion resulting in no definite decisions.

On April 17, Coke wrote to Wesley, offering "to go over and return" in order that Wesley "would then have a source of sufficient information to determine on any points or propositions" (ibid., pp. 101-2). In the light of urgent pleas from FRANCIS ASBURY and others in America, this gambit was too time consuming. JOHN PAWSON said that Wesley himself first proposed ordination as the best solution to the difficult situation in America. Unfortunately, the Minutes of the Leeds conference of 1784 give no indication of such a discussion.

Within a week of the conference's adjournment, Coke wrote at length to Wesley insisting that "the power of ordaining others should be received by me from you." He was clearly afraid of opposition from Francis Asbury. To complete "the scriptural way," RICHARD WHATCOAT and THOMAS VASEY should be ordained presbyters to assist him in ordaining the American Methodist preachers. Taken by itself, this letter would appear to be convincing evidence that the ordinations which followed in September were the result of Coke's insistence.

Drew's account of the interview between Wesley and Coke, and Pawson's account of Wesley's meeting with the consultation committee support the opinion that the ordinations were Wesley's idea from the first. Certainly the entries in Wesley's Journal indicate that he had been considering the matter over a period of years.

Shortly after four o'clock on the morning of Sept. 1, 1784, at the house of Mr. Castleman, 6 Dighton Street, BRISTOL, John Wesley ordained Whatcoat and Vasey DEACONS. The next morning he ordained them ELDERS, and Thomas Coke SUPERINTENDENT, presenting them with appropriate certificates of ORDINATION. In his letter to "Our Brethren in America" (Sept. 10, 1784), Wesley stated that he was not only concerned to prepare a "rational and scriptural way of feeding" but also of "guiding those poor sheep in the wilderness." As Whatcoat and Vasey were to "act as elders among them, baptizing and administering the Lord's Supper," so Coke and Francis Asbury were "to be Joint Superintendents over our brethren in North America."

Despite Tyerman's judgment that the ceremony was "a mere formality . . . to recommend" these agents to the American Methodists, Wesley used the word "ordain" in his private diary for Sept. 1, 1784, and he allowed the word "ordain" to stand in the Sunday Service in relation to both elders and superintendents. After his ordination, as well as before, Coke was a presbyter with the same powers—administration of the Sacraments and ordination. But Wesley sought to confer upon Coke the authority of a scriptural and primitive bishop, and the function of that office—indicated by Wesley's translation of the title as "superintendent"—was administrative authority. In respect to their orders, Coke, Whatcoat, and Vasey were equal;

however, in regard to his administrative authority, Coke stood first.

Armed with Wesley's certificates of ordination, the Sunday Service, and the letter to "Our Brethren in America," the three emissaries sailed from Bristol on Sept. 18, 1784, landing in New York on Nov. 3. On Sunday, Nov. 14, at BARRATT'S CHAPEL in Kent County, Delaware, Coke and Asbury had their famous meeting. "After the sermon, a plain, robust man came up to me in the pulpit, and kissed me: I thought it could be no other than Mr. Asbury, and I was not deceived" (Coke, Extracts of Journals, 1816, p. 45). Here, somewhat to Coke's surprise, Asbury insisted upon placing Wesley's plan before a summoned council of preachers. The council in turn sent out a call for all the preachers to gather in conference to consider this plan, determining the matter by majority vote. Coke's Journals (pp. 43, 45) makes it clear that such a democratic procedure was not intended or expected by either Wesley or Coke.

In the interval between the consultation at Barratt's Chapel and the assembling of the Christmas Conference, Asbury sent Coke on a familiarization tour of "about eight hundred or a thousand miles" through the Delaware-Maryland-Virginia Peninsula. The week immediately preceding the conference was spent at PERRY HALL, near Baltimore, with Asbury and Coke drawing up a revision of Wesley's LARGE MINUTES to propose as a DISCIPLINE for the American church. On Christmas Eve they rode into BALTIMORE, where the historic conference met at LOVELY LANE CHAPEL. As Wesley's representative, Coke presided and presented Wesley's letter and the revised plan of organization. On Dec. 25, 26, and 27, respectively, Coke ordained Asbury deacon, elder, and superintendent, after Asbury had been elected by the preachers to be superintendent. Coke also preached at noon each day. While at Barratt's Chapel, Coke and Asbury had "agreed to use [their] joint endeavours to establish a School or College on the plan of KINGSWOOD SCHOOL." The conference agreed to build the college at Abingdon, Md., and to name it COKESBURY in honor of the two superintendents. Immediately after the conference, Coke and Asbury drew up a plan for the college, to be used in raising funds for the school.

Before sailing for England on June 2, Coke made an extensive tour, notable for the great crowds attracted for preaching and the administration of the Sacraments. On the other hand, Coke encountered intense opposition because of his strong criticism of slavery.

His second visit to the United States (March 1-May 27, 1787) was marked by Wesley's instructions (Sept. 6, 1786) that Coke "appoint a GENERAL CONFERENCE of all our preachers in the United States, to meet at Baltimore on May 1st, 1787, and that Mr. Whatcoat may be appointed superintendent with Mr. Francis Asbury." Utterly opposed to such autocratic rule either by Wesley or by their superintendents, the conference rescinded their pledge of obedience to Wesley and removed his name from the Minutes. They refused to accept the appointment of Whatcoat (however, their respect for him was such that they elected him to the superintendency in 1800). Although Coke gave the conference a formal pledge that he would never "during [his] absence from the United States of America, exercise any government whatever in [the American] Methodist Church," the conference stated in its Minutes (1773-1828, p. 26) that he was a superintendent only "when present in the States."

This was also the year that Asbury and Coke substituted the term "bishop" for superintendent in the Discipline.

Coke's third visit (Feb. 24-June 5, 1789) consisted primarily of an extensive itinerary through the southern and eastern states, including the holding of ten annual conferences. Due to the large number of separate sessions, Asbury sought to centralize control through a Council made up of the bishops and the presiding elders, and presented this plan in each of the conferences. Coke was among the major opponents of this plan, preferring a General Conference. During this visit, Coke and Asbury edited the first edition of The Arminian Magazine, and appointed JOHN DICKINS to be in charge of the new Book Concern (see METHODIST PUBLISHING HOUSE). Although Coke does not mention the occasion in his Journal, this was the year (June 2, 1789) the two bishops made their formal call on the newly elected President of the United States, George Washington, for which Coke was extensively criticized.

Coke's return for his fourth visit (Feb. 21-May 16, 1791) concluded the debate over Asbury's Council. So successful was the opposition that Coke could assure JAMES O'KELLY: "No step will be taken during my absence, to prevent the General Conference; it would be so gross an insult on truth, justice, mercy, and peace, that it will not be, I think, attempted." Yet Coke was in sufficient distress about the continuing existence of American Methodism that he attempted to negotiate a union with the Protestant Episcopal Church (see COKE-WHITE CORRESPONDENCE). Nevertheless, the most disturbing event of this episcopal tour was the news of Wesley's death. Although Coke had given rapturous accounts of the American countryside, he now declared: "The death of my venerable Friend had cast such a shade of melancholy over my mind . . . that I could find very little pleasure in the contemplation of the works of nature." He immediately returned to England.

The fifth visit (Oct. 30-Dec. 12, 1792) was made primarily to attend the first truly named General Conference. Coke had apparently given sufficient explanation to Asbury for his severely critical comments about Asbury made in his funeral sermon for Wesley at Baltimore, although Coke complained of Asbury's "neglect." Due to O'Kelly's challenge of Asbury's appointive powers, Asbury retired from the conference floor and let Coke preside. Coke's characteristically irenic comments hide the heat of these debates. Following the conference, Coke "prepared a new Edition of our form of Discipline, with all the regulations made at the Conference." Because of the extensive revisions enacted by that historic initial General Conference, this Discipline is "one of the most important documents in the history of Methodist polity." Before sailing for England, Coke made a three-day examination at Cokesbury College, being "much pleased" with the progress of the students.

Four years later, Coke returned (Oct. 8, 1796-Feb. 6, 1797) for the second General Conference, perhaps with the intention of establishing a more permanent relationship. When the conference expressed the need of further assistance for Asbury, Coke offered himself to his "American brethren, entirely to their service." This conference requested "the Bishops to draw up Annotations on the Form of Discipline." "Mr. Asbury had before drawn up his thoughts at large on the subject," Coke wrote. "I therefore endeavoured to unite our ideas; and think that if I ever drew up any useful publications for the press, this was one of them, and perhaps the best." Another act of this conference which had the strong support of Coke was the establishment of a CHARTERED FUND to increase financial aid to married and retired ministers. Coke's Journal contains numerous expressions of this concern, perhaps the most vivid in response to the news of the burning of Cokesbury College and the academy at Baltimore: "O that all this money had been laid out for the support of a married ministry!"

Immediately after the conference Asbury proposed a plan of operations to Coke:

I was astonished, I did not see in this plan anything which related in the least degree to my being a Coadjutor in the Episcopacy, or serving to strengthen it; though it was for that purpose . . . [that] that General Conference [thought] that I should reside for life in America. Bishop Asbury was to hold the three Southern Conferences entirely by himself; and I was to spend my whole time merely as a Preacher. [A change of plans is then related which permitted Coke to accompany Asbury.] But to my astonishment I was not consulted in the least degree imaginable concerning the station of a single Preacher. . . . In short, I neither said nor did anything during the whole tour, which had any usefulness attending it, as far as I can judge, but preach. (Asbury's Letters, 334-35.)

No further journals of visits to America were published, although there were three more such voyages. Their significance revolves around Coke's attempts to clarify his relationship to the American Methodists. In November 1797, he attended the VIRGINIA CONFERENCE and presented a request from the British Conference asking that he be permitted to return. The conference reluctantly consented "to his return, and partial continuance" with them, subject to the approval of the General Conference to meet in 1800.

Asbury, who was too ill to travel, would not permit Coke to substitute for him at the Virginia Conference. Coke later complained that he had offered his service, as he could have sailed as well from CHARLESTON as from NEW YORK, "but he refused me & appointed Brother Jackson to station the Preachers, & Brother JESSE LEE to sit as Moderator in the Conference."

Coke made an eighth visit to America and attended the General Conference of 1800, but again he complained that Asbury did not consult him on what was taking place. However, he was active on the floor of the Conference, proposing motions that led to parsonages for traveling preachers, and increased financial support for superannuated preachers, their wives, widows, and orphaned children.

He made a final visit to America about Nov. 23, 1803. This lasted until 1804, and he stated in a letter to the General Conference that he had no expectation of returning to England. However, he found that his relationship with Asbury was unchanged, and complained that at the GEORGIA CONFERENCE, which he attended with Asbury, he was not even given a copy of the appointments, much less consulted regarding them. "I then saw the will of God concerning me—that I ought not to labour in America, unless the General Conference would consent to comply in some degree with its engagements." It was not therefore surprising that the General Conference of 1804 did grant Coke "leave . . . to return to Europe, . . . provided, he shall hold himself subject to the call of three of our annual conferences, . . . but at furthest, that he shall return, if he lives, to the next General Conference."

By this time, Coke had made up his mind that he would not return to America again unless he received full assurance that he would be accepted as a bishop. He sent a circular letter to several annual conferences which in the main raised this question, and said that if he came back it should be "on the express condition that the seven Conferences should be divided betwixt us, . . . each of us changing our division annually; and that this plan . . . should continue permanent and unalterable during both our lives."

One or more of the conferences replied that such a division was unacceptable, and the rest made no reply at all. Offering himself yet again, Coke wrote to the General Conference that was to meet in 1808, suggesting that he would come over for life if that Conference should grant him "a full right to give my judgment in every thing, in the general and annual conferences, on the making of laws, the stationing of the preachers, sending out missionaries, and every thing else, which, as a bishop or superintendent, belongs to my office."

To this the General Conference—and to the Americans he had always been simply "Dr. Coke"—gave him consent to "continue in Europe" where he was "not to exercise the office of superintendent or bishop among us in the United States until he be recalled by the General Conference, or by all the annual conferences respectively." The Minutes were to carry his name "after the name of the bishops, in a N.B.—'Doctor Coke, at the request of the British Conference, and by the consent of the General Conference, resides in Europe.'" Quite pointedly, the address to the British Conference stated that WILLIAM MCKENDREE had been elected "joint superintendent with Mr. Asbury." This was a status never granted to Dr. Coke. The truth is, Coke was never quite at home, nor could he make it appear that he was at home, with the American Methodists. As a traveling missionary he was preeminent, and he of all Wesley's followers did see the world as his parish. His work, when he was not in America, took him to all parts of the British Isles, including trips to Scotland, and to the Norman and Channel Isles.

American Methodism owes much more to Thomas Coke than it ever let him know when he was alive. For one thing, he with his lawyer's training saw the need for a Deed of Trust which would cover every Methodist church or chapel, and drew up a model deed and insisted—and saw to it—that it was put into effect. Without this Methodist itinerancy could never have established itself in local congregations and, indeed, could scarcely maintain itself today. Also, Coke saw the need for a periodic General Conference in America, and helped persuade the reluctant Asbury to call and establish one. These two bishops did not work together in all important ways; but no matter how they may have individually differed, the names "Coke and Asbury" will ever be associated in grateful remembrance as the first superintendents of American Methodism.

COKE-WHITE CORRESPONDENCE (1791). The letters that were exchanged by THOMAS COKE and Bishop William White of the Protestant Episcopal Church in 1791 were directly affected by several important factors. Among the most important of these factors were JOHN WESLEY'S distaste for separation from the Church of England, a personal struggle for power between FRANCIS ASBURY and Thomas Coke, the O'Kelly schism, and the unification of the Protestant Episcopal Church in America in 1789.

Shortly before the CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE of 1784, Coke and Asbury talked in BALTIMORE with two Episcopal clergymen, John Andrews and William West, about the future plans of their respective groups. The only known record of this meeting is a letter, dated Dec. 31, 1784, from John Andrews to William Smith, printed in H. W. Smith's Life and Correspondence of William Smith, D.D., vol. ii (Philadelphia, 1880), pp. 243-246. According to this letter, Andrews and West attempted to persuade Coke and Asbury against a complete break with the Church of England by suggesting that they maintain some sort of union with the Protestant Episcopal Church, and that special bishops might be consecrated for the Methodists to make this possible. Both Methodist leaders, and especially Coke, were said to have rejected this proposal unconditionally. However, within seven years, in 1791, Coke had changed his mind and made a similar proposal to Bishop William White, as he had then become in the newly organized Protestant Episcopal Church. Three important reasons for his change of attitude are evident.

First of all, he seems to have always been aware that John Wesley looked with disfavor upon such a complete separation from the Anglican tradition as had been effected by the American Methodists. But, secondly, appreciation of Wesley's attitude seems to have varied in accordance with Coke's position of leadership in American Methodism. In 1784, when he considered himself to be a chief leader of the American Methodists, he did not seem to be greatly concerned about what Wesley thought concerning separation. But, by 1791, after it had become clear that Coke had only the powers that Asbury saw fit to delegate to him, he seems to have concluded that the American Methodist experiment could be better perfected, and that Wesley was right after all. Union with the Episcopalians might correct most of the trouble.

The threat of separation within American Methodist ranks posed by JAMES O'KELLY'S democratic reform group was a third factor in Coke's change of opinion, since it seemed to show that the original separation was leading to more of the same. The way to stop further division seemed to be to heal the initial break through a union with the Protestant Episcopal Church as this had become a unified and stable denomination in 1789.

Therefore, on April 24, 1791, Bishop Coke wrote a letter to Bishop White of Philadelphia in which he suggested a union between the Methodists and Episcopalians under conditions that would permit the Methodists to retain their close-knit organization within the Protestant Episcopal Church. Both Coke's letter and Bishop White's reply can be found in William White, Memoirs of the Protestant Episcopal Church (Philadelphia, 1820), pp. 424-432. Coke assured White that Wesley would favor this plan and that Asbury would be against it. He implied that, if other conditions were satisfactory, the Methodist preachers might be willing to submit to reordination and hinted that one of these conditions would be for these preachers to be ordained and supervised by bishops selected from their own ranks. Since he was speaking for no one but himself, Bishop Coke asked that this matter be kept top secret and requested a private conference with Bishop White in PHILADELPHIA.

Before Bishop White's generally favorable reply reached him in Baltimore, Coke received the shocking news that John Wesley had died on March 2, 1791, whereupon he left hurriedly for Philadelphia where he planned to embark immediately for England. White's letter to Coke fell into the hands of Asbury and he seems to have read it although he made no comment on it. Meanwhile, Coke reached Philadelphia and, while he was waiting May 4-14 for a ship to sail for England, he had three conferences with Bishop White. The first two of these meetings also included Samuel Magaw, Rector of St. Paul's (Episcopal) Church in Philadelphia.

The conferences accomplished nothing and only served to convince Bishop White that Coke's plan would only give Methodist preachers access to Episcopal congregations while preventing Episcopal clergymen a similar access to Methodist congregations. During the third conference, after it had become clear that Bishop White considered Coke's proposal to be too one-sided in favor of the Methodists to be practicable, Bishop Coke read to Bishop White a letter embodying a similar proposal for union that he was sending to Bishop Samuel Seabury, the Protestant Episcopal Bishop of Connecticut. The main difference in this letter is that it explicitly suggested that Coke and Asbury be consecrated as bishops for the Methodists in the united church. Seabury seems to have been even less interested in the proposal than White, since there is no evidence that he ever replied to it. Coke's letter to Seabury can be found in Fac-similes of Church Documents, Issued by the Historical Club of the American (Episcopal) Church, 8 vols. (New York, 1874-79).

Coke finally embarked for England from New Castle, Del., on May 15 after having explained his conversations with Bishop White to Francis Asbury and receiving "no decisive opinion on the subject" from him. Later Coke accounted for his discussion with White just prior to his sailing for England by saying that he had hoped to lay the ground work for full-fledged official negotiations between the Methodists and Episcopalians, so that significant action could be taken concerning this matter when he returned to the United States to help preside over the General Conference in November, 1792. He did return to preside with Asbury over this General Conference session which produced James O'Kelly's final split with the M. E. Church, but no mention was made of his correspondence with Bishop White or any kind of negotiations with the Episcopalians.

In fact, very little mention was made of these private negotiations until 1804 when Bishop White made them public to help settle an argument between a Methodist preacher and an Episcopal priest. Methodists were disturbed at the release of this news and Coke was requested to explain his actions. In response, he sent two letters to the General Conference of 1808. After offering in the first letter to come to the United States and serve there for the rest of his life if he were granted full episcopal powers (which Asbury had never allowed him, especially in appointing preachers), he in the second wrote a lengthy explanation of his actions and defended them primarily by saying that he had hoped to stabilize the M. E. Church (in the face of the threat of O'Kelly's schism) and to enlarge its field of action—concluding that he did not now think that such a union was desirable. This significant second letter can be found in its entirety only in Nathan Bangs, History of the Methodist Episcopal Church, vol. ii (New York, 1839), pp. 206-210. After hearing his letters, the General Conference commended him for his candor and did not censure him, but did not accept his offer to return as a full-fledged bishop. Coke, incidentally, did not come back to the United States at all after the 1804 General Conference.

Two other similar incidents in Coke's life are instructive in this matter. In 1799 he made a somewhat similar proposal to the Bishop of London in an attempt to prevent a complete separation of the British Methodists from the Church of England. This correspondence can be found in SAMUEL DREW's biography of Coke. Then, in 1813 when he desired to go to INDIA as a missionary, he wrote letters to the Earl of Liverpool and William Wilberforce offering to return fully to the Church of England in return for being appointed Bishop of India. One of these letters can be found in Correspondence of William Wilberforce, eds. Robert Isaac Wilberforce and Samuel Wilberforce, vol. ii (London, 1840), pp. 256-261.

None of Coke's proposals for union on either side of the Atlantic were acceptable and it is easy to see why. They had no official sanction from any other Methodist individual or group, and they were so one-sided in favor of the Methodists that the Episcopalians and Anglicans could not accept them. In each of these proposals it seems that Coke may have been seeking more ecclesiastical power for himself—since he would have gained more power and status than anyone else if they had been implemented—but there is also evident in him a spark of ecumenicity that is remarkable in any age.

COKESBURY COLLEGE MARKER WITH REPLICA OF BUILDING

COKESBURY COLLEGE, Abingdon, Maryland. Methodists in North America held their organizational meeting, known as the CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE, in 1784, and made provision to start a college. The site selected was Abingdon, Md., on the highway between BALTIMORE and PHILADELPHIA. The name Cokesbury was selected to memorialize the first two bishops of the new church, THOMAS COKE and FRANCIS ASBURY. The cornerstone for the building was laid on June 5, 1785. Delays in completing the structure prevented the completion of the building until 1787. School work began on Dec. 6, 1787.

One of the foremost advocates of such schools for American Methodists was JOHN DICKINS, an early preacher who had attended Eton in England. Upon Coke's arrival in America, he visited with Dickins before meeting Asbury. Later he and Asbury came together at BARRATT'S CHAPEL in DELAWARE to work out plans for the Christmas Conference. At that meeting they agreed to propose the establishment of a school to the American Methodist preachers.

Cokesbury was set up as a college, not an academy, although the academic work for the most part did not approach collegiate level. It is evident that the initiative for a college was assumed by Coke. Asbury wanted a school patterned after KINGSWOOD in England. The ambitious undertaking of American Methodists prompted JOHN WESLEY to write a letter to Asbury that the latter described as "a bitter pill from one of my greatest friends."

Wesley, however, took a deep interest in the institution and suggested that the Rev. Mr. Heath, a clergyman in the Anglican Church, be named Cokesbury's first president. The school opened with Mr. Heath as president and two faculty members, Patrick M'Closky, "a well-educated Irishman," and Freeman Marsh, a Quaker.

On Dec. 6, 1787, Cokesbury College, with an enrollment of twenty-five students, was opened with appropriate religious exercises. On the Sabbath day Bishop Asbury dedicated the new building, and the text for his dedication sermon was, "O thou man of God, there is death in the pot" (II Kings 4:40). The strange text elicited many speculations. In commenting on it Daniels said, "Whether the choice of this text was suggested by the fears of the good Bishop that the higher scholarship of American Methodism would sink to the level of that of Oxford and Cambridge, or whether he had a vivid sense of the early troubles in Mr. Wesley's school at Kingswood, or still again, whether he possessed a sad foreboding of the misfortunes which were to befall this college, it is not possible now to determine, but the text is suggestive of all three" (p. 510).

The first Discipline of the M. E. Church contains a detailed announcement of the aims of the college. The three objectives that the founders had in view for the college were: (1) To make provision for the sons of married preachers. (2) The education and support of poor orphans. (3) "The establishment of a seminary for the children of our competent friends, where learning and religion may go hand in hand."

The instructional program of the institution, as set forth in the same announcement of purpose, indicated that the students would study English, Latin, Greek, Logic, Rhetoric, History, Geography, Natural Philosophy, and Astronomy. The main purpose, however, was a program of Christian education which meant, according to the founders, "forming the minds of the youth, through divine aid, to wisdom and holiness; by instilling into their tender minds the principles of true religion, speculative, experimental and practical, and training them in the ancient way, that they may be rational scriptural Christians."

For all practical purposes, Asbury may be described as the president of the institution. He made regular visits, examined the students, raised the money for its operation, and in general, carried the responsibilities for its development. The rules made by Wesley for Kingswood in 1748 were transferred to Cokesbury College. There were twenty-nine of them and they aimed to control practically every moment of the students' time. They stated that the students were expected to rise at 5 A.M., study seven hours a day, and retire at 9 P.M. Play was strictly prohibited and in lieu of any kind of games, the students had for recreation agriculture, gardening, and cabinet making.

Cokesbury was plagued with misfortunes. In December 1795, fire, suspected to be of incendiary origin, destroyed the building and contents. Asbury learned of the fire while holding a conference in SOUTH CAROLINA, and it will be seen from these lines in his Journal that the loss of the school deeply affected him:

We have now a second and confirmed account that Cokesbury college is consumed to ashes, a sacrifice of £10,000 in about ten years! The foundation was laid in 1785 and it was burnt December 7, 1795. Its enemies may rejoice, and its friends need not mourn. Would any man give me £10,000 per year to do and suffer again what I have done for that house, I would not do it. The Lord called not Mr. Whitefield nor the Methodists to build colleges. I wished only for schools—Doctor Coke wanted a college. I feel distressed at the loss of the library. (Vol. ii, p. 75.)

After the fire it was decided to move the college to Baltimore, and a large building which had been erected for dances and assemblies was purchased. There the plan of the school was altered, and it became an academy instead of a college. The school had an auspicious beginning, enrolling the first year approximately 200 students. But tragedy continued to harass Methodist educational efforts. On Dec. 4, 1796, the college and the church which adjoined it caught fire and burned to the ground. The total loss sustained by Methodists in the two fires ranged from $75,000 to $100,000. After the fire, Asbury and Coke made no further effort to develop Cokesbury College.

There is not much information available about Cokesbury College students. However, included among the first students were VALENTINE COOK, a pioneer preacher and teacher in Kentucky, and ASBURY DICKINS, the son of John Dickins. Dickins served as Secretary of the United States Senate from 1836 to 1861. Another student, Abel Bliss, was one of the first trustees of Wesleyan Academy at Wilbraham, Mass., and one of the founders of WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY. Charles Tait, also a student and instructor at Cokesbury and first cousin of Henry Clay, established himself in Georgia as an attorney. He represented that state in the U. S. Senate for ten years. As a senator he was the author of the Admission Bill by which Alabama was admitted to the Union. Later he moved to Alabama and became the first Federal Judge of the District of Alabama. Samuel White, another student at Cokesbury, the son of Judge THOMAS WHITE, one of Asbury's dearest friends, represented his state in the U. S. Senate. COKEsbury CONFERENCE SCHOOL, Cokesbury (Greenwood County), S. C., attained its notable position in South Carolina Methodism by a sort of evolutionary process. Old Tabernacle Church (1778), a devout Methodist center in which FRANCIS ASBURY preached twice in 1800, included a log schoolhouse later made famous as "Tabernacle Academy." STEPHEN OLIN (1820-21), distinguished educator, was converted while teaching in Tabernacle Academy. He joined the SOUTH CAROLINA ANNUAL CONFERENCE and after several years' teaching in the South was called to become the first president of RANDOLPH-MACON COLLEGE. In 1824 Tabernacle was moved two miles to Mt. Ariel and a female academy was added. In 1835 it was superseded by the Dougherty Manual School. Both school and academy were turned over to the South Carolina Conference in 1835.

In May, 1864, the name was changed to Cokesbury. Tradition says this was at the suggestion of W. M. WIGHTMAN, later bishop, in honor of Bishops COKE and ASBURY, for whom the original Cokesbury was named. In 1876 the buildings of the Masonic Female College, constructed in 1854, were obtained by the conference, and in 1876 the Cokesbury Manual Labor School of the conference was given a charter.

However, supplanted by growing colleges, the school closed in 1918 and its assets became the property of WOFFORD COLLEGE. The contribution of this school to church and state in the nineteenth century is noteworthy. Five bishops, thirteen judges of supreme and circuit courts, one United States senator, one governor, five college presidents, two congressmen, five distinguished university professors, a score of Confederate army officers, outstanding physicians and attorneys, and numerous successful businessmen were all proud to call this school their Alma Mater.

The building has been restored by the Conference and a dedication service was held Nov. 15, 1970.

COKESBURY PRESS was the trade name of the publishing house of the M. E. Church, South, prior to church union in 1939, just as ABINGDON PRESS was for the Methodist BOOK CONCERN and EPWORTH PRESS is for the British Methodists. This press made quite a name for itself, due principally to the excellent executive management of PAT BEAIRD, as well as the growing strength of the Southern publishing interests. At union in 1939, the Abingdon and Cokesbury Presses were combined into Abingdon-Cokesbury Press. After some years, however, the name Cokesbury was given to all official Methodist bookstores, while Abingdon remains the name of the press.

COKESBURY SCHOOL in NORTH CAROLINA was erected near Phelps Ferry on the Yadkin River in Davie County before 1794, and was probably the school for which Mr. Long and Mr. Bustian gave money to Bishop ASBURY and JOHN DICKINS in 1780, but which money was used for COKESBURY COLLEGE in Maryland.

Asbury described the Cokesbury School as "twenty feet square, two stories high, well set out with doors and windows." Asbury visited the school in 1794. It was later converted into a church building and Asbury wrote in 1799, "I said but little at the Academical school house, now a house for God." Only a few stones now remain.

COLBECK, THOMAS (1723-1779), an influential British Methodist, was born in October 1723 at Keighley, Yorkshire. He was a grocer and mercer there from 1747 on, and devoted his substance, time, and talents to establishing Methodism in Keighley and in Yorkshire and East Lancashire. His classes were closely attached to the parish church. He was steward of Haworth Circuit for almost thirty years. WESLEY ranked him itinerant in 1748, but he was strictly "half-itinerant." Colbeck, a refined, gentle spirit, was calm and amiable under mobbing (especially at Barrowford), in persecution, and under domestic trial. He was a respected friend and colleague of WILLIAM GRIMSHAW. He contracted fever in visiting, died, and was interred at Keighley.

COLBERT, WILLIAM (1764-1835), American pioneer preacher, was born April 20, 1764, in Poolesville, Md., and died in Stroudsburg, Pa., where he was buried. His mother having died in his nineteenth year, he confessed that he and his father lived "destitute of religion." After hearing Methodist preaching, he was convinced he should "call sinners to repentance."

Having filled a vacancy on the Calumet circuit in MARYLAND, Colbert was junior preacher on the BALTIMORE circuit, and then on the Harford, in 1790 and 1791, respectively. Records fail to show certain data about his entry into the ministry, but do show that in 1792 he was ordained an ELDER and received into full membership at the Baltimore Conference. His itinerancy covered much of the states of DELAWARE, Maryland, NEW JERSEY, PENNSYLVANIA, and NEW YORK, and continued more than seventeen years. He was PRESIDING ELDER of the Albany District in 1802 and 1803, and of the Chesapeake District in 1804.

Colbert's refusal to accept the Genesee District in 1804 led to a misunderstanding between him and Bishop ASBURY, such that he remained only two months on the Burlington District, to which he was appointed in 1806. The next year he went to the Kent Circuit in Maryland, but remained only until November, when he desisted permanently from the itinerancy.

On Nov. 1, 1804, Colbert married Elizabeth, daughter of Col. Jacob Stroud of Stroudsburg, Pa. She was a young woman half his age, who was culturally and physically unsuited to be the wife of a circuit rider. Of their twelve children only six survived to adulthood.

During Colbert's ministry he preached in churches when available, in schoolhouses, homes, barns, or out-of-doors. His texts were chiefly from the New Testament, but often from the prophets and were usually admonitory. He met the theological challenges of his day, and decried drunkenness, slavery and all irreligion. Members who failed to meet the standards of Methodism he summarily dismissed from church membership. He read extensively and was an able preacher, placing emphasis on salvation through Jesus Christ.

After ceasing to travel, Colbert lived on a small farm near Stroudsburg but continued to function as a minister, frequently filling preaching engagements and officiating at funerals. He also showed his civic concern, serving as a trustee of the Stroudsburg Academy. That he was a man of humility and introspection is indicated by references in his journal to himself as being "stupid," "impatient," and "depressed."

More than a century after Colbert's demise, a modest monument was erected at the place of the interment of his body, in recognition of the fact that he was Stroudsburg's first resident Methodist minister, as well as in recognition of his relation to the community.

COLCLAZER, HENRY (1809-1884), American minister, was born in Alexandria, Va., on Sept. 1, 1809. He was admitted on trial to the OHIO CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church in August, 1828, and served the Wayne and Black River Circuits in Ohio. While serving in Ohio, he was pastor of the church attended by Rutherford B. Hayes, who later became President of the United States.

In 1830, Colclazer was sent to the Ann Arbor Circuit in MICHIGAN. In 1831 he was appointed to DETROIT, the only station in Michigan Territory at the time. He established a library in Detroit, and it is said that he was the first Methodist minister to introduce instrumental music in the churches in the West.

In 1835, Colclazer was one of three petitioners who secured a charter for a Seminary, which was later to become ALBION COLLEGE. In the same year he began four years of service as presiding elder of the new Ann Arbor District. Colclazer was the University of Michigan's first librarian, serving from 1837 to 1845. By 1840 he was chosen a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE.

In 1846 he moved to Brunswick, N. J. He went on to Philadelphia's Wharton Street Church in 1848. From 1857 to 1861 he served as PRESIDING ELDER of the SNOW-hill District, PHILADELPHIA. Altogether he served seventeen charges in PENNSYLVANIA, DELAWARE, and MARYLAND.

In Michigan and in Pennsylvania he quickly rose to prominence. He was sent again as a delegate to the General Conference in 1860. He was an eloquent preacher, noted for his skill in evangelism and instruction. His sermons were logical, and always interesting because of his vast store of pertinent illustrative incidents.

Colclazer married Aseneth True in 1835; and Sallie Hicks in 1851, by whom he had two daughters and a son. He died Dec. 18, 1884 at his residence in Philadelphia and was buried in Cambridge, Md.

COLE, RICHARD LEE (1878-1963), Irish minister and historian, and son of the manse, was born in Lurgan, in the north of Ireland. He was educated at the Methodist College, BELFAST, where part of his early ministry was served as assistant theological tutor and head resident master. His circuit ministry was mainly in DUBLIN churches, and he became recognized as a preacher and administrator. He was one of the chief representatives of the Methodist Church in the newly-founded Irish Free State (later the Republic of Ireland), and gave valuable advice during years of political change. For some forty years he was Secretary of the Education Department of the Church and also a member of the Government Advisory Council on Education. He was Secretary of the Irish Conference, 1926-32, and President of the Church in 1933. He was the last surviving Irish member of the LEGAL HUNDRED. Methodist history was one of his special concerns, and he wrote extensively thereon. He was awarded a Fellowship by the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL, and was President of the WESLEY HISTORICAL SOCIETY (Irish Branch) from 1948 until his death in 1963.

COLEBROOK, NEW HAMPSHIRE, U.S.A. is located on the Connecticut River in Coos County. Methodist preachers were here as early as 1816. In 1870 a society was organized and J. H. Knott, the first pastor, was sent here a year later when both a parsonage and church were built. With Guy Roberts' pastorate, 1907-08, came renovation and remodelling, making Colebrook one of the most beautiful churches in northern NEW HAMPSHIRE. An earlier work at the Union Meeting-house at Kitterville, built around 1854, was done by W. H. H. Collins and L. R. Danforth in successive pastorates, 1881-84. These were serving at the same time East Columbia, where the church was built in 1850 in partnership with the Christian Church Society. Another church in Columbia, completely Methodist, was built in 1851, and a Methodist church in East Colebrook some years later. With the changes in the life of the area and shifts in population, the church at Colebrook was merged with the churches at East Colebrook and East Columbia around 1942, forming Trinity Church. In August, 1950, the Parish of the Headwaters was organized, including the Methodist churches of Pittsburg, Colebrook, Groveton, North Strafford, Stark, all in New Hampshire; and Bloomfield and Canaan in Vermont. Ralph Grieser, the pastor at Colebrook, became director and Miss Dorothy Wilbur, Deaconess and Parish Worker.

COLEGIO AMERICANO, a Methodist school for girls in PORTO ALEGRE, state of Rio Grande do Sul, BRAZIL. Its forerunner was the Escola Evangelica Mixta, founded in 1885 by João Corrêa, a homeopathic doctor, evangelist and educator of the M.E. Church when that church opened work in South Brazil.

Its first teacher was CARMEN CHACON, of ARGENTINA—youthful but mature at sixteen. The school opened with three pupils, but within a year and a half, had enrolled 187. Tragically, Carmen succumbed to tuberculosis in 1889. A few years later, the M.E. Church appointed Miss H. M. Hegeman to direct the school, a position she held until 1900, when this area of Brazil was turned over to the M.E. Church, South. The Woman's Missionary Council of the latter church then sponsored the school, changing its name to Colegio Americano. Under the administrations especially of Elizabeth Lamb and Eunice Andrew, it won the respect and support of the community, despite its inadequate rented quarters.

In 1920 the Centennial celebration in the States made possible the purchase and remodeling of a fine property on a main avenue. Before long, under the able administration of MARY SUE BROWN, aided by Sara Stout, a two-story building was erected on the grounds; and a large house next door was rented.

As further expansion was impossible at this location, the property was sold, and with proceeds from the sale and a generous gift from Mrs. HENRY PFEIFFER, five acres of land were bought on a suburban hillside. With Miss Brown as architect and supervisor, a modern plant was erected. With the years, many facilities were added, including an approved Conservatory of Music and chapel, named in honor of Miss Brown and built with alumnae contributions—the first chapel on a Methodist campus built by Brazilian alumnae.

The Colegio Americano pioneered in many ways. When Miss Brown retired in 1952, MARY HELEN CLARK was named principal (Reitora), and under her leadership the school continued to progress, adding several new courses, in all of which the school cooperated closely with the government. At the request of the Federal Department of Education, an experimental secondary course was organized in 1959. In 1963, upon request of the State Department of Education, the Dietetics courses were revamped to meet the need for training dietitians for the public schools. Miss Clark retired in 1968. Its present Reitora is a Brazilian, Mrs. Maria Minssen Mazzacato (1970).

COLEGIO AMERICANO is a school for girls in ROSARIO, ARGENTINA, and the first Methodist school in all Latin America.

The school was founded in 1875 by Luisa Denning and

HENRY PFEIFFER BUILDING, COLEGIO AMERICANO

Jennie Chapin, missionaries sent to Rosario the year before by the WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY of the M. E. Church at the request of THOMAS B. WOOD. After a year of language study and work in the church, they opened a school in a rented house, with five little girls attending. By the end of the first year there were twenty.

In 1880 poor health forced Miss Denning and Miss Chapin to return to the United States, and they were relieved by Mrs. E. J. M. Clemens. When they returned in 1883, they were able to buy a house, where the school grew and prospered. The founders worked there until 1890, when failing health forced them to leave.

Mary F. Swaney, with previous experience in MEXICO, became director and led the school for twenty-two years, except for two furloughs. In 1904 she purchased the present site of the school—then in the outskirts, but now considered the center of the city. A new building, opened in 1909, was used until the present structure was begun in 1955.

In 1885 a second school was opened, giving instruction without charge to 100 or more children in a poor neighborhood. Classes were held in a rented house until a bequest made it possible to purchase property, named Gleason Institute. The institute provided both a school and social center until closed for financial reasons in 1932.

Today the elementary department offers two years of kindergarten and seven grades. The children follow the official elementary program in Spanish in the morning. English instruction is begun in the first grade and gradually increased. The secondary department offers a commercial course with added emphasis upon English as a second language. The school has had a boarding department throughout its history.

Christian education has an important place in the school, beginning in primary with classes on the Bible. At the secondary level courses are added on the history of Christianity, comparative religions, and study of moral and ethical problems in the light of the Christian message. In this way Colegio Americano tries to meet the needs of body, mind, and spirit, offering a complete education. The purpose is expressed in the school motto: "Love, Serve, Trust."

COLEGIO BENNETT (Bennett College) is a Methodist educational institution for girls in RIO DE JANEIRO, Brazil. From the beginning of Methodist work in that country, church leaders had envisioned such a school. In 1888 they opened the Escola do Alto, on one of the city's high hills, with Mary Bruce as principal; but it had to be closed in 1891, due to the ravages of yellow fever.

In 1892 another Methodist school was opened in Rio, the Colegio Americano Fluminense, which despite tremendous handicaps and brief periods of closing, due to the same fever, continued until 1915. Some of the most devoted women on the field served in this school, among them: Mary Pescud, Elizabeth Davis, Ada Parker, Ada Stewart, Helen Hickman, and LAYONA GLENN, who served there some twenty years.

In 1895, with the sale of the Escola do Alto, a handsome property was bought in Petropolis, a fever-free mountain resort near Rio de Janeiro. With MARTHA WATTS as its founder and first principal, the Colegio Americano de Petropolis was opened and served until 1920.

By 1910 Rio de Janeiro had been rebuilt and rid of its recurring epidemics. It was decided to establish there the long-desired, high-grade college for girls. In July 1913 BELLE BENNETT, then president of the Woman's Missionary Council of the M. E. Church, South, made a trip to Brazil, and after surveying the situation, the Council decided to close the two above mentioned schools, merging them into a junior college. Because Miss Bennett was instrumental in securing funds for its establishment, the school was named in her honor.

It was 1920 before a suitable property with a residence could be bought in the desired location, and on March 1, 1921, Bennett College opened with Miss Eva Louise Hyde as its first principal. Since then several adjoining properties have been acquired, and new buildings erected. Students can now enroll in the nursery school at the age of three, and continue at Bennett until graduation. Boys also are allowed from nursery until nine or ten years of age.

A school of sacred music in the college was the first of its kind in Brazilian Methodism. It has been most successful and has received public recognition, appearing with the Symphony Orchestra of Brazil.

The nursery, kindergarten, reading-readiness and sacred music departments are unique Bennett specialties; and this pioneer work is nationally and continentally known. The school has an enrollment of over a thousand.

Eva Louise Hyde, who was responsible in great part for the school's advance, retired in 1952, after forty-one years of active service in Brazil. In 1954 she was invited to return to receive an award for her outstanding contribution to education in Brazil. Miss Hyde was the first foreign woman ever to receive this award—the National Order of Merit, usually reserved for diplomats and high ranking military officers.

She was succeeded by Annita Harris, who served until 1955; and then by SARAH DAWSEY, a second generation missionary, who served until 1965. On April 1, 1966, a Brazilian, Dona PÉRSIDES Leal Vianna, a distinguished educator, lawyer, and former member of the board of directors, was inaugurated as principal, or Reitora.

COLEGIO EVANGELICO METODISTA (American Institute) is a Methodist school at La Paz and the oldest Methodist school in BOLIVIA, known until 1965 as American Institute. In 1906 FRANCIS M. HARRINGTON left his work in the school at IQUIQUE, CHILE, to enter Bolivia. His object was to start Methodist work in the country, and the school was one of his first fruits.

It was known in Chile that government officials were dissatisfied with schools of their country. They were sending their own sons to Iquique English College, a Methodist boys' school, and their daughters to Instituto Inglés, a Presbyterian school in SANTIAGO, Chile. The president's daughter was enrolled at the latter. Some accounts say that the government invited the M. E. Church to establish a school in Bolivia. However, it seems more likely that Harrington entered Bolivia knowing of the interest in education, but with the primary object of establishing religious work. Only after he had won legal approval for public Protestant worship did he take up the matter of a school.

Harrington had contracted tuberculosis in Chile and died within two years of his arrival in Bolivia. But the school survived—largely through the dedication of missionaries who taught for months without salary. Though the lack of a school for girls had prompted the president to open the door, the new American Institute at first admitted only boys—130 of them the first year. It was 1910 before girls were admitted.

The school was deep in debt when it opened. Harrington obtained a subsidy from the government, but it carried a proviso that no religion be taught. There was none in the classes, but missionaries had many informal contacts with the children, and before long the youngsters were seeking out the little Protestant chapel on Sundays.

For many years American Institute was under direction of missionaries, but recent directors have been Bolivians, as have been a majority of the teaching staff. In 1963 there were ninety-two teachers, of whom eighty-five were Bolivians.

Graduates of the school include many persons who have risen to prominence in public life: businessmen, cabinet ministers, ambassadors, and Hernan Siles Zuazo, who served a term as president of the republic.

Many of the educational theories and teaching techniques now in general practice in Bolivia were tried out first at American Institute. The school continues to hold seminars for teachers, and several of the faculty teach courses in education at the University in La Paz. The government rule against religion classes has been rescinded, and now pupils attend two religion classes a week and a voluntary chapel service.

Colegio Evangelico Metodista has classes in primary, high school, and commercial departments, with an enrollment in 1966 of 1,500 boys and girls. The institute conducts an annex in Los Andes, a poor section of La Paz, for 200 students in the first six grades. The present director is GASTON POL.

The school was recently awarded the "Grand Order of Bolivian Education," one of the highest awards the Bolivian government bestows.

COLEGIO ISABELA HENDRIX, Methodist educational institution in Belo Horizonte, capital of Minas Gerais, BRAZIL, was founded with five pupils, on Oct. 5, 1904, by MARTHA WATTS, aided by Blanche Howell, missionaries of the WOMEN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY (MES). The newly-planned capital gave the land for the establishment of a school; so with the financial support of the Women's Missionary Societies of MISSOURI, the first building was erected and named for Isabela Hendrix, mother of Bishop EUGENE HENDRIX.

When this building became inadequate, a city-block property was bought on Rua Baia, near the presidential palace and a modern plant was built under the direction of MARY SUE BROWN, a missionary-architect (1936-40). Today, the school boasts seven fine buildings, the newest a chapel named after VERDA FARRAR, its long-time principal.

The courses include nursery school and kindergarten, which have served as models for the city-schools; teacher-training, business and university-preparatory. Students participate in religious education and extra-curricular activities such as music, dramatics, athletics, publication of a school paper, and evangelical clubs. All grades are accredited by State and Federal laws, and most of the faculty is now Brazilian. In 1962, Jurema d'Avila Tavares became the school's first Brazilian reitora.

The present director (1970) is a Brazilian, Dr. Ulysses Panisset.

COLEMAN, GEORGE WHITEFIELD (1830-1907), American FREE METHODIST minister, was born into a godly family of Methodist background, in Perry Center, N. Y. Converted in early youth, he soon became active in church work. He was a local preacher. General Superintendent ROBERTS of the Free Methodist Church, recognizing his latent qualities, encouraged him to enter the active ministry. It was with great hesitance that he entered the itineracy. He was immediately successful and was admitted to the Genesee Conference in 1865. Here he served pastorates for twenty-three years. In 1886 he transferred to the Wisconsin Conference where he was elected traveling chairman (superintendent) of two districts. He served briefly and was then elected the third General Superintendent of the Church in the autumn of 1886. He continued in that position until 1903, when he retired because of advanced age. He was president of the General Missionary Board of his church for many years. A man of unquestioned integrity and intense conviction, his preaching moved congregations to decision.

COLEMAN, MATTIE ELIZABETH (1870-), American Negro woman physician and first president of the Woman's Missionary Council of the C.M.E. Church, was born in Sumner County, near Gallatin, Tenn., July 3, 1870. She was the oldest of four children born to Howard Coleman, a minister in the A.M.E. Church. She was converted and joined the church at twelve years of age, finished high school at fifteen, and furthered her education at Central Tennessee College, which later became Walden University. She possessed a remarkable voice and was a member of the Walden Choral Society and the female quartet.

In 1902, she married P. J. Coleman and joined the Colored (now CHRISTIAN) METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, where her husband was a minister. In 1906, she was graduated from MEHARRY MEDICAL COLLEGE and began to practice medicine in Clarksville, Tenn., where her husband was sent as pastor of Wesley Chapel C.M.E. Church. Being an ardent Christian, she worked in every phase of the church life.

In 1932, she became the first graduate in dental hygiene of Meharry College. She served as Medical Examiner of the Court of Calanthe of Tennessee for more than twenty years, but with all of her medical practice, civic and social responsibilities, she always found time to do her church work. She was a great helper in the establishment of the Nashville Bethlehem Center. She was always helping indigent children, giving medical aid to the poor and needy, and sharing her means for food, clothing and shelter for the hungry, poorly clad, and out-of-door people. She gave her entire self to the uplift of humanity. Being an able speaker she was much in demand, serving churches, programs for crippled children, and such other organizations as Red Cross, and many others. She served as Dean of Women at LANE COLLEGE for several years and was loved and highly respected by all the faculty and every student. She is the only Negro woman physician ever to become a State Tuberculosis Advisor and Counselor.

The spirit of missionary work was uppermost in her heart. She talked and cried and prayed until, in 1918, the General Conference of the Colored Methodist Episcopal Church in Chicago gave her and the missionary women permission to organize the Woman's Missionary Council, which came into being on Sept. 3, 1918.

COLEMAN, WILLIAM (1880-1963), Australian minister, was born at Winfarthing, Norfolk, England. At thirteen years of age he was apprenticed to a blacksmith and served his time. Married in 1905, he and his wife came to New South Wales, Australia, in 1910. For several years he engaged in farming on the Far North Coast.

In 1913 he was accepted as a candidate for the ministry and was immediately appointed to Moree in the Far North West of New South Wales.

After serving eleven years in country centers, he was stationed in SYDNEY and appointed to succeed the founder of the Australian Industrial Christian Movement, F. T. Walker. For the next twenty years he witnessed to and assisted individuals of all conditions and classes. His "Sunday Afternoon Platform" in the Sydney Domain became known throughout Australia. His tolerance and advocacy in the Police Courts sprang from an intuitive understanding of folk in trouble.

COLES, GEORGE (1792-1858), American minister, editor, musician and composer, was born in Stewkley, England, June 2, 1792. He was converted at about the age of twelve under Wesleyan preaching. Joining the Wesleyan Society in his native village, he nurtured his spiritual life through study of the Holy Scriptures, the reading of religious biography and other literature. He became a local preacher at the age of twenty-two.

In 1818 he emigrated to America, where he received a warm welcome from Christian friends and found employment as a supply preacher on the Jamaica, Long Island, N. Y. Circuit. In 1819 he was received on trial in the NEW YORK CONFERENCE. His membership continued in this Conference until his death thirty-nine years later. In addition to serving pastorates in some of the larger churches of the Conference, he served as assistant editor of The Christian Advocate and Journal from 1837-47. He also served as Editor of The Sunday School Advocate and Sunday school books from 1841-44. George Coles also published several volumes, among them: The Antidote, Lectures to Children, Scripture Concordance, My Youthful Days, My First Seven Years in America, and Heroines of Methodism. He kept detailed journals for nearly fifty years, the manuscripts of which are now in the Library at DREW UNIVERSITY, Madison, N. J.

Early in life he developed an interest in music. He became proficient on the flute and formed a trio composed of two flutes and a cello. He composed several hymn tunes, one of which appeared in the 1935 edition of The Methodist Hymnal. Composed in 1835, and named "Duane Street," the tune was used as the musical setting for John Cennick's hymn, "Jesus, My All, to Heaven Is Gone."

Due to ill health, Coles had to give up active work in 1852. He died in New York City on May 1, 1858, and was buried at Somers, N. Y.

COLHOUE, THOMAS HENRY (1829-1902), distinguished M.P. editor and publisher, was born on June 9, 1829, in Baltimore County, Md. As a child he attended the Methodist Protestant Sunday School. He moved to Camden, N. J., in 1845 and joined the M. E. Church. Later, when the M. P. Church was organized in Camden, he became one of its first members. He joined the New Jersey Conference of the M. P. Church in March, 1855, and for eight years he served as secretary of the conference. He joined the Pittsburgh Conference in 1865, and for nine years was secretary of this conference. He became president of the Pittsburgh Conference in 1867 and again from 1875-78. In 1868 he published his first work, Republican Methodism, which in 1869 was revised and enlarged into Non-Episcopal Methodism, Contrasted with Episcopal Methodism, an "elaborate and thorough investigation of governmental Methodism in all its phases." In 1870 Colhouer published a Review of Methodist Episcopal Quarterly Conference Lay Delegation. He received the M.A. degree pro merito from ADRIAN COLLEGE in 1872. The Methodist Protestant Book Concern in Pittsburgh published his Sketches of the Founders of the Methodist Protestant Church in 1880. For a while, Colhouer edited and published The Methodist Missionary, a forerunner of The Missionary Record, at Allegheny, Pa. He was a member of several conventions and general conferences and attended the historic Union Convention in Baltimore in May, 1877. He gave a historical address on the M. P. Church at the fiftieth session of the Pittsburgh Conference in 1883. He died on May 28, 1902.

COLLECTIONS. The original financial provision for British Methodism was associated with the organization of its spiritual life and growth—the CLASS MEETINGS into which the United Societies were divided. This was the provision of payment by the members of a penny per week, and an additional shilling on the occasion of the quarterly visitation of the classes by the preachers. The fund thus created was used partly for buildings but mainly for the support of the preachers. This ultimately created the Society Fund administered under the authority of the quarterly meetings of the CIRCUITS.

The need for a connexional fund was realized by Wesley through the accumulation of a debt of over £11,000 on chapel buildings. This led to the adoption of a YEARLY COLLECTION, as it was called by the Conference in 1763. It was in fact made up by subscriptions for which appeal was made in all the classes. The building for KINGSWOOD SCHOOL was opened in 1748 and led to approval by the Conference of a Kingswood Collection sustained in the same way. At the same time a Preachers Fund was started, subscribed by the preachers to provide retiring allowances. This ultimately developed into an Annuitant Society with an Auxiliary Fund subscribed by the members to augment what the preachers themselves were doing. It was not until 1772 that the Conference decided that collections could be taken in every chapel, or preaching house as they were called at that time, for these purposes.

Connexional collections increased in the early nineteenth century with the establishment of a special Chapel Building Fund and a Mission Fund for work overseas. In 1815 the orderly system of quarterly collections for connexional purposes was established, as follows: October, to Kingswood and Woodhouse Grove Schools; January or February, for Chapel Building Fund; May, for Missions; July, for the Contingent Fund. This was the new name for the Yearly Collection, as it was now used for various purposes. There were developments in subsequent years with the addition of other connexional funds such as Home Missions and Theological Institution, but the 1815 decision established the framework—the local society fund for the support of the ministry and the regular connexional collections for the general funds. It was not until the seventies of the last century that a weekly offertory was adopted in connection with public worship. (See also CONFERENCE COLLECTIONS.)

COLLEGE OF BISHOPS (U.S.A.). The College of Bishops in The United Methodist Church includes all the bishops assigned to or elected by a JURISDICTIONAL or a CENTRAL CONFERENCE. The name "College of Bishops" was assumed by the Bishops of the M. E. Church, South in the later years of that denomination's life, when they met as a college ("collection") and looked after general supervision of their church. As a constitutional entity, this college of bishops had no status, though the individual men who composed it did. Their association together as a college was of their own volition and in order to supervise better their work. In the M. E. Church, the same grouping of bishops was called the "Board of Bishops" and it, like their southern episcopal brethren, had no constitutional standing except what their own mutual association gave them. But following Unification, the bishops of the entire Church have been constitutionally formed into a COUNCIL OF BISHOPS, a constitutional entity. The various Colleges of Bishops now in the Jurisdictional and Central Conferences meet from time to time to organize or oversee their work, make plans for episcopal visitation, look after general church or Jurisdictional nominations and in general supervise the work entrusted to them.

COLLEGE OF WEST AFRICA, Monrovia, LIBERIA, a Methodist Mission college preparatory high school, is the oldest school in the country, dating back to 1839 when the Liberia Conference Seminary was opened with Jabez Burton as principal. For many years the instruction was given mostly on the elementary school level.

With the coming of ALEXANDER PRIESTLY CAMPHOR and his wife to Liberia in 1897, a new era began for the educational work of the Methodist Church in Liberia. In 1898 the Conference authorized a reorganization of the educational program so that much needed courses in normal and ministerial training could be offered. The name of the school was changed from "Monrovia Seminary" to the "College of West Africa." In 1904 the school was granted a charter with the "aim to impart thorough and practical knowledge in the following departments, Collegiate, Theological, Industrial, and Normal." The college was also authorized to grant degrees. For about twenty years liberal arts courses were offered with degree after successful completion of four years' work.

In the late 1920's R. L. Embree reorganized the program of the school, limiting its instruction to the high school level. The underlying reasons were financial problems as well as the small student body. During Embree's administration a spacious and well-constructed building, "Cox Memorial," was dedicated in 1933, commemorating the centennial of the first missionary, MELVILLE B. COX. For a number of years the College of West Africa has been the leading college preparatory school in Liberia. The majority of its teachers are college-trained Africans. The influence of the school has gone far beyond the boundaries of the Methodist Church in that a large number of leading men and women in government, in various denominations and schools, are graduates of CWA. An excellent girls' dormitory under the leadership of the Woman's Division of Christian Service in the U.S.A. provides a home for girls attending CWA. In 1961 a splendid boys' dormitory and an additional classroom building were built and dedicated to meet the increasing needs and demands of the time.

COLLEY, THOMAS EDWARD (1893-1960), was so closely identified with the life and work of his American Conference that for many years he might justly have been called "Mr. ERIE CONFERENCE." Born in Featherstone, England, Dec. 23, 1893, he came to America in 1911, and became an American citizen in 1917. He was married in 1916 to Velma Grace Smiley. Having only a common school education when he came to America, he worked as a coal miner on the night shift while attending high school, graduating as valedictorian of his class. He experienced conversion under Methodist preaching and determined to give himself to the Methodist ministry. Graduating from ALLEGHENY COLLEGE and GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE, Thomas Colley was admitted on trial in the Erie Conference in 1919, and spent his ministry in that Conference.

Colley served as Superintendent on two districts of the Erie Conference, where he gave leadership in numerous Conference agencies. He served as a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1936, 1940, 1944, and 1948. A treasured privilege was his in serving as a delegate to the eighth ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE at Oxford, England in 1951, and the opportunity it afforded to revisit the scenes of his youth. A man of reserved temperament, Thomas Colley was an able administrator. He possessed an artistry in his use of the English language, and an abiding dedication to honesty and integrity of life in all things.

Thomas Colley died May 30, 1960 just two weeks before he had planned to retire.

W. GUY SMELTZER

COLLIER, SAMUEL FRANCIS (1855-1921), British Methodist, was born at Runcorn, Cheshire, Oct. 3, 1855. The son of a grocer who had almost entered the PRIMITIVE METHODIST ministry, he was accepted for the WESLEYAN METHODIST ministry in 1877, and was trained at DIDS-BURY COLLEGE, Manchester, 1877-81. Always an evangelist, he was chosen in 1886 to start the new Central Mission in MANCHESTER which was one of the earliest and most successful experiments of the FORWARD MOVEMENT. Collier was very successful as a preacher: the mission had 93 members in 1887 and 1,484 by 1895. He also financed and organized the homes, hospitals, and other social works characteristic of the early central missions. He was PRESIDENT of the Wesleyan Methodist Conference of 1913; in 1920 he visited Australian Methodism as the delegate of the Wesleyan Conference. He died in Manchester, still superintendent of the Central Mission, on June 2, 1921.

JOHN KENT

COLLINS, BRIAN (BURY) (1754-1807?), British eighteenth century Evangelical, was born at Stamford, Lincolnshire, in 1754, the son of John Collins, a painter. He was admitted to St. John's College, Cambridge, in 1771, took his B.A. in 1776, his M.A. in 1780. He was ordained deacon on March 3, 1776, and served as curate of Rauceby and Cranwell, Lincolnshire. He was dismissed as a curate because of field preaching, however, and in 1779 was assisting JOHN BERRIDGE, the famous Anglican Evangelical, at Everton, in Bedfordshire. He regarded himself as having an unlimited preaching commission, and, although himself passionately Evangelical Anglican, sought to reconcile the Wesleys and Selina, LADY HUNTINGDON. The Wesleys told him to seek full Anglican ordination; in August 1780, Bishop Porteus of Chester declined to ordain him because of his field preaching; in the following year, however, Porteus changed his mind, and ordained him in October 1781. Collins did not really settle for many years, but was frequently in the company of JOHN WESLEY, for whom he often preached, and of HENRY VENN and Lady Huntingdon. In 1799 Collins inherited the estate at Linwood Grange, Lincolnshire, of his maternal uncle, Thomas Bury; he then assumed, by royal license, the surname and arms of Bury only. In his uncle's will he was described as of Bath. The date of his death is uncertain, but he probably died soon after March 1, 1807, the date of the death of his only son.

JOHN KENT

COLLINS, CHARLES (1813-1875), American college president, scholar, author and magazine editor, was born April 17, 1813, in MAINE. He was valedictorian of the class of 1837 at WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY in Connecticut. Two of his classmates became college presidents—DANIEL CURRY, president of Indiana Asbury University (now DEPAUV) and EPHRAIM EMERSON WILEY, president of EMORY and HENRY COLLEGE in Virginia. In 1851 Collins was awarded the D.D. degree by three institutions. He, too, was elected president of Emory and Henry College, before he was twenty-five years old. He was chosen president of DICKINSON COLLEGE in Pennsylvania in 1852. Eight years later, in August, 1860, he returned to the South to become president of the State Female College in MEMPHIS, Tenn.

Collins found time in his busy career to indulge his literary talent by writing and publishing doctrinal tracts. One was Methodism and Calvinism Compared. That appeared in 1848 but in 1844 he had shown his notable talent in writing "controversial papers" against the Roman Catholic Church. Ladies Repository is another journal to which he contributed. He served also as editor of Southern Repertory and College Review.

He died on July 10, 1875.

COLLINS, EVERELL STANTON (1866-1940), American layman and philanthropist, was born in Courtland, N. Y., Nov. 30, 1866. He moved to Washington State from Pennsylvania in 1888, and engaged in the lumber business at Ostrander until 1917, when he went to Portland, Ore., where he continued to manage his business interests.

Collins was a member of the Board of Trustees of the College of Puget Sound (later THE UNIVERSITY OF PUGET SOUND), Tacoma, Wash., from 1903 to 1940. He also was a member of the Board of Trustees of WILLAMETTE UNIVERSITY, Salem, Ore., from 1912 to 1940. He is credited with giving one-tenth of all the money contributed to the College of Puget Sound from 1913 to 1940. He gave largely to Willamette University, and for many years matched, dollar for dollar, all funds raised by the OREGON CONFERENCE for WORLD SERVICE.

The Library at the University of Puget Sound and the Science Building at Willamette University were products of his generosity after his death. He gave liberally to Y.M.C.A., Y.W.C.A., and Goodwill Industries, as well as other Methodist causes.

His father, Truman D. Collins, was a founder of Collins Institute at CALCUTTA, INDIA, and a generous supporter of Allegheny College.

E. S. Collins had two sons, TRUMAN and Alton, who engaged in the lumber business with their father. His daughter, Grace, was the wife of Elmer R. Coudy, a businessman in Portland.

Collins died Dec. 18, 1940, and his remains were interred in Portland, Ore.

GEORGE N. COLLINS

COLLINS, GEORGE NAPOLEON (1899-1972), an American bishop of the A.M.E. Church, was born in Quincy, Fla., on June 8, 1899. He was educated at EDWARD WATERS COLLEGE, where he received the A.B. degree in 1926, and the Lee Theological Seminary where he received the B.D. degree. Later he was awarded the honorary degree of D.D. Following his ordination as deacon and elder he was a pastor in Florida, Arkansas, Oklahoma and Louisiana. He was elected to the episcopacy in 1960 from the presiding eldership of the Central New Orleans District of the Louisiana Conference of his church. He resided at New Orleans, La., and supervised the work of the Twelfth Episcopal Area District, which covers the states of Arkansas and Oklahoma.

Bishop Collins died in an automobile accident in February 1972.

GRANT S. SHOCKLEY

COLLINS, JOHN (1848-1932), American preacher, was born in Rouse, Lench, Worcestershire, England, May 21, 1848. He was converted to Methodism at a PRIMITIVE METHODIST cottage meeting in 1859 and joined the WESLEYAN METHODIST CHURCH in 1867. He was licensed to preach in 1869.

Collins came to the United States in 1871 and settled in SALT LAKE CITY, Utah, where he joined the M. E. Church. He was licensed to preach in Longmont, Col., in 1873, and supplied several circuits until his first regular appointment to Cucharas, Col., in 1875. For the next thirteen years he served churches in small Colorado towns, coming to DENVER in 1889. At Denver, Collins made his most important contribution to the cause of Methodism in the West. He gave leadership in establishing churches in the small towns around Denver. Churches at Valverde, Fleming Grove, Myrtle Hill, and Rosedale were formed through his efforts. A church in Denver bears his name.

John Collins died Sept. 30, 1932 and is buried in Denver.

LOWELL B. SWAN

COLLINS, JOHN A. (1801-1857), American minister and leader in the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE from 1830 until his death in 1857. He intended to become a lawyer and studied under the distinguished William Wirt, but he was converted at a CAMPMEETING in Loudon County, Va., and after serving for a time as a local preacher in Washington City, while in the public service, he joined the Baltimore Conference in 1830. He was a delegate to every General Conference from the time he became eligible until the time of his death. For a time, he was Agent for DICKINSON COLLEGE, and then in 1836 was elected assistant editor of the Christian Advocate at New York. He resigned this office chiefly because he thought he could serve the Church more fully in the regular ministry and wished to get back to The Old Baltimore.

John Collins took a prominent part in the debate which divided the M. E. Church in 1844. "Few men have equalled him in successfully preaching the doctrine, or in more faithfully defending the Discipline of the Church," said Bishop McTYRE. He was commanding in debate and conspicuous in defending the position of his own conference which was endeavoring after 1844 to be a bridge-conference between the M. E. Church to which it continued to adhere, and the newly organized M. E. Church, South, with which the sympathies of thousands of its members were engaged. Collins was suddenly smitten when he was fifty-six years of age while on his way to a quarterly meeting, and died on May 7, 1857.

COLLINS, JUDSON DWIGHT (1823-1852), first Methodist missionary to CHINA, was born on Feb. 12, 1823, in Rose County, N. Y., the son of Sepheus and Betty Collins. In his early childhood the family moved to Unadilla, Mich. Their farm home was deeply religious. Four of the eight sons entered the Christian ministry. Judson was named for Adoniram Judson, missionary to Burma.

He was one of five boys to enter the first freshman class at the University of Michigan in 1841. Two months after graduation, he became a professor at the newly organized ALBION COLLEGE, then a college for women.

When he asked the Board of Missions to send him to China, Bishop EDMUND S. JAMES replied, "The Methodist Church has no missionaries in China and no money to send one." Judson Collins answered, "Secure me a position before the mast—my strong arms can pull me to China and support me after I get there. God is calling and I must go!" The way was opened, and on April 15, 1847, joined by MOSES WHITE and his wife, he sailed from Boston on the sailing vessel Heber. It took five months to reach Foochow.

Finding a place to live was difficult. Mrs. White died within a year. Judson Collins continued three years and seven months in Foochow. He founded three schools—one for boys, one for girls and a music school. On advice of the doctor, he returned to the United States in 1851, hoping to recover his health and return for further service in China. But health did not return. He died on May 13, 1852, only twenty-nine years of age, and was buried in the family cemetery near Unadilla.

President Angell, of the University of Michigan, later ambassador to China, said of him: "Judson Dwight Collins, member of the first class of the University of Michigan, who went to China as a missionary, laid the foundation of its educational life in a little public school in the City of Foochow." COLLINS, THOMAS (1810-1864), British Wesleyan Methodist evangelist, was born on April 12, 1810, near Solihull, Warwickshire, and claimed that his conversion took place at the age of eight. It was at the age of sixteen that he consecrated himself to the work of God, and in 1832 he entered the Wesleyan ministry. He thought at first of becoming a missionary, but was appointed to the home work and served in a variety of circuits from the Orkneys to Cornwall. A man of prayer, he became a preacher in great demand all over the country, and was one of the supporters of JABEZ BUNTING, who restored Wesleyanism after the troubles of the mid-century. Collins died on Dec. 27, 1864.

TRUMAN W. COLLINS

COLLINS, TRUMAN WESLEY (1902-1964), American industrialist and philanthropist, was born in OREGON on August 29, 1902, and was educated at WILLAMETTE and HOWARD Universities. He received an honorary degree from Lewis and Clark College in 1960.

The Collins family owned hundreds of thousands of acres of forest lands in the Pacific Northwest and engaged in extensive lumber operations. The grandfather, Truman Doud Collins, established the enterprises by acquiring 200,000 acres of land. He also started the philanthropy to Methodist missions by pledging $10,000 annually for ten years to establish the Collins Institute in CALCUTTA, INDIA. The father, EVERELL STANTON COLLINS, added $285,000 for other institutions. At his death in December, 1940, he left an estate of $9,000,000, one-third of which was given to missions and educational institutions; one-third was taken by taxes and the other one-third went to the Collins heirs.

Truman Wesley Collins devoted his generosity to pensions for retired missionaries. The Collins Fund was built up to more than $8,000,000 by the early 1960s, and it pays all missionary pensions without requiring any appropriation from the Board of Missions. He died at Portland, Ore., Feb. 23, 1964, and is interred at Portland Memorial Indoor Cemetery.

COLLIVER, GEORGE HARRISON (1889-1957), American minister and educator, was born in Hornitos, Calif., June 19, 1889. His parents were natives of Cornwall, England. After learning watchmaking, he decided to enter the ministry and used his trade to earn his way through the academy and the collegiate department of the College (now UNIVERSITY) OF THE PACIFIC, graduating in 1915. He was admitted on trial in the California Conference in 1914. He won the S.T.B. degree at the BOSTON UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY in 1918. The University of California awarded him the honorary Ped.D. degree in 1945. He married Iva Bell Cooley in June, 1915, and they had one son and four daughters.

In 1920, after two years as assistant pastor at First Church, San Jose, where the College of the Pacific was then located, Colliver became a professor in his alma mater and served there the rest of his life. He organized the department of Bible and religious education in the college, the first of its kind on the Pacific coast. He was an acknowledged leader in the field of religious education. Trained at Boston under WALTER S. ATHEARN who organized there the School of Religious Education and Social Service, Colliver sought to bring the College of the Pacific into cooperation with the religious life of his community. He helped to establish the San Jose Community School for Religious Education, and after the college moved to Stockton, he assisted in establishing a similar school there. Also, in Stockton he led in organizing the Clay Street Methodist Youth Project, the Stockton Chinese Christian Center, and the Christian Community Association. Colliver served on the editorial staff of the Adult Student, and was a member of the National Association of Biblical Instructors and of the Pacific Coast Association for Religious Studies. During the last few years of his life he was vice-president of the METHODIST FEDERATION FOR SOCIAL ACTION and was president of his conference chapter of that organization.

In 1957, Colliver was honored by the inauguration of the Colliver Lectureship in Religious Education at the University of the Pacific. He died Dec. 6, 1957, and was buried at San Jose, Calif.

COLMAN COLLECTION OF WESLEYANA was a British collection of diaries and other Wesley manuscripts which were originally acquired by a prominent Norwich businessman, J. J. Colman, from Mr. Gandy, who was executor to HENRY MOORE. In 1937 the Colman family placed this material under the guardianship of the Methodist Church. This important and generous gift included several of JOHN WESLEY's private diaries—to be distinguished from his Journals—kept between 1725 and 1741. The collection also included many letters written by, or to, John Wesley; papers written by CHARLES WESLEY; and a quantity of miscellaneous papers belonging to John Wesley, most of them from the 1730's. Much, though not all, of this collection has been published. It was available to NEHEMIAH CURNOCK when he was working on the standard edition of the Journal, and to the editor of John Wesley's Letters, JOHN TELFORD.

COLORADO is a mountain state located near the center of the western half of the United States. Part of its territory was in the LOUISIANA Purchase and the rest was ceded by TEXAS and MEXICO. Colorado became a territory in 1861 and was admitted to the Union in 1876. Its average altitude, 6,800 feet, makes it the highest state in the nation. Some fifty-two of the sixty-seven tallest mountain peaks in the United States are in Colorado. The population of the state is approximately 2,000,000. Known for its gold in earlier days, mining is still an important part of the state's economy, particularly molybdenum and coal.

George W. Fisher, carpenter and wagonmaker and also a local preacher in the M. E. Church, delivered the first Protestant sermon in Colorado in November, 1858, the year that gold was discovered in the territory. It is claimed that the sermon was preached in a saloon with the minister standing in front of the bar. The text was, "Ho, everyone that thirsteth, come ye to the waters . . ." (Isa. 55:1). Behind the preacher were bottles in glittering array. Placards on the wall read, "No Trust," "Pay as you Go," and "25 cents a Drink."

Three preachers figured prominently in the official beginning of Methodism in Colorado—WILLIAM H. GOODE, JACOB ADRIANCE, and JOHN L. DYER. The first two were appointed as missionaries to Colorado from the KANSAS and NEBRASKA CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church. They began work in July, 1859. Dyer, known as "Father" Dyer, went to Colorado by way of MINNESOTA. During his career he served as preacher in charge of ten different communities and was presiding elder in the South Park, Rio Grande, and Santa Fe Districts. In winter as Dyer traveled his circuits on homemade skis, he also carried the mail. In the dome of the state capitol in Denver one finds the portraits of the sixteen pioneers who did the most for the building of Colorado. The portrait of John Lewis Dyer is among them.

JOHN EVANS, a Methodist layman who was appointed Governor of Colorado Territory by President Lincoln, contributed greatly to the religious and cultural life of the state. Evans was the moving spirit in the establishment of Colorado Seminary (UNIVERSITY OF DENVER) which was sponsored by the Colorado Conference.

Colorado Methodism was organized as the ROCKY MOUNTAIN CONFERENCE in 1863. The next year the name was changed to the Colorado Conference, and it was so known for the next ninety-three years. In 1948 the UTAH churches in the Utah Mission were taken into the Colorado Conference. In 1957, the Colorado and the WYOMING State conferences merged, and the new and larger body has since been called the Rocky Mountain Conference. From 1872 to 1876 there was another Rocky Mountain Conference which included Utah, IDAHO, MONTANA, and part of Wyoming. It divided to form the Montana and Utah Conferences.

In 1963 three churches in Colorado which had belonged to the CENTRAL WEST CONFERENCE, Central Jurisdiction, were received into the Colorado Conference. The next year as the JAPANESE PROVISIONAL CONFERENCE was absorbed by the English-speaking conferences of the Western Jurisdiction, the Simpson Church in Denver was welcomed into the Rocky Mountain Conference.

The work of the M. E. Church, South, in Colorado was significant. It began in 1860, stopped during the Civil War, and was resumed in 1871. The DENVER CONFERENCE was formed in 1874 and continued until 1930 when it was absorbed by the NEW MEXICO CONFERENCE. It was said partly in jest that the Denver Conference was made up of preachers who went to Colorado for their own health or that of their families. At the time of union in 1939, the M. E. Church, South, in Colorado brought thirteen appointments and 2,855 members into the Colorado Conference of The Methodist Church.

COLORADO CONFERENCE. (See ROCKY MOUNTAIN CONFERENCE and COLORADO.)

COLORADO SPRINGS, COLORADO, U.S.A. First Church is the largest Methodist Church in the Western Jurisdiction, with a 1970 membership of 6,031.

The city of Colorado Springs was founded by General William J. Palmer in 1871, and in October of that year the first Sunday school met in the Palmer home. By December worship services were also conducted, with an average attendance of ten.

By March 1872, records show the attendance had jumped to an average of sixty. Palmer donated a lot for a church building. The building which was finished in May cost $1,250. In 1880 land was purchased and a new building erected. Again, in 1901, the congregation moved, this time to the present location. By that time the membership had grown to 1,000.

A new sanctuary was built in 1956, and in 1957 an educational wing and chapel were added. The church has just completed an additional building program.

First Church has one of the largest Sunday congregations in all of Methodism, with three morning and one evening worship services, two church school sessions and other special activities.

In 1966 the church made a gift of land in Colorado Springs to the ROCKY MOUNTAIN CONFERENCE for a new Methodist church in the city. There are eleven Methodist churches in Colorado Springs (1970).

COLORED METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH. (See CHRISTIAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.)

COLORED METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH was formed in Elkton, Cecil Co., Md., in 1840 by approximately 100 members of Negro Methodist churches of MARYLAND and adjoining states. At the meeting, the new church was organized along the same principles as was the METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH, which believed very strongly in the equal rights of both lay and clerical members. They retained, however, the doctrine of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and adopted a Book of Discipline. They had a loose connectional form of government, no episcopacy, and only one order of ministry.

They experienced a sharp decline of membership in the early twentieth century dropping from twenty-six to one congregation between 1916 and 1936 and dropping from 1,967 to 216 members in the same period. A short time later the organization ceased to exist.

COLQUITT, ALFRED HOLT (1824-1894), United States Senator and Representative, Governor of Georgia, and active layman, was born in Walton County, Ga., on April 20, 1824. He graduated from Princeton University in 1844 and settled in Georgia as an attorney in 1845. He served in the Mexican War as a major. In May of 1848 he married Dorothy Tarver, and upon her death several years later, he married Sarah Tarver.

Colquitt began his political career in 1852 when he was elected to the U.S. Congress as a Democrat. In 1859 he was elected to the Georgia legislature. Colquitt was a presidential elector-at-large in 1860 and voted for John C. Breckinridge. The following year he was a delegate to the Georgia Secession Convention.

Upon the outbreak of the War Between the States, Colquitt joined the Confederate Army as a captain and rose rapidly to the rank of major-general. He was governor of Georgia from 1876-82, and was elected to the U.S. Senate in 1882 and 1888.

Like his father before him, Colquitt was a LOCAL PREACHER of the M. E. Church, South. He was a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1870, the first to which laymen were elected. He was an early champion of temperance and took a keen interest in all religious and moral issues. While he was Governor of Georgia, he was elected president of the International Sunday School Convention in 1878. He was a devoted trustee of Emory College, and was also a trustee of the Slater Fund which was established by a Northern capitalist to aid Negro education in the South. He was an ardent proponent of the New South philosophy. As a speaker he was much in demand for camp meetings. Throughout his long political career, he maintained a deep interest in the church, and served on several committees of the NORTH GEORGIA CONFERENCE.

Colquitt died in Washington, D.C., on March 26, 1894, near the end of his second term in the Senate. He was buried in Rose Hill Cemetery in Macon, Ga.

COLTON, ETHAN THEODORE (1872-1970), International YMCA secretary, was born at Palmyra, Wis., Nov. 22, 1872, the son of Harvey T. and Jane (Congdon) Colton. He held the B.A. (1898) and the LL.D. (1929) from DAKOTA WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, and did postgraduate study at Chicago and Columbia Universities. While in school he was president of the college YMCA, and also state president of the EPWORTH LEAGUE which he reorganized along YMCA lines. He married Caroline Quigg, Oct. 11, 1900, and they had one son and two daughters.

After graduation, Colton taught one year at Dakota Wesleyan and then began full-time service with the YMCA. Following one year as student secretary in ILLINOIS, he served as traveling secretary, student department, International YMCA, 1900-04; secretary of the foreign department, 1904-15; associate general secretary, 1915-24; and executive secretary, 1926-32. While associate general secretary, he assisted JOHN R. MOTT in building support for foreign operations.

Several important assignments fell to Colton. He was chairman of the commission on survey and occupation of the Congress on Christian Work in Latin America which met in Panama in 1916 to work out comity agreements for churches with missions in Latin America. Following the 1917 revolution in Russia, he organized the YMCA service in that country and Siberia, and from 1922 to 1925 he directed relief for the Russian intelligentsia, a project which centered in Paris. In 1925-26 he was administrative secretary of the combined work of the American and Canadian YMCA's in the Russia-Baltic Areas.

Though officially retired in 1932, during the second world war Colton was an executive for YMCA War Prisoners' Aid in camps in the United States. He served many years as a member of the International Committee of the YMCA, and was a director of the Tolstoy Foundation. He lectured widely on European affairs at colleges, clubs, forums, and civic organizations. As a recognized authority on Russia, he was consulted by government officials and others. He published a number of books, including The XYZ of Communism (1931), Four Patterns of Revolution (1935), Forty Years with Russians (1940), Toward an Understanding of Europe (1944), and The Russians We Face Now (1953).

Colton established his home at Upper Montclair, N. J., in 1905. He died May 21, 1970, and was buried there.

COLUMBIA, MISSOURI, U.S.A. Missouri Church is so named because all Methodist churches in MISSOURI joined with the Columbia congregation in the late twenties to erect this edifice. This was because the church is located one-half block from the campus of the University of Missouri and witnesses to Methodism's concern to provide a ministry to academic communities, as well as to the larger world. Christian College, Stephens College, and the Missouri School of Religion are also in Columbia. In three parts about equal, members, students, and visitors make up the usual Sunday morning congregations. Missouri Methodism, recognizing the strategic location of the church, gladly contributed to build in Columbia an edifice worthy of this church's special mission. The building is frequently called "The Cathedral of Missouri Methodism."

The building is famous for its stained glass windows. The Creation window is opposite the Nativity; the themes of Sin and Sacrifice in the Old Testament face those of Sacrifice and Salvation in the New; then in turn come the Old Testament Temple and the New Testament Church, and the Twelve Minor Prophets with the Twelve Disciples. In the north transept is Moses flanked by the Major Prophets, facing our Lord and the four Evangelists in the south transept.

The great Methodist window in the west carries JOHN, CHARLES, and SUSANNA WESLEY, FRANCIS ASBURY, BARBARA HECK, and WILLIAM MCKENDREE in life size. Four scenes or symbols are with each character. Among these is LOVELY LANE CHAPEL OF CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE fame over the head of Asbury. Under the feet of McKendree is MCKENDREE CHAPEL, located in southeast Missouri and the oldest Methodist home of worship west of the Mississippi River.

McMurry Chapel in the edifice is named after Bishop WILLIAM F. McMURRY, long the presiding Bishop of Missouri Methodism, whose insight sparked the possibility of the present great structure, and whose determination helped bring it to fulfillment.

The WESLEY FOUNDATION, serving the three campuses, is located in the church, and a warmly supportive yet free friendship between the Foundation and the church enables each to offer a deeper ministry.

Missouri Church is presently carrying the full support of Robert and Mazelle Hanson, missionaries in Salzburg, AUSTRIA. There are about 2,000 members, but the church claims a constituency nearly three times that number.

In 1965 the Church published a History of Missouri Methodist Church, written by Frank F. Stephens. Another publication, The Methodist Church in Missouri 1789-1939, by Frank C. Tucker, also treats of the story of this "state church," as it is sometimes called.

COLUMBIA, SOUTH CAROLINA, U.S.A., and Columbia Methodism are virtually coeval. It was but a year after the founding of Columbia in 1786 that ISAAC SMITH, a Methodist circuit rider, preached the first Christian sermon in Columbia.

In 1802 John Harper, an Englishman ordained to the ministry by JOHN WESLEY, held services in the partially completed State House, services being held on alternate Sundays by Methodist and Presbyterian ministers.

On Dec. 15, 1803, Harper organized a unit of six persons into the membership of a Methodist church. It was in that year that he acquired the property on the corner of Washington and Marion Streets and deeded it to the little society which he formed. In 1804 the Methodists built a plain wooden church on the lot where the sanctuary of Washington Street Church now stands.

A frequent visitor to the society in the early days was the eminent leader of American Methodism, Bishop FRANCIS ASBURY. The society grew slowly but found it necessary within twenty-five years to enlarge the little chapel twice. In 1831 WILLIAM CAPERS, the only man to serve the church as pastor three times, led in the building of a brick church.

In 1970 there were thirty-one United Methodist churches in Columbia with a total membership of 19,800, and property valued in excess of $14,000,000. Two of these churches, Francis Burns and Wesley, are composed largely of Negro membership. Wesley Church, the older, was established in 1859.

Columbia is also the center for various boards, agencies, and institutions related to the SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE. The office of the Columbia Area bishop, the Columbia District superintendent, the publishing plant and offices of the South Carolina Methodist Advocate (successor to the Southern Christian Advocate) are located in the Methodist Center, a four-story brick building erected in 1949 on Lady Street. Other agencies located in Columbia are COLUMBIA COLLEGE, Epworth Children's Home, Bethlehem Center, and Wesley Foundation at the University of South Carolina.

Columbia College, an accredited college for women, was founded in 1854. Its faculty now numbers around seventy, about 1,000 students, a plant valued at $5,435,477, and its endowment $1,625,000.

Epworth Children's Home was opened in January 1896. It provides a home for 200 children. Its property holdings are valued at about $3,000,000.

In 1866 Bethel A.M.E. Church was established, and there are now four additional churches of this denomination. The five churches have 2,260 members, and the value of their property is $810,000.

ALLEN UNIVERSITY is an educational institution of the A.M.E. CHURCH. Founded in 1870 as Payne Institute at Cokesbury, S. C., it was moved to Columbia in 1880 as Allen University. It has a faculty of about ninety, including staff, and almost 2,000 students. Its endowment is $655,000, and its assets $3,000,000.

The C.M.E. CHURCH organized a congregation and built a sanctuary, the Sidney Park C.M.E. Church, in 1886. Another church of this denomination has been organized, and the two have a total membership of 675 and property valued at $225,000.

Soon after union in 1939, those opposed to the union organized the SOUTHERN METHODIST CHURCH. A congregation of this communion formed the Maple Street Southern Methodist Church in Columbia in 1941, and subsequently two additional churches. They report a total of 250 members, with property valued at $174,000.

In 1946 the WESLEYAN METHODIST CHURCH was organized in the city. There are about twenty-five members, with a property value of $38,000.

The Taylor EVANGELICAL METHODIST CHURCH was organized in 1952, and since then has established another church in the city. They have 300 members and property valued at $155,000.

Epworth Children's Home, formerly known as Epworth Orphanage, with an average of 200 occupants, is rated as one of the finest such institutions in American Methodism. It was begun after T. C. O'Dell, a member of the South Carolina Conference, wrote an article in the Southern Christian Advocate on July 24, 1894, suggesting the establishment of such a home for orphaned children by the Methodist people of the state. The annual conference held at Laurens in November of that year voted to establish the home, and such was the interest that Bishop JOHN C. KEENER, then presiding, referred to the occasion as "the Epworth Orphanage Conference." One hundred and fifteen acres of land, one mile east of Columbia, were purchased, and the institution begun on Jan. 20, 1896, with G. H. Waddell as first superintendent. With the spread of the city, the tract of land has become enormously valuable. A church building has been erected on the center of the campus, and the children of the Home attend the city school system.

Allen Broome has acted as the able superintendent of the institution for several years, as well as serving presently as secretary for the South Carolina Conference.

Shandon Church is the home of the largest congregation in the South Carolina Conference. The church began in 1909, meeting in an old school at Queen and Lee Streets. Two years later the congregation moved into a new building on Maple Street. When this church was destroyed by fire in 1914, the members determined to rebuild on the site. This new building, completed in 1915, still stands but now houses another congregation.

By 1928 the congregation of 862 had outgrown that structure. The church negotiated with the Columbia City School Board and bought the Heathwood School property at the intersection of Devine Street and Millwood Avenue, moving in March 1931. The church struggled to keep the property during the next lean years, but by good leadership and diligent work survived and grew. By 1945 the congregation purchased the present site, breaking ground three years later April 14, 1948.

The new building was officially opened and consecrated Feb. 26, 1950. The building of the new church represented an initial outlay of $350,000 for the 1,582 members. This grew to more than $1,000,000 and 2,400 members by the time it was dedicated on March 13, 1966 by Bishop PAUL HARDIN, JR. Shandon, because of its strategic location in the capital city and its leadership in South Carolina Methodism, will continue as one of the great churches.

Washington Street Church reflects the history of the state and capital city since the year 1803, when the first church was built on a site given by John Harper, an English clergyman ordained by John Wesley, Aug. 5, 1787. With a small group of six Methodists, he determined to build a house of worship in Columbia: The little congregation was organized Dec. 15, 1803, and they built a wooden structure in 1804.

The church grew slowly at first, but during the next twenty-five years the little chapel was enlarged twice. In 1831 William Capers, later bishop, began a ministry which was to extend to three different appointments. His preaching attracted such large crowds that the building of a new brick church resulted.

On Feb. 16-17, 1865, the city of Columbia was burned by Federal troops under the command of General William T. Sherman. The church buildings were destroyed by fire, and legend has it that the soldiers, looking for the First Baptist Church where the Secession Convention was begun, were directed to the Methodist church by the Baptist sexton and thus mistakenly the torches were set to Washington Street Church. From the ruins an impoverished congregation gathered burned bricks, and with mud mortar erected a chapel which served as a place of worship until the present church was completed in 1872.

In December 1869, William Martin was appointed by the South Carolina Conference as financial agent to travel across the nation to solicit funds for the rebuilding of this great church. In his diary of Aug. 16, 1871, he wrote: "After solemn prayer to Almighty God, in the presence of Clark Waring, R. D. Senn, William Glaze, James E. Black, Rev. M. W. Moore, and my daughter Isabella, I took a spade and with my own hand broke ground for the foundation of the new church." Completed in 1872, the church sanctuary today remains virtually as it was then built.

Many gifts through the years have been added to the historic interest and atmosphere of this edifice. General Wade Hampton, III presented the chancel chairs; the memorial tablet to Bishop William Capers was given by William A. Courtenay, a former mayor of Charleston. Through the efforts and devotion of David A. Pressley, organist and choirmaster for sixty years, the present organ was designed and installed. The echo organ in the tower was given by the Childs family in memory of Mrs. Bessie Springs Childs. Unusual memorial windows of stained glass depicting the life of Christ add beauty through glowing colors.

Educational units were added in 1901 and in 1928. In 1960 a further expansion included a fellowship hall and Christ Chapel. This chapel is one of the most beautiful in America.

COLUMBIA COLLEGE, Columbia, S. C., is a liberal arts college for women, with men accepted as day students. It was established in 1853, by the SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church, South, and was chartered as Columbia Female College in 1854. It has continued under the jurisdiction of that conference since 1853. The name was changed to Columbia College in 1890.

The college formally opened in October, 1859, with an enrollment of 126 students and a faculty of 10 women and 6 men. The first class of 13 was graduated in 1863. In 1865, when General William T. Sherman seized Columbia, the college closed, leaving only one instructor in charge. There is a tradition that he had taught a member of Sherman's family, and that he wrote a note to the general requesting that the college be spared. At any rate, the college was saved even though the city itself lay in ashes. The college reopened in 1873.

The South Carolina Conference placed Columbia and WOFFORD COLLEGES under one administration in 1948. This, however, did not prove satisfactory to either institution, and since 1951 Columbia has operated under its own charter with its own administration. Disastrous fires in 1895, 1909, and 1964 resulted in a quickening of the loyalty of the friends of the college and the erecting of a modern educational plant. It grants the B.A. degree. The governing board has twenty-one members appointed by the Board of Education of the South Carolina Conference.

COLUMBUS, GEORGIA, U.S.A., with a population of 140,000, is a textile, industrial, and farmer's trading center. Located on the Chattahoochee River, Columbus became the South's first city to become an industrial center. It has a lithokrome printing plant that is well known throughout the nation, and the first ice factory in the world was in Columbus.

Established in 1827, Columbus is the county seat of Muscogee County and is a very old Indian and river settlement. Columbus College, a fully accredited unit of the Georgia University System, opened her doors in the late 1950's. Methodist churches in the city provide guidance for the Methodist students there. Fort Benning, nine miles south of Columbus, is the world's largest infantry training school. There are twenty chapels on the Post.

Methodism is alive to her responsibilities in Columbus. In 1876 when the population of Columbus was 6,152, there were three Methodist churches there—St. Luke, St. Paul, and the Broad Street Mission. In them were 905 members and the property values were $30,000. There were also two A.M.E. churches with a membership of 275.

Today there are twenty-four Methodist churches in Muscogee County with a membership of 12,181 and property valued at $5,836,206. St. Luke, the downtown church, has 2,451 members and property valued at $2,733,273. St. Paul, now in the country club section of the city, has 1,090 members and property valued at $1,165,000. Two A.M.E. and two C.M.E. churches in the city have a total membership of 2,071. More than fifteen natives of Columbus are now active in the ministry.

CUY K. HUTCHERSON

St. Luke Church is the oldest congregation in Columbus. Founded in 1828, it occupied a parcel of land in the original plan of the city and was deeded by the Georgia State Legislature to the church for the purpose of worship. It has occupied the site continuously until the present.

In January 1829, the SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE, then embracing all of Georgia, assigned Andrew Hammill as pastor of St. Luke Church, superintendent of the district, and missionary to the Indians. There were fifty-four white and seven colored members housed in a log meetinghouse. In 1833 a frame building was erected to serve as a church and a day school.

The first brick Methodist church to be built in Georgia was erected by the congregation in 1836. This gave way to a fourth structure, considered one of the finest in the South, in 1847. The fifth church building, opened in 1900, was destroyed by fire May 10, 1942. The present building was dedicated on May 10, 1948. Further major additions were dedicated May 9, 1965.

The third session of the GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M.E. Church, South convened at St. Luke in May 1854. At this conference the MISSIONARY SOCIETY of the denomination was established, a Sunday School Society was organized and chartered, the publishing house was established in Nashville, and a Tract Society was formed.

On April 26, 1866, the plan for the first Confederate Memorial Day was suggested and developed by Mrs. Lizzie Rutherford Ellis, a member of the church.

Three bishops of the church have served as pastors or assistants of the church prior to their election: GEORGE FOSTER PIERCE, pastor, 1848; JOSEPH S. KEY, 1872-75; ATTICUS G. HAYGOOD, 1860.

Five men who served as pastors of St. Luke were elected college presidents: IGNATIUS FEW, George Foster Pierce, O. L. Smith, and C. E. Dowman were all president of EMORY College, and C. R. Jenkins was president of WESLEYAN COLLEGE.

The church today has approximately 2,500 members and has been instrumental in establishing fifteen new congregations in the city. It is now engaged in building, single-handedly, a strong mission school in the Congo.

COLUMBUS, INDIANA, U.S.A. First Church, now an "inner-city" church, was established in 1839 when zealous Methodists built the first strictly denominational church in the town. Methodism had begun in Columbus around 1821, when early Methodist settlers met for worship in the log homes of members, and listened to the sermons of George K. Hester, the first minister appointed to the Flatrock Circuit, which at that time covered five counties.

The building of the Madison and Indiana Railroad through its property caused the first church building to be moved in 1844, but by 1854 this building was outgrown and a new, two-story brick building, seating 500 people, was erected at a new location. At this time the church numbered about 150 members.

Under the ministry of Virgil W. Tevis, which began in 1885, the church grew rapidly, and by 1887 another building was erected at the corner of Eighth and Lafayette Streets.

In 1928 an adjacent house was purchased to provide much needed church school rooms, and in 1950 this was razed and a new educational unit was built. Murphy Chapel, seating 100 persons and completely equipped by the Women's Society of Christian Service, was presented to the church in 1953. The last remodeling took place in 1963-64.

The church became truly a "Shelter in the Time of Storm," when in 1937 the Ohio River flood brought over 100 refugees from Jeffersonville, who were provided with beds and meals for several days.

Earl Marlatt, author of many hymns including the popular "Are Ye Able?" is the son of A. N. Marlatt who was pastor of First Church in 1893.

Eighty-five years of missionary activity in the church have culminated this year in the sending of five full-time missionaries to the countries of Africa, Argentina, India and Sarawak, and to Hawaii.

With the growth of Columbus, two other Methodist churches have been built; but First Church, now a landmark very close to the business area, maintains its honored place in the community. The 1970 membership was 2,099, with property valued at $1,256,740, and the amount raised for all purposes was $88,669.

COLUMBUS, MISSISSIPPI, U.S.A. The first section of north MISSISSIPPI to come under the Methodist appointive system was the Columbus area. In 1820 a young itinerant, EBENEZER HEARN, was appointed by the TENNESSEE CONFERENCE to penetrate the country and form societies where possible. His circuit covered a vast territory in ALABAMA and extended into what is now northern Mississippi. At that time Columbus was a small trading post on the Tombigbee River. Hearn had a preaching place in Columbus as early as 1820, but a congregation was not organized there until 1823. For many years the Columbus Methodists met on the edge of the village in a small frame school building which was shared by several denominations for religious services. From 1821 to 1832 the Columbus appointment was in the newly organized MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE, but when the ALABAMA CONFERENCE was formed in 1832, Columbus became a station appointment in that conference where it remained until 1870, when the NORTH MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE was formed.

The First Church congregation erected their first building in 1831, and ten years later they built their second structure. The third, and present, building is one of the most historic Methodist structures in north Mississippi. Construction was begun in 1860, but the hopes of an early completion were darkened by the outbreak of the Civil War. During the war the basement of the unfinished building was used as a military hospital. Part of the tin roof was removed to make canteens for Confederate soldiers. The building was also used as an arsenal for manufacturing cartridges and percussion caps. The church was finally completed and dedicated in 1877 by ATTICUS G. HAYGOOD.

The most gigantic undertaking of the church since that time was a complete renovation job in 1954-55 which cost approximately four times the initial amount. The church has been well preserved and is an attraction for those who travel to Columbus to see the many historic points of interest there. The congregation of First Church continues to worship in this building, and in 1960 they held their centennial celebration for the present structure. The 1970 membership was 1,169.

COLUMBUS, OHIO, U.S.A., capital of the state and seat of Franklin County, is a citadel of Methodism which dates from 1813, the year after the "high banks of the Scioto River" were chosen as the site of Ohio's new capital.

Columbus is the headquarters of the Ohio West Area of The United Methodist Church, an area with 350,000 members in 1,127 local churches in the western sixty percent of Ohio. In the Columbus District itself live 50,107 Methodists, members of seventy-three local churches in 1970.

Methodists were second (to Presbyterians) to establish themselves in the new wilderness capital. Actually, they built the first Methodist church in 1814, two years before Columbus was officially built and occupied as the capital. That first church, a log structure, was built on Town Street near High, on a lot donated by the infant village.

In 1813 Samuel West, a circuit rider, formed a congregation around Mr. and Mrs. George McCormick, George B. Harvey, and Miss Jane Armstrong. Among early members was Moses Freeman, a Negro.

First Church, added to in 1818, eventually became the Columbus Public School Library and its direct descendant, First Church at Bryden Road and 18th Street on the city's near east side, built in 1891, ministers to a changing parish.

Among the earliest Methodist preachers in Columbus were Jacob Hooper, William Swayze, Simon Peters, Lemuel Lane, and LEROY SWORMSTEDT. THOMAS A. MORRIS, appointed in 1830 to the Columbus Charge, later was editor of the Western Christian Advocate and still later became a bishop. GRANVILLE MOODY, the "Fighting Parson" of those early years, was a noted Methodist clergyman.

In his 1930 edition of the History of Franklin County, Opha Moore wrote: "Leading all other denominations in numerical strength as it does, the Methodist Church ranks first in the number of houses of worship, now almost fifty." In 1970 it was still the leading denomination in the city.

William A. Taylor recounts: "Broad and Fourth Sts. was the site of Wesley Chapel, donated in 1846 by William Neil, a noted public figure. Bigelow Church was erected on Friend St. in 1854. The German Methodists in 1844 erected a church at Third St. and South Public Lane." This German congregation continues today in a new structure one block west of the original site under the name, Livingston Methodist Church, consecrated in November 1966.

Taylor also noted: "In 1823 the colored Methodists separated from the Whites and formed a society themselves. From 1823 to 1839 they held services in rented rooms . . . then erected a church on Long St. in 1857. The Rev. J. H. Shorter was pastor and members reported that year totaled 113. Whitfield Methodists (Welsh) organized in 1848 and erected a brick church that year at Long and Sixth Sts."

The METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH played a prominent role in Columbus' religious life, particularly after the turn of the century, and CHARLES H. BECK of the Muskingum Conference was largely instrumental in establishing several M.P. churches in Columbus in the early 1900's.

The earliest presiding elder in Columbus Methodist history was JAMES QUINN, 1814-16. Others included David Young, 1817; John Collins, 1818-20; Samuel West, 1821; Greenburg Jones, 1822-23; JACOB YOUNG, 1824-26; and Russell Bigelow, 1827. West, Isaac Pavey, Jacob Hooper and William Swayze were among circuit riders in and around Columbus in the first two decades of the nineteenth century.

In 1970 greater Columbus was the home of a number of widely-known institutions of The United Methodist Church: Riverside Methodist Hospital; Wesley Glen, Methodist Retirement Center of Central Ohio; Methodist Theological School in Ohio, fourteen miles north of the city; the Methodist Children's Home in suburban Worthington; McKelvey Hall, residence hall for young women near downtown Columbus; Ohio State University Wesley Foundation; Southside Settlement; and Goodwill Industries, one of the nation's largest. Ohio Wesleyan University, founded in 1842 under the auspices of the M. E. Church, is located in nearby Delaware, Ohio.

Glenwood Church moved into a new church home in March 1962. This building is located on a ten-acre site, set well back from the corner of Hague Avenue and Valleyview Drive, on rising ground. The seating capacity is approximately 700. The Shellhaas Memorial Chapel seats 120 and is a wing on the north side of the church. A bell tower rises to a height of fifty-seven feet and is topped by a steel cross thirty-three feet high. This cross when illuminated at night is visible for many miles. On the southeast corner of the site are about three acres cut off by a brook bordered by trees and shrubs. On this has been located the parsonage.

Glenwood Church celebrated in 1968 its seventy-fifth anniversary of service to the Columbus people. In 1970 it reported 1,943 members, property valued at $709,280, and the total raised for all purposes, $103,228.

North Broadway Church is the largest church in the Ohio Annual Conference. First organized in 1905, the present sanctuary was erected in 1924 and expanded educational facilities were completed in 1951. The modern Gothic building, on the corner of North Broadway and Broadway Place, is in the heart of a large residential area in the northern sector of the city. Ohio State University is nearby.

The church is widely known for its special ministry to the inner city, to college students through a Wesley Foundation program entirely supported by the local church, and for its many "church-in-the-home" groups which provide opportunities for prayer and study for adult members. A vigorous missionary outreach includes substantial support of programs at home and abroad. Sunday morning services, broadcast each week, are heard by listeners in Ohio and nearby states.

Two bishops formerly served as pastors of North Broadway: F. GERALD ENSLEY (1944-52) and LANCE WEBB (1953-64). A staff of five ministers and a minister of music served a congregation of 3,758 members in 1970.

Trinity Church was the first church built in what is known as the "Tri-Villages," a suburban area of Ohio's capital city.

With a membership of 2,020 in 1970, it is one of the Ohio Conference's largest. Its congregation includes many members of the Ohio State University faculty. A large part of the congregation lives in the communities of Upper Arlington, Marble Cliff, and Grandview.

Trinity Church was organized in 1898 as a Sunday school. Its first sanctuary was erected in 1904. The present church was planned in 1938 and was built in 1950 under the supervision of JOHN W. DICKHAUT, who has since become President of the METHODIST THEOLOGICAL SCHOOL IN OHIO. The sanctuary is simple and beautiful with white woodwork, walnut pews, and arched windows of pastel squares of cathedral glass. A fellowship hall, parlor, classrooms, youth lounge and recreation room were added in 1956.

As a continuing project, Trinity provides support for a missionary family in India.

COMFORT, GEORGE FISK (1833-1910), American scholar and educator, born in Berkshire, Tompkins Co., N. Y., on Sept. 20, 1833. He graduated from WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY in 1857, and devoted himself to the study of archaeology and the history of the fine arts in Europe, in 1860-65, after which he became professor of Modern Languages and Aesthetics at ALLEGHENY COLLEGE at Meadville, Pa. For a time he was a lecturer on Christian art and archaeology in the newly founded DREW THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY in Madison, N. J.; but in 1872, he became Professor of Modern Languages and Aesthetics in SYRACUSE UNIVERSITY, where he became Dean of the College of Fine Arts from 1873 to 1893. From 1872 to 1893 he was editor of the Art Department of the Christian Advocate (New York) and contributed extensively to periodicals. He obtained a reputation beyond his own Church and was one of the chief organizers of the American Philological Association, becoming its secretary from 1869 to 1874. He published Art Museums in America, 1869; Modern Languages in Education, 1886; Woman's Education Woman's Health, 1894, and a series of German textbooks. He died in Syracuse in 1910.

COMFORT, SILAS (1808-1868), American preacher who figured in the slavery conflict, was born in Deer Park, Dutchess Co., N. Y., May 18, 1808, and died in Union, Broome Co., N. Y., Jan. 10, 1868. He was received into the GENESEE CONFERENCE in 1827 and after serving churches in the ONEIDA CONFERENCE transferred in 1835 to the MISSOURI CONFERENCE, where he became embroiled in a controversy which brought his name before GENERAL CONFERENCE in an appeal from an adverse judgment of the Missouri Conference. While serving as minister of Fourth Street Church, ST. LOUIS, he admitted as evidence in a church trial the testimony of a Negro, a practice forbidden in public trials in Missouri. For this he was censured by his Conference, and he appealed. The General Conference of 1840 reversed the censure; but, bowing to the strong force of Southern opinion, it also adopted a resolution by IGNATIUS A. FEW of GEORGIA opposing admission of black testimony in church trials in states which forbade it. This resolution was rescinded in 1844.

Comfort served for many years as PRESIDING ELDER, and having transferred back from Missouri in 1842, was delegate to General Conference from the Oneida Conference in 1844, 1848, and 1852. Self-educated, he wrote many articles and books, one of which was An Exposition of the Articles of Religion of the Methodist Episcopal Church (New York, 1847).

COMINES METHODIST CHURCH (French) was organized in 1923 as a result of a Bible colportage. It has become head of a French circuit in West Flanders. There was a Protestant day school from 1945 to 1955. The transformed cinema hall, serving as a sanctuary, was destroyed during a 1943 air raid, and a new chapel and parsonage were erected in 1947. Pastors have been J. Schyns, 1923-27; M. Geva, 1929-36; L. Berchier, 1936-53; and M. Geva, 1954-66; R. Brancart, since 1966.

COMMENTARIES, METHODIST. Methodist commentaries begin with the founder of Methodism. In 1755, JOHN WESLEY published his Explanatory Notes on the New Testament. This first Methodist commentary was a quarto volume of 762 pages, and was prepared for the use of both clergy and laity. Wesley's chief source was Bengelius' Gnomon, which had appeared in 1742, but which was not translated into English until 1860. In dealing with the text, Bengelius took the side of the Arminians, so Wesley was attracted to him. Wesley published a second edition in 1757, and in 1759 John and CHARLES WESLEY collaborated and enlarged the Notes for a third edition which appeared in 1760. In 1791, the first American edition was printed at Philadelphia. In 1846, GEORGE PECK served as editor for another edition on behalf of the M. E. Church in America.

In 1765, Wesley published his Explanatory Notes upon the Old Testament which consisted of three quarto volumes of 2,622 pages. Wesley relied heavily upon Matthew Henry and M. Poole, but he also used other sources and added much of his own material. From the point of view of biblical scholarship, these commentaries are still valuable. They also show the beliefs and doctrines which came to characterize the Methodist movement. The commentaries clearly indicated that the leader of the people called Methodists was a capable scholar. They are part of the transition from Methodist societies within the fold of the Anglican Establishment to the Methodist Church as a separate denomination.

In 1792, the Conference meeting at London requested THOMAS COKE to prepare a commentary of about three quarto volumes. He was asked to avoid both the elaborate expositions like those of Gill and Henry, and the condensed form of Wesley's Notes. Coke began at once, but he did not complete the work until 1806. The commentary became his magnum opus. Coke was more compiler than composer, and the commentary was largely based on the expositions of Dr. Dodd, who himself had gathered them primarily from the writings of Calmet, Houbigant, Waterland, Cudworth, and various Continentals. Coke, however, added a collection of expository notes which had been given to him in Holland by his friend Dr. Maclaine. These notes had previously been compiled by a Dutch theologian who was Maclaine's father-in-law. Coke took this material and abridged it and also added notes of his own. The Conference approved the commentary and commended it to the preachers.

From 1810 to 1826, ADAM CLARKE published his commentary consisting of eight volumes. He began to collect his materials as early as 1798, but the first volume was not published until 1810. For many years the commentary was an acknowledged standard both in Europe and in America. The historical notes are an outstanding feature of this commentary.

From 1811 to 1818, JOSEPH BENSON, another Englishman, published his commentary, which was issued in five volumes. It was less scholarly than Clarke's but proved more popular. English Wesleys regarded it as a superior work, especially in its theology. Benson also admired Poole, and his commentary is largely based on Poole. Indeed, the Methodists agreed with the Anglican Evangelicals on many points, and Methodists often borrowed freely from their works. In America, the M. E. Church esteemed Benson's commentary so highly that it was published under the church's auspices between 1839 and 1841. It was one of the last major publications undertaken before the disruption of that Church in 1844.

The first commentary to be written by an American citizen was that of WILLIAM NAST. Called the Apostle of German Methodism, Nast came to America in 1828 a Lutheran, was converted to Methodism, and was admitted on trial to the OHIO CONFERENCE in 1835. As early as 1848 the M. E. Church authorized a commentary for the benefit of German-speaking Methodists, and in 1859 Nast was given an assistant to speed up the work. Nast's commentary differed from earlier commentaries, for it was much more than a compilation of other works. He also introduced foreign scholars whose work had not previously been published in America. His was the first commentary to include the insights of German theologians. He relied on Rudolf Stier, F. A. Tholuk, and Johann A. Bengel. Nast was also familiar with earlier English commentators such as Wesley, Adam Clarke, Benson, Sutcliffe, Henry, Watson, and others.

The first German edition was issued simultaneously in Cincinnati, Ohio, and in Bremen, Germany, in 1860, and was entitled Kritisch-praktischer Commentar über das Neue Testament für die Bedürfnisse unserer Zeit. The commentary is a literary monument to an indefatigable scholar trained in the best German tradition. It contained Greek and Latin terms as well as quotations from the Church Fathers and from such moderns as Mill, Hume, and Schaff. Nast never finished the whole task. In 1880 he was working on the Gospel of John; and as late as 1894, when he was in retirement, he was working on the Epistles of Paul. Nast firmly believed that the results of higher criticism were disastrous to the faith. He suggested, however, that the theory of verbal inspiration was not essential to the belief that the Gospel records were a divine revelation; and for this, many people branded him a liberal.

In the last half of the nineteenth century, Methodists produced several commentaries. These were published partly in response to the conflict of science and religion, as well as to meet the challenge to the faith which was made by higher criticism. Some of the more prominent commentaries produced in this period were Strong's Harmony and Exposition of the Gospels, Watson's Exposition of the Gospels of Matthew and Mark, Hibbard on the Psalms, and Lonking's Notes on the New Testament. Until near the end of the nineteenth century, no American commentary on the entire Scripture had been published by a Methodist. This was finally accomplished by D. D. WHEDON of the M. E. Church. His commentary was designed to be both scholarly and popular.

After Whedon, no distinctively Methodist commentary appeared. Since the days of Wesley, Methodists have maintained that they are in the mainstream of Protestant theology. By the twentieth century, Methodism had solidified its position as one of the largest Christian denominations in the world. It had produced well-known preachers, teachers, and scholars, and had long been contributing to Christian theology and biblical scholarship. After the turn of the twentieth century and the growth of the ecumenical spirit, there was less emphasis on a denominational approach to theology, and more emphasis on the entire corpus of Christian theology and tradition. More attention was given to the viewpoints of scholars from other denominations. Commentaries appeared which were the results of the united efforts of scholars of different communions. One of the most significant of these was the Abingdon Bible Commentary which was published in 1929. The editors were Methodists—FREDERICK C. EISELEN, EDWIN LEWIS, and DAVID G. DOWNEY, Book Editor of the M. E. Church. The contributors, however, were of different denominations and came from such countries as Scotland, India, the U.S.A., England, Canada, Australia, and Wales.

In 1952 the Interpreter's Bible was published by Abingdon Press. It was a more extensive undertaking than the Abingdon Bible Commentary and consisted of twelve volumes. The editorial board was composed of NOLAN B. HARMON, George A. Buttrick, Walter R. Bowie, Paul Scherer, Samuel Terrien, and John Knox. It was presented as the embodiment of a comprehensive Christian biblical scholarship. It immediately became popular. This commentary had the advantage of presenting a diversity of opinion. Indeed, there were 125 contributors from all over the world and from various denominations. The Interpreter's Bible is one of the most popular commentaries ever published and was hailed as one of the first major publications with an ecumenical spirit. It became a standard for every pastor's study and every library.

COMMISSION ON CHAPLAINS. (See CHAPLAIN.)

COMMISSION ON CHURCH UNION. The Commission on Church Union of The EVANGELICAL UNITED BRETHREN CHURCH was one of the regularly constituted agencies of the church from its beginning in 1946. There were incipient agencies of this commission in The Church of the United Brethren in Christ and The Evangelical Church prior to 1946. From 1946 to 1962 the commission was known as the Commission on Church Federation and Union and was seeking to fulfill its objectives, namely, "to constantly maintain and deepen the sense of fellowship among all Christian believers, and work more effectually toward a fuller realization of the unity of the Body of Christ."

The commission held conversations to explore possibilities of union with representatives of several other Protestant churches, including The Church of the Brethren and The United Presbyterian Church, before turning in 1958 toward singular and serious conversations with The Methodist Church. The E.U.B. General Conference of 1962 adopted a constitution for the commission and provided for the new name, Commission on Church Union.

In 1964, as the work of the commission was intensified preparatory to union with The Methodist Church, an executive secretary was employed for the first time in the person of PAUL A. WASHBURN of the ILLINOIS CONFERENCE. The purposes and resources of the commission were merged with those of the Commission on Ecumenical Affairs of The United Methodist Church in April of 1968.

COMMITTEE OF PRIVILEGES, THE. During JOHN WESLEY's lifetime British Methodists were frequently under the threat of legal persecution, especially because of their ambiguous position as declared members of the Church of England, who were therefore technically not in a position to avail themselves of the privileges accorded to Protestant Dissenters under the TOLERATION ACT. After Wesley's death THOMAS COKE became the chief spokesman for Methodist religious liberties. Thus in the 1790's he successfully pleaded with influential members of the Government to secure Methodists in the CHANNEL ISLANDS from severe persecution when their sabbatarian principles would not allow them to perform military exercises on Sundays—though on other days they were quite prepared to go the second mile.

It seems to have been largely through Coke's initiative that the Committee of Privileges was formed at the Wesleyan Conference of 1803 in order "to guard our religious privileges in these critical times." An Act of Enrolment was being prepared to secure compulsory militia service to meet the threat of an invasion by Napoleon. Ministers settled in charge of congregations were specifically exempted, but not those who like Methodism's itinerant preachers travelled in a CIRCUIT. A deputation from the London Circuit waited on the Secretary of War, and upon their representations a clause was added exempting Methodist travelling preachers, though not LOCAL PREACHERS. This averted threat was reinforced by stories of a House of Commons gleeful at apparently having bested the Methodists, and by a rising chorus of literary attacks upon Methodism, even in otherwise reputable publications, while William Cobbett's Weekly Political Register warned of the danger "of making all the people of England bend to the humour of a perverse, insolent, and factious sect." Accordingly the 1803 Conference elected a committee of ten to watch over Methodist interests in national affairs—all laymen with the exception of Coke, JOSEPH BENSON, and the LONDON SUPERINTENDENT MINISTER. Their energetic solicitor was Thomas Allan of London. The Conference agreed that no Methodist lawsuit should be undertaken, whether at national or local level, except with the Committee's approval. The Committee successfully opposed the act of the Jamaica legislature of 1807 in forbidding Methodists to instruct slaves, even members of their own society, and this success helped to secure religious liberty in the colonies.

Perhaps the biggest test—certainly the best known—came in 1811, when the Home Secretary, Lord Sidmouth, introduced legislation apparently intended to stamp out Methodism by Act of Parliament. Its major provision made it impossible for anyone to secure a preacher's license under the Toleration Act without certification from "six reputable householders of the same persuasion." In the case of large city congregations this would not have been difficult, but it might well have destroyed rural Methodism and the itinerant ministry where (as was usually the case) the rank and file of the members were humble people who might not have been regarded by an unfriendly Anglican magistrate as "reputable householders." A deputation from the Committee, headed by THOMAS THOMPSON, M.P., was unable to persuade Sidmouth to withdraw his Bill, though he did agree to leave the decision to the House of Lords. Thereupon copies of the Committee's resolutions were circulated to members of that House, as well as to many sympathetic friends and to every circuit, canvassing petitions opposing the measure. So important was the issue that the Protestant Dissenting Deputies joined forces with the Wesleyan Committee of Privileges—the first Methodist-Free Church cooperation on the national level. Even the Archbishop of Canterbury joined the forces assembled against Sidmouth, who finally let the matter drop.

Nevertheless some Methodist preachers were still unable to secure freedom of worship and of speech under the Toleration Act, several being refused licenses in 1812. Methodists and Dissenters together determined to turn defence into attack, by seeking the total repeal of the Conventicle and similar Acts from which the Toleration Act had merely secured some partial relief. The Committee of Privileges drafted a Bill which the Prime Minister, Spencer Perceval, agreed to support, nor did his assassination prevent its passage two months later. This Act (52 Geo. III, c. 155) made registration of meeting-places for small religious gatherings unnecessary, though they were nevertheless secured legal protection. Laymen might occasionally conduct religious worship without fear, and only those full-time preachers who wished to claim exemption from civil and military service need secure licenses, which must be granted by the local magistrate upon their taking the necessary oaths. This was a major victory for Protestant freedom.

The Committee of Privileges discussed the rising momentum of the demands that similar liberties should be accorded to Roman Catholics, and it is to their credit that they resolved at least not to organize any official opposition to the Catholic Emancipation Bill in 1829—largely because JABEZ BUNTING was in favour of it. Fifteen years later, however, the Committee, including Bunting, unsuccessfully opposed the Maynooth Endowment Bill, by which this government-founded Irish seminary for Roman Catholics was to receive a greatly increased endowment. Similarly they protested fruitlessly against the "Papal Aggression" of 1850, whereby a Roman Catholic hierarchy was set up in England.

During the middle years of the century the national question which most exercised the Committee of Privileges, however, was that of EDUCATION. The Factory Bill of 1843 included a scheme for releasing child workers for education in state schools under the auspices of the Church of England. However worthy the aim, the Dissenters resisted this assumption of the church's monopoly of education, and to this end the Committee of Privileges joined forces with the Wesleyan Education Committee to oppose it, especially in view of the strong Tractarian movement within the Church, which thus seemed tainted with Roman Catholic teaching. The joint committees continued successfully to press the government for the support of religious rather than secular education, but pleaded for a share of its oversight. From this agitation dates not only an enormous increase in the erection of Methodist schools in England, but the recognition that the Dissenters in general, and the Wesleyan Methodists in particular, constituted a force to be reckoned with on the national political scene, a denomination only less powerful than the Church of England.

In order to grapple with its increasing problems the Committee of Privileges had been progressively enlarged during the century, though it remained predominantly a group of influential laymen, strengthened by the growing body of ministers holding important connexional offices. It became so large that from 1843 onwards an executive subcommittee acted on its behalf in emergency, and in effect spoke for the committee, just as the committee itself spoke for the Conference. Many of its actions during the first half of the nineteenth century were not only important in themselves but created significant precedents for securing the national status both of Wesleyan Methodism and of the other British Methodist denominations. With these privileges securely achieved, more attention was given to the internal stabilization of Methodism and its various departments. At Methodist UNION in 1932 these varied functions were in effect taken over by the General Purposes Committee.

COMMUNION, THE HOLY. The Wesleyan Emphasis on Holy Communion. JOHN WESLEY urged Methodists to attend Holy Communion "constantly," and he himself often attended several times a week. This was in the midst of field preaching, street preaching, preaching services in chapels, homes and meeting houses, and at the time that Wesley was participating in various prayer meetings and carrying on a vigorous schedule of personal devotions. A full appreciation for this sacrament is quite at one with the importance of scripture and preaching in Christian worship, and is due to be recovered by Methodists in something of the same spirit as that of our founders.

Holy Communion is Normative Christian Worship. The full service of Holy Communion is the normative service of worship of the Church. Scripture lesson, sermon, creed are included in the full service of Holy Communion, as well as prayers of confession, intercession, consecration, thanksgiving and dedication, and the acts of breaking the bread and blessing the wine and the receiving of the elements. Other aspects are assurance of forgiveness and hymns.

This service is normative in that it is the most complete in content and meaning of all the services of Christian worship, and in that all other services are relative to it. The meaning of the non-repeated Sacrament of Baptism is caught up in the repeated Sacrament of Holy Communion as union with Christ and with one another. The "morning orders" (services essentially of Scripture, prayers, hymns and sermon), vespers, weddings, funerals, family prayers and personal devotions all have reference to a relationship with God through Jesus Christ which is most fully expressed in the service of Holy Communion.

A Short History of the Communion Service. The Methodist service of Holy Communion has its rootage in the 1549 Book of Common Prayer of the Church of England. That first service of English Protestantism was revised in 1552, determinatively for later use in 1559, as part of the Elizabethan Settlement, and again in 1661. (This book, because published as an annex to the Act of Uniformity, 1662, is known as the 1662 Prayer Book, and has been used in England since.) John Wesley edited the 1662 Book of Common Prayer in 1784 and entitled it The Sunday Service for Methodists in North America. The Service of Holy Communion was in this very modestly edited by Mr. Wesley. In turn, the service underwent minor revisions in the Methodist Episcopal Church and the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, until 1932, at which time the Methodist Episcopal Church effected a major revision in structure of the office and a substantial revision in content. At the time of church union, the services of both the Methodist Episcopal Church and the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, were accepted, and both were printed in the edition of The Hymnal in 1939, and in the Book of Worship of 1944. The 1964 revision, done by the Commission on Worship of The Methodist Church, finally brought about a unified service for the whole American Methodist Church.

Moving back from 1549 toward the early Church, we observe that Archbishop Cranmer, who was the chief drafter of the first Prayer Book, used as his principal basis the pre-Reformation Use of Sarum, or the service of the Diocese of Salisbury. Cranmer also drew upon Lutheran, Greek Orthodox, and other Catholic sources which traced their origins back to various earlier services. The Salisbury service itself had been perfected by Bishop Richard le Poer in the 13th century. In turn, it was a variant of the Roman Mass, which was substantially formed by 402 A.D., and perfected by the end of the 6th century. Prior to that time, many "uses" were found in the Church, back to New Testament times. All of them included thanksgiving for redemption in Christ, reference to the institution of the Sacrament by our Lord, a statement of remembrance of Jesus Christ and his saving work, an offering of the hearts and lives of the people, a prayer for the benefits of the Communion, the breaking of the bread and blessing of the wine, and the distributing of the elements.

The major biblical references to the Holy Communion are Matthew 26, Mark 14, Luke 22, and I Corinthians 11. Other passages are important, especially with reference to the relationship of the Resurrection to Holy Communion, such as Luke 24; Acts 2:42-47; Acts 10:41; John 6:21; and Revelation 3:20.

It is likely that from the very day of the Resurrection, a week has not passed that Christians have not come together somewhere to celebrate this central Service of the Church.

The Major Names and Emphases of the Service. The service has been known by several names. The major ones are the Lord's Supper, the Eucharist, the Holy Communion, the Mass, the Liturgy. The full meaning of this Sacrament is implicit in each, though a certain degree of total emphasis is found in one or another.

The Lord's Supper tends to be a simple service with primary emphasis upon the institution by the Lord, the atonement through crucifixion, and mindfulness of the Last Supper itself.

The Eucharist (which stems from the Greek word for thanksgiving) normally is quite complete in content and is marked by awareness of God's victory through resurrection and coming again, and has the tone of joyful thanksgiving. Charles Wesley almost always referred to the sacrament as the Eucharist, and John Wesley frequently did so. It is a term that is in keeping with the spirit of Methodism (for that matter, with that of the Christian faith), and surely should be reappropriated by Methodists.

The Holy Communion also is a name marked by wholeness of content, and carries the emphasis of the union of Christians with their Lord and with one another.

The Mass is inclusive in content, though often weighted toward emphasis on the atonement, and the idea of the Eucharist as the Church's continuing sacrifice. It accentuates the true meaning of Christian sacrifice which is purposeful self-giving that effects meaning and unity. It is God's giving of himself through his Son which elicits our giving of ourselves to God through our Savior. This emphasis is the rededication of self that is so familiar to Methodists.

The Liturgy is a name for this service that is more common in the Eastern Church. It, too, is marked by wholeness of content and by joyful thanksgiving in spirit. "Liturgy" is the true work of Christians that is due to God, and the most central work of all is this normative service of Christian worship.

Role of Holy Communion in the Church. Whatever else the Church has been and is, its essential faith and character are revealed in the content and spirit of its principal service of worship. This service is at once a vital doctrinal reference for the Church of Jesus Christ, and the spring-source of the continuity of the Christian faith as expressed in the lives of all Christians.

British Services and Customs. The WESLEYAN METHODIST CHURCH, the largest and most ecclesiastical of the British Methodist denominations, continued to use the 1662 Prayer-Book Communion Office, in this matter standing apart from British Nonconformity proper. In general, only ordained Ministers were allowed to conduct the service, though "dispensations" were granted by Conference to Probationer Ministers where necessary. Among the "free" or more "left-wing" Methodist denominations feeling was often strong against the use of a printed liturgical form. Some of these denominations had officially sanctioned service books, but they were often unused or freely varied from, and extemporaneous Communion services were not uncommon. In some places, furthermore, senior and respected lay preachers were allowed to conduct the Communion service, particularly among the Primitive Methodists. At Methodist Union in 1932, these customs were approximated to one another to some extent. In 1936, Conference authorized a new Book of Offices, which contains a Communion Office following the Anglican 1662 liturgy, and also a shorter and simpler alternative order of service. The new Church constitution contained provision that in "amalgamated" Circuits Conference might give permission for suitable (lay) LOCAL PREACHERS to administer the Holy Communion, but this is now not done to any great extent, and the custom is gradually dying out. The long-established custom was for the Holy Communion to follow the preaching service, more usually in the evening, and for the antecommunion to be omitted. The influence of stronger liturgical sentiment in the modern period has chiefly been manifested in the use of the full liturgy, often with hymns and a short sermon, sometimes at 8 A.M. on Sunday, particularly at the Festivals, and more recently, at the regular hour of Sunday morning worship. The growing custom, furthermore (largely in default of the old discipline of public "conversion" followed by reception into the Class Meeting), of holding a training class for young prospective church members, followed by the use of a Service for the Reception of New Members, culminating in the first communion of the members, has served to make the status of communicant more unambiguously the mark of full church membership in modern British Methodism. A new liturgy has also recently been prepared. (See also EUCHARISTIC DOCTRINE AND DEVOTION.)

The Rite in American Methodism. Methodists the world over follow what is sometimes called the English Rite, and in American Methodism especially the form of the administration of this Sacrament has historically more closely copied and approximated the Prayer Book of the Church of England than does the like office in the Protestant Episcopal Church in America. Indeed, John Wesley when he prepared the SUNDAY SERVICE for the American Methodists, made very few changes in "The Order for the Administration of the Lord's Supper or Holy Communion," as the Prayer Book entitled it. Wesley kept that title exactly, except omitting the "or Holy Communion" phrase at the end. He did shorten the service somewhat in the interest of brevity, leaving out certain long Prayer Book exhortations, but he made no change whatever in the Prayer of Humble Access, or the Prayer of Consecration, or the Words of Delivery, which are all at the heart of the entire service.

It is not possible here to analyze and outline this rite as it is at present in Methodist Rituals and service books over the Methodist world. It does follow, however, even in those churches where late revisions have been made, the manner or "use" in which the English Church from the days of Cranmer on have celebrated the Sacrament. In general, as indicated in a previous section, this usage calls for an Order of Worship to be built about the actual administration of the Sacrament, with prayers, readings, and the like, leading up to the dramatic period of actual communication when the ministers serve the consecrated elements to the kneeling communicants.

The English Rite calls for the people to come forward and kneel about an "altar rail," as the chancel rail is often called, though usually in large Methodist churches and assemblies, occasionally in the interest of time, the Sacrament is served to the people as they remain in reverence in their pews. The actual coming forward of the communicants, however, makes them forthright participators in the observance of this Sacrament in an open, public way, and as Bishop COLLINS DENNY once expressed it, they thus "show forth the Lord's death until He shall come again."

The Prayer of Consecration by which the bread and wine are consecrated, has ever been the battleground between opposing theological viewpoints. On the one hand, some see this prayer as setting apart and hallowing in a distinct way the actual bread and wine which are to be consumed. On the other hand, there are those who say that as faith alone is the norm here, these "elements" are but tokens of something done once and for all by Christ on Calvary and therefore are to emphasize the memorial value of the Supper "in remembrance" of Him. The prayer (coming out of the first Prayer Book and then being revised slightly by Puritan influences in 1662) has as its key petition one not for the elements, but for the communicants. "That we, receiving these thy creatures of bread and wine, according to Thy Son, our Savior, Jesus Christ's holy institution, in remembrance of His death and passion, may be partakers of His most blessed body and blood." The essence of this prayer is that "we may be partakers." Late Methodist revision—in The United Methodist Church—by a commission working over this office between 1960 and 1964 changed this slightly with a prayer that "we receiving these thy creatures . . . may be partakers of the divine nature through Him."

The prayer of consecration in all liturgies from the earliest days on has always contained the words of Christ's institution of the Sacrament: "Who in the same night that He was betrayed, took bread; and when He had given thanks, He gave it to them," etc.

The Methodist churches over the world have revised the forms for administering the Sacrament slightly, but in the main still follow the English rite, which as Wesley said of the whole prayer book "breathes . . . solid, Scriptural, rational piety with the language of it not only pure, but strong and elegant in the highest degree." The rituals and service books of the various Methodist churches must be referred to for current variations or revivals of this ancient office.

COMMUNION TICKETS. These were tickets given to non-members of Methodist Societies to permit them to participate in the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper at Methodist chapels and churches. In the LARGE MINUTES of JOHN WESLEY and his preachers, which in 1783 he urged the preachers in America to publish and which they adopted with some changes at the organizing Conference of American Methodism in 1784, part of the answer to question 44 reads: "Let no person who is not a member of the society be admitted to the communion without a sacrament ticket, which ticket must be changed every quarter. And we empower the elder or assistant, and no others, to deliver these tickets." Evidently the provision did not meet with universal approval, and in 1789 the answer was changed as follows: "Let no person that is not a member of our society be admitted to the communion, without examination, and some token given by an elder or deacon." It is not clear what "token" was given, or how extensive the "examination" might have been, but the provision remained in the Discipline until 1844.

In 1792, a further paragraph was added to the provision of 1789: "N.B. No person shall be admitted to the Lord's supper among us who is guilty of any practice for which we would exclude a member of our society." In section XXIII of their Notes on the Discipline, furthermore, ASBURY and COKE warned that "It would be highly injurious to our brethren, if we suffered any to partake of the Lord's supper with them, whom we would not readily admit into our society on application made to us." The provision introduced in 1792 remained in the Discipline until 1912. By that time it had for some years become a rubric in the Ritual outlining the order for the administration of the Lord's Supper.

Today, no communion ticket or token or examination is required of a non-Methodist or a member of another denomination who wishes to participate in the Lord's Supper. Our attitude is well stated in the following quotation: "It has long been the practice among Methodists . . . to invite members of other denominations to join in this Sacrament. There is more fear among our ministry of failing to bring the Supper of the Lord to those who want it, than of permitting an unworthy person to receive it."

COMMUNION TOKENS were small thick metal discs, usually dated and inscribed with the name of the church and an emblem or text. Their use was generally confined to Scotland, and only a few survive. They did not supersede the showing of class tickets for admission to the Lord's Supper.

CONCEPCION, Chile is a cultural and industrial center about 300 miles below SANTIAGO. The university there has recently added a number of new colleges, and the city is becoming more and more a strategic center for evangelistic work. It has a growing Methodist church which is the center for a program of evangelization for a number of smaller towns.

It has a Student Center rebuilt after the destructive earthquake of 1939, and this modern building also serves as a center for reaching a much larger group of university students through the Student Christian Movement, supported by the WOMEN'S SOCIETY OF CHRISTIAN SERVICE of The United Methodist Church (U.S.A.).

CONCORD, NEW HAMPSHIRE, U.S.A., the capital of the state, is situated on the Merrimac River. It was first settled in 1725, was incorporated as Rumford in 1733, and as Concord in 1765, and as a city in 1853. A biblical institute under the control of the M. E. Church was in-incorporated in 1847 as "The Methodist General Biblical Institute." The North Congregational Society, having just erected a new church, presented its edifice with nearly two acres of land to the M. E. Church for this purpose. Following essential alteration, the Institute opened April 1, 1847 with seven students and three teachers. These teachers were JOHN DEMPSTER, who later was the founder of GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE at Evanston, Ill., professor of theology and ecclesiastical history; Charles Adams, who served for two years as professor of biblical literature and pastoral theology; and OSMON C. BAKER, who was professor of New Testament Greek, homiletics, church government and discipline until his election as bishop five years later. ELIJAH HEDDING, the eighth bishop of the M. E. Church, served as first president, and upon his death gave the school his library. After twenty years the institute which had graduated 217 students, with all its trusts and traditions, was moved to Boston, Mass., where in 1871 it became the BOSTON UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY.

Concord was originally included in the Pembroke Circuit. It is first mentioned as the Concord Circuit in the minutes for 1823. The first church was erected in 1831 on a site costing $200, with the building costing $2,500. This was enlarged in 1858 and improved in 1874, the membership then being 403. On Oct. 30, 1874, 110 of these members were dismissed to become the nucleus of Baker Memorial Church named in honor of Bishop Osmon Baker. On Dec. 1, 1876 the Baker Memorial chapel was dedicated and on Sept. 13, 1893 the cornerstone of the Baker Memorial Church itself was laid with appropriate ceremonies. The church was dedicated May 17, 1894. At the beginning of the twentieth century the chapel was remodeled, and some twenty years later a $30,000 addition was built.

First Church continued to grow, and became one of the finest churches in the city, when it was completely destroyed by fire July 24, 1915. The congregation immediately set to work planning for a new building, and the cornerstone was laid in early fall of 1916 with the completed church dedicated the following spring. The two churches voted unanimously to merge in the spring of 1957, and as Wesley Methodist began its first year. On Oct. 17, 1957 it was voted to build a new church. Wesley Church, contracted for $210,000, was consecrated Oct. 15, 1961 by Bishop JAMES K. MATHEWS.

THE NEW HAMPSHIRE CONFERENCE Minutes of 1970 lists 792 members and property values of $485,925.

CONCORDANCES, BIBLE. JOHN WESLEY, an enthusiastic student of the Bible, knew the best Bible Concordances of his day, that by Samuel Newman, first published in 1643, and that by Alexander Cruden, which replaced it in 1737—though in fact Newman's concordance was occasionally reprinted subsequently, even as late as 1889. Wesley also sponsored two new concordances, both much more compact and incomplete than that of Cruden. The first was A Concordance to the Holy Scriptures by John Fisher, published in 1760, with the imprint: "London: Printed for the author, and sold at the Foundery, Upper-Moorfields." This went through five editions by the end of the century, but is now extremely rare. The second was prepared by one of Wesley's preachers, THOMAS TAYLOR. This was A New Concordance to the Holy Scriptures, abridged from the third edition of Cruden's, and was published for Taylor in 1782 by ROBERT SPENCE of York. Wesley contributed a foreword: "Mr. Cruden's Concordance is undoubtedly the best which hath yet been published in the English tongue, but abundance of people who want a concordance cannot go to the price of it: I am in hopes this small, cheap, and portable one may answer the same intention; I therefore recommend it to all lovers of the Bible. John Wesley, Scarbrough, May 21, 1782." By 1812 this passed through four English and one American edition.

Many other concordances appeared, including one by a Baptist minister, John Butterworth (2nd ed., 1785), of which a new edition "with considerable improvements" was prepared by the famous Methodist scholar ADAM CLARKE, and published by the author's son JOSEPH BUTTERWORTH, Clarke's brother-in-law. First published in 1812, Clarke's edition of Butterworth's concordance was reprinted in 1838; and once more in 1851, this time in Philadelphia. On both sides of the Atlantic, however, Cruden's Concordance remained the favorite, the preferred abridged version being that by the Presbyterian John Eadie. A new departure was marked by the Analytical Concordance of Robert Young, a Presbyterian printer of Edinburgh, which appeared in 1879. Young's was enriched by identification of the original Hebrew and Greek words under each English word. A different method of providing this information—by cross references to appended Hebrew and Greek lexicons—was incorporated into what was certainly the best American Bible concordance, and is probably the best of all. This was produced by a Methodist, JAMES STRONG, in 1894. The full title shows its special characteristics: The Exhaustive Concordance of the Bible, showing every word of the text of the common English version, together with a comparative concordance of the Authorized and Revised Versions. Also brief dictionaries of the Hebrew and Greek words of the original, with references to the English words. Like Young's and Cruden's, this still remains in print.

CONFERENCE has become a somewhat technical and specialized name in the entire Methodist movement since—and during—the days of JOHN WESLEY. He called his first conference in 1744, and in Britain the term "conference" remained restricted to the annual legislative and administrative assembly of a Methodist denomination. (See BRITISH METHODISM, ORGANIZATION OF and CONFERENCE, BRITISH METHODIST.)

In America the name "conference" gradually came to be affixed to several Methodist meetings. The different varieties of Methodist conferences, as Annual, General, District, Jurisdictional, and other similar gatherings, provided for in the various Disciplines and Books of Offices of the Methodist churches, will be found noted or described usually under their own special names in this Encyclopedia.

The large Methodist churches work through a chain of interlocking and supporting conferences, with specific membership, duties, responsibilities, and powers carefully allotted or indicated by the General Church as belonging to each.

CONFERENCE, BRITISH METHODIST. The first Methodist conference, destined to become the mother of many conferences in many lands, was held in the FOUNDERY, London, in June, 1744. Like all conferences held prior to the establishment of the Legal Conference in 1784, it consisted of those whom Wesley invited to confer with him. On this first occasion there were ten persons present, six of them being clergymen and four lay preachers. From that time the Conference met annually with Wesley presiding each year until his death.

The agenda included, as it still does, doctrine, discipline, and practice. While in composition and proceedings it remained under Wesley's direct control, it gradually assumed the authority it has wielded without challenge since his death. It is the crown of the Methodist system. It became, as the Australian Methodist, W. H. FITCHETT, remarked, "a parliament clothed with all the functions of legislation; a cabinet of administration; a court of discipline; the machinery by which the great system of itinerancy, which is characteristic of the pastorate of the Methodist Churches, is regulated." This last function is of supreme importance.

When preaching houses began to be established and vested in trustees, an attempt was made in some quarters by trustees to invite and appoint the ministers. JOHN WESLEY reacted against this with unequivocal determination and insisted that the deployment of the ministry, so vital to the Methodist movement, be vested in the Conference and the Conference only. The business of the Conference was conducted in and by Wesley's method of question and answer, which became traditional in all succeeding Methodist conferences.

In 1784, because of his advancing years, Wesley executed the DEED OF DECLARATION. The purpose of this was "to explain the words Yearly Conference of the People called Methodists and to declare what persons are members of the said Conference, and how the succession and identity thereof is to be continued." (Townsend, Workman and Eayrs, New History, ii, 552). This was the first legal definition of the Conference. In the Wesleyan Church right up to the time of Methodist UNION in 1932, this body, popularly known as the Legal Hundred, remained the body with theoretical absolute power. In practice, the full body of the Conference carried through its business, and its acts were formally ratified by the LEGAL HUNDRED at the conclusion of the proceedings. This ratification was never withheld.

The itinerant lay preachers invited by Wesley far outnumbered the ordained clergy of the Church of England in every conference except the first, and eventually they themselves were regarded as ministers, though Wesley resisted their use of the term. The Legal Hundred was composed entirely of preachers, vacancies occurring through death or retirement being filled annually by vote of the members of the Conference. After 1878, when the Wesleyan Conference admitted lay representatives for the first time, voting for members of the Legal Hundred remained a ministerial prerogative.

During the nineteenth century, when divisions occurred in Methodism resulting in the formation of new Methodist denominations, each of these Churches adopted a form of government with the Conference as its supreme court. The main difference between these conferences and the parent Wesleyan body lay in the more democratic characteristics which developed, particularly in the relative authority and representation of ministers and laymen.

In 1932 when Methodist Union was brought about by the reuniting of the continuing Wesleyan Methodist Church with the PRIMITIVE METHODIST CHURCH and the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH, the Conference, as it now exists in British Methodism, remained the chief court of the church. The Wesleyan system became the basis of the new Conference, but important changes were introduced from the other two churches. The Legal Hundred disappeared altogether. When laymen were admitted to the Wesleyan Conference they sat with the ministers in a Representative Session, but the Pastoral Session remained, consisting only of ministers, and exercised great authority. It appointed the president and secretary of the Conference and the chairmen of districts. It also controlled the stationing of ministers.

The Pastoral Session met after the Representative Session and had the right, which it not infrequently exercised, of reversing the vote of the former session in matters relating to the appointment of departmental ministers, and it had the last word on questions of doctrine. These are now the prerogative of the Representative Session. A pastoral session remains, renamed the Ministerial Session, but the only subjects exclusively within its province concern the ministry; namely, the acceptance of candidates, probationers, ordination of ministers (who are received into FULL CONNEXION by the Representative Session), the character, discipline, and doctrinal fidelity of ministers; applications for supernumeraryship; and the obituaries of deceased ministers. It shares with the Representative Session responsibility for stationing, and the consideration of the work of God and similar pastoral subjects. Since 1963 the Ministerial Session has preceded the Representative Session.

The Conference consists of an equal number of ministers and laymen, the total being between 660 and 670, depending on representation from certain autonomous daughter conferences. It includes a number of representatives of the Irish Conference, the link between the two conferences being especially close as the president of the British Conference is also the president of the Irish Conference. The Conference membership is made up of certain ex-officio members, numbering about 160, the remaining 500 being elected by the District Synods in the proportion of the number of members of society in the respective districts. The Conference meets in thirteen or fourteen large centers in rotation.

It has a president, a vice-president, and a secretary, who are designated a year ahead by a ballot vote. The president and the secretary must be ministers, and the vice-president (this office did not exist in the Wesleyan Church) must be a layman. They hold office for one year; and although there is nothing in the constitution to this effect, the president and vice-president have in practice changed annually, whereas it has been customary to reelect the secretary for a period of years. Other officers of the Conference include the precentor, who leads the singing (no instrument being permitted), the record secretary, and the journal secretary. The record secretary presents daily the record of the previous day's proceedings, and the journal secretary presents the acts of the Conference for formal approval at the end of the Conference. This becomes the official record of the Conference actions and is carefully guarded under lock and key. The annual publication, prepared by the secretary and known as the MINUTES OF THE CONFERENCE, contains only a selection of the proceedings, and includes much material, such as lists of names and address, which makes it a yearbook of the church rather than a formal record of the Conference. It is the responsibility of the secretary of the Conference to prepare the agenda of the Conference with the assistance of the secretaries of all committees reporting to the Conference, and to present the business day by day.

The Conference reviews the whole of the work of the church, receiving reports from all standing, departmental, and ad hoc committees, passes judgment on them, and reappoints the committees, assigning to them their tasks for the ensuing year. It also receives and deals with all memorials from District Synods and Circuit Quarterly Meetings, and considers such notices of motion on a wide variety of issues as members may submit for its consideration.

CONFERENCE, CENTRAL. The name given in The United Methodist Church (U.S.A.) to those representative bodies outside the United States of America which represent, in various lands, the authoritative connexional joining of Annual Conferences for supervisory control and legislation. They are comparable to JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCES within the United States, though the Central Conference of India was organized long before the Jurisdictional plan was adopted in the States, and its value helped to commend the Jurisdictional or "regional plan" for the United States itself. The Constitution of The United Methodist Church provides that there shall be Central Conferences and gives the following directives regarding them.

Article I—There shall be Central Conferences for the work of the church outside the United States of America and Canada with such duties, powers and privileges as are hereinafter set forth. The number and boundaries of the Central Conferences shall be determined by the Uniting Conference. Subsequently the General Conference shall have authority to change the number and boundaries of Central Conferences. The Central Conferences shall have the duties, powers, and privileges hereinafter set forth.

Article II—The Central Conferences shall be composed of as many delegates as shall be determined by a basis established by the General Conference. The delegates shall be ministerial and lay in equal numbers.

Article III—The Central Conferences shall meet within the year succeeding the meeting of the General Conference at such times and places as shall have been determined by the preceding respective Central Conferences or by commissions appointed by them, or by the General Conference. The date and place of the first meeting succeeding the Uniting Conference shall be fixed by the bishops of the respective Central Conferences, or in such manner as shall be determined by the General Conference.

Article IV—The Central Conferences shall have the following powers and duties and such others as may be conferred by the General Conference:

1. To promote the evangelistic, educational, missionary, social concerns and benevolent interests and institutions of the church within their own boundaries.

2. To elect the bishops for the respective Central Conferences in number as may be determined from time to time, upon a basis fixed by the General Conference, and to cooperate in carrying out such plans for the support of their bishops as may be determined by the General Conference.

3. To establish and constitute such Central Conference boards as may be required and to elect their administrative officers.

4. To determine the boundaries of the Annual Conferences within their respective areas.

5. To make such rules and regulations for the administration of the work within their boundaries, including such changes and adaptation of the general Disciplines, as the conditions in the respective areas may require, subject to the powers that have been or shall be vested in the Central Conference.

6. To appoint a Committee on Appeals to hear and determine the appeal of a traveling preacher of that Central Conference from the decision of a Committee on Trial. Section VI. Episcopal Administration in Central Conferences Article I. The bishops of the Central Conferences shall be elected by their respective Central Conferences and inducted into office in the historic manner.

Article II. The bishops of the Central Conferences shall have membership in the Council of Bishops with vote.

Article III. The bishops of the Central Conferences shall preside in the sessions of their respective Central Conferences.

Article IV. The bishops of each Central Conference shall arrange the plan of episcopal visitation within their Central Conference.

Article V. The Council of Bishops may assign one of their number to visit each Central Conference. When so assigned the bishop shall be recognized as an accredited representative of the general church; and when requested by a majority of the bishops resident in that Conference may exercise therein the functions of the episcopacy. (Constitution of The United Methodist Church, Division Two, Sections V and VI.)

Central Conferences, as can be seen in the Constitutional paragraphs regarding them, enjoy enormous powers and manage their own affairs to a greater degree than the Jurisdictional Conferences within the United States are enabled to manage theirs. The Central Conferences in The United Methodist Church are the following:

Africa Central Conference

Central and Southern Europe Central Conference

China Central Conference

Germany Central Conference

Latin America Central Conference

Liberia Central Conference

Northern Europe Central Conference

Pakistan Provisional Central Conference

Philippines Central Conference

Southeastern Asia Central Conference

Southern Asia Central Conference

The bishops elected by the Central Conferences take their place as bishops of the United Methodist Church and belong, of course, to the COUNCIL OF BISHOPS.

CONFERENCE, PRESIDENTS OF THE. In JOHN WESLEY'S DEED OF DECLARATION of 1784 his own authority over the Methodist societies was bequeathed to the preachers meeting annually in CONFERENCE, who were to elect one of themselves to preside over their sessions as he had done. It was clearly a high honor for any man to step into Wesley's shoes, an honor which has eagerly been sought throughout all the major British Methodist denominations, the others copying the pattern thus set for Wesleyan Methodism by the founder.

At the first Conference after Wesley's death it was generally felt that there should not be another "king in Israel," and therefore the preachers passed over the name of THOMAS COKE and others who might seem tainted by authoritarianism or ambition, choosing instead an able but less well known man, WILLIAM THOMPSON. Coke's turn came, however, as has that of most of the prominent leaders of British Methodism. A few indeed were elected to the office more than once; twenty-one for a second time, and of these ADAM CLARKE for a third time, while both JABEZ BUNTING and ROBERT NEWTON were elected four times.

At METHODIST UNION in 1932 the office of Vice-President was added, in order to give both responsibility and honor to a distinguished Methodist layman. Alone among the uniting churches, the PRIMITIVE METHODISTS had appointed a Vice-President (in one instance only a minister) from 1885 onwards. During this last generation, especially with united British Methodism's enlarged scope, the office of President of the Conference has become a year-round function rather than the mere presiding over the sessions of the Conference, however important those might be. It has entailed almost continuous touring of Methodist centers, presiding over a host of important committees, and delivering innumerable exhortations and pronouncements on Methodist work and witness.

In such high honor has this office been held that for well over a century enthusiastic collectors have striven to assemble a portrait and a letter to represent every President, beginning with the most prized if not the most rare, those of John Wesley himself. Several of these collections have found their way into institutional libraries, and a few at least have been faithfully continued to the present day, aided by the practice of the METHODIST RECORDER of presenting portraits of the current President and Secretary to their readers. This fashion in collecting, however, does not seem to have spread to any extent among the offshoots of Wesleyan Methodism.

A list of the Presidents of the various British Methodist Conferences will be found in the Appendix.

FRANK BAKER

CONFERENCES, TABLE OF METHODIST ANNUAL, U.S.A. (See Appendix.)

CONFERENCE COLLECTIONS (U.S.A.), a term formerly used in the American Methodist Churches for those funds which the Discipline required the preachers-in-charge to collect from their congregations and to bring and report to the Annual Conference. These funds were for general, connectional, or annual conference purposes, and by Methodist common law all such obligations and duties due in any one year are closed when Conference meets. The term "conference collections" meaning "collections that must be made for the coming conference" came to be widely adopted.

With the growth of the Church and the development of a more broadly based budget, including the part each local church must play in contributing to the budget of the general Church, the term "conference collections" began to be supplanted by WORLD SERVICE FUNDS, or "general assessments." The word "assessment" itself fell into disrepute, the name "askings" taking its place, with voluntary acceptance from each local church being in time allowed—and since it is made a matter of loyalty and honor pledges are usually obtained. However, the custom yet prevails of closing each Conference year's accounts, whether paid up or not, at each Annual Conference.

CONFESSION OF FAITH. Historical. The Church's Confessions of Faith, or Creeds, originally go back to the baptismal confession of faith. Christian saving faith is basically an attitude of penitent, obedient, loving personal trust in God, as He has made Himself known in Christ (Galatians 5:6). However, this attitude toward God is founded upon a certain view of what God is like (Hebrews 11:6). Therefore "faith," or trust in God, naturally moves over into the sense of "the faith," or the body of truth about God to which scripture and the Church makes witness (Galatians 1:23, Ephesians 4:5; Jude 3). A "confession of faith" properly incorporates both elements, but as the Creeds became more theologically developed, and increasingly aimed to exclude false doctrine from the Church, the element of a confession of doctrine came more and more to prevail (see FAITH).

It is arguable that the original baptismal confession of the primitive Church was in the Name of Jesus alone (Acts 8:37). However, from a very early date a confession of the triune name of "Father, Son, and Holy Spirit" became the essential and invariable baptismal confession, and the Church of New Testament times believed that this formula went back to our Lord Himself (Matthew 28:19). This formula also appears in the first stratum of Christian literature outside the New Testament (Didache 7). Baptism was by a threefold immersion in running water, or pouring of water, to which corresponded a threefold confession of faith by question and answer. The threefold answer was in course of time filled out with a summary of the leading articles of the Christian faith, drawn from Scripture, so that the Church came into the possession of a scriptural Confession of Faith in three clauses. The development may be illustrated from The Apostolic Tradition of S. Hippolytus, a Church Order reflecting the customs of the Church in Rome during the second half of the second century. Thus we read (Pt. II, xxi. 12-18), "And when he who is being baptized goes down into the water, he who baptizes him, putting his hand on him, shall say thus:

Dost thou believe in God, the Father Almighty?

And he who is being baptized shall say:

I believe.

Then holding his hand placed on his head, he shall baptize him once. And then shall he say:

Dost thou believe in Christ Jesus, the Son of God, who was born of the Holy Ghost of the Virgin Mary, and was crucified under Pontius Pilate, and was dead and buried, and rose again the third day, alive from the dead, and ascended into heaven, and sat at the right hand of the Father, and will come to judge the quick and the dead? And when he says:

I believe,
he is baptized again. And again he shall say:

Dost thou believe in the Holy Ghost, and the holy church, and the resurrection of the flesh?

He who is being baptized shall say accordingly:

I believe,
and so he is baptized a third time."

From this may clearly be observed the development of the later Creeds of the Church, as they assumed a form which was always recited in the same way. The last stage of preparation of catechumens for Baptism was to teach them the Creed, so that they might make appropriate answer to the baptismal questions.

The exact details of the origin of the APOSTLES' and NICENE CREEDS have been much debated by scholars (for a summary see Early Christian Creeds, J. N. D. Kelly, London, 1950). In general it is agreed that the so-called Apostles' Creed, which took its traditional name from the ancient legend that the Twelve Apostles composed it by each reciting in turn one of its twelve clauses, goes back to the type of Baptismal Confession used by the Latin-speaking Churches of western Europe. Its accepted form is sufficiently familiar from the formularies of the Book of Common Prayer, and of the Methodist Churches, and may be compared with "The Old Roman Creed" of c. 340 A.D. preserved in Epiphanius (lxiii. 3).

I believe in God Almighty;

And in Christ Jesus, His only Son, our Lord; who was born of the Holy Ghost and the Virgin Mary; who was crucified under Pontius Pilate and was buried; and the third day rose from the dead; who ascended into heaven; and sitteth on the right hand of the Father; whence He cometh to judge the living and the dead;

And in the Holy Ghost, the holy Church, the remission of sins, the resurrection of the flesh, the life everlasting.

It will be noted that one clause, "He descended into hell," has not yet appeared. This clause, answering to the doctrine of 1 Peter 3:18-20, is first recorded in the Creed as preserved in Caesarius of Arles (6th cent.). It has in some quarters in the modern period unfortunately been the subject of misunderstanding, and therefore of prejudice. The traditional Prayer-Book translation "hell," (meaning in Tudor English "a covered place"), represents the New Testament Hades, and the Old Testament Sheol; that is to say, the abode of the departed as they await the Resurrection. It does not represent Gehenna, the place of punishment of the finally impenitent, or "hell" in the modern sense of the word. The essential doctrine is that the divine Son, who by His incarnation made Himself one with us men that He might be our Saviour, in His death and burial made Himself one also with the righteous of by-gone days, that He might take His victory over sin and death to them. The common objection that this clause is "mythological" is a superficial one. Any doctrine concerning the unseen world, which is beyond our bodily senses, has to be framed in symbolic language. Thus it is the use of symbolic language to call God "the Father." The confession that the victorious Christ is "ascended" to glory does not require the idea that the throne of the divine Majesty is in some kind of "place" above the blue sky. In just the same way, "the descent into hell" does not involve the notion that the departed are literally in a "place" under the ground. But the picture-language is most expressive and beautiful when understood aright.

The "Nicene" Creed, by long tradition recited at the Eucharist in the Eastern Churches, the Roman Church, the Lutheran Church, the Anglican Church, and following the Anglican usage, by many Methodists, goes back to the early baptismal Confessions of Faith of the Eastern Church. More than any other Confession of Faith, therefore, it unites the various branches of the Church, and as such is accepted by the modern Ecumenical Movement as the unifying statement of essential Christian doctrine. The "Nicene" Creed, familiar from the Book of Common Prayer, and from Methodist formularies, was originally promulgated at the Second Ecumenical Council of the Church (Constantinople, A.D. 381), and was ratified as authoritative for the Eastern and Western parts of the Church at the Fourth Ecumenical Council (Chalcedon, A.D. 451). It is called "Nicene" because it contains the essential doctrinal formula declared by the First Ecumenical Council, of Nicea, A.D. 325. This is the phrase applied to the divine Son: "being of one substance with the Father." This formula represents the attempt of the ancient Church to define the essential Christian position that the Son is divine in the full and proper sense of the word, as the Father is divine, and not in any secondary or reduced sense, as the Arians had taught (see DIVINITY OF CHRIST).

The Creed of Nicea (A.D. 325) is an eastern, and quite probably a Palestinian, baptismal Creed, interpolated with a number of theological formulae to make it more explicit in repudiation of the Arian position that Christ was a semi-divine being. It reads as follows:

We believe in one God the Father All-sovereign, maker of all things visible and invisible;

And in one Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God, begotten of the Father, only-begotten, that is, of the substance of the Father, God of God, Light of Light, true God of true God, begotten not made, of one substance with the Father, through whom all things were made, things in heaven and things on the earth; who for us men and for our salvation came down and was made flesh, and became man, suffered, and rose on the third day, ascended into the heavens, is coming to judge living and dead;

And in the Holy Spirit.

The leading inserted words are in italics. It will be noted that the Eastern Creeds were more developed theologically, and less matter-of-fact, than the Latin and Western. Also the Eastern Church says "We believe," rather than "I believe." It is well arguable that this usage is theologically and spiritually preferable, particularly when the Creed has ceased to be a personal Confession of Faith at Baptism, and has become a corporate and congregational profession at the Liturgy. What the individual believer acknowledges in reciting the Creed is not so much that he himself has personally thought his way through every clause of it, for the number who know enough theology to have the right to an independent judgment is very few. Rather is it that he acknowledges his loyalty to a Church which in its mature wisdom and theologically informed judgment has accepted this Creed as an authoritative guide to sound doctrine.

It is also worthy of note that the eucharistic "Nicene" Creed exists in two variants. The Latin and Western form confesses of the Holy Spirit that He "proceedeth from the Father and the Son," the words in italics not occurring in the original Greek, and not being said by the Eastern Church. This variation crept in in an attempt further to safeguard the divine equality of the Father and the Son, and at a time when there was almost no knowledge of Greek in western Europe. The Eastern Church does not affirm that the doctrine expressed is false, but has much justice in the complaint that an ecumenical creed has been altered without the authority of an Ecumenical Council.

A word may also perhaps be added about the third great Creed of the Western Church, the so-called Athanasian Creed, because Wesley both expressed his approval of it, and somewhat pointedly did not pass it on in his revision of the prayer book, The Sunday Service, for the use of his followers. This long and very detailed confession of the doctrine of the Trinity, and of the divine and human natures of Christ, is appointed in the Book of Common Prayer to be said instead of the Apostles' Creed on fourteen leading festivals. It most probably originated in the learned monasteries of the south of France about A.D. 500, and reflects the teaching of St. Augustine. The chief difficulty about it is the statement which ill accords with much modern thinking on the place of doctrinal orthodoxy in the Christian life: "This is the Catholic Faith: which except a man believe faithfully, he cannot be saved." In his Sermon LV On the Trinity, (3) Wesley states, regarding his use of the word "Trinity": "I insist upon no explication at all; no, not even on the best I ever saw; I mean, that which is given in the creed ascribed to Athanasius." He goes on to say that he had felt scruples regarding subscription to the damnable clauses, but had been reassured that they did not apply to those who erred through ignorance, and that what was being insisted upon was the substance of Christian trinitarian thought, not its philosophical illustration. So, (4) he will not insist on the use of the words "Trinity," or "Person," but only on the essential New Testament doctrine of one God made known as Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. Thus the historic Creed is not disowned, but salvation is affirmed to be not a matter of speculative orthodoxy, but of the personal "faith that works by love" directed toward a divine Saviour. This may still be commended as a good rule.

JOHN LAWSON

The Creeds in American Methodism. In the SUNDAY SERVICE which Wesley sent to America in 1784, he did not include the Nicene Creed in the Service of Holy Communion as it is found in the English Communion office which he there abridged. Following the Epistle and the Gospel in the Communion office of the Church of England, and in the Protestant Episcopal Church in America, comes the Nicene Creed. Wesley totally omitted this, possibly in the interest of saving time, as he said that the service on the Lord's day had been complained of as too lengthy and that he had left out certain parts of it.

It can scarcely be maintained that Wesley was opposed to the Nicene Creed, as he nowhere gives any indication (other than omitting it from the Sunday Service) that he objected to it. As with all priests of the Church of England, he probably repeatedly used it in conducting the Communion Service in his own land, and repeated it time after time with his fellow worshippers when that office was being celebrated.

The Nicene Creed was never incorporated into the formal worship of the M. E. Churches in America, nor in that of the M. P. Church, prior to the union of these three in 1939. However, provision has been made in revisions of the Methodist Order of Worship since that time for an "Affirmation of Faith" to be repeated as part of the formal worship. In the Methodist Hymnal of 1964 the Nicene Creed is published for use as such an affirmation and denominated one of the "ancient creeds of the Church"—as is also the Apostles' Creed. Also there is published a creed known as "a Modern Affirmation" and one denominated the Korean Creed. These are all published as affirmations of faith, any one of which may be selected for use. Such use is introduced by the minister saying, "Let us unite in this historic confession of the Christian faith." (Methodist Hymnal, 1964, #739.)

The text of the Nicene Creed has never been amended, nor has there ever been any attempt to amend it in American Methodism as the Apostles' Creed has been. The Nicene is used occasionally by ministers in their ordinary conduct of worship in place of the Apostles' Creed when the time arrives for the affirmation of faith in formal worship.

Here follows the text of the Nicene Creed as it is now published in the Book of Worship and in The Methodist Hymnal of The United Methodist Church.

I believe in one God: the Father Almighty, maker of heaven and earth, and of all things visible and invisible;

And in one Lord Jesus Christ, the only-begotten Son of God: begotten of his Father before all worlds, God of God, Light of Light, very God of very God; begotten, not made, being of one substance with the Father, through whom all things were made; who for us men and for our salvation came down from heaven, and was incarnate by the Holy Ghost of the Virgin Mary, and was made man, and was crucified also for us under Pontius Pilate; He suffered and was buried, and the third day he rose again according to the Scriptures, and ascended into heaven, and sitteth on the right hand of the Father; and he shall come again with glory, to judge both the quick and the dead; whose kingdom shall have no end.

And I believe in the Holy Ghost, the Lord, and giver of life, who proceedeth from the Father and the Son, who with the Father and son together is worshiped and glorified, who spake by the prophets. And I believe in one holy catholic and apostolic church. I acknowledge one baptism for the remission of sins. And I look for the resurrection of the dead, and the life of the world to come. Amen.

The Apostles' Creed was sent to American Methodism by John Wesley in the Sunday Service as part of the baptismal covenant in "the Ministration of Baptism to Such as are of Riper Years"—an office commonly referred to as "adult baptism." The triple vow of the baptismal covenant—Repentance, Faith and Obedience—contained a vow which the person to be baptized took regarding his faith, and this was by his certifying belief in the items of the Apostles' Creed. "Dost thou believe in God the Father Almighty, maker of Heaven and Earth, etc." John Wesley kept this exactly as it was in the Church of England's Prayer Book, and is the only place (the adult Baptismal office) where he sent the Apostles' Creed—the text of it—to American Methodism. Wesley did, however, retain the Apostles' Creed in the Morning

Prayer, and this of course would call for its use constantly. The M. E. Churches retained this creed in the service for adult baptism until within quite recent years, when after Church union, or at the time of Church union in 1939, the Creed was supplanted in adult baptism by a simple affirmation of belief in God the Father, Jesus Christ His Son, and the Holy Spirit as the "Lord the giver of Life."

The Apostles' Creed, however, has been revised by American Methodism in certain respects, the first being the omission in the second Sunday Service of 1786, of the clause "he went down into hell and did rise again the third day." The 1786 book had "he was crucified, dead, buried, that he rose again the third day." John Wesley himself in his revision had changed his Church's "resurrection of the flesh" to "resurrection of the body." COKE and ASBURY, or whoever made the 1786 revision on the American side, could truthfully argue that there is no sure Scriptural basis for the descent into hell, that it was a late insertion in the Creed, and in any event is not of prime importance in Christian faith. No Methodist church in America has since 1786 ever affirmed the descent into hell.

Also in American Methodism there was a constant attack upon the expression "holy catholic church"—that is in the service of adult baptism, which throughout the nineteenth century was the only place wherein the Creed was continuously kept. In 1836, apparently by General Conference action, there was inserted an explanatory note: "by the holy catholic church is meant the Church of God in general." In 1864 in the M. E. Church "holy catholic church" became "the one universal Church of Christ."

In the M. E. Church, South "holy catholic church" was put back in 1854 (probably at the behest of T. O. SUMMERS, Book Editor of this church and a classic liturgist). The constant efforts to amend the Creed at this point caused the General Conference of the M. E. Church, South, in 1918 to create a committee to examine whether the Creed could be so amended, or whether it was under the protection of the first Restrictive Rule which forbade a General Conference to change or to alter standards of doctrine. The bishops of the Church, South laid down an episcopal check arresting the proposed measure of the legislative committee which would have changed "holy catholic" to "Christ's holy church." Bishops COLLINS DENNY and EUGENE R. HENDRIX read the statement of the bishops which held that "the Creed known as the Apostles' Creed was adopted by our Church in 1784 . . . In our judgment the Creed is included in our Standards of Doctrine. The Annual Conferences have not committed to the General Conference the right to change these standards of doctrine." Proponents of this change, however, were strong enough to have the General Conference by a two-thirds vote refer it to the Southern conferences asking for their favorable action during the ensuing quadrennium. There the change failed of adoption by a vote of 3,063 to 1,697—especially since the DENVER, HOLSTON, KENTUCKY, LOUISVILLE, MISSOURI, SOUTH GEORGIA, and VIRGINIA CONFERENCES had voted against the measure, and it was maintained then that the language of the Discipline regarding amending constitutional matter made it necessary that all the conferences would have to agree to any change in doctrine.

Meanwhile, in the Southern Church, the word "begotten" (which was not in the Creed in its usual text, but was in the Creed in American Methodism at an early date) had been taken out of the text of the Creed which was now being published in the newly adopted order of worship and in the then new hymnal. The Book EDITION apparently did this himself in the 1906 edition of the Book of Discipline leaving an affirmation of belief in "Jesus Christ his only Son our Lord." The M. E. Church continued to use the word "begotten" until in the revision of 1932 the whole Creed was dropped from adult baptism, and a simple confession of accepting and confessing Jesus Christ took its place.

In the M. E. Church in 1884 the "forgiveness of sins" took the place of "the remission of sins," and the Southern Church copied this change in 1906. Also the "life everlasting" took the place of "everlasting life after death." This latter expression, not in the usual traditional text of the Apostles' Creed, came to America in John Wesley's text of the Creed in Adult Baptism.

It has been argued that The Methodist Church never accepted the Apostles' Creed as a norm of doctrine, seeing that GENERAL CONFERENCES have felt free to change it in the particulars noted above. The constitutional question as to the violation of the Restrictive Rule has never been called in question or brought to a General Conference floor since 1918 in the Southern Church. The statement of the Southern bishops in 1918 seems not to have been cited nor acted upon by any appeal to the JUDICIAL COUNCIL since 1940, though to be sure no change has been proposed in the language of the Creed since that date. It is evident, however, that should the Creed be so changed by General Conference revision as to alter fundamentally any of the doctrinal standards of Methodism, this would clearly be unconstitutional and would presumably be struck down by the Judicial Council, though that Council itself is not eager to decide upon theological matters.

The Apostles' Creed came into the life of the M. E. Churches in a much more general way when in 1905-06 it was inserted in the formal Order of Worship provided by these two churches in their joint Hymnal of that date. Previous to that time, various orders and outlines directive of Methodist worship had been used—or not used—in a desultory way. The Joint Hymnal Commission felt that the time had come to draw up and publish in connection with the Hymnal an official form for the guidance and direction of the entire church in its formal worship (see Worship in American Methodism). The Order of Worship placed in the 1905 Hymnal was the result, and in this the Apostles' Creed was published where it should be repeated by minister and people Sunday after Sunday. This established the Creed in the life and consciousness of Methodist people in a much more definite way than it had been when it was simply to be found in the baptismal service. There was considerable objection to the newly created Order of Worship in 1905-06, not so much to the Creed itself as to the idea of Methodist worship becoming "too formal." However, the Order of Worship established itself and the Creed continued to be used, as it is to the present time in The United Methodist Church.

In later revisions of the Order of Worship, an "affirmation of faith" was called for at a certain point in the service, with the understanding that the Creed or some other affirmation might be used at this point. Usually, however, the Apostles' Creed is the affirmation which most of the congregations of Methodism use. In the Hymnal of 1964, the text of the Creed is not published as part of the Order of Worship, though its use is implied by the call for "the affirmation of faith."

Here follows the text of the Apostles' Creed as it is published in the Book of Worship and The Methodist Hymnal of The United Methodist Church.

I believe in God the Father Almighty, maker of heaven and earth.

And in Jesus Christ his only Son our Lord: who was conceived by the Holy Spirit,¹ born of the Virgin Mary, suffered under Pontius Pilate, was crucified, dead, and buried;² the third day he rose from the dead; he ascended into heaven, and sitteth at the right hand of God the Father Almighty; from thence he shall come to judge the quick and the dead.

I believe in the Holy Ghost, the holy catholic Church, the communion of saints, the forgiveness of sins, the resurrection of the body, and the life everlasting. Amen.

² Traditional use of this creed includes the words: "He descended into Hell."

As has been explained above, the Nicene Creed is also made available for use as an affirmation of faith at this point in the service. Also, there are two other Creeds in The United Methodist Church—one is called a Modern Affirmation, which was written by Edwin Lewis and accepted and approved by the General Conference of the M. E. Church in 1922; and the Korean Creed written for the Methodist Church of Korea and adopted by that church and placed in its Discipline in 1930. It is still found in the Discipline of that church as a Statement of Belief, and the text of the Korean Creed is made available in the present Methodist Hymnal as another affirmation of faith in the Order of Worship.

The Modern Affirmation. It should be said that the Modern Creed was written at the instance of Bishop W. P. THIRKIELD when he was chairman of the Commission on Worship and Music of the M. E. Church. Bishop Thirkield asked EDWIN LEWIS of DREW THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY to draft a brief statement of Christian belief which "in addition to the Apostles' Creed might be recommended to the Church." (The Christian Advocate, Aug. 1, 1946.) The Commission approved what Lewis had written, and it was adopted by the General Conference of the M. E. Church in 1922. The text of the Modern Affirmation:

We believe in God the Father, infinite in wisdom, power and love, whose mercy is over all his works, and whose will is ever directed to his children's good. We believe in Jesus Christ, Son of God and Son of man, the gift of the Father's unflinching grace, the ground of our hope, and the promise of our deliverance from sin and death. We believe in the Holy Spirit as the divine presence in our lives, whereby we are kept in perpetual remembrance of the truth of Christ, and find strength and help in time of need. We believe that this faith should manifest itself in the service of love as set forth in the example of our blessed Lord, to the end that the kingdom of God may come upon the earth. Amen.

The Korean Creed was written when the Korean Methodist Church was to be organized in 1930. At that time the question of a suitable doctrinal statement came up, and the commissioners from the two uniting M. E. Churches, North and South, were faced with a twofold demand. Bishop HERBERT WELCH explained: "The new church was not something emerging from a void. It was to be a Methodist Church and a Christian Church, and historical continuity with the Church Catholic had to be preserved. The other part of the demand came from the fact that there seemed to be no wisdom in loading upon the new church doctrinal statements or standards which had no immediate relation to the church's history or thinking. . . . I discussed the problem with Dr. J. S. RYANG, leader of the Southern Methodist Church in KOREA, who became the first general superintendent of the united Church. We agreed that such a creed, intended primarily as a teaching instrument, ought to be brief, including only the few essentials of a practical Christian faith, and that it should be simple, couched in non-technical language. To keep in line with Methodist tradition, and yet shun the wholesale and indiscriminate transfer of Western standards of belief and conduct, Dr. Ryang suggested that the General Rules common to the two united churches should become part of a historical statement concerning the rise of Methodism in England, where they originated; that the Articles of Religion should be incorporated into a short history of Methodism in America, to which Wesley had sent his abbreviation of the Thirty-nine Articles of the Anglican Church; and then, following a historical statement regarding Korean Methodism, that we should place the proposed new creedal statement, not as a condition of membership in the Church but as setting forth the things commonly accepted among us."

Bishop Welch further said that he formulated the doctrinal statement with three Koreans who had been appointed a committee to work upon a historical and doctrinal statement. "It was discussed, slightly changed by suggestions from Bishop JAMES C. BAKER and from the Korean members, amended and approved by the Joint Commission, presented to the first General Conference of the Korean Methodist Church, and officially adopted." (The Christian Advocate, vol. 121, no. 31, August 1, 1946, p. 13.) The text of the Korean Creed follows:

We believe in the one God, maker and ruler of all things, Father of all men, the source of all goodness and beauty, all truth and love. We believe in Jesus Christ, God manifest in the flesh, our teacher, example, and Redeemer, the Savior of the world. We believe in the Holy Spirit, God present with us for guidance, for comfort, and for strength. We believe in the forgiveness of sins, in the life of love and prayer, and in grace equal to every need. We believe in the Word of God contained in the Old and New Testaments as the Sufficient rule both of faith and of practice. We believe in the Church as the fellowship for worship and for service of all who are united to the living Lord. We believe in the kingdom of God as the divine rule in human society, and in the brotherhood of man under the fatherhood of God. We believe in the final triumph of righteousness, and in the life everlasting. Amen.

The Confession of Faith of the Evangelical United Brethren Church was the title of the doctrinal beliefs of that Church as published in the Discipline of the E.U.B. Church prior to union with The Methodist Church in 1968. At union, by constitutional process, this Confession of Faith, which paralleled the Articles of Religion of The Methodist Church and did not differ in any essential doctrine from these, was adopted as among the standards of faith of The United Methodist Church. The E.U.B. confession is published in the 1968 Discipline (UMC) just after the twenty-five Methodist ARTICLES OF RELIGION and is held to be constitutional matter in The United Methodist Church. Its text follows:

ARTICLE I.—GOD

We believe in the one true, holy and living God, Eternal Spirit, who is Creator, Sovereign and Preserver of all things visible and invisible. He is infinite in power, wisdom, justice, goodness and love, and rules with gracious regard for the well-being and salvation of men, to the glory of his name. We believe the one God reveals himself as the Trinity: Father, Son and Holy Spirit, distinct but inseparable, eternally one in essence and power.

ARTICLE II.—JESUS CHRIST

We believe in Jesus Christ, truly God and truly man, in whom the divine and human natures are perfectly and inseparably united. He is the eternal Word made flesh, the only begotten Son of the Father, born of the Virgin Mary by the power of the Holy Spirit. As ministering Servant he lived, suffered and died on the cross. He was buried, rose from the dead and ascended into heaven to be with the Father, from whence he shall return. He is eternal Savior and Mediator, who intercedes for us, and by him all men will be judged.

ARTICLE III.—THE HOLY SPIRIT

We believe in the Holy Spirit who proceeds from and is one in being with the Father and the Son. He convinces the world of sin, of righteousness and of judgment. He leads men through faithful response to the gospel into the fellowship of the church. He comforts, sustains and empowers the faithful and guides them into all truth.

ARTICLE IV.—THE HOLY BIBLE

We believe the Holy Bible, Old and New Testaments, reveals the Word of God so far as it is necessary for our salvation. It is to be received through the Holy Spirit as the true rule and guide for faith and practice. Whatever is not revealed in or established by the Holy Scriptures is not to be made an article of faith nor is it to be taught as essential to salvation.

ARTICLE V.—THE CHURCH

We believe the Christian church is the community of all true believers under the Lordship of Christ. We believe it is one, holy, apostolic and catholic. It is the redemptive fellowship in which the Word of God is preached by men divinely called, and the sacraments are duly administered according to Christ's own appointment. Under the discipline of the Holy Spirit the church exists for the maintenance of worship, the edification of believers and the redemption of the world.

ARTICLE VI.—THE SACRAMENTS

We believe the sacraments, ordained by Christ, are symbols and pledges of the Christian's profession and of God's love toward us. They are means of grace by which God works invisibly in us, quickening, strengthening and confirming our faith in him. Two sacraments are ordained by Christ our Lord, namely, Baptism and the Lord's Supper.

We believe Baptism signifies entrance into the household of faith, and is a symbol of repentance and inner cleansing from sin, a representation of the new birth in Christ Jesus and a mark of Christian discipleship.

We believe children are under the atonement of Christ and as heirs of the Kingdom of God are acceptable subjects for Christian baptism. Children of believing parents through baptism become the special responsibility of the Church. They should be nurtured and led to personal acceptance of Christ, and by profession of faith confirm their baptism.

We believe the Lord's Supper is a representation of our redemption, a memorial of the sufferings and death of Christ, and a token of love and union which Christians have with Christ and with one another. Those who rightly, worthily and in faith eat the broken bread and drink the blessed cup partake of the body and blood of Christ in a spiritual manner until he comes.

ARTICLE VII.—SIN AND FREE WILL

We believe man is fallen from righteousness and, apart from the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, is destitute of holiness and inclined to evil. Except a man be born again, he cannot see the Kingdom of God. In his own strength, without divine grace, man cannot do good works pleasing and acceptable to God. We believe, however, man influenced and empowered by the Holy Spirit is responsible in freedom to exercise his will for good.

ARTICLE VIII.—RECONCILIATION THROUGH CHRIST

We believe God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself. The offering Christ freely made on the cross is the perfect and sufficient sacrifice for the sins of the whole world, redeeming man from all sin, so that no other satisfaction is required.

ARTICLE IX.—JUSTIFICATION AND REGENERATION

We believe we are never accounted righteous before God through our works or merit, but that penitent sinners are justified or accounted righteous before God only by faith in our Lord Jesus Christ.

We believe regeneration is the renewal of man in righteousness through Jesus Christ, by the power of the Holy Spirit, whereby we are made partakers of the divine nature and experience newness of life. By this new birth the believer becomes reconciled to God and is enabled to serve him with the will and the affections.

We believe, although we have experienced regeneration, it is possible to depart from grace and fall into sin; and we may even then, by the grace of God, be renewed in righteousness.

ARTICLE X.—GOOD WORKS

We believe good works are the necessary fruits of faith and follow regeneration but they do not have the virtue to remove our sins or to avert divine judgment. We believe good works, pleasing and acceptable to God in Christ, spring from a true and living faith, for through and by them faith is made evident.

ARTICLE XI.—SANCTIFICATION AND CHRISTIAN PERFECTION

We believe sanctification is the work of God's grace through the Word and the Spirit, by which those who have been born again are cleansed from sin in their thoughts, words and acts, and are enabled to live in accordance with God's will, and to strive for holiness without which no one will see the Lord.

Entire sanctification is a state of perfect love, righteousness and true holiness which every regenerate believer may obtain by being delivered from the power of sin, by loving God with all the heart, soul, mind and strength, and by loving one's neighbor as one's self. Through faith in Jesus Christ this gracious gift may be received in this life both gradually and instantaneously, and should be sought earnestly by every child of God.

We believe this experience does not deliver us from the infirmities, ignorance and mistakes common to man, nor from the possibilities of further sin. The Christian must continue on guard against spiritual pride and seek to gain victory over every temptation to sin. He must respond wholly to the will of God so that sin will lose its power over him; and the world, the flesh and the devil are put under his feet. Thus he rules over these enemies with watchfulness through the power of the Holy Spirit.

ARTICLE XII.—THE JUDGMENT AND THE FUTURE STATE

We believe all men stand under the righteous judgment of Jesus Christ, both now and in the last day. We believe in the resurrection of the dead; the righteous to life eternal and the wicked to endless condemnation.

ARTICLE XIII.—PUBLIC WORSHIP

We believe divine worship is the duty and privilege of man who, in the presence of God, bows in adoration, humility and dedication. We believe divine worship is essential to the life of the church, and that the assembling of the people of God for such worship is necessary to Christian fellowship and spiritual growth.

We believe the order of public worship need not be the same in all places but may be modified by the church according to circumstances and the needs of men. It should be in a language and form understood by the people, consistent with the Holy Scriptures to the edification of all, and in accordance with the order and DISCIPLINE of the church.

ARTICLE XIV.—THE LORD'S DAY

We believe the Lord's Day is divinely ordained for private and public worship, for rest from unnecessary work, and should be devoted to spiritual improvement, Christian fellowship and service. It is commemorative of our Lord's resurrection and is an emblem of our eternal rest. It is essential to the permanence and growth of the Christian church, and important to the welfare of the civil community.

ARTICLE XV.—THE CHRISTIAN AND PROPERTY

We believe God is the owner of all things and that the individual holding of property is lawful and is a sacred trust under God. Private property is to be used for the manifestation of Christian love and liberality, and to support the church's mission in the world. All forms of property, whether private, corporate or public, are to be held in solemn trust and used responsibly for human good under the sovereignty of God.

ARTICLE XVI.—CIVIL GOVERNMENT

We believe civil government derives its just powers from the sovereign God. As Christians we recognize the governments under whose protection we reside and believe such governments should be based on, and be responsible for, the recognition of human rights under God. We believe war and bloodshed are contrary to the gospel and spirit of Christ. We believe it is the duty of Christian citizens to give moral strength and purpose to their respective governments through sober, righteous and godly living.

Restrictive Rule Number II protects this Confession of Faith from any GENERAL CONFERENCE action contravening it.

CONFIRMATION. (See MEMBERSHIP IN METHODIST CHURCHES.)

CONGO. The Democratic Republic of the Congo, former Belgian colony and United Nations member since 1960, is the largest country in Central Africa. The capital is Kinshasa, formerly Leopoldville. It is not to be confused with an adjacent country of the same name, west of Congo and Ubangi Rivers, former French colony and United Nations member since 1958, whose capital is Brazzaville. The area is 905,380 square miles; the population is 13,984,000. The contour resembles a quadrangle, with two stubby extensions.

Mining excavations reveal an extensive stone age, but long blank centuries intervene between that prehistory and 1482-83 when Diego Cao (Cam), Portuguese navigator, discovered the Congo estuary. No serious attempt at exploration was made until the late 1800's. The names of Livingstone, de Brazza, and Stanley are linked together in the decade 1871-81, when the course of the Congo was mapped, and its relationship proved to the south-north Rift Valley of the Lakes Tanganyika, Kivu, Edward and Albert whence the White Nile flows to Egypt and the Mediterranean.

In September 1876, Leopold II of Belgium, summoned a convention of geographers and philanthropists "to discuss the exploration and civilization of Africa, and the measures to be adopted to end the scourge of the slave trade." By 1884 the fever for annexation of African territory had reached a peak, and a conference of European nations met at Berlin, winter 1884-85, to consider the international problem. On Leopold's initiative, and to keep Congo free of the intense rivalries of the Powers, an independent government was established—"L'Etat Independent du Congo." Leopold was designated the titular ruler. However, by the turn of the century, corruption and oppressive measures had gripped the administration; and in 1908 Belgium was compelled to accept responsibility for the control of Congo as a colony. Government reforms were instituted, and the humanitarian principles of Leopold were honored.

Considering size and population, Belgium suffered as great economic and manpower losses in World Wars I and II as did any occupied country. Yet the affairs of Congo were conducted without interruption or undue hardship to the people. Africa's post-war surge for freedom profoundly affected Congo. Across the 1950's Belgium planned with leaders of all groups, so that in 1960 independence was achieved and the Republic of the Congo (Belgian) entered the United Nations.

Insatiate jealousy between rival native political leaders, fomented by certain European powers, and the outbreak of ancient tribal hatreds, plunged the new nations into bloodshed, rapine, and financial catastrophe. Only the entry of the United Nations produced a measure of governmental stability, and a hope for peace and order. However, the assassination of Patrice Lumumba; the inexplicable death of Dag Hammarskjold, Secretary General of the U.N., and all his helpers in an air disaster near Ndola, Zambia, while en route to a crucial conference in Katanga; the refusal of several influential member-nations of the U.N. to make any payment on their proper charges for the U.N. Congo Operation; the intransigent secession of Moise Tshombe of Katanga from the recognized central government of all Congo, conspired to carry Congo into 1963 as a major source of world tension.

Tshombe escaped to Europe after the defeat of his troops by the U.N. force that restored order in Katanga. Late in 1964 he returned to Congo, to become Premier of the central government with Joseph Kasabuvu as President. A bloody revolt in northeastern sector was finally liquidated, 1964-65, during which time Methodist work suffered great loss in personnel and property. Several national church leaders were killed, and one American Methodist missionary, Burleigh Law, was shot while trying to rescue five other missionaries and their families held as hostages. This group was later released after having repeatedly faced firing squads of rebels.

Methodist penetration into Congo began in 1885 as Bishop WILLIAM TAYLOR projected one of his "self-supporting missions." Progress was made up the river, several stations being established between the sea and Stanley Pool where Kinshasa now stands. There were heroes in the group: William R. Summers who pushed far inland to the Baluba country; J. C. Teter and Mary Lindsay, his wife, at Vivi; Mary Kildare, who carried on alone for several years at Natumba. Among them were William and Helen Rasmussen. He was stricken fatally on the field. Later their child also died. The sorrows did not quench the flame of devotion, and Helen Rasmussen went back in 1901 as a WFMS missionary to Rhodesia. She was destined soon to return to Congo for many years of unexampled service. The insidious diseases that plagued west and central Africa; the inadequate qualifications of some enthusiasts; the constant problem of maintaining religious and educational work while struggling to secure local support—so hampered the work that early gains were lost. When Bishop J. C. HARTZELL succeeded Taylor a decade later, he found only a tiny remnant in people, property and missionary personnel. The small units were transferred to other missions, and Methodist work disappeared from Congo for at least 15 years.

In 1901 JOHN M. SPRINGER went to Rhodesia as a missionary of the M. E. Church. He and Helen Rasmussen were married in 1905, continuing to serve in Rhodesia, but with deepening conviction that their work lay in the heart of Congo. Furlough in 1907 found them starting the first of the dozen long treks that would take them crisscross over central Africa. Bishop HARTZELL wrote: "Since their marriage in 1905 (they) have been one in a rare union of endeavor, devoted to exploration and missionary pioneering. Probably no other persons have touched Livingstone's trail at so many and so widely separated points as they." The 1907 furlough saw a journey from Old Umtali, deep southeast in Southern Rhodesia (less than 200 miles from Africa's east coast), through Zambia into Congo to Kambove (Jadotville), thence westward through Dilolo across Angola to the Atlantic. At home until 1909, they secured sufficient funds and pledges to permit the Board of Foreign Missions to organize work in the Lunda country, an area as large as Michigan, Illinois and Indiana, where there was no Protestant mission. Bishop Hartzell appointed the Springers to open this field. They established the first station at Lukoshi in 1911. The present centers in the Lunda area are Kapanga and Sandoa.

In January 1915 Bishop Hartzell organized the Congo Mission of the M. E. Church for Katanga province. The work has grown in significance as the developing mining industry brought thousands of laborers into the area. The "Union Miniere de Haute Katanga" and its allied interests have extended many courtesies to the mission. Lubumbashi, provincial capital, is a major Methodist station, which with Jadotville and Kolwezi constitute the working and administrative centers of province and industry. These towns are focal points of the SOUTHERN CONGO ANNUAL CONFERENCE. The Conference has 26,500 members served by over 100 native ministers and supply pastors, together with missionaries from the World Division. Medical work was pioneered by Dr. and Mrs. Arthur Piper who gave over forty years service to Congo. Institutions are: Pfeiffer Memorial Center, Lumbumbashi; Springer Institute, Mulungwishi; Piper Memorial Hospital, Kapanga; Leprosy Camp, Kapanga; Agricultural Center, Sandoa.

Also in 1911 the Congo Mission of the M. E. Church, South was established by Bishop WALTER R. LAMBUTH in Kasai and Kivu provinces, north of Katanga. It now comprises the CENTRAL CONGO ANNUAL CONFERENCE. High plateaus, open grassland and dense forests cover the 35,000 square miles. This is the only Protestant mission serving the important Otatela tribe of over 250,000. Evangelistic and educational work is organized to meet people in small villages and "the bush." Agriculture and kindred occupations are stressed in industrial training schools. The Agricultural Aids Foundation, a nonprofit organization of the SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA-ARIZONA ANNUAL CONFERENCE, provides valuable assistance. Medical work, including an unusual traveling dental service, moves out from several hospitals and dispensary centers. Membership totals 34,832. Since 1960 the native church of this Conference has met the support of the 378 pastors of all grades. Institutions are: High school for missionary children, Lubundi; Hospital and Nurse Training School, Minga; Lewis Memorial Hospital, Tunda (named for Dr. and Mrs. W. B. LEWIS who gave over thirty years' service); Lambuth Memorial Hospital, Wembo Nyama, first station and chief town of the Otatela.

The 1964 AFRICA CENTRAL CONFERENCE elected JOHN WESLEY SHUNGU bishop for the two annual conferences in Congo. He is a graduate of the Methodist Theological School in Congo, studied in Southern Rhodesia, had been superintendent of the Wembo Nyama District, and a member of the 1956 General Conference. He is facile in English, French, and several African dialects. Bishop Shungu had just previously rescued his wife and family at great personal risk.

Both conferences cooperate in the Congo Protestant Council, "a truly national Council of Churches." There is a Union Printing House and Bookstore at Kinshasa. The Congo Institute of Technology, assisted by the Aids Foundation, and Union Theological Seminary are at Lubumbashi.

Late in 1962 the FREE METHODIST CHURCH took over the work and property of the mission among the large Babembi tribe in eastern Kivu province, previously conducted by the Assemblies of God in Great Britain and Ireland. The centers are Nunda and Baraka, tribal towns situated in the northwestern littoral of Lake Tanganyika. The congregations are self-supporting, and contribute most of the school costs. There is a Bible training school as well as many primary schools, and a medical clinic building. The membership is 11,000 and 5,000 are enrolled in the schools. The administration is under the Free Methodist Conference organized in neighboring independent Rwanda and Burundi, whose headquarters is Usumbura, the capital of Burundi. A hospital is presently under construction.

The Union Theological Seminary, formerly at Lubumbashi, is now part of the Universite Libre (Free University). It has been in Kinshasa, Luluabourg, and in Kinans Kisingani (formerly Stanleyville). The Congo Institute of Technology is at Sandoa. (See also Free Methodist Overseas Churches.)

The two Congo conferences, Central and Southern, are a part of the Africa Central Conference with ANGOLA, RHODESIA, and SOUTHEAST AFRICA CONFERENCES. The separate districts, and indeed conference organization of these bodies, has been in flux during recent years owing to the wars and disorganization in the Congo itself, and also to moves in connection with the union resulting in

The United Methodist Church in America. Conference alignments, districts, etc. may change in the near future, and it is impossible to attempt to delineate all of that here with any accuracy.

CONGREGATIONAL METHODIST CHURCH was formed by a group of laymen led by local preachers who withdrew from the GEORGIA CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church, South. The group met in the home of Mickleberry Merritt on May 8, 1852, and organized the new church. William Fambough was elected chairman. Hiram Phinazee was appointed to draw up a Book of Discipline which was approved and published soon afterward. Three main issues seemed to disturb those who withdrew from the parent body. They were concerned over the itinerant system, as then practiced, which was plagued with large circuits and weekday preaching to empty pews. Secondly, they were concerned over the lot of the local preacher who did most of the work with the congregations and received no credit. Finally, they disliked the government of the M. E. Church, South which deprived laymen of a voice in church business.

On Aug. 12, 1852 the first district conference was convened. Except for local church conferences, this was the first Methodist conference composed of more laymen than ministers, and the first body of Methodists whose total representation was by election of the total fellowship. By 1880 the church expanded to include conferences in six states and work in several surrounding ones, with a total membership of approximately 6,000.

The Congregational Methodist Church is conservative in theology. Its members are premillennialists; they believe in a literal "heaven" and "hell" and use only the King James Version of the Bible. The addition of Articles of Religion on regeneration and sanctification led a dissident group to form the FIRST CONGREGATIONAL METHODIST CHURCH of the UNITED STATES of AMERICA in 1941. In 1957, these two articles, plus ones on tithing, eternal retribution, and the resurrection of the dead, were adopted.

The publishing board of the church has charge of the Messenger Press which publishes the church school literature and the Congregational Methodist Messenger, a weekly periodical. In 1953, Westminster College and Bible Institute at Texarkana, Texas, was established. A mission program in cooperation with World Gospel Mission has missionaries in Africa and South America and among American Indians.

In 1961, the denomination reported 14,879 members in 242 churches and ten conferences.

CONGREGATIONAL METHODISTS (British). In Scotland the Methodists at Paisley erected their first chapel at 12 George Street in 1810. In 1834, when the membership was almost three hundred, a difference of opinion led to the secession of half its members. By 1836 the seceders were worshipping at 5 Sir Michael Street, under the leadership of C. J. Kennedy as their "minister," and were described in the Paisley Directory as "Dissenting Wesleyan Methodists." In 1838—now describing themselves as "United Methodists"—they moved to 7 Oakshaw Street; and in 1844, having changed their name locally to Congregational Methodists, they worshiped in 2 New Street. Meanwhile the Wesleyan congregation in George Street had been unable to keep up the payments on its chapel, and in 1850 Kennedy personally bought it at auction and moved his group there. Kennedy attended the assemblies of the WESLEYAN METHODIST ASSOCIATION and with his congregation was listed in its Minutes from 1836 on. At his death in 1854 the George Street chapel was sold by his executor, but his group seems to have survived for a few years, disappearing from the Minutes of the successor UNITED METHODIST FREE CHURCHES only in 1859.

There is no connection between this Scottish group and the Congregational Methodists in the United States, who withdrew from the M. E. Church, South in 1852.

CONNECTICUT, U.S.A., one of the thirteen original states, is in New England. Its population in 1970 was 2,987,950. The first permanent settlement was in 1635, the colonists coming from MASSACHUSETTS. As Puritans the settlers sought to identify their religious organization with civil institutions of the colony. No person could vote or hold office unless he was a member of the state church. The severity of Connecticut's "blue laws" in the early years is proverbial.

GEORGE WHITEFIELD met opposition in Connecticut in 1745 as he began preaching the need for conversion and experimental religion. JESSE LEE first preached at Norwalk in the home of Absalom Day on June 17, 1789. At Stratford, on Sept. 29, 1789, Lee organized the first Methodist society in the state. Other Methodist itinerants, such as Cornelius Cook, FREEBORN GARRETTSON, and LORENZO DOW, had preceded Lee in Connecticut, but none of them organized classes or congregations. In the face of disapproval and opposition, Lee worked in southern and eastern Connecticut. He organized Methodist groups in Reading, Stamford, Round Hill, Fairfield, New Haven, Hartford, Canaan, Litchfield, Bridgeport, Milford, Danbury, Long Ridge, Ridgefield, Sharon, Manchester, and Square Pond (Crystal Lake).

Bishop ASBURY traveled through Connecticut almost every year from 1791 to 1813. At Tolland, on Aug. 11, 1793, he conducted the second conference to be held in New England. In that conference GEORGE ROBERTS was appointed PRESIDING ELDER in charge of all Methodist work in Connecticut. Asbury held the conference at New London on July 15, 1795, and in West Thompson on Sept. 19, 1796.

The first Methodist parsonage in Connecticut, and possibly in New England, was built at Square Pond in 1795. The first CAMP MEETING was held at Sharon in 1805. Another was conducted at Square Pond in 1806. The Willimantic Camp Meeting began in 1860; and as late as 1966 it was still functioning.

The Methodists launched WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY at Middletown in 1831, being the first permanent Methodist college in America to open for students, although RANDOLPH-MACON in Virginia was the first to be chartered (1830). WILBUR FISK, one of the ablest men in the church, was the first president of Wesleyan. Unfortunately Wesleyan was lost to the church; after 1930 the conference no longer appointed trustees to the institution.

For some years after 1784, the conferences of the preachers conducted by Bishop Asbury were small gatherings. Gradually the numerous small conferences were merged into six regular annual conferences, boundaries of which were first formally fixed by the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1796. One of the six was the NEW ENGLAND CONFERENCE. Connecticut and NEW YORK, as well as the other states of the region, were included in the New England Conference.

In 1800 the western half of Connecticut was assigned to the NEW YORK CONFERENCE which was formed by dividing the New England Conference. In 1841 the New England Conference was again divided to form the PROVIDENCE CONFERENCE. The latter included part of Massachusetts, the eastern part of Connecticut, and, as its name indicates, RHODE ISLAND. The eastern Connecticut work constituted the New London District of the Providence Conference. In 1880 the NEW ENGLAND SOUTHERN CONFERENCE superseded the Providence Conference. The New London District became the Norwich District in 1869, and it continued under that name until 1966 when it became the Connecticut East District.

In 1849 the NEW YORK EAST CONFERENCE was formed by dividing the New York Conference. The work in western Connecticut then became the New Haven District in the new conference. In 1964 the New York East Conference was absorbed by the New York Conference; and at that time the New Haven District was divided to form the Connecticut West and the Connecticut East Districts.

In 1967 the Connecticut East District of the New England Southern Conference had thirty-six pastoral charges, 12,022 church members, and property valued at $7,709,904. The two Connecticut districts in the New York Conference had a total of 106 pastoral charges, 44,335 church members, and property valued at $35,346,844.

CONNECTION is the term generally applied to the entire organization of the Methodist Church. It was first used in Britain by JOHN WESLEY, who spoke of preachers being "in connexion" (his spelling) with him, and the term came to be expanded to the entire Methodist organizational life as it grew. Methodists often affirm that they are a "connectional church" in contradistinction to the more loosely organized bodies such as the Congregational or Baptist Churches.

During the first years of the organization of the M. E. Church in America, the church itself was often referred to as "the connection," which term was something of a holdover from the days of societal organization before the church itself formed. In 1816, however, the GENERAL CONFERENCE ordered that the term connection in all places in the Discipline be replaced by "church," "community," or "itinerancy," as the case might require. This was due evidently to a feeling that churchly status required such a change. The term connection, however, does remain in general use over Methodism and is clearly understood.

Article IV of Section 1, Division 2 of the Constitution of The United Methodist Church states: "The General Conference shall have full legislative power over all matters distinctively connectional. . . ." and then there follow certain specific authorizations having to do with admittedly connectional matters. Several decisions of the JUDICIAL COUNCIL have been based upon the outreach and authority of the connectional pattern which must cover the whole Church. In Methodism no member local church or conference lives to itself. Touch one and you touch all. "All for each and each for all" is the essence of connectionalism.

CONNER, BENJAMIN COULBOURN (1850-1921), American minister and educator, was born of Scotch-Irish descent in Marion, Somerset Co., Md., on Jan. 5, 1850. He attended Dickinson Seminary, Williamsport, Pa., graduating in 1873. He enrolled at WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, Middletown, Conn., where he was graduated with Phi Beta Kappa honors in 1876. He received his M.A. degree there the following year, and in 1910 his Alma Mater honored him with the D.D. degree. He became a member of the CENTRAL PENNSYLVANIA ANNUAL CONFERENCE in 1878 and remained a member until his death forty-three years later.

His career began as a teacher of the Natural Sciences at Dickinson Seminary. After four years as a teacher, he accepted a pastoral appointment in the annual conference where he served as pastor and district superintendent.

In 1912 he returned to the campus of Dickinson Seminary as President, a position which he held for nine years. Though sixty-three years old when elected to this office, he brought a vigorous and dedicated leadership to the school.

He was a member of the General Conference of the M. E. Church in 1900, 1908, and 1912. For many years he was one of the Managers of the Board of Foreign Missions of his church.

He was married in 1877 to Bettie S. Tyler of Onancock, Va. They were the parents of four children—three girls and a boy.

He died Aug. 18, 1921, and is buried in the Wildwood Cemetery, Williamsport, Pa.

CONNEXION, FULL (British). The term goes back to the eighteenth century, when a man whom JOHN WESLEY accepted as a traveling preacher was first admitted "on trial"; after a probation of varying length he was then admitted "into Full Connexion." A preacher in "Full Connexion" was, therefore, a man in full standing as an itinerant; and between John Wesley's death in 1791 and 1836 the ceremony of admission, which took place at the annual Conference, was regarded by the itinerants as "virtual ordination." In 1836, however, the service of ordination by the imposition of hands was introduced into the Wesleyan connection; this would have been the logical moment to drop the ceremony of admission into Full Connexion; but in practice it was retained, usually taking place before the ordination services themselves. The custom survived in the Wesleyan connection down to Methodist UNION in Britain in 1932, when it passed over into the new united church. It is therefore possible to say that in modern Methodism "the act of making a man a minister is performed by the Methodist Conference, by its standing vote in the Reception into Full Connexion, and through its appointed representatives in the Ordination Service." At the present time the service of ordination precedes the ceremony of reception into Full Connexion.

Full Connection (American). In conferences of the American Methodist bodies much the same procedure is followed as is outlined above. In The United Methodist Church the requirement that a man be voted ELDER's orders, or be ordained an elder, usually accompanies his admission into full connection.

CONNEXIONAL EDITOR, British Methodist. The Rules of the Wesleyan Book Committee seem to have been first codified at the Conference of 1806. An editor is already mentioned; he had general charge of the literary side of the Book Room and especial charge of the magazine. In the nineteenth century there was a good deal of disagreement about how long a minister should hold office as editor, and terms varied greatly, e.g.: JOSEPH BENSON (1804-20), JABEZ BUNTING (1821-23), and THOMAS JACKSON (1824-37 and 1839-41). Between 1849 and 1872 there were frequently two editors, but from 1872-93 BENJAMIN GREGORY reigned supreme. In 1904 the Wesleyan Conference said that the Editor shall be responsible for all the publications of the Book Room theological and otherwise, and shall have care of the literary work of the House generally. He shall himself select readers of the manuscripts, who shall present their reports to him. The final decision as to publication shall in every case rest with the Board of Management.

The METHODIST NEW CONNEXION had an editor from 1797; HUGH BOURNE was the first PRIMITIVE METHODIST editor (1819-42); the BIBLE CHRISTIAN first editor was WILLIAM O'BRYAN himself (1822-28), who was followed by JAMES THORNE (1828-69); the WESLEYAN ASSOCIATION appointed an editor in 1838. There have been five editors since Methodist Union in 1932. Gordon Wakefield was appointed editor in 1963.

CONNEXIONAL FIRE INSURANCE FUND, New Zealand, made a humble beginning in 1899. The enterprise was launched without capital and in reliance entirely upon personal guarantees to pay on demand such sums as might be required for fire losses. Not one penny of guaranteed money was ever called up, and ultimately all guarantees were cancelled. Reinsurance of risks has from the start been effected on a selective basis.

When the stability of the fund was assured through its reserves, the fund began to make grants to connexional institutions and departments. More recently the reinsuring company has entered into a ten-year agreement carrying the full insurance risk, so that by 1966, annual grants were being made at the rate of about £6,000 per year.

CONNEXIONAL FUNDS DEPARTMENT controls certain funds of the British Methodist Church. Each of the three Methodist denominations uniting in 1932 to form the present Methodist Church had an annuitant society for the benefit of its preachers and their widows. The names and dates of establishment of these funds were as follows: The Itinerant Preachers Annuitant Society (Wesleyan) was founded at the Bristol Conference of 1798. The PRIMITIVE METHODIST Itinerant Preachers Friendly Society was founded at the Primitive Methodist Conference in Leeds, 1823. The Annuitant Society of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH Superannuation and Beneficent Society was an amalgamation of three older annuitant funds authorized by the Conference of the United Methodist Church in 1910. The Methodist Ministers' Annuitant Society was established by the uniting Conference of the Methodist Church in 1932 and registered as a Friendly Society in 1934. Only the last of these four societies is still capable of receiving new members, but the three older societies are all in being and will presumably continue so until the death of the last of their members.

The Methodist Ministers' Retirement Fund was established in 1948 and registered under the Superannuation and Other Trust Funds (Validation Act, 1927). The fund is a contributory pension fund to which all ministers make a percentage contribution of their stipends, and to which the circuits employing them also contribute. Before METHODIST UNION in 1932 the three uniting denominations each had some pension arrangements which were auxiliary to the older annuitant funds, which were quite inadequate to make provision for ministers' retirement under modern conditions. Not all the churches concerned had made adequate provision for future pensions, and in one case at least the pensions were paid by annual assessment without any attempt to fund pensions in advance. As a result, the newly formed contributory fund in 1948 faced very great difficulties and in the 1960's is still carrying a very heavy deficiency with regard to contributions for its older members.

The Auxiliary Fund of the Ministers' Retirement Fund is a benevolent fund associated with the Pension Fund, and is mainly concerned with the older supernumerary ministers and ministers' widows who were unable to benefit from the National Insurance State Pension because of being overage in 1948. Supplementary allowances are paid from the fund, which is raised by voluntary contributions from individuals and trusts. The fund is also charged with the responsibility for early breakdowns in health and similar compassionate cases.

The Invalid Ministers' Rest Fund was a charity established in the former Wesleyan Methodist Church in 1879. By resolution of the Conference a sum of £3,000, part of a fund known as the Thanksgiving Fund, was set apart as an Invalid Minister's Rest Fund to be administered under the Conference. Further funds and properties have been acquired, and the charity at present holds houses which are available to Methodist ministers and their families for periods of recuperation and for holidays.

The Ministers' Children's Fund can claim to be the oldest of all the Connexional Funds of the Methodist Church. In 1756, at the thirteenth conference called by John Wesley, it was resolved "that a subscription for it [KINGSWOOD SCHOOL] be begun in every place and (if need be) a collection made every year." The first recorded collection was in 1765, the total amount being £100/9/7.

The Ministers' Children's Fund as at present was established in 1819. Throughout the nineteenth century and up to the date of Methodist Union, Kingswood School for ministers' sons, and Trinity Hall School for ministers' daughters were a main concern of the fund. Since Methodist Union, the Ministers' Children's Fund has undergone extensive modifications, but bursaries to ministers' children at Kingswood and Trinity Hall are still granted, as well as maintenance allowance to children educated at home. The fund is maintained by an annual grant from the General Assessment.

The Methodist Church Funds Act, 1960, provides for the establishment of investment and deposit funds in which the capital of a large number of Methodist charities may be pooled and invested in an unrestricted range of investment. This is done by the Central Finance Board, which is administered by a council.

CONNOR, JAMES MAYER (1863-1925), an American bishop of the A.M.E. Church, was born in Winston County, Miss., in 1863. He was the son of slave parents, William and Marie Connor. He was educated at SHORTER COLLEGE and the University of Chicago. MORRIS BROWN COLLEGE conferred the D.D. degree upon him. He was converted in 1881, licensed to preach in 1882, and admitted to the Mississippi Conference of his denomination in 1883. He was ordained deacon in 1884 and then elder.

In 1886 he married Glovenia L. Stewart. They had five children. He served as pastor and then became a PRESIDING ELDER in MISSISSIPPI and ARKANSAS. Elected to the episcopacy in 1912, he was assigned successively to the Mississippi and LOUISIANA Eighth Episcopal District (1912-16), the Arkansas and OKLAHOMA Twelfth District (1916-20), and the CANADA and Central America Fifteenth District (1920-24). He retired in 1924 and died in 1925. He was a member of the ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE in Toronto in 1911.

CONNOR, THOMAS JEFFERSON (1821-1898), American E.U.B. home missionary, was born April 6, 1821, near Colerain, Hamilton Co., Ohio. At thirteen he was converted and joined the Church of the United Brethren in Christ. In 1839 he was granted a license to preach and six years later he began work in the Indiana Conference of that church.

He was married to Phoebe N. Borden in 1838, and they began to plan for missionary service. Connor published an article in a church paper in which he volunteered for mission service and urged the opening of a mission in OREGON. The Mission Board soon thereafter invited him to attend its meeting. At a public service the audience raised enough money, and the Board appointed him as missionary to Oregon. A wagon train of ninety-eight United Brethren was formed and departed May 2, 1853 from Council Bluffs, Iowa, to establish a colony in Oregon. It arrived in the Willamette Valley, Sept. 26, 1853. Connor organized two districts of churches. When the Oregon Conference was organized in 1855, he became the presiding elder, serving until 1864.

Connor retired in 1874 and returned to Indiana. He died June 2, 1898, at Greensburg, Ind.

CONNOR, WILLIAM FRANCIS (1852-1937), American minister, was born in Salineville, Ohio, Dec. 10, 1852. He graduated from MOUNT UNION COLLEGE in 1872, and later received the D.D. and LL.D. degrees from that school. In 1874 he was admitted on trial in the PITTSBURGH CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church. His father, John Connor, was a member of that conference from 1859 to 1900. In 1876 "Frank" Connor married Mary E. Paxton of Canonsburg, Pa.

He served for eighteen consecutive years, 1906-24, as the district superintendent on three districts of the Pittsburgh Conference. He was a GENERAL CONFERENCE delegate in 1908, 1912, 1916, 1920, and 1924. From 1912 to 1932 he was a member of the Book Committee of the M. E. Church, serving seventeen years as its chairman.

Connor and his wife died within one day of each other, Dec. 27 and 28, 1937, and were buried in a double funeral service from Christ Church in Pittsburgh.

CONSECRATION is a word which means "to set apart for holy uses"—from the Latin consecratio or "making sacred together." In practical church life, consecration usually denominates the ceremony of dedicating persons or things to the service of God. In the Bible both persons and things were so devoted. Instances of vessels (Joshua 6:19); profits (Micah 4:13); fields (Leviticus 27, 28); cattle (II Chronicles 29, 33); individuals (Numbers 6:9-13); nations (Exodus 19:6)—all these were at times separated unto God's service. The word consecration is quite often used in a spiritual sense to mean a complete devotion to the service of God.

In the Ritual of the American Methodist Churches, there is an office for the Consecration of Churches. Such an act of consecration is provided for when new buildings are set apart by solemn and peculiar ceremonies for the exclusive use of God's worship and church life. In Methodist polity and practice a church building may not be dedicated until it is free of debt, and then it may be formally and completely turned over to God and for His service. As, however, it seems fitting that a building when first opened for service, should have some special ceremony connected with its beginning, a special office or form has been prepared within recent years "for the Opening or Consecrating of a Church Building." This office is an adaptation of the form for the dedication of a church, which has been in use for many years in the Ritual of Methodist Churches. A church not free of debt so that it may not be formally dedicated may now through this service be consecrated to God and His use in this particular formal manner.

Another significant use of the word consecration is in relation to the induction of bishops. The historic tradition of the Catholic Church has in general used the word ordination of presbyters or priests, and consecration of bishops. The distinction is not absolute, for both rites consist in admission to an order of ministry. Thus the Book of Common Prayer of the Church of England can speak of "The Form of Ordaining or Consecrating of a Bishop." Indeed, the Church universal, including the Roman Catholic Church, has never had an entirely clear doctrine as to whether there are two separate priestly orders, presbyters and bishops, or whether there is but one priestly order in which some ruling members, the bishops, have certain special authoritative functions in ordination and teaching. Nevertheless, it has been securely established in the custom of the Catholic Church from ancient times that the regular appointment of a bishop in the historic succession must be by the laying on of hands of three bishops already in the succession. This rite has been, and is, described by the distinctive title of the consecration of a bishop. Thus, the general Catholic use of the word consecration is clearly associated with the doctrine of the historic episcopal succession.

Of interest to Methodists are the words used by Wesley when he came to the appointment of THOMAS COKE to be the first "General Superintendent" of the Methodist Church in America. Wesley proceeded to the establishment of the polity of the Methodist Episcopal Church in this way on the following grounds: (a) The American Church should be "episcopal" in the sense that it should be a cohesive connexion governed by authority from above. It was not to be congregational in polity, with government in the hands of the local congregation. (b) This "episcopate," or office of government, was in New Testament times exercised by a ministry which was not divided into the ruling bishops and subordinate presbyters of later Church order (cf. Acts 20: 17, 28; Philippians 1: 1; 1 Timothy 3: 8, and Wesley's Notes on the same). Thus, as a presbyter (priest) in due succession of ordination, Wesley felt himself to be in the New Testament sense a bishop, hence, "scriptural episcopos" in the celebrated letter to his brother of August 19, 1785 (Letters vii 284), with a right, if necessary, to ordain other presbyters. It is to be noted that Wesley did not dismiss as a "fable" the idea of ministerial succession itself, but only the traditional claim that an uninterrupted succession of ruling bishops as distinct from presbyters went right back to the apostles themselves, and was ordained by the Lord. (c) Thus, when the separation of the new American nation made a new Church polity necessary, Wesley felt he could proceed to ordination, even though this was not in accord with the established ministerial order of his own Church of England.

The word he used is significant, and it speaks of the perplexity of this subject. In his published Journal, Wesley simply says that he "appointed" Dr. Coke. In the private diary he writes that he "ordained" him, which is a somewhat strange word, in view of the circumstance that Dr. Coke was already ordained. And in the celebrated Letters of Ordination he circumspectly says that he "set him apart" as "General Superintendent" (sources in Standard Journal, vii, pp. 15-16). The word Wesley significantly avoids is consecrate, presumably because this is the word associated with that traditional Catholic theology of orders which would have forbidden Wesley to ordain (for discussion see Proceedings of Wesley Historical Society, xxx, 162-67; xxxi, 18-19, 23-24, 65-70, 102-3, 147-48).

However, in America, where men naturally had less mind for Wesley's concern with the traditional and Anglican connotation of words, the "General Superintendents" were soon called "Bishops," and the word "consecration" has been used of their appointment. But as American Methodist Bishops are not, and do not claim to be, "Bishops" in the traditional Catholic sense, but are in fact "ruling elders," the word "consecrate" has had to be used in a new sense, not answering to the notion of the transmission of the historic episcopate. As British Methodism has not had bishops, the question of their consecration has never been discussed. However, it is significant that in the 1963 Report on the "Conversations" with the Church of England, regarding the establishment of an episcopally ordained ministry within British Methodism, the word consecrate is used of the projected episcopal appointments, and used presumably with a somewhat traditional sense (pp. 35, 54).

The office for the induction of a newly elected Bishop into the superintendency of the American Methodist Church is termed his "consecration" to this office, as distinct from "Ordination" which is the term used in the Ordinal of the Protestant Episcopal Church. In keeping with the long continued discussion and division in the Methodist Episcopal Churches as to the exact ecclesiastical status of Methodist episcopacy, the Church at length endeavored to set the matter at rest by carefully seeing that the office for the induction of Bishop should never be termed an "ordination," such as might involve the idea of a third order—which Methodism has never believed in—but, simply his consecration as an Elder to a particular and highly specialized type of administration. The time-honored office for the setting apart of a Bishop in Episcopal Methodism is almost exactly a replica of the like office in the Ordinal of the Church of England, and as edited by John Wesley and sent over to American Methodism it had the title "The Form of Ordaining of a Superintendent." In the Church of England it is the "Form of Ordaining or Consecrating of an Arch-Bishop or Bishop." The Methodist Episcopal General Conference of 1792 made this "Form of Ordaining a Bishop," but in the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1864 the title was made "Form of Consecrating Bishops"; and in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, the "Form of Consecrating a Bishop" in 1870. Since that date, repeated speeches on the floor of the General Conference and alterations in the rubric, have made clear that this service is not to be thought of as an ordination—an induction into an order—in any respect, but only as a consecration. The office, however, does call for the Methodist Bishop who is being consecrated to respond to the same questions which have always been asked of the Bishop when he is consecrated in the Church of England, and in the Protestant Episcopal Church, and for his response to give the time-honored answers.

Special days were always, in earlier times, set apart for the consecration of churches; and in the Church of England the consecration of the Bishop has always been called for upon some Sunday or Holy Day. Eusebius, the early Church historian, gives an account of the consecration of the church at Jerusalem built by Constantine, A.D. 335. This solemnity began with an oration or sermon, followed by prayers, in which there was one especially for the dedication. The day of consecration was usually observed by the Church among its annual festivals.

In the Church of Rome, the consecration services are performed by a Bishop in his pontifical vestments, and are accompanied by processions and ceremonies. In Methodist Churches, the form of dedication or consecration is prepared for use by any minister who may officiate. Frequently the Bishop, if he can be secured, or the District Superintendent, is called upon to officiate upon such ceremonial occasions. British Methodism has no recognized order for the consecration of a church, though prayers are often said in dedication. Nor has the Prayer-book of the Church of England any Office for the consecration of a church or burial ground (as Wesley was quick to point out when his preaching-houses were objected to as "unconsecrated"), but the Church of England in point of fact always has a service of consecration, presided over by the Bishop of the diocese, or by his Suffragan. CONSTITUTION OF AMERICAN METHODISM. What was long regarded as the constitution of the Methodist Episcopal Church was written by Bishop JOSHUA SOULE (at the age of twenty-six) and adopted by the GENERAL CONFERENCE in 1808. It prevailed, with minor changes, until 1900.

The General Conference of 1808 at BALTIMORE represented total American Methodism, and at first was a mass meeting of all the preachers who had served four years. The two conferences adjacent to Baltimore had sixty-three of the 129 members and in whatever city the conference was held, the preachers nearby made up the bulk of the membership. This persistent inequality of representation led to a demand for a delegated body in which all conferences should have proportionate membership. The General Conference, until then, had absolute power. It was competent by a simple majority vote to repeal the ARTICLES OF RELIGION, discard the GENERAL RULES, abolish the EPISCOPACY, or do anything else.

Acting on a memorial, the General Conference of 1808 named a committee of two persons from each annual conference "to draw up such regulations as they might think best, to regulate the acts of General Conferences." Among the fourteen men were EZEKIEL COOPER, JOSHUA SOULE, WILLIAM MCKENDREE, JESSE LEE, NELSON REED, WILLIAM PHOEBUS, THOMAS WARE, PHILIP BRUCE, and other stalwarts whose names are well known in Methodist history. Cooper, Soule, and Bruce were each asked to draw up a separate paper, and the first two did so. That of Joshua Soule was finally adopted.

The resolution, later embodied in and published as a series of paragraphs in all successive Disciplines, was not called a Constitution until 1892; but all subsequent General Conferences were bound by it and it, with the enabling paragraphs, was generally accepted as the Constitution of the Church. The instrument as adopted on Tuesday, May 24, 1808, and printed in the Discipline of that year was as follows:

Ques. 2. Who shall compose the general conference, and what are the regulations and powers belonging to it.

Answer. 1. The general conference shall be composed of one member for every five members of each annual conference, to be appointed either by seniority or choice, at the discretion of such annual conference: Yet so that such representatives shall have travelled at least four full calendar years from the time that they were received on trial by an annual conference, and are in full connection at the time of holding the conference.

2. The general conference shall meet on the first day of May, in the year of our Lord 1812, in the city of New York, and thenceforward on the first day of May, once in four years perpetually, in such place or places as shall be fixed on by the general conference from time to time: But the general Superintendents, with or by the advice of all the annual conferences, or if there be no general Superintendent, all the annual conferences respectively, shall have power to call a general conference, if they judge it necessary, at any time.

3. At all times when the general conference is met, it shall take two-thirds of the representatives of all the annual conferences to make a quorum for transacting business.

4. One of the general Superintendents shall preside in the general conference; but in case no general Superintendent be present, the general conference shall choose a president pro tempore.

5. The general conference shall have full powers to make rules and regulations for our church, under the following limitations and restrictions, viz.,

1. The general conference shall not revoke, alter, or change our articles of religion, nor establish any new standards or rules of doctrine contrary to our present existing and established standards of doctrine.

2. They shall not allow of more than one representative for every five members of the annual conference, nor allow of a less number than one for every seven.

3. They shall not change or alter any part or rule of our government, so as to do away Episcopacy or destroy the plan of our itinerant general superintendency.

4. They shall not revoke or change the general rules of the United Societies.

5. They shall not do away the privileges of our ministers or preachers of trial by a committee, and of an appeal: Neither shall they do away the privileges of our members of trial before the society or by a committee, and of an appeal.

6. They shall not appropriate the produce of the Book Concern, or of the Charter Fund, to any purpose other than for the benefit of the travelling, superannuated, superannuated and wornout preachers, their wives, widows, and children. Provided, nevertheless, that upon the joint recommendation of all the annual conferences, then a majority of two-thirds of the general conference succeeding, shall suffice to alter any of the above restrictions.

These above six "restrictions" became known thenceforth as the Restrictive Rules and have had enormous effect in the development of American Methodism.

As indicated above, while the power of the General Conference was clear and the Rules were clear, there was enough uncertainty about the exact matter of a constitution in episcopal Methodism during the entire nineteenth century to cause what one authority once termed "spirited discussions." The word constitution was used somewhat loosely by the early Methodist fathers, but it seems agreed from the study of such authorities as Bishops Joshua Soule, S. M. MERRILL, T. B. NEELY, J. J. TIGERT and COLLINS DENNY that the whole section of the Discipline creating and setting up the General Conference, as well as the restrictions and provisos relating to the amending of those restrictions, was truly constitutional and could be amended only by the due process therein provided. Debating this matter in the 1892 General Conference of the M. E. Church, it was decided by the adoption of what was called the "Goucher substitute," that the constitution of the church was in essence the section of the Discipline of 1808 "together with such modifications as have been adopted since that time, in accordance with the provisions for amendment in that section." (Journal, 1892, pp. 206, 228.)

Historians have pointed out that since there was no authority to settle just what was constitutional and what was not, trouble came about in 1820 when Joshua Soule refused to be consecrated a bishop since he believed the General Conference had done an unconstitutional thing with reference to the elective presiding eldership; and also that the great division of 1844 came about when the majority of the General Conference—the northern anti-slaverymen—took an action which they affirmed to be constitutional, but which the southern delegation said was not. All this added to what may be termed constitutional confusion. So in 1900 when the M. E. Church adopted, by constitutional process, a rather brief but well-integrated constitution, this was frankly termed the Constitution of the M. E. Church—though the alterations in this were not too many from the old constitutional fundamentals. After being referred to the annual conferences for their adoption, this constitution of 1900 was adopted. It appeared first in the Discipline of 1900, and remained unaltered until 1939 when the Plan of Union, or constitution of The Methodist Church, was adopted by all three churches then uniting.

The M. E. Church, South, in its General Conference of 1930, considered a proposed constitution for adoption. The document, however, failed to get the necessary two-thirds majority. This constitution, nevertheless, did have in it a section creating a JUDICIAL COUNCIL which, apart from bishops or General Conferences, would have power to interpret Methodist constitutional law. The effort to adopt the proposal having failed, the Judicial Council feature was taken out of it and sent down to the annual conferences as a separate item; and these in due time adopted it and created a Judicial Council. Thus a Judicial Council was set up in the M. E. Church, South just prior to Union in 1939. The Judicial Council feature was in time carried over into the Plan of Union of The Methodist Church, which was itself frankly termed the Constitution of The Methodist Church, and in 1968 went into the constitution of The United Methodist Church.

The M. P. Church began with a written constitution. The Discipline of that church was always entitled The Constitution and Discipline of the Methodist Protestant Church. This was amended from time to time by well-stated processes, the most important change being that of 1920 when an executive committee for the church was created, which committee exercised many of the powers of the General Conference ad interim.

The constitution of The Methodist Church, as adopted in 1939, was destined to last until 1968, when a new constitution was adopted by The Methodist Church and the E.U.B. Church then uniting to form the present constitution of The United Methodist Church.

This was accomplished first by affirmative General Conference action at sessions of the respective General Conferences held in Chicago in November, 1966, and then by subsequent action of the Annual Conferences of both Churches approving the proposed constitution which had been adopted by their General Conferences. The Constitution of The United Methodist Church—as it became—was in general that of The Methodist Church, except in minor particulars. It does contain and holds as constitutional matter, two separate and parallel sections dealing with doctrine. One of these is the ARTICLES OF RELIGION of The Methodist Church; the other the CONFESSIO OF FAITH of the former E.U.B. Church. The new Constitution also gave to the E.U.B. connection the right to have double representation for some twelve years in the various Conferences and bodies of The United Methodist Church of which they are now components. This was to protect to some degree the minority status of the E.U.B. connection.

The Constitution of the new Church will be found in the Discipline of 1968 and is under the same protection by the Restrictive Rules as against General Conference action, as was the Constitution of The Methodist Church. Indeed, two Restrictive Rules have been added to cover the E.U.B. doctrinal statement and the minority status of the E.U.B.'s.

No word or line in the Constitution of The United Methodist Church as formally adopted can be altered except by constitutional processes. Such processes—certainly in the past history of The Methodist Church—have occurred a number of times. Indeed, twelve constitutional amendments were duly adopted in The Methodist Church from 1939 until 1968. As the PLAN OF UNION of The United Methodist Church declares itself to be the Constitution of the Church and is published as such, there can never again be any uncertainty on this point as was the case in the nineteenth century. However, the Judicial Council of The United Methodist Church, as was the case in The Methodist Church, has the responsibility for finally determining what is or what is not constitutional.

CONVENTICLE ACT was an Act of the British Parliament passed in 1664, in the reign of Charles II, which made it illegal for more than five people to meet in private houses or elsewhere for worship other than that laid down in the Anglican Book of Common Prayer. The Act, which was altered slightly in 1670, was part of the machinery set up by Lord Clarendon, Charles II's great Chancellor, in the effort to suppress the Puritans. JOHN WESLEY'S Puritan ancestors suffered under this machinery.

The Conventicle Act was repealed in the Toleration Act of 1689, which granted freedom of worship to the Dissenters under certain conditions, which in turn affected the development of the Methodist societies throughout the eighteenth century.

CONVERSATIONS WITH OTHER CHURCHES. (See ECUMENICAL MOVEMENT.)

CONVERSION, or THE NEW BIRTH. The belief in Conversion, or the New Birth, has always been a characteristic feature of the Methodist heritage. Just as men are born physically into this world, so are they born spiritually into the kingdom of God.

In the thinking of JOHN WESLEY and his followers, this doctrine was no merely sectarian peculiarity. It was an essential demand of the Biblical revelation and of human nature. It was understood as a part of God's revealed purpose to bring people, by divine grace and human response, into a conscious and life-giving relationship with God himself. The New Birth was seen as the starting point of the most significant of all pilgrimages, namely, the journey in communion with others into the kingdom of God.

In keeping with this Methodist heritage, then, the doctrine is based on certain teachings and events in the Bible.

It is implied in scriptural teaching that man is a "fallen" creature. This has been crudely exaggerated by some in relation to the doctrine of "original sin" and "total depravity." Wesley, too, taught the doctrine of "original sin." In fact he dealt with it at great length. But what he had in mind was the plain fact that men are naturally and continually inclined to turn from God to their own selfish ways. There is a gravitational pull away from God.

This mysterious pulling away calls for a distinctive kind of inner transformation. In the modern world men assume readily that all they need for their spiritual well-being is provided either by native human endowments or by education, cultural refinements, and political and economic improvement. They forget that, because of the subtleties of man's pride and selfishness, every one of these good things can become a base of operations for self-centeredness. They forget also that not one of these benefits can bring men into a life-giving relationship with God. No one would say that it follows from the fact that a creature is a man and not a dog that he is rightly related to God. Similarly, no one would say that because a man is well educated, or financially successful, or culturally refined, he is thereby committed to the purpose of God for his life and for his fellowmen.

The Methodist teaching on the New Birth, then, is based in part on the fact that men, though made for God, do not respond to God appropriately either by natural inclination or by cultural and social refinements. What they require is the grace of God in Jesus Christ, which is made available to them upon the condition of that personal and total response which the Bible speaks of as faith.

That this teaching is deeply rooted in the Bible is seen further in its revelation of God's primary purpose for men. God is concerned not merely with men's existence in an earthly setting—however refined and improved. He created them for the realization of moral and spiritual values within his kingdom. God never intended for men to live apart from himself and his aims. The question, then, is not merely: Is a man a good citizen in this world? Though that is important. More deeply, the question is: Is he a participating member of the kingdom of God?

The New Birth is the doorway into the kingdom. Jesus spoke of this to Nicodemus. He reminded men again and again that they must make their personal and total response to God. Paul knew the reality of this in his own experience. He found that not all the refinements and discipline of his former training as a Pharisee could bring a man into this new life-giving relationship with God. John Wesley himself came to know the same thing by experience. If any man ever tried to work his way into the kingdom of God by refinement and discipline, that man was Wesley. But he could not do it. Nor could he be satisfied with the speculative ideas that a man is either elected by God to salvation (whether he experiences anything or not), or that God's righteousness in Jesus Christ is imputed to him (whether there is actual righteousness in his life or not). In keeping with the Biblical teaching, Wesley saw that it is idle to talk of any kind of salvation without the personal experience and involvement of a man's whole being. His own conversion was a pivotal point in his life and thought. (For an excellent discussion of this see W. R. Cannon, Theology of John Wesley.)

All men are called to participate with God in the kingdom. Each must respond for himself to this call. But the New Birth, though involving this response, is not produced by it. It is the work of divine grace made available to men through Jesus Christ within the community of faith.

Here is where the Holy Spirit comes in with His unique mission of realizing righteousness in the souls of men. In every human being the Holy Spirit works preventively to draw him toward the Lordship of Jesus Christ. That is, prior to any conscious personal relationship with God, there is in every man the divine presence which inclines him toward God. Though this is never in defiance of man's personal responses, it is an ever-present persuasive power making it possible for him to respond in faith.

When he thus responds, as Wesley put it, ". . . pardon is applied to the soul, by a divine faith wrought by the Holy Ghost, who then begins the great work of inward sanctification" (Notes on the New Testament, Romans 4:5). This beginning amounts to a new creation wrought by the operation of the Holy Spirit. To use Wesley's own words again, being born of God ". . . implies not barely the being baptized, or any outward change whatever; but a vast inward change, a change wrought in the soul, by the operation of the Holy Ghost; a change in the whole manner of our existence; for from the moment we are born of God, we live in quite another manner than we did before; we are, as it were, in another world" (Standard Sermons, XV. i. 1.).

At this point Wesley differed with the Continental Reformers. They viewed regeneration as something which had to be repeated throughout life because man is not the bearer of any actual righteousness. Through Jesus Christ, however, God imputes righteousness to men. In contrast to this, Wesley insisted that the New Birth is actually the first stage in the total movement of the soul toward sanctification. To be sure, if a man backslides, he must repeat the process. As is the case with a newborn baby, the soul that is newly born of God requires constant nurture which is made available within the community of faith.

If we ask today what is the relevance of this doctrine, the first comment might be that any significant belief which has dealt realistically with men in the past is sure to have a continuing place in the life of mankind. Like all important doctrines, the belief in the New Birth deals in reality. For there are all-important changes wrought in a man when he responds by faith to Jesus Christ with his whole being.

These changes, actually experienced in the New Birth, may be identified as follows:

(1) A man has a new Lord and Master, which means also that he holds to new standards and values; (2) he starts moving in a new direction because he has a new vision of what life under God is all about; (3) he cultivates new habits; (4) he is conscious of a new appreciation of the dignity and preciousness of every human being regardless of race, or station, or culture; (5) he feels a new sense of community with others who bear the name of Christ; (6) he has a new concern for men who turn away from God and who thus miss the primal reason for being; and, underlying it all, (7) he experiences the power of a new and life-giving relationship with God through Jesus Christ.

All of this was summarized by Paul when he said, "Therefore, if anyone is in Christ, he is a new creation; the old has passed away, behold, the new has come" (2 Cor. 5:17).

MACK B. STOKES

CONVICTION is a term used theologically to denote the state of being awakened to a consciousness of sin, whereby the soul of man has a clear sight of its sinful condition, of its guilt before God, and of the punishment due it. Conviction goes before repentance and conversion, though it is closely tied in with what may be, by an immediate psychological transfer, an instant and deep repentance. It is the first condition that leads to the recovery of the soul from its separation from God. It precedes conversion but does not necessarily produce conversion, as it does not follow that a sinner who is under conviction will always become converted.

Conviction is wrought in some strange way by the invasive touch of the Holy Spirit, Who not only reveals unto the soul its true condition before God, but also condemns it by the very Holiness of the Divine presence which is then overwhelmingly felt. As with regeneration, or being born of the Spirit, man stands here in the presence of mysterious moves which he cannot fathom. "The wind bloweth where it listeth," explained our Lord, "and thou hearest the sound thereof but canst not tell whence it cometh, nor whither it goeth: so is everyone that is born of the Spirit" (John 3:8). It may reverently be added that He might have said the same thing about the convicting power of the Holy One, which comes from we know not where and in a manner we know not how, but is absolutely unmistakable to the sinner whom He convicts. Indeed, the Lord taught that when the Holy Spirit should come, He "would reprove [convict] the world of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment" (John 16:8, 9). This happens and in some strange way, sometimes through one experience, sometimes through another, there comes to persons an inner conviction of dominant evil and of mortal danger. "This office belongs alone to God," said Bishop MATTHEW SIMPSON. "The Holy Spirit strives with men and enlightens and reproves them. His work is universal, not confined to any race or limited to any age. He is present, going through all minds everywhere, moving them inwardly and drawing them unto Him. Before Christ the manifestation of His office was not clear, but since the Ascension of Christ, the race has been living under the dispensation or law of the Holy Spirit. His work, fragmentary in former ages, is now organized, and is the controlling agency in the regeneration of humanity."

It is usually seen that the principal means by which the work of conviction is carried on through the Holy Spirit is the preaching of the Word of God, and especially preaching of the Law and Judgment of God. However, many instances have occurred other than those connected with preaching, where a sense of conviction has fallen upon persons. Affliction, danger, sickness, and disappointment—God sometimes makes these instrumental in arousing a sinner to a consciousness of his forsaken and lost condition. (Cf. Wesley. Sermon IX, The Spirit of Bondage and of Adoption ii. 1-10.)

The work of the Spirit in conviction is to lead men unto God and make them tremendously aware of their separation from God. The final result rests both with the person convicted and with the outreaching of the Grace of God. Conscience may be awakened and judgment convinced, yet the will and affections remain unchanged. This was the case of Agrippa unto whom Paul preached who was "almost persuaded" to become a Christian. "A man may be convinced that there is no other way of recovery, but by the love of God, manifested in the gift of Christ his Son; may be fully persuaded of the riches of God's grace. . . . and of joys immortal hereafter. And yet with all these remains an unconverted man." This is true, but the first step is always conviction. "Those warm desires that in thee burn were kindled by reclaiming Grace," as the hymn expresses it. Conviction, like lightning, strikes where least expected; and every sincere preacher who utters the word of God knows that behind it, and through it there goes forth, sometimes when the preacher himself is not aware of it, the searching, convicting power of the Righteous One. In evangelism, wherever there are conversions, there will always be seen, as a preliminary, conviction. Conviction, repentance, conversion usually occur in that order. Conviction and conversion are the Lord's doing, and marvelous in our eyes.

COOK, CHARLES (17?-1858), British "father" of French Methodism, entered the Wesleyan ministry in 1816 and was appointed in 1818 to FRANCE, where Methodism had been introduced by William Mahy and JEAN DE QUETTEVILLE in 1791. Cook spent the whole of his ministry in the service of French-speaking people. For many years Paris was regarded as "hard ground," but he initiated work in Normandy, South France, Sardinia, and French-speaking SWITZERLAND. In 1821 he was sent to try to open work among Jews and Moslems in Palestine and Alexandria, but the attempt proved abortive. He visited England and America in the interest of the French work; and it was due to his wise guidance, evangelical zeal, and concern that French Methodism should not merely be an imitation of British Methodism, that the British Conference agreed to the creation of an autonomous French Conference in 1852. Cook became its first President and remained so until his death in Paris, Feb. 21, 1858.

COOK, EDMUND FRANCIS (1867-1957), pastor, presiding elder, and board secretary, was born Jan. 24, 1867, in Marietta, Ga., the son of William Francis and Louisa (Richards) Cook. His father, and grandfather (Francis Cook) were Methodist preachers. He was educated at EMORY COLLEGE and VANDERBILT, and received the honorary D.D. from the latter in 1909. He married Annie Cargill, Feb. 14, 1894, and they had one son. Admitted to the NORTH GEORGIA CONFERENCE in 1887, Cook immediately transferred to SOUTH GEORGIA and was appointed to the Centennial Circuit.

Twice in his life, Cook made headline news, first, for heroic service rendered in a yellow fever epidemic in the early 1890's when he was pastor at McKendree Church, Brunswick, Ga., and second, in 1917 when as foreign secretary of the General Board of Missions he tried to limit the power of the bishops in the affairs of the board and in the appointments of missionaries on the field.

After successful pastorates at McKendree and First Churches in Brunswick, Cook served as a chaplain in the Spanish-American War, and then, beginning in 1899, he had four years at Wesley Monumental Church, SAVANNAH. In 1903 he was appointed to the Thomasville District, and in three years made it the banner district in Southern Methodism, supporting seven missionaries. As a result, in 1906 he was made secretary of education in the General Board of Missions, and in 1910 became foreign secretary of the board.

Cook's chief antagonist in his tilt with the bishops was WARREN A. CANDLER who lived in Atlanta and who at the time was the presiding bishop in the South Georgia Conference. A majority of the bishops supported Candler. In March, 1917, Cook, despairing of altering the situation, printed a 54-page pamphlet entitled, "The Bishops and the Board of Missions," in which he outlined the issues and announced his resignation as foreign secretary of the board. Sympathetic laymen had the pamphlet reprinted and widely distributed. In November 1917, Cook went to the South Georgia Conference, Bishop Candler in the chair, bearing a request from the Moody Bible Institute in Chicago that he be appointed to that institution to organize and direct its department of missionary education. The conference by majority vote turned down the request on the ground that the Moody Bible Institute was not related to the M. E. Church, South, but at the same time it adopted a resolution drafted by W. N. AINSWORTH expressing esteem and affection for Cook. Adamant, Cook then requested location which was granted, and on his own he accepted the position in Chicago.

Apparently Cook thought his career as a Methodist minister was finished. But his friends had other ideas. Ten months later he was readmitted to the traveling connection in the SOUTHWEST MISSOURI CONFERENCE and was appointed president of Scarritt Bible Training School in Kansas City (now SCARRITT COLLEGE in Nashville). After three years at Scarritt, Cook became associate general secretary of the General Board of Education at Nashville, remaining there six years. In 1922 when Bishop W. N. Ainsworth presided over the South Georgia Conference for the first time after his elevation to the episcopacy in 1918, Cook transferred his membership back to that conference. Bishop Candler, who had presided over the South Georgia Conference eight of the nine years prior to 1922, never again served as the presiding bishop over that body.

In 1927, Cook returned to the pastorate in South Georgia. He was appointed to Vineville Church, MACON, where he served five years. In 1932 he moved to Mulberry Street Church, Macon, where the congregation was burdened with a huge debt and where the pastor had just committed suicide. After five years of effective service there, he retired at seventy and lived twenty more years in Macon where he was held in high esteem. He published two books: The Missionary Message of the Bible, 1924, and Methodism and World Service, 1928.

Cook told the writer that he would like to be remembered as the chaplain of the First Georgia Regiment in the Spanish-American War, and he would prefer to forget that he ever served as a presiding elder. He died in Macon, April 10, 1957.

COOK, EDWARD BOYER (1806-1843), first resident Wesleyan missionary in Great Namaqualand (South West Africa), was born in Longwhattun, Leicestershire, England, on Nov. 4, 1806, and arrived at Cape Town in April, 1832. He commenced his ministry in the vicinity of Cape Town but soon volunteered to open a mission in Great Namaqualand, for which Josiah Nisbett had offered up to £300. Leaving the Cape in 1834 in the company of EDWARD EDWARDS, Cook established a mission (Nisbett-Bath) at Warmbad among the Bondelswarts. Assisted only by a Namaqua catechist, Peter Links, he erected the buildings, established agriculture, and began work among nomadic tribesmen who were scattered over a wide area. Requests for missionaries came in from other tribes and Cook undertook a nine-month journey of exploration which took him as far north as present-day Windhoek and Walvis Bay. This undermined his health but, instead of returning to the Cape, he labored on and established a new mission at Gobasis. Ill health soon compelled his withdrawal and he set out for Cape Town, only to die on the banks of the Orange River on March 9, 1843, at the age of thirty-six.

COOK, EULALIA (1913-), an American missionary to Cuba and director of literature for Latin American countries, was born Nov. 17, 1913, at Little River, S. C. She was educated at Davenport College, Lenoir, N. C.; COLUMBIA COLLEGE, Columbia, S. C.; SCARRITT COLLEGE, Nashville, Tenn.; and did graduate work at Union Theological Seminary, New York. After teaching for four years in the public schools of South Carolina, she was accepted for work in Cuba in 1940.

For a short time she worked in the Centro Cristiano, MATANZAS, but soon was transferred to rural work at Baguanos, Oriente. Here she developed a large circuit which was served at first by horseback travel. She then established a flourishing day school and kindergarten and built a substantial classroom building.

During her stay in the Oriente province she became one of the leading members of a literacy team using the Laubach method of teaching an illiterate to read in fifteen days. Her last work in Cuba was as a teacher in the UNION THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY in the field of rural sociology.

In 1960 she was released to make a survey in the various South American fields for the Board of Missions of The Methodist Church. With the close of missionary work in Cuba, she became a member of the ALFALIT literacy team stationed in Costa Rica, 1962-65. She was transferred to BOLIVIA, 1965-66, and to PERU in 1966, where she is at present stationed.

COOK, ISAAC P. (1808-1884), leading American local preacher, was a scholar in the original BALTIMORE SUNDAY SCHOOL of 1816. Becoming a LOCAL PREACHER in 1830, he was in demand for dedications and other important events, but he also took his regular assignments at country schoolhouses, market places, and jails. Bishop HEDDING ordained him DEACON in 1836, and five years later he was ordained ELDER.

Cook was a founder and for thirty years president of the Local Preacher's Association of Baltimore, and in 1858 he helped to organize the National Association of Local Preachers, which he twice headed. The bishops appointed him to the committee on the Centenary of American Methodism, 1866. His historical articles appeared in The Christian Advocate, Baltimore Methodist, Pioneer, and the secular press; he left unfinished a general Methodist history. Publication of an article concerning John Wesley led Emory College at Oxford, Ga., to award him the D.D. degree in 1881.

In public life he was twice elected register of wills for Baltimore and was a school commissioner. He also served as president of the Maryland Bible Society, 1859-68, and was a founder of the Wartime Christian Commission.

In 1880 his home church, Light Street, gathered a great concourse to fete him on the semicentennial of his ministry. When he passed away, he was remembered for his well-seasoned and mature sermon thoughts; and it was said that no one else of his time had contributed more to Baltimore Methodism.

COOK, THOMAS. (See CLIFF COLLEGE, Br.)

COOK, VALENTINE (1765-1820), American pioneer circuit rider and educator, was born in 1765 in Monroe County, W. Va. He entered COKESBURY COLLEGE in 1786 and remained one or two years. Afterward he was known as that institution's most famous student. He was licensed to preach and admitted to the Methodist itineracy in 1788. He traveled the Calvert Circuit in MARYLAND and the Berkeley and Clarksburg Circuits in WEST VIRGINIA. Appointed a PRESIDING ELDER, he served districts in PENNSYLVANIA and KENTUCKY. He went to Kentucky in 1798. After one year as presiding elder, he was designated as principal of the newly founded BETHEL ACADEMY in Jessamine County. The school failed, and in 1800 Cook located. Though he lived twenty years longer, he did not again enter the itinerant ranks. He devoted his time to reading, farming, hunting, teaching in academies, visiting portions of the country, and conducting revivals and camp meetings. On visits to NEW YORK, Baltimore, PHILADELPHIA, and CINCINNATI he preached to large crowds with power. Cook was credited with introducing the "MOURNER'S BENCH" about 1797. Prior to that time persons seized with conviction in religious services customarily knelt where they were and counselors went to them to pray with and instruct them. Cook was a raven-haired adventurer who could speak German as well as English. According to EZRA TIPPLE, "Cook was one of the wonders of the primitive Methodist ministry. Born among the mountains of Virginia, he became a famous hunter and never knew fear. It is said that no man in his day in the west wielded greater power in the pulpit." Cook died in Kentucky in 1820 shortly after preaching in a camp meeting.

COOK-JAMIESON DEBATE. The Western Pennsylvania frontier was a stronghold of Presbyterianism in the last quarter of the eighteenth century. With the spread of Methodism in the region there was a clash of Calvinistic predestination doctrines with the Methodist doctrine of free grace. The clash came to a head in a debate before thousands in an open-air amphitheatre near the Congruity Presbyterian Church north of Greensburg, Pa., on June 12, 1793. Several exchanges between VALENTINE COOK, the preacher on the PITTSBURGH Circuit that year, and Samuel Porter, pastor of the Congruity Presbyterian parish, precipitated the debate.

It was agreed that the debate would deal with four points of theological difference: (1) absolute and unconditional election; (2) reprobation; (3) final and unconditional perseverance of the saints, or, of all believers; (4) perfection or holiness. Porter chose the Rev. John Jamieson as his champion controversialist, and Cook defended the Methodist position. Each man had thirty minutes to deal with each point. The debate was a great triumph for Cook and Methodism, and made Cook a hero on the frontier. It gave a great impetus to the respect in which both the Methodist preachers and Methodist doctrines were held throughout the region, and a great subsidence of the prejudice toward the organized Methodist societies. COOKE, JOSEPH (1775-1811), British Methodist, was born at Dudley, Worcestershire, May 8, 1775, and became a Wesleyan itinerant in 1795. In 1805 he was charged with teaching doctrines which attributed merit to justifying faith and denied the witness of the Holy Spirit. He was expelled by the Conference of 1806 for continuing to teach these doctrines. His supporters in Rochdale, Lancashire, built him Providence Chapel, which after his death on March 14, 1811, became the present Independent Chapel in Rochdale. Cooke was not a self-confessed Unitarian when he died, but some of his followers established the METHODIST UNITARIAN MOVEMENT.

COOKE, RICHARD JOSEPH (1853-1931), bishop, was born in New York City, Jan. 31, 1853, the son of Richard and Joanna (Geary) Cooke, Roman Catholics who came from IRELAND. He attended parochial schools in Brooklyn, and later went to Tennessee as a railway construction worker. In 1874 he was admitted on trial in the TENNESSEE CONFERENCE (ME) and was appointed to the Benton and Henry charge in the MEMPHIS District. The next year he served at Dyer in the same district. In 1876 he was admitted into FULL CONNECTION, but the minutes show no appointment for him apparently because he entered East Tennessee Wesley College, Athens, Tenn., from which he was graduated in 1880. In 1879 he was admitted to the HOLSTON CONFERENCE (ME) and was appointed tutor at the college. In 1880 he transferred to the GEORGIA CONFERENCE (ME) and served two years at Marietta Street Church, ATLANTA. In 1883 he transferred back to the Holston Conference and was appointed to Clinch Street Church, KNOXVILLE, for three years. Following a year of study and travel in Europe, he served three years as pastor of First M. E. Church, Cleveland, Tenn. In 1889 he was appointed professor in U. S. Grant Memorial University (UNIVERSITY OF CHATTANOOGA) where he remained fifteen years. During that time he also served briefly as vice-chancellor and acting president, and as editor of the Methodist Advocate Journal which was published in Chattanooga. He was Book Editor of the M. E. Church, 1904-12. A member of five General Conferences and three ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCES, he was fraternal delegate to the British and Irish Wesleyan Conferences in 1906. He was elected bishop in 1912 and was assigned to the Portland, Oregon Area, 1912-16, and to the Helena, Montana Area, 1916-20. He retired in 1920 and moved to Athens, Tennessee. Cook married Eliza Gettys Fisher, April 20, 1881, and they had four sons. She died in 1904, and in 1908 he married her sister, Ella B. Fisher. Cooke served on the Commission on the Unification of the M. E. Church and the M. E. Church, South. He was a prolific and able writer; his editorials attracted wide attention. Among his books were: The Historic Episcopate, History of the Ritual of the M. E. Church, The Wingless Hour, Incarnation and Recent Criticism, The Church and World Peace, and Religion in Russia Under the Soviets. He died Dec. 25, 1931 and was buried in Athens, Tenn.

He entered the ministry of the METHODIST NEW CONNEXION in 1827, early superintended the Irish Mission, lectured on Puseyism (see George B. Pusey) in Liverpool, and hested JOSEPH BARKER in a notable ten-day debate in Newcastle upon Tyne in 1845, in which town he regained control of the chapel which the Barkerites had wrested from the denomination. His health breaking down in 1849, he was appointed editor and book steward, holding those offices for twenty-two years. He published memoirs of Thomas Carlisle and James Maughan. He was President of the New Connexion Conference in 1843, 1859, and 1869. He died in London on Christmas Day, 1884.

COOKMAN, ALFRED (1828-1871), a widely known pulpit orator of the PHILADELPHIA CONFERENCE, M. E. Church, in whose memory the Cookman Memorial Church was named when it was organized in 1872. He was born in Columbia, Pa., Jan. 4, 1828, and was educated at Dickinson Grammar School, Carlisle, Pa. A linguist, he became proficient in French, German, Greek, and Latin, and received a license to preach when he was eighteen years of age. He joined the Philadelphia Conference in 1848, filling important assignments in PITTSBURGH, WILMINGTON, NEW YORK and NEWARK. Like his father, GEORGE G. COOKMAN, he was a brilliant, forceful preacher and popular pulpit orator. He died Nov. 13, 1871.

COOKMAN, GEORGE GRIMSTON (1800-1841), American minister, was born at Hull, England, in 1800. He received an excellent secular and religious education from his pious and wealthy parents and participated widely in Sunday school work. He visited the United States in 1821 and began working as a LOCAL PREACHER. He returned to England, but came back to PHILADELPHIA in 1825, joining the PHILADELPHIA CONFERENCE in 1826. He preached with great success in PENNSYLVANIA, MARYLAND, NEW JERSEY, and the District of Columbia. In 1839 he became Chaplain of the United States Senate. Outstanding as an orator, he attracted huge crowds wherever he preached; his vivid imagination and nervous energy gave his sermons remarkable force and power. Both he and the ship in which he sailed were lost at sea in 1841 on a return trip to England to visit his parents. Two of his sons became ministers, ALFRED COOKMAN becoming equally as famous as his father.

During his latter years as a bank manager, and after his retirement, he increased both his scholarly interests and his services to many and varied causes. He was a member of the Council of the Royal Historical Society, and in 1944 was awarded the M.A. of Liverpool University for his dissertation, English Dissent under the Early Hanoverians (London: Epworth Press, 1946). He was a founder-member, editor and treasurer of the Methodist SACRAMENTAL FELLOWSHIP, auditor for the WESLEY HISTORICAL SOCIETY, and lay secretary of the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL, in the latter capacity carrying heavy responsibilities for the Oxford assembly in 1951.

FRANK BAKER

COONS, JAMES EPHRAIM (1877-1965), American clergyman, was born at Matilda, Ontario, Canada, Nov. 1, 1877, the son of John and Rhoda Ann Coons. Migrating to the United States in early life, he received his education from Polts Institute, Herkimer, N. Y.; OHIO WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, BOSTON and Harvard Universities with degrees of A.B., A.M., and S.T.B. He held honorary degrees of D.D., LL.D., and L.H.D. from three colleges. He married Mabel Ida McIntosh, Jan. 1, 1900, and they had a son, John Wesley.

Admitted on trial in the NORTH-EAST OHIO CONFERENCE in 1902, and then being duly received in full connection, he served the pastorates in OHIO and MASSACHUSETTS and special appointments in IOWA and NEW HAMPSHIRE. In 1921-25 he was superintendent of the Lynn District in Massachusetts. He was a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE, a member of the ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE, and President of the IOWA WESLEYAN COLLEGE (1928-35), in which capacity he conferred the Sc.D. degree on Admiral Richard Byrd in 1935. He also served as vice-president of the Iowa Association of College Presidents, as a director of the Presbyterian Ministers' Fund, Boston office, and as a member of both the Clerical and Itinerant Ministers Clubs of Boston. He was a Mason and a member of the Rotary Club.

Coons loved the church and believed that its future usefulness depended upon properly trained leadership. In support of Christian education, he secured large sums of money both for building projects and for institutional financial stability during his presidency at Iowa Wesleyan, and his sixteen-year tenure as headmaster at TILTON SCHOOL in New Hampshire. Following his retirement in 1952, he lived in Maitland, Fla. He died on July 9, 1965.

WILLIAM J. DAVIS

COONS, JOHN (1797-1869), American U. B. minister, was born Oct. 27, 1797, near Martinsburg, Va., the son of a German father and an English mother. When John was ten years of age, the family moved to Ross County, Ohio.

Coons was converted under the ministry of Jacob Antrim in 1821. The year following his conversion he received a license to preach and became a member of the MIAMI CONFERENCE, Church of the United Brethren in Christ. His first appointment was Washington Circuit in 1823. He joined the Scioto Conference in the northern part of Ohio when the Miami Conference was divided.

Bishop JOSEPH HOFFMAN ordained John Coons a deacon in 1824; Bishops HENRY KUMLER, Sr. and CHRISTIAN NEWCOMER ordained him an elder in 1826. Later he served a number of years as PRESIDING ELDER.

Coons was a member of GENERAL CONFERENCES from 1829 to 1841. In the latter, he was elected bishop and served one term of four years, declining reelection in 1845. He was a strong preacher, possessed good administrative ability, and exercised good judgment in his duties as presiding officer. He was elected to General Conference again in 1853.

John Coons married Catherine Bookwalter on Jan. 16, 1821, and they were the parents of eight children. Mrs. Coons died in 1840. The bishop later married Eleanor Windship, a widow, and she became the mother of seven children. Bishop Coons died Aug. 7, 1869, and was buried at Germantown, Ohio.

COOPER, ADAM W. (1879-1950), served as a bishop in the American EVANGELICAL CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH from 1942 until his death in 1950. Although born in Swan Village, Staffordshire, England, May 24, 1879, he was able to serve as an outstanding preacher in the PENNSYLVANIA German communities where he was assigned as a pastor in The United Evangelical denomination, and later in the Evangelical Congregational denomination. His father was a PRIMITIVE METHODIST preacher; but after education at ALBRIGHT COLLEGE, Providence University and a Master's degree from Temple University, he became a United Evangelical pastor in 1900. He was noted for his eloquence in the pulpit. His outstanding achievement as Bishop was to enlarge the vision of his denomination into forms of cooperation with other denominations of similar approach and size. Death came to him July 23, 1950, at Ocean Grove, N. J. His body was laid to rest in the Cedar Grove Cemetery, Adamstown, Pa.

EZEKIEL COOPER

COOPER, EZEKIEL (1763-1847), American preacher and general church editor, was born in Carolina County, Md., Feb. 22, 1763. His parents were Richard and Ann Cooper, whom Ezekiel describes as "plain people, in easy and plentiful circumstances in life." Being Anglicans, they had their children baptized and reared in the faith of the Church of England. The training Ezekiel received, particularly from his mother, caused him to "abhor" swearing, lying and evil speaking, and the "profane and scandalous evils of every kind."

Early in life he felt a desire to "fear, love and serve his Maker," but it was not until he listened to a sermon by FREEBORN GARRETTSON, as he addressed two companies of soldiers drilling on the Cooper property, that he "wished to be a Christian." His father, he states, was dead at this time and his mother married a man who was "a violent enemy to the Methodists as a people, who he supposed were enemies to the country." After variegated experiences of depression, renewal, doubting, despair and frustration, Cooper "was walking alone in the woods" when he "knelt down and prayed fervently." He felt such "confidence in the merits of Christ and the mercy of God," he writes, that "I laid hold of the promise, felt my burden remove, and a flood of peace, love and joy break forth in my soul."

Feeling a call to preach, he consulted several Methodist traveling preachers about the matter, and after a time he was appointed by Freeborn Garrettson as a class leader in Talbot County, Md. In the year 1784 at BARRATT'S CHAPEL he was appointed by FRANCIS ASBURY to go "on the Caroline Circuit and make a trial."

From then on Cooper served with distinction in many of the circuits and charges of American Methodism: Kent and Long Island Circuits; East Jersey; The Trenton Circuit; Baltimore; Annapolis; Alexandria, Va., where he was the first preacher appointed to serve when Alexandria in 1791 became a separate charge; Charleston, South Carolina; then going north to New England, where he served with the famed JESSE LEE. He was appointed presiding elder over Boston, Needham, Lynn, Greenwich and Warren Circuits in Massachusetts from 1793 to 1794; and later in 1794 he came to New York. Other places where he served included Philadelphia, and Wilmington, Del.

When serving in East Jersey, he organized Methodism in Newburgh, N. Y., and also crossed over into Pennsylvania where in 1786 he preached the first Methodist sermon in Reading, returning there several times. Regular Methodist worship was not begun in Reading, however, until 1823.

In Baltimore he experienced a revival of unusual emotional impact. "The heart-rending cries," he relates, and "throbbing lamentations were truly awful to hear." In the years 1790 and 1791 in particular, he denounced slavery both through the press and pulpit, writing strong articles in The Maryland Gazette, The Maryland Journal and The Virginia Gazette, and preaching boldly from his pulpit against American slavery as a vile sin.

In Philadelphia he introduced organized Methodism into Germantown on June 4, 1796, having preached here as early as 1786 when on the East Jersey Circuit. Also in 1796, he performed heroic service in Philadelphia in the midst of one of the periodic visitations of the yellow fever plague. "The deaths are now between twenty and thirty a day," he writes, "more than thirty died one day. But as I was stationed here as a preacher, I resolved to put my trust in the Lord and stand by the dear people in the days of adversity and distress."

In 1798 Asbury appointed Cooper to fill the vacancy in the BOOK CONCERN caused by the death of JOHN DICKINS, but his work was delayed both by yellow fever, which again raged in Philadelphia, and by a disturbing indebtedness on the Book Concern. In 1799, however, the PHILA-DELPHIA CONFERENCE, meeting in June and July, elected him to superintend the book business—then the church's only general agency—with only two dissenting votes, one being cast by Cooper himself.

A split occurred in Philadelphia Methodism about the turn of the century and Ezekiel Cooper became the leader of the Society at ST. GEORGE'S and at Ebenezer, opposing the group which later became Union Methodist Church. As a result, every effort was made to remove Cooper and the book business to New York City. The attempt failed but was periodically renewed. His opponents argued that Cooper, having been stationed for five years, now, in Philadelphia was not really subject to the itinerant plan as were all of the other preachers.

In 1803 at a meeting of the Philadelphia Conference in Smyrna, Delaware, it was decided to move the Book Concern to Baltimore, but Cooper declined to make the change, being rebuked for his attitude by Asbury, himself. In the ensuing year, however, it was seen that Baltimore would not be the best location for the Book Concern, and at the General Conference of 1804 the Book Concern was moved to New York City with Cooper as "Editor and General Book Steward" and John Wilson as his assistant. He continued in this position until 1808 when he again became an itinerant for eight years and then located. After eight more years he sought once more to travel, but soon thereafter was placed in the Supernumerary list in the Philadelphia Conference.

MATTHEW SIMPSON says of him: "His personal appearance embodied a fine illustration of age, intelligence and piety. His frame was tall, but slight; his locks white with years, and his features expressive of reflexion and serenity. He was considered by his ministerial associates a 'living encyclopedia.' He was a diligent student and a close observer. He was never married, was frugal, even to a fault; and, what was quite unusual in that day, left behind him an estate of about $5,000. At the time of his death he was supposed to be the oldest Methodist preacher in the world."

At his own request he was buried at the door of Old St. George's Church, Philadelphia, where a marble slab commemorates his life. He died Sunday, Feb. 21, 1847.

COOPER, SALLY KATE (1886-), American missionary to KOREA, was born in Douglasville, Ga., on June 25, 1886, and joined the church at an early age. She received the B.A. degree from WESLEYAN FEMALE COLLEGE, Macon, Ga., at the age of sixteen. The M.A. degree was granted by SCARRITT COLLEGE, Nashville, in 1929.

Miss Cooper sailed for Korea in September, 1908, and was assigned to Wonsan, where she continued until 1940 in evangelistic and Bible School work, as well as work in the district schools. She served as district superintendent of the Kangneung District for one year, being the one missionary woman serving in that capacity.

During the second World War, she taught Bible in the HARWOOD GIRLS SCHOOL in ALBUQUERQUE, N. M. She then returned to evangelistic work in Seoul. During the Korean War, she worked among the 80,000 Koreans in Hiroshima, Japan. Returning to Seoul, she taught in the Methodist seminaries in Seoul and Taejon and did evangelistic work until at the age of seventy she said good-bye to her beloved Koreans and returned to the States for retirement in 1959.

Miss Cooper was ordained as a minister in the Korean Methodist Church by J. S. RYANG, General Superintendent, in 1931. She received the Wesleyan College Alumnae award for distinguished achievement as having had the longest term of service of any Methodist woman missionary in Korea—fifty years and eight months.

The life of Miss Cooper and her ministry in Korea were written by Ho Woon Lee and published in the Korean language some years ago. Miss Cooper, during her retirement, was given a trip back to Korea by an anonymous friend and admirer of her work there. She presently resides at McDonough, Ga.

COOPER, THOMAS (1777-1850), layman, was born July 5, 1777 in Birmingham, England. His grandfather was one of JOHN WESLEY'S first converts in BIRMINGHAM. He himself was converted at about twenty under JOSEPH BENSON. Arriving in PITTSBURGH in 1803, he formed the first Methodist class there, and rented a house in which the group worshiped until 1810 when a stone church was built on Second Street. He was the first Methodist class leader, the first steward, and one of the first trustees in Pittsburgh, and was also the recognized song leader. A merchant, he also served as an alderman in Pittsburgh. Retiring to a farm in 1834, he continued active in the church, often having charge of three classes. He was regarded as a "man of unflinching integrity, a philanthropist, devotedly pious, well read, and intelligent." He died Sept. 14, 1850.

COOPER, THOMAS (1800-1892), British Methodist, was a Wesleyan LOCAL PREACHER who found the conflict between religion and politics in the area of CHARTISM a distracting force. At a time when political activity so often issued in violence, and the church was trying to keep aloof from such distractions, he found it difficult to preach acceptably. He was a working journalist who came into contact with many who hoped most from Chartism, and in Leicester he threw in his lot with them and became their leader, considering this to be the way to translate the gospel into nineteenth-century terms.

COORDINATING COUNCIL, THE, was an agency of The Methodist Church created by the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1952. This powerful Council was made responsible directly to the General Conference and was empowered to coordinate the work of the general administrative agencies of The Methodist Church. Its membership was outlined in the Discipline and was representative of the COUNCIL OF BISHOPS, the separate Jurisdictions, the ministry and laity of the Church, and representatives of the Church overseas.

Responsibilities of the Council were: to study the organizational structure of the church and recommend changes to avoid duplication of function; to propose quadrennial programs; to lead in long range planning; to recommend the number and timing of special days to be observed throughout the church; to approve or disapprove plans of any general agency proposing to acquire real estate or erect a building; to consider the plans of any general agency to publish promotional periodicals.

In 1960, the General Conference approved legislation prepared by the Council which united the Board of World Peace, Board of Temperance, and Board of Social and Economic Relations in one new agency called the BOARD OF CHRISTIAN SOCIAL CONCERNS.

In 1964 the General Conference adopted the Coordinating Council's recommendations, growing out of a Study of the General Superintendency. Included was provision for earlier retirement of a bishop from supervision of an Area, but with provision for special assignments by the Council of Bishops until he should reach the compulsory retirement age of all Methodist ministers. The Church also adopted the Council's proposed Constitutional Amendment requiring simultaneous sessions of the Jurisdictional Conferences, thus making transfer of bishops possible.

In 1956 the Coordinating Council proposed unification of promotional materials in one magazine, called Methodist Story—Spotlight. Following the 1968 union with the E.U.B. Church, the name of this periodical became The Interpreter. Many promotional periodicals were closed out. Shortly thereafter the Board of Temperance, joined by the Board of World Peace and Social and Economic Relations, joined in a new publication, Concern, but the matter was not officially appealed to the Coordinating Council until 1960 for report in 1964. In 1964, the study was continued.

In 1968 the Coordinating Council ruled against the continuation of Concern magazine. The General Conference approved the appeal of the latter board. Authorization of a new magazine was synchronized with the Plan of Union in 1968, which included the subordination of the function of the Coordinating Council to a subcommittee within a division of the new Program Council.

COPE, THOMAS JOHN (1838-1927), British Methodist, and founder of the UNITED METHODIST FREE CHURCH Deaconess Institute, was born at Lostwithiel, Cornwall, March 16, 1838. He entered the ministry in 1861; in 1890, having been appointed to Pimlico, in London, he saw the value of an order of deaconesses. With the aid of the two Bowron brothers, he started deaconess work in Lupus Street, Pimlico. The Annual Assembly adopted the work in 1891; an enlarged institute was established in Wandsworth in 1904. Cope was warden of the institute from 1891-1912, and chairman of the officers from 1915-21. He died on February 10, 1927.

KENNETH W. COPELAND

COPELAND, KENNETH WILFORD (1912-), American pastor and bishop, was born on April 3, 1912 in Bexar, Ark., the son of the Rev. and Mrs. John Wesley Copeland of the M. E. Church, South. The family later united with the M. P. Church, in which Kenneth Copeland was brought up.

He was educated at Westminster College in Tehucana, Texas; at East Texas Teachers' College; and at SOUTHERN METHODIST UNIVERSITY, where he received a B.A. degree in 1938. He served as President of the Texas Conference of the M. P. Church when he was twenty-six years of age, and helped lead his conference into Methodist Union in 1939. At the South Central JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCE which met in San Antonio on June 24, 1960, he was elected a bishop of The Methodist Church, and was consecrated at the altar of Travis Park Church. He was assigned to the NEBRASKA Area, where he presided over the NEBRASKA CONFERENCE which covers the entire state.

He married Catherine Andrews on Oct. 5, 1933, and they have two daughters.

COPELAND, THOMAS H. (?), founder of the Pensions Department of the C.M.E. Church, was born in Caldwell County, Ky., where he grew up on a farm. His early schooling was in a one-room log school house. In his early teens he was converted and joined the C.M.E. Church in his native community. Later he was licensed to preach and sent to LANE COLLEGE, Jackson, Tenn., where he finished the Normal and Theological courses.

While still a young man, Copeland became a leader in his denomination. He served pastorates in Cleveland, Ohio; Winchester, Ky.; Clarksville, Tenn.; and Hopkinsville, Ky. He also served several terms as a PRESIDING ELDER. His outstanding contribution was made in connection with the Department of Conference Claimants. He wrote the first constitution for this department. The General Conference of his church adopted it and elected him the secretary-treasurer of the department. He served in this office sixteen years.

COPENHAGEN, Denmark. In Copenhagen today there are three Methodist churches. The oldest is the Jerusalem Church, which in 1966 celebrated her one hundredth anniversary. The next church, Bethany, was founded in 1892. The Calvary Church is a small section of a home for sick and old people, and the church has replaced an old church on quite new premises.

Together the congregations of Copenhagen have 630 members in full connection with the church, and 570 members of their youth organizations. Further the churches have contact with a very large number of people because of the wide social activities. The work at Copenhagen is much larger than statistics indicate.

Central Mission of Copenhagen has its home in the Jerusalem Church, but it is an institution owned by itself.

JERUSALEM CHURCH, COPENHAGEN, DENMARK

It was founded in 1910 by ANTON BAST, who later became a bishop of the M. E. Church, U.S.A. Through the years since then it has undergone various changes as the changing times required. Its work includes various forms of help for people in need, two infant homes, a day nursery, a kindergarten, a home for handicapped children, a hostel for youth, an old people's home, and a summer camp, which serves hundreds of children. The Central Mission carries on several kinds of evangelical work. It has a permanent staff of about seventy persons, a considerable number of whom are student nurses at the infant homes.

COPPIN, LEVI JENKINS (1848-1924), an American bishop of the A.M.E. Church, was born in Frederickstown, Md., on Dec. 24, 1848. He was educated at the Philadelphia Episcopal Divinity School, from which institution he graduated in 1887. He was ordained DEACON in 1876 and ELDER in 1880. He served as pastor in PHILADELPHIA, Pa. In 1888 he was elected editor of the A.M.E. Church Review in which position he served until 1896 when he was appointed to the pastorate of historic Bethel Church in Philadelphia. In 1900 he was elected to the episcopacy from Bethel—and "by acclamation," an unusual General Conference action. He was assigned to Cape Colony and the Transvaal of SOUTH AFRICA for the 1900-04 quadrennium, where he had some difficulty with the South African whites who were suspicious of his political intentions. It was just after the Boer War, but the government finally approved his activities. He established many churches among the Bantu and the Colored, and worked mightily toward integrating the Ethiopian churches into the C.M.E. connection.

Coppin served as a bishop in South Africa until 1904, after which he presided over the Seventh (South Carolina) and Second (Baltimore, Virginia, North Carolina) Episcopal Districts. He lived in Washington, D.C. and was said to be the most influential African Methodist in that city for twenty years. He was a prolific hymn writer. He died in 1924. Coppin Hall at ALLEN UNIVERSITY is named for him, as are the Coppin A.M.E. Churches in Chicago; Indianapolis, Indiana; Fort Dodge, Iowa; and Prattville, Ala.

COPPLESTONE, JOHN RICHARDS (1876-1939), British and American minister, was born on the Cornish coast of England in 1876. At twelve his formal education ended, and he began a seven-year apprenticeship in plumbing and metal work. In time he organized a small business. In 1906 he married Ada Jane Roberts, and soon afterward they emigrated to Somerville, Mass., where their three sons were born. Coppystone was baptized in the Church of England, but in his youth he became active in the former Wesleyan Methodist Church and was made a local preacher. On coming to America, he joined the First Methodist Church in Somerville and taught in the church school. He contracted tuberculosis and entered the Rutland State Sanatorium in Massachusetts. While there he substituted occasionally for the Protestant Chaplain. When discharged as a patient in 1914, the chaplaincy was vacant; he was invited to take the position, accepted, and served three years. Meantime, he had begun the conference course of study. He was received on trial in the NEW ENGLAND CONFERENCE in 1916 and was immediately located at his own request. Then in 1918 he was admitted on trial in the NEW HAMPSHIRE CONFERENCE and in succeeding years his appointments were: Bethlehem, Plymouth, Amesbury, and Nashua Main Street Church. In 1935, after five years in Nashua, he was appointed to the Southern District. While still in that office he died June 10, 1939, and was buried at Amesbury, Mass. He was known as a hard worker and a capable administrator.

CORAL GABLES, FLORIDA, U.S.A. First Church, third largest church in the FLORIDA CONFERENCE, was organized July 27, 1926, with forty members. The congregation worshiped in several different temporary quarters before erecting a small church in 1933 with the help of a loan of $1,500 from the board of church extension. Several rooms for the church school were added in 1934. In 1948 when the church had over 900 members, the sanctuary was enlarged so as to seat over 400, and a chapel, offices, and more church school rooms were added. More church school space was completed in 1951, and in 1955 when the congregation numbered over 2,200, a new sanctuary seating 1,400 was erected. Additional lots for parking space were purchased. First Church created a memorial scholarship fund in 1951 which has assisted ten young men from its membership who have entered the ministry and has helped others going into full-time Christian service. In 1955 the church adopted a ten-year plan to give "as much for others as ourselves." The congregation has helped to build several new Methodist churches in the greater Miami area. A new education building was completed in 1967. In 1969 First Church reported 3,938 members, property valued at $1,424,920, and $341,907 raised for all purposes.

CORE, LEWIS ADDISON (1862-1959), was born in Cassville, W. Va., on Aug. 22, 1862. He received his B.A. degree at OHIO WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, and his B.D. from BOSTON UNIVERSITY. He was ordained in CALCUTTA, INDIA, in January 1890, having arrived there on Nov. 24, 1889. He married Mary Kennedy, a missionary of the WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY, in 1894.

On the death of W. A. Mansell in March 1913, Bishop WARNE and the NORTH INDIA CONFERENCE faced the problem of selecting a new principal for the theological seminary at Bareilly. Their decision was the appointment of Core. Early he had been recognized as a man of thorough scholarship, sound judgment, and careful attention to details, who always placed supreme emphasis on spiritual values. Also, he had had wide experience in district work at Moradabad, where for seventeen years he was in close touch with E. W. PARKER. Core had also served for a year as principal of LUCKNOW CHRISTIAN COLLEGE.

The work of the seminary was strengthened and developed in every department during his administration, and his successor in 1923 was an Indian—the first time the seminary had had an Indian principal. During Core's administration the work of the English department developed into a separate institution, teaching exclusively in English and offering advanced courses that led to the opening of the Indian Methodist Theological College in Jabalpur, now Leonard Theological College.

Before retiring the Cores administered the Budaon District until the end of 1928. Core's emphasis on the spiritual was invaluable in the developing work.

He left India in the early part of 1929 and retired in California. He lived until he was well past ninety-six years of age and died on Feb. 22, 1959, in Los Angeles.

CORINNE, UTAH, U.S.A. The Methodist church building in Corinne, believed to be the oldest Protestant church building in UTAH, was repaired and restored as a historic site in 1968 and 1969 by Methodists of that state. Corinne was a Gentile (i.e. non-Mormon) town owing its existence primarily to the building of the transcontinental railroad which was completed in Utah in 1869.

With the coming of the railroad came LEWIS HARTSOUGH, a Methodist minister functioning as a "railroad man" for the AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY. In December 1869, Hartsough was appointed superintendent of work in Utah for the M. E. Church, with headquarters in SALT LAKE CITY. Protestantism was ridiculed in Salt Lake City, but it found some response in the Gentile community of Corinne, where Hartsough preached occasionally.

Hartsough's health broke, and G. M. Peirce was appointed superintendent of the Utah Mission in 1870, preaching his first sermon in Corinne, June 15 of that year. On July 17 a subscription list for the church building was begun, and on Sept. 20, 1870, the building, costing $4,000, was dedicated by G. M. Peirce and Chaplain C. C. McCABE.

The church in Corinne was never prosperous, and when some feeder railroad lines were established, the community lost much of its significance as a shipping point. No Methodist pastor has been appointed to the community since 1958, when twenty-one church members were reported, fifteen of whom were removed by Quarterly Conference action and six transferred to other churches.

The churches in Brigham City and Tremonton, in cooperation with the ROCKY MOUNTAIN CONFERENCE Historical Society, decided to restore the building, that it might be used as a museum and visitor center and be staffed by church members from this particular area.

The restoration project was begun in August 1968, by youth from Centenary, Aldersgate, Tremonton, and Ogden First churches under the direction of the Rev. William O. Davis and Mrs. James A. Jensen. The Rocky Mountain Conference sent a $300 donation, and the youths paid their own travel and food expenses. The building's exterior was repainted, mortar was replaced in the outside brick work, the interior and bell tower were cleaned, and the original birch pews were revarnished.

A bell cast in 1852 by the Henry Cooper Company of Boston still hangs in the church tower. The hand-pump organ is still usable and there is a communion set which was hand-carved in Canada before the turn of the century. An antique highboy and a coal stove add a historic flavor to the structure. Restoration work was guided by a photograph taken "sometime before 1914." The formal ceremony to mark the re-opening of the church building was delayed until 1970 when the 100th year of Methodism in Utah was observed.

CORKHILL, THOMAS E. (1822-1897), American preacher, was born on the Isle of Man, April 24, 1822. His Methodist parents came to America before he was one year old and settled in Ohio. As a youth, Corkhill studied medicine and began practice in Henry County, Iowa, in 1849. In 1844, he married Lucinda Crawford, and they had ten children. One of their sons became a Methodist preacher.

In 1851, Corkhill abandoned medicine and was admitted to the IOWA CONFERENCE (ME). In the next three years he served Middletown, Iowa City Mission, and Dubuque. He was agent for IOWA WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, 1854-56, and helped to secure a charter for the school. He served as a trustee of Iowa Wesleyan, 1855-97, and was influential in persuading the brilliant James Harlan, later senator and secretary of the interior, to become Iowa Wesleyan's first president. Corkhill was appointed to the Mt. Pleasant District in the fall of 1860. Two years later, after having been reappointed to the district, he surrendered the office and was commissioned chaplain of the Twenty-Fifth Iowa Infantry. His successor on the district died in March, 1863, and Corkhill left the army and again took over the district. He served the Keokuk District, 1877-81. A leader in his conference, Corkhill was always prominent in its deliberations, and was one of its delegates to the 1860 and 1864 GENERAL CONFERENCES. Due largely to his foresight and influence, the legislature established the State Reform and Industrial Schools at Eldora and Mitchellville. He took the super-numerary relation in 1890, and died at Mt. Pleasant, June 30, 1897.

CORNELL, LEONIDES SAMUEL (1842-1912), American E.U.B. minister and educator, son of William and Electra Porter Cornell, was born in Athens County, Ohio, April 12, 1842. The family moved to a farm in Fulton County, Ill. in 1846, where young Cornell grew to manhood. He prepared for college at the Fulton Seminary, Lewiston, Ill., and graduated in 1870 from Westfield College, Westfield, Ill. with an A.B. degree. While pursuing his academic work he was admitted to the ILLINOIS CONFERENCE of the United Brethren in Christ and served several churches.

He married Mary Dawson of Lexington, Ill. in 1864, and they had three children. Ill health forced him to go to COLORADO, and they arrived in DENVER on Feb. 22, 1873. There Cornell devoted himself largely to educational work, teaching his first school in Bear Creek, Jefferson County. In 1877 he was elected county superintendent of schools for Boulder County, where he served two terms.

In 1880 he was elected State Superintendent of Public Instruction for Colorado. At the close of his term he was elected Regent of the State University and held the office for six years. He then worked for the Tribune Publishing Company of Denver, and in 1893 he took charge of the Del Norte Public School, but was again elected to the office of Superintendent of Public Instruction. He retired in 1899 after serving three terms.

During his years in Colorado he was active in the work of the ministry, serving with distinction in the Colorado Mission Conference, United Brethren in Christ. At one time he served as conference superintendent, and in all his association he sought to raise the level of education in the ministry.

He died Jan. 13, 1912 and is buried in Berthoud, Colo.

CORNELL COLLEGE, Mount Vernon, Iowa, was founded in 1853 by GEORGE B. BOWMAN, a Methodist circuit rider, and was called Iowa Conference Seminary. It was later named for William Cornell of New York, one of its generous donors. Cornell University, New York, named for Ezra Cornell, was founded in 1868, later by fifteen years.

The college experienced serious financial losses in the 1920's. Through the generosity of Mr. and Mrs. HENRY PFEIFFER, a financial expansion plan was later developed, and the college became one of the strongest in the Midwest. A Phi Beta Kappa chapter was installed in 1922. Degrees granted are the B.A. and B.M. (Music). The governing board has thirty-six trustees, elected by the board, nine of whom are nominated by the NORTH IOWA CONFERENCE.

CORNERSTONE LAYING. The laying of a cornerstone in a public building in which a church, a community, a state or a nation is interested, has always been an occasion for a formal ceremony. However, in the M. E. Church, until 1864, and in the M. E. Church, South, until 1870, the type of service to be held at the laying of a cornerstone was left to the judgment of the officiating preacher, or the local people. At the respective GENERAL CONFERENCES, in the years mentioned above, forms were provided for a cornerstone laying and published in their Disciplines as offices of the Ritual. From time to time these forms have been revised, but in general a sermon or address is called for, with prayers, hymns, etc. Quite often, documents or other materials of interest are placed in a container—which may be sealed against time and the weather—within the cornerstone itself.

A list of items placed within the cornerstone is sometimes read as part of the ceremony. The stone is finally put in place with the chief minister or ministers symbolically assisting. Quite often the architect or builder is present to be recognized on such occasions, and with his workmen sees that the stone is placed in proper position, with the mortar or cement which is to hold it in place put around and about it. The officiating minister frequently takes the trowel for the first placing of mortar.

The crux of this service is the prayer of dedication of the cornerstone. This the officiating minister reads from the Ritual at the appointed time, usually at the end of the service. Congregations often seek to have a bishop—if he may come—or the district superintendent, or some other prominent minister be on hand for such ceremonial occasions. While reading the dedicatory prayer, the officiating minister may symbolically place his hand upon the cornerstone. The service is sometimes concluded with a final hymn, or immediately after the prayer with the benediction. Reference should be made to the Ritual of the Church for a complete outline of the official form for the laying of a cornerstone as it may be at present.

CORNISH, GEORGE HENRY (1834-1912), Canadian minister and writer, was born in Exeter, England, and came to CANADA as a child. He was converted in the Richmond Street Methodist Church and in due time was called to the ministry. Received on trial in 1858, he was ordained in Ontario. Subsequently, he served on many circuits in Ontario. In addition, he held many offices, such as district chairman and journal secretary of the General Conference.

As a minister he was fervently evangelical, a kind counselor, and above all a systematic, methodical worker. This latter talent he put to good use in his capacity as General Conference statistician. As such, he published his two-volume Cyclopaedia of Methodism (1881, 1903), the sequel to a Handbook of Canadian Methodism (1867). This invaluable compilation was both accurate and comprehensive. It complemented the five-volume Case and His Cotemporaries, produced by Cornish's older colleague, John Carroll.

Cornish was awarded the LL.D. by Rutherford College, North Carolina, U.S.A. In 1901 he became a superannuated preacher, but he continued to live and work, as he was able, in Toronto. It was difficult for his brethren to accept the departure of one so active and tireless in the work of the church. His funeral was held in Toronto on Aug. 27, 1912.

CORNWALL. The traditional Cornish toast was "copper, fish, and tin." The mineral wealth of Cornwall was first exploited efficiently in the eighteenth century, when capitalist organization, new deposits, the use of engines and gunpowder, and the new coal-smelting process transformed the mining industry. By the 1830's, Cornwall produced two-thirds of the world's output of copper, and her population increased from 200,000 to 350,000. Gross inequalities of wealth brought widespread misery, and stimulated smuggling and the wrecking of vessels. The eighteenth-century tin miner was feared, shunned, and suspected of disaffection by his "betters." It was to the tinner that the Wesleys went; Cornish Methodism flourished because it won and held his loyalty.

Some of the classic stories of the revival are found in the thirty-two Cornish visits of JOHN WESLEY and the four visits of CHARLES in the period 1743 to 1789. Until 1746, clerical magistrates such as WALTER BORLASE suspected the Wesleys of Jacobitism and opposed the first Methodists; they succeeded in establishing a tradition of wholesale Anglican persecution. Nevertheless, Cornish Methodists for a century or more in some cases continued to go to Communion in their parish churches. John Wesley himself was nearly arrested for the king's service near Gwennap in 1745. Mob violence broke out at St. Ives, where the preaching house was pulled down in 1744, and at Falmouth, where a mob led by crews of privateers trapped Wesley in a house. They roared, "Bring out the Canorum. Where is the Canorum [Cornish cant term for a Methodist]?" They broke down the door, and Wesley escaped by calmly facing his persecutors and talking some of them into becoming his protectors.

The St. Ives clergy was hostile—one of them at Zennor publicly denounced the Methodists for holding "that damnable Popish doctrine of justification by faith"—but others such as GEORGE THOMAS of St. Gennys and JOHN BENNET of Laneast were evangelical allies of Wesley, at least for a time. Wesley's correspondence with SAMUEL WALKER of Truro was very important for Methodist-Anglican relationships. From JOHN NELSON's Journal in 1743 comes the story of him and John Wesley sleeping on a St. Ives floor:

He had my greatcoat for a pillow, and I had Burkitt's Notes on the New Testament for mine. After being here for near three weeks, one morning, about three o'clock, Mr. Wesley turned over, and finding me awake, clapped me on the side, saying, "Brother Nelson, let us be of good cheer; I have one whole side yet, for the skin is off but on one side."

A real moral change was apparent, despite the partiality of some Cornish Methodists for smuggling. Charles Wesley reported on Aug. 4, 1744, that "last Assizes there was a jail delivery—not one felon to be found in their prisons—which has not been known before in the memory of man." John Wesley wrote of St. Ives in 1748, "The lives of this society have convinced most of the town that we preach the very truth of the gospel."

Wesley first preached in Gwennap Pit, a huge natural amphitheater, on Sept. 4, 1762. Later he spoke to huge crowds there, which he estimated in 1781 at 23,000 people. Many societies were formed in industrial western Cornwall; there was a slower growth in the more rural east. At Wesley's death in 1791 there were 4,192 members in three circuits, of which 3,242 were in the two western circuits of Redruth and St. Ives. From 1801 to 1821 there was a thirty-seven percent increase in population and a seventy-four percent increase in Methodist membership; in 1821, one out of nineteen Cornishmen was a Methodist. The Episcopal visitation returns of 1821 noted Methodist activity in almost every parish. Impassioned revivals in the mining areas caused striking increases in membership, followed by equally striking declines; the Redruth Circuit in 1814 returned 4,408 members (the largest in the Wesleyan Methodist connection), but by 1821 numbers had returned to the pre-revival level. This 1814 revival was the biggest of a series which followed in part a sixteen-year cycle: 1764, 1782, 1798, 1814, 1824, 1833, 1839, 1848-49, 1862-65. The fact that so many fell away helped to ensure that the general influence of Methodism was much greater than its membership. The vicar of Crowan said in 1833: "In a few words, we have lost the people. The religion of the mass is become Wesleyan Methodism."

There are many reasons for this. The Established Church was too inelastic to cope with the new conditions created by industrial revolution, and was out of touch with the mining population. Dissent was weak, though it underwent a limited revival in the early nineteenth century. Methodism, on the other hand, put its trust in the miners, and invited them to take up positions of leadership in the chapels. The emphasis on assurance met the need of the miner in this hard, uncertain life. All this roused a deep love of Cornish Methodists for Methodism, and bred a Methodist self-sufficiency which lessened its attachment to the Church of England.

In addition to the tanners, however, there was a nouveau riche middle class which provided Methodist leaders. PETER JACO of Newlyn and RICHARD RODDA of Sancreed were Wesley's itinerants. Later noted Wesleyan ministers included RICHARD TREFFRY, the father (1771-1842) and the son (1804-38), JOHN STEPHENS of St. Dennis, and SAMUEL DUNN of Megavissey. The elder Treffry and Stephens became Presidents of the WESLEYAN METHODIST CONFERENCE, while Dunn was one of the three ministers expelled in 1849. There were many well-known local preachers: SAMUEL DREW of St. Austell was a shoemaker and metaphysician; "Foolish Dick" Hampton of Illogan (1782-1858) was a half-witted but shrewd son of a miner. GEORGE SMITH of Camborne was a biblical scholar and the historian of Wesleyan Methodism in the first half of the nineteenth century. WILLIAM CARVOSSO of Mousehole (1750-1834) was an outstanding class leader. THE BIBLE CHRISTIANS had a Cornish founder, WILLIAM O'BRYAN of Luxulian. They originated on the northeast Cornish border and soon spread through the county, their revival-ism and use of itinerant female preachers arousing great interest. Their most well-known figure was WILLIAM (Billy) BRAY of Twelve-heads, an eccentric and over-rated local preacher whose posthumous reputation was made up by F. W. Bourne's life of him.

PRIMITIVE METHODISM was introduced into Redruth and St. Austell by WILLIAM CLOWES in 1825. They soon spread to St. Ives, Penzance, Newlyn, and Liskeard, but they overreached their strength, and by 1857 had only 2,083 members in five circuits. A small society of the Leeds Protestant Methodists existed near Helston from 1830 to 1835. Painful and damaging secessions from the Wesleyan circuits took place in 1835-37: at Camelford, 604 out of 702 seceded; Helston, 324 went out of 1,545; and Liskeard, 425 out of 1,160 withdrew. The seceders became members of the WESLEYAN METHODIST ASSOCIATION. They amalgamated with the WESLEYAN REFORMERS of the St. Columb, Truro and Camborne-Redruth areas in 1856-57 to form the UNITED METHODIST FREE CHURCHES, with a membership of 3,721 in eight circuits. The METHODIST NEW CONNEXION arose in 1833 as far as Cornwall was concerned, as a result of a division among the Truro Wesleyans. WILLIAM BOOTH conducted a mission for them at Truro in 1857, when there were only 125 members.

The Teetotal Wesleyans were almost entirely a West Cornish secession arising from the Wesleyan Methodist ban on teetotal meetings on trust premises in 1841. Some of the TEETOTAL METHODISTS later joined the Wesleyan Methodist Association; the remainder joined the New Connexion in 1860. This all led to a multiplication of chapels, but for the time being they flourished in concert. This situation began to change, however, in the last quarter of the nineteenth century, when the traditional Cornish economy was destroyed. Foreign competition caused the collapse of copper (1866) and tin (around 1890), and the decline of fishing and agriculture. The coming of the railways, the clay china industry, and the slow growth of tourism could not prevent widespread emigration; Cornwall has not yet recovered from these disasters, which were reflected in Methodism; emigration drained off its vitality. Those who remained tended to lose their nerve and stubbornly resist further change.

Despite the decline in membership there was opposition to Methodist Union in 1932 from the Cornwall Wesleyan District, and there was strong resistance to the local amalgamations of circuits which followed; redundancy became a major problem in the area after 1932. In the most recent period, many young Methodists capable of leadership left home because of lack of opportunities; at the same time there came a large influx of retired people. All this came at the time when the winds of secularism were beginning to blow. The membership declined from about 30,000 in 1932 to 20,659 in 1965, the biggest declines being in the old industrial areas of Hayle and Camborne-Redruth. The new Cornish Methodism has to cope with young people who will leave the country as they grow up, older people who go to Cornwall to retire, and the thousands of visitors who every year seek rest and recreation.

CORPRON, ALEXANDER (1875-1962), distinguished medical missionary in India, was born in Florence, Ontario, CANADA, March 25, 1875, and graduated from the University of Michigan with an M.D. degree in 1898. He practiced medicine at MINNEAPOLIS, MINN. and Medford, Ore., and acquired wide recognition as a general surgeon.

He became deeply concerned about the small attention given to the ministry of healing in missions and decided that he should go to INDIA. On arrival at LUCKNOW in October 1906, he found that the conference had neither asked for a medical missionary nor had plans to use one. Instead, the conference wanted a pastor for a church in Lucknow, and the bishop appointed the doctor to the pastorate. However, a few weeks later he was appointed to medical work in Eastern Kumaun. There was no hospital or money available, but the need was great, and he financed a program of medical work by selling property that he owned in Minneapolis.

Early in 1911 Corpron was appointed to Nadiad in Gujarat. Limited funds had been collected for a hospital there. He accepted the challenge and within a few months patients were assembling in numbers greater than could be accommodated. His reputation as a surgeon was quickly established. Wealthy industrialists from nearby Ahmadabad and distant BOMBAY were attracted, as were the poorest and most neglected from the villages and from city slums. The wealthy contributed funds needed for equipment and for new buildings, and thus the Methodist Hospital at Nadiad was founded.

Another highly trained and skilful surgeon, Herschel Aldrich, a second-generation missionary, joined Corpron in 1930 and succeeded him in 1936. The hospital made dramatic gains under Aldrich and his associates. A school of nursing and a school for training laboratory technicians extended the influence of the hospital.

The first Gujarati doctor on the staff was R. K. Parmar, who served faithfully for many years. Amarjit Chitambar, one of the four sons of Methodism's first Indian bishop, JASHWANT RAO CHITAMBAR, served for several years before passing his specialty board examinations and joining the medical college of the University of the Punjab.

One of the beloved nurses at this hospital, Elizabeth Taylor, while serving as dean of nursing at the Christian Medical College in Vellore, was awarded by the International Committee of Red Cross Societies the Florence Nightingale Medal for her "outstanding role" in raising the standards of nursing in India and for "exceptional devotion to duty."

Wilma Cracknell, Theresa Lorenz, and Myrtle Precise, among others, gave many years to nursing in this hospital, and Hannah Gallagher organized and placed on firm foundations the associated School for Training Laboratory Technicians.

Corpron's daughter, Ruth, was on the staff of the hospital for several years.

CORPUS CHRISTI, TEXAS, U.S.A. Methodism first appeared in Corpus Christi in 1846 when the TEXAS CONFERENCE sent John Haynie there as a missionary because in the winter and spring of 1845-46 an American army under the command of General Zachary Taylor had camped nearby. Haynie arrived February 4 and began preaching regularly in a theater. A few weeks later the army left the area, and Haynie also departed. In December, 1851 the Texas Conference listed Corpus Christi "to be supplied." In 1852 the town was incorporated, and the conference appointed Henderson Lafferty there. In 1853 Lafferty succeeded in organizing a society with eighteen white and six colored members, and he led in building an adobe church. As the only public building in town, the structure was used also by other denominations, and it served as a sort of community center. In 1876 the Methodists erected a frame church which served as a school house on week days. The congregation grew slowly; in 1900 the church had 129 members. By 1910 there were 300, and about 1914 a second church was established in the town. In 1938 a third church was organized. After World War II Methodism in Corpus Christi grew rapidly. A total membership of some 2,150 in 1941 more than doubled by 1950 and doubled again by the late 1960's. By that time there were ten white, one Negro, and two Spanish-speaking churches in the city. First Church was the largest with 3,581 members. In 1969 the thirteen churches in Corpus Christi reported 11,587 members, property valued at $6,000,000, and some $500,000 raised for all purposes.

First Church, organized in 1853, one year after the town was incorporated, remains the oldest church in the city. Its story is largely told in the account above. The church grew with the city, slowly at first, more rapidly later. In 1893 after forty years, the church had only 131 members, but in 1933, after another forty-year period, it reported 1,370. In 1950, there were 2,858 members. In recent years First Church has led in establishing new churches in the city, spacing them geographically so as to avoid duplication and competition. At the same time the congregation has maintained a strong missionary interest, supporting two missionaries, a husband and wife, on the foreign field. Between 1853 and 1969, forty-three ministers served as pastors of First Church. In 1970 the church reported 3,593 members, property valued at $2,653,348, and $316,671 raised for all purposes.

His conference elected him a member of the General Conference in 1932, 1940 and 1944. As bishop he was assigned to the superintendency of the Philadelphia area of The Methodist Church, at that time comprising the New Jersey, the Philadelphia, and the Central Pennsylvania Conferences. He remained in that Area for twenty-four years, until his retirement in 1968.

He served as President of the World Methodist Council, being elected to that position in 1960 for a five-year term. He was President of the Council of Bishops from 1952-53 and also served as President of the General Board of Education of The Methodist Church from 1948-1960. The Governor of Pennsylvania appointed him a member of the Governor's Commission for revision of the Constitution of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

On special missions he, in 1947, was appointed by the Secretary of War to study occupation problems in Europe and made seven round-the-world tours studying conditions in missions, education and government about that time. In 1947-48 he represented the Council of Bishops in China and Japan at the centennial of China Methodism, and inspected the U.S. occupation in Japan as the official guest of General Douglas MacArthur. In 1951 he was a delegate to the World Methodist Conference in Oxford, England, and in 1955-59 was the fraternal messenger to British and Irish Methodist Conferences.

In 1962 Bishop Corson headed the Methodist observers to the Vatican Council and was honored with an extended period of visitation by Pope John XXIII who expressed interest in the worldwide work of Methodism and said that he did not forget Methodist bishops in his prayers.

Bishop Corson has delivered numerous lectures, among them the Peyton Lectures at Southern Methodist University, and the Gray Lectures at Duke, the Tipple Lectures at Drew, and the Willson Lectures at Centenary College, and the Quillian Lectures at Emory University. He was chosen by his fellow bishops to deliver the Episcopal address at the quadrennial General Conference in 1956.

Bishop Corson has written widely. Among his books have been a Christian Philosophy of Education for the Postwar World and The Christian Imprint. He continues to live in Philadelphia.

COSBY, LOUIS F. (1807-1883), Methodist Protestant preacher, was born in Staunton, Va., Jan. 14, 1807, the son of Dabney C. and Frances D. Cosby. He married Jane E. BeKern, January 13, 1833, and they had seven children. His wife died in 1853, and in 1861 he married Elizabeth Montgomery.

Licensed as an exhorter in the M. E. Church in 1828, Cosby soon joined the M. P. Church in Lynchburg, Va., and was a lay representative to the organizing session of the Virginia Conference in June, 1829. He served as assistant secretary on that occasion, and later was president of the conference two different times. Licensed as a M. P.

preacher, Dec. 12, 1829, he was admitted to the Virginia Conference and was appointed associate pastor at Lynchburg. He was stationed at Abingdon, 1831-32, and was sent to Norfolk in 1833. While there he assisted in organizing a church in nearby Portsmouth. In 1834 he was appointed to the Lynchburg and Bedford Circuit which had churches in six counties. The next year he located. In time he settled at Oakland, Va., where he farmed and preached. In 1834 he began writing under the pseudonym of Onesimus for The Methodist Protestant. He was a delegate to the 1870 General Conference. Western Maryland College awarded him the D.D. degree in 1872. He died July 6, 1883.

COSMOS is the commonly accepted designation for what is more properly listed as the Commission on the Structure of Methodism Overseas. This commission was authorized by the General Conference of 1948 as a liaison group between the General Conference of The Methodist Church and the churches overseas that had come into existence as the result of American missionary outreach. All memorials for changes in relationships of the General Conference to the churches overseas were considered and presented by this commission.

The commission saw that such remarkable developments were taking place overseas that the very structure of American Methodism needed study and revision, so that decisions for autonomy for these churches, or continued relation to the General Conference, might be made wisely. The General Conference of 1964 authorized a study conference of 175 overseas delegates and 125 from the U.S.A., to be held at Green Lake, Wis. It considered three possibilities: first, only such changes as seemed immediately mandatory; or, formation of a world council of Methodist Churches made up of autonomous churches meeting for fellowship and discussion; or, formation of a world church with regional autonomy. Pursuant to the Green Lake discussions, the 1968 General Conference authorized COSMOS to hold a world Methodist structure congress during the quadrennium 1968-72, and directed that there be also Jurisdictional convocations to inform and secure the judgment of American Methodists as to future United Methodist structure such as might best enable the church to fulfill its mission. In general, COSMOS is the representative agent and movement looking toward a worldwide Methodist organization—or reorganization. It envisions a structure which would leave the Methodists of any country free to come into or leave the world structure and to create within their own borders a united church if they desire so to do.

COSTA RICA is a country of Central America and a charter member of the United Nations. The area is 19,653 square miles, and the population (1968 est.) is 1,631,000. The capital is San José. Elements of prehistoric civilizations have been found there. Costa Rica was conquered and held by Spain until early in the nineteenth century. The five republics of Central America achieved freedom from Spain in 1821, and since then Costa Rica has maintained independence. Except for a brief period after

CHAPEL AT SCHOOL FOR PREPARATION OF METHODIST WORKERS, ALAJUELA, COSTA RICA

World War I, Costa Rica has enjoyed a degree of political stability almost unique among the Latin countries. The government has a firm democratic base. Elementary education is compulsory and free, and the people pride themselves in having more schoolteachers than men at arms, and more school rooms than police stations.

Around the turn of the century, FRANCISCO G. PENZOTTI, a Methodist evangelist, preached in San José and other cities as agent for the AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY. His work prepared for later organization. In 1918, under a comity agreement, the M. E. Church was established by GEORGE A. MILLER (later bishop), as superintendent of the PANAMA MISSION. Eduardo Zapata of Mexico was appointed as pastor-in-charge at San José, and Rev. and Mrs. C. W. Ports came later in the year as the first Methodist missionaries. In addition to San José, congregations were organized in towns along the Inter-American Highway between San José and Panama. When a congregation developed at Golfito, a new banana port on the Pacific, the United Fruit Company provided a chapel. A training school for evangelistic workers in San José is a memorial to Mrs. Miller. The Colegio Metodista is the only government-recognized Protestant school whose graduates may enter the university in full accreditation. Church membership approaches 1,000, with a much larger constituency.

Costa Rica celebrated the fifteenth anniversary of its Methodism in 1967 with the seventh session of the Provisional Annual Conference of Costa Rica. The first meetings of the conference were held in El Redentor Methodist Church in San José, near the spot where Methodist work began fifty years before with George Amos Miller in charge. The observances continued throughout the fall of that year. The conference changed the name of the training school to the Methodist Theological Seminary. Bishop PEDRO ZOTTELE, who had been elected bishop in 1962 to fill out the term of Bishop B. FOSTER STOCKWELL, had been reelected for a four-year term by the 1964 LATIN AMERICA CENTRAL CONFERENCE, and he presided over the COSTA RICA PROVISIONAL ANNUAL CONFERENCE.

In early 1969, upon the retirement of Bishop Zottele, FEDERICO PAGURA was elected bishop and assigned to the Costa Rica and Panama Area, as president of that Provisional Conference.

British-related Methodism in Costa Rica began in 1889, when a Jamaican carpenter, Sidney E. Stewart, came to work on citrus and sugar-cane farms. He collected hundreds of signatures for a petition to the Methodist leader in Panama, asking for a minister to be stationed in Costa Rica. Under the leadership of the West Indian, E. A. Pitt, who worked in Costa Rica for several years before entering the ministry in 1900, churches were built along a railroad at Limon, Pacuaribo, and Siquirres. The church never became large, however, and now ministers to about 700 Negro members.

The Methodist Theological Seminary, Alajuela, Costa Rica, is an institution which was founded in 1957, largely through the efforts of Bishop George A. Miller and friends, under the name of The Training School for Methodist Workers, for the purpose of training ministerial students and deaconesses of Costa Rica and Panama. The name was changed to the present name recently as one of the steps toward upgrading entrance requirements and the level of training. The possibility of establishing a Union Seminary is being promoted among other mission groups in Central America.

The Seminary is situated in the Central Plateau of Costa Rica, fifteen miles from San José. It is financed by the World Division and the Woman's Division of the BOARD OF MISSIONS of The United Methodist Church and by the Annual Conferences of Panama and Costa Rica.

Since 1965 a department of sacred music has been training young men and women to help in this area in the local churches. An active extension program is also carried on by this department. Special postgraduate courses and courses for laymen have recently been added to the curriculum. At present the school has approximately twenty students, in addition to those in the extension program.

Two large buildings and a duplex provide space for living quarters for students and faculty, for library, classrooms, offices, kitchen and dining room. A chapel was built in 1960 in memory of Margaret Miller, wife of Bishop Miller.

Marion F. Woods is director of the Seminary.

COUGHLAN, LAWRENCE (? -1785), was born and educated in Ireland. He traveled as one of JOHN WESLEY's preachers from 1755 to 1764, when, without Wes-ley's permission, he sought and obtained ordination by the Greek bishop, Erasmus. In 1765 he came to NEWFOUNDLAND on his own responsibility and began a ministry at Harbour Grace and the nearby settlement of Carbonear.

Some of the inhabitants of these communities asked the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel to appoint him as a missionary to them. He was so appointed and, with Wesley's encouragement, was ordained by the Bishop of London. Returning to Newfoundland in September, 1767, Coughlan continued to preach along Methodist lines. Writing to Wesley from Harbour Grace in 1772, he said: "I am and do confess . . . myself to be a Methodist. The name I love and hope I ever shall. The plan which you first taught me, I have followed, both as to doctrine and discipline." He formed CLASSES, held LOVE FEASTS, and formed one of the earliest Methodist societies in North America. When in the face of persecution he returned to England in 1773 there were two hundred communicants in the area he had served. He had visited Blackhead, twenty miles from Harbour Grace, where under his preaching many people were converted, and where they built in fourteen days a chapel to contain four hundred persons. Fishermen from the Isle of Jersey, who were influenced by his preaching, on returning home established Methodism in the CHANNEL ISLANDS. In 1776 he published his Brief Account of the Work of God in Newfoundland.

After his return to England he served for some time as minister of Cumberland Street Chapel, London. At Harbour Grace in 1966 a monument was erected by the National Historic Sites and Monuments Board of Canada to commemorate the man who introduced Methodism to Newfoundland.

COULSON, CHARLES ALFRED (1910-), British LOCAL PREACHER and scientist, was born in Dudley, 1910, and educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, of which he was Fellow, 1933-38. He has held several academic appointments, and is at present Director of the Mathematical Institute at Oxford. He has written three technical books and about three hundred research papers, chiefly in the field of quantum theory and theoretical chemistry, and has earned a reputation as a speaker and writer on the relations between science and religion. Among his books in this field are Christianity in an Age of Science (Riddell Memorial Lectures, 1953), Science and Christian Belief (John Calvin McNair Lectures, 1954), and Science, Technology, and the Christian (BECKLY LECTURE, 1960). He was elected Vice President of the Methodist Conference in 1959, and has been a member and speaker at various sessions of the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL since 1956.

COUNCIL, THE, an impractical and ill-fated scheme in early American Methodism, which Bishop ASBURY formulated in 1789—five years after the organization of the M. E. Church. The annual conferences, not then well organized as such, were scattered out over the seaboard; and the calling together of a general conference, which would have to be somewhat irregularly done at that time, made ASBURY feel that there might be a sort of executive body arranged, with he himself presiding, which might better supervise the work of the church. The Council was to be composed of the bishop and PRESIDING ELDERS, but never less than nine altogether; they were to have authority to mature everything they should judge "expedient." The unanimous approval of the Council would be required for any measure, and nothing would be binding on any one annual conference unless a majority of that conference should approve; and the bishop would have power to call a meeting at any time and any place.

Asbury hoped that the establishment of this body would mitigate some of the criticism directed toward him for exercising a truly supreme power in the church. THOMAS COKE saw the weakness of the scheme, and would not accept Asbury's judgment on the whole plan. Some of the best leaders and most loyal followers of Asbury were also arrayed against him on the matter of the Council. Men like THOMAS WARE and JESSE LEE were strongly in opposition, and these three men, with JAMES O'KELLY, were very much interested in firmly establishing a regular general conference. Asbury's plan was intended as a substitute for such a general assembly of the church.

The Council was doomed from its start, as the requirement of unanimity made impossible all but the most trivial pieces of legislation, and gave always a veto power to Asbury.

As it turned out, the Council did not last long and Asbury himself had to give way regarding it when Coke came back from Europe. Coke, too, wanted a GENERAL CONFERENCE, as did the brethren who were becoming leaders in the connection. As Asbury gave way, he wrote ironically to EZEKIEL COOPER, "No court is sufficient but a general conference."

When the long desired general conference assembled in 1792, it is said that Asbury would not even hear the word of the Council mentioned. So the first quadrennial general conference of the M. E. Church at that date took over, and became ever after the sovereign body of Methodism in the United States.

COUNCIL, COORDINATING. (See COORDINATING COUNCIL.)

COUNCIL OF ADMINISTRATION OF THE E. U. B. CHURCH, THE GENERAL. The General Council of Administration of the EVANGELICAL UNITED BRETHREN CHURCH was the administrative and program coordinating arm of the denomination. Its duties and functions were described in the Discipline of that church in great detail, and it became an extremely powerful administrative agency. One of its functions was the right to act for the denomination in any emergency arising during the quadrennium requiring immediate action, the Board of Bishops to determine what constituted an emergency.

The Council originated in the Church of the United Brethren in Christ. At the General Conference sessions in 1917 the need was felt for an agency which would correlate the total program of the denomination and supervise a special advance program. It was set up as "The Board of Administration," and had all the powers formerly assigned to the Commission on Finance. It was also empowered to be the coordinating body for the entire denomination acting with the bishops in securing harmony and efficiency in the plans of all church departments.

The council was officially organized May 21, 1917. J. S. Kendall served as its first executive secretary. He resigned Oct. 31, 1918, and was succeeded by S. S. Hough, who continued to serve in this office until 1937.

At its General Conference in 1938, The Evangelical Church voted to organize a General Administrative Council. It was the successor organization to the Commission on Finance. The duties of the Administrative Council were listed in the 1939 Discipline of the denomination, and included the right to determine the general budget for missions, education and benevolence, and to act for the denomination in an emergency between General Conferences. A. F. Weaver was elected executive secretary and treasurer.

When the two denominations were united in 1946, it was determined that the idea of the Council of Administration should be continued, and it was.

D. T. GREGORY was elected as the executive secretary and A. F. Weaver as the associate secretary. It was also provided in the plan and basis of union that the executive secretary was to be elected as the denominational statistician and the associate secretary was to serve as the general church treasurer. The title of associate secretary was dropped in 1955. Others who have served in the office of executive secretary are: L. L. BAUGHMAN, 1951-54; H. W. KAEBNICK, 1955-58; PAUL W. MILHOUSE, 1959-60; PAUL V. CHURCH, 1961-68. The following have also served in the office of the general church treasurer: H. W. Kaebnick, 1951-54, and Cawley H. Stine, 1955-68.

One of the primary functions of the General Council has been the correlation of the entire program of the denomination. This was not an easy task. In 1955 the General Conference established an Interboard Program Committee. Each agency in the church had at least one member representing it on this committee. Although some progress toward the goal of correlating and unifying the program of the church was made, the result was not wholly satisfactory. In order to strengthen this aspect of the work of the General Council of Administration, the General Conference of 1962 established the PROGRAM COUNCIL. All boards were made amenable to it in matters affecting local church program. The Program Council was able to correlate the program of the denomination and made real progress toward unifying it. The executive secretary of the Council of Administration served as Program Director.

There were also four areas of program work which were related to the Council of Administration: namely, the Departments of Stewardship, Social Action, Health and Welfare, and Communication.

Another major responsibility of the General Council of Administration came to be the handling of the denomination's ecumenical affairs. This had become increasingly important in its later years and constantly demanded a large segment of the time of the Executive Secretary. It then became expedient to employ a full-time executive in this area and PAUL WASHBURN was elected as such in 1964.

In The United Methodist Church. The Program Council of the E. U. B. Church was taken over into The United Methodist Church by the PLAN OF UNION between the Methodists and the E. U. B. connection in 1968. It embodies in The United Methodist organization many of the provisions which it had in the E. U. B. connection. It is an incorporated body responsible only to the General Conference. Upon it serve at present fifteen bishops, three from each Jurisdiction and four ministers who are pastors and seven laymen from each Jurisdiction. This body continues to have great executive power, especially in correlating the work of the various boards and agencies. During the first quadrennium of The U. M. C. many details of administration continued to be worked out in this new, to the Methodists, body.

While the different Jurisdictions may have Program Councils if they please, they are not directed to have such though the Annual Conferences are. In each Annual Conference there must be a Conference Program Council whose duties are carefully outlined in the Discipline.

In each local church there must be a Council on Ministries whose duties are outlined in the Discipline as part of the work of the Program Council.

COUNCIL OF BISHOPS (The United Methodist Church, U.S.A.). The Constitution of The United Methodist Church provides: "there shall be a Council of Bishops composed of all the Bishops of all the Jurisdictional and Central Conferences. The Council shall meet at least once a year and plan for the general oversight and promotion of the temporal and spiritual interests of the entire church, and for carrying into effect rules, regulations, and responsibilities prescribed and enjoined by the General Conference and in accord with the provisions set forth in this PLAN OF UNION." (Division 3, Article III of the Constitution.)

The Council of Bishops is thus established as a constitutional entity. This gives it standing which neither the Board of Bishops in the former M. E. Church, nor the College of Bishops in the former M. E. Church, South, had. Both Board and College depended for their strength upon the individual bishops who composed them, as these men themselves met as Board and/or College and performed supervisory duties. There was no reference to and no standing given to either Board or College in the respective pre-union DISCIPLINES. Each bishop, however, was considered a general superintendent of the entire church.

With the adoption of the Plan of Union, the bishops of the Church were compartmentalized to an extent in their general church supervisory capacities by being placed in separate jurisdictions, or central conferences. What, however, each bishop lost in the way of personal general superintendency, the bishops as a whole gained by their organization constitutionally into a Council. This body has tremendous power under its mandate to meet and oversee the promotion of the "temporal and spiritual" interests of the entire Church. Its semi-annual meetings, as they now are, are attended by all the bishops of The United Methodist Church from all lands, and the program of the Council is so arranged as to call up for review and for direction all matters of moment which may press upon this Methodist Church anywhere in the world. The actions of the Council in matters of church-wide interest is of supreme connectional importance.

The Council of Bishops is empowered by the constitution to transfer bishops from one jurisdiction to another in certain instances, and to assign bishops under certain situations to work within a particular jurisdiction. The Council of Bishops makes its own rules, though the General Conference has been given authority under a constitutional provision to "define and fix the powers, duties and privileges of the Episcopacy" (Constitution, Division I, Art. IV.5). However, the old Restrictive Rule (see RESTRICTIVE RULES) of the Episcopal Methodist Churches forbidding the General Conference to "change or alter any part or rule of our government so as to do away Episcopacy or destroy the plan of our itinerant general superintendency," stands.

The Council of Bishops acts as a sort of local church for the bishops who compose it, since they cannot be members of the General or Jurisdictional or Annual Conferences, and it never has been decided where a bishop's personal church membership inheres. They, in their Council, watch over each other, and hold a memorial service for their deceased brethren at one of their sessions during each year. The Council elects its own officers and makes its own rules for guidance in its many processes—all in harmony, of course, with Disciplinary powers.

COUNCIL GROVE, KANSAS, U.S.A., the site of an early Methodist mission, is presently the county seat of Morris County, Kan., with a population of some 3,000 persons. However, its importance for Methodism began in the early 1800's. Council Grove was the most important way point on the Santa Fé Trail between the MISSOURI border—then the western limit of American settlement—and the Spanish town of Santa Fé. Council Grove being a fertile spot became a meeting place for settlers to take "council" for their mutual safety in the long trip ahead. It was at Council Grove that the United States commissioners negotiated with the Osage Indians for passage across their lands. The right-of-way, surveyed by the government in 1825-1827, became the Santa Fé Trail as it is still known, and from this "council" with the Osages came the name, Council Grove.

A treaty was made with the Kansa (or Kaw) Indians in 1846, giving them a reservation about twenty miles square, including the site of present Council Grove. Traders and government agents soon followed the tribe there. The treaty of 1846 had provided that the government would make an annual payment of $1,000 for educating the Kaw Indians on location. In 1850 the M. E. Church, South, which had maintained a missionary to the tribe before this, made a contract with the government to establish a mission and school on the new reservation at Council Grove. The government provided funds for the building, and Allen T. Ward, an employee at the SHAWNEE METHODIST MISSION and Manual Labor School near the present KANSAS CITY, was sent to Council Grove to superintend construction. The building was designed to accommodate fifty students as regular boarders, in addition to teachers, missionaries, farmers, and other mission workers. The building was completed in February 1851, and school began in May 1851, under the direction of Thomas Sears Huffaker, who had also been at the Shawnee Manual Labor School. Henry Webster was in charge of the farming and stock, and Mrs. Webster supervised the kitchen. Classes for Indian children were held until 1854, when the school was closed because of the excessive cost—$50 a year—of maintaining each student.

The Kaw Indians never responded well to the efforts of the church, sending to school only boys who were orphans or dependents of the tribe, while girls were not allowed to attend school at all. Tribe members considered education and the ways of the white man degrading to the Indian character. While the school was in session, attendance averaged about thirty students, who received instruction in spelling, reading, writing and arithmetic. Indian boys worked on the farm, displaying facility in learning the principles of agriculture, but received no instruction in the trades. After the government withdrew its support in 1854, a school for the white children of Council Grove, one of the first in Kansas territory, was continued.

Under a treaty of 1859 the Mission building and grounds were conveyed by a United States land patent to the Council Grove Town Company in 1863. Descendants of Thomas Huffaker bought the land, from which, in 1951, the Kansas legislature authorized the purchase to be operated as a museum by the Kansas State Historical Society.

COUNCIL ON MINISTRIES (Local Church). (See PROGRAM COUNCIL, The.)

COUNCIL ON WORLD SERVICE AND FINANCE. (See WORLD SERVICE AND FINANCE, COUNCIL ON.)

COURSES OF STUDY. The Methodist Church has always expected its ministers to spend time in reading and study. JOHN WESLEY admonished his early preachers to spend at least five hours a day in reading "the most useful books." American Methodists placed Wesley's admonitions in the 1785 Discipline; and FRANCIS ASBURY, although not favoring extensive formal education, urged the circuit riders to "read while they rode."

Later bishops set courses of reading for their ministers and sometimes examined them during annual conferences. By 1816, the bishops had agreed to recommend that a course of study be required of all ministers, and the General Conference in that year instructed the bishops to set up such a course in each annual conference. Either the bishop or a committee of his appointment was to formulate the course and candidates for the ministry were to be examined as to their mastery of the required subjects. This action was the basis for the more formal Conference Course of Study that later served as standard ministerial preparation for more than a century.

With extent, content, and integrity in the hands of individual bishops and conferences, the content and conduct of the course was far from uniform. For the most part, however, it coincided with the required two years "on trial," and included a solid core of Bible and doctrinal study, as well as grammar, rhetoric, geography, and history.

The General Conference of 1844 extended the course, instructing the bishops to prescribe a course in literature and science for admission on trial, and a four-year course of study for candidates for the ministry. In that year the first uniform course for all conferences was announced. The uniform list of books first appeared in the Discipline of the M. E. Church in 1848, and in that of the M. E. Church, South in 1878. In 1876, with two-thirds of its ministers being local preachers, the M. E. General Conference ordered a course of study for that group. At various times special courses were provided for ministers in the German, Swedish, Danish, Norwegian, and Spanish language conferences.

The Methodist Protestant Church also developed courses of study. In 1830 the first Constitution and Discipline carried a list of thirty books to be studied over a three-year period. In 1834 the number was reduced to nineteen: ten for license to preach and nine additional for ordination. The same Discipline carried a list of forty-three books recommended as the minister's basic library. The 1858 Discipline carried a list of books almost identical with that of the M. E. Church and placed the course in the hands of the annual conferences.

By the middle of the nineteenth century the practice of all three branches of the church was similar. The prescribed books in all included The Bible, Wesley's fifty-two Standard Sermons, Wesley's Notes on Old and New Testaments, Richard Watson's Theological Institutes, and W. B. Pope's Compendium of Christian Theology. Non-theological subjects included before the development of public education were dropped and books on personal and social ethics were added. In all three churches the courses were in the hands of the bishops and the annual conferences and were administered by appointed or elected boards of examiners.

With the spread of collegiate education the demand arose for a better educated clergy. Theological seminaries were being established and the adequacy of the courses of study was being questioned. Many steps were taken to improve both content and administration. One action was to place supervision in the hands of a central agency—the Bureau of Correspondence of the M. E. Church, South in 1902, the Commission on Course of Study of the M. E. Church in 1916. After 1939 the work was continued in the Commission on Course of Study, later renamed the Commission on Ministerial Training. In 1944 the Commission was associated with the Board of Education, and in 1952 the General Conference assigned to the Department of Ministerial Education, Division of Higher Education, Board of Education full responsibility for prescribing "studies required for license to preach, introductory studies, and the four-year course of study," as well as advanced readings and studies for those who had completed the prescribed work.

At the time of reunion in 1939, entrance into annual conference membership in all three branches was normally through the Conference Course of Study for Traveling Ministers. The Discipline of 1940, while not setting any minimum education requirements, provided that graduation from theological seminary could be accepted in lieu of the course of study. In 1956 the General Conference made college and seminary graduation the standard for admission to an annual conference, with admission through the course study becoming the exception.

The Discipline of 1968 of The United Methodist Church continues the Courses of Study under the jurisdiction of the Department of the Ministry, working through the Boards of the Ministry of the respective annual conferences. It also provides for the courses to be offered at pastors' schools, usually held at theological seminaries during the summer, with correspondence work being provided for part-time supply pastors and others unable to attend such schools.

The Courses of Study, no longer the main doorway to conference membership, are now largely an educational program for approved supply pastors. They set requirements of reading and study for license to preach, for achieving and retaining the office of approved supply pastor, for administering the sacraments, and for ordination as local deacon and elder. They also continue to provide an entry into annual conference membership for persons who have not met the regular educational requirements but whose ministry has warranted special consideration.

COVENANT SERVICE. This is a form drawn up by JOHN WESLEY himself. A greatly modified form is explained as well as carried in The Book of Offices of The Methodist Church of Great Britain and Ireland. This is also found in the Book of Worship for Church and Home of The United Methodist Church, U.S.A., entitled: "An Order of Worship for Such as Would Enter into or Renew Their Covenant with God; For Use in a Watch Night Service, on the First Sunday of the Year, or Other Occasion."

On Dec. 25, 1747, John Wesley strongly urged the Methodists to renew their Covenant with God. His first Covenant Service was held in the French Church at Spitalfields on Aug. 11, 1755, when he recited the words of "that blessed man Richard Alleine," which he published that year in the Christian Library. Wesley issued this Covenant Service as a pamphlet in 1780, and the form was used without alteration for nearly a century. Various modifications were then made, until a later form was prepared which gave the people a larger share in the devotions. That form has now been revised with a deep sense of the importance of a service which has been a fruitful source of blessing to Methodism ever since 1755.

A special hymn called the covenant hymn, "Come, Let Us Use the Grace Divine," was written for this service by CHARLES WESLEY. The service itself begins either with the Wesley hymn or with some other suitable one, and through a successive series of prayers, meditations and thanksgiving, an adoration and confession litany proceeds into a final covenant which all are expected to repeat in unison. The office closes with the Sursum corda, "Lift up your hearts," and the trisagion, "Holy, Holy, Holy," as from the Ritual of Holy Communion. A rubric in the American Book of Worship states, "Holy Communion may follow this service beginning with the prayer of consecration; or a hymn may be sung and a blessing benediction immediately given." (See also WORSHIP, BRITISH METHODIST.)

COVINGTON, KENTUCKY, U.S.A. Methodism began in the vicinity of what is now Covington in 1804 when the Licking Circuit was organized. A Methodist society was formed in Covington in 1827, a Sunday school was organized in 1831, and a brick church was built in 1832. Covington first appeared in conference appointments in 1832 when W. P. McKnight was appointed to "Newport and Covington." Covington became a station in 1838 and reported 156 members the next year. After the division of 1844, First Church, or Scott Street Church as it was then called, voted to adhere South. Second Church (MES) was organized in 1878.

Some twenty-seven members of First Church, unwilling to go into the M. E. Church, South, withdrew and formed Wesley Chapel M. E. Church, later known as Union Church. Prior to the Civil War, two more M. E. congregations were formed in the town, a German church in 1849 and Main Street Church in 1857. Union Church erected a small building in 1855 and a larger one at the close of the war. The windows of the latter were painted red, white, and blue to show the congregation's loyalty to the Union. In 1869 the Union members sponsored the organization of Shinkle Church, named for AMOS SHINKLE, banker and philanthropist, who served as Sunday school superintendent at Union Church, 1864-92.

At unification in 1939, the M. E. Church had six congregations in Covington with 2,341 active members, and the Southern Church had two congregations with 1,073 members. Today Covington is the head of a district in the KENTUCKY CONFERENCE.

In 1970 The United Methodist Church had eight congregations in the city, First Church being the largest with 685 members. In that year the eight churches reported 2,580 members, property valued at $1,566,866, and a total of $173,829 raised for all purposes.

COWEN, RAY HOWARD (1895-), American minister, was born Nov. 11, 1895, in Stockton, Mo., the son of Joseph A. and Laura A. (Reckard) Cowen. He was educated at the University of Nebraska (A.B., 1920), and BOSTON UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY (S.T.B., 1924). He married Evelyn L. Hawes, June 28, 1928, and they had two daughters. Cowen joined the NEBRASKA CONFERENCE in 1920 and served one year at Martell before entering the seminary. Transferring to the NEW HAMPSHIRE CONFERENCE in 1925, his appointments were: Lancaster and Grange, 1925-29; Concord, Baker Memorial, 1930-33; Derry and Londonderry, 1934-40; Lebanon and Grantham, 1941-42; Chaplain, United States Army, 1943-44; Southern District, 1945-50; Manchester, First Church, 1951-54; and Northern District, 1955-60. Cowen won Phi Beta Kappa in college, and was a delegate to the 1952 GENERAL CONFERENCE and to three Jurisdictional Conferences, 1948-56. He wrote two books, His Perfect Recompense, and Meditations from a Wheel Chair. He retired in 1961 and established residence at Chester, N. H.

COWNLEY, JOSEPH (1723-1792), British minister, was born on June 26, 1723, at Leominster, Herefordshire. He first heard the Methodists in Bath, and joined a society in Leominster in 1743, where he began to preach. He became an itinerant in 1746 and traveled in England and Ireland. He was a friend of GEORGE WHITEFIELD.

Cownley was one of the several preachers ordained by JOHN WESLEY after 1784 (see ORDINATION). From the account of him by John Gaultier it can be concluded that at an early stage (1746) Wesley used a form of commission for the itinerant work: "Mr. Cownley kneeled down; and Mr. Wesley, putting the New Testament into his hand, said, 'Take thou authority to preach the Gospel.'" It was when Cownley was appointed to work in Scotland, however, that on June 4, 1788, he was ordained deacon and presbyter by Wesley. In 1792 Cownley and CHARLES ATMORE ordained ALEXANDER KILHAM and two others at a district meeting. "These proceedings," notes Frank Baker, "were stopped by the 1793 Conference as far as England was concerned, but apparently continued for ministers to be stationed in Scotland or on the mission field." Cownley died on Oct. 8, 1792.

EDWARD COX HOUSE

COX, ALVA IRWIN (1901-1967), American minister and leader in Christian education, was born at Coshocton, Ohio, Oct. 2, 1901, the son of Dana and Emma (Guilliams) Cox. He was educated at BALDWIN-WALLACE COLLEGE (A.B., 1923), and GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE (B.D., 1928). Baldwin-Wallace and OHIO WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY awarded him the D.D. degree in 1941 and 1960, respectively. On Sept. 6, 1923, he married Helen Roe, and they had three daughters and two sons.

Cox joined the NORTH-EAST OHIO CONFERENCE in 1921, and was ordained deacon in 1924 and elder in 1927. His appointments were: Mayfield, 1924-28; Mingo Junction, 1928-34; Cleveland, Parkwood-Asbury, 1934-39; Lorain, 1939-43; and executive secretary, Conference Board of Education, 1943-65. He was chairman of the Methodist Conference on Christian Education in 1949, and was a delegate to the ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE in 1951, the World Conference of Christian Education in 1958, the GENERAL CONFERENCE in 1956 and 1964, and the JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCE, 1948-64. He served as registrar of the Conference Board of Ministerial Training, and was chairman of the department of Christian Education, Ohio Council of Churches, 1962-65. He published Christian Education in the Church in 1965. Retiring because of illness in 1965, he died April 26, 1967, and was buried at Akron.

COX, EDWARD, HOUSE, located about one mile northeast of Bluff City, Sullivan Co., Tenn., was designated as one of the historic SHRINES of The Methodist Church by the 1960 GENERAL CONFERENCE. By its action the General Conference distinctly honored a pioneer Methodist layman.

Edward Cox, born in Baltimore County, Md., in 1750, was probably the earliest Methodist settler in the Holston region of east TENNESSEE. He and his parents were among the first converts made by FRANCIS ASBURY in MARYLAND; they joined the Methodists in 1773. Soon afterward Edward migrated and settled on a tract of land north of the Holston River in east Tennessee. Returning east in 1775, he married Sallie Meredith and took her to Tennessee. On arriving at their destination they had prayer in their tent, probably the first prayer by a Methodist family in east Tennessee. Just when Cox built his house is not certain; he may have started it before going east to be married; in view of Asbury's recorded visits, it is not likely that the house was erected later than 1787.

Cox served as a soldier in the Revolutionary War while his wife and small child remained at the homestead in Tennessee. After the war, he opened his house for religious services which he himself often conducted, and though not ordained he is said to have administered the sacraments at times. Also, he took the names of those who desired to become Methodists when a preacher should arrive.

Between 1788 and 1806, Asbury, as shown by his Journal, visited and preached in the Cox home a number of times, and on one occasion he is said to have held a conference there, with some of the preachers sleeping in the barn for lack of room in the house. Cox's house was available for Methodist services as long as he lived. He died in 1852 at the age of 102.

In 1966 the HOLSTON CONFERENCE purchased the Cox House and seven-tenths of an acre of land from Mr. and Mrs. Lyle Smith for $10,000. Since that time the conference commission on archives and history has spent more than $20,000 restoring, renovating, and furnishing the house with period furniture. On April 22, 1967, the Edward Cox House was dedicated as a Methodist historic shrine by Bishop H. ELLIS FINGER, JR. with more than 300 persons attending the ceremony.

COX, JOSIAH (1828-1906), British missionary pioneer to Central China, was born at Tipton, Staffordshire, March 7, 1828. When a student at Richmond College, he volunteered to follow GEORGE PIERCY to China, paying his own expenses. The WESLEYAN METHODIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY then decided to accept the challenge of the newly opened country, despite financial problems in the society, and opened a special "China Fund" separately from the general income. Cox was sent with William R. Beach to Canton in 1853, remaining there until the Opium War of 1857-60. In 1858 he briefly opened a dispensary at Canton. While he was on furlough, a letter reached him assuring him of an opening in Nanking, and he returned there in 1860 but found the town closed to him. He moved on to Hankow, bought property, and began work there the same year. Concerned with medical needs, he approached W.M.M.S. for a doctor, and Dr. F. Porter Smith, the first-appointed medical missionary, was sent to Hankow in 1864 and remained until his health broke down in 1870. Cox, who had laid the foundation of Wesleyan missionary endeavor in Central China, returned in ill health to England in 1875 and died October 11, 1906.

MELVILLE B. COX

COX, MELVILLE BEVERIDGE (1799-1833), first American missionary to AFRICA, was born in Hallowell, Me., on Nov. 9, 1799. Converted in 1818, he joined the M. E. Church, was licensed as local preacher in March 1821, and started traveling on the Kennebec District. He was received on trial in the NEW ENGLAND CONFERENCE in 1822 and was appointed to the Exeter Circuit. In his zeal to preach the Gospel, he strained himself to the utmost, often sleeping in wet clothes in the woods on his way between distant farms. In May of 1825 he became seriously ill, contracted tuberculosis, and was near death. Superannuated in 1826 and 1827, he traveled southward in search of a more congenial climate. In 1828 he located.

In BALTIMORE, Md., on Feb. 7, 1828, he married Ellen Cromwell, who died in December 1830. During his years in Baltimore Cox edited The Itinerant, a religious weekly. Returning to the ministry, he was received into the VIRGINIA CONFERENCE by transfer early in 1831 and appointed to RALEIGH, N. C. After a few months his voice and health broke down, compelling him to locate. Later in the year his thoughts turned to mission work in South America. Presenting his concern to Bishop ELIJAH HEDDING, he was asked if he would be willing to go to LIBERIA instead. On May 7, 1832, the bishops decided unanimously to send Cox as missionary to Liberia. He was commissioned by Bishop JAMES O. ANDREW.

Sponsored by the Young Men's Missionary Society of New York, Cox sailed on the S.S. Jupiter from Norfolk on Nov. 6, 1832, via Freetown, SIERRA LEONE, where he was approached to buy valuable property which the Basle Mission had abandoned in MONROVIA. Upon arrival Cox bought the house and three adjoining town lots for $500, which transaction led to the incorporation of the Mission Society in New York.

Cox arrived in Monrovia, Liberia, March 8, 1833. As superintendent of the Methodist Mission in Liberia, he did an astonishing amount of work during the few months he lived there. At Caldwell he conducted the first CAMP MEETING at which twenty-five to thirty persons declared their conversion and allegiance to God; he helped rally the people interested in SUNDAY SCHOOL work (mainly Christian education of tribal boys) and got it off to a new start; the Methodist work he met upon arrival was organized as a branch of the church in America.

He mapped out mission strategy in regard to new stations, education, and personnel. All this was done within five weeks of arrival. On April 12, Cox was stricken by the dreaded "African fever," malaria. Almost immediately he was laid low and suffered repeated attacks until his emaciated body gave up the struggle on July 21, 1833. His body is buried in Monrovia. It was Cox who uttered the famous challenge, "Though a thousand fall, let not Africa be given up."

CRABBE, GEORGE W. (1875-1951), American temperance leader, was born in London, Ohio, on June 1, 1875. He studied at DEPAUW and Ohio Universities before connecting himself with the anti-saloon movement in 1906. He was attorney for the Ohio Anti-Saloon League, 1906-13; superintendent of the West Virginia League, 1913-17; and superintendent of the Maryland and Delaware League, 1917-46. The BALTIMORE CONFERENCE elected him a lay delegate to seven GENERAL CONFERENCES from 1924 to 1948, and also to the UNITING CONFERENCE in 1939. He was chairman for drafting the disciplinary stand of the M. E. Church against alcohol, 1924-28, and vigorously contended throughout the prohibition period for enforcement of the law in Maryland.

CRAGG, ERNEST LYNN (1896-), South African minister and theological tutor, was born in Leeds, England on Dec. 21, 1896, and came to SOUTH AFRICA in 1908. Accepted as a probationer in 1918, he was trained at Richmond College, England, 1921-24, and returned to circuit work in South Africa. He subsequently held office as Secretary of the Kimberley and Bloemfontein District Synod 1928-9, of the Cape District 1932-45, and Chairman of the Kimberley and Bloemfontein District 1946-7. He became President of Conference in 1947, transferring as Chairman to the Grahamstown District during his year of office in 1948, and later was Chairman 1956-9.

A graduate of the Universities of Cape Town (B.A.) and of London (B.D. Hons.), his chief work has been in theological training. He was appointed Vice-Principal of the newly-established Theological College, Bollilhope, Cape Town in 1930, and virtually alone carried the entire curriculum until in 1940 World War II closed the college doors. Here he trained white Methodist ministers. From 1948, he was appointed Warden of WESLEY HOUSE, Fort Hare, where African, Cape Coloured and Indian Methodist ministers were trained. He continued in office until the government took over the University College of Fort Hare in 1959. He retired from the active ministry in 1965.

A deep interest in theology, preaching and administration has marked his ministry, and he has never permitted defective sight to impair the quality of his service. During the pioneer period at Bollilhope, during the war period when he never lost touch with the theological students entrusted to his care as Secretary of the Board of Examiners (1942-5), and in the concluding period at Fort Hare, he has in succession trained ministerial students of every racial group.

CRAG, CLARENCE TUCKER (1895-1953), American minister, teacher, and theologian, was born on June 7, 1895, in Benton Harbor, Mich., to Alfred and Clara (Tucker) Craig. After undergraduate studies at MORNINGSIDE COLLEGE (B.A., 1915), he entered BOSTON UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY. Following his studies for the S.T.B. (1919), he continued graduate studies at Harvard (1919-20), Basel (1920), and the University of Berlin (1921-22), and completed work for the Ph.D. degree from BOSTON UNIVERSITY in 1924. In 1925 he married Rena Catherine Stebbins, and to them were born four children.

In 1918 he was ordained in the Methodist ministry and served various charges: Walpole, Mass. (1918-19), Trinity in Evansville, Ind. (1921); Clifton in Cincinnati (1922-26); and Simpson in Brooklyn, N. Y. (1926-28). From this latter church he was called to teach at the Oberlin Graduate School of Theology as professor of New Testament language and literature. After eighteen years at Oberlin, he went to Yale as professor of New Testament until 1949. At that time he accepted the invitation to become head of New Testament and Dean of the Theological School at DREW UNIVERSITY, and he served there until his untimely death on Aug. 20, 1953.

Craig's academic interest is represented by his writings: The Beginning of Christianity, 1943; One Church, 1951; Introduction and Exegesis of I Corinthians in Interpreter's Bible. His participation—a high honor in the scholarly world—in the New Testament division of those producing the Revised Standard Version of the Scriptures was of note, as was also the fact that Glasgow University in 1951 granted him an honorary degree for his New Testament scholarship. His interest in the "One Church" is evidenced by his service in the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, where he was chairman of the American Theological Committee of the Faith and Order Commission, and American associate editor of the Ecumenical Review. He was a member of the editorial board of the scholarly journal, Religion in Life, at the time of his death. He served for several years on the Commission on WORSHIP of The Methodist Church, and took a prominent part in the creation of the Book of Worship.

In 1902 he was ordained in the KENTUCKY CONFERENCE (MES) and appointed a missionary to Korea. For fourteen years he engaged in evangelistic and literary work in Seoul and Songdo. In the absence of the bishop, he was three times elected president of the Korea Mission Conference. He served on the Board of Bible Translators, was editor of the Christian Advocate, and assistant editor of the Christian News.

In 1917 he returned to America to serve as associate director-general of the Missionary CENTENARY Movement, a campaign to raise $35,000,000. Upon request of the Korean Mission, he was released from this work in 1920 to act as director of "the Centenary" on the field, particularly in the use of increased appropriations.

In 1922 he returned to the Board of Missions where he completed the work of the Centenary Movement. In 1926 he was elected General Secretary of the Board of Missions (MES), in which office he continued until unification in 1940, when he became executive secretary of the Joint Division of Education and Cultivation of the Board of Missions and Church Extension of The Methodist Church, with offices in New York City. BYRON S. LAMSON

CRANDON INSTITUTE is a Methodist school at MONTEVIDEO, URUGUAY. In 1879 Cecilia Güelfi, a Uruguayan high school teacher, left her job to found a series of evangelical day schools in various parts of the city of Montevideo. When she died, the WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY of the M. E. Church took over the fourteen little schools and later made them into one big school called Evangelical Lycée.

There have been some outstanding principals of that school who have had real vision for the future. Such were Elizabeth Hewitt and Jennie Reid. When the first unit of the present plant was built, the school was given the name "Crandon" in honor of Mrs. Frank P. Crandon, who helped to finance the three-story building.

During its history Crandon has had as its goal to contribute to the intellectual, cultural, and spiritual life of children and youths, stressing the spiritual aspects of life and the formation of character based upon Christian principles.

The school has departments for primary, secondary, and junior college with about 1,200 students of both sexes. The lower departments follow the official program of the government with, in addition, intensive study of English and Christian education. In junior college (two years) the students prepare to become bilingual secretaries, and graduates are well known all over Uruguay. There are 120 students in this department.

Crandon also has departments in English, home economics, audiovisual aids, personal guidance, music, library, and physical education.

In 1957 Crandon's work was extended to the city of Salto. In 1966 the school at Salto had its first unit made possible by gifts from the Woman's Division of the BOARD of Missions of The Methodist Church. In 1965 Crandon in Salto became autonomous, though keeping a close relationship with Crandon in Montevideo. It has classes at elementary and secondary levels.

Crandon in Montevideo in 1966 had three buildings. Güelfi Hall, the most recently built, includes a chapel seating 200. The general principal is Jose A. Richero, the first Uruguayan and the first man to occupy the post. There are two other principals, a business manager, ninety-five teachers, and forty-five secretaries and other employees.

EARL M. SMITH

CRANE, FRANK (1861-1928), American pastor and journalist, was born at Urbana, Ill., May 12, 1861, the son of James Lyon and Elizabeth (Mayo) Crane. He attended ILLINOIS WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, 1877-78, and later was awarded honorary Ph.B. and D.D. degrees by that school. NEBRASKA WESLEYAN also gave him the D.D. He married Ellie C. Stickel, Sept. 26, 1883. Admitted to the ILLINOIS CONFERENCE in 1882, he served twenty-two years as a Methodist preacher and five as a Congregationalist. His Methodist pastorates were in ILLINOIS and at First Church, Omaha, Neb. His appointments in Illinois were: Roodhouse, Ashland, Island Grove, Rantoul, Urbana; First Church, Bloomington; and Trinity and Hyde Park Churches, Chicago. He served two Congregational churches—People's Church (independent), Chicago, and Union Church, Worcester, Mass.

Though a popular and effective preacher, Crane began to feel that the ministry was tame and cramping, and in 1909 he entered journalism. For the first few months he was not successful, but before long he was established as a writer for popular magazines and the newspaper syndicates. In time he became renowned for his 400-word inspirational, personal, common sense essays which were long a daily feature in scores of newspapers. He published nearly twenty books, including Why I Am a Christian, The Ten Commandments, and The Song of the Infinite (the 103rd Psalm). His brief, syndicated articles were printed in book form: Four Minute Essays (10 volumes); The Crane Classics (10 volumes); and Everyday Wisdom. He died Nov. 5, 1928.

He also received the L.H.D. from WEST VIRGINIA WESLEYAN in 1958, and from Hillsdale College in 1959. Dr. Crane was a member of the UNITING CONFERENCE in Kansas City in 1939 and of the GENERAL CONFERENCE of The Methodist Church in 1940, '44, '48, '52. He was a member of the JOINT HYMNAL COMMISSION of the M. E. Churches in 1930-34, and took a prominent part in compiling the hymnal of that date. He was a delegate of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES in 1948, and was a member of the Public Review Board of the United Auto Workers in 1962. In his early years he did secretarial service for the Army Y.M.C.A. in England and France in 1917. He is a trustee of BENNETT COLLEGE (1940-) and of ADRIAN COLLEGE (1948-53); and has contributed articles, essays and sermons to magazines and church publications. Dr. Crane took part in the great debate in the General Conference of 1944 supporting ERNEST F. TITTLE, who brought in then a majority report from the Committee on the State of the Church opposing asking the church to pray for victory in the war then raging. During his active career he was in great demand as a college and university chapel preacher and lecturer. Since retirement he continues to live in Detroit.

CRANE, JONATHAN TOWNLEY (1819-1880), American minister, was born at Connecticut Farms, now Union, N. J., on June 18, 1819. He was a descendant of Stephen Crane, member of the NEW JERSEY delegation to the first and second Continental Congresses. After he was graduated from the College of New Jersey, which later became part of Princeton University, Jonathan Crane was licensed in 1844 as a local preacher and became presiding elder of the Parsippany Circuit. In the next three years he preached in various communities from Quarantine and Port Richmond to Orange, N. J.

In 1848 he married Mary Helen Peck, daughter of GEORGE PECK. They had fourteen children, of whom the most celebrated was Stephen Crane, named for his distinguished forebear, and famous as the author of the classic American novel, The Red Badge of Courage and other works.

For ten years Jonathan Crane served as principal of the New Jersey Conference Seminary at Pennington, N. J. He taught at the DREW THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY in its first year and in 1856 received the D.D. degree from DICKINSON COLLEGE. Thereafter he served in various pastorates in New Jersey. His last ministry was at the Drev Centennial M. E. Church in Port Jervis, N. Y., where he died on Feb. 16, 1880.

Crane preached the moral responsibility of the church, and published many volumes derived from his sermons. As early as 1859, he proposed the gradual liberation of the Negro slaves in the South, urging their religious instruction and "the general cultivation of their minds." Among his works were: Holiness the Birthright of All God's Children, 1874, and Methodism and Its Methods, 1875.

LOUISE ZARA

CRANSTON, EARL (1840-1932), American bishop, was born at Athens, Ohio, June 27, 1840, the son of Earl and Jane (Montgomery) Cranston. His ancestry went back to Governors John and Samuel Cranston of colonial RHODE ISLAND. He won degrees from Ohio University (A.B., 1861; A.M., 1866), and was awarded an honorary LL.D. by that institution and the D.D. degree by ALLEGHENY COLLEGE. He enlisted on President Lincoln's first call for troops in 1861 and rose from first sergeant to captain of Ohio Infantry and West Virginia Cavalry. (Cranston told Bishop W. F. McDOWELL that he was once wounded by a "spent ball," and McDowell often used that as an illustration of good aim but lack of force!) On dedicating an addition to the Guyandotte Church in Huntington, W. Va., in 1915, Cranston said, "The first time I came here was during the Civil War as captain in the Union Army with this church as headquarters."

Cranston joined the OHIO CONFERENCE in 1867. His pastorates were: Marietta, 1867; Portsmouth, 1868-69; Columbus, 1870; Winona, Minnesota, 1871; Jacksonville, Illinois, 1872-74; Evansville, Indiana, 1874-75; Cincinnati, 1875-78; Denver, 1878-80. He served as PRESIDING ELDER in Denver, 1880-84, and was one of the promoters of DENVER UNIVERSITY. He was publishing agent in CINCINNATI, 1884-96. Elected bishop in 1896, he served in PORTLAND, Ore., 1896-1904 and in Washington, D. C., 1904-16. He gave episcopal supervision in CHINA, JAPAN, and KOREA, 1898-1900, and in MEXICO in 1903. In 1907 he served as a commissioner for the M. E. Church on the union of Methodism in Japan. He was a delegate to the 1911 ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE.

Cranston persistently advocated the reunion of American Methodism. He declared that both Methodisms were "equally legitimate and apostolic." In 1915 he wrote, "An English Methodist, who had the traditional British trait well developed, confessed that when he resorted to prayer to thwart the union of two branches of English Methodism on terms unsatisfactory to him, he found he could not pray. That ended his opposition." In 1915, when seventy-five years of age, Cranston published a book, Breaking Down the Walls, a Contribution to Methodist Unification, a candid discussion of the issues and problems and an eloquent plea to the Episcopal Methodisms to rise above their differences and unite for the sake of the kingdom of God. Southern Bishop JOHN M. MOORE well said of Cranston, "When the cause seemed lost, no kind of surrender came from him. Earl Cranston was a pier that held Methodism within the channel." Cranston's wisdom, his knowledge of the South, and his unceasing labors contributed much to the ultimate unification of Methodism.

Cranston was married three times: to Martha A. Behan, Oct. 7, 1861; to Laura A. Martin in 1874; and to Lucie M. Parker in 1905. He had one son by the first wife and two daughters by the second. He died in New Richmond, Ohio, Aug. 18, 1932, and was buried with military honors in Arlington National Cemetery.

CRANSTON, RHODE ISLAND, U.S.A. Early Methodism in Cranston, a town south of Providence, centered in the General LIPPITT homestead which was built in 1736. JESSE LEE stayed there when he was mapping out a circuit for RHODE ISLAND in 1791. Lippitt was a cordial host to all itinerant Methodist preachers. It is said that there were fifteen spare beds, and that he often fed twenty-five or more at table. Bishop ASBURY made five visits there. In 1802 a small chapel was built on the property, but no permanent church building was constructed in the town. Asbury entertained Bishop WHATCOAT there in 1800. In 1802 there was a gathering of Methodists from a wide area, and Asbury ordained preachers who could not go to the MAINE CONFERENCE. In 1808 Jesse Lee made his final visit to Cranston, and Asbury's last visit was in 1813 in the company of Bishop MCKENDREE. Asbury presented his tea canister to the Lippitts, and it is now in the Methodist Historical Society in BOSTON UNIVERSITY. The house was restored in the 1950's by Dr. William L. Mauran, Jr., who is the fifth generation of the Lippitt family. The Bible desk from the little chapel is preserved in the Phoenix Methodist Church, which is called the successor of the Cranston society.

CRAVEN, BRAXTON (1822-1882), American minister and first president of Trinity College, now DUKE UNIVERSITY, was born on Aug. 22, 1822. He entered the ministry when very young, and at nineteen he was elected principal of the Union Institute in Randolph County, N. C. Under his constant and wise supervision, this institution gradually enlarged and extended its sphere of influence until, in 1851, it was taken under the patronage of the NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church, South. Finding it necessary to borrow from the Literary Board of the state in 1853, he, with certain others, became personally responsible for the security needed to obtain the loan. In 1859 he succeeded in having the institution placed wholly under the control of the Conference, and the name became Trinity College. He resigned the presidency in 1863—which was in the midst of the Civil War—and was stationed for two years at the Edenton Street Church in RALEIGH, N. C. In 1865 he was reelected president of Trinity and remained in that position until retirement. He joined the North Carolina Conference (MES) in 1857. His grandson, James Braxton Craven, became a prominent member of the WESTERN NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE.

As a conference leader, Craven was elected to five GENERAL CONFERENCES, 1926-40, and to the 1939 UNITING CONFERENCE. He served as chairman of the conference commission on world service and finance, as a member of the board of education, as a trustee of Duke University, and as president of the J. B. Cornelius Foundation, Inc., which administered scholarships for young women. A man of intelligence, candor, and sincerity, Craven was an effective pulpit preacher, and an able administrator. He died, April 13, 1947, and was buried at Trinity, N. C.

CRAVEN, ROBERT M. (1842-1919), American minister and western pioneer, was born Nov. 7, 1842, near Walterboro, S. C., of Scotch descent. He was a soldier in the Confederate Army. He went by steamboat to Fort Benton in 1868 and worked as a carpenter in Helena, Mont., where he married Mary E. Frazier, June 5, 1870. Converted in 1866, he was licensed to exhort in 1871 by the M. E. Church, South, admitted on trial in 1874, and ordained DEACON in 1876 by Bishop ENOCH MARVIN. He served in the Bitterroot Valley in 1874, organized a church at Sterling, Colo., and returned to MONTANA in 1878. He served Missouri Valley and Gallatin Valley, where three of his children died, leaving him $3,000 in debt. He located, worked as a carpenter and farmed, and cleared the debt.

M. E. Church and served Meadow Creek charge, 1888-91; Philbrook and Lewistown, 1891-94; and Sand Coulee and Belt, 1894-97. He was appointed to Kalispell in 1897, and served as superintendent of the Kalispell Mission, 1900-05. He was presiding elder of the Lewistown District of North Montana Mission, 1905-07, went to UTAH as a missionary for two years, returned to Montana, and in 1913 retired. He died June 27, 1919, and was buried at Columbia Falls, Mont. Bishop CHARLES H. FOWLER gave him the title "Archbishop of Judith Basin."

CRAVEN, THOMAS (1846-1920), missionary to INDIA, was born March 28, 1846, in Buckley, Flint County, North Wales. He came to America in June 1864, and received his education at NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY (B.A., 1870; M.A., 1873) and GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE (B.D., 1872). He was appointed to LUCKNOW as a missionary in January 1871.

WILLIAM TAYLOR's experience in getting boys to sing hymns suggested to Craven that he organize SUNDAY SCHOOLS which were mostly singing schools. Later, Scripture cards were provided and boys walked down the streets memorizing the verses. When Craven arrived in India the latter part of 1870, there were thirty-four Sunday schools in the conference. Just eleven years later there were 344.

In 1873 he became agent of the Lucknow Publishing House where, except for furlough, he continued until 1885. He then served as superintendent of the press in CALCUTTA. In 1888 he was appointed to Naini Tal for evangelistic work. Under his leadership arrangements were made for a new building for the boys' high school, the oldest school in the mission. He acquired a reputation as a businessman of rare ability. He purchased sites and erected buildings that proved highly profitable to the church.

His special contribution in literature was his series of English-Hindustani and Hindustani-English dictionaries. These continued in use for many years after he left India. He returned to America upon retirement.

CRAWFOOT, JAMES (1758-1839), British preacher and leader of the FOREST METHODISTS or MAGIC METHODISTS centered in Delamere Forest, Cheshire, was born near Tarvin, Cheshire. He was at first a Wesleyan local preacher, but was unchurched on account of his association with the QUAKER METHODISTS. He gathered around him a band of disciples who met monthly at his house in the Forest of Delamere; they preached silence and had mystical visions. HUGH BOURNE and WILLIAM CLOWES attended a meeting in 1807. Inspired by Crawfoot's knowledge of spiritual things, eventually Hugh Bourne and his brother James agreed personally to pay Crawfoot to serve as an evangelist. Thus he became the first PRIMITIVE METHODIST traveling preacher and labored in Cheshire and Staffordshire. He died on Jan. 23, 1839, at Tarvin, where he is buried.

CREAMER, DAVID (1812-1887), American author and hymn authority, was born of Methodist parents in BALTIMORE, Md., Nov. 20, 1812, and joined the M. E. Church in his eighteenth year. After a good education in private schools, he entered his father's business at twenty years of age and became a partner in the firm, Joshua Creamer and Son, Dealers in Lumber.

In 1836 he and John Nelson McJilton began the Baltimore Monument, a weekly journal of music, science and literature. An avid collector of sacred poetry, Methodistic, and Wesleyan hymn books, he published his Methodist Hymnology in 1848. It was immediately reviewed in flattering terms by a writer in the Methodist Quarterly Review, who spoke of it as a "standard work." That same year he was appointed to a committee of seven by the General Conference of the M. E. Church to revise the hymn book. The committee consisted of five ministers, Robert H. West, a layman, and Creamer. These were the first two laymen ever to serve on the Hymn Book Committee of the M. E. Church. Creamer gained the friendship of JAMES DIXON, the fraternal delegate from England to the GENERAL CONFERENCE in PITTSBURGH in 1848.

For the last ten years of his life Creamer was a post office department clerk. He died April 8, 1887. His vast library was sold at auction, about 700 of his volumes on sacred poetry going to DREW THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY Library.

CREDENTIALS in The United Methodist Church (U.S.A.) designate the official certificates, documents, or parchments certifying a person's license to preach, ordination or ordinations, and, in the case of a bishop, his election and consecration certificate signed by all the members of the Council of Bishops. Usually when "credentials" are spoken of, reference is made to the ordination parchments certifying one's ordination as deacon and/or elder. Quite a few provisions are to be found in the Discipline indicating how such certificates are to be given and recognized, and how they are to be surrendered, or in some cases filed for keeping, with the annual conference secretary. Credentials may be replaced if lost, but the usual minister rather proudly keeps these personal official documents in some safe place at all times. It is customary to give the parchments certifying ordination to the ordinand at the completion of each rite of ordination.

CREED, CHARLES (1812-1879), New Zealand Methodist minister, was born in Somerset, England, entered the ministry in 1837, and arrived in NEW ZEALAND in 1839. Morley writes, "His first appointment was Kaipara, but his best days were given to Aotea and Taranaki." Later Creed was transferred to the most southerly station of the mission at Waikouaiti. While there he was present in Port Chalmers when the first contingent of Scottish immigrants for the Otago settlement arrived in 1848. Creed's later years were spent in European circuit work in AUSTRALIA. He was buried at Rockwood, New South Wales, where he died on Feb. 18, 1879.

CREEDS AND CREEDAL STATEMENTS IN METHODISM. (See CONFESSION OF FAITH.)

CREIGHTON, JAMES (1737-1819), participated in the ordinations by JOHN WESLEY of those persons whom he sent to America in 1784. This made Creighton a personage of special interest to American Methodism. He was an ordained minister of the Church of Ireland and began to preach in the Church of England in 1776. He entered the Methodist itinerancy in 1783, and John Wesley brought him to London in that year to be a Reader at CITY ROAD CHAPEL. When in September 1784, Wesley decided to take the momentous step of ordaining men for America, he asked THOMAS COKE to bring Creighton with him to BRISTOL for the Rites of ORDINATION. According to RICHARD WHATCOAT'S Journal, "John Wesley, Thomas Coke, and James Creighton, three priests of the Church of England, formed a Presbytery and ordained Richard Whatcoat and THOMAS VASEY, Deacons." On the next day, Sept. 2, 1784, "by the same hands"—that is with Creighton participating—"Whatcoat and Vasey were ordained Elders, and Thomas Coke LLD, was ordained Superintendent of the Church of God under our care in North America."

Creighton seems to have been a scholarly type who was also a prolific writer. The most important of his works were A Dictionary of Scripture Proper Names, and an edition in four volumes of Shuckford's History of the World Sacred and Profane.

CREIGHTON, WILLIAM BLACK (1864-1946), Canadian minister and editor, was born at Dorchester, Ontario, July 20, 1864. He grew up in rural Ontario, attended local schools, and then proceeded to Victoria University. He was an honor graduate in Arts and Divinity in 1890 and 1894 respectively.

Although he began in the pastorate, Creighton soon discovered that religious journalism was his most effective vocation. Six years after graduation he became assistant editor of The Christian Guardian; six years later he became its editor. Until he retired in 1937, he edited The Guardian and its successor The New Outlook, the longest tenure of the editorial chair in the history of Canadian Methodism.

The period during which Creighton was editor was a crucial one in Canadian religious history, spanning as it did the events leading up to church union and the consolidation of The United Church of Canada, and the adaptation of Canadian social and religious attitudes to the revolutionary circumstances of the twentieth century. In retrospect it is clear that no better man could have been found to represent and guide the opinion of his church in this process of transformation.

To his editorial duties, Creighton, who received a doctorate from Victoria in 1909, brought a well-stocked mind, a catholic spirit, unfailing good nature, and a remarkable breadth of understanding. Upon politicians and the community he urged the necessity of integrity and of vital concern for social justice. He impressed upon his brethren the salient arguments for church union and for tolerance in achieving it. In an epoch of religious uncertainty, he encouraged his people to consider carefully and prayerfully the ways in which their faith and practice could be made relevant, and to avoid fads and charlatanism.

A judicious observer remarked: "For religious controversy as such, Dr. Creighton was by disposition and intellect disqualified. . . . Sympathy with others and breadth of view save[d] him from the partiality and hypocrisy which underlie so much ruthless argument and acrimonious debate. Little has he written which he might now wish unwritten." Another friend said: "He has the truth in his inward parts and he radiates moral health. . . . He is deeply concerned about the welfare of the world. He actually believes that God intended this to be a decent, kind and brotherly place in which to live. . . . His gentle and sensitive soul is truly haunted by what he believes to be the unnecessary and curable sufferings of the world." As a workman of God, he labored long for "a new heaven and a new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness."

Thus, it was said at his funeral: "We cannot regard his passing with sorrow. . . . He completed his work and the eventide of his life was calm and serene."

CRESCENT RANGE COLLEGE. (See THEOLOGICAL COLLEGES, British, Victoria Park College.)

CREVER, BENJAMIN H. (1817-1890), American preacher and educator, was born in Carlisle, Pa., March 16, 1817. He was educated in the preparatory department of DICKINSON COLLEGE and though he began his college career on the same campus, it was later interrupted for lack of funds. He proceeded to educate himself, an achievement which Dickinson recognized in later years with M.A. and D.D. degrees. In 1840 he was admitted to the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE and began a series of appointments which covered VIRGINIA, MARYLAND, and PENNSYLVANIA. At the division of the Baltimore Conference in 1856 he became a member of the East Baltimore Conference.

While serving as pastor of the Milton charge in Pennsylvania, he became interested in the facilities of Williamsport Academy in Williamsport, Pa. Under his direction this institution was purchased by the Baltimore Conference and Williamsport Dickinson Seminary came into being. He chose THOMAS BOWMAN, later bishop, as the first President. Benjamin Crever is to be regarded as the founder of Williamsport Dickinson Seminary, a fitting tribute to his dedication to education.

Crever was a member of the GENERAL CONFERENCE (ME) of 1888. At this session the CENTRAL PENNSYLVANIA CONFERENCE was brought into existence. He died in Hanover, Pa., April 15, 1890.

CROCHERON, NICHOLAS (1754-1810), American layman, was baptized by Richard Charlton, in the Episcopal Church of St. Andrew, Staten Island, New York, on Nov. 10, 1754. Of Flemish ancestry, his forebears settled in the vicinity of present New Springville, Staten Island, about 1670. Nicholas Crocheron welcomed FRANCIS ASBURY to his home on Oct. 3, 1796, this being the "friend's house," where the bishop and the preachers sought shelter from a storm. Crocheron had heard Asbury preach at Disosway's, Woglom's and Totten's, and with the bishop sheltered in the Crocheron homestead at Carle's Neck (New Springville), Nicholas bespoke the need of "the North End" of Staten Island for a Methodist church. With Asbury on this occasion was John Fountain, among others, who preached in Crocheron's home.

In 1798, THOMAS MORRELL ministered to the Island and encouraged a North End Class Meeting, David Bartine and Joseph Totten, in 1799 and 1800 respectively, promoted a Methodist society which actually dates from Totten's time, since he was also assigned to the Island district for 1801 and 1802. The North End Church, fathered by Nicholas Crocheron, was erected in 1802. The first election of trustees was held at Crocheron's home on January 30, 1803. Nicholas Crocheron and Richard Merrell were elected to preside at the meeting, and both were elected among the trustees. The church was later named Asbury. From it came at least four other churches.

Crocheron possessed an extensive property where he maintained a large farm and a sawmill and gristmill at The Neck (Carle's Neck, the present New Springville). His holdings, farm, and mills located on Crocherons Mill Pond, a landmark, were on Signs Road opposite the country estate of Cornelius Van Schoick Roosevelt, grandfather of a future President of the United States, Theodore Roosevelt.

The Crocheron home was always open to the traveling preachers. NICHOLAS SNETHEN, John Fountain, THOMAS MORRELL, Joseph Crawford, Joseph Totten, in addition to Bishop Asbury, were among those who enjoyed his hospitality. His love for the bishop was seen in naming a son Asbury.

Bishop Asbury found Nicholas Crocheron in a languid state on May 5, 1809, and "sought to administer consolation to his mind and body." Crocheron died in August 1810, burial being in the St. Andrew's Cemetery Aug. 18, 1810.

CROMWELL, JAMES OLIVER (c. 1760-1829), American minister, was admitted on trial at the conference of 1780 and appointed to Sussex, Md. Subsequently he served in East Jersey (1781), Fluvanna Circuit, Virginia (1782), Pittsylvania, Va. (1783), and Kent, Md. (1784). Ordained elder at the 1784 CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE, he was sent with FREEBORN GARRETTSON to Nova Scotia. Here Cromwell was afflicted with ill health to the detriment of Methodist work, according to Garrettson's correspondence with JOHN WESLEY. In 1787 Cromwell presided with two other elders over a district including a portion of MARYLAND. The following three years (1788-91) he was presiding elder for the entire state of NEW JERSEY. After a one-year appointment to Bethel Circuit, N. J. (1792), he located in 1793.

Information is scanty concerning Cromwell's personal life. His family resided in Green Spring Valley, Baltimore County, Md. He had a brother, Joseph, who served as a prominent Methodist itinerant for sixteen years, but he located and died in disrepute an alcoholic. James Cromwell married Elizabeth Fidler, probably of the family living in Titusville, N. J. She died at her son's home, Oct. 8, 1832; Cromwell died in 1829 and is probably buried in the Baltimore area. He had a reputation for being "a devout and laborious man, and a useful and powerful preacher."

ERNEST R. CASE

CROOK, JOHN (1742-1805), British preacher, known as "the Apostle of Methodism in the Isle of Man," was born in 1742 at Leigh in Lancashire to a spendthrift physician and his improvident wife. John Crook experienced an unhappy childhood, and ran away from an apprenticeship to enlist in the army. While stationed in Limerick, in 1770, he was converted in a Methodist chapel. A well-to-do uncle discovered him and his Irish wife in Ireland, secured his release from the army, and brought them back to LIVERPOOL, where Crook became a Methodist CLASS LEADER and LOCAL PREACHER.

In response to an appeal from a converted Manxman in 1775, he visited the Isle of Man, preaching his first sermon in the courthouse in Douglas. His evangelical appeals met with immediate response. At Castletown a sympathizer secured a ballroom for his preaching, but so many assembled that he preached in the open air by candlelight.

Soon the Lieutenant Governor of the island and the local Anglican minister were among his hearers. An equally successful mission followed among the fisherfolk of Peel. On a second visit to the island he encountered more opposition, but was able to form and nurture Methodist societies. WESLEY attached the Isle of Man to the Whitehaven circuit, and Crook gave up his business to join the itinerancy. He shared with the two Whitehaven itinerants the oversight of the Manx work, local sentiment apparently causing Wesley to reverse his decision to station Crook in Lincolnshire. For the following two years, however, Wesley insisted that as an itinerant preacher Crook must travel, and he was sent to northern circuits. In 1778 the Isle of Man became a separate circuit, and Wesley stationed Crook in charge of the work there for the maximum three years, and even allowed him to return for two years in 1786.

Crook's devotional zeal and administrative acumen helped to build up a very strong circuit.

Crook also spent many fruitful years as an itinerant preacher in Ireland, and when Wesley was prevented by death from presiding at the Irish Conference in 1791, John Crook was "called to the chair," as he was again in 1792 in the absence of ALEXANDER MATHER. He died on Dec. 27, 1805, after several years of failing health, during which he was unable to stand, but preached upon his knees.

FRANK BAKER

CROOK, WILLIAM (1823-1897), Irish minister, was born at Newtownbarry, the son of an early Methodist preacher. He trained for the Irish ministry at DRIBSBURY COLLEGE, England. For nearly fifty years he was in the itinerancy. In 1859 he threw himself into the work of the great Ulster Revival, and to help the long-term preservation of the good effects, began the publication of a regular journal, the Irish Evangelist, afterwards incorporated in the Irish Christian Advocate. He was the author of the important book, Ireland and the Centenary of American Methodism, as well as other publications. He was prominent as a preacher and a cogent debater in Conference, and twice was Vice-President of the Irish Conference, in 1883 and 1896.

FREDERICK JEFFERY

CROOKS, ADAM (1824-1874), an American Wesleyan Methodist editor and church leader, was born in Leesville, Carroll Co., Ohio. He united with the METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH upon his conversion but, finding that this church took no active stand against slavery, he became unhappy in it. When Edward Smith organized a WESLEYAN METHODIST CHURCH in his town in 1843, Adam Crooks became a member and was elected CLASS LEADER. In 1845, he united with the Allegheny Conference of the Wesleyan Methodist Church and went as a junior preacher to the Erie circuit. This, at that time, had but one organized church, and that a small one of Negro members. In 1847, Crooks was ordained and volunteered to be the minister of a group that had adopted the Wesleyan Discipline in Guilford, N. C. Here he met bitter opposition from preachers, politicians, and the press, since the tension over slavery had grown intense.

After four years in Guilford, Crooks returned to his home conference, leaving six Wesleyan meeting houses and some 500 members. In 1864 he was elected Conventional Editor of The American Wesleyan, and continued in this office until his death in 1874. At a time of great perplexities in the life of the church, Adam Crooks spent a night in prayer in the woods. With the coming of day a great blessing came upon him. God's word to him was, "Go forward; I will never leave thee nor forsake thee." His biographer says: "From that time, no matter what the opposition or how great the obstacles, he felt the calm assurance that God was with us."

GEORGE E. FAILING

CROOKS, GEORGE R. (1822-1897), American minister, church leader, and scholar, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., Feb. 3, 1822. He was educated at DICKINSON COLLEGE where he graduated in 1840, and in 1841 began the itinerant life in ILLINOIS, traveling the Canton circuit, then embracing parts of Fulton, Knox and Peoria Counties. In the fall of that year he was recalled to Dickinson and there he spent the next seven years as a tutor and in teaching Latin and Greek. In 1843 he went into the PHILADELPHIA CONFERENCE, and served for a time several churches—Trinity, Philadelphia (1851-2); and St. John's, Philadelphia (1853-4). In 1855-6 he was at St. Paul's, Wilmington, Del., but in 1857 was transferred to the NEW YORK CONFERENCE. There he was pastor of the Seventeenth Street Church in New York for two terms, the Summerfield Church in Brooklyn, and the Church in Flushing, Long Island.

In 1846, Crooks was associated with JOHN McCLINTOCK in preparing and publishing a series of Greek and Latin elementary books for schools. In 1852 he published an edition of Bishop BUTLER'S Analogy, completing the unfinished analysis of that work which had been left by EMORY.

In 1860 he became editor of The Methodist, a position which he held for fifteen years, devoting his attention largely to working for lay delegation in the M. E. Church. He continued to act as editor and publisher while working with J. F. HURST in preparing a series of theological works. In 1880 he went into teaching again at DREW THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.

Crooks took part in a great debate on slavery in the 1856 GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church. At this session of the Conference, twelve years after the Southern Church had withdrawn, an effort was made to pass a measure that would refuse to allow any slaveholder to remain a member in good standing within the M. E. Church. Taking the floor in the debate besides Crooks were ABEL STEVENS and John McClintock. Crooks, however, made his mark principally as a scholar and editor, as well as teacher in his church. He died on Feb. 20, 1897, in Madison, N. J.

CHARLES H. CROOKSHANK

CROOKSHANK, CHARLES HENRY (1836-1915), Irish minister and historian, was born at Cayuga, Upper Canada, and came to Ireland at an early age. He graduated at the then Queen's College, Cork. His fine intellectual gifts marked him as an outstanding pastor. For over twenty years he was treasurer of the Supernumerary Fund, and so was instrumental in helping retired ministers. For six years he edited the Irish Christian Advocate, and in 1899 he was called to the highest office of the Irish Methodist Church. His son, C. Henry Crookshank, reached the same office in 1937. The great achievement of the elder Crookshank was the compiling and publishing of his three-volume History of Methodism in Ireland, Vol. I, 1885; Vol. II, 1886; Vol. III, 1888.

CROSBY, SARAH (1729-1804), British woman preacher, was born on Nov. 7, 1729. From childhood she had been subject to strong religious impressions and entertained Calvinistic views; but after hearing JOHN WESLEY and reading some of his sermons, she joined the Methodist society and became a CLASS LEADER at the FOUNDRY in London. In February 1761, expecting about thirty at a class meeting, she found some two hundred. Addressing so many individually was impossible, so she gave a general exhortation and, as a result, felt a call to preach. In this Wesley encouraged her. She moved from London to Yorkshire and traveled far and wide. She recorded that during the year 1777 she rode 960 miles, conducting 220 public services and about 600 classes and other meetings. John Wesley had a warm regard for her and frequently corresponded with her. She died in Leeds, Oct. 24, 1804.

CROSBY, THOMAS (1840-1914), Canadian missionary to the Indians on the Pacific coast, was born in Pickering, Yorkshire, England, and came to Canada with his parents in 1856. The family settled near Woodstock, Ontario. When he was twenty-two, an appeal for workers, over the signature of EBENEZER ROBSON, appeared in The Christian Guardian and led Crosby to offer himself for service among the Indians of British Columbia. Borrowing money for the trip, he left Woodstock on Feb. 25, 1862, and arrived in Victoria on April 11.

In March 1863, Crosby was asked to teach in the Indian school at Nanaimo, and thus began his career of missionary service which lasted for half a century. In addition to teaching, he mastered the Ankomenum language and several others as well. He helped with services among the white people, and preached to the Indians, and acted as interpreter. In 1868 he made a trip up the Fraser as far as Chilliwack and opened up the work among the Indians of that area. After nine years of teaching, preaching, and ministering in countless ways to the Indians, as well as to newly arrived settlers, he was ordained by the Methodist Conference in 1871. In 1873 he was granted a furlough, during which he returned to Ontario and spent several months there and in Quebec, addressing meetings to stimulate interest in Indian missions. Early in 1874 he married Emma Douse and together they returned to the Pacific coast, and then north to Port Simpson, a large village of the Tsimshians, many of whom had been converted by the Anglican missionary, William Duncan.

"Through succeeding years, the missionary travelled by canoe and on foot, through summer and winter, carrying the Gospel message to Indian tribes along the north coast, on the Queen Charlotte Islands to the west, and up the rivers and inlets of the mainland." Other missionaries came; industrial and boarding schools and hospitals were established. "A mission ship, the 'Glad Tidings,' was built for Mr. Crosby, and this little craft was soon known as a bringer of light to village and camp."

In 1897 Crosby was elected president of the Conference and moved to Victoria. His later ministry was spent in and around Chilliwack, which had been the scene of some of his earlier work. In 1907 he was superannuated, and in that year published one of his books, Among the Ankomenums. In the year of his death, 1914, another was published, Up and Down the North Pacific Coast. Four mission boats have borne his name, and in August 1966, the contract was let for the building of M. V. "Thomas Crosby V."

"A conflict like that in which Thomas Crosby spent his life was no mere holiday parade. It was a grapple to death with the powers of evil, in which no quarter was asked or given. He gave his life for the redemption of a people for whose souls no man cared, and fought a life-long battle against superstition, immorality, and godlessness of every kind."

CROSS, WILLIAM (182?-1842), British missionary pioneer to the South Seas, was appointed to the new field of NEW ZEALAND in 1827, but on arrival in AUSTRALIA was commanded by NATHANIEL TURNER for urgent work in the Friendly Islands, where the staff was intolerably depleted. Cross spent eight years in TONGA, where he translated the Scriptures and wrote schoolbooks for circulation in manuscript. In 1832 Mrs. Cross was drowned when their canoe capsized en route between Tonga and Vavau. Cross was never robust but agreed to remove to the cannibal islands of FIJI with DAVID CARGILL in 1835. Cross remained there for six years, at Lakemba, Rewa, and Viwa, being the joint founder of Wesleyan missions in the islands. He died in Fiji, Oct. 15, 1842, having seen cannibalism begin to give way before the Gospel.

CROSSLEY, HUGH THOMAS (1850-1934), Canadian minister and evangelist, was born in King Township, Ontario, Nov. 19, 1850. He was received on trial in 1874 and ordained in 1880, during part of which period he attended VICTORIA COLLEGE (now UNIVERSITY).

After serving on several circuits, Crossley became associated in an evangelistic team with John E. Hunter. This association continued for many years. When Hunter became inactive Crossley was assisted for ten years by J. H. Leonard. The team of Crossley and Hunter became widely known throughout North America as an effective agency for adding converts to the church.

Crossley was a blameless, cheerful individual, who was often called the "Singing Evangelist." For his eminent work as a preacher, he was awarded the D.D. degree by WESLEY COLLEGE, Winnipeg, Manitoba. Some 200,000 individuals are thought to have responded to his appeals.

He died in Toronto on May 2, 1934.

CROWTHER, JONATHAN (1759-1824), British itinerant preacher from 1784 until his death on June 8, 1824. In addition to theological learning which was correct and extensive, he was also an expert on Methodist finance, and published in 1817 Thoughts Upon the Finances of the Methodist Connexion. He was chosen as president of the Wesleyan Methodist Conference in 1819, and deputed to the same office in the Irish Conference in 1820. His writings included studies of Methodist history, doctrine, and polity, and a life of THOMAS COKE.

CRUSADE FOR CHRIST, THE, was a quadrennial movement of The Methodist Church, U.S.A., 1944-48. Designed as a post-war reconstruction and missionary program, it was ordered by the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1944, which met in Kansas City, Mo. Bishops G. BROMLEY OXNAM and PAUL B. KERN presented the enabling resolution to the Conference. The report was unanimously adopted. A committee of two hundred was set up to manage the Crusade, from which an executive committee was organized. Bishop J. RALPH MAGEE was made chairman of both committees, as well as director, and J. MANNING POTTS, then pastor of Greene Memorial Church, ROANOKE, Va., was elected associate director in charge of the Chicago office.

A well appointed staff was organized with Earle H. MacLeod as Director of Publicity, while GAITHER P. WARFIELD was loaned by the Board of MISSIONS for speaking engagements during the financial effort. The bishops were to organize their own areas for the Crusade, and the regular organization of the church was to be used, including district superintendents, pastors, and general agencies.

The Crusade was to have four facets, one for each of the four years: World Relief and Reconstruction; Evangelism; Stewardship; and Church School Enrollment and Attendance.

A goal was set for the first year of $25,000,000. In fourteen months more than $27,000,000 was raised. The largest part of this was expended under the direction of RALPH E. DIFFENDORFER and the Foreign Division of the Board of Missions. The next largest was under the direction of Earl R. Brown and the Division of Home Missions and Church Extension. Many mission projects, foreign and home, were built or reconstructed, extending to all the mission fields.

A goal of one million members to be added to the church was set for Evangelism in the second year, and this was accomplished in a little more than a year, under the direction of HARRY DENMAN and the Board of Evangelism. The Crusade for Christ office directed each of the causes during the quadrennium.

Goals were set for Stewardship, Tithing, and Full-Time Dedication to Christian Service. More than twelve thousand persons dedicated themselves during these years to the ministry or to other full-time service. There was a large increase in the total giving of the church. These goals were reached under the direction of GEORGE L. MORELOCK and the Board of Lay Activities.

A goal was set for the SUNDAY SCHOOLS for a net increase in all divisions. Losses had been recorded. The trend was reversed and significant increases were reported. These were realized under the direction of JOHN Q. SCHISLER, Walter Towner and the Board of Education.

The Crusade for Christ made the quadrennium 1944-

48 one of the outstanding eras of The Methodist Church. Over five hundred new churches were organized in that period; mission institutions were rebuilt; educational institutions were helped financially; goals were reached which have not been equalled or surpassed since, and the Crusade Scholarship Fund was started. It is said by some that the $27,000,000 thus raised was the greatest single amount raised up to that time in church history.

ESTEBAN T. CRUZ

CRUZ, ESTEBAN T. (1890-), minister, evangelist, and organizer of churches in the PHILIPPINE ISLANDS, was born on Aug. 1, 1890, the son of Engracio T. and Apolonia Baltazar Cruz. He was born at Orani, Bataan, in the Philippines and was received into the M. E. Church with his family in 1903. He entered the ministry as a supply pastor in 1912, joined the Philippine Conference in 1913, and was ordained deacon and elder in the next years. He served several churches as pastor for the next few years and in one—the church at Atlag, Malolos—organized a missionary society. As he moved to different churches he became well known as an organizer, but also primarily as an evangelistic preacher.

His active service extends over fifty-one years—twenty of those years he was a district superintendent. He was a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church in 1936, and to that of The Methodist Church in 1960. He served as superintendent of the Manila District in 1955. At the General Conference of 1960 in Denver, Colo., he was instrumental in seeing that the General Conference should be impressed by the growth of Methodism in the Philippines so as to expand the work there and to create two Episcopal Areas, namely the Manila Area and the Baguio Area, out of what had been one. He retired at the age of seventy-two, but after that at the age of seventy-eight he accepted an appointment by Bishop JOSE L. VALENCIA to be supply pastor of the Valenzuela, Bulacan church in the Manila District.

CRYSTAL LAKE, CONNECTICUT, U.S.A. Old Methodist Parsonage is believed to be the first Methodist parsonage in New England. Built in 1795 at Square Pond (now Crystal Lake), this building sheltered FRANCIS ASBURY, JESSE LEE, and other itinerant preachers. This parsonage has recently (1968) been purchased, moved, and restored by the NEW ENGLAND SOUTHERN CONFERENCE Historical Society. Located across the highway from the Community Methodist Church, the house will be used as a museum and meeting place. Methodism flourished in this area in the early nineteenth century with a camp meeting held at Crystal Lake in 1806.

CUBA is a republic, a charter member of the United Nations, occupying the largest island in the Caribbean. Its length is 759 miles, average breadth about sixty miles. Its area is 44,206 square miles, and its population is 8,250,000 (United Nations estimate, 1969). Havana harbor is one of the finest in the world. Guantánamo Bay, on the southeast coast, is a United States naval base under treaty rights.

Columbus discovered Cuba, Oct. 27, 1492, at Cibara,

Oriente, calling it Juana. At a later date, the native Indian name, Cuba, supplanted the Spanish term. Except for a brief British interlude, in 1762, it was under Spanish domination until 1898.

Numerous attempts to secure independence from Spain, from the 1850s onwards, were suppressed. Cuban leaders had been in open rebellion for three years when the United States became involved through the sinking of the battleship Maine, in Havana Harbor. War was declared against Spain, April 25, 1898. Spain was quickly defeated, the Treaty of Paris being signed, Dec. 10, 1898. Spain relinquished all sovereignty, and Cuba was established as an independent republic (May 20, 1902). Protection by the United States fell within the terms of the so-called "Monroe Doctrine" by the "Platt Amendment," which authorized the United States to intervene in case of disorders. This amendment was only abrogated in 1934.

There were periods of revolt and dictatorship between 1934 and 1950. On March 10, 1951, Fulgencio Batista ousted President Carlos Prío and took over the control of the government. Fidel Castro led an attack on the army base "Moncado" in Santiago, July 26, 1953 marking the beginning of guerrilla warfare which continued until Dec. 31, 1958, when General Batista fled the island. On Jan. 1, 1959, Castro's forces took over the government, announcing that the Revolution had just begun. Begun on more fervor than experience, the Revolution asked Castro to assume the position of Prime Minister on Feb. 16, 1959.

The reform measures promised by the Revolution soon began to be put into effect: Tax Reform, Urban Reform, Educational Reform, Agrarian Reform and nationalization of both private and international industries. The United States declared an economic boycott of Cuba on Oct. 13, 1960 of all items except foodstuffs and medicine. These later were also included, cutting off all commerce between the two nations. This forced the leaders to turn elsewhere for assistance with the resulting dependence on the Soviet bloc for its economic survival. Castro declared on April 16, 1961 that he had created a Socialist Revolution in Cuba.

In the fall of 1962, it was ascertained that Russia was delivering and installing elaborate systems capable of shooting nuclear missiles across wide distances. A serious confrontation occurred between the United States and Russia. Premier Khrushchev agreed to the demand of President Kennedy that "this clandestine, reckless and provocative threat to world peace" be halted. Khrushchev then agreed to remove the missiles. Early in 1966 the United States agreed to receive a large number of Cuban political refugees, and since that time many Cubans have come to the United States. The situation for the past few years has been an unhappy one with the people lacking in essential foods and commodities since the priorities of the Revolution call for the use of capital in civil defense and the development of industries.

The origins of Cuban Methodism are found in FLORIDA, among Cuban expatriates before the Spanish-American War. In 1873, Methodist work was begun among Cubans in Key West. Ten years later, two Cubans were sent as missionaries: ENRIQUE B. SOMEILLAN and Aurelio Silvera—one a minister; the other a teacher. The first church was organized in Havana in 1888, with 194 members. Later, other Cuban pastors and an American followed from Florida.

The Spanish-American War interrupted this flourishing work. After the war, in late 1898, the M. E. Church, South, reorganized the work in Cuba, sending Bishop WARREN A. CANDLER and WALTER R. LAMBETH, with two preachers on a tour of inspection. In 1899 two missionaries were sent, and these started work at several points. The chapel built at Matanzas was the first Protestant church building to be erected in Cuba. The Cuba Mission was organized in 1907, a Mission Conference in 1919; and the Cuba Annual Conference in 1923. At Methodist Unification in 1939, the Conference became a unit in the Southeastern Jurisdiction.

Methodism was established in each of the six provinces. Prior to the Castro regime, there were sixty pastoral charges and over 10,000 members. Twenty institutions of learning had been established, including the Evangelical Theological Seminary at Matanzas. Several schools were of size and importance—notably CANDLER COLLEGE and Colegio Pinson. There were six districts in the conference, with twenty-six missionaries from the United States.

Under the Castro regime, the work of the churches continued but often under trying circumstances. Membership suffered a large loss. All schools were nationalized except the theological seminary. All missionaries chose to leave. Sunday schools continued, but under the difficulty that public schools held extracurricular activities on Sunday mornings. A number of Methodist groups in the United States have given continuous and unstinted aid to the work in Cuba, bolstering the morale of Cuban Methodism in this time of suffering.

The Autonomous Methodist Church in Cuba. In 1964 the General Conference of The Methodist Church passed an enabling act allowing the Cuban Methodist Church to become autonomous if it so chose. It did so choose and became an autonomous Church on Feb. 2, 1968. It elected posthumously ANGEL FUSTER a bishop; and then ARMANDO RODRIGUEZ, of the conference, to be a bishop with full presidential powers. The new autonomous body reported something like 9,000 members with approximately fifty-four pastors either fully ordained ministers, theological students, or accepted supply ministers.

Bishop Armando Rodriguez presided at the conference sessions July 27-29, 1969, this marking the first annual conference of the autonomous church. International visitors included Miss Joyce Hill, a United Methodist Board of Missions staff member, and Bishop FRANZ SCHAEFER of United Methodism's Geneva Area. He represented the COUNCIL OF BISHOPS of The United Methodist Church, and his presence opened official contact between the Cuban church and the United Methodists over the world. The conference decided that its main thrust in the immediate future was to be in Christian education and evangelism.

The first General Conference of the autonomous church was held March 2-7, 1971 in Havana. At that time Bishop Armando Rodriguez was reelected for a four-year term. Emphasis on social action and lay participation as responsible Christians was made in the planning for the next quadrennium. Bishop RAYMOND VALENZUELA from CHILE and Miss Joyce Hill from the United States were international guests at the conference.

Agricultural and Industrial School, Mayari, Cuba (1945-1961), an agricultural and industrial school built at Play Manteca between the towns of Preston and Mayari, Oriente, Cuba, on 300 acres of land donated by the United Fruit Sugar Company. Its first director was the Rev. John E. Stroud. Also connected with this institution were Richard G. Milk and Edgar Nessman as director and vice director. The school trained an average of sixty Cuban young people each year for leadership in a rural environment. All students worked half the time and studied the other half. No one of the students knew who were the scholarship students. It had the highest percentage of conversions among its students of all Protestant schools in Cuba. Its graduates—young men as well as young women—learned improved methods of agricultural and minor industrial trades. Many of them became supply pastors in the Cuba Conference.

It had its beginning in 1921 in the heart of L. H. Robinson and Ezequiel Suarez, who were convinced that the church should provide schools for rural children. Up to this time all church related schools of all denominations were located in cities and served families in the upper economic brackets, while fifty percent of the population was rural and illiterate.

The Methodist Mission officials were indifferent to any plan for rural training, as were the Cuban pastors located in the cities, until in 1940 Dr. Ralph Felton, noted rural sociologist from DREW UNIVERSITY, spent a month in Cuba making a thorough study of rural needs and practical methods of improvement. About the same time, Merle Davis, a former Congregational missionary to the PHILIPPINES, published a sociological survey of Cuba, Cuba in a Sugar Economy.

These reports aroused considerable interest and soon plans were drawn up for an industrial school but two years' negotiation ensued before final approval was secured from the General BOARD OF MISSIONS and at Conference level, although the Cuban government lent its support from the beginning.

The Agricultural and Industrial School was the first Methodist school in Cuba to have a Board of Directors having active overall supervision. Preference was given to students lacking in financial support. Also, almost all work done on the farm, dairy, kitchen and laundry was done by the students themselves. Previously, all boarding schools were hesitant to accept work-scholarship students, since they frequently developed an inferiority complex on account of their economic difference from the other students. But at the Agricultural-Industrial school everyone worked, including the teachers.

CUBITT, GEORGE (1791-1850), British preacher and writer, was born at Norwich, Norfolk, and became a Wesleyan Methodist itinerant in 1813. He went out as a missionary to Newfoundland in 1816, but his very successful ministry there was cut short by ill health, and he returned home in 1819. He was appointed CONNECTIONAL EDITOR in 1842, a post which he held until his death. Of his numerous writings, biographical, historical and doctrinal, none has left any permanent impression. He died in London on Oct. 13, 1850.

CULLOM, JEREMIAH WALKER (1828-1915), pastor, Confederate chaplain, and PRESIDING ELDER, was born Dec. 20, 1828, in Davidson County, Tenn., the son of Caius F. and Cynthia (Hooper) Cullom. His formal education was limited to the three-month rural schools of the day. Converted at twenty, he was soon licensed to exhort and then to preach. After teaching school briefly, he was admitted to the TENNESSEE CONFERENCE (MES) in 1851 and served on a number of circuits and stations. Throughout his ministry he was known for short sermons and much pastoral visiting. His work was effective, often resulting in 200 conversions per year. Though not rated a great preacher, his marked acceptability was attested by the fact that during his career he was appointed a second time for two- to four-year pastorates in four charges he had previously served. He had a four-year term on the Sparta District. Cullom did not retire until eighty years of age, and then against the expressed wish of his presiding elder. He enlisted in the Confederate Army as a private in 1861 because most of the young men on his charge were going, and because their parents said they would feel better if he went with them. Soon elected chaplain, he served two years, and then resigned and farmed and preached at Decatur, Ala. (then in the Tennessee Conference) until the war was over. In 1866 he resumed his place in the itinerant ranks and served for forty-two years. Cullom married Mary B. Isom, Oct. 13, 1857, and they had three sons and three daughters. She died in 1888, and after a few years he married Mattie Hyde, who died in 1914. Cullom started keeping a daily journal in 1854, continued the practice for fifty-eight years, and rewrote the work in 1912. A valuable historical record, the journal throws light on life in TENNESSEE during the period it covers, including the doings of the KENTUCKY and Tennessee "night riders" at the turn of the century. Cullom died Nov. 21, 1915 and was buried at Triune, Tenn. It was claimed that more than 2,000 attended his funeral.

CULVER, FRANK PUGH (1863-1949), American minister and conference leader, was born near Lawrenceville, Henry Co., Ala., July 31, 1863, the son of Major Isaac Franklin and Nancy McSwean Culver. He graduated from Southern University at Greensboro, Ala. (now merged into BIRMINGHAM-SOUTHERN), B.A., 1886, and M.A., 1887.

After ordination to the ministry in 1887 and a brief membership in the ALABAMA CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church, South, he transferred to the NORTH ALABAMA CONFERENCE where he served a number of appointments, including churches in Anniston, Tuscaloosa, Huntsville and Birmingham, and as presiding elder of the Birmingham District.

In 1911 Culver was named President of Polytechnic College in Fort Worth, Texas (now TEXAS WESLEYAN) and after two years in that capacity, he reentered the itinerancy in the CENTRAL TEXAS CONFERENCE. Among the pulpits he filled were those of Austin Avenue, WACO; First Church, FORT WORTH; and First Church, Corsicana, serving also as presiding elder of the Fort Worth and Waco Districts. He retired at the session of his conference in 1940, and thereafter made his home in Fort Worth.

In 1888 Culver was married to Ella Taylor of Greensboro, Ala., and to them were born two children. After the death of the first Mrs. Culver, he married Mary White of Meridian, Miss., and they had two children.

Culver served his church as a member of various boards and committees on both the annual and GENERAL CONFERENCE levels, and was a member of the General Conference of the M. E. Church, South each quadrennium from 1906 until the date of his retirement. He was an early and ardent advocate of reunion, and as a member of the Unification Commission aided in its accomplishment. He also participated in this historic event as a member of the UNITING CONFERENCE.

Culver firmly supported the role of the church in the field of Christian education, believing that the leverage of the church-related college was vital to the spiritual, evangelistic and numerical growth of the church. For a number of years, just prior to retirement, he presided over the board of trustees of Texas Wesleyan College, an institution owned and supported by Texas Methodism.

In 1914 SOUTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY conferred on him the honorary D.D. degree.

Bishop NOLAN B. HARMON recalls at his first General Conference in 1930 that Culver was chairman of the powerful Committee on Episcopacy. He had a stormy time presiding over the Committee as Bishop JAMES CANNON, JR. was on trial before it under charges of irregular dealings in the stock market, the charges being pressed by important Methodist laymen then in political life, including Senators Carter Glass of Virginia and Charles Hay of Missouri. Described by the Dallas papers as "a tall, soldierly looking grey-haired man," Culver kept everything in order, though several times he stormed to his feet, banging his gavel, and once he shouted, "I will control this house! I will control it!" So he did, in a very able way.

He died June 26, 1949 and is interred in Greenwood Cemetery, Fort Worth, Texas.

FRANK P. CULVER, JR.

CUMBERLAND, MARYLAND, U.S.A., started as a trader's place on the west side of Will's Creek near where it flows into the Potomac River. At first, it was called Mount Pleasant. About 1750, the Ohio Company built a trading post in that spot, which was a supply station, a fort, a shelter and resting place for Colonels George Washington, Fry, and others. In 1755, this post was enlarged by General Edward Braddock and renamed after his friend, the Duke of Cumberland. This post was George Washington's first appointment.

The first mention of Methodism in Cumberland is as early as 1782, when Bishop ASBURY, John Hagerly, and RICHARD OWENS planted the gospel seed. Cumberland was first mentioned as a circuit in 1783, when John Cooper was appointed preacher. The first house of worship was built in 1800 on the lot at the corner of Fayette and Smallwood Streets, and was rebuilt in 1816 on the site of the present Centre Street Methodist Church's buildings.

What is now known as First Church started out as Associated Methodist Churches in 1828; but two years later, the name was changed to "Methodist Protestant" Church. Its congregation first met in the basement of the English Lutheran Church. Their first building was on the corner of Henderson and Bedford Streets, built in 1836 and rebuilt in 1849. In 1889, they built at 127-9 Bedford Street and in 1959, relocated in the 1700 block of Frederick Street.

Prior to 1849, the colored people worshipped with the Centre Street congregation; but they organized a separate society and built a church adjoining Centre Street in 1851-2. It was relocated to Paca Street in 1962, and is known as McKendree Methodist.

Some members from Centre Street started Kingsley Church in 1870. It was first located on the corner of Gay Street and Oldtown Road, where it ministered to railway and canal boat men of the C & O Canal, who lived in this vicinity. It relocated to Williams Street in 1882.

Trinity was the first M. E. Church, South congregation in Cumberland. It started on South Centre and Union Streets in 1872, was sold in 1876, reopened work in St. John's Lutheran Church on Arch and Fourth Streets in 1897, and built on Grand Avenue in 1898. The auditorium was built in 1915.

On July 14, 1884, a congregation formed a permanent organization and was placed under the care of Centre Street. They met on fair ground property on Virginia Lane, which they purchased. A church building was dedicated on Chapel Hill, May 15, 1895; and the educational building was completed in 1926. This is Grace Church.

In May, 1900, some members from Trinity Church organized a Sunday School on the other side of the tracks, as it was dangerous for children to have to cross the many railroad tracks to get to Trinity. They met on the west side of Virginia Avenue in Walsh's Addition. Construction was started on a building on Humbird Street in Humbird's Addition in 1900, and they started meeting in it in August, 1900. Agur Chapel separated from Trinity Church and became a station in 1917. The name was changed to Emmanuel Church, South on Nov. 10, 1918. In 1967, an educational unit was added.

First Church mothered three other M. P. churches about the same time under the same pastor, William A. Melvin. In 1905 a need was seen for a church in the "Linderville" suburb of Cumberland. The church was incorporated on Feb. 13, 1906, and was named Melvin Chapel.

Melvin Chapel and Mapleside Churches were consecrated Feb. 18, 1906, and they with Bedford Street Church comprised the Cumberland Circuit. The present Melvin church building was consecrated Nov. 20, 1955. The new Mapleside building was constructed in 1944, and additions were made in 1953 and 1965. Since 1962, Melvin and Mapleside have comprised a circuit. Fairview was built in 1905.

For some time previous to 1901, the Southern Methodists felt the need of services in the center of Cumberland for those living uptown. Central Church was completed in time to hold the 122nd session of the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE there in 1906.

Cumberland is a city of some 33,500, with eleven Methodist churches, reporting a total membership of more than 4,700. The property has recently been valued at $1,200,000.

CUMBERLAND METHODIST CHURCH is a small body which withdrew from the CONGREGATIONAL METHODIST CHURCH because of a disagreement on polity and doctrine. It was organized at Laager, Grundy Co., Tenn., in 1950 and consists of less than 100 members in four congregations in the immediate area. The polity is loosely connexional with a quadrennially elected president and general board, the chief administrative offices.

CUMBERS, FRANK HENRY (1905-), BOOK STEWARD and general manager of the Methodist Publishing House in London, 1948-69, was born on May 6, 1905, in London. In his youth he served the Hornsey (London) Corporation, the Great Northern Railway, and Richard Thomas and Company—iron and steel. He entered the Wesleyan Methodist ministry in 1926, training at RICHMOND COLLEGE and gaining the B.A. and B.D. degrees. EMORY AND HENRY COLLEGE in the U.S.A. awarded him the D.D. degree in 1956.

After serving six circuits of British Methodism, he was appointed in 1947 the Assistant Book Steward of his church, and in 1948 he was elected Book Steward and General Manager of the Publishing House at 25-35 City Road, London. There he served for the next twenty-one years, until his retirement in 1969.

He has written histories of Richmond College and of the BOOK ROOM, produced a publication, Talks for Women's Meetings, and a number of plays. He has served on many connexional committees of British Methodism and on those of the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL. He has been chairman of the World Methodist Council's Publications Committee, and was vice-chairman of the Religious Group of the Publishers' Association of Great Britain from 1950 to 1956. He has served as one of the supervisory committee of the Encyclopedia of World Methodism and has contributed several articles to it. He resides in Colchester, Essex, England.

CUMMING, JAMES N. C. (?), city magistrate in Quetta, Baluchistan, India, took a leading part in organizing the first Methodist congregation in Baluchistan in 1891 and provided by his own gifts and solicitation of gifts for the building of the church and parsonage. He obtained a LOCAL PREACHER'S license and repeatedly filled the pulpit, visited the sick, buried the dead, and arranged for an ordained clergyman to administer baptism and conduct the sacrament of the Lord's Supper when the church was without a resident pastor.

On Sept. 12, 1915, he was ordained DEACON and ELDER and appointed as pastor. In late December 1933, when an earthquake devastated Quetta, killing some 30,000 people and demolishing the church and parsonage, Cumming miraculously escaped. Many members of the church were killed. He once again gave generously and appealed effectively, and in a few months a new but smaller church was in use.

Rarely has one man done so much to establish and maintain a Methodist church in the face of cumulative difficulties as has this worthy Christian official working in an area dominated by Islam.

CUMMINGS, JOSEPH (1817-1890), American pastor and educator, was born the son of a Methodist preacher at Falmouth, Me., March 3, 1817. Prepared for college at Kent's Hill Academy in Maine, he went to WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY (A.B., 1840; A.M., 1843). Later both Wesleyan and Harvard awarded him the honorary D.D., and NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY conferred on him the LL.D. degree. He taught at Amenia Seminary, New York, 1840-43 and served there as principal, 1843-46. Entering the NEW ENGLAND CONFERENCE, he served important churches in greater Boston for seven years. He was president of Genesee College, Lima, N. Y., 1854-57, president of Wesleyan University, 1857-75, and president of Northwestern University, 1881-90. He was a delegate to the 1864, '76, '80, and '84 GENERAL CONFERENCES (ME) and to the ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE at London in 1881. During his presidency at Wesleyan, three buildings were erected. After resigning as president, he served the institution two years as a professor. Then he had four more years as a pastor in BOSTON before going to Northwestern. As president of Northwestern, he paid off a debt of $200,000, established schools of dentistry and pharmacy, and dedicated a science hall and an astronomical observatory. Cummings was a strict disciplinarian, exceedingly dignified, and eminently thought-inspiring. Though a man of vigorous intellect, he published little aside from a few sermons, addresses and articles in church periodicals. He married Deborah S. Haskell, Aug. 15, 1842. There were two adopted daughters. Cummings died May 7, 1890 in Evanston, Ill.

CUMMINS, ANSON W. (1815-1894), American minister and educator in the M. E. Church, was born at Trenton, N. Y., Feb. 23, 1815. Educated at Cazenovia Seminary, he was licensed to preach by JOHN DEMPSTER in 1836. After several years as a teacher and circuit rider in NEW YORK State, Cummins was transferred in 1846 to the ILLINOIS CONFERENCE and appointed professor of mathematics and natural science at MCKENDREE COLLEGE, becoming president of that institution in 1850. In the same year ASBURY COLLEGE conferred on him the D.D. degree. For reasons of health, Cummins moved to TENNESSEE in 1853, and soon was made president of the HOLSTON CONFERENCE (ME) Female College, Asheville, N. C., where he served eleven years. After the Civil War he became head of the Female College, Spartanburg, S. C. In 1872, while a member of the SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE (ME), he was made professor of mathematics in the University of South Carolina, soon became president of that institution, serving in that capacity until 1877. Transferring to the GENESEE CONFERENCE in that year, Cummins settled at Wellsville, N. Y., and launched nearby a boarding school called Riverside Seminary. Retiring in 1881, he wrote and published, in 1884, Early Schools of Methodism, an authentic and valuable contribution to the history of education in American Methodism. He died Dec. 7, 1894.

CUMMINS, PHILIP (1750-1825), American layman, was born in Hall's Mills, now Asbury, Warren Co., N. J., on Aug. 15, 1750, the son of Christian and Catharine Cummins, early settlers from Alsace-Lorraine. Philip moved to Pequest (now Vienna) in the same county about 1770, with two brothers, later followed by another brother. They were among the first inhabitants. He first erected a log cabin and then a stone house, where FRANCIS ASBURY and other itinerants found a welcome.

The labors of the traveling preachers resulted in the organization of a Methodist society at Vienna or Cumminstown. Bishop Asbury and RICHARD WHATCOAT preached in the Cummins house in 1789. A cold spring is suggested in Asbury's Journal entry for April 24, 1807, when he preached "in Philip Cummins' kitchen." In 1810, Cummins was the moving spirit in the erection of a meeting house, called the Pequest Church, but often referred to as the Cummins Church. The land had been purchased on May 10, 1810, from John Cummins for $30, and a deed given to Philip, John, Matthias and Christian Cummins and James Hoagland, the first trustees. When the cornerstone was laid, Philip knelt upon it and prayed that "on this stone a church might be built against which the gates of hell shall not prevail." With his brothers Cummins promoted other Methodist societies in western NEW JERSEY at Buttzville, Hackettstown, Oxford and Mount Bethel. Philip Cummins died Aug. 29, 1825, and is buried in the Vienna Methodist Cemetery.

He received his A.B. degree from the University of North Carolina, 1891, and the B.D. from VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY in 1895, at which time he joined the NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE. He attended the University of Chicago from 1898 to 1902, and received D.D. degrees from SOUTHERN METHODIST and DUKE UNIVERSITIES. He was married to Maud L. Merrimon of Raleigh, N. C., June 29, 1910. He was instrumental in moving this school to NASHVILLE, Tenn., where it would be close to Peabody College and Vanderbilt University. Following its move to Nashville, the school became SCARRITT COLLEGE FOR CHRISTIAN WORKERS, and later it was fully accredited as a senior college and graduate school and an integral part of the Nashville University Center.

CUNNINGHAM, JOHN WILLIAM (1824-1920), American minister, church historian, and "marrying parson" of the St. Louis World's Fair, was born June 12, 1824, at Leitchfield, Ky. He was converted to Methodism in 1844 and admitted the same year to the KENTUCKY CONFERENCE. After Bishop J. O. ANDREW, he is said to have been the first man to declare allegiance to the M. E. Church, South, on June 1, 1845, "three months in advance of all others." He became a charter member of the LOUISVILLE CONFERENCE in 1846.

His itinerancy covered twenty-five years in the Kentucky and Louisville Conferences, during which time he was a PRESIDING ELDER of the Maysville District, 1854-56, and in 1860 one of the original trustees of KENTUCKY WESLEYAN COLLEGE. Transferring to the MISSOURI CONFERENCE in 1869, he served three consecutive pastorates. Locating in 1875, he continued as a local preacher on occasion.

Gifted as a writer, he became editor of the "Kentucky Page" in the St. Louis Christian Advocate in 1866. Later he was a contributor to The Central Methodist and other periodicals. One article for the Memorial History of Louisville was written out of his remarkable memory. Another was for an encyclopedia of MISSOURI history. These articles carried the story of Methodism from its beginnings on into KENTUCKY, TENNESSEE, OHIO and MISSOURI, and indicate that he was a true Methodist historian.

In 1904, while living in St. Louis, this eighty-year old minister officiated for the weddings of many couples who came to the Fair (the Louisiana Purchase Exposition) desiring to be married at the top of the famous Ferris Wheel—the original, the largest ever built—towering up some 270 feet. Hence his reputation as a marrying parson at the Fair.

Cunningham's last years were spent in CALIFORNIA with one of his seven children. He died there on Jan. 13, 1920, having lived half that time as the oldest Southern Methodist, "by priority of adherence—the patriarch, so to speak."

CUNNINGHAM, W. KENNETH (1888-1952), missionary to CUBA, was born in Berkeley County, W. Va., Jan. 6, 1888, the son of Rienzi Stuart and Martha May Cunningham. He graduated from RANDOLPH-MACON COLLEGE, and engaged in business until 1919 when he joined the VIRGINIA CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church, South. That same year he transferred to Cuba. He was married to Josephine Wyatt in 1913, and to them were born two sons.

After a successful term in Antilla, he was appointed pastor in Cienfuegos and superintendent of the Central District. The annual audit of the various church schools became his job because of his business training. On the district he was admired by all his men because of his thoughtful and efficient planning.

In 1927 he became director of the Central Methodist School in HAVANA. Because of his acute asthmatic condition he transferred to VIRGINIA in 1930. There he served successfully several congregations until his death in 1952.

CUPPLES, SAMUEL (1831-1912), American philanthropist, was born in Harrisburg, Pa., Sept. 13, 1831, the son of James and Elizabeth Cupples, who came to America from County Down, Ireland in 1814. His education was gained in the business school conducted by his father. At the age of fifteen the care and support of his mother and sister became his responsibility upon the death of his father.

He went to CINCINNATI, Ohio, in the employ of Albert O. Taylor, a manufacturer and wholesaler of wooden ware. There Cupples' unusual business ability developed. At twenty years of age, backed by Taylor as the silent partner, he established in St. Louis, Mo., Samuel Cupples and Company, which grew into a profitable manufacturing and wholesaling business and produced for him a large fortune.

Cupples was converted and joined the M. E. Church, South, in Newport, Ky., in 1848. On his removal to St. Louis he joined Fourth Street Church and met Martha Kell, whom he married in 1860. At the founding of St. John's Church, St. Louis, in 1867, they became charter members. Throughout his life he was a participant and an official in the local church, district, annual and GENERAL CONFERENCES.

As a memorial to his wife, who died in 1894, Cupples gave $100,000 to erect a modern building for the Methodist Children's Home of Missouri, in addition to the substantial gifts to the endowment made by his wife. Soon afterward he gave a dormitory to CENTRAL METHODIST COLLEGE, Fayette, Mo., which bears his name. From the time of his election as a Curator in 1876 until his death, he paid annually the operating deficits of the college.

Various missionary enterprises of the M. E. Church, South, and every campaign for funds in the general church and in Missouri, were recipients of his benefactions. His gifts to VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY, Central Methodist College, the Methodist Children's Home of Missouri, the St. Louis Provident Association, the St. Louis City Mission and Church Extension Society for new churches and congregations, totaled in excess of $1,250,000.

CURNOCK, NEHEMIAH (1840-1915), British Methodist, was born at Great Bridge, Tipton, Staffordshire, March 30, 1840. He became a Wesleyan Methodist minister in 1860, and from 1886 to 1908 was the editor of the Methodist Recorder. He took part in the compilation of the Wesleyan Methodist Hymnbook issued in 1904. His life's work, however, was the editing of the Standard Edition of John Wesley's Journal, in eight volumes (1909-16). He did not live to see the publication of the last two volumes, but had done almost all the work of their preparation. He played an important part in the late-nineteenth-century revival of interest in Methodist history. He died at Folkestone, Nov. 1, 1915.

CURRY, DANIEL (1809-1887), an influential American church editor of the M. E. Church, was born near Peekskill, N. Y., on Nov. 26, 1809. He graduated from WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, Middletown, Conn., in 1837, and for a time was principal of the TROY CONFERENCE Academy at West Poughkeepsie, Vt. In 1839 he went to the south and became a professor in the Georgia Female College (now WESLEYAN) at Macon, Ga., and in 1841 was admitted on trial to the GEORGIA CONFERENCE. He filled pastoral charges at Athens, Savannah, and Columbus (all Georgia); but because of the slavery issue and the division of the Church in 1844, he transferred to the NEW YORK CONFERENCE. In 1848 he became one of the founders of the NEW YORK EAST CONFERENCE.

In 1854 he was chosen president of the INDIANA ASBURY UNIVERSITY at Greencastle, Ind. After three years, he returned to New York and entered the New York East Conference, but was in 1864 elected by the GENERAL CONFERENCE to the editorship of the Christian Advocate at New York. He is said to have been primarily a teacher, not a preacher, but his greatest work was done in the editorial chair. The History of American Methodism classes him as one of the three most useful church editors in the years between the Civil War and Unification in 1939.

Curry was reelected editor of the New York Advocate both in 1868 and 1872; and in 1876 the General Conference having ordered a committee to consider the propriety of making a change in the Ladies Repository so as to make it a magazine of wider interest and more extended usefulness, Curry was elected to the editorship of the reconstituted publication. Meanwhile, he wrote: Life of Wyckliff; The Metropolitan City of America, and Life of Bishop Davis W. Clark. He also edited an edition of Southey's Life of Wesley.

Curry became BOOK EDITOR of the M. E. Church and editor of the Methodist Review in 1884, which positions he occupied until his death. He was a forthright contender for what he believed and, while "his arguments were often voted down on the floor of the General Conference, he invariably and successively was elected to positions of higher rank." The Bishops' address to the General Conference of 1888 paid a special tribute to him, saying, "Daniel Curry filled a place in the eye of the Christian public and in the Councils of Methodism which gave him rank with the most conspicuous men of his days." CURRY, GEORGE EDWARD (1899-1951), American bishop of the A.M.E. Church, was born in Edgefield County, S. C., the son of Andrew and Louise (Williams) Curry. He was educated at Turner Theological Seminary in Georgia and Lee Theological Seminary in Florida. The honorary degrees of D.D. and LL.D. were conferred upon him by WILBERFORCE UNIVERSITY. He served for a time as a pastor in Florida and then as presiding elder. He was elected to the episcopacy in 1940, was assigned to West Africa, but did not go. After the death of Bishop EDWARD J. HOWARD, he was assigned to the Twelfth Episcopal District (Arkansas and Oklahoma), 1941-46. He had difficulty over charges that he had mishandled church funds, was found guilty by a trial committee in 1945, and was restored by the Council of Bishops of his church in 1946. But the General Conference of the denomination, meeting in November 1946, expelled him and he made no appeal. He endeavored to conduct a recreation park in Jacksonville, Fla., but suffered reverses and died in comparative poverty in 1951. A designer and builder by trade, "he made much money," states Bishop WRIGHT, "which he freely used for his advancement." Wright, in fact, says that Curry boasted that he had "bought the bishopric." To his credit it may be said that he was the designer and builder of the Lee Theological Seminary in 1925.

His pastoral ministry was in the East Texas, Central Texas, New Jersey, and California annual conferences. In 1947 he was a teacher at Texas College. From 1958 to 1962 he was editor of The Christian Index, the major publication of his denomination. He was elected bishop in 1962. Presently he is chairman of the governing board of the Board of Lay Activities of the C.M.E. Church, in CURTIS, EMORY W. (1853-1937), American U. B. minister, was born April 12, 1853, in Noble County, Ohio, son of Moses H. and Sarah Curtis. In 1857 he went to Iowa with his parents by steamboat and covered wagon. For ten years he served as a public school teacher. In 1877 he was licensed to preach by the IOWA CONFERENCE, Church of the United Brethren in Christ, and was ordained in 1883. He served five churches facing frontier dangers, was a presiding elder for ten years, conference treasurer, president of the Young People's Christian Union, conference secretary, delegate to six GENERAL CONFERENCES, a member of the general Board of Church Erection, and the denominational Board of Finance.

He and Loretta A. Wilkins were married Sept. 7, 1881, and to them were born four children. Curtis attended SIMPSON COLLEGE one year and took the biblical course at Union Biblical Seminary, Dayton, Ohio. Leander Clark College conferred a D.D. degree on him.

He constructed two parsonages and three church buildings, was editor of the conference newspaper, and a college trustee. He died Sept. 15, 1937 and was interred in the Van Meter Cemetery, Van Meter, Iowa.

ROBERT R. MACCANON

CURTIS, LEVI (1858-1942), Canadian minister and educator, was born Feb. 22, 1858 at Blackhead, Conception Bay, Newfoundland. He was educated at Blackhead, the Methodist College in St. John's, and at MOUNT ALLISON UNIVERSITY, from which he graduated in 1889.

As a youth he was converted in the Methodist church and, after several years as a schoolteacher, he became a probationer in 1883. He was ordained in 1889 and was subsequently stationed in a number of Newfoundland circuits. In 1898 he was elected President of the Newfoundland Conference and was a delegate to the General Conference of that year. He participated in all succeeding General Conferences and in the union sessions of 1925.

Meanwhile, in 1899 he had left the active pastorate to become superintendent of education for Methodist schools. He continued in this post after the union of 1925. As such, he was an active member of the provincial council of education. Similarly, he was one of the founders of Memorial University College, now Memorial University.

For twenty-seven years Curtis was editor-in-chief of The Methodist Monthly Greeting, the local Methodist monthly. His editorials reflected his concern for the spiritual, moral, and physical welfare of the Newfoundland community.

Despite his many interests, Curtis participated actively in fraternal organizations, especially Masons. During the first World War he recruited vigorously for the Newfoundland Regiment and supported other patriotic causes. After the war he was associated with the work of the Great War Veterans' Association.

He was married in 1889 to Lily Black, and four children of the marriage survived. During his life he was honored with the D.D. degree from VICTORIA UNIVERSITY and was decorated with the M.B.E. In his memory the Curtis Memorial Bursary was established to assist in the training of ministerial candidates and lay supplies for the Newfoundland Conference.

There can be no doubt that in religion and in education Curtis exemplified the best elements in the Methodist tradition. He lived and died in the faith of his fathers.

CURTIS, OLIN ALFRED (1850-1918), American theologian, scholar, and teacher, was born in Frankfort, Me., Dec. 10, 1850, the son of a Methodist preacher. He had intended to follow a business career, but eventually felt compelled to enter the ministry. After earning an A.B. (1877) and an A.M. (1879) from LAWRENCE UNIVERSITY, and a B.D. (1880) from the BOSTON UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY, he joined the WISCONSIN CONFERENCE in 1880.

After serving two pastorates he went to Leipzig for further theological study. Returning to the U.S.A. in 1888, Curtis transferred to the ROCK RIVER CONFERENCE, where he served a church for one year. In 1889, BOSTON called him to a professorship in systematic theology, where he remained until 1896. During this period he did further study in Europe at Erlangen, Marburg, and Edinburgh. In 1896 he accepted appointment as professor of systematic theology in the Theological School of DREW UNIVERSITY, where he was destined to remain and to exert a commanding influence for the rest of his life.

Lawrence University, which had awarded him the S.T.D. degree in 1886, honored him with an LL.D. in 1905. In 1914 ill health forced him to curtail his activities, but he remained at Drew as Professor Emeritus and Lecturer on Christian Doctrine until his death in Leonia, N. J., Jan. 8, 1918.

As a theologian, Curtis commanded wide respect and wielded great influence in American Methodism. His book, The Christian Faith, was adopted as a standard guide in Methodist theological circles and for many years was a required study in the official course of study for young ministers in the M. E. Church, South.

Curtis greatly influenced EDWIN LEWIS, whom he taught at Drew and who later succeeded him in the chair of Systematic Theology. "Dr. Curtis' theory of the atonement particularly influenced me," states Bishop NOLAN B. HARMON, "and while his ideas of an 'intermediate state'—not purgatory at all but a sort of transition period for the soul after death—have never quite impressed Protestant circles, his teaching as a whole represented late nineteenth century Methodist thought at its best."

Edwin Lewis stated, "Dr. Curtis believed that it had been given to him to see the Christian faith as that total organism of fact and truth which answered to existence as the concave answers to the convex," and "that being the case, he must set forth its significance as the promise of a possible complete and everlasting redemption for every human soul." Another of his students, LYNN HAROLD HOUGH, regarded Curtis as the one who made clear to him that "it takes the whole of Christian doctrine to make a complete Christian." His students agreed that, as a teacher, Curtis made systematic theology an exciting subject. He had a high regard for Bishop Martensen's Christian Ethics and its recognition of the uniqueness of each human personality in respect to temperament and bias. "Of all the seminars that he offered, the one on Martensen appeared to exercise the greatest influence on the outlook of his students," states Henry Lambdin.

Olin Curtis married Eva Farlin in 1880; she died in 1883. In 1889 he married Ellen Hunt, who died in 1895. He married again in 1906, Ida Gorham, who survived him. His publications include Elective Course of Lectures in Systematic Theology (1901), The Christian Faith Personally Given in a System of Doctrine (1905), and Personal Submission to Jesus Christ (1910).

He was a delegate to the 1928 and 1932 GENERAL CONFERENCES, and was elected bishop at the latter. His episcopal assignments were: the Denver Area, 1932-39, and the Minnesota Area, 1939-52. Cushman was chairman of the commission on evangelism, 1932-39, and president of the Anti-Saloon League of America, 1939-48. He served as a member of the WORLD SERVICE COMMISSION, as president of the board of trustees of ILIFF SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY, and as a trustee of DENVER UNIVERSITY, HAMLINE UNIVERSITY, LAWRENCE COLLEGE, Wesley College (Grand Forks, North Dakota), and DAKOTA WESLEYAN. An author and poet, Cushman wrote some twenty-five books on the subjects of evangelism, stewardship, and prayer, including Hilltop Verses and Prayers, Practicing the Presence—A Quest for God, The Message of Stewardship, and The Essentials of Evangelism. At the UNTING CONFERENCE, Cushman and Bishop C. C. SELECMAN supervised the morning watch and the evangelistic services. Retiring in 1952, Cushman lived for a time at Raleigh, N. C. Bishop HERBERT WELCH said, "Bishop Cushman was a poet and recognized writer of religious meditations and prayers, and was markedly evangelistic in his activities." He died at Herkimer, N. Y., Aug. 10, 1960, and was buried at Manchester, Vt.

He was educated at WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY (A.B., 1936), Yale University (B.D., 1940; Ph.D., 1942). He received the honorary degree of L.H.D. from Belmont Abbey, a Roman Catholic institution in North Carolina in 1966; and the Teacher-Scholar Award from Connecticut Wesleyan in 1967. He married Barbara Priscilla Edgcomb on Sept. 12, 1936, and they have three children.

Dr. Cushman joined the GENESEE CONFERENCE on trial in 1938, going into full connection and being ordained elder in 1940. He was pastor for a time in Meriden, Conn. (1936-40) and Hamilton, N. Y. (1941). At this time he became instructor in theology at Yale (1942-43); professor of religion at the University of Oregon (1943-45); professor of systematic theology at the DIVINITY SCHOOL, DUKE UNIVERSITY (1945-58). Upon the retirement of Dean James Cannon, III, in 1958, Dr. Cushman was made Dean of that institution.

He has served as a delegate to the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES in Lund, Sweden (1952); at Montreal, Canada (1963); and was an observer at the Second Vatican Council (1963-65). The NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE, to which he belongs, elected him a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCES of 1964, 1966 and 1968. He has been a member of the Commission on Ecumenical Affairs since 1958, of the Ecumenical Planning Commission of the NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES since 1964. He was a lecturer at the Second OXFORD INSTITUTE OF METHODIST THEOLOGICAL STUDIES (England), 1962; a member of the Association of Methodist Theological Schools (president), and of the American Association of Theological Schools (on its executive committee).

He is the author of Therapeia: Plato's Conception of Philosophy; also co-editor with Egil Grislis of The Heri-

CUYAHOGA FALLS, OHIO, U.S.A. First Church grew out of the work of the Methodist circuit riders who began their labors in the wilderness of the OHIO frontier in the early part of the nineteenth century. It was founded in 1830 by John Chandler and John McLain, who rode the circuit out of Cleveland, visiting scores of tiny communities in what still is known as the Connecticut Western Reserve. This was a large area in northeastern Ohio reserved to itself by the state of CONNECTICUT when all the original states turned over to the new Federal Government most of their claims to the lands west of the Alleghenies.

For five or six years before formal church organization, the circuit riders held meetings in the homes of the handful of families living along the turbulent Cuyahoga River. The river falls give the name to the community. The first meeting house was a small school, and when this became crowded as the work of the circuit riders brought more families into the church, the congregation moved to a store building.

Cuyahoga Falls was a progressive community and the citizens had set aside a full square in the heart of the village for religious and educational purposes. First Church became the first to acquire a large corner lot on this square and in 1837 began to erect the first of three sanctuaries which have housed the ever-increasing membership.

The third and largest sanctuary was consecrated March 6, 1965, by Bishop FRANCIS E. KEARNS. With a membership of 3,555 (1970), First Church is the largest religious group in Cuyahoga Falls, a community of more than 50,000 population and the largest suburb of Akron.

The first graded church school in this area was established around 1890. Methodists took the lead in anti-slavery work before the Civil War, and the first temperance society in Ohio was formed in Cuyahoga Falls in 1827, with some members of the Methodist station active in its organization.

At present First Church has ten choirs with a total of 608 members. The church has been served by fifty-nine ministers and nine associate ministers during its history. Its annual budget as of 1970 is $266,270. The church is the sole support of a mission family in Malaya and contributes strongly to world-wide Methodist mission programs. Each year at Easter, $10,000 is raised in one day of giving for missions.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA lies in the middle of Europe with an area of 49,381 square miles and has 14,000,000 inhabitants. Up to 1918 the country was part of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, and on Oct. 28, 1918, it became an independent republic. The Reformation movement started here long ago. John Huss was burned at the stake in 1415; the Moravian Church was founded in 1457, with its last bishop, John A. Comenius (1592-1670).

Methodism first came to Czechoslovakia in 1920 when three bishops surveyed Europe for missionary possibilities. A Mr. Williams, together with a Mr. Wilkinson (two social workers), began to give social aid among the Russian emigrants. This work was discontinued when C. D. Collyer, a Korean missionary, came from the United States to set up an extensive colportage work with the help of twenty native colporteurs. The work gave encouragement to the Board of Missions to begin evangelistic work, and Joseph Dobeš was sent in 1920 from TEXAS as the first missionary to Czechoslovakia. During the time of the great "Los von Rome" (Away from Rome) Movement, the first evangelical tent was put up in Prague, Aug. 8, 1920. J. P. Barták also arrived in 1921 from Texas, and tents were put up in many large towns where people heard the Good News and asked to be accepted as members.

Bishop WILLIAM B. BEAUCHAMP, with the help of JOHN L. NEILL, brought over from MISSISSIPPI, completed in 1921 an organization of this new work of Methodism, and the Central Office began its administrative work in Prague, headed by Neill. In August 1922, VACLAV VANCURA joined the staff of workers, upon his return from Y.M.C.A. work in Siberia during the first World War. The first Missionary Conference was organized in 1922 by Bishop Beauchamp, who presided. Barták and Vancura were ordained elders at that conference.

Institutions. In 1922 Neill, superintendent of the mission, organized a biblical seminary for students. It was a four-year course, and the main teachers were Neill, Dobeš, Barták, and Vancura, with the help of some workers from other denominations. For eight years this biblical seminary was active, and today its students are registered at the Comenius University Faculty of Theology, which is a state institution. The State Ministry of Education, which deals with all church questions, has the last word as to the choice of students and professors, and it rules over the supplying of preachers and superintendents of the Methodist Church. It is a state rule that a foreign bishop cannot preside at a Czechoslovakian conference or regulate its church administration.

One of the largest orphanage societies was organized by the Methodist Church, and 500,000 kopecks were collected. A home for seventy children was provided for, and also for thirty old people. After the second World War all private social institutions were taken over by the government, which also took care of the inmates. The orphanage building became the property of the military forces of Czechoslovakia in 1948 and is still in their possession.

The congregations all grew because of evangelistic services, not by proselytism from other churches. The larger and most prominent churches are as follows: three in Prague, and one each in Třeboň, Ostrava, Slaný, Velvary, Mikulov, Jihlava, Bratislava, Jenkovec, and Litomerice. The Methodist Church of Czechoslovakia is a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

In 1939 Czechoslovakia was invaded by the Nazis, and the Central Office in Prague was badly bombed and demolished. In 1945 Czechoslovakia was liberated by the United States forces and the Russian army. Much help was received from the U.S.A. in the way of food and clothing, especially by the help of Bishop PAUL N. GARBER, then presiding over the Geneva Area. Two years of reconstruction work followed. Socialistic changes have of course taken place in every phase of life.

Today the Methodist Church has 2,393 full members (total number, 8,799) in sixteen congregations with the same number of pastors. Regular meetings are held in forty-five places, in which lay members are active (fourteen are ordained, and there are thirty-two in all). The work is organized as an Annual Conference with a superintendent as the head, and he is elected every six years. The Church Council consists of three pastors and three lay members. The Central Headquarters of the church are presently in Jecna Street 19 in Prague 2, CSSR (Czechoslovak Republic).

DACORSO, CESAR (1892-1966), Brazilian preacher and bishop, was born Nov. 10, 1892, in Santa Maria, Rio Grande do Sul, Brazil, where he spent his early childhood. JOHN W. PRICE, who organized Methodist work in that city in 1902, refers to him as a little brown-eyed boy of nine who faithfully attended Sunday school. Just when and how he was converted, is not definitely known; but in his teens, he entered Instituto Granbery at JUIZ DE FORA, Minas Gerais, from which he graduated in 1915.

On April 5, 1913, Cesar married Maria José Guimarães, by whom he had eight children. Though elected deacon in the Brazil Conference in 1916, he could not be ordained since no American bishop was present that year at Conference, due to the danger from German submarines along the coast. In 1918, he was ordained deacon by Bishop JOHN M. MOORE, and the next year he was ordained elder.

Bishop Dacorso served in the ministry forty-three years—as pastor, district superintendent, editor of the Review of Sunday School Lessons, teacher at Granbery, often as conference secretary, and five times as statistician and editor of the Annual Conference Annuals. He wrote regularly for church papers, yet in all his career never had a helper or secretary.

In 1930, when the Methodist Church of Brazil became autonomous, it elected as bishop JOHN W. TARBOUX, a retired missionary, already in frail health. The 1934 General Conference, meeting in PORTO ALEGRE, Rio Grande do Sul, found it necessary to have a second bishop. On Jan. 13, Cesar Dacorso was elected on the third ballot. He was consecrated on Jan. 14, at a ceremony in Central Church, Porto Alegre attended by the three members of the first Brazil Mission Conference—J. L. KENNEDY, J. W. Tarboux, and H. C. TUCKER. So humble and unambitious for office was young Dacorso that he hadn't even brought a dark suit and had to borrow one for the consecration service.

Dacorso gave twenty years in all to the bishopric. At that time, bishops were not elected for life tenure; but Dacorso was reelected and served three four-year terms (1934-46), presiding over all three regions (conferences) of the church; and after the election of two more bishops in 1946, he continued administering the First Regional Conference.

On July 19, 1965, Cesar Dacorso was elected for a fifth term. He rose, thanked the conference but offered his irrevocable resignation. The conference then stood and elected him bishop emeritus. Soon afterward, Instituto Granbery conferred on him the honorary title of Doutor Honoris Causa.

A man of vision, Bishop Dacorso endured exhausting trips that led him on narrow, pack-animal trails, over desolate stretches of dusty or muddy roads, through inland jungles. His interest in people, his involvement in movements for world peace and for social action—sorely needed in Brazil—sometimes led him into situations that brought misunderstanding and criticism as a leftist. Yet few ever doubted his genuine sincerity, his passion for the Gospel in action.

He died in RIO DE JANEIRO on Feb. 15, 1966, and was buried there.

DAHOMEY is a small country of West Central Africa on the Gulf of Guinea, a former French colony and an independent member of the United Nations since 1960. The area is 44,700 square miles and the population approximates 2,500,000. The capital is Porto Novo, its name reminiscent of early Portuguese contacts, but the port and largest city is Cotonou.

The first European influence seems to have been through Portuguese settlement at Ouidah (Whydah) and Porto Novo (Hogbonou). France ultimately gained trade and political dominance, recognized by treaties with the chieftains in the mid-1800's. A Protectorate was declared by France in 1851 to offset growing British influence in Lagos. Anglo-French agreements from 1889 to 1894 fixed the boundaries and settled other problems. Dahomey was finally conquered by the French and became a colony in 1892-94. After World War II and the establishment of the United Nations, France sought to train indigenous leaders for government. Independence came in 1960.

THOMAS BIRCH FREEMAN, British Wesleyan missionary, arrived in Ouidah on the coast of Dahomey in 1843. He trekked inland to interview the king of Dahomey at Abomey (Abomi). Freeman received a stiff rebuff, the king fearing the loss both of political power and of his lucrative slave-running trade. Largely because of his opposition the work developed slowly. It was not until after French influence became paramount and the interior was pacified that the mission could grow. The greatest single figure in Methodism during the last third of the nineteenth century was the African superintendent of the Porto Novo circuit from 1875, Thomas Joseph Marshall, a native of Badagry. He was succeeded in 1899 by a French missionary, Henri Arnett. By this time the membership in Dahomey and Togo had risen to 630, and there was a worshipping community of around 5,000. The Methodist churches of Dahomey and Togo comprise a single district of the British Conference, with an African chairman. In 1968, the district had 8,216 full members, mostly in Dahomey, and a constituency of over 40,000, but only twelve ministers in circuit work. Methodism is by far the largest Protestant church in a predominantly Roman Catholic country.

In 1968, a Joint Action for Mission project began among the largely unevangelized Fon people in the center of the Methodist district. The team, drawn from French-speaking churches in Africa, Asia and Europe, engaged in evangelistic, educational and social work. In the same year, the church had thirteen primary schools, with 2,051 pupils, and two secondary schools with 777 students. A joint theological college at Porto Novo serves the Ivory Coast, Togo and Dahomey.

DAKOTA CONFERENCE. (See SOUTH DAKOTA and SOUTH DAKOTA CONFERENCE.)

DAKOTA CONFERENCE, E.U.B., was organized under the leadership of Bishop RUDOLPH DUBS in Big Stone City, Dakota Territory, May 9, 1884.

As early as 1871, just eight years after the territory was opened for homesteading, missionaries from MINNESOTA arrived near Big Stone City. Two years later, they came to Yankton in the south and to Wahpeton in the north and held services. Soon there were preaching places from CANADA to the border of NEBRASKA. By the time the Dakota Conference was organized, services were being held as far as one hundred miles west of the Minnesota border. Not only had the missionaries come from Minnesota, but that conference gave the newly formed conference a gift of one thousand dollars.

In the early eighties, the railroads began building lines to the west and the people entered new areas. In the southern part of the territory, Evangelicals came from PENNSYLVANIA via ILLINOIS; in the area around Big Stone they came from Minnesota and WISCONSIN, and farther north from Minnesota and Canada. These were German people. A few German Russians began arriving in 1872, but by the eighties and nineties they came by the thousands. Ministering to these people increased the size of the church so rapidly that by 1905 the membership had practically doubled. Because the work of the Evangelical Association was largely with German-speaking people, the church tended to remain rural much longer than other denominations.

With a division in the General Church in 1894, some of the people in the Dakotas joined The United Evangelical Church. These congregations became a part of the Northwestern Conference of that denomination. While the two denominations were planning merger in 1922, the Dakota Conference proceeded to divide along state lines in May 1920. The North Dakota Conference was much larger than the South Dakota Conference, but each gained some churches in the 1922 merger. The union of The Evangelical Church and the United Brethren in Christ to form The Evangelical United Brethren Church brought one United Brethren church from the Nebraska Conference into the South Dakota Conference, namely Stickney, S. D.

In the late 1940's overtures were made by the leaders of the South Dakota Conference to the leaders of the North Dakota Conference to merge these two bodies. This was in harmony with the wishes of the denomination that no conference have less than ten thousand members. This merger took place May 9, 1951 at Jamestown, N. D.

The Dakota Conference became self-supporting in 1955 after seventy-one years as a Mission Conference, and in 1956 it began new mission churches in two cities of North Dakota. The membership was 7,682 at the time of the merger in 1951 and 9,156 in 1967. In 1966, there were 72 elders with 77 organized congregations in 56 charges. The total money raised for all purposes was $939,403 with local property valued at $5,098,050. In January, 1969, the conference was merged with North Dakota and South Dakota of the former Methodist Church.

DAKOTA WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, Mitchell, S. D., was chartered in 1883. Black Hills College in Hot Springs, S. D., which opened in 1888, was later merged with Dakota Wesleyan.

The college library contains the state papers of the late Senator FRANCIS I. CASE of South Dakota. It is also the center for frontier studies, especially those relating to the Middle Border of the United States. Degrees granted are the B.A., B.M.E. (Music Education). The governing board has forty-three members elected by the South Dakota Conference.

DALLAS, TEXAS, U.S.A. Dallas Methodism began in 1844-45 through the loyal efforts of a former Tennessee layman, Isaac Webb, and his relatives, including his sister-in-law, Mrs. W. M. Cochran, for whom the oldest congregation in the city is named. Many early pioneers and city leaders were Methodists. Dallas was first listed as a Methodist appointment in 1846 when there were about 200 persons in the town. Dallas appeared in the conference minutes as a station in 1867. The following year the church had 104 white and 35 colored members. Methodism grew with the city. By 1900 there were five churches with 1,673 members, and in 1920 the minutes show eighteen congregations with nearly 10,000 members. Today with large churches in all parts of the city, several important institutions, able leadership, and respected intellectual strength at PERKINS SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY and SOUTHERN METHODIST UNIVERSITY, Dallas ranks high as a Methodist stronghold among the cities of the nation.

Dallas is headquarters for the bishop of the area, The Texas Methodist, United Methodist Information, the Texas Methodist College Association, and the regional secretary of the Women's Division of the Board of Missions. In 1970 there were eleven churches in greater Dallas with more than 2,000 members: Highland Park, 8,705; Lovers Lane, 7,171; First, 5,931; Richardson, First, 4,005; White Rock, 3,896; Tyler Street, 3,059; University Park, 3,012; Garland, First, 2,395; Oak Lawn, 2,222; Walnut Hill, 2,239; and Munger Place, 2,000. In addition, some sixteen other churches had memberships exceeding 1,000.

In 1970 the WEST TEXAS CONFERENCE of the former Central Jurisdiction had seven churches in Dallas with 3,222 members. St. Paul's Church with 1,719 members was the largest. That same year, when the West Texas Conference merged with the overlying conferences of the South Central Jurisdiction, these churches were included in the Dallas Districts of the North Texas Conference.

The United Methodist Church has nearly 100 local churches in greater Dallas with approximately 95,000 members, and property valued at some $135,000,000. The latter figure includes the value of the Cokesbury Bookstore, Southern Methodist University, Perkins School of Theology, Methodist Hospital, C. C. Young Home and Blanton Gardens (for the aged), Bethlehem Center, Wesley Center, and Rankin Community Center. The total amount raised for all purposes by Dallas Methodists in 1969 was about $7,127,000, of which some $331,000 was for world service and conference benevolences.

The C.M.E. CHURCH has fourteen congregations in Dallas, Cedarcrest Church with over 1,300 members being the largest. There are fourteen A.M.E. CHURCH congregations in the city divided into two districts, the largest church being Bethel with nearly 1,200 members. The A.M.E. ZION CHURCH has about 300 members in three congregations.

Dallas Methodism is trying to make its ministry relevant to crucial urban problems. A telephone ministry uses trained workers who try in telephone conversations to help people with their concerns. Several churches have been recognized for their efforts at renewal in worship, theology, architecture, and ministry. A special ministry to apartment house dwellers has been organized. Coffee houses have been set up under Christian auspices. An Inner City Parish was started in 1966 in the hope of correlating the work of several cultural and racial groups in economically blighted areas of the city.

Cedarcrest C. M. E. Church was organized as the Evening Chapel C. M. E. Church in 1873. The congregation adopted the name of Boll Street shortly after it began. In 1966 the congregation moved to a new location, and the name was changed to Cedarcrest. With a membership of more than 1,300, Cedarcrest is the largest congregation of the C. M. E. Church in Texas.

First Church carries on a significant downtown ministry. Dallas Methodism began with preaching in 1844 by a visiting itinerant from Indiana, Thomas Brown, followed by Daniel Shook, the circuit preacher who organized a society in March, 1845, at Farmer's Branch called Webb's Chapel. A few years later it merged with a society at Cedar Springs, the new church being named Cochran Chapel. About 1850 Dallas is first mentioned as a preaching place, although there was likely a small congregation by 1846. Progress was slow in the beginning; the first building was planned by 1860, a lot donated, and money raised, but the Civil War delayed building until 1868. This early congregation of 104 white and 33 colored members took the name of Lamar Street, but changed it to First Church in 1886. The first building burned in 1879, and after using various halls and the auditorium of Dallas Female College, a new building was erected by 1889, at Commerce and Prather Streets. Membership had increased to 631. In 1916 it was decided to unite First Church and Trinity Church, and the membership of 1,748 chose as the new site for building one at Ross Avenue at Harwood Street. The new structure was completed by 1926; in recent years an additional all-purpose building has been erected, and the entire plant refurbished, all of this new work at a cost of nearly one and a half million dollars. The total plant is now valued at $3,842,126; and the membership in 1970 was about six thousand.

Five former pastors have been elected bishops: SAM R. HAY, JOHN M. MOORE, CHARLES C. SELECMAN, WILLIAM C. MARTIN, and W. ANGIE SMITH. ROBERT E. GOODRICH, present pastor, has served the church for twenty-five years, leading a staff that is carrying on a most significant ministry as a downtown church. Dr. Goodrich has specialized in radio and television, with a strong pulpit emphasis; the educational program under the direction of Estelle Blanton Barber is strong and effective (it is called "the largest church school in a downtown church in Methodism"); and since about 1950 the church has carried on a summer Sunday night Chautauqua that includes outstanding guest preachers, prominent musical and choir groups, and other attractive features.

Highland Park Church, located on the campus of SOUTHERN METHODIST UNIVERSITY which opened in 1915, was organized in 1916 by faculty members, students, and a few residents of the community not connected with the school. A. FRANK SMITH (later bishop) was the first pastor. In the fall of 1916 the church reported 200 members. In the next seven years six men served the church as pastor for longer or shorter periods—CLOVIS G. CHAPPELL, H. M. Whaling, Jr., PAUL B. KERN (later bishop), Glenn

HIGHLAND PARK CHURCH, DALLAS, TEXAS

Flinn, C. O. Shugart, and ROBERT W. GOODLOE. Since 1923 the church has had only three pastors—UMPHREY LEE (1923-36), MARSHALL T. STEEL (1936-57), and WILLIAM H. DICKINSON, JR. (1958-). Reporting 750 members in 1923, the congregation grew steadily under Lee and Steel; there were 2,349 members in 1936 and 8,531 in 1957. During Lee's pastorate, the church erected a Gothic sanctuary, and during Steel's term a chapel and other facilities were added, giving the institution some 140,000 square feet of floor space for worship, education, fellowship, and administration. Lake Sharon Assembly, a 135-acre tract some thirty-five miles northwest of the church, is considered a part of the church facilities. In addition to recreational and primitive and day camping areas, the assembly has dormitories, a dining hall, and classrooms. Various groups in the church use the assembly for regular meetings and weekend retreats. The church started radio broadcasts in 1945, and beginning in 1951 it pioneered in televising worship services.

In 1970 the NORTH TEXAS CONFERENCE appointed eight ministers to Highland Park Church. In addition, a full-time employee of the Dallas Visiting Nurses Association is supported by the church and is regarded as a member of its ministerial staff. The ministers with their lay councils and the assistance of some 3,000 volunteer workers serve the congregation. The official board consists of 300 members. The Church school enrolls 4,524 and has an average attendance of 1,478. In appealing for the support of missionary and benevolent projects, the church emphasizes contributing as much for others as for itself. Highland Park has led in church extension in greater Dallas, assisting in establishing twenty-four new churches in twenty years. Highland Park Church and First Church, Houston, Texas, are the two largest churches in the world. In 1970 Highland Park reported 8,705 members, property valued at $5,825,000, and $1,151,796 raised for all purposes.

ALBEA GOBOLD

Lovers Lane Church, now the second largest congregation in the North Texas Conference, was started with twelve members on Feb. 4, 1945 by a student minister, W. O. Scroggin, Jr. The group met in a cottage at 3924 Parkside Street, which was rented from the city. By the time conference met in the fall, there were sixty-four members, and a full-time pastor, Thomas J. Shipp, was appointed and in 1970 he was still the chief minister of the church. To date the congregation has had three sanctuaries, and it is now initiating a five-million dollar plant, including a sanctuary that will seat 2,500, on a ten-acre tract at Northwest Highway and Inwood Road. In 1969 the Church school enrolled 2,489 and had an average attendance of 1,218. The music director and his assistants conduct nineteen choirs which present four major oratorios and a number of special musical programs each year. In addition to worship and other regular services and activities, Lovers Lane Church seeks to maintain: an evangelistic program that will bring new members into the congregation every Sunday, an untiring ministry to alcoholics and their families (scores of them have been retrieved and are members of the church), an integrated membership (the first of the denomination in the city), the support of three missionaries (in the Oklahoma Indian Conference, Africa, and the Philippines), a unified financial budget which avoids frequent special offerings, and a ministry that will serve every need (including all persons from scouts to senior citizens). Explaining the rapid growth of Lovers Lane Church, Bishop WILLIAM C. MARTIN said, "Lovers Lane Methodist Church has the conviction that the glorious Gospel of Jesus Christ has the power to change human nature and to triumph over the forces of evil." In 1970 Lovers Lane Church reported 7,171 members, property valued at $2,696,341, and $505,974 raised for all purposes. In 1970 the North Texas Conference appointed nine ministers to this church.

JAMES T. CARLYON

Munger Place Church was organized Feb. 8, 1914 with sixty-five members. The ceremony took place in the home of O. L. Hitchcock, 5229 Bryan in east Dallas. Lawrence L. Cohen, Jr. was the first pastor, having been appointed to Munger Place in November, 1913. The first church building was a small structure erected by the members during their free time. It stood on a lot adjacent to the present sanctuary which was built in 1925. An education building was added in 1949.

The unique ministry which goes by the name of Contact, sponsored by the North Texas Conference, is located in Munger Place Church. It is a seven-day a week telephone ministry. Any person may telephone the church and receive counselling in a conversation. In 1954 Munger Place Church assumed the full-time support of a missionary couple in Chile.

In 1970 Munger Place Church reported 2,000 members, property valued at $589,500, and $155,936 raised for all purposes.

Oak Lawn Church was established in 1874 with M. W. Cullum as the first pastor. Its location is near downtown Dallas, and the neighborhood has apartment houses of all kinds. Presently about one-half of its membership lives in the neighborhood and the other half far out in the suburbs. The membership includes five Cuban refugee families, many Mexican families, two families from Germany, one American Indian family, and one family each from Costa Rica, Holland, Iran, and the Philippines. The membership spans the cultural spectrum from millionaires to college professors, physicians, pilots, musicians, housewives, waitresses, and high school dropouts. The church maintains a radio ministry that reaches beyond its neighborhood. It supports missionaries in Brazil and Korea, and it has helped to organize and staff several new churches in greater Dallas. In 1970 Oak Lawn Church reported 2,222 members, property valued at $827,446, and $232,508 raised for all purposes.

FRED R. EDGAR

Tyler Street Church was organized in the home of W. O. Forrester, 511 West 10th Street, Jan. 29, 1912. J. Leonard Rea was the first pastor. A gift of $5,000 made possible the erection of a church building costing that amount. The cornerstone was laid in May 1912. At that time the church had 166 members; the number increased to 304 by the end of the conference year. About 1920 the sub-story of a new church was erected, roofed, and used for services. The entire new edifice, valued at $275,000, was completed by 1925, but it left the congregation with a heavy debt. During the depths of the economic depression the creditors foreclosed and for some months the congregation could not worship in it. In time it was bought back from the bond holders for a fraction of the amount of the debt. By December 1940, the debt was paid and the church was dedicated. A children's building costing nearly $100,000 was erected in 1951. In the mid-1960's some $750,000 was spent in remodeling and expanding the church plant. When Tyler Street Church was ten years old it had 1,439 members. At unification in 1939 there were 2,144. It reached a peak membership of 4,260 in 1953. Through the years the church has maintained a strong church school with an average attendance of 1,604 in 1950, and a record attendance of 2,555 on Easter Sunday in 1951. It has been said that Tyler Street is the largest conservatively oriented church in the denomination. In 1970 the church reported 3,050 members, 1,780 enrolled in church school with an average attendance of 1,408, property valued at $2,157,582, and $332,127 raised for all purposes.

University Park Church, a suburban congregation, located at Preston Road and Caruth Boulevard, was organized Nov. 12, 1939. The first pastor was J. Daniel Barron. In 1940 the church had 354 members. In 1950 there were 1,884. A fellowship hall was occupied in 1942; the sanctuary was completed in 1950, and the education building in 1955. The education building was one of the first in the denomination to have modern observation rooms and a closed channel television for use in instruction. The church was the first in Texas Methodism to have a department for the religious training of mentally retarded children and youth. A canteen and gymnasium provide for athletics, hobbies, age-group recreation, and agency activities. The facilities are made available to character building organizations of the community. Some 250 meetings and activities are scheduled monthly. There is a library of 2,500 volumes, 150 film strips, and hundreds of religious pictures and training pamphlets. There are twelve choirs which provide music for the worship services and offer seasonal musical programs. The church supports world missions and conference benevolences, and in addition aids the Dallas Southside Mission for Latin American people. Two former pastors of the church have been elevated to the episcopacy, LANCE WEBB (1964) and ALSIE H. CARLETON (1968). In 1970 University Park Church reported 3,012 members, property valued at $2,027,000, and $334,287 raised for all purposes.

ERWIN F. BOHNFALK

White Rock Church was organized with eight members in August, 1939. For a year or more worship services were held in a drugstore. In 1941 when the church had eighty members, a stone chapel was erected. During the war temporary hutments were used to house the church school. In 1954 the membership passed the 1,000 mark, and the church had property valued at $209,000. In 1956 a sanctuary costing $300,000 was erected. In 1965 another building program was completed at similar cost. The church now has ten choirs with more than 500 persons participating. In 1970 White Rock Church reported 3,896 members, 2,499 church school members with an average attendance of 1,001, property valued at $1,232,018, and $263,821 raised for all purposes.

JOSEPHINE HECK

DALLINGER, WILLIAM HENRY (1841-1909), British Wesleyan scientist and theologian, was born at Devonport on July 5, 1841, and though of Anglican parentage, was converted to Methodism and entered the Wesleyan ministry in 1861. His main field in science was the biology of micro-organisms, and experiments begun in 1870 led also to his developments of lenses and microscopes. His findings won the approval of Charles Darwin and others, and in 1878 he was created a Fellow of the Royal Society. From 1884-87 he was president of the Royal Microscopical Society. His scientific knowledge was used to combat materialism, as in his FERNLEY LECTURE, The Creator, and What We May Know of the Method of Creation (1887). In 1880 he was elected to the LEGAL HUNDRED of the British Conference and made governor of Wesley College at SHEFFIELD, where he remained until, in 1888, he was relieved of pastoral charge in order to devote himself to science and apologetics. He died on Nov. 7, 1909.

H. MORLEY RATTENBURY

DANCY, JOHN C. (1857-1920), American layman and the second editor of the A.M.E. Zion Quarterly Review, was born of slave parents on May 8, 1857, in Tarboro, N. C., the year of the Dred Scott Decision. His father, of Edgecombe County, N. C., was a skillful carpenter and became a successful builder and contractor after Negro emancipation. The Dancys did all in their power to give their children a sound moral and cultural background, and John graduated in 1873 from a school for Negroes in Tarboro.

For a time he worked as apprentice in the printing office of the Tarboro Southerner, became an expert typesetter and acquired a basic knowledge of printing and publishing, which was to serve him in his later newspaper work. Having saved the money to pay his tuition, he entered Howard University, Washington, D. C., and after three years there and a brief period of service in the United States Treasury Department, went back to his home in Tarboro to teach school.

After his return Dancy directed the campaign which made his brother, Franklin, the mayor of Tarboro, and in 1883 John Dancy was elected Register of Deeds for Edgecombe County, serving three terms. He became chairman of the Edgecombe County Republican Executive Committee for eight years. His speech at the National Republican Convention in 1884, seconding the vice presidential nomination of John A. Logan, attracted wide attention and established his reputation as one of the most able Negro orators of the day. In 1891 he was elected chairman of the North Carolina State Convention of Colored People, which vigorously protested the exclusion of Negroes from jury service.

Dancy went abroad in 1879 as a delegate of the Right Worthy Grand Lodge of Good Templars. He was Grand Secretary of the North Carolina Grand Lodge for seven years. At the convention of the Right Worthy Grand Lodge of Good Templars, held at Boston in 1898, he shared the speaker's platform with the renowned orator and champion of Negro rights, Wendell Phillips, and the following year he represented the lodge abroad, winning acclaim throughout the British Isles for his brilliant oratory and attracting astonishingly large audiences.

He addressed 5,000 people at the great Hengle Circus in Liverpool with Joseph Malins, the Temperance advocate, and George Gladstone of Scotland, nephew of the famous English statesman. He also appeared before an audience of 40,000 at the Crystal Palace in London.

His career as journalist began in 1882 with his editorship of the North Carolina Sentinel at Tarboro, N. C. In 1885 the board of bishops of the African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church elected him editor and business manager of their official publication, The Star of Zion. Under Dancy's editorship the paper became self-supporting and a powerful influence among Negroes. As I. Garland Penn points out, it was the equal of any religious paper published by the race in America. Dancy also edited the A.M.E. Zion Quarterly Review and in 1891 he was delegate to the Ecumenical Conference of the Methodist Churches of the World.

Dancy continued to be active and prominent politically. From 1891 to 1895 and 1897 to 1902, appointed by President Harrison and reappointed by President McKinley, he was Collector of Customs at Wilmington, N. C. In 1902 he was chosen Recorder of Deeds for the District of Columbia by President Theodore Roosevelt, and he remained in this post until 1910. He died in 1920.

He was the father of three children, John C., Jr., Joseph and Lillian, who worthily represented a second generation of active Negroes.

John Dancy, Sr. was one of the most eminent Negroes of his era. Sometime during the 1890's he met Booker T. Washington (1865-1915), and Dancy and Washington became fast friends and carried on a large correspondence of which a portion has most fortunately been preserved. This gives unusual interest to the present calendar, and provides a valuable sidelight upon both the activities and philosophy of Booker T. Washington.

DAVID H. BRADLEY

DANIEL, JEROME WALTER (1884-1955), American preacher and missionary to BRAZIL, was born in Cotulla, Texas, on March 14, 1884.

He received his B.A. from the University of Texas in 1912 and his B.D. from VANDERBILT in 1914. He sailed at once for Brazil, was admitted on trial in September at the South Brazil Annual Conference, and was ordained elder in 1916. After a year of language study at Colégio União (now Instituto), he was sent in 1916 to Passo Fundo, a city of about 10,000 in the state of Rio Grande do Sul. In 1917, he married Maggie Lee Kenney, missionary in Brazil of the Women's Division.

At that time, there was no church building, no parsonage, no Methodist property of any kind in Passo Fundo. The city, however, offered the Methodists a large tract of land for a school; so on March 12, 1919, Daniel opened a school in a frame building behind the church hall. To the surprise of all concerned, ninety-one pupils applied immediately.

Knowing through Daniel about this challenge, Miss Mary Decker, a teacher at the University of Texas, stirred up enthusiasm among Methodist students, and raised $4,000 for the educational work in Passo Fundo. With this, and with additional gifts later, Daniel was able to build a parsonage, a small chapel, and buy a block-size adjoining piece of land.

All health following an eight-year term of service for Mrs. Daniel brought them home on furlough in 1920; and when they returned to Brazil, Daniel was appointed to Cruz Alta. Here he did splendid work, reviving a congregation that had dropped from some 200 to seventeen, and leaving a substantial church building and a small chapel in the suburbs. Later Daniel served in Central Church, PORTO ALEGRE, as pastor, treasurer of the mission, and as director of the Bible school connected with Porto Alegre College. In 1936, they returned to the United States, and he worked in the LYDIA PATTERSON INSTITUTE in El Paso, preparing young Spanish-Americans for the ministry.

He retired in 1954 and went to live in his hometown, Cotulla, where he died in November, 1955. He was survived by his widow and two sons. Mrs. Daniel, who was living in Williamsburg, Va., died in May, 1964.

DANIEL PAYNE COLLEGE was founded by the A.M.E. Church at Selma, Ala. in 1889. In 1891 the school was enlarged and in 1903 it was incorporated under the laws of the state. By 1923 Payne offered the Bachelor of Arts degree. The school was forced to close during the economic depression (1930-32) but reopened thereafter.

In the 1890's Nichols Theological Seminary began its work at Payne. In 1968 Howard D. Gregg headed the work at the college and J. L. Myers was dean of the seminary.

JOSEPHUS DANIELS

DANIELS, JOSEPHUS (1862-1948), noted American newspaper publisher, Secretary of the Navy (1913-21), and Ambassador to Mexico (1933-41), was born on May 18, 1862, in Washington, N. C. He was the second son of Josephus and Mary Cleves (Seabrook) Daniels. His father was killed in the closing months of the Civil War, and his mother moved to Wilson, N. C. He studied law in the University of North Carolina Law School, and was admitted to the bar but never practiced. He received the LL.D. from twelve different colleges and universities. He married Addie Worth Bagley on May 2, 1888, and to them were born Josephus, Jr.; Worth Bagley; Jonathan Worth; and Frank A.

Daniels became a newspaperman in 1885 and obtained the controlling interest in the Raleigh (North Carolina) State Chronicle when he was but twenty-three. Nine years later he bought the Raleigh News and Observer, and merged it with the Chronicle, which was dropped. In a short while Josephus Daniels became a major editorial voice in the South.

He early joined the Methodist Church and kept his membership in the EDENTON STREET CHURCH in Raleigh for many years. He strongly supported the prohibition movement. As a progressive Democrat, he became a close friend of William Jennings Bryan and also supported Woodrow Wilson, who when he became President, appointed Daniels as Secretary of the Navy. Daniels abolished the officers' wine mess and democratized the naval service. He resigned as Secretary in 1921—there was impending a change of administration—and became an editor again. His former assistant in the Navy Department was Franklin D. Roosevelt, who when he became President appointed him Ambassador to Mexico. There he served eight years, making a name as spokesman for the "Good Neighbor Policy." He retired from this post in 1941, going back to Raleigh where he died on Jan. 15, 1948.

Daniels kept a home at LAKE JUNALUSKA, N. C., Methodist headquarters and center of summer activities in Western North Carolina. He was a strong supporter of the various programs carried on at "The Lake." He published in his later years a five-volume autobiography whose separate volumes were denominated Tar Heel Editor, 1939; Editor in Politics, 1941; The Wilson Era, Years of Peace, 1944; Wilson Era, Years of War and After, 1946; and Shirt Sleeve Diplomat, 1947. He was also the author of Life of Woodrow Wilson, 1924; Our Navy at War, 1922; and Life of Worth Bagley, 1898.

DANNELLY, CLARENCE M. (See JUDICIAL COUNCIL.)

DANVILLE, ILLINOIS, U.S.A. St. James Church was only ten years old when Methodist history began in the little village of Danville. Squire Perkins wrote in 1829 that he came to Danville to attend Methodist Episcopal class meetings held by Samuel Whiteman from "house to house." The first listed appointment in Danville was in 1829, but it was 1836 before a church was built at a cost of $800. A second church building was built in 1857 and was dedicated by PETER CARTWRIGHT, famous pioneer preacher, and was called "the finest house of worship in Eastern Illinois." Both churches grew to be strong congregations, but they were only four blocks apart, and in 1919 the two congregations, First and Kimber, united to form Saint James Church. As neither building was large enough for the new congregation, plans for an adequate one were made and in 1927 a handsome new building was consecrated during the ministry of T. N. Ewing. The congregation of 2,099 members was the largest membership in Danville in 1970. The stone building is of Gothic design and valued at more than a million dollars. It is still regarded as one of the most beautiful churches in Central Illinois.

DANVILLE, VIRGINIA, U.S.A., a noted tobacco and textile center, is located in south-central VIRGINIA near the NORTH CAROLINA line. It is the hub of one of the fastest growing industrial sections of the state.

Methodism made its first appearance in Danville and Pittsylvania County around 1780. Bishop FRANCIS ASBURY is known to have visited the area on at least three occasions, preaching in various homes to large congregations. In 1827 the first Methodist church was built near Danville, and in 1834 the first Methodist church was built within the incorporated city of Danville. It was "a small frame building with a steeple and a bell" on a lot 50 feet by 65 feet. Methodism grew rapidly in membership and influence. In its beginning this church was on a circuit served from Milton, N. C. Charles Fisher was the first appointed pastor. It was not until 1858 that the churches of this area were transferred to the VIRGINIA CONFERENCE.

The Danville Church flourished and by 1865 plans were being developed for a new edifice at a new location. A division occurred over the location of the new church. As a result, two churches were built—one of them now known as Main Street Church, and the other as Mount Vernon. The two continue to be leaders in Virginia Methodism.

The United Methodist Church now serves this community with fourteen churches, comprising a membership of 6,018. Danville is the headquarters for the Danville District, which serves five counties and two cities in the southwestern section of the Virginia Conference, with a membership of more than 19,500. (1970)

In 1834 RANDOLPH-MACON COLLEGE established a Danville school for girls, now known as Stratford College. Later it became an independent institution.

Negro Methodists of the area are served by two A.M.E. and one A.M.E. Zion Churches.

DARBY, GEORGE ELIAS (1889-1962), Canadian physician and minister, was born on Oct. 27, 1889, near Milton, Ontario. He was educated in New York and at the University of Toronto, from which he was graduated in 1913. He did postgraduate studies at medical schools in Toronto, New York, Chicago, and London, and was made a fellow of the Royal Anthropological Institute for his research in blood groups of native Indians of British Columbia. In 1955 he was elected to honorary membership in the College of Physicians and Surgeons of British Columbia. In that year he was also honored by Union Theological College with a doctorate of divinity.

Responding to what he believed was a call from God, in 1914 he became superintendent of the Bella Bella Hospital. For forty-five years George Darby rendered a service that is unique in the annals of the British Columbia coast. He ministered to physical needs; prayed with the people; preached in their church; married them and taught them. In 1944 the chief of the Bella Bellas bestowed his name upon Darby and decreed that henceforth he would be known as Wo-Ya-La ("The Highest").

Darby died on Sept. 1, 1962, but to quote H. W. McKervill, "Chief Wo-Ya-La is not dead. His spirit permeates the coast he knew so well. The finest monuments to his honor . . . are the grateful hearts of people who loved this man, who achieved greatness through humble obedience to the Chief of All."

DARJEELING, India. Mount Hermon School was founded as a school for girls in 1895 by Miss E. Knowles, a missionary of the M. E. Church, on a small site known as Queen's Hill near the center of Darjeeling. The school was moved in 1926 to its present location outside the city, and was then made coeducational. Baptist and Presbyterian boards of missions in AUSTRALIA and NEW ZEALAND now cooperate with the Methodist Church of Southern Asia in maintaining the institution. They have provided funds for excellent new buildings recently erected.

Many missionaries have been able to remain in INDIA years longer than would have been possible had Mount Hermon and comparable schools not been available. The distressing alternative was to send their children to their homeland for an education. Those separations have produced many tragic results. On the other hand, many children of missionaries who studied through high school in Mount Hermon, or another such school, have returned as missionaries and many of them have become eminent church leaders.

DARLINGTON, URBAN VALENTINE WILLIAMS (1870-1954), bishop of the M. E. Church, South, was born Aug. 3, 1870 at Graefenberg, Shelby Co., Ky., the son of James Henderson and Kitty Pemberton Darlington. He received his education at KENTUCKY WESLEYAN COLLEGE, 1889-95; this institution also granted him the D.D. degree.

He was ordained in 1896. His appointments included Washington, Ky., 1896-1900; Millersburg, Ky., 1900; Covington, Ky., 1901-05; Parkersburg, W. Va., 1905-09; Huntington, W. Va., 1909-13. He was secretary of education of the WESTERN VIRGINIA CONFERENCE in 1914 and 1916. He served as PRESIDING ELDER of the Ashland District of the Western Virginia Conference (MES) in 1915. He was president of MORRIS HARVEY COLLEGE (then at Barbourville, W. Va., later moved to Charleston, W. Va.), 1917-18.

Darlington was made a bishop in 1918, at Atlanta, Ga. For eight years he served the Southern Church's newly opened European area, with conferences in BELGIUM, POLAND, and CZECHOSLOVAKIA. In the United States he had areas including WEST VIRGINIA, KENTUCKY, SOUTH CAROLINA, NORTH CAROLINA, MEMPHIS, LOUISVILLE, and MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCEs. He retired in 1944, but two years later he was called back to active service; for three years he was bishop in Mississippi before his final retirement in 1949.

A tall, impressive looking man, his forte was administration, especially in the field of missions. Bishop ROY SHORT, who knew him intimately, said that he was a "typical old-fashioned Southern Bishop." He was not rated as a great preacher, though in his preaching was a powerful, emotional appeal, especially along evangelistic lines. He would say to his congregation, "If you do not get anything else from this service, get what I am reading from the Bible." It was said of him that he was the only bishop to have "his office in his hat" and that he was "the last bishop who made appointments without consulting his cabinet."

Bishop Darlington was twice married. His first wife was Lyda Clark of Millersburg, Ky., and a daughter and son by that union preceded him in death. His second wife was Virginia Bourne of Stanford, Ky., and they had two children.

Bishop Darlington died Oct. 1, 1954 and is buried at Frankfort, Ky.

DARNEY, WILLIAM (? -1774) British preacher, was known as "Scotch Will." It is possible that he was converted in SCOTLAND in a revival which occurred there 1733-40. About 1742 he appeared in the north of England as a preacher and founded societies. WILLIAM GRIMSHAW came under his influence in 1744 and was helped toward an evangelical experience. For some years before his societies were formally recognized by JOHN WESLEY, they were known as "William Darney's Societies," and they received occasional oversight from Grimshaw. Darney wrote hymns, compiled a hymnbook, and published a number of theological works, including Fundamental Doctrines, which are contained in the Scriptures. His name disappeared from the Minutes in 1769 because he refused to give up his trade while an itinerant, but he continued as a local preacher in the Rosendale area, where he died in December, 1774. "For a quarter of a century, Darney was intermittently in trouble with the Wesleys and flying for protection to Grimshaw. His vehement Calvinism, his insistence on singing his own less mediocre hymns, his general uncouthness, led to continual reprimands."

DAS, PREMNATH CONSTANCE (1886-), known also by her maiden name of Constance Maya Das and as Chandrama Prem Nath Das, was the first Indian principal of the ISABELLA THOBURN COLLEGE. She was born April 22, 1886, at Ferozepur, Punjab, INDIA. Her father, a member of a prominent Hindu family, was converted through the ministry of John Newton. He and one of the missionaries were severely beaten by his angry kinsmen, and he was held captive by relatives to keep him from further association with Christians. After a few days he escaped and soon became firmly established as a Christian, and in a few years he became an elder in the Presbyterian Church, in which office he continued to the end of his life.

Constance and several of her sisters were enrolled in Isabella Thoburn College. She was quickly recognized as a student of rare promise. After she had completed high school and two years of advanced work in the college, JOHN F. GOUCHER gave her a scholarship for study at GOUCHER COLLEGE in BALTIMORE, Md. She maintained her scholarly reputation there and was awarded Phi Beta Kappa membership.

Returning to India she became in 1911 a teacher of English and higher mathematics at the college. In April 1913, she was married to Prem Nath Das, a third-generation Christian and a leading layman of the Anglican Church in the United Provinces. Das died in 1931. Mrs. Das rejoined the faculty of the college the next year. She was soon elected vice-principal. In 1937 she went to America on sabbatical leave and was awarded the LL.D. degree by Goucher College and the Doctor of Pedagogy degree by BOSTON UNIVERSITY. She had earlier earned the M.A. degree from Allahabad University and another from Columbia University.

With the rising tide of political feeling calling for Indian leadership in every possible area of national life, it was most fortunate that Mrs. Das was available for the principalship of Isabella Thoburn College when, in 1939, Mary Shannon came to retirement age. With one accord the board of governors and its wide constituency recognized that she was the one for that high office. She nominated SARAH CHAKKO for vice-principal, and with her invaluable assistance, Mrs. Das led the college through six years of steady advance during a time of world-wide stress and strife. In 1945 she was succeeded by Sarah Chakko as principal.

DASHIELL, ROBERT LAURENSEN (1825-1880), missionary secretary and educator, was born in Salisbury, Md., on June 25, 1825, the son of Robert and Mary R. Dashiell. Converted at fifteen, he entered DICKINSON COLLEGE, graduating in 1846. He joined the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE in 1848, traveled circuits in MARYLAND and VIRGINIA, and subsequently served churches in Washington, D. C., and Baltimore. In 1860, he transferred to the NEWARK CONFERENCE, where he served churches in Newark, Jersey City and Orange.

He was chosen President of Dickinson College in 1868, the first graduate of the college to hold that office. After four years he resigned, having served the college through a difficult period and with eminent success. He was made presiding elder of the Jersey City district of the Newark Conference in the same year, 1872, and in May of that year, the GENERAL CONFERENCE elected him Missionary Secretary of the M. E. Church.

Dashiell received the D.D. degree from Rutgers College and WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY. He was a member of the General Conferences of 1872 and 1876, and served as general Missionary Secretary for eight years, dying while in office at Newark, N. J. on March 8, 1880.

He joined the NORTH ALABAMA CONFERENCE in 1911, and in the next forty-eight years served many of its leading appointments, including First Church, Decatur; First Church, Huntsville; Norwood, Birmingham; the Tuscaloosa and Birmingham Districts; and East Lake, Birmingham. He was delegate to six General Conferences (1926 to 1944), as well as to the UNITING CONFERENCE in 1939. He served as chairman of the conference board of church extension, 1927-44, and was secretary of its rural church extension committee for many years. After his retirement in 1959, he served as secretary of the commission on sustentation and minimum salaries, a cause dear to his heart. A leader in his conference, he was a strong preacher. He died May 9, 1966 in Birmingham.

ST. JOHN'S CHURCH, DAVENPORT, IOWA

DAVENPORT, IOWA, U.S.A. St. John's is an English Gothic church built of Bedford stone and stands on one of the busiest streets in the city. The first Methodist minister arrived in the city within a year of the first settlers in 1834. During the early decades the Methodist pastors were true circuit riders, constantly travelling. By 1840 a stationed preacher was requested, and the following year the first Methodist church was built in Davenport. It was a small brick building which had no pulpit except a big pine box. A wood-burning stove was used for heat. The chandelier was a block of wood, into which tallow candles were inserted, suspended from the ceiling.

This small building was outgrown and replaced within ten years. In turn the larger building was outgrown so the congregation divided, and in 1867 about eighty members of the parent church moved to the present location. They began with a temporary tabernacle, then there was a small brick edifice which was in use until 1899 when the two congregations again became one and a larger church home was erected.

The new building encompassed many unique ideas and beautiful details including magnificent stone mullioned stained-glass windows.

There have been three development programs since building the original structure and these expanded and modernized facilities to meet the needs of the congregation which now numbers nearly 3,000.

St. John's has working in its membership hundreds of families from many backgrounds and occupations, and offers a wide variety of activities to appeal to every age and interest. It has grown to become one of the strongest Methodist congregations in Iowa and has become increasingly missionary in its interests and emphasis. It has given full financial support to an overseas missionary for a number of years and its concern has also covered many areas of local need. It has provided leadership, financial aid and use of facilities to many civic groups.

DAVENPORT COLLEGE grew out of a movement in 1853 to establish a school for women at Lenoir, N. C., sponsored by the M. E. Church, South. A public meeting in 1853 resulted in subscriptions amounting to more than $10,000. The Main Building, built of brick with large portico in front and four massive fluted columns, two and one-half stories high, and a second building containing the boarding department and dining room were erected at a cost of $16,000. The college was named for Colonel William Davenport, a prominent state legislator and church leader, who gave some $3,000 to the building fund. In 1857 the stockholders made a formal tender of the institution to the SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE (MES), requesting the appointment of a Board of Trustees and president. H. M. Mood was chosen to serve as the first president and the college opened that fall. President Mood gave his inaugural address on the third Thursday in July, 1858. Fifty-six pupils attended Davenport Female College, as it was known until 1893, during the first academic term. Among the early presidents of the college were: R. N. Price, A. G. Stacy, J. R. Griffith, Samuel Lander. During the Civil War, when the Federal army was approaching Lenoir, President Stacy disbanded the college. The invading troops plundered, abused and defaced the college buildings but they were not burned and the college was able to reopen shortly thereafter.

In 1870, Davenport Female College became affiliated with the NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE (MES). A strong religious influence characterized the college throughout its existence and history records many revivals on the campus. During its early years "every single one of its pupils were members of the church."

Men were first admitted to the college in 1893.

Davenport College closed in 1933 due to the economic depression of that period. Its endowment and property were transferred to GREENSBORO COLLEGE in 1938.

DAVID, CHRISTIAN (1690-1751), Moravian, born at Senftenben, Moravia, on Dec. 31, 1690, was brought up as a Roman Catholic but became a Pietist. He led the Moravian remnant to Berthelsdorf and was called by JOHN WESLEY "the first planter of the Church at Herrnhut." Though a layman, he impressed Wesley by his preaching and probably affected his later attitude toward lay preachers. A zealous missionary, he went on the first Moravian mission to Greenland. He died at Herrnhut on Feb. 3, 1751.

He entered the Methodist ministry, serving charges in the ILLINOIS CONFERENCE, which he joined in 1894, being pastor of First Church, Decatur, from 1902-08. His interest in Christian education was evidenced by the following appointments: Chancellor of NEBRASKA WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, 1908-09; professor of Religious Education, Garrett Biblical Institute, 1910-19, with a previous term there as instructor, 1900-02; president of Illinois Wesleyan University, 1922-31.

He served the church at large, first as executive secretary of the Commission on Life Service, 1920-21, and also secretary for Educational Institutions from 1932-39. He was a delegate to seven GENERAL CONFERENCES. He retired in 1940, and he and his wife lived at Bethany Methodist Home, in CHICAGO, ILL., until his death on Jan. 14, 1968.

DAVIE COUNTY, NORTH CAROLINA, U.S.A., which was carved out of Rowan County in 1836, was the location of a number of early Methodist societies. The 1780 Conference at BALTIMORE sent Andrew Yeargan to the Yadkin Circuit which, according to the General Minutes, had twenty-one members at that time. It was the first circuit whose boundaries were wholly within western NORTH CAROLINA. Beal's Meetinghouse, built about 1780 on Hunting Creek some ten miles northwest of what is now Mocksville, was one of the first on the circuit. It was succeeded by Zion's Chapel and New Union Church which went into the NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE (later Blue Ridge-Atlantic) of the M. E. Church when it reentered the state in 1869. In 1969 the two churches reported 36 and 112 members, respectively.

Whitaker's Chapel (not to be confused with a former Methodist Protestant chapel of the same name in Enfield County) flourished until 1830. ASBURY preached there in 1794 and 1799. The old Whitaker's cemetery lies midway between the succeeding Oak Grove and Smith Grove Churches on Highway 158 between Mocksville and the Yadkin River. Timber Ridge (now Bethlehem); Olive Branch which later moved to Farmington; Ward's (later absorbed by Bethlehem and Farmington); and several other preaching places existed in Davie County around 1800.

The present Shady Grove Church at Advance grew out of COKEBURY SCHOOL which Asbury visited there in 1794. When he returned in 1799 he said he found no school but a society. In 1969 the church reported 318 members.

Hebron, once called Fulton, down the Yadkin River from old Cokesbury School, began during the revivals in the early nineteenth century. It is the oldest continuing congregation in one location in Davie County. The land for this church was deeded by Joseph Hanes, a member, Nov. 10, 1826. Liberty Church was part of a union congregation near Jerusalem in south Davie County prior to 1819. Desiring "liberty," the Methodists in the union body withdrew and began worshipping in a schoolhouse. Concord Church was organized in 1846. These two churches now constitute the Liberty-Concord charge. In 1969 the one church reported 413 members and the other 175. Center Church was organized in 1830; it had 190 members in 1969. Daniel Dwiggin, a local preacher, was a leader there in the early days.

Bethel Church, established two miles from what is now Mocksville, was relocated in 1833 in the town and became First Church. The Methodist Protestants occupied the old building and continued to call it Bethel Church. In 1847 the NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE (MP) organized a Mocksville Circuit, and some churches on the circuit were in Davie County. The circuit practically disappeared during the Civil War. It was reorganized soon after 1865, and four of its churches were in Davie County.

From 1783 to 1836 the churches in Davie County were on the historic Salisbury Circuit. For many years thereafter they were on the Mocksville Circuit. In 1921 there were six charges in Davie County with 3,000 members and property valued at $120,000. In 1969 there were twenty-three churches in the county with 4,215 members and property valued at $1,921,679.

DAVIES, HOWELL (1717-1770), was converted about 1737 under HOWELL HARRIS, whom he assisted in organizing some of the earliest societies of the WELSH CALVINISTIC METHODISTS. He was ordained deacon (1739) and priest (1740) by Nicholas Claggett, Bishop of St. David's, and after a brief curacy at Llysyfran served GRIFFITH JONES as curate. From Llanddowror he moved back to Pembrokeshire, occupying several church livings. He was an enthusiastic and emotional preacher, who could be confined neither to his own parish nor to conventional worship. A contemporary described him as "a mighty Boanerges, and very industrious in preaching, both in churches, houses, and fields." He carved out a wide preaching itinerancy in Pembrokeshire, which he came to regard as his own special evangelical preserve, so that he complained to HARRIS about JOHN WESLEY's attempt in 1763 to visit the area with the intention of forming societies for unsheltered converts. Davies was twice married, to Catherine Poyer of Henllan Amgoes, Carmarthenshire (1744), and to Elizabeth White of Prendergast (c. 1748), where he was buried Jan. 16, 1770.

DAVIES, OWEN (1752-1830), Welsh Methodist, was born at Wrexham, North Wales, on March 27, 1752. He joined the Wesleyan society at Brentford and began to preach in London. At JOHN WESLEY's request he became an itinerant preacher about 1789, and traveled in a number of English circuits from 1790-1800. When in 1800 the Wesleyan Methodist Conference decided to send missionaries to North Wales, Davies was appointed superintendent of the mission "with an unlimited commission to form new circuits." He had already had some experience as a chairman of a district at Redruth, and it was only natural that he should be appointed first chairman of the Welsh District, which was formed in 1803. He was given "a discretionary power to labour as and where he judges best for the advantages of the Welsh missions; and shall have the superintendence of the whole mission, and authority to change the Preachers as he judges best." Although his knowledge of the Welsh language was very limited, the mission flourished under his guidance and with the help of devoted preachers. He published tracts which were translated into Welsh by his colleague JOHN BRYAN in defense of ARMINIANISM, which was bitterly and ably opposed by some of the leaders of the other Welsh churches soon after the inauguration of the mission. When for financial and other reasons a number of ministers were withdrawn from Wales in 1816, Davies went to the Liverpool circuit. In the following year his health broke down, and he became a supernumerary. He died Jan. 12, 1830, and was buried at Liverpool.

GRIFFITH ROBERTS

DAVIES, RUPERT ERIC (1909-), British minister, was born in Shepherd's Bush, London, on Nov. 29, 1909. He was educated at St. Paul's School, London, at Balliol College, Oxford (B.A., 1932; M.A., 1936), and as an accepted candidate for the Methodist ministry at WESLEY HOUSE, CAMBRIDGE, where in 1946 he proceeded B.D. From 1935 to 1947 he served as Chaplain of KINGSWOOD SCHOOL, being ordained and received into FULL CONNEXION with the Methodist Church in 1937. After five years of circuit ministry in BRISTOL, he was in 1952 appointed tutor in church history at DIDSBURY COLLEGE, Westbury-on-Trym, Bristol, where he still serves. Mr. Davies has written widely in the field of Reformation theology and church history, notably The Problem of Authority in the Continental Reformers (1946) and Religious Authority in an Age of Doubt (1968). He was chosen to write the volume on Methodism in the Penguin series (1963), and is co-editor with GORDON RUPP of A History of the Methodist Church in Great Britain (Vol. 1, 1966). Mr. Davies has been a leader in religious education in Great Britain, and in 1956 edited a symposium entitled An Approach to Christian Education. He has also been very active in the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL, serving on its executive committee from 1951, and also in the ecumenical movement—see The Catholicity of Protestantism, which he edited with R. NEWTON FLEW in 1952, and Methodists and Unity (1962). His wife, formerly Margaret Price Holt, is a Methodist local preacher, and has long been a prominent leader in the Women's Fellowship.

DAVIS, HENRY L. (1870-1943), American preacher and administrator, was born in Marion County, Ind., the son of Harry and Adelaide (McWherter) Davis. Admitted to the NORTHWEST INDIANA CONFERENCE in 1896 and appointed to Congress Street, Lafayette, he served outstanding churches and built the magnificent First Church, SOUTH BEND. Davis was superintendent of the South Bend and Greencastle Districts, but his great achievement was as Executive Secretary of the Preachers Aid Society, 1925-1943. In three years he trebled its assets. In 1931 he introduced Group Insurance and carried the load of promotion and administration until 1942. He was on the National Board of Pensions for years. A graduate of DEPAUW UNIVERSITY, Davis served on its Board of Trustees. He was a delegate to four GENERAL CONFERENCES and the 1939 UNITING CONFERENCE. He married Mable Houlehan on Nov. 22, 1907. He died April 10, 1943.

DAVIS, LEWIS (1814-1890), "Father of Higher Education" in the United Brethren Church, was born in Craig County, Va., Feb. 14, 1814, on a small farm owned by his father, a convivial Welshman. At eighteen he went to nearby New Castle to work for a tool manufacturer where he came under the elevating influence of Methodist itinerants. His only formal schooling was an eighteen-month attendance at New Castle Academy but thereafter he became a lifelong, diligent scholar.

For two years, Davis taught at a local school in WEST VIRGINIA, where he was persuaded to join the Church of the United Brethren in Christ. Licensed to preach in 1838, he spent the next eight years as an itinerant in Scioto Conference and championed the cause of higher education in the church. He became the first financial agent for the new institution projected by the Scioto Conference, OTTERBEIN UNIVERSITY, and made the first contribution of $15. Traveling all over OHIO and West Virginia he struggled to overcome prejudices and solicit support.

In 1850, Davis became president of the infant college and combined this responsibility with his others, even adding that of bishop after GENERAL CONFERENCE elected him to that post in 1853. He resigned the presidency in 1857, but left the bishopric in 1860 when called again to lead the university. His second term as president lasted for eleven years, culminating in the heroic construction of the present Towers Hall, after its predecessor had burned down.

In 1871, Davis became the senior professor in Union Biblical Seminary (now UNITED THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY), DAYTON, Ohio, thus pioneering in that field of education for his church, as well. Retired to emeritus status in 1886, he died at his home in Dayton on March 23, 1890. His widow, née Rebecca Bartels, survived him by five years.

DAVIS, LYMAN EDWYN (1854-1930), American M. P. minister and author, was born Dec. 28, 1854 at Perrysburg, Ohio, the son of a Methodist minister, John Wesley and Martha (Powers) Davis. He was graduated from ADRIAN COLLEGE in 1877 and began his ministry that same year. He was president of the GENERAL CONFERENCE from 1912-1920, editor of the Methodist Recorder from 1913-1930, and was five times a delegate to the General Conference, 1912-1928. He wrote Democratic Methodism in America.

JOHN W. HAWLEY

DAVIS, MONROE HORTENSIVS (ca.1886-1953) an American bishop of the A.M.E. Church, was born in SOUTH CAROLINA about 1886. He was educated at ALLEN UNIVERSITY, Howard University (A.B.), and DREW THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY (B.D.). He married Catherine Beckett and two children were born to them. Davis served as pastor in NEW JERSEY and MARYLAND and was elected to the episcopacy in 1928 from the pastorate of St. John's Church, BALTIMORE, Md. His first assignment was to West Africa 1928-1931, then the Second Episcopal District in the Southern United States in 1931. Bishop Davis was reputed to be a forceful and persuasive preacher, kind to his friends but, as he said, "a terror to his opponents."

Bishop Wright's account states that Bishop Davis was tried for malfeasance and misappropriation of funds by a committee at Richmond presided over by Bishop R. C. RANSOM; that he was found guilty and suspended until the Virginia Conference of his Church that year could meet. This exonerated him but other charges were brought and he was again tried at a special session of his General Conference at Little Rock, Ark., in November, 1946, and suspended until the regular General Conference met in 1948, when he was put upon the inactive list with no assignment but "with full salary and no expense allowance." He died on Feb. 9, 1953.

GRANT S. SHOCKLEY

DAVIS, WERTER RENICK (1815-1893), preacher and educator, was born at Circleville, Ohio, April 1, 1815. Educated at Kenyon College, he held the D.D. degree from Indiana Asbury University (now DEPAUW). He was admitted to the OHIO CONFERENCE in 1835. During his early ministry he was imprisoned in WEST VIRGINIA because of his anti-slavery views. He was pastor of Ebenezer M. E. Church in St. Louis in 1853, and then went to MCKENDREE COLLEGE as professor, and was serving as president of that school in 1858 when he was elected the first president of BAKER UNIVERSITY, Baldwin City, Kan. He served as president of the latter three times. He remained in KANSAS the rest of his life. He was chaplain of the constitutional convention which organized the state and a member of the first legislature. During the Civil War he served first as a chaplain, then as the colonel of a cavalry regiment, and as commandant at Fort Leavenworth. His family long prized a pair of gold-mounted revolvers presented to Colonel Davis by his own Kansas regiment.

Returning to the ministry, he served fourteen years as a PRESIDING ELDER. He was a delegate to three GENERAL CONFERENCES, the first ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE in London, and the CENTENNIAL Celebration in BALTIMORE. Davis was known as an eloquent preacher. He was the father-in-law of Bishop WILLIAM A. QUAYLE who admired him greatly. Davis died in Baldwin, Kan., June 22, 1893.

LESLIE DAVISON

DAVISON, LESLIE (1906-1972), British Methodist, was born June 8, 1906, in County Durham. He attended the Bede School, Sunderland, became a LOCAL PREACHER when he was fifteen, and was trained for the UNITED METHODIST ministry at Victoria Park College, Manchester, 1924-27. He was ordained in 1931 and was stationed at the Central Hall, Bermondsey, 1937-44, during which time he was an alderman of the borough of Bermondsey (1940-44) and a London county councillor (1942-44). After a period as superintendent of the Walsall Mission, he was made chairman of the Wolverhampton and Shrewsbury District, 1950-57; in 1957 he went to the Methodist HOME MISSION DEPARTMENT, of which he became the general secretary in 1965. In 1962 he was elected PRESIDENT of the Methodist Conference; in his year of office he went to Italy to inaugurate the METHODIST CHURCH OF ITALY and to Lagos to inaugurate the METHODIST CHURCH OF NIGERIA; he also had an audience with Pope John. Among Davison's publications are a book of verse, The Ballads of Bermondsey (1944); The Principles of Penal Reform (1960); and he also edited a volume of apologetics, The Christian Replies (1960). He wrote in defense of the proposals published in 1962 for closer union between the British Methodist Church and the Church of England. He held an honorary L.H.D. of KANSAS WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY (U.S.A.) and an honorary D.D. from DICKINSON COLLEGE (U.S.A.). He died Jan. 13, 1972.

JOHN KENT

DAVIDSON, WILLIAM THEOPHILUS (1846-1935), British Methodist, was born at Bath in 1846, the son of a Wesleyan Methodist minister. He was educated at KINGSWOOD SCHOOL and won an open scholarship to Exeter College, Oxford, which family circumstances prevented his taking up. After teaching, he entered the Wesleyan ministry in 1868, and in 1881 he was appointed classical tutor at Richmond Theological College. For three years during this period he was editor of the Wesleyan newspaper, the Methodist Recorder. In 1891 he became theological tutor at Handsworth Theological College, Birmingham. In 1901 he was elected PRESIDENT of the Wesleyan Methodist Conference. After a year as CONNEXIONAL EDITOR in 1904, he returned as theological tutor to Richmond College, and was principal of the college from 1909 until his retirement in 1920. He was an outstanding preacher and influential teacher, but reluctant to commit himself in controversial theological questions. His career is of great importance for anyone anxious to understand the history of Methodism in the opening years of the twentieth century.

JOHN NEWTON

DAWS, CHARLES KINGSTON (1903-), Australian minister, chaplain-general, and conference president, entered the ministry in 1928, in the VICTORIA AND TASMANIA CONFERENCE. His circuits included the North Melbourne Mission, 1945-51. He served for five years as a chaplain in World War II and became Chaplain-General to the Australian Military Forces (1946-62). In 1966 the C.B.E. (Commander of the Order of the British Empire) was conferred upon him.

Since 1955 he has been Managing Secretary of the Methodist Church in Victoria. He was President of the Victoria and Tasmania Conference in 1957 and Secretary-General, 1966-69. He became President-General in 1969 (for the term 1969-72).

A. HAROLD WOOD

DAWSEY, CYRUS BASSETT (1886-), American preacher and missionary to Brazil, and elected bishop of the Methodist Church in that country, was born in Aynor, Horry Co., S. C., on Sept. 4, 1886. His father was English and his mother of French origin. In 1902, he was converted and joined the Rehoboth Methodist Church. He received a B.A. degree from WOFFORD COLLEGE in 1910. In 1946, he received an honorary degree from the same institution. In 1912, he married Ethel Sanders, of Spartanburg, S.C.

Always eager to be a missionary, Cyrus had volunteered for JAPAN. At a 1913 District Conference in Spartanburg, however, he heard J. L. KENNEDY present BRAZIL'S needs so strongly that he answered the call; and with his wife and one child, sailed for Brazil in 1914. He was sent first to PIRACICABA, where he spent a year studying the language; was ordained elder in 1915 and appointed to the vast Western frontier of the State of São Paulo, which had just been penetrated for the first time by a railroad. Here, in a region still inhabited by Indians, he pioneered in the establishment of Methodist work. In Birigui, where they lived fourteen years, their first home was a mud house with beaten clay floors.

Cyrus, traveling a circuit some 350 miles in extent, on mule or horseback, sometimes on foot, was often away a month at a time, with no means of communication with his family. Heavy responsibilities fell on Ethel's shoulders—holding services, tending the sick, the tuberculous and leprous who came to their door, preparing the dead for burial, serving as midwife, even setting broken limbs as best she could.

In Birigui, they started a school, the Colégio Noroeste which to this day continues as one of the strongest evangelical influences in that part of the country. After fourteen years in Birigui, they were appointed to Marilia, and next to São Carlos. In 1946 he was elected as bishop. He later received $10,000 from the SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE, and with this he bought in 1954 a farm of sixty acres in the State of Paraná. There he established a Rural Institute—the first and only one of its kind in all that area. It was named the Centro Rural Dawsey in his honor (see INSTITUTO RURAL DAWSEY), and it is a monument to the dedication, energy, and imagination of the bishop.

Taller than the average Brazilian, and with a great shock of hair, Bishop Dawsey became well-known throughout the country. He was primarily and always a pastor and his unflinching courtesy, gentle ways and complete dedication to the Master, plus a great simplicity yet directness in preaching, endeared him to all.

The Dawseys had five children—Ethel, Sarah, Cyrus, Jr., Agnes, and Mary Ellyn. Four of these have served on the mission field, and altogether the family has given about 175 years of missionary service to the Church.

Ethel Dawsey died in Piracicaba (São Paulo) in 1948 and was laid to rest in this land she loved and to which she had given herself unstintingly. In 1951, Bishop Dawsey married Louie Lillian Knobles, of MISSISSIPPI, who had come to Brazil from CHINA, where she had served for twenty years as a missionary. Her spirit of dedication made her also a blessing to Brazil.

Bishop Dawsey now lives in Columbia, S. C.

DAWSEY, SARAH MARGARET (1915-), American teacher and missionary in BRAZIL, was born in PIRACICABA, state of São Paulo, Brazil, on Oct. 9, 1915. She was the daughter of CYRUS B. DAWSEY, missionary and later bishop of the church in Brazil. Her primary education was in the Methodist church schools of Brazil, high school in SOUTH CAROLINA, and she earned a B.S. from Peabody College, Nashville. Later, she took courses at SCARRITT COLLEGE and Teachers' College, Columbia University, from which she received her M.A. degree.

Miss Dawsey returned to Brazil in 1940, under the auspices of the WOMAN'S DIVISION OF CHRISTIAN SERVICE. From 1942 she was at Bennett College (Colegio Bennett), RIO DE JANEIRO, nationally known educational institution, where she pioneered in nursery and kindergarten work. In 1955 she was named Reitora (principal) of the school. She served until 1966, when she returned to the United States and was succeeded by a Brazilian, Dona Persides Leal Vianna.

His appointments were McCloud, 1911; Weleetka, 1912-13; Okemah, 1914-17; Miami, 1918-21; Grace Church, Oklahoma City, 1922-26; First Church, FORT SMITH, Ark., 1927-33; and First Church, SHREVEPORT, La., 1934-47. He was elected bishop in 1948 and served the Kansas-Nebbraska Area for four years and the Kansas Area eight years. He was delegate to the 1934 and 1948 GENERAL CONFERENCES and to the Uniting Conference in 1939. He served on the Boards of Missions, Lay Activities, and Temperance. He was a trustee of SOUTHERN METHODIST UNIVERSITY, ST. PAUL SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY METHODIST, and of the three Methodist colleges in KANSAS. He was influential in the establishment of the theological school in Kansas City. Dawson traveled widely both before and after his elevation to the episcopacy. He served as exchange preacher at the American Church in Paris and at the Hoyleke Presbyterian Church, Liverpool. He visited the Methodist missions in the Orient, Africa, and South America. Because of declining health, Bishop Dawson retired in 1960 and moved to Shreveport. He died there, May 2, 1964.

DAWSON, WILLIAM (1773-1841), British "traveling local preacher," was born of humble parents in Garforth, Yorkshire, and was of Anglican background but attended Methodist prayer meetings. He led both the curate's class and the Methodist class also. He also supplied for LOCAL PREACHERS. He became a member of the society in 1800, a local preacher in 1801, and was proposed and accepted for the itinerant ministry in 1802, but declined because arrangements for his dependents did not materialize.

Dawson was a popular preacher, and was invited to NEWCASTLE, BRISTOL, LIVERPOOL, HULL, BIRMINGHAM, etc. He took part in the first missionary meetings in LEEDS in 1813, and then in Wakefield, Selby, and York in 1814. He supported the Conference in the Leeds Organ Case (see PROTESTANT METHODISTS), and in the dispute over the theological institution (see SAMUEL WARREN); he always argued strongly against total abstinence. In 1836 an attempt was made to raise a fund of 4,000 guineas to enable him to leave his farm and travel, preaching principally for overseas missions. Eventually £3,000 was raised, giving him £150 per year. He served in this way for less than two years, when he died on July 4, 1841.

DAY, ALBERT EDWARD (1884-), American pastor and preacher, was born on Nov. 18, 1884, at Euphemia, Ohio, the son of Elam Mansfield and Mary Ellen (Bright) Day. He was educated at Taylor University (A.B., 1904; D.D., 1918); the University of Cincinnati (M.A., 1916); OHIO WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY (D.D., 1926); ALLEGHENY COLLEGE (D.D., 1936). The University of Southern California awarded him the Litt.D. degree in 1939, and he enjoyed other honorary degrees. He served for a time in OHIO at CINCINNATI, and then at Delaware, the seat of Ohio Wesleyan University, 1916-19; he was at Canton, 1919-25; Christ Church, PITTSBURGH, Pa., 1925-32; Mount Vernon Place, BALTIMORE, Md., 1932-37; First Church, PASADENA, Calif., 1937-45; Mt. Vernon Place, Baltimore, 1947-57; Chaplain, WESLEY SEMINARY (Washington), 1957-59. He was chosen one of the six leading preachers of America by the Christian Century magazine in a poll conducted by that journal, and was considered one of the ten most influential living Methodists by the Christian Advocate poll taken about the same time. He became director of the New Life Movement of the Methodist Church in America, 1945, and was the founder of the Disciplined Order of Christ, 1945.

Dr. Day was chaplain of the 117th Field Signal Battalion of the 42nd Division in the American Expeditionary Forces, 1918-19. He has been a special mediator of the National War Labor Board, 1942-43, has served as a member of the Board of Foreign Missions, 1924-36 (ME), and been a vice-president of the FEDERAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES in Christ, 1942-44.

He delivered the Lyman Beecher lectures on Preaching at Yale, 1934; the Earl lectures at the Pacific School of Religion in 1937, and also in 1958; and the Sam Jones lectures at EMORY UNIVERSITY, 1939. Among his books were Jesus and Human Personality, 1934; The Evangel of a New World, 1939; An Autobiography of Prayer, 1952; and Letters on the Healing Ministry, 1964. Since his retirement, Dr. Day lives on the Gently Retreat Farm near Front Royal, Va.

DAY, JAMES ROSCOE (1845-1923), noted clergyman and educator, was born in Whitneyville, Me., on Oct. 17, 1845, the son of Thomas and Mary Plummer (Hillman) Day. His maternal grandfather, Samuel Hillman, was a Methodist minister who was not above mixing politics with religion. This trait was later to be seen in his grandson and was to involve him in considerable controversy.

In 1860 Day went to the Pacific Northwest with his father, who was a lumberman. There he worked as a steambot roustabout, stage-driver, and cattle herder. In later years these experiences as a laboring man gave him the right, he felt, to speak with some authority on matters of labor relations.

Returning to MAINE, James Day was converted and decided to become a minister. He studied at Kent's Hill Seminary and at Bowdoin College, but did not complete his college course. In 1872, he was ordained. On July 14, 1873, he married Anna E. Richards, of Auburn, Me. He served pastorates in Maine and First Church, BOSTON, 1881-82; St. Paul's, NEW YORK CITY, 1883-85; Trinity, Newburgh, N. Y., 1885-89; and Calvary, New York City, 1889-94.

One of his parishioners at Calvary Church was John D. Archbold who was chairman of the Board of Trustees of SYRACUSE UNIVERSITY. When Syracuse needed a new Chancellor in 1893, Archbold was able to secure Day's election to the office. At that time Syracuse had but three departments, with 750 students, and property valued at $1,780,000. Day had great dreams for Syracuse which he outlined in a chapel talk soon after becoming Chancellor. "I see in my mind's eye," he said, "a great University on the Hill. Instead of three colleges, I see a dozen colleges. Instead of several buildings, I see a score of buildings. Instead of a student body of 800, I see a student body of 8,000 and the University as the center of the educational system of the State of New York." (W. F. Galpin, Syracuse University, 1952). It should be noted that when Day retired in 1921 the University had grown to include eight colleges, eight schools, and had an enrollment of over 5,000. With the aid of his wealthy friends, Day had raised over $10,000,000 to carry on the expansion program.

Being Chancellor at Syracuse in no way diminished Day's position and influence in the church. In 1900 he received 199 votes for bishop at the GENERAL CONFERENCE held that year. As the General Conference of 1904 approached his name was mentioned as one who was likely to be elected a bishop. When Day's election did not come after several ballots, Day decided to withdraw from the race and drew up a withdrawal statement. However, before going to the General Conference session that day, Day chanced to pick up the Los Angeles Examiner and read in the newspaper a malicious attack upon his character. Day went to the General Conference, and secured the floor to defend himself and to deny the Examiner's charges.

On the fourteenth ballot he was elected bishop. The Conference adjourned over Sunday. On Monday morning, Day arose to resign his office. Whether he did so because he felt his election was secured by the sympathy of the Conference, or because he still felt his real call was to the ministry of education is not clear. The fact remains he resigned, and he never seems to have regretted his action.

The Chancellor was a man of definite opinions and strong will. These brought him into conflict with many at the University, and in 1907 with President Theodore Roosevelt when Day published a book entitled Raid on Prosperity. The book was a defense of large corporations and of the Standard Oil Company in particular. His views were both vigorously opposed and supported in and out of the pulpit. In 1920, Day published another book, My Neighbor the Workingman, in which he sought to expose the dangers of the radical labor movement, inflation, profiteering in business, and the breakdown of traditional patriotism. This book, as the former one, drew both praise and censure in the secular and religious press.

In 1919 he offered to resign from his post as Chancellor, but the Board of Trustees did not act on his resignation. In 1921, possibly at the urging of one of the Trustees, he submitted his resignation again. This time it was accepted and he was elected Chancellor Emeritus.

After his retirement, the Days continued to live in Syracuse. He died on March 13, 1923.

The historian of Syracuse University, W. F. Galpin, has written of him: "For twenty-eight years he had presided over the destinies of the University, and it was his mind and hand that had fashioned a small institution into one of the nation's outstanding universities. His limitations were self-evident, but such may be said of every man. And those who review his chancellorship with discrimination hail him as the great chancellor he was . . ."

DAY, WILLIAM HOWARD (1825-1900), a prominent Negro citizen of PENNSYLVANIA and one of the most prominent men of his race in the United States, was born Oct. 15, 1825 in NEW YORK CITY and was baptized by Superintendent JAMES VARICK, the first superintendent of the A.M.E. ZION CHURCH. He was the son of John Day (1783-1828) and Eliza Dixon (1793-1869). He was educated in the public schools of his native city and in the private school of Rev. Frederick Jones, and prepared for college in the high school of Northampton, Mass.

In 1843 he entered Oberlin College, graduating in 1847. He learned the art of printing in the Hampshire Gazette office at Northampton and afterwards turned his attention to teaching and lecturing. In 1850 he was elected by the colored citizens of OHIO at a state conference, to plead their cause before the Ohio constitutional convention. He received the degree of A.M. from Oberlin College in 1859, and later the degree of D.D. was conferred upon him by LIVINGSTONE COLLEGE. He was elected professor of language by two colleges in 1857, and was offered the Latin tutorship at Lincoln, England in 1862.

From 1852 to 1855 he edited a special publication in Cleveland, having previously been local editor of the Cleveland True Democrat, now The Leader. In 1866 he was invited to take the lecture platform in Great Britain, and remained there at the request of the American residents from the north to explain to the people of England the issues at stake in the great civil conflict then at its height in this country. He was received by the Earl of Spencer at Spencer House, by the Lord Provost of Edinburgh, Scotland; and was the principal speaker at a meeting of 3,000 persons in Music Hall, Dublin, presided over by the Lord Mayor.

In 1866 he was ordained DEACON and ELDER at Petersburg, Va., by Bishop J. J. CLINTON, and was elected general secretary of the General Conference in 1876, 1888, 1892, 1896, and 1900. In 1867 and 1868 he was superintendent of schools in the district of Maryland and Delaware under the United States government.

He was elected to the school board of Harrisburg, Pa., in 1878 from the eighth ward and served until ill health compelled him to relinquish his seat in 1898. He was also elected president of the Dauphin County Directors' Association for five successive years, from 1891-1896, he being the only colored member of the body.

William Howard Day died Dec. 3, 1900. It was said by a Harrisburg newspaper at the time of his death that he devoted his life and the best energies of a trained and astute mind to the uplifting of his race and he was very generally respected by both races. He was a friend of Booker T. Washington, President of Tuskegee Industrial College.

DAYAL, MUNSHI ISHWAR (1871-1964), was born in an upper-middle-class (Kayastha) Hindu home in Bihar, INDIA. Deeply religious by nature, he yearned for and sought an experience of God. He was repeatedly disappointed in following advice given him by priests and others. At length he joined a wandering sadhu (Hindu holy man), who claimed to enjoy frequent experiences of God. He was shocked to discover that the sadhu and his other chelas (disciples) used charas and ganji (hemp drug derivatives) and interpreted the exhilaration of intoxication as the soul's communion with God. Disillusioned, he denounced the sadhu and in despair started home.

While his train stood at a railway station, Dayal was given by an English woman a tract about Jesus Christ. After the train started, he began to read and was so moved that he got off at the next station and went back to find the woman. When he discovered her two weeks later, her testimony awoke new hope, and she and a German missionary led him to the Savior.

A few years later, Dayal joined a Methodist missionary at Arrah Bihar, and became an extraordinarily effective village preacher. In one year, 760 persons whom he had influenced were baptized on confession of faith. He convinced thousands of village Hindus that the prevailing Hindu teaching about caste was false and damaging to society, and he inspired many thousands to believe that men, not God, are responsible for the iniquities of the caste system.

He encountered oppressed people who were so filled with resentment that others had been unable to help them. But his concern for them was so strong and persistent that they responded gratefully. He brought them to Christ who replaced their sense of grievance with a sense of mission. He put new converts to work as evangelists and was to an outstanding extent a maker of men.

With very little formal education he fired his children with zeal so that his daughters graduated from college and his son joined the Annual Conference and became a district superintendent. A grandson was a prominent physician, and a granddaughter married an American missionary and is now serving with him in India.

DAYTON, OHIO, U.S.A. Methodism was brought to Dayton by pioneers on the Miami and Mad River Circuits. The first Methodist class was organized by JOHN KOBLER in 1798, and a meetinghouse was erected in 1814. By 1832 the Dayton church had 246 members. First known as Wesley Chapel, it became Grace Church which now has more than 4,000 members.

An A.M.E. congregation was organized in Dayton about 1837, and a frame church was erected in 1840. After a few years the congregation dissolved, but it was reorganized in 1867. In 1966 the denomination reported five congregations in the city with 1,881 members and property valued at $515,000.

Dayton was the headquarters of the former E. U. B. Church. The first U. B. preacher came to Dayton in 1810, but the denomination had little strength there until 1853 when its publishing house and general church offices were brought from Circleville, Ohio to Dayton. Bonebrake Theological Seminary (UNITED THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY after 1954) was established at Dayton in 1871.

The U. B. Church erected a fourteen-story office building in Dayton in 1905, moved its printing plant into the edifice in 1915, and enlarged the building to twenty-one stories in 1924. But, finding the building a poor investment, they sold it in 1952, and then rented office space in it. In 1960 the church erected a modest-sized modern administrative building for its headquarters.

When the E. U. B. Church was formed in 1946, the staff of the former Evangelical Church was moved from Harrisburg, Pa., to Dayton at once, while its printing plant and some editorial staff members continued at Harrisburg.

In 1966 there were twenty-eight E. U. B. churches in Greater Dayton with 15,714 members and property valued at $9,133,229. In the same year The Methodist Church listed twenty congregations in Dayton with 18,805 members and property worth $7,727,056.

When The United Methodist Church was formed in 1968, Dayton, with its church office building, publishing plant, theological seminary, and central geographical location, immediately became one of the headquarters cities of the enlarged denomination.

First Church was often referred to as the "Cathedral Church" of the former E. U. B. denomination. Founded in 1848 in the city which became headquarters for that communion, as well as the location of the United Theological Seminary and the publishing house (OTTERBEIN PRESS), it has always had in its membership many seminary professors and general church officers.

As the mother church in Dayton, the congregation through the years sponsored several mission churches. Two of these, Cowden and Euclid Avenue Churches, were later merged with First Church, the one in 1930 and the other in 1962.

The Women's Missionary Association of the denomination was organized in 1872 in the Summit Street Church (later Euclid Avenue Church). In 1890 the Young People's Christian Union of the denomination was organized at a convention in First Church. Nine men who served as pastors of First Church were elected bishops: HENRY KUMLER, JR. (1841), DANIEL K. FLICKINGER (1885), GEORGE M. MATHEWS (1902), CYRUS J. KEPHART (1913), ARTHUR R. CLIPPINGER (1921), GRANT D. BATDORF (1929), FRED L. DENNIS (1941), DAVID T. GREGORY (1950), and PAUL M. HERRICK (1958). A number of other men who became bishops were associated with the congregation of First Church while serving in the boards and agencies of the denomination in Dayton.

First Church's beautiful Georgian colonial edifice at 1516 Salem Avenue, Dayton, consists of three units built in 1952, 1957 and 1964 at a cost of over $1,000,000, and it became debt free in 1968. In that year the church had about 1,500 members and a budget of some $110,000.

C. WILLARD FETTER

Grace Church is the mother church of Methodism in the area. Among the thirty-six persons who came from Cincinnati in 1796 to settle Dayton was William Hamer, a local Methodist preacher who served as the first class leader when a Methodist society was organized. Shortly after the village was settled, Bishop ASBURY sent JOHN KOBLER to organize the Miami Circuit. Later (Sept. 22, 1811), Asbury himself preached from the steps of the courthouse in Dayton at which time the Methodist society was organized with twenty-four members. By the end of that year the Methodist church was organized and the membership had increased to seventy-five.

Known first as Wesley Chapel, the church was located at Main and Third Streets, and as time passed the congregation erected three buildings on that site. In 1866 the congregation moved to another downtown location where it built a twin-spired Gothic church. Then in 1917 that site was sold and the church moved to its present location about a mile and a half from downtown Dayton where it erected an impressive building of Flemish Gothic architecture.

Grace Church has ever been missionary minded. Three couples on the mission fields of MEXICO, LIBERIA, and JAPAN are presently supported by the church. The congregation has assisted in establishing other churches in the area. St. Paul's Church was built on land given by Grace Church. The Grace congregation gave both members and funds to establish Christ Church in the southern part of Dayton. For some years Grace Church has provided $11,500 annually for church extension in the district, and it has voluntarily added $5,000 each year to its apportionment for world service. The church has established the Grace Community Center to serve the people in an underprivileged area nearby.

Two pastors of Grace Church have been elected to the episcopacy: CHARLES W. BRASHARES (1922-34), and HAZEN G. WERNER (1934-45).

In 1970 Grace Church reported 3,914 members, property valued at $2,408,177, and $254,544 raised for all purposes.

McKinley Church. The beginnings of this church date from 1860 when a group of Negroes began worshipping in a United Brethren Church on Court Street in Dayton. At the time the pastor and all class leaders were white. In 1873, John Downs, a preacher in the LEXINGTON CONFERENCE, was appointed to Dayton and Xenia. He tried unsuccessfully to organize a Negro Methodist church in Dayton. In 1880 the Negroes became a part of the Little Jim Baptist Mission in Dayton. In 1888 the Lexington Conference appointed J. H. Payne to Dayton, and he succeeded in organizing a church with sixty-five members. Called Hawthorne Street M. E. Church, the name was later changed to McKinley because President William McKinley made a donation to the congregation.

MCKINLEY CHURCH, DAYTON, OHIO

J. E. Burton who grew up in the church, later served it as pastor twice, 1914-19 and 1924-29.

The church building was destroyed by fire in 1921 and was rebuilt in 1923. Later an education building was added. In 1968 the plant was valued at $322,000.

The membership of McKinley Church grew to 110 by 1900, to 421 by 1940, and 624 by 1970. In the latter year the church raised about $50,000 for all purposes.

FRANK R. ARNOLD

DEACON. In the Methodist Episcopal Churches, the deacon belongs to the lower order of ministers, in contradistinction to that of ELDER, or the higher order. The origin of the diaconate (deacons) is related in Acts 6:17. The account there tells how certain men were selected to "serve tables" and to minister unto the poor, so that the apostles, who formerly had felt compelled to undertake all manner of work, might be free to follow their spiritual empowerment and give themselves to the "ministry of the word."

The word diakonas "originally signified a runner, messenger, or server." But perhaps the word "minister," referring to one who ministers, is the best translation here, and is the one dearest to the church. In the development of the diaconate in the Christian Church, there can be seen—and today is heavily emphasized among many Christian bodies—the lay functions of the deacon, rather than the clerical. In the early Christian Church, the special office of the deacon was to care for the poor and needy and to attend to the temporal interests of the church; but in piety and Christian deportment the qualifications for the diaconate as enumerated by the apostles ("of honest report, full of the Holy Ghost and wisdom"—Acts 6:3) are almost those for the ministry. Certainly Philip, who was one of the original deacons (Acts 6:5), went about preaching and baptizing at a great rate just as any minister. However, it is admitted that in those early years the deacon was the almoner of the congregation. Gradually however, as the priesthood and episcopate grew, so also did diaconate increase in ecclesiastical functioning. The sick and poor were gathered into hospitals, or looked after by the novitiates and other pious workers, and the deacon eventually became a "minister" in the ecclesiastical sense. He arranged the altar, presented the offerings of the people, read the gospel, gave the signal for the departure of the catechumens and unbelievers when the Mass was celebrated, and distributed the consecrated cup. In some cases he was authorized to preach—in some forbidden. The Pontificale Romanum states: Diaconum oportet ministrare ad altare, baptizare et praedicare (per Schaff-Herzog Encyclopedia). This was the deacon as he became in the later Church, and as his office went over into the English establishment and so into Episcopal Methodism. Practically, however, the diaconate has always remained as a stepping-stone to the priesthood or eldership, the higher order.

In the Church of England, and also in the Protestant Episcopal Church, U.S.A., and in the Methodist Episcopal Churches, U.S.A., it is provided that a deacon ordained and in regular standing shall be authorized to administer baptism, to marry, to bury the dead, and to assist the elder in the administration of the Lord's Supper. He could not however, and to this day he has not been authorized to consecrate the elements nor administer the Sacrament of Holy Communion by himself.

It is noteworthy that when JOHN WESLEY decided to ordain certain persons for America, and actually took this momentous step in September, 1784, he first ordained RICHARD WHATCOAT and THOMAS VASEY, deacons. That he ordained them by the Rite of Ordination of the English Prayer Book is perfectly evident, and on that particular day the ordained men and the participating elders (priests) evidently took Communion as part of the Ordination service. (The Communion was part of this Rite of Ordination in American Methodism until 1858, M. E. Church, South, and 1864, M. E. Church.) The Prayer Book which Wesley sent to America provided for an Order of Deacons, as well as of Elders and Superintendents, and at the CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE of 1784 it was decided that this office of deacon should be a part of the ministry of the newly organized church.

The Order of Deacons, however, as well as the Order of Elders, is one which is not at the disposal of a Methodist bishop nor may he ordain without authorization. Ordination must be voted by an empowering annual conference. Regulations in the Discipline changing somewhat as the years have passed, have clearly outlined and specified how and when a man may be ordained deacon and become eligible for such an order. Within recent years the term of service which a deacon is expected to serve before he is eligible for ordination as an elder has been somewhat shortened. The office in Episcopal Methodism, however, remains where it has been since the Christmas Conference.

At the organization of the M. P. CHURCH in 1828-30, the order of deacon was done away, that church having only one order, that of elders—and of course no bishops. In the GERMANY CENTRAL CONFERENCE only one order (elders) is known. A strong move has been in effect in The United Methodist Church during recent years to make the diaconate an office, rather than an order, as was done by the Methodist Protestant Church, and by non-Episcopal Methodist bodies. Among the English Wesleyan Methodists, and in all of its affiliated branches in Ireland, Canada, and Australia, and in the organizations which have seceded from the Wesleyan body, there is but one form of ordination which is that of elders. The great tide toward ecumenical conformity today, felt in all Methodism, is having great influence toward doing away with the diaconate as an order.

The duties of the deacon as specified in the time honored ordination Rite are stated: "It appertaineth to the office of the Deacon to conduct divine worship and to assist the elder in the administration of the Holy Communion, to help him in the distribution thereof, and to read and expound the Holy Scriptures; to instruct the Youth, and to Baptize. And furthermore it is his office to search for the sick, poor, (and impotent) and the needy in order that they may be visited and relieved." The service of ordination for a deacon concludes with a prayer by the Bishop that the newly ordained deacon "so well may behave himself in this office, that he may be found worthy to be called into the higher ministry in the Church." This prayer is saying in effect what has practically always been the attitude of the Church and of the ordained deacon himself toward his order and office—it is a stepping-stone to the higher order, that of elder.

General Conferences within recent years have created certain committees to study the ministry in its various aspects. The report of a committee of this nature to the General Conference of 1964 (TMC) brought on considerable debate as there was a definite recommendation at that Conference to declare the diaconate an office, not an order. No conclusive action was taken but the committee reporting—or a continuation of it—was continued and directed to report at a subsequent session. The diaconate and its status in Methodist polity will therefore continue to be studied and debated and more definite pronouncements and possibly actions regarding the status of the deacon in Methodism may be expected in years to come.

The Methodists of the Germany Central Conference, as has been said, ordain to only one order, that of elder, and the JUDICIAL COUNCIL of The Methodist Church agreed that this, which came by an empowerment of the General Conference, was a Constitutional privilege not contravening a Restrictive Rule and one which the Germany Central Conference might utilize. The Judicial Council ruled July 3, 1955, that "since the Philippines Central Conference has failed to take action regarding the ordination of women, Northwest Philippines Annual Conference has a right to ordain a woman as local deacon."

DEACONESS, BRITISH. (See WESLEY DEACONESS ORDER.)

DEACONESS MOVEMENT, U.S.A. German Methodism gave the inspiration for the deaconess movement to Methodism in the United States. Bishop MATTHEW SIMPSON, on a visit to GERMANY in the 1860's, studied their deaconess program and returned home advocating the founding of deaconess institutions after the German models. Soon thereafter, ANNA WITTENMEYER and Susan Fry travelled the country pleading for the expression of Christian benevolence in the founding of hospitals, orphanages, deaconess homes, homes for the aged and other institutions.

In 1872 Susan Fry, then the secretary of the Women's Foreign Missionary Society for ILLINOIS, wrote:

"When will the women of America awake to a sense of their responsibilities? And what great soul filled with love to God and man shall open the way and prepare the means whereby we may be enabled to compete successfully with our sisters of Rome, not only as general charity women but educators and succorers of the unfortunate. . . .

"Earnest thinkers upon the subject of 'woman's work in the church' are looking to the Quakers and Methodists to move forward in God's name . . . leading their daughters into the full responsibilities of an entirely devoted Christian womanhood."

Fourteen years later, Jane M. Bancroft (later secretary of the Deaconess Bureau of The Woman's Home Missionary Society in the M. E. Church) while studying in Zurich became interested in the deaconesses and thought of promoting such a program upon her return home. She did not know that in her absence such work had already begun. For it is to Mrs. LUCY RIDER MEYER, of CHICAGO, diminutive in size but exceedingly dynamic in spiritual power and vision, that credit must be given as the founder of the first deaconess training program of Methodism in the United States. Her own distress over the needs of those she saw about her in the great city of Chicago and her conviction that something must be done for them, and that it must be done not only with good intention but also with skill and Christian training, was the foundation of the movement. With a forceful pen and the magnetism of her own personality, she gained support, ultimately winning approval for the founding of the Chicago Training School by her offer to give her own services as director for one year—a service she continued to give for many of the continuing years.

Begun in 1885, the Training School for City and Home Missions (later the Chicago Training School) preceded by three years the approval for the establishing of the office of deaconess in the M. E. Church. Even before this approval was given, some of the graduates of the school had assumed the title of "deaconess"; and a "deaconess home," under the direction of ISABELLA THOBURN, had been operating in Chicago for one year where "eight earnest Christian women worked among the poor, the sick and the needy of that great city without any reward of man's giving." Chicago Training School not only furnished trained women to become the first deaconesses, but it set the pattern for other schools later set up across the country.

Miss Thoburn, who served as the first superintendent of the Deaconess Home in Chicago, was herself a source of great support and inspiration to Mrs. Meyer. Miss Thoburn's testimony to the great value of such training as that offered by Chicago Training School and JAMES M. THOBURN'S willingness to present to the GENERAL CONFERENCE a memorial for the establishment of the deaconess relationship helped gain approval for the establishment of the office in 1888. Ill health had before this forced Miss Thoburn's return from INDIA, but, while regaining her strength, she not only directed the program in Chicago, but, at the request of a group of dedicated lay people, moved to CINCINNATI to become the head deaconess at the newly organized Elizabeth Gamble Deaconess Association. Within eleven months after its dedication, on Dec. 23, 1888, this Deaconess Home had eleven women engaged in the movement.

The Christ Hospital in Cincinnati had its beginning when Miss Thoburn took home with her a woman she found ill in the streets; this woman could not be admitted to the city hospital because she was not a resident of the city. Her appointment as the first superintendent of The Christ Hospital was the beginning of a great advance. From the Elizabeth Gamble Deaconess Association grew not only the Deaconess Home, The Christ Hospital, a Nurses' Training School, a kindergarten, a Bible Training School, a Home for the Aged, and several missions, but also, in 1909, Cameron Church for the deaf, the first of its kind in America.

"Bethesda," the first German Methodist Deaconess Home in the United States, likewise found its home in Cincinnati. Louise Golder was the first superintendent when the home was founded on Feb. 29, 1896. Much of the credit for the opening of this phase of the work goes to Christian Golder, a brother of Louise, who for many years had been urging the German Conference to open such work.

Miss Golder was well prepared for her superintendency, having received her deaconess training at Elizabeth Gamble Deaconess Home and later additional training at Kaiserwerth in Germany. She returned to the Elizabeth Gamble Hospital as a co-worker with Miss Thoburn until called to Bethesda. "The Dorcas Institute," founded by the Bethesda Association as a training school for young women in 1910, was later merged with the Cincinnati Missionary Training School, founded by the Gamble Association, and took the name of "The Cincinnati Training School." Its graduates occupied prominent positions in many states and in many different countries. Its closing, in 1939, meant a real loss, especially to the Deaconess Hospital work.

In the M. E. Church, South, the beginning of the city mission movement under the Woman's Home Mission Society, demanded workers trained to fulfill its objectives. Workers for the foreign field had, since 1893, been trained at Scarritt Bible and Training School in Kansas City, Mo., but as yet no training was provided for workers in the home field. However, with the introduction of the deaconess movement in the sister church of the north, great encouragement was given to women of the southern church for a similar organization. A memorial for the recognition of the deaconess movement was thereupon sent to the General Conference of 1902. Despite two years of intensive preparation for such a move, led by BELLE HARRIS BENNETT, President of the Woman's Home Mission Society, the proposal met with long and bitter debate on the floor of the Conference. Some feared such an office would lead women to aspire to the ministry and even to the episcopacy. Others feared it was intended to displace ministers. One delegate declared such action could only be called heresy. However, the memorial passed with only thirty-seven dissenting votes.

With the approval for the work of deaconesses in the M. P. Church in 1908, these three branches of Methodism had thus duly recognized and made provision for trained women workers for carrying out the mission program at home as well as abroad. At Unification of these three branches of Methodism and the forming of The Methodist Church in 1939, all deaconess work was combined and placed within the framework of the Woman's Division of Christian Service of the Board of Missions for administration.

The story of the rise of the deaconess movement in Methodism in the U.S.A. would be incomplete without emphasizing the training programs of the Woman's Home Missionary Society at Lucy Webb Hayes Training School in Washington, D. C., and at the Kansas City Training School, later to become NATIONAL COLLEGE, in Kansas City, Mo. SCARRITT COLLEGE, in Nashville, Tenn. (formerly Kansas City Bible and Training School) continues to be the primary center for the training of deaconesses. National College at Kansas City was discontinued as such prior to United Methodist Church reorganization in 1968. Increasing numbers of deaconesses are, however, being trained in theological seminaries.

In The United Methodist Church: The Commission on Deaconess Work was continued in The United Methodist Church as the Committee on Deaconess Service within the National Division. It is presently composed of certain representatives from several boards and agencies of the Church, with one bishop upon it chosen by the Council of Bishops. The committee meets annually with its officers elected quadrennially. Its duties are to recommend new channels and fields of service for deaconesses; to study and recommend to the National Division of the Board of Missions policies and procedures, including standards, relative to the office of deaconess; and to initiate and recommend programs of continuing education for deaconesses. There are several other disciplinary regulations and observations made concerning this committee which is directed to have an executive committee and such other committees as it may need. (Paragraph 1324, Discipline, 1968 (UMC)).

The American Methodist deaconess today does not wear a garb or live within a community of deaconesses, for she recognizes that her witness must be as a member of the society in which she lives and among the people with whom she works. The feeling of individualism and personal independence also fosters within the deaconess the need to develop a sense of personal responsibility for herself, a characteristic of a maturing Christian and one that she finds easier to communicate to others if at the same time she is experiencing it herself.

The sense of independence, for many, is more readily made possible as a result of the decision of the Commission on Deaconess Work that the salary of the deaconess be determined and paid by the employing agency. In its early history the deaconesses of The Methodist Church and its predecessor organizations were paid a small monthly cash allowance plus room and board. In the minds of many this deprived the deaconess of her sense of individuality and personal dignity, thus placing her in a dependent role rather than one in which her own sense of personal worth and responsibility could be developed and enhanced.

Today the salary of the American Methodist deaconess is determined by the agency of the church which employs her. Although there is no maximum, the Committee on Deaconess Work has been recommending to an employing agency that in determining the salary of the deaconess consideration should be given to the academic training and years of experience, skill and competence, responsibility and complexity of work and the cost of living in the area.

"Today the scope of the ministry of the deaconess is as vast as the abilities she has to offer," says an executive of the National Division of the Board of Missions. "It is as broad as The United Methodist Church dares to involve itself on the frontiers of need in the lives of persons, and on the growing edges of opportunities which emerge from the problems created by the technological and space age in which the Church finds itself and which are affecting the spiritual and social development of people."

Through a period of more than eighty years, young women, who have been led by the Holy Spirit to devote themselves to Christlike service under Methodist direction, have offered themselves as deaconesses and have become a part of that endless line of faithful servants of Christ from the time of Phoebe 'til now!

DEADWOOD, SOUTH DAKOTA, U.S.A. The Deadwood Church not only is the oldest Methodist institution in the picturesque Black Hills of western SOUTH DAKOTA, but the most historic. It might claim a penumbral association with JEDEDIAH SMITH, stalwart Methodist layman, who led a party of trappers through the Southern Hills in 1823. Similarly it might note a tenuous tie with the leader of the first exploring expedition of 1874, General George Armstrong Custer who was named for his family's favorite Methodist preacher back in OHIO, and whose "last stand" in 1876 in adjacent MONTANA has a secure place in American lore. Of similar ilk was James Butler "Wild Bill" Hickok, celebrated western lawman, whose death in Deadwood Gulch from a stealthy gunshot came during the 1876 Gold Rush shortly after he and Agnes L. Thatcher had been married in Cheyenne, Wyo., by W. F. WARREN who signed the certificate, preserved in a Deadwood museum, as "Pastor M. E. Church." Lying in Mt. Moriah cemetery near Wild Bill are two others known to Deadwood Methodist history, "Preacher Smith" and "Calamity Jane."

HENRY WESTON SMITH, known as "Preacher Smith," also came in 1876 to exhort in the traditional Methodist manner, but was killed by skulking Sioux, Aug. 20, 1876, while on a preaching mission down the gulch to Crook City. Since 1914, Deadwood Methodists have led annual memorial services at a monument near the site on the Spearfish Highway.

Of entirely different stamp was the woman known in Western lore as Calamity Jane, who in 1903 returned weary and worn and poor to die. Old-timers, remembering how she had nursed miners in the 1878 smallpox epidemic, visited the Methodist parsonage to ask Charles Badger Clark "to say a few words" at the funeral planned for the city hall. "That's no place for a funeral even for a sinner like Calamity Jane," he said. "We'll give her a real funeral—at the church." It was done, and Deadwood never had a bigger one. Later poet Badger Clark ruefully wrote that although his father "won his share of honors in life, though he lived many years, made many friends and did many good deeds, he is now remembered for just one thing—he preached Calamity Jane's funeral sermon."

When the Black Hills Mission Conference was organized by Bishop HENRY W. WARREN at Deadwood in 1880, it was the smallest one in the world, with but Presiding Elder James Williams and two ministers present. One was the Deadwood pastor, Robert H. Dolliver. Deadwood's first Methodist church was a rented building which was destroyed by fire in 1879. A new sacrificially-built $6,700 structure was wrecked by flooded Whitewood Creek in 1883 but was promptly replaced the same year on a higher site by the present brick building. It is augmented by a former bank building adjacent to it, contributed by the late F. E. Howe, parishioner and mayor. Membership runs to almost 500, with more than 250 in the church school.

DEAL, EDSON HART (1903-1967), American layman and state official of the IDAHO CONFERENCE, was born in a Methodist parsonage at Weiser, Idaho, the son of Willard W. and Flora Hart Deal. He received his education at Nampa public schools and graduated from Gooding College (Methodist) of Gooding, Idaho. Edson Deal returned to Nampa in 1933 and joined his brother Homer in the insurance business in which he was actively associated for thirty-two years. He was the lay delegate from the Idaho Conference to the UNITING CONFERENCE of The Methodist Church in 1939, as well as to the 1940 GENERAL CONFERENCE session. He was Conference Lay Leader for eight years and consistently served on Conference Boards or Commissions for over thirty years. In addition to his church activities, he was state Senator from his county for five terms, followed by four years as Lt. Governor for the State of Idaho. At the time of his death he was serving as Secretary of State for Idaho, having been elected in 1966 for a four-year term. Edson Deal may well be said to be "one who served his fellow men sincerely."

DEAN, SIDNEY (1818-1901), pastor, congressman, and editor, was born at Glastonbury, Conn., Nov. 16, 1818. Educated at WILBRAHAM ACADEMY, he joined the PROVIDENCE CONFERENCE in 1843. He served eight years, took the supernumerary relationship for fourteen years because of poor health, accepted conference appointments again, including two years at the Mathewson Street Church, Providence, R. I., from 1860 to 1865, and then located and had success in business. He served in the state legislature, and was elected to congress in 1855 and 1857. He was an outspoken abolitionist, a member of the "Underground Railroad," and had a price set on his head in two Southern states. Also, he was an opponent of the liquor traffic and an upholder of public morals; he was prominent in the councils of the Prohibition party in Rhode Island, and at one time was its candidate for the U. S. Senate. From 1865 to 1880 he was editor and publishing manager of the Providence Evening Press, the Providence Morning Star, and a weekly, the Rhode Island Press. Retiring in 1880, he devoted himself to writing, and in 1884 published A History of Banking and Banks from the Bank of Venice to the Year 1883. A man of refined tastes, Dean had a valuable collection of books and art treasures. He was twice married: to Martha Hollister in 1839 (she died in 1841), and to Annie Eddy in 1865. He had a son and daughter by the first marriage and three sons by the second. Dean died in Brookline, Mass., Oct. 29, 1901.

DEARBORN, MICHIGAN, U.S.A. In 1809 WILLIAM CASE preached at DETROIT, the River Rouge, and Monroe, Mich. while serving a 240-mile circuit in CANADA. In 1810 a Methodist society with seven members was organized on the River Rouge six miles west of Detroit in what is presently East Dearborn. A log church was built there in 1818. Both First Church, Detroit and First Church, Dearborn sprang from this congregation. Dearbornville first appeared in the conference minutes as a separate appointment in 1840, and at the end of that year the circuit reported 331 members. Growth was slow. Dearborn station had eighty members and property valued at $700 in 1866. In 1900 there were 147 members and a building worth $11,000. In 1924 the Mount Olive Church, Dearborn, first appeared in the appointments, and in 1961 a third church, Warren Valley, was established. In 1969 the three churches reported a total of 3,797 members, property valued at $1,994,420, and $324,046 raised for all purposes. Stephens Church in Dearborn Heights appeared in 1967. It reported 436 members in 1969.

A FREE METHODIST CHURCH was organized in Dearborn in 1938. In 1950 the congregation erected a sanctuary at 21342 Outer Drive and added a unit for education in 1955. The church has over 200 members, and its property is valued at $150,000.

FREDERICK C. VOSBURG

First Church is descended from the society of seven members formed in 1810 under the preaching of William Case. One of these seven converts was Robert Abbott, auditor-treasurer of the Michigan Territorial Government. A year later the society had thirty members, and it was meeting in the homes of the people. In 1818 the group built a log church along the River Rouge, east of what is now the intersection of Greenfield and Butler Roads, Dearborn. In 1838 the log structure gave way to a frame church that would seat 200. After fifty-two years, a brick church was erected at Chicago Road, now Michigan Avenue. Since a gift from William Ten Eyck made the building possible, it was then called Ten Eyck Memorial Church. In time the lot on which the church stood became very valuable, and it was sold and in 1926 a new stone church costing $139,000 was built at Garrison and Mason Streets. At that time the church had 382 members. An education building was erected in 1948, and additional building was done in 1952 and 1963; in the latter year both the sanctuary and the dining room were enlarged.

First Church supports two agricultural teachers in INDIA, and partially supports a medical missionary in LIBERIA. The Women's Society assists with work among retarded children in Dearborn, and provides two scholarships annually for youths attending the United Nations' Washington Peace Seminar. Six members of the church are engaged in inner city missionary work in Detroit. In 1970 First Church was the fifth largest congregation of the denomination in MICHIGAN. It reported 2,783 members, property valued at $1,515,577, and $201,570 raised for all purposes.

DEARBORN COLLEGE (1836-1839), Lawrenceburg, Indiana, U.S.A., the first college to be established by the M. P. Church, was founded through the efforts of the Ohio Annual Conference of the Methodist Protestant Church with the concurrence of the Pittsburgh Conference. NICHOLAS SNETHEN and ANGEL H. BASSETT took prominent roles in the establishment of the college as well as John Clarke, Jr., who devoted three years to the project. A farm was purchased near the town of Lawrenceburg in view of using the manual labor principle of education which was popular in the first half of the nineteenth century. Snethen was elected first president of the "Manual Labor Ministerial College" and he was succeeded by Josiah Denham and David Crall. John Haughton of Cincinnati was a magnanimous contributor to the college and a principal loser when the school was destroyed by fire in February, 1839. Because of the lack of financial aid, Dearborn College was not rebuilt.

DEASE, STEPHEN S. (1852-1921), early M. E. medical and evangelistic missionary, was born in INDIA of British parentage. He was at seventeen years of age the first European convert in India under the ministry of WILLIAM TAYLOR. He went to the United States and graduated in medicine (M.D., 1875, Philadelphia Medical College) and in theology (B.D., 1880, DREW THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY). He cooperated with the pioneer woman missionary, CLARA SWAIN, and with JAMES L. HUMPHREY and T. S. JOHNSON in early efforts to establish medical education in India under Christian auspices. Dease was a man of many talents and concerns. He was a good preacher, a Bible student, an instructor in theology, an ornithologist, and an artist. His drawings of the birds of the Himalayas were praised for their beauty and accuracy. The first medical class which he and his associates taught at BAREILLY consisted of sixteen young women. After two years of instruction they were examined by two civil surgeons and T. S. Johnson. Thirteen passed the examination and were certified as competent to treat "all ordinary diseases."

His appointments included the superintendency of two districts, the pastorate of the English-language church in Naini Tal and a professorship and the vice-principalship of the Bareilly Theological Seminary.

He died in Naini Tal in 1921, in the parsonage adjoining the little chapel in which he was converted fifty years before.

DECATUR, ALABAMA, U.S.A., First Church. The first regular preaching by Methodist preachers in the town of Decatur was done by Alexander Sale and JOHN B. McFERRIN in the year 1827, and for years Decatur was an appointment in the Lawrence Circuit.

A church building was erected in 1832 by popular subscription, one Mr. Rutledge contributing a special sum on condition that the church should be so placed that the chancel should be over the grave of his young daughter. The building had the appearance of a two-story structure because of a commodious gallery which extended around the sides and front, intended for the accommodation of servants, who often attended the services with their white families. Later a wooden building was constructed on the rear of the lot on Lafayette Street for the use of the Negroes, and the pastor in charge conducted services for them in the afternoon, usually assisted by some local Negro preacher.

Decatur was first made a station in 1841, with Joshua Boucher as the preacher, and at the close of the first year there were sixty white members and seven colored members.

In the seating the inexorable law of the Quakers prevailed, the men on one side of the church and the women on the other.

During the Civil War the Confederate Army en route to Shiloh occupied the church building as a hospital for the sick and wounded of the Battle of Fort Donelson. The Federal Army following occupied it for camping purposes. After the close of the War, Decatur was again put on a circuit, for its homeless citizens could not support a preacher, and their church building had been destroyed. Services were conducted in a small log house fenced in by the Federal fortifications. In 1868 another church was built, on the lot where this one now stands. This was under the pastorate of John H. Nichols. This building was erected at a cost of $2,000, and within six weeks.

In 1878 yellow fever laid waste the town as it struck over the whole deep South. Many faithful members were victims. The Methodist preacher, Joel W. Whitten, refused to leave and died with the dread disease.

In 1887-88, during a period of financial prosperity in the town, the congregation grew to overflow the house and partook of the prosperity of the times. But the good fortune was short lived, for in the fall of 1888 yellow fever again struck, taking a mighty toll, and it was not until 1892 that any building was attempted.

In 1898, during the pastorate of J. B. Gregory, one of the most eloquent preachers of Southern Methodism, the construction of the present building was begun, and was completed at a cost of $2,000.

Fifty-seven ministers have served the church during the 111 years of its uninterrupted existence.

Other churches in the city are Austinville, Central, which is the largest church in the community, Chapel Hill, East End, Memorial Drive, Ninth Street, and Wesley Memorial. Certain of these have been sponsored and helped by First Church. Decatur is the headquarters of a district in the NORTH ALABAMA CONFERENCE.

DECATUR, GEORGIA, U.S.A. First Church is the third largest in North GEORGIA Methodism, now having 3,400 members; it is also the oldest Methodist church in Metropolitan ATLANTA, having been founded in 1826, three years after incorporation of the town of Decatur. The first sanctuary was built on the property located on Sycamore and Barry Streets. Two other sanctuaries were later built on this same property which was deeded to the Church by an Act of the Georgia Legislature in 1832. The present Chapel stands on this property.

The Church was incorporated by the Legislature in 1830 under the name of "Decatur Methodist Episcopal Church." In 1895 the name was changed to "Anderson Memorial M. E. Church" in the memory of a deceased presiding elder; in 1916 the name was again changed to "First Methodist Church of Decatur."

The first two buildings were wooden. In 1897, a granite sanctuary was built costing $6,650.00. Destroyed by fire in 1929, it was replaced, and the educational facilities on Sycamore Street were completed in 1949. The NORTH GEORGIA CONFERENCE met in this Church in 1910.

Many prominent pastors have served Decatur, First: ATTICUS C. HAYGOOD, Luke C. Johnson, A. W. Quillian, C. H. Branch, W. F. Glenn, G. W. DuVall, J. F. Bryan, Frank Quillian, G. M. Tumlin, G. M. Eakes, J. W. Quillian, Horace Smith, WALT HOLCOMB, J. W. O. McKibben, Harvey Holland, J. W. Veatch, Frank Crawley, Rembert Sisson, and Bevel Jones.

An expansion program was launched in 1957, resulting in the purchase of an entire city block. On this was erected an educational building and fellowship hall at a cost of $483,992 in 1958; a youth activities building was completed in 1965; and a large and imposing Georgian-style sanctuary seating 1,150 was completed in 1967.

Present properties are valued at $2,000,000.

DECATUR, ILLINOIS, U.S.A. First Church dates from 1829 when PETER CARTWRIGHT, while serving as presiding elder of the Sangamon District, organized a Methodist society there. The group met in the home of David Owen on the west side of Stevens Creek and for a time was called Stevens Settlement Society. It was attached to the Salt Creek Circuit which at the time was traveled by W. L. Deneen. In 1831 the society relocated in Decatur where it met in the homes of the members for a year before receiving permission to worship in the courthouse. In 1834 James Renshaw donated a lot on Church Street and a frame structure called First Church was built there. Decatur first appeared in the conference minutes in 1836; the circuit reported 200 members in 1839. In 1854 when First Church had only eighty-four members, a second sanctuary was erected. About that time both the town and the church began to grow. In 1858 the church had 247 members, and in 1867 the number had grown to 577. A third church edifice with a seating capacity of 1,000 was dedicated in 1872. In 1867 Stapp's Chapel (later called Grace Church) was formed in Decatur. The next year it reported 125 members and First Church 566. In 1877 there was a German language church with forty-five members. In 1906 First Church again rebuilt in downtown Decatur, and in 1956 an education wing was added. Following a Billy Sunday revival in 1908, the membership of First Church increased from 1,318 to 1,900 plus 150 probationers, and the Sunday school enrolment rose from 840 to 1,200. In 1969 First Church reported 3,074 members, property valued at $1,484,858, and $208,514 raised for all purposes. In that year there were ten United Methodist churches in Decatur with a total of 9,332 members.

Grace Church grew out of a revival in 1866. The conference appointed a pastor to Stapp's Chapel in 1867; in 1891 the name was changed to Grace Church. A brick church was completed and dedicated in 1869. It was replaced by a new building in 1905. The church was destroyed by fire in 1934 and rebuilt the next year. Another fire in 1942 did heavy damage and made necessary extensive repairs and refurbishing.

Grace Church maintains a trust fund which provides scholarships for ministerial students. For several years it has participated in the International Youth Exchange. The church had 125 members in 1868, 503 in 1900, 2,080 in 1939, and 2,378 in 1969. In the latter year its property was valued at $775,000, and it raised for all purposes $168,432.

DECCELL, JOHN LLOYD (1887-1946), American bishop, was born on Aug. 12, 1887, near Brookhaven, Miss., a son of William Ashley Decell and Martha Eloise Smith. After a few successful years in business, he answered the call to preach and was granted license in 1906. He attended UNION COLLEGE, Barbourville, Ky., and MILLSAPS COLLEGE, Jackson, Miss. The D.D. degree was conferred on him by Millsaps in 1929, and the LL.D. by both ATHENS COLLEGE and Union College in 1938. The MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE received him on trial in 1910, and that same year he was married to Bertha Whitley, of Missouri. They had two children.

He was ordained DEACON in 1912, ELDER in 1914. As a pastor he served several churches including Galloway Memorial, JACKSON, in the Mississippi Conference; and St. Paul's Church, Fresno, Calif. He also served as presiding elder of the Brookhaven and Jackson districts, Mississippi Conference. In 1931 he was made editor of The New Orleans Christian Advocate.

As a delegate to the M. E. Church, South GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1930, he was named secretary of the Interdenominational Relations Commission. In 1934, he was not only a delegate to the General Conference, but was pastor-host to the session, in Jackson, Miss. In that year he was made secretary of the General Conference Commission on Church Union, and was placed on the General Board of Christian Education. He was returned to the General Conference of 1938 as a delegate and was elected bishop. In the episcopacy he served the Birmingham Area 1938-44, and the Jackson Area 1944-46.

He was a trustee of the Mississippi Methodist Hospital, Seashore Methodist Assembly Grounds, and Millsaps College, giving statesmanlike service to those institutions and also to the cause of Methodist unification.

He died in Jackson, Miss., on Jan. 10, 1946, and was buried in Greenwood Cemetery.

Bishop Decell was generous, patient, sympathetic, and wise. As pastor and as bishop he never lost the simple friendly touch. As a peacemaker, his influence was like oil on troubled waters. He possessed gentleness, yet firmness, a sense of direction, and self-confidence. His judicial mind led him to study the Discipline constantly, and he was widely respected for his knowledge of it.

DECLARATIONS, CONFERENCE. (See SOCIAL CONCERNS, BRITISH.)

DECLARATORY DECISIONS. (See JUDICIAL COUNCIL; also, GENERAL CONFERENCE.)

DEDICATION, SERVICE OF. Dedication, from the Latin dedicatio, is the "act or rite of setting apart, or dedicating to a divine being, or to a sacred use." The formal dedication of Solomon's temple as narrated in the First Book of Kings, Chapter 8, has ever been held up before the church as the prototype of all such dedicatory services. It has long been understood that before a church building or parsonage can properly be dedicated to God, all financial obligations and claims of others must first be cleared away.

Prior to 1864 in the M. E. Church, and 1870 in the M. E. Church, South, there was no regular form provided for the service of dedication. This was left to the judgment of the officiating minister. At the dates mentioned in the above respective General Conferences, an Order of Dedication was provided which took its place in the Ritual of each Church. This formulary has been revised from time to time, but consists primarily of a preparatory address to the congregation, and of hymns and prayers suitable to the occasion, usually concluding with a formal prayer of dedication. A sermon or dedicatory address is always a feature of such occasions, provided for in the order of service.

Late revisions of this office in The United Methodist Church call for the presentation of the building by some representative of the local church such as a respected layman or laywoman, or perhaps the president of the administrative board. The officiating minister asks "By what name shall this church henceforth be known?" (p. 357, Book of Worship). The presenting person then gives the name of the church, and the officiating minister in a statement to the congregation accepts the building "to be known as the — United Methodist Church" and then proceeds to read a litany which has been prepared. This embodies responses by the people, and there are also certain prayers beseeching God's blessing on the preaching and worship to be held in that church, and other prayers having to do with various activities and interests which are to be carried on within the church building itself. The service is climaxed with the solemn prayer of dedication, which is designed to conclude the service, unless a hymn be desired afterwards.

The ceremony giving an official name to a church when it is dedicated was suggested by Bishop CLARE PURCELL a short while after the union of American Methodism in 1939. For details of the rite of dedication, see The Book of Worship. Rubrics in the office direct how it may be used for the dedication of a parsonage, or possibly for the dedication of a school, college or university building.

DEED OF DECLARATION. Acting under a deep sense of the need to give definition and permanence to the British Methodist Conference, and having secured expert legal advice, JOHN WESLEY prepared and subscribed a Declaration (commonly called a Poll Deed, as it was executed by one party and therefore polled, or cut with a straight edge) which was enrolled in Chancery under the date February 25, 1784. This Deed of Declaration not only defined the Conference for the purposes of the Trust Deeds but created the unity of the people called Methodists as a connection throughout the country. In addition to appointing a hundred of the preachers as the legal CONFERENCE, the Deed of Declaration, inter alia, provided for annual conferences, arranged for the election and defined the power of the PRESIDENT and secretary, provided for the reception of the preachers into FULL CONNEXION and on trial, limited appointments of preachers to three years, and named the written Journal signed by the president and secretary as the official record of the proceedings and decisions of the Conference.

DEEDS, TRUST (British). The properties of the Methodist Church in Great Britain, numbering approximately fourteen thousand (with the exception of a small number of scholastic and other special buildings), are legally settled upon bodies of local trustees who hold the several properties "for and on behalf of the Methodist Church" and are required by the Trust Deed to act in accordance with "the general rules, usage, and practice of the Methodist Church." The trusts of each local deed are declared by reference to "The Model Deed for The Methodist Church, 1932," which was adopted by the uniting Conference under the provisions of the Methodist Church Union Act in 1929. This system of Model Deed Trusts, through which the connective unity of the Methodist Church is maintained, legally arose under the guidance of John Wesley out of the experiences and controversy of the eighteenth century.

The first Methodist building, erected in the Horsefair, Bristol, in 1739, was vested in JOHN WESLEY himself for five years while he pondered over the problem. It was necessary to secure it so that the property be kept for Methodist use in perpetuity, that the preachers be properly appointed after Wesley's death, and that the purity of the doctrine preached from the pulpits should be maintained. Various forms and methods were tried in those early days, but after legal advice had been secured, a simple form of Model or Pattern Deed was adopted by the Conference of 1763 and inserted in the Minutes of the Conference. The right to appoint the preachers after the deaths of John and CHARLES WESLEY and WILLIAM GRIMSHAW was secured to the Conference, and the standard of doctrine was defined by reference to John Wesley's Explanatory Notes upon the New Testament and the four volumes of his Sermons. The point upon which rested the unity of Methodism was that ultimately the Conference, not the local trustees, should appoint the preachers. This Model Deed of 1763 was used for the earliest Methodist buildings in America.

Wesley was advised that the Model Deed would fail unless the Conference was defined. He pondered long over this, and in 1784 by a DEED OF DECLARATION (often called the Poll Deed) appointed the legal conference of one hundred of the preachers. For 150 years thereafter the LEGAL HUNDRED was the final authority, though the general Conference, later including laymen, actually transacted all the business.

The development of Methodism gradually required a more comprehensive Trust Deed, and in 1832 the Conference adopted a new Model Deed, preserving the essential principles of the 1763 deed, but to be used as a Reference Deed instead of a pattern. The local trust deeds would not need to reproduce this 1832 Model Deed, but to declare the form of the trust by reference to it. This stabilized the position in the Wesleyan Methodist Church for a hundred years until the Union in 1932.

The various divisions of Methodism which took place mainly in the first half of the nineteenth century finally followed the method of the Model or Reference Deed of 1832. The dates of the adoption of their model deeds are: METHODIST NEW CONNEXION, 1846; BIBLE CHRISTIANS, 1863; UNITED METHODIST FREE CHURCHES, 1842, 1865; PRIMITIVE METHODISTS, 1864. The Act of Parliament under which the united church was established in 1932 referred to "the essential similarity of the Trust Deeds," which simplified the union. Power was given to all local trusts to transfer from any of the previous model deeds or from any church deed (there being some awkward exceptions) to the new Model Deed by a declaration of the transfer, and ninety-five percent of all the trusts came under the one form of deed.

It is the character of the Trust Deeds, together with the fact that the Conference retained the overriding direction and appointment of ministers, which has preserved the identity and connective unity of the British Methodist Church. (See also Trustees.)

Deeds of Trust in American Methodism. Churches within the Methodist tradition in the United States of America commonly require that deeds of conveyance for local church property shall provide that the same shall be kept and maintained for the use of Methodist people under the authority of the denomination's General Conference. In particular the trust specifies that the property, whether church or parsonage, shall be subject to the law and Discipline of the Church, and that ministers duly appointed to the charge shall be entitled to the use thereof. The trust provision presently authorized and required in The United Methodist Church is: "In trust, that said premises shall be used, kept, and maintained as a place of divine worship of the Methodist ministry and members of The United Methodist Church; subject to the Discipline, usage, and ministerial appointments of said Church" etc. A similar provision is required in the case of property to be used as a parsonage. Other churches in the Methodist line and tradition follow the same general pattern.

Such provision, designed to protect the rights of the entire denomination, is not peculiar to Methodist polity. Except in the case of churches purely congregational in government, it is essential that some provision be made to secure the rights and privileges of the parent body or denominational structure. Accordingly, in the Roman Catholic Church the bishop and his successors in office hold title to all church property in the diocese. The Protestant Episcopalians recognize the authority of their bishops and their canon law in the use of parish properties. The Presbyterians take care to safeguard the rights vested in the presbytery of which the local church is a part. The methods for accomplishing this end vary among the respective denominations. The principle is, however, commonly recognized by all churches organized as a cohesive body.

Insistence upon a proper trust provision in titles to local church property has been characteristic of the Methodist movement from the beginning, and for evident reasons. Over the years of his administration of the societies in Britain and America, John Wesley was much concerned to devise a deed of conveyance for local church property that would reserve to him and his successors the right to appoint the ministers to their charges and to have oversight of the work. If a society should have exclusive control of the property, it could refuse the use of it to any appointee not approved by the congregation, and the appointive system would collapse. The question was resolved for British Methodism by the "Deed of Declaration," approved by the British Methodist Conference in 1784, seven years before Wesley's death.

When Methodist societies were organized in America under the authority of John Wesley, the necessity for a trust provision was apparent, and for the same reason as in Britain. The earliest deeds of record followed the form employed by Wesley in that period and contain the same legal defects. When the M. E. Church was organized in 1784 as an independent ecclesiastical body, the question of proper title to local church property was a major concern. Bishop THOMAS COKE, who was himself a lawyer, had been one of Wesley's trusted advisors in property matters, and he was no doubt influential in determining the form of title approved by American Methodists.

The General Conference of 1796 came to grips with the issue. It approved the "Deed of Settlement" and commended it to all Methodist churches in the connection. It provides that church property shall be conveyed to properly constituted local trustees and their successors, and at the heart of it is the following trust provision: "In future trust and confidence, that they shall at all times, for ever hereafter, permit such ministers and preachers . . . duly authorized by the General Conference . . . or by the yearly conferences (Annual Conferences) . . . and none other to preach and expound God's holy word therein" (Discipline, 1796, p. 64). This is the first trust clause approved by the General Conference of American Methodism. Though from time to time the phrasing has been somewhat altered, the trust and its intent and purpose remain as from the beginning. It makes possible our connectionalism and our system of ministerial appointments, and guarantees to every minister duly appointed to a charge the free and unhindered use of the church premises.

The General Conference of 1796, referring to the form of deed approved by it, further declared: "By which we manifest to the whole world that the property of the preaching-houses will not be invested in the General Conference. But the preservation of our union, and the progress of the work of God, indispensably require that the free and full use of the pulpit should be in the hands of the General Conference, and the yearly conferences (Annual Conferences) authorized by them" (Discipline 1796, p. 66). Bishop OSMON C. BAKER, an authority in this field, says by way of interpretation: "The fee of the land is vested in trustees, who hold the property in behalf of each respective society. The General Conference claims merely the right to supply the pulpit, by means such as it shall elect, with duly accredited ministers and preachers of the Methodist Church" (Guide-Book to the Administration of the Discipline, p. 171, New York, 1856). The title is held locally, subject to the trust. The congregation may by proper procedure mortgage or sell and give title to property so held by their trustees, and it may receive and invest the proceeds. This is virtual ownership. The trust is for the purpose of establishing and preserving Methodism's connectional form of polity.

The civil courts have consistently upheld the validity of the trust clause as interpreted by the General Conference of 1796, and as employed by American Methodist churches for nearly two centuries. Court decisions in this matter are numerous. Three may be cited as indicative of the position taken by the courts.

1. In a Missouri case "it was decided that the trust clause does not limit the fee simple title conveyed." The title to local church property held in trust by local trustees for the use of "Methodist ministers and members" is none the less valid on account of the trust provision, nor is the local church's power to give clear title to the purchaser adversely affected. (Southwestern Reporter, Vol. 213, pp. 784 ff., 1919.)

2. The trustees do not have authority, when so ordered by a majority of the congregation, to close the doors of a church building against persons duly appointed to a charge, and to deny them the use of the premises. "They" (the trustees), says the Court, "are not chosen to represent the majority, but rather to execute the trust of carrying out the intention of those from whose benevolence flow the temporalities put in their charge." (People vs. Steele, 2 Barbour, New York, pp. 314 f.).

3. A third decision further illustrates the soundness of the trust. In the event of a division of the congregation, right to the property belongs to "that party which maintains the true position of subordination and connection . . . and not to the party which, claiming in opposition to the authoritative action of the Church, places itself in an unlawful position." (Kentucky Reports, B. Monroe, Vol. VII. See also Corpus Juris, Vol. XI, pp. 371 f.).

DEEMS, CHARLES FORCE (1820-1893), American clergyman who became famous as pastor of the Church of the Strangers, New York, toward the latter part of the nineteenth century. He was born in Baltimore, Md., Dec. 4, 1820, son of George W. and Mary (Roberts) Deems. After graduation from Dickinson College, he married Annie Disoway, and was then for two years agent of the North Carolina division of the AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY.

In 1842 he launched a career as an educator, serving as professor of humanistic studies at the University of North Carolina, 1842-48; professor of natural science at RANDOLPH-MACON COLLEGE, 1849; president of GREENSBORO (N. C.) WOMEN'S COLLEGE, 1850-54; and director of a boarding school at Wilson, N. C., 1859-60.

In 1866 he became founder and editor of The Watchman, New York City, and that year the Southern bishops gave to him the unusual appointment as minister of the non-denominational Church of the Strangers in New York. The building was given to the church in 1870 by Cornelius Vanderbilt. Deems served as pastor of this church from 1866 to 1892.

He was founder of the American Institute of Christian Philosophy, 1881, and was the author of Life of Jesus and Scotch Verdict in re Evolution. He died in the city of New York, Nov. 18, 1893.

DEEVER, OTTERBEIN THOMAS (1881-), American E. U. B. educator, evangelist, and administrator, was born June 11, 1881, the son of J. B. and Jennie B. (Etherington) Deever. After early education at Topeka, Kan., he attended Campbell College, Holton, Kan. (A.B., 1904), and Bonebrake (now UNITED THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY) (B.D., 1907). He was licensed to preach before he graduated from high school and was ordained by the Kansas Conference, Church of the United Brethren in Christ (September, 1904), before he began theological studies. As pastor he served at Topeka (1907-12) and at Kansas City, Mo. (1912-14). He married Florence Maude Wilkin, Oct. 20, 1908.

At the United Brethren GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1913 Deever was elected to the new position of general secretary of Young People's Work and remained in that capacity from 1914-29. Despite inadequate finances and other problems he successfully established this work and in 1929 he was chosen to be the general secretary of the denomination's Board of Christian Education. In this capacity he not only helped to shape curriculum for his church but also was active in the National Christian Endeavor Society, the International Council of Religious Education, and the FEDERAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. With the union of the United Brethren and the Evangelical Churches in 1946, Dr. Deever became executive secretary of the Board of Evangelism and associate secretary of the Board of Christian Education. In November 1954 he retired, but remained active as speaker, teacher, and writer. He published many articles and pamphlets, and several books, the most recent his autobiography, God Leads the Way (1962). He makes his home in Friendly Acres, a United Methodist retirement home at Newton, Kan.

DEFENCE OF OUR FATHERS is a publication by JOHN EMORY which is considered by Episcopal Methodists to be a masterful explanation and defense of episcopacy. It was published in the heat of the agitation and call for lay representation and reform which finally resulted in the organization of the METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH. The treatise was written in answer to ALEXANDER McCAINE's History and Mystery of Methodist Episcopacy. Emory in this work gives clear and full statement of the organization of the Methodist Episcopal Church, the character of its episcopacy, and the reasons for its adoption and perpetuation. It defends Bishops ASBURY and COKE against the attacks which had been made upon them. McCaïne's attack "labored to show that the American Methodist episcopate was a surreptitious perversion of Wesley's intent and that it amounted to a misguided reversion to an episcopate resting on three ministerial orders. Emory's rather complicated but scholarly defense used Wesley's own arguments from scripture, history, and expediency to show an American episcopacy as valid with two orders as any with three," affirms the History of American Methodism.

The bitterness of the controversy at that time is shown by the fact that McCaïne's books, if read and circulated, were grounds for expulsion from the Methodist Episcopal Church. Emory, who was later elected a bishop himself, provided in his Defence a publication which has been of great value to all subsequent Methodist historians and authorities.

DEININGER, CHRISTIAN F. (1826-1888), American E. U. B. pioneer preacher, was born in Berks County, Pa., on Jan. 4, 1826. He was married to Mary Reesman in 1849, and to them were born three daughters and one son.

Appointed by the General Board of Missions as a missionary to the German people in CALIFORNIA, he arrived via PANAMA in SAN FRANCISCO on June 8, 1864, with his wife and children and Rev. and Mrs. Michael Guhl. They were the first missionaries of the EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION in California. Deininger had been ordained a DEACON in 1852 and an ELDER in 1854 and served several charges in the West Pennsylvania Conference (later known as Central Pennsylvania Conference). In San Francisco he soon organized a small class to which he ministered in the German language. The next year a church building was erected.

In 1867 Deininger transferred to a larger German church in SALEM, Ore., where he served two years before returning to Central Pennsylvania.

He was the first missionary of the church in the city of Washington, D. C. Later he was a Presiding Elder for a number of years, and finally served as pastor in York, Pa.

He died July 17, 1888, and was buried in the York cemetery.

DELAMOTTE, CHARLES (1714-1796) and WILLIAM (1717-1743), were the sons of a London sugar merchant, whose home was at Blendon Hall, near Bexley, Kent, but who acted as a magistrate in Middlesex. Nothing is known of the details of Charles Delamotte's meeting with JOHN WESLEY, but we find him, age twenty-one, as John's servant on board the Sinmonds en route for GEORGIA in 1735. During the voyage Delamotte learned Greek, and part of his time in SAVANNAH was spent in teaching thirty to forty children. He is mentioned frequently in Wesley's Journal during the stay in America: indeed, Wesley records that during the period Oct. 14, 1735-Dec. 16, 1737, they were separated for only a few days. Tyerman claims that Delamotte was put out by SOPHIA HOPKEY's nursing of Wesley during a fever. Delamotte did not return to England with Wesley: hence Wesley's expectation—not in fact fulfilled—of a cool reception when he visited Delamotte the elder at Blendon Hall on his own return; and Charles left America on June 2, 1738, "the poor people deeply regretting his departure."

Charles Delamotte became a Moravian; and after meeting him again in 1759 Wesley wrote a touching tribute: "He seemed to be the same loving simple man still. (Journal, July 10, 1759). I should not repent my journey to Hull, were it only for this short interview." They met again in 1782 at Delamotte's house at Barrow-on-Humber, when Wesley repeated the tribute. He died some years after Wesley, 1796.

William Delamotte was the first Methodist (or Methodist Moravian) at Cambridge University. Born in 1717, he was converted through the influence of CHARLES WESLEY and BENJAMIN INGHAM. The letter contained in John Wesley's Journal, December, 1738, probably comes from his hand, and describes the agony of the new birth and a subsequent mystical love for Christ. Like his brother he became a Moravian, advocating the practice of "stillness," and he worked closely with Benjamin Ingham. He died young, however, in 1743.

DELANY, MRS. (née Mary Granville) (1700-1788), friend of Wesley and daughter of Bernard Granville (a brother of Lord Lansdowne), was married in 1718, against her will, to Alexander Pendarves, a wealthy Cornishman, who died in 1724. In 1730 she met JOHN and CHARLES WESLEY at the home of Lionel Kirkham, rector of Stanton in Gloucestershire. She and John Wesley were strongly attracted to each other and a lively correspondence, chiefly on religious themes, began between them and continued for about a year. It was ended by Mrs. Pendarves, as she was still known, and when in 1734 she wished to reopen it, Wesley declined. In 1743 she married Patrick Delany, who later became the Dean of Down. Mrs. Delany was richly endowed with intellectual and artistic gifts and was famed for her beauty, charm, and vivacity. She was very popular in London society, in which she delighted to come. She addressed her friends by fancy names: John Wesley was "Cyrus," Charles was "Araspes," and she herself was "Aspasia." She was highly esteemed by the royal family of George III, who provided a house for her in Windsor during the widowhood of her old age.

DELAWARE, U.S.A., one of the thirteen original states and the first to ratify the federal constitution, is usually regarded as belonging to the South Atlantic region, but is considered Middle Atlantic by its own officials. The state is bounded by PENNSYLVANIA, NEW JERSEY, Delaware Bay, the Atlantic Ocean, and MARYLAND. Mostly a sea-level plain, it has some hills in the northern section. It is ninety-six miles long and nine to thirty-five miles wide. The population is approximately 543,000.

Delaware received its name from Lord de la Warr, the first appointed governor of VIRGINIA, who entered Delaware Bay in 1610. For nearly half a century the Dutch and the Swedes contended for possession of Delaware, but subsequently it was conquered by the English, and in 1682 the Duke of York transferred it to William Penn who held it as a tributary to Pennsylvania. Always closely connected with Pennsylvania, it remained under the government of that colony even after 1703 when it was allowed its own assembly.

The story of Methodism in Delaware is narrated below in the account of its record on the Delmarva Peninsula, as the "Eastern Shore" (Maryland, Delaware, and Virginia—all three have important territory) is frequently called.

Delmarva Peninsula: Most historians state or strongly imply that Methodism began in America either in NEW YORK under PHILIP EMBURY or in Maryland under ROBERT STRAWBRIDGE. This fails to distinguish between Methodism as a movement and organized Methodism.

There was a discernible spiritual movement in America which was consummated in the organization of Methodist societies. The leader of that movement was GEORGE WHITEFIELD, who itinerated in America from MAINE to GEORGIA. Wherever he went he captivated the multitudes, awakened the souls of the masses, and laid the foundation on which Christianity of new strength and vitality was to rise.

On Whitefield's second journey to America he landed at Lewes, Del., on Oct. 30, 1739. There he preached to a serious congregation. The result was the organization of the first Methodist Society in America.

A brief reference to that society is recorded in the letters of William Beckett, the London Missionary Society's missionary to Lewes. A letter dated April 25, 1741, states, "Mr. Whitefield had a vast crowd of hearers at Lewes in May last where he preached four or five times from a balcony. I believe to not less than fourteen or 1500, of all sorts. They contrived unknown to me, to set up a religious society. Some of the Church people (a few, for that matter, up and above thirty of all sorts) joined them. . . ." (Hallman, Garden of Methodism, p. 261.) Apparently the society made no attempt to build; and, for want of spiritual guidance and leadership, it died a natural death.

At the Conference of 1769 Wesley appointed RICHARD

BOARDMAN and JOSEPH PILMORE to go to America. When they arrived Whitefield greeted them in the name of the Lord. Through his intensive and extensive labors he had introduced the general Methodist movement into America. That same year Methodism was officially brought to WILMINGTON, Del., by the colorful Captain THOMAS WEBB.

Soon after ASBURY came to America, he began preaching tours from state to state and ministered alternately in the cities and countryside. "This example of Mr. Asbury had its effect upon the other preachers, and in the latter part of the year (1771) some of them visited the provinces of Delaware and Maryland." (Bangs, History 1, 71.) However, Whitefield had previously labored so much in that area that there was a room in BOHEMIA MANOR called the "Whitefield Room" and the way was prepared for the itinerants.

The first annual conference of the American Methodist preachers was held in PHILADELPHIA on July 4, 1773. BALTIMORE Circuit, one of the five stations, was divided into three appointments, one of which was the Eastern Shore. WILLIAM WATTERS, the first native American itinerant of Methodism, although appointed to NEW JERSEY, went to the Eastern Shore and "had greater freedom and success in preaching than ever before. The Eastern Shore was thenceforth to be a fruitful garden of Methodism."

In 1774 Kent was one of the ten appointments. That year FREEBORN GARRETSON was converted on the Peninsula and entered the itineracy. Each succeeding Annual Conference saw a marked increase in membership on the Peninsula. In 1777 it had 720 of the 6,968 members in American societies. Then the Revolutionary War came and all of the English preachers, except Francis Asbury, set sail for England. Asbury found asylum within the borders of the Peninsula.

The next year, 1778, five established circuits were dropped, but the Peninsula was divided into two. In 1779 her membership had increased to 1,288 of the 8,577—one-seventh of the total membership; in 1781 to 2,755 of the 10,539—one-fourth of the total membership; in 1782 to 3,952 of the 11,758—one-third of the total membership; and in 1783 to 4,369 of the 13,740—about one-third of the membership of all American Methodist societies. Thus, when other sections of our nation retreated from their association with Methodism for fear of persecution, the Delmarva Peninsula paid the price that it cost to be a Methodist and held aloft the torch of spiritual experience.

On Nov. 14, 1784, BARRATT'S CHAPEL entertained a quarterly meeting over which Asbury was to preside. There were over 1,000 people present including many preachers. After the service THOMAS COKE, Francis Asbury, Richard Whatcoat, Freeborn Garretson, and eight other clergymen went to dinner at the home of PHILIP BARRATT'S widow. There they decided, subject to the approval of their brethren, to call a conference on Christmas Eve to decide whether and how they would be formed into a Church. Those present approved. Freeborn Garretson was sent "like an arrow" to call the preachers together. The CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE met Dec. 24, 1784.

Between 1784 and the first GENERAL CONFERENCE in 1792, Methodism continued to expand on the Peninsula. In 1784 there were eight circuits and 4,604 members. In 1792 there were twelve circuits and 10,035 members. The total membership of the M. E. Church was 65,980.

In a short time, the General Conference divided the United States into seven sectional conferences, one of which was the PHILADELPHIA CONFERENCE, with four districts. The Delaware and Eastern Shore District covered all of the Peninsula except the Wilmington area. The Peninsula was set off by itself in 1828 to the extent that it composed two entire districts. In 1840 the Area was divided into three districts with each having eleven appointments. Its membership was 25,297, of which 8,250 were Negro. Twenty years later there were still three districts with 30,005 members.

At the General Conference of 1868, the Philadelphia Conference recommended that the Wilmington Conference be set off and its boundaries include the State of Delaware and the Eastern Shore of Maryland and Virginia. On March 17, 1869, Bishop MATTHEW SIMPSON called the first session of that new conference to order.

The first division of significance within the M. E. Church which affected the Delmarva Peninsula was occasioned when the General Conference of 1824 refused to hear the widespread appeal for equal lay representation. In protest "Union Societies" were organized in many parts of the country. When the Memorial of the Union Societies was not adopted at the General Conference of 1828 they proceeded to make the moves which resulted in the METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH.

Centerville, Md., was the first town on the Eastern Shore to adopt Methodist Protestant allegiance. On Dec. 14, 1828, an invitation was given after the morning worship service at the M. E. Church to those desirous of uniting with the "Reformers" and fifty-four men and women were received. Chestertown, Kent Island, Easton, and other churches saw the same division.

On April 2, 1829, the MARYLAND CONFERENCE of the M. P. Church organized in Baltimore. It became the largest and strongest conference in that church. At its first session there were twenty ministers and twenty-six delegates present. Its geographical boundaries embraced all of Maryland, Delaware, and that part of Virginia not in the Virginia district. Thirteen itinerants were appointed to three stations and five circuits, one of which was called "The Eastern Shore Circuit." The next year growth necessitated that the circuit be divided into three, with each bearing the name of the county in which it was located—Kent, Queen Annes, and Talbot. At the conference of 1877 there were reported 163 itinerant and unstationed preachers, 13,402 members, 204 churches, forty-four parsonages, and property valued at $785,265.

Later came a greater cleavage within the M. E. Church, and the M. E. Church, South was organized in 1845-46. The PLAN OF SEPARATION, under which the Church South organized, provided that each church in the border states be given the option of whether they wanted to be M. E. or M. E., South. Sixteen charges on the Eastern Shore went South.

In 1860 the General Conference of the M. E. Church took a strong anti-slavery stand. As a result in 1861 a large portion of the members of the Baltimore Conference, which had hitherto reached over to the Shore, declared themselves independent. That year the Civil War erupted, and they simply maintained a precarious position—neither north nor south. After the War, in 1866, they united with the M. E. Church, South, and became its Baltimore Conference with a membership of 11,866. It is noteworthy that there was only one Southern Methodist congregation organized in the State of Delaware and it soon faded.

As long as there have been white Methodists, there is evidence that there have been Negro believers of like kind. Ever since HARRY HOSIER, Asbury's grooming-boy, preached his first sermon on May 13, 1781, on a stump at Thomas Chapel Church, the first church building owned by the Methodists in the State of Delaware, the voice of the Negro has been heard in the church.

The DELAWARE CONFERENCE organized in 1864 for the Negro travelling preachers, was to include all the territory east and north of the Washington Conference, its principal area being the Delmarva Peninsula and all land east of the Susquehanna River in Pennsylvania. Geographically it overlay several white conferences. The first session of the Delaware Conference was held in Philadelphia on July 28, 1864, with Bishop EDMUND S. JAMES presiding. At that session they reported twenty-one travelling and thirty-nine local preachers, three stations and eighteen circuits, 4,871 members, thirty-four churches, and property valued at $38,000. Of these the Peninsula had fifteen circuits, 3,280 members, twenty-two churches, and property valued at $17,900.

At the end of a hundred years of Methodist activity on the Delmarva Peninsula the M. E. Church had the Wilmington Conference with three districts and churches in every county; the M. P. Church had two districts of the Maryland Conference and churches in every county; the M. E. Church, South, had two districts of two conferences with its concentration of power in the southern section; and the Delaware Conference had two districts and churches in every county. There they existed side by side with overlapping interests; yet their growth was phenomenal. In 1769 there were only a few scattered Methodist converts, yet at the centennial anniversary of Methodism on the Peninsula, the Methodists constituted the largest sector of the church-going people, with over sixty percent of the total population—a proportion not to be equaled elsewhere!

When the UNITING CONFERENCE (1939) established the boundaries of the conferences, the Delmarva Peninsula was divided so that the Eastern Shore of Maryland and all of Delaware were to constitute the Peninsula Conference and the Eastern Shore of Virginia became a part of the Virginia Conference.

Exactly two hundred years after Whitefield introduced Methodist evangelism to America, the PENINSULA CONFERENCE of The Methodist Church was formally organized, on Oct. 31, 1939, at the State Teachers College, Salisbury, Md. The Wilmington Conference of the M. E. Church gave 144 active and thirty-two retired ministers, 52,980 members, 323 churches and property valued at $5,192,280. The Maryland Conference of the M. P. Church had forty-five active and nine retired ministers, 12,124 members, 108 churches and property worth $1,710,620. The VIRGINIA CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church, South, yielded seven active and one retired ministers, 2,929 members, twenty churches and property valued at $350,300. The Baltimore Conference of the M. E. Church, South, contributed six active and two retired ministers, 958 members, ten churches and property worth $101,500. Thus, the Peninsula Conference was composed of 202 active and forty-four retired ministers, 68,991 members, 461 churches and property valued at $7,354,700.

The General Conference of 1956 recommended Amendment IX, which, when ratified by the annual conferences, provided a method whereby the Central Jurisdiction could be gradually abolished. In essence it permitted local churches to transfer from one conference to another without the approval of the Jurisdictional Conference, if it were approved by the two annual conferences involved; and enabled an annual conference to transfer from one jurisdiction to another without waiting the approval of the General Conference.

Pursuant thereto the Delaware Conference and the Peninsula Conference at their respective annual sessions in 1961 approved the transfer of the Delaware, Washington, and North Carolina Conferences of the Central Jurisdiction to the Northeastern Jurisdiction. Further negotiations were carried on by the bodies concerned and at its 1964 session, the Peninsula Conference voted that "Districts will not exceed fifty charges in number," following the agreed upon merger of the Peninsula and the Delaware Conferences.

In June, 1964, the NORTHEASTERN JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCE met in Syracuse, N. Y., and voted to receive the Delaware and Washington Conferences into the Northeastern Jurisdiction and ordered that by July 1965 the Delaware Conference be dissolved and its churches be transferred into the various conferences which it overlay. Bishop JOHN WESLEY LORD, in charge of the Washington Area, was given jurisdiction over the Delaware and Washington Conferences (since they were largely in his geographical area), for the purpose of completing the merger with other conferences. On the Delmarva Peninsula, the Delaware Conference had eighty charges, 198 churches, 16,603 members, and property worth $6,098,490, and the Peninsula Conference had 187 charges, 369 churches, 84,488 members, and property valued at $49,717,151.

On April 27, 1965, the Delaware Conference held its final session at Tindley Temple, Philadelphia, with Bishop John Wesley Lord presiding. On May 13th the Peninsula Conference convened and the merger of the two conferences was completed. Thus, the Peninsula Conference emerged a new force with 299 active and retired ministers, 267 charges, 565 churches, 101,091 members and property worth approximately $55,815,641.

DELAWARE, OHIO, U.S.A., is a Methodist stronghold. It is the seat of OHIO WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY (founded 1844) and METHODIST THEOLOGICAL SCHOOL OF OHIO (founded 1960). About seventeen percent of its population of some 13,000 are members of the four Methodist churches in the town.

Jacob Hooper who traveled the Scioto District organized a Methodist class in Delaware in 1818 or 1819. Five years later a church was dedicated. In 1845 the congregation relocated on William Street, and it is still known as the William Street Church. A new edifice was built in 1888. A German language church was established in Delaware in 1844. Never strong, it ceased to exist about 1903. St. Paul's Church (now Stratford St. Paul's) was organized in 1856. The conference first appointed a preacher to Asbury Church in 1886; the next year it reported 283 members. Grace Church, first known as East Delaware Church, began about 1880 and soon had 300 members.

In the 1880's the boundary lines of the Central Ohio, North Ohio, and Ohio Conferences were so drawn that each had at least one Delaware church within its bounds.

Such partitioning of the town of Delaware was understandable in view of the fact that all of the conferences supported Ohio Wesleyan University. To this date (1970) Delaware's Asbury and Grace Churches are in the Ohio East Conference and Stratford St. Paul's and William Street Churches are in the Ohio West Conference.

In 1969 William Street and Asbury were the strongest churches, reporting 886 and 692 members, respectively. In that year the four churches had a total of 2,261 members, property valued at $1,409,549, and they raised $146,628 for all purposes.

DELAWARE CONFERENCE (1856-1860). (See CENTRAL OHIO CONFERENCE.)

DELAWARE CONFERENCE was organized July 29, 1864, in John Wesley Chapel (Tindley Temple), PHILADELPHIA, with Bishop EDMUND S. JANES presiding. The 1864 GENERAL CONFERENCE had adopted a committee report on the state of the work among the people of color which authorized the organization of Negro annual conferences. Delaware was the first conference of Negro Methodists to be formed following the action of the General Conference.

The territory of the conference included DELAWARE, NEW JERSEY, the eastern shore of MARYLAND, Accomack and Northampton Counties in VIRGINIA, eastern PENNSYLVANIA, and the region to the north.

Meetings of Negro local preachers and laymen were held in African Zoar M. E. Church, Philadelphia, in 1852 and 1855. From 1857 to 1863 there were annual sessions of colored local preachers as follows: 1857, African Zoar Church, with Bishop LEVI SCOTT presiding; 1858, Ezion Church, Wilmington, Del.; 1859, African Zoar; 1860, Ezion; 1861, Mt. Hope Church, Salem, N. J.; 1862, African Zoar; and 1863, Ezion. These meetings were the forerunner of the Delaware Conference.

The Delaware Conference had eleven charter members: Joshua Brinkley, Isaiah Broughton, Samuel Dale, James Davis, Wilmore S. Elsey, Isaac Hinson, John G. Manluff, Jehu H. Pearce, Isaac Hinson, Frost Pollett, and Nathan Young. Five of them died within ten years, while one, Jehu Pearce, lived fifty-one years after the conference was organized.

Ten men were admitted on trial at the first conference session: Abraham Brown, Anthony Driver, Stephen Johns, Wesley J. Parker, Charles Pollett, Robert Robinson, John W. Saunders, Simon Taylor, Samuel G. Waters, and Stephen P. Whittington. At the time of organization the conference had thirty-nine local preachers, thirty-four churches with 4,964 members including probationers, twenty-one Sunday schools with 841 pupils, and the churches had raised $76.25 for conference claimants during the year.

Among Negro churches organized prior to the formation of the Delaware Conference were: African Zoar, Philadelphia, 1794; Bryan Chapel, Queenstown, Md., 1800; Mt. Hope, Salem, N. J., 1801; Ezion, WILMINGTON, Del., 1805; Waugh, Cambridge, Md., 1826; Mt. Zion, Lawnside, N. J., 1827; St. John's, Orange, N. J., 1829; Asbury, Easton, Md., 1836; John Wesley Chapel, Philadelphia, 1837; John Wesley, Salisbury, Md., 1837; Joshua's Chapel, Morg Nec, Md., 1839; Metropolitan, Princess Anne, Md., 1841; Whatcoat, Dover, Del., 1852; Long's Chapel, St. Michaels, Md., 1852; Wesley Chapel, Slaughter Neck, Del., 1853; New Bethel, South Berlin, Md., 1855; Ferry Avenue, Camden, N. J., 1856; St. Paul, Milford, Del., 1857; Asbury, Merchantville, N. J., 1857; and Berry's Chapel, Quinton, N. J., 1859.

On May 1, 1868, James Davis, a charter member of the conference, became the first Negro to be seated as a delegate in the General Conference of the M. E. Church. Two members of the Delaware Conference were elected bishops: ALEXANDER P. CAMPFOR (Missionary Bishop) in 1916, and NOAH W. MOORE, Jr. in 1960. Charles A. Tindley was the outstanding pastor in the 101-year history of the conference. In 1900 he went to a church of about 400 members in Philadelphia. Under his leadership, in the next third of a century it grew to more than 5,000 active members. A new edifice, Tindley Temple valued at $500,000 was erected, and in his last year during the economic depression, the church raised $24,000 for benevolences.

In 1937, the Delaware Conference voted 218 to 19 against the plan for uniting American Methodism. However, under the able and sympathetic leadership of Bishops ALEXANDER P. SHAW and EDGAR A. LOVE, each of whom served as resident bishop twelve years, the conference loyally supported the program of The Methodist Church.

Pursuant to overtures and invitations from conferences of the Northeastern Jurisdiction, in accordance with Amendment IX of the constitution of The Methodist Church, the Delaware Conference agreed to merge with those conferences. The process was effected over a period of two years, 1964-65, with five different conferences—Peninsula, PHILADELPHIA, NEW YORK, NORTHERN NEW JERSEY, and SOUTHERN NEW JERSEY—receiving some Delaware Conference ministers and churches. In addition, a few churches and ministers were transferred to the NORTH CAROLINA-VIRGINIA CONFERENCE of the Central Jurisdiction, pending the absorption of that body by Southeastern Jurisdiction conferences.

In 1964, the Delaware Conference had 109 ministers, 154 local preachers, 265 churches, 23,955 Church school pupils, 43,659 church members, and property valued at $13,080,037.

DELEGATES, FRATERNAL. This title is self-explanatory, but it may be noted that in the early years of the M. E. Church in America a sort of fraternal relationship was kept up between the Wesleyans of England and the Methodists of America by the several visits of Dr. THOMAS COXE who came back and forth—his last visit being in 1804. Quite frequently letters of fraternal greeting were borne by him from the British body and returned to them through him from the Methodists of America. When his visits ceased, such regular correspondence ceased, but according to Bishop SIMPSON, after the War of 1812, since difficulties arose between the missionaries in several churches in CANADA, the bishops of the M. E. Church and the American GENERAL CONFERENCE addressed the British Conference on the subject, and a special correspondence on these matters was carried on. As these difficulties continued, in 1820 JOHN EMORY was sent to England by the M. E. Church to arrange for some definite plan regarding the work in Canada. He was also requested to ask for the mutual exchange of publications. Emory was cordially received by the British Methodists and an amicable arrangement was worked out in reference to the difficulties in Canada.

To return his visit, Richard Reese visited the General Conference in 1824 with Dr. Hanna as his traveling companion. So commenced an interchange of personal visits and fraternal salutations, and this was continued at various intervals from that time until the present, and has served to maintain a close fraternity of feeling between the older Methodist bodies.

In time other branches of the Methodist family sent fraternal delegates to the respective General Conferences of the other branches of the family, and thus it came about that at each General Conference, then and today, there is traditionally set apart a period in which to hear the addresses of the fraternal delegates. Necessarily since time today has come to be at a premium in a crowded schedule, and since there are many Methodisms (as well as other Evangelical denominations who wish to send representatives bearing their good will), it is not possible to set aside as much time as might be desired for these separate addresses. Nevertheless, such delegates are always warmly received, given honored seats upon the platform at each General Conference, and as much time as proves possible is allotted to them for their fraternal messages.

In turn, The United Methodist Church itself sends its representatives to various other Methodisms, the Council of Bishops usually being requested by the General Conference to provide for such fraternal messengers. The Council of Bishops itself selects and directs one of its own members to be present at each Jurisdictional Conference of the Church, in order to represent the Council, and the larger Church. A list of the fraternal delegates who have represented the various Methodisms in each General Conference would be too lengthy to enumerate here, but naturally each Church wishes one of its commanding personalities to speak for it and to express its brotherhood on each such occasion.

DELHI, India. As early as 1857, Delhi acquired historic significance for M. E. missions in INDIA. In the last days of that year WILLIAM and CLEMENTINA BUTLER, with their infant daughter born in Naini Tal, traveled across the mountains and valleys of Kumaun and Garhwal to Dehra Dun and to Delhi. There the Butlers witnessed the final break-up of Mogul power and wrote a moving appeal for more missionaries and for funds to care for children. At the Taj Mahal, on March 11, 1858, William Butler met the first missionary recruits sent by the Board of Missions. They were the Rev. and Mrs. RALPH PIERCE and the Rev. and Mrs. JAMES L. HUMPHREY. They had left Boston on June 1, the day after the martyrdom of Maria Bolst and the burning of the BAREILLY residence of the Butlers. Because of the violence of the revolution, the missionaries were not able to stay in or near Delhi, and they finally set up headquarters at Naini Tal. So far as is known, no M. E. minister preached in Delhi until WILLIAM TAYLOR went in April, 1871, on the invitation of James Smith, to conduct evangelistic meetings for the British Baptist Mission.

Methodists in Delhi were advised to unite with the Baptists or the Anglicans, and many did so. By 1900 many Methodists were eagerly pleading with the leaders to send them a pastor, as Methodist ministers and laymen were trying to spread the Gospel in rural areas around Delhi. In 1910 the first M. E. missionaries were assigned to Delhi—the Rev. and Mrs. Frank M. Wilson. The next year the Delhi District was organized with Wilson as superintendent. By 1914 he and his associates had baptized 6,000 people. But they did not own a single church structure or any other property in the city. Worship was conducted in private homes or in open spaces. The first pastor appointed to Delhi City was Kallu Dass. Services were held in his rented house. WILLIAM ROCKWELL CLANCY succeeded Wilson in 1914, when land was obtained on Battery Lane and a district parsonage was built, a temporary church building was constructed, and membership expanded rapidly. By 1932 the enrolled membership exceeded 700.

Butler Memorial Higher Secondary Girls School was opened in 1925 in Delhi as a part of a memorial to William and Clementina Butler, founders of M. E. missions in India. The day after Christmas, 1857, Butler sat on the crystal seat in the Diwan-i-Khas (audience room) of the deposed Mogul emperor, during the trial of the Nawab of Ballabhpur and reflected upon the trials and tragedies, the visions and victories of the twelve months and three weeks since he and Mrs. Butler had begun work in Bareilly. His thoughts turned to plans for the future. He knew that boarding schools were essential, and that schools for girls would be as important as boys' schools. It was not until the early years of the twentieth century, however, that the M. E. Church considered opening work in Delhi, and not until 1924 that proposals were formulated for a boarding school for girls.

Bishop JOHN WESLEY ROBINSON, appointed to Delhi by the General Conference of 1924, secured land from the government and finances from India and America and made the project a memorial to the Butlers. The girls' school was started as a middle school. The first principal was Lily Dexter Green. She had won acclaim as an educator in Lahore, then the capital of the undivided Punjab. Among those who have rendered memorable service in the school have been Catherine Justin, Helen Buss, Jennie Ball, and Ella Perry, all Americans; and Dolly Mathews, Agnes Shaw, and Priscilla Mukha, Indians. The school became a high school in 1965 and received permission to become a higher secondary in 1966. The enrollment at that time was 422. Miss Perry became principal in September 1938, and served the school with distinction. She stepped down so that her Indian colleague, Miss Mukha, might head the institution. Boys have been admitted into the primary classes from the first year, and some consideration has been given to a proposal that the school be made coeducational through all grades. Christ Church is less than a furlong away, and the church and school are associated in a richly productive partnership.

Cantonment Church. During British rule a church was built in Delhi Cantonment, primarily for the use of the British troops. When Britain transferred ruling powers to the Indian government, the Cantonment Church was made over by agreement to the Delhi diocese of the Church of India. Arrangements were made by which Methodists could use the church, contributing a modest sum for the upkeep. The government of India responded to an appeal from Christian members of the defense forces to the Ministry of Defense for the appointment of a chaplain. After canvassing the church affiliations and preferences of their forces and conferring with the Methodist bishop, the authorities appointed the local Methodist pastor. Successive Methodist ministers have served the troops, civilian employees of the army, the related families, and the Methodists in adjoining areas.

Centenary Church. In 1938, when the members and preparatory members of Christ Church exceeded 1,600, many of whom lived in New Delhi, a new quarterly conference was organized for New Delhi. P. D. David was appointed pastor. Under his leadership arrangements were made for a joint worship service in Hindustani for Methodists and Baptists and others willing to join them in the Union Church, constructed with help from the Baptist, Methodist, and Presbyterian Boards of Missions in Britain. This service was held in the afternoon when the heat was often oppressive. Prayer meetings and Bible-study classes were conducted wherever arrangements could be made. Within six months the salary of the pastor was provided by the members without help from the union services. Soon an associate pastor was engaged. From the beginning, funds were contributed for the purchase of land and the construction of a new church. In 1956 a suitable site was obtained from the government of India, and the cornerstone of the Centenary Church was laid by Bishop J. WASKOM PICKETT and mission board secretary, JAMES K. MATHEWS (now bishop). Russell King, missionary construction engineer, drew the plans, and he and the district superintendent, Hendrix Townsley, who also holds an engineering degree, supervised the building. Generous gifts were made by Methodists of Iowa and by First Church, Glendale, Calif. The church was dedicated in December 1962, and now houses three congregations which provide worship services in four or more languages for a constituency of more than 3,000 people representing all parts of India and many foreign countries.

Christ Church was erected on property purchased in 1925. In the 1950's a social hall and education unit were added as a memorial to Methodism's first bishop in Delhi, John Wesley Robinson. The church quickly became one of Indian Methodism's most influential churches. Two of its pastors, JOHN A. SUBHAN and MANGAL SINGH, have been elected to the episcopacy by the SOUTHERN ASIA CENTRAL CONFERENCE. Three other pastors gained influence in the All-India councils of the church—Amar Das, Isaac Mann, and JOSEPH R. LANCE. Recent statistics of Christ Church report three pastors, 583 full members, 550 preparatory members, and 682 baptized children under twelve years of age.

The Dakka Church. For about twenty years, a few humble families in Dakka Village were served by local preachers and occasionally visited by the district superintendent or the woman evangelist. On special occasions, such as Christmas, Good Friday, and Easter, some members walked or rode bicycles to Christ Church, some four miles distant. The University of Delhi extended to a point less than a mile away, and in 1952 a layman began holding Sunday services in a schoolhouse, and then a new church was organized. Soon an ordained minister was appointed and land was purchased for the building of a church and a parsonage. A militant Hindu group made a determined effort to prevent the construction, but officials respected and protected the rights of the church. Generous gifts by members of the congregation and by other local Christians, and by a family in Virginia, made possible the completion of the church and parsonage.

DELHI CONFERENCE covers DELHI, East Punjab, Hariana, Himachal Pradesh, and Rajasthan in INDIA. It was organized in 1893 and then called the Northwest India Annual Conference. In 1945 the name was changed to the Delhi Conference. Before 1893 this area had been a part of the SOUTH INDIA CONFERENCE.

Delhi itself, which is head of an episcopal area and of a district of the conference, is now capital of the Republic of India and a city of about 2,500,000.

In the Delhi Conference there are six districts. The Ajmer District is based in the old walled city of Ajmer, which is 275 miles from Delhi and has a population of 231,240. The Batala District is the most modern district of the conference in the Punjab and reaches to the Pakistan border. There are 16,555 in the Christian community in the Batala District. In Ludhiana in the Punjab, a city of 244,032, there is the Christian Medical College, where the Division of World Missions and the Woman's Division of Christian Service (TMC) have cooperated with other boards to carry on its school for full medical training. Physicians are provided by both Divisions for this hospital.

Other administrative districts of the Delhi Conference are Delhi, Fazilka, Hissar, and Patiala. At last reporting the Delhi Annual Conference had 41,077 names on the church rolls, with a total Christian community of 61,511.

DEMPSTER, JAMES (d. 1803), British Methodist, was born in Scotland, and attended Edinburgh University. He served JOHN WESLEY as an itinerant preacher in five Irish circuits, 1764-69, with great success. From there he travelled for three years in Welsh circuits, and for two years in Cornish circuits, his last being Cornwall East, where his junior colleague was MARTIN RODDA, who in 1774 accompanied him to America. They were the last two preachers sent out before the Revolution. Wesley reposed great trust in him, and continued to correspond with him in America. Here his health broke down, so that although he was put in charge of the New York circuit in 1775, his name disappeared from the American Minutes in 1776, and the British Minutes that year recorded that he had "desisted from travelling." He became pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Florida, New York, where he remained until his death in 1803. His son JOHN DEMPSTER became a zealous worker in Methodist theological education.

DEMPSTER, JOHN (1794-1863), American minister, missionary to South America, and pioneer educator, was born in Florida, N. Y., Jan. 2, 1794, the son of JAMES DEMPSTER. At the age of eighteen, John was converted at a camp meeting and at once devoted himself to a life of diligent study and labor. For more than fifty years it was his habit to retire at nine at night and to rise at four in the morning. He early gained the reputation of having unusual power as a speaker and great acuteness as a thinker, especially in the field of logic.

In 1818 he was admitted to the GENESEE CONFERENCE, but because of ill health, he was kept on probation for four years. His first circuit was in Lower Canada—at that time within the Genesee Conference, and GEORGE PECK said, "It was a vast field, most of it a wilderness . . . nothing daunted, he must meet his appointments." From 1818 to 1835 he filled important appointments and was for several years PRESIDING ELDER of the Cayuga District in the ONEIDA CONFERENCE in New York (by that time the Canadian work had been separated from that in the States).

Dempster noted that many laymen, converted by Methodist preaching, joined churches having better educated ministers. He resolved then to dedicate himself to theological education. In 1832 the Genesee Wesleyan Seminary was founded at Lima, N. Y., with Dempster as president.

However, he felt the call of the mission to wider fields and in 1836 accepted the invitation of JUSTIN SPAULDING to go to BUENOS AIRES in South America. He was duly appointed there as one of the first Methodist missionaries in all South America. He held services, organized a congregation, started a school, and began the first Methodist church building in Argentina. He also had a hand in founding Methodist work in URUGUAY, visiting there in 1838, after which he requested the Missionary Society in New York to send a permanent worker—which was done.

Also working in BRAZIL, Dempster, within a year, succeeded in organizing a church, and by 1840 a school of eighty students was established. A national financial crisis caused his return to the States in 1841.

In 1844 he succeeded OSMAN C. BAKER as president of the Methodist Biblical Institute of Newbury, Vt., which, though organized at a ministers' meeting in Boston, Mass., on April 24, 1839, did not begin instruction until 1841. Dempster, the Institute's second president, traveled widely to secure funds for the school, which relocated in BOSTON and became the forerunner of BOSTON UNIVER-SITY. Dempster resigned from the Biblical Institute in 1853 and went to CHICAGO. There, assisted by Mrs. ELIZA GARRETT, a wealthy widow, he founded GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE at Evanston, Ill. With four students and three faculty members Methodism's second theological school opened in January, 1854. After seven years of service at Garrett, Dempster went to CALIFORNIA to establish a third ministerial training school. He died in 1863 before achieving his dream. John Dempster is often called "father of American Methodist theological education."

DENISON, JOSEPH (1815-1900), American minister and educator, was born Oct. 1, 1815, in Bernardston, Mass. He professed conversion and was united with the M. E. Church in 1832 and from 1834 to 1837 studied in WILBRAHAM ACADEMY. He then entered the Western University in 1837, graduating in 1840. For a time he filled a number of appointments in the NEW ENGLAND CONFERENCE, but in 1854 or '55, he removed to KANSAS where the Kansas-Nebraska Bill had passed the Congress and left the slavery question open to the decision of the settlers. Conditions there were stormy. Joseph Denison became the first regular minister of the First Methodist Church, MANHATTAN, KAN. He became secretary of the first session of the Kansas-Nebraska Annual Conference with Bishop OSMON C. BAKER in the chair. He served as PRESIDING ELDER of the Manhattan District from 1859 to '63, and was a member of the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1864 of the M. E. Church. Along with ISAAC T. GOODNOW, he helped establish Bluemont Central College in Manhattan, and became its first president. He went before the State legislature, urged them to establish the university at Manhattan—which they did—but the governor, who lived at Lawrence, vetoed the bill. Then, Denison with others went to Washington and succeeded in establishing Kansas State Agricultural College in Manhattan with the assistance of the Morrill Act (Federal Land Grant to Colleges) passed in 1862. Kansas State claims to be the first Land Grant College. Joseph Denison was president of Kansas State College from September 1863 to August 1873. There is a building named for him on the campus in Manhattan, Kan.

He became president of BAKER UNIVERSITY in 1874, and served as such until 1879. He died on Feb. 19, 1900, and was buried at Manhattan.

DENMAN, HARRY (1893-), long time executive secretary of the BOARD OF EVANGELISM and lay leader of The United Methodist Church, U.S.A., was born on Sept. 26, 1893, the son of William Henry and Hattie (Leonard) Denman. He was educated at BIRMINGHAM-SOUTHERN COLLEGE, where he received the A.B. degree in 1921 and the M.A. in 1930. He was given the honorary D.D. degree at ATHENS COLLEGE (Alabama) in 1936. He was for a time with a TENNESSEE business concern in which he held various positions until in 1915 he became secretary of the Birmingham, Ala. Sunday School Association. This position he kept until 1919 when he became church manager of the First Methodist Church at BIRMINGHAM. Dr. Denman became a strong lay leader of the NORTH ALABAMA CONFERENCE, and after church union in 1939, he was elected General Secretary of the Commission on Evangelism (later Board of Evangelism) of The Methodist Church. He retained that position until 1965, when he retired. He was a member of the GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church, South in 1934 and 1938; of the UNITING CONFERENCE in 1939; and a member of the JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCES, 1940, '44, '48, and '52. He was chairman of the Committee on Evangelism of the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL until his retirement. Unmarried, he was able to travel extensively over the church, holding revivals, services and evangelistic rallies—not only in the United States but over the entire Methodist world connection. A prayer room, with worshipful and distinctive furnishings, has been named for him and dedicated in his honor at Lambuth Inn, LAKE JUNALUSKA, N. C.

DENMARK is the southern part of the northern European area, the smallest country, but the second largest in population. At the latest census (1960) there were 4,738,884 inhabitants, of whom 1,376,369 were living at the capital, COPENHAGEN.

The small group of islands in the northern Atlantic Ocean, the Faroe Islands, and Greenland, have together 70,095 inhabitants, and these also belong to Denmark.

Denmark is an ancient kingdom, to which Christianity came very early. As early as 826 we find the first traces, which were visits paid by Ansgar, the Augustinian friar. Until 1536 the Roman Catholic Church alone was at work in this country and had built churches all over the kingdom. Several hundreds of these churches are still found and in use today. In 1536 the Reformation made its way in Denmark, and since then the Evangelical Lutheran Church has been the Established Church. However, from the year 1849 there has been a constitution allowing more freedom than in the usual state church, and that is why the church is called the Danish State Church.

Several of the free-church denominations in Denmark have been recognized by the state, which means that their ministers are authorized to perform all ecclesiastical ceremonies, such as matrimony, keeping recognized church registers, and to issue certificates with civil legality—that is, they have the same rights as the clergymen of the Established Church. On September 22, 1865, the Methodist Church obtained this right.

Denmark is a conservative country regarding church life, for which reason the free-church movement has had much difficulty in making progress.

Methodism came to Denmark in 1858 by the Danish-American CHRISTIAN WILLERUP. That same year he commenced preaching at a small hall in Copenhagen. It did not take long until his preaching attracted attention, and many people gathered to listen to his message. It is to be noted that, a couple of years before, Willerup had been in Copenhagen—on his way to Norway—and at that time he had held meetings in private homes. About the same time, another Danish-American had returned home. He was a traveling bookseller named Boje Smith, and he too had been converted to God in the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States. He became Willerup's first collaborator and proved a good one.

In 1859, on January 10, Christian Willerup organized the first Methodist congregation in Denmark, receiving on that day eleven persons into full membership of the church. Likewise he organized the first Quarterly Conference. In 1862 a site for a church was bought, and the foundation stone was laid on May 18, 1864. The new church, called St. Paul's Church, later St. Markus Church, and finally the Jerusalem Church, was consecrated on January 7, 1866. It was erected by voluntary gifts from people in Denmark and considerable amounts from the Board of Missions (M.E. Church, U.S.A.).

Congregations were next formed at Vejle in 1861, and at Svenborg in 1862. Gradually the work of the church spread to several places in the country, and at some of them there were considerable revivals and new congregations were formed.

In 1856, Willerup had been appointed superintendent of the mission in Norway, Sweden, and Denmark. In 1868, however, a superintendent for each of the countries was elected, and so Denmark then became a mission of its own.

For a long time Willerup had wanted to be excused from his superintendency in the three countries. His health had for some years been poor, but not until 1872 was he released from his services in Denmark. In his place another young Danish-American, CARL JENSEN SCHOU, was appointed superintendent. This was effected after a committee consisting of Bishop MATTHEW SIMPSON, Secretary of Missions JOHN DURBIN, and the Danish-American, Harald Dollner, Danish consul-general in the United States, had visited Denmark and examined the work there.

Carl Schou came home to a very difficult task. There was some opposition against him already before he arrived. This was due to a certain group of the Danish ministers who had wanted a Danish minister appointed to the superintendency. Now they got a total stranger and a very young man. Schou was hardly thirty-two years old when he took over the leadership in Denmark. He met with other disappointments too. The men Willerup had drawn into the church work were mostly Norwegians, and gradually they went home again. A few had to leave for personal reasons. Untiringly Schou continued his work. His honesty and zeal aroused interest and respect for the church, and the work was greatly stabilized in his days.

Schou called the first meeting of ministers in 1873, at which meeting it was decided to publish a monthly paper for the Danish Methodists, and likewise a hymnbook to be used at the services. At several places day schools for children were opened; in 1887 the publishing firm of the Methodist Church was founded. Then in 1888 a theological school for training of ministers was opened. The church work was in steady progress; congregations were formed; and several churches and chapels built.

Carl Schou, who had wrought well and who had never been in good health, died in 1889, only forty-nine years of age.

The next superintendent was JENS JOACHIM CHRISTENSEN, the first to be selected from the ministers who had grown up in the Methodist Church of Denmark. The last ten years of the nineteenth century was characterized by a considerable increase in new men, due to the newly established school for training ministers. To a high degree several of these men left their mark on the development of the church during the following ten years. Parish work flourished; social work increased swiftly; and churches and social institutions were built.

In 1911 the Methodist Church of Denmark was organized as an annual conference. At the Methodist Episcopal General Conference in 1920 at Des Moines, Iowa, ANTON BAST, the leading figure of the Danish Methodist Church, was elected bishop of all Scandinavia. Two or three years after his election a lawsuit against him began, which ended in his resignation from his office at the General Conference in Kansas City in 1928. This case made a great commotion all over the country, and sad consequences hit the church. There was stagnation and a decrease of membership.

Bishop RAYMOND J. WADE succeeded Anton Bast in 1928. In a letter to the Denmark Annual Conference on July 27 of the same year, Anton Bast asked to be released from ministry and membership of the Danish Methodist Church.

In August, 1939, just before outbreak of the Second World War, the first All-European Methodist Conference was held at Jerusalem Church, Copenhagen. There were representatives from almost all European countries. The following bishops were present: Raymond J. Wade, JOHN L. NUELSEN, F. H. OTTO MELLE, ARTHUR J. MOORE, PAUL B. KERN, and CHARLES C. SELECMAN.

At the Northern Europe Central Conference held at GOTHENBURG, Sweden, in 1946 THEODOR ARVIDSON was elected bishop to replace Bishop Raymond J. Wade; and this of course made him the bishop for Denmark also until ODD HAGEN, headmaster of the theological school at Gothenburg, was elected bishop at Helsinki on March 27, 1953.

Danish church work during recent years has gone fairly well without great fluctuation. At present the greatest problem of the church is a decided shortage of ministers. Recently, however, two new churches have been dedicated and several new social institutions erected.

The children and youth work of the church has always been a considerable asset. As early as in 1866 a Sunday school with a large attendance of children was to be found at the new church at Copenhagen. Probably it was the very first of its kind in Denmark. Youth work was organized in 1892, scout work in 1922. During the latest years a new branch of youth work, clubs, have been started, especially aiming at the older girls and boys and teen-agers.

The Board of Missions and Woman's Society of Christian Service of the Danish Methodist Church have collected very large amounts for foreign missions; and many Danish missionaries during past years have gone out, especially to the Congo, Africa, but also to the Far East. In 1892 the first Danes went to the mouth of the Congo River to participate in Bishop WILLIAM TAYLOR'S plan of placing self-supporting missions across Africa. Only three of the four Danes who went out returned. Wilhelm Rasmussen succumbed to the climate, and the other three had to go home again shortly after. The widow of Wilhelm Rasmussen later became Mrs. HELEN EMILY SPRINGER, wife of Bishop Springer. The Congo has always kept a leading place in the hearts of Danish Methodists. Due to political trouble after independence, there remained only one missionary in the Congo and one in Malaysia.

The social, humanitarian, and philanthropic activity is very great when the size of the church is considered. In 1879 in the Methodist church at Vejle the Temperance Society was founded, and this became the mother society of the temperance movement in Denmark. C. F. Eltzholtz was its founder. Since then, the church has had special temperance work, and for many years attached to it has been a home for alcoholics.

The year 1905 was the beginning of children's homes, and today this welfare work covers ten various homes and other institutions of different kinds. For more than fifty years the state authorities have allowed the sale of a small badge, the Spring Flower, which each year gives more than a hundred thousand Danish kroner for such welfare work.

The Bethany Society, the deaconess work, was organized in 1908. Beside building and sponsoring a couple of very fine and large homes for elderly and lonely people, this organization has had a rather moderate influence. (For the greatest social work, see also the Central Mission under COPENHAGEN.)

The Denmark Conference saw a dream come true when they established a Folk High School in 1969. They purchased a private school, fully accredited and with dormitory space for about 100 students at a total capital investment of about $172,000. There was some help from the Advance Special funds from the United States, and a definite plan whereby the balance will be amortized by the Danish Methodist Church over a period of years.

In the Danish educational system this school will function as an intermediary link between the primary school education and various kinds of practical training. At the same time it will serve as a Youth and Conference Center for the Methodist Church, providing excellent facilities for summer camps, various courses, etc. It will be designated the Folk High School in Denmark.

DENNETT, EDWARD POWER (1863-1947), American minister and editor, was educated in the UNIVERSITY OF THE PACIFIC, A.B., 1882; BOSTON UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY, D.D., 1886. He was married Aug. 12, 1891 to Alice Elizabeth Evans.

Coming to CALIFORNIA in early childhood, he was received on trial in the California Conference in 1886, and began a significant ministry in that body until retirement forty-eight years later. His twelve pastorates, including Central, Stockton and Trinity, Berkeley, were widely scattered over the Conference. He early assumed leadership in socioeconomic reforms. His only publication, The Christian Program (Methodist Book Concern, 1907), was in this field. His largest influence was as Editor of the California Christian Advocate from 1924 to 1932, and in membership in the GENERAL CONFERENCE sessions of 1908, 1916, 1920, 1924 and 1932.

Dennett was a short, slight man, and did his unusual service through a lifelong struggle with asthma. He was one of the leaders of the Conference in his generation, and in 1921, in the absence of the bishop, he was elected to preside over the Conference.

DENNIS, FRED L. (1890-1958), American U. B. preacher, conference superintendent and bishop, was born on Nov. 21, 1890 near Gwynneville in Shelby Co., Ind. He was the youngest child of farmer John William and Sarah Youngs Dennis. He taught two years in a one-room country school, but in 1910 he was granted a quarterly license to preach. His annual conference license was granted the following year by the White River Conference, Church of the United Brethren in Christ. In 1911 he married Anna Maude Sullivan and entered Indiana Central College. He was ordained in 1915 and graduated from Bonebrake (now UNITED) THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY in 1919. He served student pastorates while continuing his college and seminary training.

In August of 1919 he began a seven year pastorate in the Euclid Avenue United Brethren Church in DAYTON, Ohio. During this time he received 782 persons into church membership, and saw the membership increase from 764 to 1,139. He was elected Miami Conference superintendent in 1926. After three years he became the pastor of First Church in Dayton and led the congregation in a merger with the Cowden Memorial Church.

In 1941 the GENERAL CONFERENCE of his church elected him to the office of bishop, in which position he served until his sudden death in Dayton, Ohio, on Jan. 28, 1958.

He served as the first president of the Indiana Council of Churches, 1942-45. In the United Brethren Church he served as president of the Board of Publications and chairman of the executive committee of the Board of Trustees of Bonebrake Theological Seminary.

DENNY, COLLINS (1854-1943), American lawyer, preacher, professor, author, bishop, was born in Winchester, Va., May 28, 1854, the son of William R. and Margaret A. (Collins) Denny. He received the B.A. degree at Princeton in 1876 and the M.A. in 1879. He studied law at the University of Virginia and received the LL.B. degree in 1877. He married Lucy C. Chapman, and they had six children: Margaret Collins (wife of the Rev. J. W. Dixon), Elizabeth Chapman (wife of E. E. Vann), William Ritenour, who died early, Edith Allan (wife of the Rev. R. M. White), Lucy Chase (wife of Prof. P. W. Slosson), and Collins, Jr.

Denny practiced law in BALTIMORE from 1877 to 1879 and then entered the ministry of the M. E. Church, South at the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE in 1880. He was appointed to visit the Asiatic missions in 1886 and 1887. He was chaplain of the University of Virginia, 1889-91. After that he became professor of mental and moral philosophy at VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY, 1891-1910.

He was elected a bishop in the M. E. Church, South in May 1910, and served until May 1934. At the time of UNIFICATION, which he opposed bitterly, he declined to become a bishop in the new church. He was secretary of the COLLEGE OF BISHOPS of the Southern Church from 1910 to 1927. Before he was elected a bishop he had been secretary of the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1894; chairman of the Book Committee from 1898 to 1910; delegate to the General Conferences of 1894, 1898, 1902, '06, and '10; and fraternal delegate to the General Conference of the M. E. Church in 1908.

Denny was a member of the Virginia State Council of Defense in 1917, a member of the Virginia War History Commission, a contributor to the Library of Southern Literature, and a frequent contributor to The Methodist Quarterly Review and other Methodist periodicals. He wrote the Analysis of Davis's Elements of Deductive Logic and Elements of Psychology. He edited six editions of the Discipline of the M. E. Church, South, and edited and revised Bishop McTyeire's The Manual of the Discipline.

His legal training remained with him throughout life and determined many of his attitudes. He was a church lawyer par excellence. This legal bent could be seen in all of his preaching and in all of his writing.

After entering the itinerancy, for eleven years he filled pastoral charges in MARYLAND, VIRGINIA, and WEST VIRGINIA. When Vanderbilt's break with the church took place in 1910, he sided with the church. Upon his election as bishop and after retirement, he lived in RICHMOND, Va. and enjoyed a great reputation for his knowledge of the church and of secular history, especially that of the South. Douglas Freeman, the biographer of Robert E. Lee, asked Bishop Denny to read over and check his manuscript of the monumental four-volume work on Lee before it was published—which Bishop Denny did.

A supreme court justice of Virginia said of Bishop Denny, "He is the most learned man in Virginia." Denny had a vast fund of knowledge and spent much of his time answering questions which had to do with church history, discipline, and parliamentary procedure. He was considered one of the best parliamentarians the church ever had. In later years he was best known for his opposition to the unification of the Methodist churches, even though he had served for many years on various unification commissions. The PLAN OF UNIFICATION, which was proposed in 1914, was favored by Denny. However, he did not approve the plan which was finally adopted in 1938, and remained, he said, a retired "bishop of the M. E. Church, South." He refused to accept his bishop's pension from The Methodist Church.

He was known for several oddities, one especially being the way he corrected his ministers when they made a mistake on the conference floor, either in fact or grammar. At times he seemed very cold, even ruthless, when presiding, and in the chair was icily exact. However, this was but one side of the man. To those who knew him well, he was a most delightful host in his own home. It was often said of him that he "swore to his own hurt and changed not." Even his enemies respected his ability.

Bishop Denny died in Richmond, Va., May 12, 1943. His body was laid to rest by the side of his wife in River-view Cemetery, Richmond.

DENTON, TEXAS, U.S.A. First Church has made beneficent progress since its organization in 1857. In 1872 the first spire rose from a white frame structure in the downtown area on a lot that is used today. In 1899 a red brick building was erected, with doors opening on the same street, South Locust. A rapidly growing congregation made another building project necessary in the early 1920's. In 1951, Cole Chapel, given by the M. T. Cole family, and the education building were added.

In the town of 32,000, this church ministers to students in two universities. First Church tries to make religion and formal education a working combination. College professors are significant leaders in projects and in the church school, and students assume responsibilities in affiliate membership, teaching staff, youth groups, choir and music. Local members open their homes for "drop-in" gatherings after evening worship, and also sponsor retreats to the camp at Lake Bridgeport, and recreational outings at Price Camp, one of the recent gifts to the church.

By helping to support a WESLEY FOUNDATION on each campus since the late 1930's, and a Bible Chair since 1951, this church has been an active partner in the Texas movement for campus ministry. But work in higher education has not been a one-way relationship; student participation has brought enrichment and reward.

Two identical morning services in the sanctuary are now necessary. For more than twenty years, the worship has been broadcast regularly over the local radio station. There is a weekly news bulletin; W.S.C.S., with a membership of approximately 350; a Love Fund for emergencies among the needy, and a concern for missions. First Church is a mosaic of service, with significant pattern and changing dimensions.

SABRA PARSONS

DENVER, COLORADO, U.S.A., with a metropolitan population of 1,140,000 and an altitude of 5,280 feet, is the leading wholesale distribution center of the West, and is served by five railroads. The once small mining settlement founded during the gold rush days of 1858, was named Denver City after James W. Denver, territorial Governor of Kansas. Incorporated in 1861, Denver is the capital of COLORADO. It has been called the "Western Capital," because there are located the United States Mint and regional headquarters of over two hundred Government agencies in the Federal Center. Military installations such as Lowry Air Force Base, Fitzsimons Army Hospital, Buckley Field, and the Air Force Academy are near Denver.

One of Denver's main industries is meat packing. Other industrial interests include milling, oil refining, printing, mining equipment, rubber and chemicals. The city operates thirty-two square miles of Denver Mountain Parks, including the famous park of the Red Rocks. It is the home of the UNIVERSITY OF DENVER and ILIFF SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY, both Methodist, as well as other important educational institutions.

The first settlers in this area found gold in Cherry Creek where it empties into the South Platte River in the summer of 1858. The news brought settlers to the area, including GEORGE W. FISHER, a Methodist lay preacher, who delivered the first sermon in the area on Nov. 21, 1858. In the summer of 1859, the Kansas-Nebraska Conference sent two missionaries, WILLIAM H. GOODE and JACOB ADRIANCE, to organize the "Pikes Peak and Cherry Creek Mission." These three men preached in various mining camps, and on Aug. 2, 1859, they organized the Auraria and Denver City Missions (later Lawrence Street, and since 1888, Trinity Church). The next year the area became the Rocky Mountain District of the Kansas-Nebraska Conference, and then the ROCKY MOUNTAIN CONFERENCE was organized in Denver in 1863. In 1860 a group of Southerners organized the First M. E. Church, South in Denver. This church disbanded during the Civil War but was later reestablished and continued until union in 1939.

Between 1863 and 1876, when Colorado became the thirty-eighth state of the union, there were six new Methodist churches organized in the growing frontier town. In addition to these, in 1868 the first Negro church was organized by J. M. Wilkerson of the A.M.E. Church in Cheyenne. In 1891 this church took the name "Shorter A.M.E.," in honor of a pioneer bishop of the denomination. In 1872 the first German Methodist church became a reality.

Most important during this period, however, was the organization in March 1864, of the Colorado Seminary, now the University of Denver. Leaders included Territorial Governor JOHN EVANS, who before his appointment to this post by President Lincoln, was a medical doctor and was partly responsible for establishing NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY. Begun in the center of the frontier town in 1864, this oldest institution of higher education in Colorado had many problems, not the least of which was its lack of room for expansion. Consequently, in 1889 it was agreed to rebuild the school in a new area six miles outside of Denver city limits—University Park. Two of the thirteen chancellors of the University were later elected bishops: DAVID H. MOORE (Chancellor 1880-1890, elected bishop 1900) and WILLIAM F. McDOWELL (Chancellor 1890-1899, elected bishop 1904). These led the University in its relocating and rebuilding at its more promising location. Following McDowell, HENRY AUGUSTUS BUCHEL became the third Chancellor, remaining in that office for twenty years and leading the University in needed expansion. During two years, 1907-09, Buchtel was also Governor of Colorado. From a few hundred students in 1890, the University has grown to 9,000.

John Evans had proved vitally interested in the churches of Denver. He remained for many years a leader of the Lawrence Street Church, which established three Methodist churches in the city as "missions" of the parent church. After Evans helped to develop "Evans Addition" to Denver (where the present Civic Center stands), he saw the need of a fourth church, also begun as one of the missions of the Lawrence Street Church. However, there were financial problems, and finally in 1877 John Evans provided money for building the small "Evans Chapel" in memory of his daughter, Josephine Evans Elbert, who had died five years earlier. The area expanded rapidly and there was need for a building to seat more than the chapel could accommodate. In 1889 the new building, now called Grace Church, was completed adjoining Evans Chapel. Trinity and Grace remained the two major downtown Methodist churches until the 1950's when industrialism and urban renewal threatened Grace. Plans were made to relocate Grace and to preserve Evans Chapel, now the oldest place of worship in Denver. In 1960-61, Evans Chapel was taken apart stone by stone and rebuilt six miles away on the University of Denver campus.

The first bishop resident in Denver was HENRY WHITE WARREN, who made Denver his home from 1884 until his retirement in 1912. During this twenty-eight year period the city grew from a pioneer town (population 50,000) to a major city (population 280,289). Under the bishop's leadership in this same period, Methodism in Denver grew from 1,456 members in twelve churches to 7,468 members in forty-seven churches and missions. In 1912 there were several Methodist churches outside of the then Colorado Conference: one Swedish, one Japanese, one Italian, three German-speaking, one Negro M. E. (Scott, organized 1904); and one M. E. Church, South, which maintained a Chinese Sunday school.

One of the major concerns of Bishop Warren centered in the Iliff School of Theology which he helped to organize. The school was named for JOHN WESLEY ILLIFF from Ohio, a successful pioneer cattleman. When he died in 1878 at the age of forty-one, he left his widow, Mrs. Elizabeth Iliff, to manage his business interests and care for their three children. A few years later Mrs. Iliff met and married Bishop Henry White Warren, himself a widower. Earlier John Wesley Iliff had expressed concern that there was no center for theological learning in the West, and later his son, William Seward Iliff, agreed to provide for a theological building at the University of Denver for a graduate department of theology. Bishop and Mrs. Warren, through the Iliff estate, provided endowment for the school which opened to its first students in 1892. Succeeding years, with special financial problems, indicated that it would be better for the Iliff School of Theology to be separate from the University, and in 1910 the two Methodist institutions were organized separately on adjoining campuses. HARRIS FRANKLIN RALL, President of Iliff from 1910 to 1942, followed the liberal tradition established by Bishop Warren, as did LINDSAY B. LONGACRE, the German-trained Old Testament Professor.

Bishop Warren helped to organize a DEACONESS HOME in Denver in 1891, using his old residence after he and Mrs. Warren had built outside the city in University Park. This became also a hospital for the underprivileged. The Frances Merritt Deaconess Home continued its work until 1943. The bishop also organized a CHURCH EXTENSION SOCIETY and appointed a "City Missionary" in Denver. Between 1890 and 1912 the missionary organized eighteen churches and missions. Another active circuit minister in this period was the English-born JOHN COLLINS, whose efforts led to the establishment of several other South Denver missions, many of which continue to this day.

Between the retirement and death of Bishop Warren (1912) and the period of World War II, there were no new Methodist churches organized in Denver, while seventeen small missions or organizations in changing industrial areas ceased to exist. The population of the metropolitan area grew from 280,289 in 1912 to 448,702 in 1940. The M. E. Church, however, kept pace with the gradual development, growing from 7,468 members in forty-seven churches and missions in 1912, to 13,808 in thirty churches in 1940. Three different bishops served the Denver area in this thirty-year period.

FRANCIS J. MCCONNELL, elected bishop in 1912, was assigned to the Denver Area, which at that time extended from the Canadian border in MONTANA south to and including NEW MEXICO and MEXICO. One of McConnell's first official appearances in Denver was as a participant in the funeral of his predecessor in July 1912. He gave evidence of his strong social concern early in his episcopal term, and in 1918 he made a trip to the war front in France. His encouraging report of the probable early end of the war was greeted by a great crowd in Denver's Grace Church, April 1918.

In 1920, CHARLES L. MEAD, pastor of Trinity Church in Denver, was elected bishop and assigned to the Denver Area. At that time besides the Colorado Conference of the M. E. Church, there were churches of the DENVER CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church, South; of the Lincoln Conference (Negro); the West Swedish Conference; the West German; and the Pacific Japanese Conferences. An Italian Methodist church furnished an active program for that language group.

Bishop RALPH S. CUSHMAN was assigned to the Denver Area in 1932, where he remained until the UNITING CONFERENCE in 1939. The devoted activity of this bishop endeared him to his people. He held many visitations and preaching missions in those depression years. Salaries and membership remained static. Several of the small missions in Denver ceased to exist. The Iliff School of Theology and the University of Denver faced severe financial crisis.

The bishop from 1939 to 1948 was WILBUR E. HAMMAKER. Following the Uniting Conference, St. Paul M. E. Church, South and the Swedish church (Emmanuel) became affiliated with the Denver District. The German churches had long since merged into the conference. During World War II years, one new church was organized in Denver in 1943 (Montclair), the first in a third of a century. Also, concern for Spanish-speaking peoples was introduced into the conference, resulting in a Spanish mission—now the Spanish Methodist Church.

At the end of World War II, Denver began its second period of expansion. By 1948, when Bishop GLENN RANDALL PHILLIPS was assigned to the Denver area, The Methodist Church was ready to expand. During the years of his leadership (1948-1964), twelve new churches were established. In this sixteen-year period the Denver population climbed from 500,000 to 1,140,000 while Methodist membership grew from 17,108 in 1948 to 36,403 in 1964. This rapid growth came as a result of the Denver Church Extension Society, an organization similar to the successful one under Bishop Warren at the turn of the century. After the General Conference of 1960, the only church in Denver from the old Central Jurisdiction (Scott, membership about 400) became a part of the Rocky Mountain Conference, and steps were taken to integrate the Japanese church (membership about 400) into the Conference as well. There are now five congregations of the A.M.E. and A.M.E. Zion Churches in Denver. The Spanish-speaking ministry is also continuing.

Bishop R. MARVIN STUART was appointed to the Denver Area in 1964, and the merger of Methodist work and the four E.U.B. churches (total membership 985) followed the union of the parent churches in 1968.

The largest Methodist church in 1970 is Park Hill, with a membership of 2,957 and property valued at $1,203,939. Second in size is the Arvada Church with 1,984 members. Lakewood Church has a membership of 1,940, and University Park has 1,860. Trinity, descendant of the original Methodist church in the region, reported 1,693 members and property valued at $2,199,261.

Although the Kansas Conference of the WESLEYAN METHODIST CHURCH made several attempts to establish churches in Colorado, the first such was organized in the Denver suburb of Englewood on June 11, 1941. At this time E. L. Conrad, who had previously served in the Kansas Conference, became the minister of the newly organized church. This small church occupied three locations in Englewood and in 1946 moved to South Knox Court in Westwood (recently annexed to Denver). In 1959 they completed a new building in the Brentwood section of Denver. Their 1969 membership was 139.

In the meantime a second organization in the Denver area was planned. In 1953 this second organization was begun in Englewood where it remains as Englewood First Wesleyan Church. Present size of Englewood First Wesleyan is something less than 100 members.

Park Hill Church, Denver's largest Methodist church, is located in the Park Hill area east of City Park, and has been serving Denver since 1910. It was organized by a group of laymen on Jan. 10, 1910, and by Sept. 17, 1911, over fifty members were worshipping in its first building at 23rd Avenue and Dexter Street. Ten years later, with over 400 members, the church sold its property and moved a few blocks to its present location on Montview Boulevard between Forest and Glencoe Streets.

After using a multi-purpose frame tabernacle for three years, a new church, education building and gymnasium were built. In 1955-56 a new sanctuary, fellowship hall, and an extensive remodeling program were completed.

Among former pastors was WILLIAM H. SPENCE (1920-23), about whom his son Hartzell wrote the book One Foot in Heaven. Part of this book, and a later book, Get Thee Behind Me, has the Park Hill Church and community as its setting. One Foot in Heaven has also been produced as a play and motion picture.

Park Hill Methodist Church has 2,957 members and serves the entire city of Denver.

Shorter Chapel (AME) was organized with eighteen members in July, 1868. Its founder, J. M. Wilkerson, states in a letter to the pastor of Shorter Church (Aug. 12, 1890) that:

"The church at Omaha and the church at Denver are near the same age. I organized the church at Omaha, Nebraska about one month before I went to organize the Denver church."

This church, also the first Negro church in Denver, was originally named the "African Methodist Episcopal Church." At its formal organization (1868) it became known as Shorter A.M.E. Church. In 1888, when the church was legally incorporated, it took the name of St. John's A.M.E. Church. By order of the Annual Conference the name of St. John's was again changed to Shorter in 1890.

TRINITY CHURCH, DENVER, COLORADO

Trinity Church is the oldest church organization in Denver. It was organized on Aug. 2, 1859, the same year the city was founded. The first two buildings were log cabins, the latter one being carried away by the Cherry Creek flood of 1864. The site at 18th and Broadway was purchased in 1886 and the present sanctuary of Trinity Church was built under the pastorate of HENRY A. BUCHTEL, who later became Chancellor of the University of Denver and Governor of the State of Colorado. The cornerstone was laid on Sept. 5, 1887. The sanctuary, which seats 1,200 people, was used for community concerts and programs.

The pipe organ was designed by A. A. Audsley of London and was built by Hilfome Roosevelt, a cousin of Theodore Roosevelt. Its console is equipped with four manuals and the 4,290 pipes range in size from thirty-two feet in length to $\frac{1}{8}$ inch. For twenty years the choir was directed by Wilberforce Whiteman, and during this period was considered one of the great church choirs in America.

Thirty preaching ministers have served this church, five of whom were elected bishops: EARL CRANSTON,

DAVID H. MOORE, WILLIAM F. McDOWELL, ROBERT MCINTYRE and CHARLES L. MEAD. The educational building in connection with the church in past years housed the office of the bishops of the Denver Area.

The great Gothic stone steeple in the downtown area of Denver has long been a historic landmark of the city. A fire swept through the educational building in April of 1966, but was entirely rebuilt in 1968 and gives downtown Denver fine facilities for general and church meetings. A $65,000 chapel given by Dr. George Stiles is open every day for worship and meditation. Trinity is a downtown church serving the needs of the entire metropolitan area.

University Park Church began in 1894 when the then fledgling University of Denver was known as Colorado Seminary. In 1893 Iliff School of Theology, located on the University campus and adjacent to University Hall which had been erected in 1891, opened its doors for classes. No church was in the community at that time, although a Sunday school had been established in a store building a few blocks away. From this group the University Park Church was formed on Sept. 16, 1894, and services were held in University Hall. A. B. HYDE, a professor at the University, was the first part-time pastor with a salary of $237 for the first year. For a number of years the pastors were either professors at the University or students at Iliff School of Theology. Services continued to be held on the campus.

In 1918 the congregation began worshiping in the new Buchtel Memorial Chapel on the campus. Sunday school classes and social meetings were held in University Hall and Iliff School of Theology. Church dinners were served in the University gymnasium or in the Chapel basement. Records indicate that as many as a thousand persons were served under such difficult circumstances by the determined and dedicated women of the church.

The Ladies' Aid purchased six lots across from the campus, at the corner of Warren Avenue and University Boulevard, and later the men of the church purchased the adjoining six lots to the east, giving the congregation a full block frontage.

In 1928, when the congregation was thirty-seven years old, a church was finally erected. This provided a sanctuary, a social hall, and some classroom space. The pastor at the time was William Campbell Wasser (1867-1966). The portion of the church which he saw erected is now the Wasser Chapel. Benjamin Eitelgeorge was pastor when the earlier indebtedness on the church was retired.

In 1944 Alexander Bryans, Jr. came as pastor. During his twenty-two-year pastorate the church grew steadily until it now has 1,860 members. In 1951-52 the educational wing was erected, and in 1964 a new sanctuary was completed.

In 1966 Carl M. Davidson came to serve the church. At the present writing the balance of the indebtedness is being rapidly retired and the church is continuing to serve a widening ministry in the community and city. University Park Church stands on what is called "Methodism's Four Corners." Occupying the other three corners are the Headquarters Building of the Rocky Mountain Annual Conference, Iliff School of Theology, and Denver University. In this strategic location, the church proposes to fulfill its heritage.

DENVER CONFERENCE was organized by the General Conference of the M. E. Church, South in 1874. At the time the conference included COLORADO, MONTANA, and NEW MEXICO. The first session reported twenty-one traveling preachers and 636 church members.

The work of the Southern Church in Colorado began in the summer of 1860 when William Bradford from the Kansas Mission Conference went to DENVER. He soon had a congregation of twenty-six and a chapel, the first Methodist church erected in the city. In the fall of 1860, the conference in KANSAS created the Pike's Peak Mission and appointed Bradford superintendent and preacher in Denver; also, the conference authorized but did not appoint preachers to six additional circuits. With the outbreak of the Civil War, Bradford departed, his congregation in Denver disbanded, and the Episcopalians acquired his chapel. Union sentiment was strong in Colorado.

In 1871 the Western Conference in Kansas appointed seven preachers to Colorado, and that paved the way for the organization of the Denver Conference three years later. The Denver Conference was never strong. In 1930 it was absorbed by the NEW MEXICO CONFERENCE, and the Colorado work was a part of that conference until unification in 1939. At its last session in 1929, the Denver Conference reported nineteen pastoral charges and 3,181 church members.

JESSE A. EARL

DEPAUW, WASHINGTON CHARLES (1822-1887), an American businessman, manufacturer, and banker for whom in time DEPAUW UNIVERSITY in Indiana was named, was born at Salem, Ind., on Jan. 4, 1822. He had rather small educational advantages due to the pioneer conditions in which he then lived, and at sixteen, upon the death of his father, was thrown upon his own resources. His story is the story of the proverbial poor boy who by industry and intelligence, fought his way up until he obtained great success. It is said that as a boy he was unwilling to depend upon any of his relations, and so worked for $2.00 a week where he could get it, and when he could not, worked for nothing rather than be idle. He gained the public confidence, and at the age of twenty-one was without objection elected clerk and auditor of his native county. Several times he was reelected until he refused to serve further. In 1872 he was solicited from many parts of Indiana to be candidate for governor, and in his absence from the State actually was placed on the ticket for lieutenant-governor, but respectfully declined the nomination.

As a grain dealer, banker, and manufacturer, DePauw became extremely successful and built up a splendid fortune. This he employed in building churches and educational institutions, as well as helping the poor and educating the deserving. He was an active member of the M. E. Church and was elected a lay delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCES of 1872 and 1876, always being a steward and trustee of his own local church. In time he largely assisted what was known then as a female college in New Albany, Ind., but which afterward in his honor adopted the name DePauw College for Young Ladies.

When a charter was given to the Indiana Methodists under the leadership of Bishop ROBERT R. ROBERTS to found an institution at Greencastle, Ind., this institution which went on for many years under the name of Indiana Asbury University, changed its name in 1884 to DePauw University because of Washington C. DePauw, who was an influential benefactor of it. DePauw died in New Albany, Ind., on May 5, 1887.

DEPAUW UNIVERSITY, Greencastle, Ind., chartered in 1837 under the name of Indiana Asbury University, was founded by Indiana Methodists under the leadership of Bishop ROBERT R. ROBERTS. Its first president was MATTHEW SIMPSON, later a bishop. In 1884, the name was changed to DePauw University in honor of WASHINGTON C. DEPAUW, a benefactor of the college. Asbury College of Liberal Arts perpetuates its original name.

The School of Music, founded in 1884, is one of the oldest in Indiana. Bishops E. H. HUGHES, F. J. MCCONNELL, GEORGE R. GROSE, and G. BROMLEY OXNAM served as presidents of DePauw at the time of their election to the episcopacy. The institution has Indiana's oldest chapter of Phi Beta Kappa.

Through a large bequest made by Edward Rector, the college formed the Rector Scholarship Foundation and from this source grants annually about four hundred scholarships. In 1963, the Rolla M. Malpas Trust of $2,000,000 was established for scholarship purposes, and the John Ellis Wright Memorial Fund of $1,250,000 was set up for unrestricted use. In 1965 three anonymous gifts, two for $1,000,000 each and one for $500,000, were pledged and fifty percent paid in the first year. In 1966 the Ford Foundation awarded DePauw a $2,000,000 matching grant. Degrees granted are the B.A., B.M. (Music), B.S. in Nursing, M.A., M.A.T. (Teaching), and M.M. (Music). The governing board has forty trustees and nine visitors; twenty-one trustees elected by three annual conferences in Indiana, four by alumni, and fifteen by the board. Each annual conference appoints three visitors (nonvoting).

DEPESTRE, MARCO (1913-), pastor and agronomist of Haiti, was born on that island, November, 1913, in St. Marc, Haiti. His father was Edouardo Depestre, a medical doctor, his mother, Françoise Thevenin. He attended the Ecole des Freres de l'Instruction and the Chretienne Pitit Seminaire College, St. Martial, and later studied agriculture at the Government Agriculture School of Damien, 1931-34, graduating with distinction. He worked with the government from January, 1935, to April, 1946, in certain soil conservation programs and director of agricultural work until in 1946 he asked to be released in order to become a pastor. He studied theology at Caenwood College, 1946 to July, 1948, and from that day to this has been the minister in charge of the Petit Gove Circuit of the Methodist Church, making many distinctive moves in the field of social improvement.

He was the organizing genius of The Christian Institute of The Rural Life and continues to direct this group. This institute contributes greatly to the study of Haitian rural problems and solutions to them.

He has been instrumental in extending the ministries of the printed word, especially in his work of translating and editing La Chambre Haute, the French edition of

The Upper Room, started in 1956. This edition circulates in more than thirty countries. In 1966, Depestre launched the edition in French Creole, a dialect spoken by the majority of the people in Haiti. He and Mrs. Depestre, the former Christiane Ritchie, are the parents of nine children.

He received the 1970 citation award and dinner by The Upper Room in Kingston, JAMAICA, on Oct. 13, 1970, marking the first time that a Christian indigenous to the Caribbean area had been honored thus by The Upper Room.

DE PUY, WILLIAM H. (1821-1901). American pastor, educator and editor, was born in Penn Yan, N. Y., on Oct. 31, 1821. He joined the GENESSEE CONFERENCE in 1845 and remained a member throughout his life. Leaving pastoral work in 1849 to become financial agent for Genesee College, he assumed a year later the principalship of the teachers' department of Genesee Wesleyan Seminary. Later (1852) he taught mathematics and natural philosophy.

In 1855 he became pastor of Grace Church in BUFFALO, and subsequently served the four Methodist churches there. Concurrently, he edited the Buffalo Christian Advocate. He became assistant editor of The Christian Advocate in 1865 and held that post for twenty-five years. He was a manager of the Methodist Sunday School Union for thirty years. He edited The Methodist Year Book for a short time, as well as People's Cyclopaedia and the American revision of the Encyclopaedia Britannica (1891). ERNEST R. CASE

DERBY, England. From the earliest days many mighty men and movements have been associated with Derby Methodism. In many respects its history has followed familiar lines, yet there are interesting features which have played no small part in shaping the character and ethos of the Methodism as we know it today. The arrival, to take up residence in the town, of two London Methodists was of little significance to the citizens of Derby in 1761; but a year later, when on a journey from Sheffield JOHN WESLEY called at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Dobinson in Irongate, a crowd gathered and he preached and prayed with them. In this home was born a small Methodist society which was destined to grow in grace and strength. Its members built the first preaching house in St. Michael's Lane in 1764. In addition to the visits of the Wesley brothers, many other well-known preachers were heard here, including JOHN FLETCHER of Madeley and JABEZ BUNTING, who preached here on his wedding day.

The first Sunday school in Derby began in 1786. It is to the credit of those who laid the foundation of this brick building that after two hundred years it is still standing, although its purpose now is the manufacture of ladies' foundation garments! In 1925 the District WESLEY GUILD Council erected a tablet commemorating the first visit of the founder of Methodism.

In 1805 the society moved to a new chapel in King Street, which in turn became too small and was replaced in 1841 by a stately structure built on the liberal lines of the "Brunswick" chapels, with a noble Doric exterior and spacious pews, imposing mahogany pulpit, and massive organ inside. In its 120 years there are many revered names of families and ministers which one would wish to recall. The leading ministers of old-time Methodism have all occupied King Street pulpit. ROBERT NEWTON, four times president of the Conference, preached the anniversary sermons for thirty years, and after him Richard Roberts continued to do the same for another forty years. Among the distinguished ministers of the church was George B. Macdonald, father of FREDERIC W. MACDONALD, and four notable daughters.

It was through a woman that PRIMITIVE METHODISM began in Derby. In 1815 SARAH KIRKLAND, the first woman traveling preacher in Methodism, was invited to conduct a LOVE FEAST at Amboston; on her way home she preached at Chaddesden, and three Derby residents heard her and asked her to hold a meeting at Derby. The following night she did so; her converts were gathered into a CLASS MEETING; and within fifteen months Derby became the second Primitive Methodist circuit. This was the beginning of a great revival in the Midlands, one feature of which was the hearty singing. It was because of this, that at Belper, the Primitive Methodists were first called "Ranters."

In 1820 a chapel was built in Albion Street, Derby; then after a brief period in Babington Lane, the well-known Traffic Street Chapel was erected in 1844. An old building playfully called "the cathedral" was used in Normanton until the St. Thomas' Road premises were opened; these were enlarged and a modern church has been built to meet present needs.

The only secession on account of doctrine within Methodism took place in Derby. Six hundred members and four local preachers were expelled in 1831 from the Wesleyan society. These were the ARMINIAN METHODISTS who held Sandemanian views as to the nature of saving faith. Known as the "Derby Faith Folk," they stressed the part that the human will and intellect played in the work of salvation over against the grace of God. They were ardent revivalists and, unlike the parent body, favored women preachers. ELIZABETH T. EVANS was typical of these, who, under the name of Dinah Morris is movingly portrayed in Adam Bede by her niece George Eliot. The much gifted mathematician and tutor, George Spencer, father of Herbert, was associated with this body of Methodists in Derby. They eventually joined together with others and became part of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH of Britain. The Reform Movement, in which the notorious FLY SHEETS were published in 1844, had strong support in Derby. Among the ministers who were expelled by the Wesleyan Conference was WILLIAM GRIFFITH, who became a leader of the WESLEYAN REFORMERS in the town, and when Beckett Street Chapel was built in 1857 he ministered there for twenty-two years.

Another chapel which has had a glorious past and also holds an honored place as head of the largest circuit in the Nottingham and Derby District is Greenhill. Built in 1816 as an Independent chapel it was sold to the Wesleyans five years later. Because three butchers were prominent in its erection it was called the "Marrowbones Chapel." The philosopher Herbert Spencer and his mother were worshippers here. On the wall of the church is a tablet to the memory of a former minister, Williams Wilson, who was a pioneer missionary to the Fiji Islands. An attractive scheme for the modernization of this central church is being planned, it being the focal point and natural meeting place for the South Circuit functions, committees, and rallies.

Many might be mentioned as people whose vision and enterprise led to the establishing of societies at London Road, now the popular Queen's Hall Mission; at Rosehill, near the site of the old gallows; at Ashbourne Road, Kedleston Street, and the thirty or so other chapels in the Derby circuits. Like many large towns Derby is rapidly changing and developing. Vast areas of old property are being cleared to make way for new roads and buildings. The population has moved out of the town center into new areas which are teeming with life and growth. New work and witness has begun, new churches opened and others enlarged in such places as Chaddesden, Spondon, Breadsall, Darley Abbey, Mickleover, Littleover, Mackworth, Dunkirk, Allestree. It is not all that far from the old preaching house in St. Michael's Lane to Blagreaves Lane where Newmount, the most modern church in Derby, stands with its colorful stained-glass windows in abstract design, its sanctuary paved in Kotah stone from India, and its unusual off-center screen; yet between these two buildings there is a fascinating story of two hundred years of devotion, service, and sacrifice.

DESAI, RAMJI B. (1903-), was the first Gujarati college graduate to become an ordained minister of the Methodist Church in INDIA. His education began in the Methodist Boys' High School in Baroda. After completing his undergraduate studies in Baroda State College and obtaining the B.A. degree from the University of Bombay, he entered the educational service of Baroda State. Hearing the call of God to the ministry, he resigned from government service and enrolled in Leonard Theological College in 1932. Three years later he was awarded the diploma of a Graduate in Theology with distinction, and also received the B.D. degree from Serampur University. In 1949 he acquired the S.T.M. degree from Westminster Theological Seminary in Westminster, Md.

Assigned to the pastorate of the Methodists of Ahmedabad with no church building and no history of systematic giving, he challenged them to provide his full support, and also to start regular monthly giving for construction of their own place of worship. With fractional help from American friends, a site was purchased and a building erected. His subsequent appointments have included the superintendency of the Ahmedabad, Nadiad, and Umreth districts, a professorship in the Florence B. Nicholson School of Theology, and the principalship of the Gujarat Union School of Theology. In 1966 he had been Secretary of the GUJARAT ANNUAL CONFERENCE for fourteen years, a member of the executive board for sixteen years, and a delegate to every session of the Central Conference of Southern Asia since 1940. He represented the Gujarat Annual Conference in the General Conference of The Methodist Church in 1948 and 1964. He was a delegate from India to the First World Conference of Christian Youth in Amsterdam in 1939.

His activities have included membership in the Bombay and Gujarat Regional Christian Councils, the chairmanship of the Gujarat Christian Book and Tract Society, membership in the Senate of Serampur University, and the chairmanship of the Gujarat Sunday School Union, and membership in the Board of Governors of Leonard Theological College.

First Church is the oldest church in Des Moines. Established in March of 1845 at the forks of the Raccoon and Des Moines Rivers, First Church has continued at the heart of the city to this day. It began in traditional pioneer fashion with the formation of a Methodist class in the log cabin home of the Rathburn family. Thomas Kirkpatrick was assigned to be missionary to the Forks at the first Iowa Conference meeting at Iowa City in February, 1844.

The first Sabbath school was organized in the log cabin home of Benjamin Hoxie in 1846 and continued as a very definite reinforcement and support to the Rathburn Methodist class. The Methodists thrived and the first church building was completed in April, 1848, on Fifth Street in Des Moines, which had by then been platted and laid out. For some years this building also served the fledgling city as public hall, courtroom and general auditorium. Later, in 1881, a new building was completed at Ninth and Pleasant streets with the unification of the Fifth Street and Centenary Churches. In 1906, the cornerstone for the present church building at Tenth and Pleasant streets was laid. Subsequent remodeling and enlargement has continued to make First Church an influential force at the heart of the city.

The Methodist Hill Children's Center has recently been established in the educational unit, the first to be licensed in the city. A trained, pastoral counselor has been added to the church staff.

C. Clifford Bacon served First Church from 1937 until 1963. JOHN L. HILLMAN, later to be president of SIMPSON COLLEGE, was one of his predecessors. Present church membership is listed as 2,946 (1970), and there is a staff of three ministers.

Grace Church. At the 1884 session of the DES MOINES ANNUAL CONFERENCE, W. A. Wiseman was appointed to work in the northwest part of Des Moines. In June 1885, he erected a tent at 19th and Crocker Streets for worship and Sunday school. Forty-eight members met Sept. 9, 1885, to organize a church. A building was planned and a one-room frame church was dedicated Dec. 27, 1885.

On June 30, 1901, the cornerstone was laid for a new brick church on the same site. Boy Scout Troop No. 15 was organized in May 1915, and is still chartered by the church. The cornerstone was laid for a larger building further west in the city at 37th and Cottage Grove on Nov. 11, 1926. On Dec. 11, 1927, the church was dedicated with a membership numbering over 1,900.

An associate minister was added to the staff in 1946, and a third minister in 1954. The sanctuary was remodeled in 1953 and two services of worship were instituted. A music program was undertaken which resulted in six choirs with 260 voices. In December 1956, the education wing was consecrated.

Grace next served as "mother" church to a new congregation, Aldersgate, in the Urbandale area, furnishing a pastor and other staff in 1960 and 1961. In 1964 Grace sponsored two more new congregations—New Hope in northwest Des Moines, and Greenfield in south Des Moines.

Counted among Grace Church's outstanding members are Ralph Jester, nominated to the Methodist Hall of Fame in Philanthropy in 1964; Paul James, Sr., who served as a member of the Judicial Council of The Methodist Church for twelve years; and Mrs. J. A. Owens, who completed a four-year term as South Iowa Conference President of the W.S.C.S. in 1965.

Iowa Methodist Hospital is a fully accredited and departmentalized hospital. It was established by the M. E. Church in 1901, and is presently the largest private hospital in Iowa with 550 beds.

An original Warner Sallman mural, "The Great Physician," is a noteworthy feature of the hospital.

The hospital inaugurated the city's first Intensive Care Unit in 1961, and supplemented it with the state's first private hospital coronary care unit in 1966. Radioisotope laboratory, cobalt therapy, cardiovascular laboratory, recreation therapy, vocational counseling, speech-hearing services, electromyography, poison information center, psychiatric unit, premature newborn nursery, electroencephalography, communicable disease units, home nursing arrangements, clinical chaplains, and child guidance center make Iowa Methodist Hospital distinctive.

Iowa Methodist was the third hospital in the nation at which intra-cardiac surgery was performed (1956), and the first to use an electronic computer for medical research in a private hospital. The hospital has received several Hartford Foundation grants, usually reserved for large university teaching centers.

A Methodist hospital chaplaincy training program was begun at IMH in 1958, and there are medical internships and residencies, a professional nursing school, etc. The hospital introduced Patient Relations—a service in which personable young women reassure, and facilitate information to, relatives of patients in surgery, visit with and do errands for patients, and assist the chaplains.

Annual Pediatric, Orthopedic-Rehabilitation, and Internal Medicine meetings attract such dignitaries as the Queen of England's personal surgeon.

A $15 million expansion program is currently being undertaken and expected to be completed within the next seven years. The hospital will then have about 850 beds. One of the largest hospital volunteer groups in the nation, the Raymond Blank Hospital Guild, with 8,000 members, lends personnel and financial support.

DES MOINES CONFERENCE was organized at Clarinda, Iowa, Aug. 31, 1864 with Bishop EDMUND S. JAMES presiding. It was formed by merging the Western Iowa Conference with the west half of the UPPER IOWA CONFERENCE, its boundaries thus including the west half of the state. When organized the conference had six districts—Des Moines, Chariton, Council Bluffs, Lewis, Sioux City, and Fort Dodge; 67 preachers, 58 charges, and 7,293 members.

In 1867 the Des Moines Conference established Simpson Centenary College at Indianola. It continues as SIMPSON COLLEGE, a strong Methodist school.

In 1872 the upper half of the Des Moines Conference became the NORTHWEST IOWA CONFERENCE, thus limiting the Des Moines body to the southwest quarter of the state.

In 1932 the Des Moines and Iowa Conferences merged to form the IOWA-DES MOINES CONFERENCE which covered the south half of the state.

The Des Moines Conference had in its last year 320 churches, 67,662 members, and property valued at $5,097,560. (See also South Iowa Conference.)

DETROIT, MICHIGAN, U.S.A., has a population of 1,492,914 (1970). Situated in the southeastern part of MICHIGAN, it is the automobile capital of the country and the home city of many pioneers in that industry. Founded in 1701 by Antoine Cadillac in the service of Louis XIV of France, it was during early years an important fur depot and was of great military value because of the control of Great Lakes commerce. The early inhabitants were mostly French-Canadians and of the Roman Catholic faith. The second oldest continuously maintained parish of that church in the U.S. is Ste. Anne's, Detroit, established two days after Cadillac's landing.

Protestantism did not make its official appearance until the early nineteenth century. Its start was difficult as most of the ministers who came were from New England and were resented by the scattered Protestants because of their Yankee speech and manners. On the other hand, the settlers were depraved in morals and were indifferent to attempts to reform them. WILLIAM CASE writing to FRANCIS ASBURY said, "This country is perhaps the most wicked and dissipated of any part of America."

The first Methodist preacher to Detroit came in 1804. He was Daniel Freeman, a local preacher from CANADA. He made no converts and stayed only a few days. Later that year NATHAN BANGS, afterward a leader in Methodism, was appointed to a circuit in Western Ontario which included "the Detroit country." He made three visits to Detroit, but found few who wanted to attend the services.

Five years later more English-speaking settlers arrived, and in 1809 Bishop Asbury appointed William Case to Detroit—the first time the name appears in the Methodist records. His outstanding achievement was the conversion of Robert Abbott, Auditor-General of the Michigan Territorial Government. In 1810 William Mitchell was appointed and organized the first Methodist Society in Michigan, consisting of seven persons. They erected a church on the River Rouge, outside the town, in 1818—the first Protestant building in the state.

In 1826 the first Methodist church within the boundaries of Detroit was erected. In 1828 the Detroit Circuit reported 226 members. The opening of the Erie Canal increased migration from the East, and in four years, 1836-40, the population of Michigan doubled from around 100,000 in 1836 to 212,267 in 1840.

As the city grew, a second and a third Methodist church was built; by the year 1856 when the state was divided into two Methodist annual conferences, there were four Methodist churches, plus a French Mission and a German church. By 1875 there were six, and by 1900 the number had grown to sixteen. In 1970 there are forty-four Methodist churches within the city limits and a total of ninety-two in the Greater Detroit area, with a property value of $41,227,223; 68,467 full members and 19,210 preparatory members. The church school enrollment is 3,628 officers and teachers, and 34,611 scholars.

Central Church is the oldest Protestant church in Detroit and the lineal descendant of the first Methodist church erected in the city. Another historic Methodist church is Metropolitan, made famous by the pulpit oratory of MERTON S. RICE, who for thirty years preached to congregations of two to three thousand each Sunday.

Detroit is the seat of two universities. The University of Detroit (Catholic) has an enrollment in excess of 10,000. Wayne University (State) has over 20,000. A WESLEY FOUNDATION operates in connection with the latter.

The following Detroit Methodist pastors have been elected bishops: EDWARD THOMSON, WILLIAM XAVIER NINDE, FREDERICK D. LEETE, LESTER H. SMITH, HAZEN G. WERNER, and MARSHALL R. REED. A Children's Village, owned and operated by the Methodist Church, is situated at the outskirts of the city and cares for 200 children. A retirement home for senior citizens on Twelfth Street, the former Boulevard Temple church, has a capacity of 110.

United Protestantism is strong in the city. Over 800 congregations are affiliated with the Detroit Council of Churches. The Council has a vigorous program in the field of broadcasting, Lenten services, an annual Reformation Rally, religious education, social service and contribution to racial and industrial relations.

There are many minority groups in Detroit, the largest being that of the Negroes, which accounts to about thirty percent of the population today. Clashes have been frequent in the past, but the churches, in cooperation with civic-minded groups, have made significant contributions in promoting good will between the groups. The movement of large numbers to the suburbs has also created an "inner city problem"; but progress is now being made in urban renewal schemes.

Bethel A.M.E. Church. A.M.E. history in Michigan began in 1839 as a direct outgrowth of the missionary labors of WILLIAM PAUL QUINN. In that year the Colored Methodist Society in Detroit was organized, following a separation from the Methodist Episcopal Society. On May 10, 1841 this Colored Methodist Society was received into the A.M.E. Church through the influence of Quinn, and at this same time its name became Bethel. In 1849 it was incorporated. A second edifice was erected and entered on Dec. 22, 1889, under the leadership of James H. Henderson. In 1925 JOSEPH GOMEZ, since elevated to the episcopacy, led Bethel in securing her third and present building on St. Antoine Street. Bethel is the mother church of Ebenezer founded in 1871, and St. Stephens, organized in 1918.

Central Church is the historic, liberal Methodist church of downtown Detroit. The first Methodist preachers appeared in Detroit in 1804. In the fall of 1810 a society of seven members was organized on the River Rouge, six miles west of Detroit. The first society was incorporated May 14, 1822. Several of the signers had been members of the earlier society on the Rouge. The first Methodist church in the city was built in 1823-26, but it proved unsatisfactory. A second church, built of wood and costing $3,000, was located more centrally on Woodward and Congress, and was dedicated in 1834. Half the seats in this church were rented for a minimum price of six dollars per year. In 1848-50 a third church was built, seating 700 people. Church attendance increased with a series of able pastors, and soon the building was too small.

The Congress Street Church, whose edifice had been destroyed by fire, and the First Church agreed in February 1864 to unite and build a large stone church. The united church became known as Central M. E. Church. The present structure was erected in 1866-67, and was dedicated on Nov. 17, 1867. It was a lovely Gothic building, 123 by 58 feet, with a tower of 175 feet, seating 1,200 people. In 1936-37 Woodward Avenue was widened. In order to save the building and through a major engineering feat, the steeple was raised and rolled eastward twenty-six feet, thus shortening the nave. The workmen who turned the levers in the many jacks that lifted the great steeple did so with their moves carefully synchronized by music and so the stone tower rose evenly and the church was saved. Even today this is an impressive church on the main street, overlooking Grand Circus

Park, on the edge of the downtown area. It has been called the "most churchly and satisfying religious edifice in Detroit."

Women's work began early. The object of the Female Missionary Society in 1844 was "to beget a missionary spirit and to labor and pray for the success of missions at home and abroad." The women in 1867 were organized as a Benevolent Society, with special care for the sick and poor. In 1869 the WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY was organized with twenty-five members. The church early sent out missionaries. For many years a Chinese church was maintained in Detroit.

Famous ministers who have served this church include: EDWARD THOMAS, ELIJAH H. PILCHER, Wellington Collins, SETH REED, JOHN M. ARNOLD, WILLIAM X. NINDE, LEWIS R. FISKE, GEORGE ELLIOTT, FREDERICK D. LEETE, H. LESTER SMITH, LYNN HAROLD HOUGH, JOSEPH M. GRAY, FREDERICK B. FISHER, and HENRY HITT CRANE. Five of these later became bishops.

Just before 1900 Central Church went through a period of adjustment, with a decline in membership. JAMES THOBURN declared: "Heaven and the suburbs have drawn heavily upon us. All downtown churches must be maintained by uptown people. This is a new phase of Christian duty and obligation developed by the exigencies of modern city life." In 1914 Marshall Field, the famous Chicago merchant, wanted to buy the church's strategic corner. The trustees, influenced by H. Lester Smith, declared that the church is "not for sale at any price." In recent years Central has refought the battle of the inner city churches. A strong program is still maintained. Famous lecturers and speakers are brought here. The famed annual Lenten services of the Detroit Council of Churches are held here, and Central Church remains on its strategic corner.

In 1970 Central Church had two ministers and reported 1,249 members and a church property valued at $3,188,765.

Methodist Children's Home Society, The, is a multiple-service child welfare agency providing adoption, foster family care and institutional care for children, and counseling services to parents. Founded in 1917 by Methodist deaconesses under the auspices of the WOMEN'S HOME MISSIONARY SOCIETY as a home for ten orphan children, it became a separate corporation in 1921 upon the urging of the resident Bishop, THEODORE S. HENDERSON. This "Home" soon became too small, and in 1922 a new congregate, dormitory-type home for twenty-eight children was dedicated. This served both the Michigan and Detroit Conferences of the M. E. Church. It was at this time that Miss Frances Knight, a woman of unusual ability, became the Executive Director of the agency.

Miss Knight developed a plan for a Children's Village of cottages for small groups, which could provide for a family-type of living rather than the traditional, large group, congregate-type. She interested SEBASTIAN S. KRESGE, a Methodist, and founder of the Kresge Foundation, in the "village" plan, and through his gifts Children's Village became a reality on June 2, 1929. Additional gifts from the Kresge Foundation and interested individuals made possible the continued development of the seventy-two acre campus of Children's Village. This now includes nine cottages for sixty-three children, four staff residences, an administration building, the Children's Chapel, and Kresge Hall, with school rooms, recreational facilities, and social work offices. Miss Knight served as Executive Director from 1923 to 1948, William I. Lacy from 1948 to 1955, and Clayton E. Nordstrom is the current Director.

The current value of the land and buildings of Children's Village—which is also the location of all the services of the Society—is approximately $4,000,000. The current market value of its Endowment Fund is about $6,000,000.

The Methodist Children's Home Society has experienced some major changes and growth since 1948. Changes in services have been related to changes in the nation's health and welfare conditions. Services to unved parents and adoption services have increased steadily, and in 1965 the agency served 175 unved mothers and 91 infants for adoption.

All of the children who have been placed in Children's Village during the last ten years have suffered from deep emotional and social shocks, due to desertion, mistreatment, neglect, rejection, and/or misunderstanding. To meet their needs, the Society has developed a treatment service in Children's Village to help children overcome and correct their social and emotional problems, and to help them develop their natural abilities to lead happy, productive lives.

Currently staffed by twenty-five professional and forty-five non-professional staff, the Methodist Children's Home Society is nationally recognized for the high quality of its services, and the progressive nature of its program. It is a fully accredited member of the Child Welfare League of America.

Metropolitan Church is the largest Methodist church in Detroit, with a massive and impressive stone edifice on Woodward Avenue. In the spring of 1901 the North Woodward Church was organized, a union of the Haper Avenue Church and the Oakland Avenue Mission. The new church quickly purchased a lot and erected a tent in which services were held for a time. In October ground was broken for a chapel. The completed church was dedicated under the pastorate of Charles B. Allen in 1906. The membership was then 700.

In 1916 a new site fronting on Woodward Avenue was purchased for $175,000. Fire destroyed the old church. A tabernacle was erected on the old site, as governmental war restrictions then prohibited building on the new site. In 1923 ground was broken for the present church, and it was named Metropolitan. On Jan. 15, 1926, a victory banquet was held celebrating the completion of this great church. It had received the contributions of over 13,000 people and cost about $1,500,000.

Metropolitan has a priceless tapestry above the reredos portraying the Lord's Supper. On the grounds is a life-size statue entitled "Yet," done by the sculptor Alfred Nygard and erected in commemoration of a sermon preached by MERTON S. RICE.

The guiding star of Metropolitan Church for nearly thirty years, 1913-43, was Merton S. Rice. He spoke widely, wrote books, preached for two weeks each year in Detroit's noonday Lenten series, and attracted great crowds to Metropolitan Church. Essential also to the great growth of the church was Charles B. Allen, who served as pastor from 1903 to 1909, and came back as associate minister from 1919 to 1951. He was highly regarded as a pastor and fund raiser.

The membership of Metropolitan in 1913 was 1,293; by 1923 it had soared to 2,821; in 1929 to 4,107. In 1943 the membership had risen to 7,118, and for some years was regarded as the largest church in Methodism.

This church carries on an intense seven-day-a-week program in education, music, recreation and social activities. It has an enviable choir program under the leadership of organist-director F. Dudleigh Vernor. The church school is characterized by large active adult classes. The Rice Men's Bible Class was organized in 1915 by Dr. Rice himself. The church also operates a full scale neighborhood recreation program. It has had a strong missionary emphasis. In 1964 the Woman's Society gave $14,348 for missions, said to be the largest contribution of any local church in the U.S.A. A large scholarship fund has been established to assist the education of youth going into full-time Christian service. Several of the leading ministers of Detroit Conference have come out of Metropolitan Church.

In recent years Metropolitan has fought the battle of the "inner city" parish. It now has a membership of 2,359 (1970), and the church property is valued at $6,207,000. The amount raised for all purposes is $263,644.

Scott Memorial Church, which had the largest membership in the former LEXINGTON CONFERENCE of the Central Jurisdiction and is now a large church in the DETROIT CONFERENCE, was organized in 1909 with seven adults and two children. Organization took place in the home of Harvey F. Henson, who had come to Detroit from Indiana in 1905, and finding no Negro church of the denomination began efforts to secure one.

J. H. Payne, who organized several churches in Ohio, was the first pastor of Scott Church, the oldest Negro church of the denomination in MICHIGAN. The church was named in honor of Bishop ISAIAH B. SCOTT, who was one of the four Negroes elected as missionary bishops to serve in LIBERIA in the former M. E. Church.

Scott Church has had some outstanding pastors, including Samuel H. Sweeney, John B. Robinson, Gloster R. Bryant, Benjamin F. Smith, and EDWARD W. KELLY, Sr. Kelly was elected to the episcopacy in 1944 and was the resident bishop of the St. Louis Area of the Central Jurisdiction for eight years.

The Woman's Society of Christian Service has been recognized through the years as one of the best organized and most active not only in its conference, but throughout the denomination.

The present pastor is Clarence T. R. Nelson, a founder and national co-chairman of "Operation Freedom," a civil rights organization.

Strathmoor Church had its beginning in 1917 when twenty Methodists, living in the new Strathmoor subdivision of northwest Detroit, organized a church school under the leadership of Weldon E. Crossland. The first official record of the church appeared in the 1920 minutes of the Detroit Annual Conference. The first services were held in a two-room schoolhouse at 14350 Terry, the site of the present Burns School. In 1922 the congregation moved to the Masonic Temple Building near the corner of Grand River and Hubbell Avenues. In 1924 the first Strathmoor Church building was erected on the corner of Schoolcraft and Marlowe Avenues. The present site at 16801 Schoolcraft, consisting of three and one-half acres, was purchased in 1941. Construction was started in 1949 and completed in 1951. The educational unit which is considered to be complete and up-to-date in every way was completed in 1959. The 1970 membership was 1,557.

DETROIT CONFERENCE was formed by dividing the MICHIGAN CONFERENCE in 1856. Its boundaries include the east half of the lower peninsula and all of the upper peninsula. The first session of the conference was held at Adrian, Sept. 17, 1856 with Bishop THOMAS A. MORRIS presiding. After the division the two conferences were nearly even in strength, Detroit having 98 ministers and 10,755 members and Michigan 91 ministers and 10,623 members.

In its first session the Detroit Conference organized committees on education, Sunday schools, temperance, the Bible, tracts, slavery, parsonages, etc. The next year the committee on education commended to the conference the new State Agricultural College, the State Normal School, the University of Michigan, NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY, GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE, and especially the Methodist school called "Wesleyan Seminary and Female College at Albion." (The name was changed to ALBION COLLEGE in 1861.)

During the financial depression in 1876, the number of districts in the conference was reduced from eight to six. Thereafter, with more charges per district, the PRESIDING ELDERS had to abandon the time-honored custom of holding a protracted weekend quarterly meeting on every circuit, though they continued to visit every charge once a quarter. The conference was incorporated in 1876.

Most of northern MICHIGAN remained unsettled until the coming of the railroads around 1880. Alert to the prospective opportunities, a conference committee report in 1879 dwelt on the importance of "immediately marching up" to occupy that land. The Alpena District was established in the north that year, and attempts were made to start fourteen pastoral charges in the region. Some of the new places had to be abandoned when the lumbering and mining industries in the north declined.

From the beginning, the Detroit Conference supported Albion College. ADRIAN COLLEGE, a former M. P. institution within the bounds of the Detroit Conference, has received aid since unification in 1939.

In 1906, the conference established the Methodist Old People's Home at Chelsea. In 1920, it acquired jointly with the Michigan Conference, Bronson Hospital in Kalamazoo and the Methodist Children's Village near DETROIT. In recent decades the Detroit Conference has established seven WESLEY FOUNDATIONS and acquired six camps.

From 1915 to 1968 the conference had six districts. In the latter year the Detroit District became Detroit East and Detroit West. The other five districts are: Ann Arbor, Flint, Port Huron, Saginaw, and Marquette.

With the rise of the automobile industry in the twentieth century, Detroit and some other cities in the conference grew rapidly. In 1900 there were approximately 50,000 members in the Detroit Conference; by 1929 the number had risen to nearly 90,000. The economic depression which began in 1929 was a disaster for the conference. By 1933 the total raised for pastors' salaries had dropped 37 percent while world service giving fell to 15 percent of the 1929 level. It was not until 1947 that the conference again matched its 1929 contribution of some $230,000 for world service.

Between 1930 and 1960 the population within the bounds of the Detroit Conference increased 100.6 percent, and by the latter date one-half the population of the state was living in metropolitan Detroit. Macomb County immediately north of Detroit more than doubled in population between 1950 and 1960. Growth and shifts of population created two pressing problems—the need of money for church extension and the challenging need of an effective ministry in the deteriorating inner city areas. The conference had campaigns in 1953 and 1962 to raise large sums for church extension. It is concerned about but has not yet had notable success in ministering to the inner city where churches are declining in membership.

Detroit has been the residential city of the bishop of the Michigan area since 1916.

In 1970 the Detroit Conference reported 550 churches, 189,522 members, 96,140 enrolled in the church schools, and property valued at $127,726,910.

DETWILER, GEORGE H. (1853-1914). American pastor and evangelist, was born at Findlay, Ohio, Aug. 31, 1853. His parents soon moved to Mercer County, Ill. where he grew to manhood. He taught school for several years in ILLINOIS and IOWA. He married Mattie Griffin of Iowa in 1877. In the fall of that year he joined the DES MOINES CONFERENCE and in the next nine years served several charges. In 1886 he went for a year of study at GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE, and then for some seven years engaged in evangelistic work in Iowa and neighboring states. In 1894 he took charge of a school for mountain boys and girls at Hendersonville, N. C., and three years later he transferred to the WESTERN NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE (MES) and was appointed to the Rutherfordon Circuit. He rose rapidly. After one year, he was appointed to Gastonia, a strong church. He served the Salisbury District one year, and six years after joining the conference was sent to West Market Street Church, GREENSBORO, a premier appointment in Western North Carolina. He then served top churches like Tryon Street, CHARLOTTE, and Central Church, ASHEVILLE, and in 1910 was transferred to West End Church, NASHVILLE, TENN., where he ministered most acceptably for three and one-half years until his health broke. Dean WILBUR F. TILLET of the VANDERBILT Divinity School, who was usually loath to praise contemporaries, declared that Detwiler was "one of the most able, beloved, and efficient pastors" West End Church ever had. He said that with rare fluency of speech Detwiler dealt in his sermons with the great thoughts and themes of the gospel, adding, "I have rarely ever heard a man speak whom I considered more gifted in the use of words." Though Detwiler ministered in Nashville only three and one-half years, he came to be "regarded by all denominations as one of the ablest and most influential preachers in the city." Detwiler died July 5, 1914, and was buried in Charlotte, N. C.

DEULOFEU, MANUEL (1849-1911), one of the first national preachers of the Methodist Church in CUBA, was born in Bejucal and died in San Juan de los Yeras after serving six different pastoral charges, two of them being in FLORIDA. Teaching in the public schools of Havana Province, he had been outspoken against certain policies of the Spanish government, when friends told him that he was marked for execution. With his wife and daughter he embarked immediately, with the protection of the patriot José Martí, to Key West in 1886. In Key West a second daughter was born, Noemi, who has been a pastor's assistant for many years and is still active in Camaguey.

ENRIQUE B. SOMEILLAN was the Cuban pastor in Key West and superintendent of Latin work in Florida, and under his leadership Deulofeu and his family were converted. Deulofeu was licensed to preach, was ordained by Bishop W. W. DUNCAN, and sent to Havana where he established the first Methodist congregation in Cuba in 1892 on Neptuno Street.

In 1895, at the beginning of the Cuban War of Independence, his church was considered by the Spaniards as a center of American propaganda and so Someillan appointed him pastor of the Salvador congregation in Key West. In 1903 he was moved to the Cuban pastorate in TAMPA. When the war was over he was appointed again to Cuba and sent to the church in Cienfuegos and later to San Juan de los Yeras, where he died of cancer in 1911. His illness was a continual testimony to his faith, as he had his bed placed by a window where he gave out tracts and quietly preached to the passers-by who would gather around his window. A young atheistic businessman, AGUSTIN NODAL, was converted by seeing the way Deulofeu lived and died and became the Saint Paul of Cuba.

DEVADASAN, JAMES (1874-1935), was the first Indian principal of the Bareilly Theological Seminary. Of South Indian parentage and birth, his mother tongue being Tamil, he completed his high-school studies at Jabalpur, Madhya Pradesh, passed his intermediate examination (two years of college) in LUCKNOW, and was graduated with a B.S. degree from St. John's College (Anglican), at AGRA. On graduation he was invited to join the faculty of St. John's. He had by that time become fluent in the Tamil, Hindi, Urdu, and English languages.

Devadasan was a member of the Church of England, but was equally at home in Methodist churches. His interest in evangelism and social service led him to seek opportunities to help the needy. These he found in an organization known as the Prem Sabha (Love Assembly). Its members were mainly domestic servants who had been converted and baptized by Methodist ministers, but had not as yet qualified for church membership. He worked with these people enthusiastically, conducting literacy classes, preparing them for church membership, helping the unemployed to find work and to bring their relatives to Christ. He then joined the Methodist Church and decided God was leading him into the ministry. He soon was admitted to the Annual Conference on trial and passed the conference course of study.

He taught in the seminary for nine years, then went to America for further study. Returning to INDIA, he was elected principal of the seminary and held that position for nine years.

His last four years were given to the pastorate of the church in Agra. When the Central Conference was electing a bishop for the first time, he received a considerable vote. James Devadasan died March 6, 1935, and was buried in Agra.

DEVIATIONS IN ENGLAND, METHODIST. In the first half of the nineteenth century there arose several deviations from the main stream of orthodox Methodism, either because of especially strong evangelistic impulses or as a reaction against undue authoritarianism. One only was due to a doctrinal difference. These are here listed in mainly chronological order: QUAKER METHODISTS and INDEPENDENT METHODISTS (1796), BAND ROOM METHODISTS (1806), FOREST METHODISTS or MAGIC METHODISTS (1807), CAMP MEETING METHODISTS, CLOWESITES, and PRIMITIVE METHODISTS (1807), TENT METHODISTS, (1814), CHURCH METHODISTS (1824), ARMINIAN METHODISTS or DERRY FAITH FOLK (1831), CONGREGATIONAL METHODISTS (1834), TEETOTAL METHODISTS (1841), and the METHODIST UNITARIAN MOVEMENT (1806)—the only deviation on doctrinal grounds.

DEVILBISS, JOHN WESLEY (1818-1885), American circuit rider in Republic of TEXAS was born in Graceham, Md. He later moved to Licking County, Ohio, was licensed to preach by the OHIO CONFERENCE, and appointed to Coolville Circuit in 1840. In 1842 he transferred to the TEXAS CONFERENCE as foreign missionary to English-speaking and other immigrants. On his first appointment, Egypt Circuit, he rode 400 hazardous miles on each round. In 1844 a few Methodists were reported without ministry in the distant outpost of SAN ANTONIO with 3,000 Spanish-speaking inhabitants. There in 1891 the first Christian witness had been brought by Spaniards celebrating mass in Yanaguana, an Indian village preceding the Spanish settlement. The first ecumenical witness was reported in 1844 by DeVilbiss and a Presbyterian clergyman, John McCullough, who, along with fifteen American immigrants of different faiths, joined in a worship service in San Antonio. DeVilbiss delivered a historic sermon, taking first steps toward harmonious sharing of religious and ethnic cultures with those of various national origins. For four decades his leadership continued among newcomers and native Spanish-speaking people.

Organizing a congregation in San Antonio which included novelist Augusta J. Evans, DeVilbiss founded Travis Park Methodist Church in 1846. Native San Antonians affectionately called the young clergyman "Padre-cito." He was appointed to Caldwell Colored Mission for Negro newcomers in 1852. He ministered to German immigrants in their own language in 1855-59 while serving as presiding elder for the German District in Texas and LOUISIANA. He also assisted in the organization of the trilingual RIO GRANDE CONFERENCE—German, English, and Spanish-speaking.

During war years 1861, 1862, and 1865, DeVilbiss in the absence of the bishop was made President of the Conference. He was delegate to GENERAL CONFERENCE

(MES) in 1866. He served as agent for the AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY, 1866-70. He became Curator of SOUTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY in 1870; field agent in 1875. He promoted the chartering of San Antonio Female College in 1860, a school which after various changes merged with Trinity University in 1942.

After superannuation DeVilbiss lived on his Palo Blanco Ranch, Bexar County, Texas. Over the years this versatile circuit rider had also been teacher, saddler, even coroner and county surveyor. He died Jan. 31, 1885, and was buried near San Antonio in the cemetery of the Oak Island church which he had organized in 1867-68. DeVilbiss, sometimes called Carosso of Texas, was a true pathfinder in this former Spanish territory and in the confluence of cultures, and there laid foundations for a solid ecumenism.

DEVORE, JOHN F. (1817-1889), American pioneer preacher, was born near LEXINGTON, Ky., Dec. 7, 1817. He was converted at the age of seventeen, licensed to preach by PETER CARTWRIGHT in ILLINOIS, and joined the ROCK RIVER CONFERENCE in 1842. In 1853 he was transferred by Bishop BEVERLY WAUGH to the Oregon Conference and stationed at Steilacoom, WASHINGTON Territory, on Puget Sound. On August 23, the day of his arrival at Steilacoom, he organized a Methodist church, the second in the Puget Sound region. Before the end of that year he had erected the first Protestant church building north of the Columbia River.

DeVore's reputation for prompt and decisive action became legendary throughout the Northwest. In 1855 he erected a church at Olympia. During his pastorate at VANCOUVER, Wash., 1859-61, he dedicated a new building there.

In every pastorate DeVore pioneered work in the surrounding territory. He was the first Methodist minister to preach at Tacoma in 1872. In Washington and OREGON DeVore served as pastor twenty-two years, presiding elder twelve years, and in agencies two years. His biographer, Isaac Dillon, said of him, "His record for indefatigable labor and success in building churches, and encouraging schools, academies, and universities is equalled by few and surpassed by none." He was trustee of WILLAMETTE UNIVERSITY, Olympia Collegiate Institute, and the UNIVERSITY OF PUGET SOUND.

As a member of the publishing committee of the Pacific Christian Advocate, he contributed largely to the interest and continuance of that infant journal. He was delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE in 1872. The D.D. degree was conferred upon him by Willamette University in 1888. He died July 28, 1889, at TACOMA, Wash.

DEVOTION, THE LIFE AND LITERATURE OF. It is impossible to begin to understand the devotional life and literature of Methodism apart from JOHN and CHARLES WESLEY, especially John. His tiny figure dominates the scene. If ever a man were to get to heaven by spiritual discipline and the enthusiastic pursuit of holiness it would have been John Wesley, nor did his conversion in 1738 alter in any large measure the assiduity of his public worship and his private devotion. Throughout most of his long life he devoutly attended divine worship in parish church or cathedral at every possible opportunity; he took Holy Communion on an average more than once a week; he set aside an hour every morning for Bible study, meditation, and prayer; he used every devotional aid available—the Anglican Bible lectionary, the writings of mystics, poets, theologians, biographers, historians, and many collections of printed prayers, especially the Book of Common Prayer. Every spare moment of every day was improved by reading.

Few found themselves able to emulate this pattern of devotional life, but for generations to come Wesley remained the Methodist ideal, and continued to spur his followers to similar religious exercises long after his death, so that the impress of "Mr. Wesley" marked Wesleyan Methodism more or less throughout the nineteenth century, and remains to this day.

Wesley's early followers were mostly loyal members of the Church of England, into whose communion they had been baptized, whose worship they frequented, whose sacraments they received, by whose clergy they were married and buried. They came to Wesley's societies for something extra—the warmth of Methodist preaching services and LOVEFEASTS, the searching Christian fellowship of the CLASS MEETING, which in turn led them on to a life of deepened devotion. Constantly Wesley urged upon them the need to use all the "MEANS OF GRACE" ordained by God, chief of which were "prayer, whether in secret or with the great congregation; searching the Scriptures (which implies reading, hearing, and meditating thereon); and receiving the Lord's Supper" (Works, 3rd edn., V, 188; for a much fuller and more detailed summary, see Works, VIII, 322-4). In his General Rules Wesley made such spiritual exercises one of the conditions of continued membership in his societies. In the day to day life of the Methodists, indeed, one gathers the impression that more was made of the life of disciplined devotion than of enthusiastic revival meetings.

Methodists did indeed help to revive the regular and devout attendance at public worship and at the Lord's Supper in their local Anglican parish church wherever they were given the least encouragement, so that some church buildings had to be enlarged and new communion vessels purchased, as was the case in WILLIAM CRIMSHAW's Haworth. They helped also to bring spiritual warmth to the barren routine into which nonconformity had fallen, thus repaying to some degree the devotional debt which Wesley himself owed to the Puritans. It was indeed this general revival of piety which Wesley sought, rather than the founding of a new denomination, though increasingly he realised that his followers' growing dependence upon him for leadership and example would polarize a new denomination around him, despite his protestations of loyalty to the Church of England. He insisted that Christ as Savior must be offered to all, church or no church; he was equally insistent that Christ as Lord of life must be proclaimed, that Methodism was indeed raised up "to spread scriptural holiness throughout the land." (Works, VIII, 299)

Wesley never lost an opportunity of urging his followers to the life of Christian spirituality, not indeed as the roots, but certainly as the fruits of salvation by faith, and as the normal method of being built up in the faith, of pressing on to the goal of perfection, of perfect love, of holiness. To this end he became one of the world's leading devotional publishers, and his publications in their turn furnish a valuable key to the spiritual standards and practices of the Methodist people, both during Wesley's lifetime and later, both in Wesley's England and elsewhere. In this article we shall concentrate on devotional literature as an index to devotional practice.

The Methodists, like both the Wesley brothers, above all read their Bibles—read them devoutly, diligently, and deeply. They had no difficulty, therefore, in appreciating the constant scriptural illustrations and allusions in Charles Wesley's hymns and John Wesley's Bible expositions and sermons, nor in realizing how indeed the King James version of the Bible, along with the Prayer Book version of the Psalms, were woven into the texture of almost everything they said or wrote. Wesley provided them with aids to Bible study, but it should be pointed out that his Explanatory Notes upon both the Old and the New Testament were not (for the most part) scholarly essays upon the text and its context, but straightforward guides to understanding the English Bible, and applying its message to themselves, aided by an amended translation that in many details anticipated the textual improvements of the Revised Version of over a century later.

The early Methodists also read the hymns provided for them by the Wesleys—hymns themselves saturated with Bible lore and language. Altogether the two brothers published some sixty volumes and pamphlets of hymns for their people. Although these were indeed designed to add a new dimension of emotional warmth to Methodist worship, they were only in part intended for congregational use. The hymns of Methodism furnished also a new dimension to private devotion, as is indicated by the title shared by four of the major works in this category—Hymns and Sacred Poems. From 1780 onwards A Collection of Hymns for the use of the People called Methodists formed the companion book of devotion to the Bible in most Methodist homes, and a Congregationalist has testified that it became one of the supreme devotional classics of the world, ranking with the Psalms, the Canon of the Mass, and the Book of Common Prayer. (Bernard L. Manning, The Hymns of Wesley and Watts, London, Epworth Press, 1942, p. 14.)

Wesley was one of the most prolific writers in Christian history, but even more he was one of the most prolific editors and publishers. Of the several hundred works which he published some were for the theological instruction of the Methodists, some were frankly administrative or educational or controversial (though always with the glory of God as their ultimate purpose), but a large proportion must be classed as devotional "explanatory notes" upon the Bible, collections of prayers for private use (including Prayers for Children), a manual of preparation for Holy Communion, improving biographies, and general aids to the life of devotion.

Rarely did Wesley write a book himself, if the need could be supplied by revising a work already in print. In his search for devotional literature to edify the Methodist people, the field of choice was vast, and he explored it thoroughly. His taste was catholic and without prejudice, in this genre if not in others. He ranged from Europe to America, from Roman Catholic to Puritan. His earliest publication, A Collection of Forms of Prayer for Every Day in the Week, was based mainly on the work of a Non-Juror, Nathaniel Spinckes, itself gathered from the writings of Laud, Andrewes, Ken, Hicckes, Kettlewell, and others, all of whose writings were known to Wesley himself. To these he added selections from Jeremy Taylor, WILLIAM LAW, Robert Nelson, and others, probably contributing some prayers of his own.

It was undoubtedly through Wesley's advocacy that the Methodists came to appreciate many devotional writers of whom otherwise they would never have heard. In 1734 he published versions of two works by the Cambridge Platonist, John Norris of Bemerton, his Treatise on Christian Prudence and Reflections upon the Conduct of Human Life, each of which passed through several editions until the early nineteenth century. Probably Wesley's most important early work appeared in the following year, a revised translation of the Catholic classic, Imitatio Christi, issued under the title of The Christian's Pattern. He also published an abridgment of this, a separate reprint of Book 4 (entitled A Companion for the Altar), and even a translation of his own extract back into Latin, in order to ensure that the educational exercises of the scholars at KINGSWOOD SCHOOL would be colored by the spirituality which meant so much to Wesley himself. One of the Scots classics very dear to Wesley was The Life of God in the Soul of Man, by Henry Scougal, and he took care that this was kept constantly before his people. He also helped to keep John Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress in the public eye, though his brief abridgment does not appeal to those who love the full quaintness of the original. Wesley was much more successful in popularizing John Milton and George Herbert, even though this entailed not only large omissions from their works but extensive alterations. The two devotional writers whose works he edited in greatest number were William Law and Jonathan Edwards, very different from each other both in background, in message and in style, the one an English Non-Juror, the other an American Congregationalist. Wesley published editions not only of the two works by William Law which had so deeply influenced his own spiritual awakening, A Serious Call to a Devout and Holy Life, and A Practical Treatise on Christian Perfection, but also two volumes of his later mystical writings—and others. Wesley was deeply moved also, though in a quite different way, by Jonathan Edwards's account of his experience in the Great Awakening, and published all four of his works describing and defending it, as well as Edwards's life of David Brainerd, the missionary to the Indians.

Wesley believed especially in the inspiration of holy lives. Among his earliest publications were biographies of the Presbyterian Thomas Halyburton (1739), of a Roman Catholic, the Marquis de Renty (1741), and of a Methodist, Hannah Richardson—also published in 1741, but this time prepared by Charles Wesley. John's Christian Library abounded with biographies, ranging from the martyred St. Polycarp through Philip Melancthon, John Calvin, Sir Philip Sidney, and Richard Hooker, to John Donne and George Herbert. In 1744 Wesley published The Case of John Nelson, his pacifist stonemason preacher who was impressed as a soldier and braved every threat to preach to the officers and men until he was released on an exchange—an exciting story which eventually formed a part of Nelson's better known Journal, which passed through scores of editions and is still being reprinted. "A Short Account . . ." and "The Life and Death of . . ." became familiar (and apparently extremely popular) elements in the titles of Methodist publications, and in his Arminian Magazine Wesley ran a regular monthly feature of improving biography.

Wesley's largest devotional work was the fifty-volume Christian Library. This did indeed include a little speculative theology, but it was chiefly given over to what he called "practical divinity," namely, either purely devotional writing, or theology applied to everyday living. He began with sparse selections from the early Church Fathers, devoted over three volumes to John Fox's Acts and Monuments of the Christian Martyrs, and thus arrived at the writings of the Puritans, which occupied the bulk of the work. He included books which had exercised an important influence upon his own devotional growth, such as Jeremy Taylor's Rules of Holy Living, which in 1725 had prompted his keeping of a diary in order to maintain a check on his spiritual development, this in turn leading to his famous Journal and to the only less famous journals of many of his preachers. The Christian Library included not only that popular Anglican religious classic, The Whole Duty of Man, Pascal's Thoughts on Religion, RICHARD ALLEINE'S Vindiciae Pietatis (from which the Methodist COVENANT SERVICE was derived), and Devotions for Every Day of the Week, revised by Non-Juror George Hicckes from the manual by Roman Catholic John Austin, but Richard Baxter's Saints Everlasting Rest, John Bunyan's Holy War, and even the Shorter Catechism of the Westminster Assembly—all, of course, suitably abridged.

The Christian Library summarizes and symbolizes the conglomeration of devotional literature which Wesley had been providing for his followers ever since publishing his Forms of Prayer in 1733, and which he continued to provide both through separate publications and in his monthly magazine until his dying day. The Arminian Magazine was founded in 1778 as an antidote to Calvinist extremes. Continued as the Methodist Magazine and the Wesleyan Methodist Magazine, it retained the affection of the Methodist public until the present century, and was undoubtedly the most widely read periodical throughout Methodism. Similar magazines arose in the divergent branches of nineteenth century Methodism both at home and overseas, and formed one of the major elements (along with the Bible and the hymnbook) which secured a measure of continuity in Methodist devotional life.

The generation of Methodists following Wesley's death, in America as well as in the British Isles, maintained the patterns of devotion exemplified and instilled by him. They were assiduous at public worship, many of them (in England at least) continuing to attend both parish church and Methodist chapel each Sunday; they communicated frequently; they were constant in private and often in family prayers; daily they read their Bibles and meditated thereon; many of them kept spiritual diaries. Religious biography was their favorite literary diet. HESTER ANN ROGERS became familiar on both sides of the Atlantic through her Experience and Spiritual Letters, usually together with THOMAS COKE'S Funeral Sermon, and in various forms these passed through scores of editions during the first half of the nineteenth century, and indeed remained in print in both England and America until the beginning of the twentieth century.

In general Methodists were nurtured largely upon the literature which Wesley had supplied. Alongside his Explanatory Notes upon the New Testament on their shelves appeared a succession of Bible commentaries by his preachers: Thomas Coke (six volumes, 1801-3), JOSEPH BENSON (six volumes, 1815-18), ADAM CLARKE (eight volumes, 1810-26), and JOSEPH STUTCLIFFE (two volumes, 1834). Adam Clarke's famous Commentary created something of a furor in his own day because of what seemed somewhat advanced views on several points, but it proved the scriptural mainstay of the Methodists (after Wesley's Notes) for over a century, and is still in demand, especially among the more conservative.

Several of the Roman Catholic devotional works to which Wesley had introduced his contemporary followers retained at least a measure of popularity. The life of De Renty passed through three editions from 1803-30, and the extract from Thomas á Kempis's Imitation of Christ through thirty from 1793-1830, nearly half of these in the U.S.A. The perennial appeal of Wesley's Extract of the Christian's Pattern has continued to this day. His greatly abridged edition of Baxter's Saints' Everlasting Rest remained in print past the middle of the century, with over thirty editions, mostly in America, as did William Law's Serious Call with seventeen—again mainly American. Other popular reprints from the Christian Library were Baxter's A Call to the Unconverted (eight editions, 1792-1810) and JOSEPH ALLEINE'S An Alarm to Unconverted Sinners (fifteen editions to 1818, and one in 1841). Far more welcome, however, was JOHN NELSON'S Journal, which went through twenty editions from 1792-1830, a further seventeen by 1860, and another ten by the end of the century. Most popular of all was Wesley's famous Collection of Hymns, which retained its basic pattern until it was completely reshaped in 1904, though it was enlarged by supplements in 1831 and 1876. It is quite impossible to say how many editions were published, but there were at least a hundred before 1831, and many more after that date. Obviously its main use for most people was in public worship, but countless biographies attest to its widespread use in private devotions.

This strong dependence upon Wesley was especially notable, of course, within Wesleyan Methodism, but it was true also to a limited extent in the Methodist offshoots. Whatever controversial differences existed, these rarely concerned spiritual life, except that the PRIMITIVE METHODISTS rejected the Wesleyan love for liturgical worship in general and for the Book of Common Prayer in particular. It was they who developed most fully a fervency of prayer both in the CAMP MEETINGS, in regular worship, and in PRAYER MEETINGS held after public worship. The "Prims" also developed their own somewhat rough-hewn hymnology under the leadership of HUGH BOURNE, with far less dependence upon Wesley's book than was the case with the METHODIST NEW CONNEXION, the BIBLE CHRISTIANS, and the UNITED METHODIST FREE CHURCHES.

Although nineteenth century British Methodism bred many worthy writers—name only RICHARD WATSON, THOMAS JACKSON, and JAMES EVERETT—no one directed and inspired their devotional life as had Wesley. Perhaps that arch-controversialist Everett came nearest, with a series of popular Methodist biographies, the best known being a life of Sammy Hick entitled The Village Blacksmith, which went through at least twenty editions on both sides of the Atlantic during the forty years following its first publication in 1831. A major devotional landmark was set up in 1856 when an Irish ex-missionary, WILLIAM ARTHUR, published The Tongue of Fire, or the True Power of Christianity. This saw eighteen editions in three years, and was commemorated by a centenary edition in 1956.

By the middle of the nineteenth century, however, the growing church-consciousness of the Methodist societies not only diminished their numbers attending Anglican worship but led in some areas to strong church-versus-chapel feuds. An additional nudge away from the Church of England was afforded by the Oxford Movement, and the Romeward tendencies of many Anglican leaders fostered an anti-liturgical trend in Methodism. This affected private devotions as well as public, and the catholicity exemplified in Wesley's publishing activities was replaced by an unreadiness to explore new horizons in devotional literature. Methodist spirituality seems to have been turned out almost solely from the molds created in Wesley's day, but many forgot the secret of imparting the spiritual glow. To the reprints of a dwindling few of Wesley's publications, however, especially of his hymn-books, were added innumerable new biographies and sermons, most of them of little permanent significance. The best-loved and most typical biography of this period was of a Bible Christian, F. W. BOURNE'S The King's Son or, A Memoir of Billy Bray; this was first issued in 1871, went through six editions in less than two years, and no fewer than thirty-five by the end of the century.

Towards the close of the Victorian era Methodist biographies gave place slightly before a flood of fictional accounts of Methodism in the "good old days," especially in the slowly disappearing rural communities. Best known to the general public were the novels of Joseph and Silas K. Hocking, both United Methodists, but for Wesleyans there was no one to touch MARK CUY PEARSE, especially with his Daniel Quorm and his Religious Notions. Along with its promise of more things to possess, more activities to pursue, the advance of technology was not only swallowing up the quiet countryside but infusing complexity and haste into the lives of everyone. Darwin and Huxley had sown seeds of doubt among the theologians, and even the man in the pew was no longer as afraid of hell or as desirous of heaven as his forefathers had been. These nostalgic novels betrayed the fact that the days of deep and unselfconscious piety were largely passing, for the Methodists as for others.

Even the typical Methodist institution of the class meeting was in decline, and for most the BAND meeting was little more than a dim memory. Methodists were becoming less inclined either to exercise rigorous self-discipline in their private devotional life or to subject themselves to the spiritual discipline of their peers.

The institution of family prayer, in which the Wesleyans themselves had been reared and which they had successfully promoted among their followers, was engaged in a struggle for survival. At the same time the Methodists were tightening their patterns of worship, which became much more formal, and in some churches highly liturgical, though saved from barrenness by the Wesleys' hymns.

Even the hymns, however, were inevitably regarded with less favor by the many whose theology and spiritual experience did not vibrate on the same wavelength as that of many of the hymns which they had inherited, and by the end of the century drastic revision of the hymn-book was demanded. Uneasiness about the subtle changes taking place, however, seem to have been somewhat softened by sentimental reminiscences inspired by reading the latest magazine story or novel about "old time Methodism."

The liberalizing process continued at an accelerated pace into the twentieth century. In reaction there was a rebirth of interest in Wesley's catholic spirituality, both for its own sake and as an instrument of the ECUMENICAL MOVEMENT. This led to the formation of the Methodist SACRAMENTAL FELLOWSHIP. There was also a growing realization that the documented story of Methodism itself could offer valuable assistance in the pursuit of a whole Christian life in these disturbing days, whether as escape or as inspiration for spiritual renewal. This increasing interest in Methodist history led to the formation and steady growth of the WESLEY HISTORICAL SOCIETY, and the bicentenary of Wesley's conversion in 1938 gave a new fillip to Wesley studies. The patterns of Methodist devotion continue to change, and no one can forecast with certainty whether Wesley will return to dominate the scene once more. It seems safe to claim, however, that as long as there is a Methodist Church there will remain a spiritually-minded nucleus who will see in the two Wesley brothers not only the founders of a great church but the fathers of a great flow of Christian spirituality.

Nevertheless Methodism, both in Britain and elsewhere, has rapidly become less narrowly pious and more ecumenical in approach to the life and literature of devotion. No longer is Methodist reading largely confined to the authors of its own denominations, and Methodist publishing houses number among their authors leaders from other churches—and from no churches. On the other hand a few books by Methodist writers have exercised worldwide influence—to instance only E. STANLEY JONES's Christ of the Indian Road, LESLIE D. WEATHERHEAD's The Transforming Friendship, and some of the writings of DONALD SOPER and W. E. SANGSTER. American Methodism's The Upper Room is the most widely used devotional periodical in the world.

It may be suspected that unquestioning piety is gradually on its way out, or at least in eclipse, but the new generation of Methodists nevertheless evidences genuine devoutness in other ways: in a dedication to social justice, in the honest exploration of the nature and purposes of God, in the adventure of applying Christian principles to changing cultures and an expanding universe, in helping bring together the severed members of Christ's Body. All this would surely be commended by the founding father of Methodism, himself one of the greatest adventurers in spiritual revolution, who might well have said: "Let the patterns change, so the purpose remains the same, of giving glory to the most high God." DEWART, EDWARD HARTLEY (1828-1903), Canadian minister and writer, was born in Cavan County, IRELAND, in 1828. At the age of six he came to Upper Canada with his parents, who settled in Peterborough County.

Dewart was educated in the local schools and at the Toronto Normal School. He taught in the public schools for a few years, but in 1852 he was taken on trial by the CANADA CONFERENCE. Ordained in 1855, he was for a time a circuit minister.

In 1869, Dewart was elected editor of The Christian Guardian, a post which he held until 1894. To his post he brought the erudition, interest in education, and the literary skills which he had acquired. The Guardian thus continued to be a great newspaper, but one which became increasingly unresponsive to the needs of the church. Its editor believed that he should not be "an organ grinder, turning out the tunes which others have composed"; rather he should seek "not only to express but also to form public opinion." Accordingly, he vigorously opposed the union of 1883-84 along with other theological and ecclesiastical changes.

Apart from his work on The Guardian, Dewart helped to effect the union of 1874. He was a member of the VICTORIA UNIVERSITY board of regents and vice-president of the Ontario Ladies' College (Whitby). He published Selections from Canadian Poets (1864), whose introduction was a remarkably cogent plea for the promotion of Canadian literature, and many poems of his own composition.

Undoubtedly, Dewart, who received a doctorate from Victoria in 1879, helped significantly to raise Methodist literary and intellectual standards, and to focus the attention of Canadians on the problems of creating their own culture. Of him, as of John Knox, it might be said: "Here lies one who never feared the face of man."

DEWEY, HALSEY E. (1895-), American lay missionary of the M. E. Church, was born in Ruthven, Iowa, Dec. 7, 1895. He was a graduate of Iowa State College, with a degree in animal husbandry. Ordained in 1923, he began a ministerial career that included preaching, teaching, and healing. He quickly realized that the people of INDIA needed the preaching of the Gospel even more than they needed help in animal husbandry, agriculture, and medicine, but that the Gospel can be much more effectively communicated when preaching, teaching, and service are combined. Dewey ministered to all people, Europeans and Americans, Indian Christians, Anglo-Indians, Hindus, Moslems, Parsees, Jews, and Animists. He served for some years very successfully as principal of Mount Hermon School, Darjeeling.

He developed a strong interest in the Santals, members of an ancient aboriginal tribe, and helped to develop lay and ministerial leadership for their congregations. They have become an articulate Christian people, determined to achieve and to help others achieve the abundant life.

His wife, the former Hattie Hepperly, of Nebraska, came to India in 1922 to teach domestic science in ISABELLA THORBURN COLLEGE. They were married a year later. She died in 1958.

After independence, a government-promoted program of industrialization produced new colonies in an area of Bengal and adjoining Bihar, which were recognized by comity agreements as territory for Methodist work. Dewey gave invaluable help to Indian district superintendents, pastors, and laymen in welding people from varied denominational backgrounds and with different mother tongues into a dozen Methodist congregations.

The BENGAL CONFERENCE has twice elected H. E. Dewey to represent them in GENERAL CONFERENCE and repeatedly in the Central Conference and the Executive Board of Southern Asia.

DE WOLFE, CHARLES (1815-1875), Canadian minister and theologian, was born at Wolfville, Nova Scotia, May 30, 1815. As a young man he began to study law, but was converted and decided to enter the Methodist ministry. Trained at the Wesleyan Methodist Theological Institute, Hoxton, England, he was ordained in 1838 at CITY ROAD CHAPEL, LONDON.

After his ordination, the missionary society posted him to his native province where he preached until 1848, when he transferred to the Canada Conference. Returning to Nova Scotia in 1855 he served in several circuits. In 1860, however, he was stationed at Sackville and was given the oversight of the students at Mount Allison Academy who had been recommended as candidates for the ministry. The following year, Conference directed that Charles De Wolfe, "one of our most accomplished scholars and best theologians," be appointed Charles F. Allison Professor of Theology, the founder having bequeathed funds for this purpose. De Wolfe continued in this post until his retirement in 1870.

Honored by VICTORIA UNIVERSITY with a doctorate of divinity in 1862, De Wolfe was elected president of the Conference of Eastern British America in 1863. To his brethren he was a silver-tongued orator of deep learning, classic speech, and polished wit. He died on June 9, 1875.

DEWSBURY CHAPEL CASE was an incident in the institutional development of eighteenth century British Methodism. Dewsbury is a town in Yorkshire, and the need for a larger chapel there led to a scheme inaugurated in 1788 when money was raised on the basis of a definite promise made by the trustees that it would be settled on the usual Wesleyan Methodist TRUST DEED. When the building was complete the trustees refused to keep their promise and claimed the right to decide on the appointment of preachers. This was a burning issue and had caused a prolonged struggle in LEEDS in 1782: the official trust deed then worked out gave the Conference the right of appointment. In the case of Dewsbury negotiations were fruitless, and the Conference of 1789 decided to sanction the building of a second chapel in accordance with the official regulations. The first building became independent.

DHANJIBHAI, YUSAF (1869-1924), and GANGU (1873-1951), were brothers and greatly loved early ministers in Gujarati Methodism. Their parents, Dhanjibhai and Motibai Lalji, were Hindu domestic servants, employed by a Mr. Garmet, an engineer in Baroda and an active Christian. When army officers, converted in WILLIAM TAYLOR'S services in BOMBAY, started Methodist meetings in their homes, Garmet joined them. A number of servants and their children were won to Christ, among them the parents of Yusuf and Gangu.

Yusaf was baptized in 1881, and became eager to learn all the could about the Bible. He was assisted in many ways by members of the English Language Church. He became a teacher in an Irish Presbyterian mission school, but when a Methodist school was opened in Baroda, he transferred. In the meantime, Gangu had begun working with the missionaries, accompanying them to the villages and singing and playing the violin in their meetings. In 1896, both brothers were given local preachers licenses, having passed the necessary examinations. Yusuf was admitted to the Annual Conference in 1899 and Gangu in 1901. Yusuf joined Edwin Frease in establishing the Evangelistic Training School, out of which developed the Florence B. Nicholson School of Theology, of which first A. A. PARKER and then R. D. Bisbee were principals.

Yusaf served as vice-principal until his death in 1924.

While Yusaf was training young men for the ministry, his younger brother was giving fatherly care to boys in the boarding school and helping scores of them to an experience of Christ that made them eager to serve God and man by acquiring advanced education. The partnership of these brothers in Christian education contributed substantially to the development of both ministerial and lay leadership for Methodism in Gujarat State.

DHARUR JATRA, a Christian type of meeting in INDIA, is a powerful institution in Hinduism. The term, "Jatra" is more widely used in South India than in the North, but the institution, under different names, has been a feature of Hindu religious practice all over India for many centuries. The Dharur Jatra is very Christian. It was founded by two young M. E. missionaries, EARL ARNETT SEAMANDS and Marcellus Dow Ross in 1923. These young men had been richly blessed in CAMP MEETINGS in the United States and had become fast friends and fellow district superintendents in adjoining districts in India. As they talked and prayed about their task and for the pastors and congregations that looked to them for leadership, they decided that the American camp meeting and the Indian Jatra might be brought together to form a distinctively Christian kind of religious meeting. They determined to invite the most concerned of their preachers and laymen from the two districts to come together for Bible study and prayer. At the time and place appointed, a group of more than 100 Christians gathered in an open area beside a travelers' well, called locally Bondla Bhavi. Most of them were evangelists, but they gathered as seekers. They felt the need for a Pentecostal experience—some as they started their meeting, and others as they heard the young missionaries preach and testify. Almost without exception, all experienced a personal Pentecost. Returning to their work, they demonstrated power and faith that had been previously lacking in their ministries.

After three years the need for a better location that could become a permanent site for such meetings was so strongly felt that a search was started. A plot of eight acres of suitable land was found near the village of Dharur, and money was immediately provided for its purchase. During the Second World War, restrictions on travel interrupted the annual meetings. But after the war they were started anew, and have grown in favor year by year. In recent years attendance has averaged around 7,000, and the meetings have profoundly affected the quality of life in Methodism and in several other churches in South India. The church in the Hyderabad and SOUTH INDIA CONFERENCES has grown much more rapidly during this time than in any other part of India. Education and church construction have also made remarkable progress.

DHOBIA, KLASS (some manuscripts refer to him as Klass Oliphant) was born in Zebedela's tribe in the Northern Transvaal, and went to Colesberg in the Cape Colony to look for employment. There he was converted by Wesleyans and attended their school. He returned to his tribe to preach but the chief drove him away, and he joined another section of the tribe living on the Aapjies River near Pretoria in 1873. Here he preached and taught in the kraals of his people and eventually erected a fairly substantial church building of mud and thatch which was opened on Christmas Day, 1881. By this time there were seventeen members, two on trial and fifty-four seeking baptism. He had received occasional visits from George Blencowe and GEORGE WEAVING. OWEN WATKINS, the Chairman, visited the area in January 1882 and incorporated the Society into the new District.

DHULIA was the only mission station of the METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH (U.S.A.) in INDIA at unification in 1939. The work at Dhulia was started by two women missionaries who arrived in India late in 1905. They had no sponsorship, but worked with the great Pandita Rama-bai at Khedgaon, and while thus engaged they learned the Marathi language. Later they made their work over to the M. P. Church. Dhulia lies within Maharashtra State, 215 miles northeast of BOMBAY.

A day school, started in 1905, was maintained until 1934, when it was made over to the municipality; however, the mission retained hostels for Christian boys and girls attending the school.

The four missionaries who were in Dhulia at the time of unification united with the BOMBAY ANNUAL CONFERENCE or its adjunct, the Bombay Woman's Conference. They were JESSE F. MINNIS, of the Annual Conference, and Mrs. Minnis, Edith Lacy, and Mildred Miskinen, of the Woman's Conference.

A thirty-five-bed hospital, equipped with an X-ray machine and air-conditioned operating theater, and an outpatient service that treated about 15,000 patients annually, was under the direction of Dr. Edith Lacy.

Full integration of the station and the local church in the Bombay Conference was quickly established. Dhulia is the headquarters of a district by that name in the Bombay Annual Conference.

DICKERSON, WILLIAM FISHER (1844-1884), American bishop of the A. M. E. Church was born in Woodbury, N. J., on Jan. 15, 1844, the son of the Rev. Henry and Sophia Dickerson. He was educated at Lincoln University, Pennsylvania, receiving the A.B. degree there and the honorary D.D. degree from WILBERFORCE UNIVERSITY. He was admitted to the New York Conference in 1870 after having been ordained DEACON in 1868 and ELDER in 1871. He was a pastor in MASSACHUSETTS and NEW YORK. Elected to the episcopacy at thirty-six years of age in 1880, he was assigned to the Sixth District (SOUTH CAROLINA and GEORGIA) of his church. He was the first A. M. E. bishop to hold the A.B. degree. He died Dec. 19, 1884. One of his sons served in the A. M. E. ministry for many years.

DICKEY, JAMES EDWARD (1864-1928), American bishop, was born at Jeffersonville, Ga., May 11, 1864, the son of James Madison and Elizabeth (Thomas) Dickey. His father was a Methodist itinerant. Dickey held the A.B. (1891) and the LL.D. (1915) from EMORY and the D.D. (1903) from KENTUCKY WESLEYAN. He married Jessie Munroe, Sept. 9, 1891, and they had three daughters and one son. He joined the NORTH GEORGIA CONFERENCE in 1891 and was appointed professor at Emory College, 1891-99. He was pastor of Grace Church, ATLANTA, 1899-1902, and president of Emory College, 1902-15. Returning to the pastorate, he served First Church, Atlanta, 1915-20, and First Church, Griffin, 1921-22. He was secretary of education for his conference, 1920-21. A delegate to the General Conference four times, 1910-22, he was elected bishop in 1922. He had charge of conferences in TEXAS and NEW MEXICO, 1922-26, and in KENTUCKY and ILLINOIS, 1926-28. Dickey served as a trustee of Emory College, as a delegate to the ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCES of 1911 and 1921, and as a member of the Methodist unification commission, beginning in 1918. He was a conservative, a man of the old school who dressed and looked like a gentleman and a statesman. A good speaker, at the opening of the 1918 General Conference in Atlanta he turned what might have been a perfunctory word of welcome at ten o'clock at night into a brilliant, stirring address which no doubt contributed to his elevation to the episcopacy in 1922. Dickey was one of the minority of Southern bishops who opposed Methodist unification in the 1920's. He died at Louisville, Ky., April 17, 1928, and was buried in Atlanta.

DICKEY, SARAH ANN (1838-1904), teacher and champion of the Negro, was born at Brown's Run in southwestern Ohio. Her mother died when she was eight, and since the family numbered eight children, her father was compelled to send her away to work on a farm. Until she was sixteen, Sarah Dickey had only a few weeks' schooling. Then she joined a family who permitted her to attend school and within three years she received her teacher's certificate, in spite of rising at four, working until school time, and again after school until ten o'clock, when she was free to study.

Her first teaching assignment at age twenty required a daily walk of eighteen miles. Her sympathies for the Negro prompted her to apply to the Mission Board of the United Brethren in Christ for service in Sierra Leone but she was not accepted.

In 1863, the United Brethren Mission Board opened a Freedman's Mission in Vicksburg, Miss. Sarah Dickey was one of three women teachers assigned to teach the emancipated Negroes pouring into Vicksburg. For two years she taught in that school until the withdrawal of the occupying Union Army caused the school to close.

Penniless, she went to Mount Holyoke Seminary in Massachusetts and worked her way through the four years. While there her driving compulsion was to return to Mississippi to establish a school for Negro girls.

In 1870 she was back in Mississippi, teaching in a Negro school in spite of great resentment and threats to her life.

By 1874 the first classes were conducted in Mount Hermon Seminary, a Negro girls' school established by Sarah Dickey at Clinton, Miss.

Since no organization sponsored it, Miss Dickey was compelled to spend several months annually traveling in the North to solicit funds. In 1896, on one of these trips she was ordained by the Miami Conference as one of the first women ministers of the United Brethren Church, the denomination in which she had her membership since her twentieth year.

Her school continued for twenty years after her death, Jan. 23, 1904, then closed. She was buried in Clinton, Miss., on the school grounds. The book Dauntless in Mississippi, The Life of Sarah A. Dickey, written by a former Mt. Holyoke teacher, tells the story of this courageous woman.

DICKHAUT, JOHN WILSON (1913-), American minister and president of the METHODIST THEOLOGICAL SCHOOL, Delaware, Ohio, was born at Mount Vernon, Ind., Feb. 11, 1913, son of John and Mary (Wolfe) Dickhaut.

He was graduated with the B.A. degree from Marietta College in 1935, B.D., GARRETT SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY, 1938. He was awarded the D.D. degree from Ohio Northern University, 1955, and from OHIO WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, 1959. He also holds the S.T.D. degree from BALDWIN-WALLACE COLLEGE, 1958, and L.H.D. from Rio Grande College, 1962. He was married to Margaret Sapp on June 30, 1939.

He joined the OHIO CONFERENCE, M. E. Church, 1937, and served a number of pastorates in OHIO. He became superintendent of the Dayton, Ohio, District, 1954-55, and of the Columbus District, 1955-57. He was director of Methodist Theological School, Delaware, Ohio, 1957-59, and since 1959 has been president of that institution. He has been a member of the Board of Education of the Ohio Conference since 1960. He was a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1964, and since 1964 has been a member of the Ecumenical Council.

DICKIE, MICHAEL (1863-1939), naturalized American preacher and missionary to BRAZIL, was born in Lisburn, IRELAND, on Oct. 16, 1863. After coming to the United States, he became a Methodist preacher, and was licensed at the Broad Street Church in RICHMOND, Va. He was accepted by the Board of Missions and sent to Brazil with his wife, Bella, in 1888. On July 30 of that year, he was ordained a local DEACON, and in August, 1890, an ELDER at the Brazil Annual Conference, by Bishop J. C. GRANBERY.

Dickie served as pastor and presiding elder, and built several small churches. During his ministry of nine years at Central Church, SÃO PAULO, he was instrumental in building the beautiful temple in which the congregation worships to this day and was effective in calling men to Christ. His rich, beautiful voice added to the Gospel's appeal.

After the death of Bella in January, 1899, Dickie married Julia Coachman about 1910. She was a descendant of the distinguished Coachman family that emigrated to Brazil after the Civil War, and was always very active in the church. She too was musical, and compiled and edited a hymnal, Aleuias, which was published by the Methodist press. There were no children by either marriage.

Dickie retired in January, 1935, and died in São Paulo, on Jan. 14, 1939, after fifty-one years of service in Brazil. At his request before dying, Luiz Gonzaga de Macedo, who had been converted under his preaching, conducted the funeral service. He is buried in the Protestant Cemetery in São Paulo.

DICKIE, SAMUEL (1851-1925), American layman prominent in the prohibition movement and college president, was born June 6, 1851 in Burford County, Ontario, Canada. His parents moved to Lansing, Mich. in 1858.

He was educated in the Lansing public schools and at ALBION COLLEGE, where he received a B.S. degree in 1872, an M.S. degree in 1877, and an honorary LL.D. degree in 1900 in recognition of his work in the national prohibition movement.

Dickie taught in Dansville, Mich. and later became superintendent of schools in Hastings, Mich. In 1877, he returned to Albion College as professor of astronomy and mathematics. During this period he became interested in the prohibition campaign, and delivered many speeches strongly favoring prohibition. In 1884 he was named chairman of the Prohibition Party at its national convention, and was an unsuccessful candidate in the Michigan gubernatorial election of 1886.

He resigned in 1887 from the Albion faculty to become chairman of the Prohibition Party's national committee, serving for thirteen years. He was elected mayor of Albion in 1896.

For ten years, 1890-1900, Dickie edited The Citizen, a prohibition periodical, in addition to his work as national committee chairman. He resigned his party post to become co-publisher of a prohibition newspaper, The New Voice, and was immediately elected vice-chairman of the national committee.

In 1901, Dickie returned to Albion College as president of the school. His twenty-one years of service were marked by sound financial management as the college was able to retire a long-standing debt of $92,000.

Samuel Dickie died Nov. 4, 1925, and was buried in Riverside Cemetery, Albion.

DICKINS, ASBURY (1780-1861), a PHILADELPHIA book-seller and publisher and secretary of the United States Senate from 1836 to 1861, was the son of JOHN DICKINS, early pastor of Old St. GEORGE'S M. E. Church in Philadelphia.

Asbury Dickins was born in NORTH CAROLINA July 29, 1780, and lived most of his early life in Philadelphia. Later he lived for some years in Europe. Following his father's death in 1798, Asbury conducted a book business at 25 N. Second Street, and in 1801, he, together with John Dennie, published The Port Folio at Philadelphia, a political and literary weekly. The magazine compared favorably with the best magazines in England, and it is today a collector's item. Dennie spoke of Dickins as a liberal man, one "who in literary negotiations is unaccustomed to measure talents with a two foot rule or to ascertain the exact quantum of mental labor with the vulgar arithmetic of a pitiable excise man." (Oberholzer, p. 170.)

From 1816 to 1833 Dickins was a Clerk in the United States Treasury Department under Secretary William H. Crawford. He is credited with having written Crawford's defense against the charges of Ninian Edwards, the Minister to Mexico. A Dickins letter in possession of the author of this article indicates that Dickins believed Crawford would eventually become President of the United States. From 1833 to 1836 Dickins served as Chief Clerk in the State Department and in 1836 he became Secretary of the United States Senate, an office which he held at the time of his death in Washington in 1861.

JOHN DICKINS

DICKINS, JOHN (1747-1798), noted early American preacher and publisher, was born in London on Aug. 24, 1747, and was educated there and at Eton College—which was quite a distinction at the time. He came to America sometime before 1774, was converted in VIRGINIA and became a traveling preacher in 1777.

His first appointment was to the NORTH CAROLINA circuit. Then he went to the Brunswick Circuit, and in 1780 to the Roanoke. FRANCIS ASBURY visited him there and reported that "his voice is gone."

At Dickins' house on Fishing Creek in Halifax County, N. C., the first plan for a Methodist school in America was prepared, and the first money was given for Methodist education. The donors were Gabriel Long and a Mr. Bustion. Asbury called it "a Kingswood school in America." Presumably, it was to be in North Carolina and indeed a Cokesbury school was established in that state around 1793.

Dickins located at the end of 1780, perhaps because of his lost voice and also because he had married Miss Elizabeth Yancey. He settled in Halifax County, and Asbury visited him there again on April 5, 1783, and persuaded him to reenter the itinerant ranks and go to New York. Wesley Chapel, of JOHN STREET CHURCH, had been behind the British lines during the Revolution and had disappeared from the appointments, and Dickins was sent to revive it. Asbury wrote, "I prevailed with brother Dickins to go to New York, where I expect him to be far more useful than in his present station." Actually the church had functioned throughout the war under the care of its laymen. It is said that in the city Mrs. Dickins became the first woman ever to live in a Methodist parsonage.

John Dickins met THOMAS COKE when he arrived in 1784, sent by JOHN WESLEY to organize the Methodists into an independent church and consecrate Francis Asbury as superintendent. Coke spent his first night in America at the Dickins' parsonage, and to Dickins he first related the facts of his mission to America which the latter approved. Dickins must have unfolded his plan for a school. Coke wanted a college, and COKESBURY COLLEGE was established in Maryland by the ensuing CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE. So Dickins may be regarded in some sense as the father of Methodist education in America.

He was a member of the Christmas Conference and by it was elected to DEACON'S orders. And when the new Church had been agreed upon it was Dickins who made the motion to give it the name of Methodist Episcopal Church.

He returned to North Carolina and was appointed to travel the Bertie Circuit. While on this circuit he prepared, in 1786, the first Discipline in the form which came to be the guide for all subsequent issues.

He then went back to New York for three years. When the Methodist BOOK CONCERN was formed in 1789 Dickins became its first agent or superintendent; he had saved $600—"125 pounds," he called it—and offered this to the conference to start the business. He remained in Philadelphia until his death, serving as BOOK STEWARD or BOOK AGENT and also serving St. George's Church there much of the time. As Book Steward he published 114,000 copies of books and pamphlets.

Dickins was the first author in American Methodism. He prepared and published a Short Scriptural Catechism, which NATHAN BANGS called "a body of divinity in a few words."

The first periodical he published was the Arminian Magazine. This was also a North Carolina product, conceived in 1789 at the conference at McKnight's Chapel. The preface of the first edition was signed by both Asbury and Coke at "North Carolina, April 10th, 1789." Two volumes were published, 1789 and 1790. It then disappeared to be later revived as the Methodist Magazine in 1818.

Thus John Dickins was responsible for the first school, the first collection for education, the first Discipline, and the first periodical. He was the first man in America to learn of Wesley's plan for the formation of the first Methodist Church in the world and he was the man who gave it a name.

John Dickins survived two scourges of yellow fever in Philadelphia. Although when the third dread visitation came, he seems to have known that he faced certain death, but refused to abandon the post of duty. He wrote to Bishop Asbury, for whom he named his son, "I sit down to write as in the jaws of death. Whether Providence may permit me to see your face again in the flesh, I know not; but if not, I hope, through abundant mercy, we shall meet in the presence of God."

He died in the third epidemic of the disease on Sept. 27, 1798, and was succeeded as Book Steward by EZEKIEL COOPER. "What I have greatly feared for years hath now taken place," said Asbury. "Dickins the generous, the just, the faithful, skillful Dickins is dead."

DICKINSON COLLEGE, Carlisle, Pa., traces its origin to 1773, although its charter was granted in 1783, the year in which the independence of the colonies was conceded by England. It was named for John Dickinson, a member of the Continental Congress and signer of the Constitution. He was the first president of the board of trustees.

The prime mover in the effort to attain a college charter was the distinguished Benjamin Rush of Philadelphia, a signer of the Declaration of Independence and one of the country's leading physicians. Rush believed that the civilization envisioned for the new nation depended "upon the right education of the youth" and that all ranks of people should "promote the growth of useful knowledge."

The college was under Presbyterian leadership until 1833, when the trustees voted to transfer it to the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church, and its first president under Methodist auspices was JOHN A. DURBIN. The college throughout its history has exerted a wide influence upon the Methodist Church of the middle eastern part of the nation. Four of the bishops elected by the Northeastern Jurisdiction since union were graduates of Dickinson College.

A chapter of Phi Beta Kappa was installed April 13, 1887, the first chapter in Pennsylvania. The college received a challenge grant of $2,000,000 from the Ford Foundation in 1966. It grants the B.A. and B.S. degrees. The governing board has 50 trustees, forty-six elected by the board and four by alumni.

JOHN O. GROSS

DICKSON, JOHN (1820-1907), American minister and bishop of the United Brethren in Christ, was born near Chambersburg, Pa., June 15, 1820, the son of James Dickson. His childhood was that usual to farm families of the day—simple life, short terms in inferior schools and work for each member of the family. John had little interest in school until he was about nineteen years old. He entered an academy at that time and later taught school in PENNSYLVANIA.

Dickson was converted and joined the church in 1843.

He was given license to exhort by JOHN RUSSELL, PRESIDING ELDER, and a QUARTERLY CONFERENCE license soon followed. In 1847, he became a member of Pennsylvania Conference, and was given Annual Conference license by Bishop WILLIAM HANBY. He was ordained by Bishop JACOB ERB, Jan. 26, 1850, in York, Pa.

John Dickson and Mary Jane Adair were married Nov. 14, 1848. A son of these devout people, William Adair Dickson, was a minister in the Pennsylvania Conference, and a daughter, Dr. Madge Dickson Mateer, gave her life to missionary work in CHINA, in the Presbyterian Church.

Dickson proved to be a builder of churches and helper of the people. He refused many offices in the general work of the denomination. He was delegate to GENERAL CONFERENCE in 1861, 1865, and 1869, when he was elected a bishop and served until 1893.

Bishop Dickson was an able expository preacher and a clear and concise writer. He was of great influence in keeping members from leaving the church during the "secret society" controversy. After retiring as bishop, he continued to preach and write. He died Feb. 22, 1907, and was buried in Chambersburg, Pa.

DICKSON, MURRAY S. (1915-1961), a leader in Methodist education in BOLIVIA and originator of many church projects, was born in Hillsboro, Texas, and received a B.S. degree in government and a M.A. in economics at SOUTHERN METHODIST UNIVERSITY. He studied toward a Ph.D. at Columbia University, and also attended

PERKINS SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY, Union Theological Seminary, and Hartford Seminary. He studied the conference course of study in Spanish while in Bolivia and was ordained in First Methodist Church, HOUSTON, Texas, in 1952.

Dickson started his career as director of the WESLEY FOUNDATION in Austin, Texas. In 1941 he was sent by North American young people to the First Evangelical Young People's Conference in LIMA, PERU. On the boat he met Mrs. FRANK S. BECK, who changed his thinking about missionary work and inspired him to go to Bolivia. He married Nova Bryant, a graduate of Texas Woman's University, in 1942. Their children, Frances, Margaret, and George, were born in Bolivia.

In 1943 when the Dicksons went to Bolivia they served as teachers at the American Institute in COCHABAMBA. He was acting director of the institute from 1945-46 and director from 1951-53 and again during 1955 and 1956. He was director of the La Paz American Institute (Colegio Evangelico Metodista) in 1957. At various times he was pastor of the Union Church (English-speaking) and the Spanish-speaking Methodist church in Cochabamba. He was superintendent of the Central District of the BOLIVIA ANNUAL CONFERENCE during 1952, 1956, 1958, and 1959, and of the Northern District during 1957 and 1961. He also served as executive secretary of the annual conference during 1958, 1959, and 1961.

In 1960 Dickson was appointed executive secretary of the Latin American Mission Board of The Methodist Church. At this time he was also executive secretary of the LATIN AMERICAN CENTRAL CONFERENCE and was working on plans for the session to take place in 1962 at the time of his death. One of his last acts was to take part in a survey that led to reopening of Methodist mission work in ECUADOR by the Latin American churches.

Dickson lost his life in an automobile accident, along with Louis Tatom III, on the road to Caranavi on Dec. 16, 1961. The two men were en route to hold a fourth quarterly conference and deliver medical supplies.

The Knight Award of the Condor of the Andes, the highest that Bolivia gives to foreigners, was granted posthumously to Dickson as a teacher who had done much for Bolivian education. His name was placed on a list of great Cochabamban teachers on a monument in the city—the only Protestant, the only foreigner, and the only representative of a private school on the list. The United States Senate gave him honorable mention as an American who had done outstanding service abroad.

Dickson helped to draw up proposals that Bolivia should be a "Land of Decision" for The Methodist Church. He saw the importance of colonization in the lowlands around Santa Cruz, Montero and Caranavi and made the first steps to locate the church in these areas. Wesley Seminary, to train Bolivian pastors, was also his dream. His vision contributed to the church's involvement in the social development of Bolivia, especially in education, agriculture, health, and medicine.

DIDSBURY COLLEGE, MANCHESTER, England, was opened as one of the THEOLOGICAL COLLEGES of the Wesleyan Methodist Church in Great Britain on Sept. 22, 1842. In 1945 the college was transferred to BRISTOL, thus giving a ministerial training center to the west of England. The lecture rooms were in the mansion which was in the grounds when purchased, but the students' living quarters were in a separate large building, which also housed the original chapel. Within recent years a new chapel and lecture rooms have been built, after the amalgamation in 1968 with WESLEY COLLEGE, Headingley, Leeds. The enlarged Didsbury campus is now known as Wesley College. Wesley College is an Associated College of Bristol University, and its tutors are recognized teachers of the university. Students are eligible to read for theological degrees at Bristol, and can avail themselves of other university facilities.

DIFFENDORFER, RALPH EUGENE (1879-1951), executive secretary of the Board of Missions of the M. E. Church and of The Methodist Church and often called a "missionary statesman," was born at Hayesville, Ohio, on Aug. 15, 1879. His parents were Frank and Addie L. (Arnold) Diffendorfer. He was educated at OHIO WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, A.B., 1902; DREW THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, B.D., 1907; and did postgraduate work at Union Theological Seminary in New York. Ohio Wesleyan awarded him the D.D. in 1925 and the LL.D. in 1942; ILLINOIS WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, LL.D. in 1941; BOSTON UNIVERSITY, L.H.D. in 1950. On Nov. 4, 1903, he married M. Edna Saylor.

He was made assistant secretary of the EPWORTH LEAGUE Board (M. E. Church), 1902-04, and later became secretary of the Missionary Educational Movement, 1908. For a time he served as director of religious education at Washington Square Church in New York. He was a delegate to the first International Conference on Missionary Education in Holland in 1911; in later life he became a trustee of the University of Nanking, CHINA; a member of the executive committee of the Commission on Christian Education; and was also in the FEDERAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. He was also in the Missionary Commission's International Sunday School Association for a time.

In 1924 he became corresponding secretary of the Board of Foreign Missions and remained in this, or a comparable position, until Church union in 1939, when he became executive secretary of the Division of Foreign Missions of the Board of Missions of The Methodist Church. In this position he remained until his retirement.

Diffendorfer came to have enormous influence in the Councils of the Church, and was a commanding figure in the missionary world of American Protestantism. He was a born executive, and his personality was all-pervasive in the meetings and administrative work of the Board of Missions. Bishop F. J. McCONNELL said of him that he would in a committee or conference "advance ten ideas in the course of a meeting—nine of these no good whatever, but the tenth worth everything everybody else had said for the past three days."

During his ten years as executive secretary, the second World War broke, and he took immediate command of the far-flung missionary empire of The Methodist Church throughout the world, giving directions by wire to each mission field in war-torn lands, and commanding missionaries as to safety moves that should immediately be made. The headquarters at 150 Fifth Avenue, New York, became in effect a foreign affairs office, and Diffendorfer earned the name that was frequently applied to him, of "missionary statesman." He resided at Madison, N. J., and commuted each day to New York, though he kept his conference membership in the ROCK RIVER CONFERENCE.
